The interpretation of law was and remains an indispensable postulation, inherent and the most significant in the application of the law. Through interpretation the aim is to clarify the obscure text, to rectify the imperfection of the text of the legal norm, to remedy its shortcomings, and in consequence, to specify the exact meaning of the legal norm. Interpretation concerns itself with emphasizing the authentic meaning of the normative texts, finding the spirit of the lawmaker-author, the authentic legal sense of the actions that occurred, of the conduct of the perpetrator, and the significant legal connection of these meanings. The necessity of interpreting legal norms is justified by several considerations, out of which the most important remains the one regarding the act that the lawmaker cannot and need not provide everything in the normative text. The unity between the spirit and the letter of the law, the continuity of interpretation, the useful effect of the legal norm are just a few of the principles that need to be taken into account in interpretation. Be it official (obligatory), or unofficial (doctrinary), interpretation remains an extremely important stage in the application of the law: the literature of specialty consecrates five important methods of interpretation (grammatical, historical, systematical, teleological, and logical). The latter method allows for the formulation by the interpreter of certain rational assessments, done through operations of generalization, of logical analysis of the text, of analogy, through applying formal logic.
The present study will mainly deal with this method, analyzing the main logical arguments used in interpretation.

Keywords: legal norm, interpretation, method, logical argument

1. Interpreting legal norms designates the intellectual process of establishing the exact sense of the legal norm[1].

Usually, through interpretation we understand the analysis and explanation of an obscure text, of a text that "leaves room for interpretation".

From the very beginning, interpretation was an indispensable postulate, inherent and the most significant in the application of law. Not the other way around, in the sense that the application of the law determines its interpretation, because in that case, substituting itself to the lawmaker, the interpreter would also become the judge of the opportunity of laws. But a law that would be impossible to interpret would also be impossible to apply, because nobody can apply something they do not know, something they do not understand[2].

Interpretation means, beside clarifying the obscure text and circumstantiation of a general text, the rectification of imperfections in the text of the legal norm, solving the contradictions in the specific text.

Through interpretation what is intended is eliminating the ambiguities in the legal text, the remediation of its shortcomings and, in consequence, specifying the exact meaning of the legal norm.

Interpretation concerns emphasizing the authentic text of the legal texts, finding the spirit of the lawmaking author, the authentic legal meaning of the actions that occurred, of the behavior of the offender and the legal-significant connection of these meanings[3].

In the specialty literature it has been said that interpretation doesn't have general utility in law, but only when the law is unclear. In this sense we are facing an obvious contradiction because in order to establish whether a law is clear, it needs to be necessarily interpreted. Claiming the formulation is unclear in a legal norm does not lead to the only basis of interpretation; the more general the formulation, the more jurisprudence there is; the more heterogeneous the practice, the more uncertainties and freedom of interpretation increase. On the contrary, rigor and detailing regulations, the abundance of jurisprudence, the uniformity of practice diminish the number of ready variants in interpretation, without ever eliminating them[4].

The theory of law contains several syntagms regarding law and interpretation. Thus, expressions such as the following can be heard: "the interpretation of law", "the interpretation of laws", "the interpretation of legal norms", "legal interpretation".

Through "the interpretation of law" we can focus on "a philosophical discourse, that takes into consideration the explanation of the main bases of the position and functioning of law in society (the theoretical and philosophical interpretation of law)[5].

The interpretation of law makes reference to "a certain hierarchy of the sources of law", the primordiality of the law as a main source of law being obvious[6].

Through interpreting legal norms we do not have in our scope the entirety of normative acts, but the interpretation as a moment of the application of the law.

2. The necessity of interpretation of legal norms is justified by the following considerations:

- in the process of applying the law, the implementing body (the judge, the administrative body) is forced to clarify with all precision the text of the legal norm, to bring law closer to the social reality, to go from general to particular and vice versa, to establish the compatibility of the legal norm in in a certain factual situation;
- the legal norm that has a general and impersonal nature cannot, not matter how perfect it is expressed, contain all possible situations that arise in the social reality. Through it's nature, the legal norm is general. It does not concern itself with concrete situations. This is why, many times it is incapable of predicting the rapid changes of concrete reality. The general sense of the legal norms can make the law obscure; thus it is necessary that its provisions should be adapted to each and every aspect of social reality that it regulates, in a general sense. The lawmaker cannot and need not predict everything. Is it impossible to them to encompass in a law all the needs of a society because it is so wide-spread?[7]. They don't have to, because in laws certain "blank spaces" are needed, some "valve concepts" to "allow for the dilation and for the communication with the world outside […][8], that can thus prevent the excess of compression in the legal system. The empty space created by the lawmakers, due to their impossibility of predicting all hypotheses of application – otherwise law would not be a general and abstract norm but an array of individual norms – is filled by the interpreter. Thus interpretation can have the traits of a "complementary legislation"[9].

Legal norms are established in a system; their application implies diverse relationships. In order for it to be correctly applied, it is necessary that it should be elaborated in conjunction with other legal norms that have the same domain, or a similar domain of regulation. And rightfully so it has been underlined that the current state suffers from a kind of "legislative bulimia"[10]. It tends to regulate everything. This excessive tendency of regulating through lawn leads to a legislative inflation and, in consequence, to a loss in value of legal norms. The rule does not have sufficient time any longer to crystallize and subsequently, it will be poorly drafted and coordinated with the rest of the legal system. This way contradictions appear between the provisions of the same normative act, between the provisions of multiple normative acts, between normative provisions and the general principles of law[11]. The role of interpretation is precisely that of eliminating these contradictions, the interpreter applying the principle of hierarchy of normative acts and thus solving any conflict between two acts (rules) of this kind[12];

- the reasoning of interpretation of the legal norms is given by the method in which the normative text is drawn up, by the language and style used in the normative construction. From this point of view the possibility of a confusing legal norm draft is not out of the question, a "product" of disregarding the requirements of lawmaking. The language used in a legal text is presumed to be utilized in the general sense. The general sense must be determined by the interpreter, and not specified by the lawmaker like in the case of technical terms;
- certain normative acts that are still in force were adopted a long time ago. As a consequence, disregarding the language of the times that was used (certainly outdated today), the normative text – that upon its adoption reflected the social reality of the moment – no longer corresponds to the reality "in the field".

3. In the legal doctrine and in jurisprudence a series of principles are relevant, principles that are at the foundation of the process of interpretation of legal norms. From a multitude of such principles, in order to form a general theory of interpretation of the legal norm, we have decide upon the following:

3.1. In the process of interpretation of the legal norms what must be respected is the unity between the letter and the spirit of the law, without any exaggeration on one side or the other. The imbalance between the letter and the spirit of the law leads to an abuse of rights, to the fraud of law.

Unity between the letter and the spirit of the law – as appreciated by prof. Gheorghe Mihai – irrevocably leads us into a system of law "Indeed, for this «spirit of the law» can mean «the spirit of the lawmaker», determined, who is in a position to appropriate the de jure knowledge of certain principles, but in a personal formulation, and to disregard other principles or declaring certain personal assertions as principles; but it can very well also mean an array of natural principles, that [7] Portalis, even since the preparatory phase of the French Civil Code, signaled the fact that it is extremely dangerous to want to regulate and provide everything: „To predict everything is impossible to achieve. The needs of society are so extensive that it is impossible for the lawmaker to provide everything" (apud N. Popa, Teoria generală a dreptului, C.H. overtake the preferences and interests of a lawmaker or another, the reality of which subsequently being accepted by the lawmaker and affixed as the foundation of all its normative acts[13].

The spirit of the law situates itself above the spirit of the lawmaker, if we understand the term "law" with it's universal meaning, that is "the spirit of any laws, regardless of places and times".

In ancient roman times law was defined as ars boni et aequi (the art of good and fair), concept in which we find the coordinates of law and moral. "Equity is not against that which is just in itself, but against that which is just according to the law" said Thomas Aquinas. From this point, Perelman concluded that equity is the appeal of the judge against the law. Still, sometimes the law itself makes reference to equity, so not always do we encounter the opposition stated by Aquinas and Perelman[14].

3.2. In the process of interpretation we must always have in mind the will of the lawmaker, what he intended in the moment of the lawmaking[15].

The will of the lawmaker concerns his mediated and immediate objectives, achievable step by step through the given laws

3.3. The principle of continuity of interpretation presupposes that once the interpretation is established in a certain sense, it cannot be too easily modified. The reason for this is given by the necessity for stability of legal rapports and so that one of the most important desiderata of the state of law – the predictability of constraint – can be achieved[16].

3.4. An interpretation must become „subiectum materiam", that is, it must be in direct relation with the entirety of the normative act (with the entire economy of law), with the legal institution and with the branch of law it pertains to.

3.5. Exception is to be strictly interpreted - exceptio est strictisimae interpretationis. Between law and exception there is the following relationship: specialia generalibus derogant – the general rule does not derogate from the special law, the special law derogates from the general law. In law, an exception exists only if it is provided expressly by the legal norm. The exception cannot be created through interpretation, and the existing ones must be restrictively interpreted. Restrictive interpretation is imposed in the legal presumptions that do only exercise their role in the precise cases for which they were written. In criminal law, poenalia sunt restringenda, in complete respect of individual freedom that cannot be touched but in the strict limits provided by law expressly.

3.6. Where law doesn't distinguish, neither should the interpreter – ubi lex non distinguit, nec nos distingere. According to this rule, to the general formulation of the text corresponds an equally general application. The interpreter cannot introduce distinctions if the law doesn't incorporate them.

The silence of law can be interpreted in favor of the freedom of action: all which is not forbidden, is permitted. The lack of express constraint must hence be always interpreted in the favor of the individual.

Tightly connected to the aforementioned is what Roman jurists called in dubio pro reo, in other words, when a text seems ambiguous or obscure, the court must always conclude in the sense that is most favorable for the accused.

This principle derived from doubt, favorable for the guilty part, is to have consequences upon the matter of proof; indeed, every man is under the presumption of innocence until proven otherwise and if the evidence do not meet the attributes provided in the law, objective and subjective, then it is natural that the accused should profit from them[17)].

3.7. The principle of effectiveness is expressed through the adage actus interpretandus est potius ut valeat quam ut pereat = the law must be interpreted in the sense in which it is valid.

The interpreter must at all times begin from the premise that the lawmaker adopted the legal norm in order for it to produce effects; we cannot ever state that the decreed legal norm is a nonsense and in consequence does not find its applicability. Legal norms must always be interpreted as such, so that their effect is ensured. An interpretation which would cancel the practical effect of the rule is not permitted.

4. The interpretation of legal norms knows two main forms, after which the interpretation must be done by a public authority or a particular person: official interpretation and unofficial interpretation.

4.1. Official interpretation (obligatory) is done by the state bodies that have attributions either in regards to elaborating legal norms, or in regards to their application. Thus we distinguish the following: authentic interpretation (legal or general), judicial interpretation (causal), administrative interpretation.

Authentic interpretation (legal or general) is done by the legislator himself when, through a normative act (interpretative act), he interprets his own adopted normative act. Nothing can be opposed to an issuing body of a normative act (the lawmaker) interpreting it on the basis of the principle "a majori ad minus" (who can do more, can also do less).

[15] „Optima lex quae minimum judici, optimus judex qui minimum sibi" = the best law is the one that leaves as little as possible to the interpretation of the judge and the best judge is the one that bases his decision in such a way through the law, that the arbitrary is as minimal as possible.

[16] „Minime sunt mutanda quae interpretationem certam semper habuerunt" = those that have a clear interpretation have always suffered the minimal amount of change (Paulus, Digestele lui Iustinian, 1.3.23.).

[17] Ibidem, p. 491.

We are not in the presence of an authentic interpretation but to the extent to which there is a strict equivalence between the original act and the act that interprets it, that is, if the interpretation is done by the same body and in the same form as the original act[18].

The interpretative normative act will be a common body with the interpreted act, it will be obligatory (in the sense that it is imposed to courts) and it will present the advantage that it radically eliminates all doubts the interpretation of law raises.

We are facing an authentic interpretation when, for example, the Parliament interprets through an interpretative law, a different law previously adopted or when the Government interprets a decision through another (interpretative) decision.

Through the normative act of interpretation, the only aim is to explain the adopted normative text, a correct understanding of the purpose and its finality and in no way adding new rules to the existing normative act.

The interpretative act should be applied from the date of its coming into force of the interpreted act, and consequently, the effects of the authentic interpretation being retroactive.

This aspect of retroactivity of the interpretative acts has constituted and constitutes the subject of certain major disputes in the specialty literature.

Judicial interpretation (causal) is done during the process of application of the law by the judge; it is always an interpretation by case. It only has obligatory force for the respective case and for the participants of the respective case.

Sovereignty of the judicial interpretation is a consequence of the independence of the judicial power. The courts remain not compelled, free in the sense of their own interpretations, otherwise also necessary to justly solving the causes brought forth unto them (to be tried).

In the specialty literature[19] what is underlined is the fact that between authentic and judiciary interpretation there is a main difference. In the case of the first form of (authentic) interpretation, the interpretation is granted a freestanding value and is made with the purpose of clarifying the meaning of a rule, not being conditioned by the necessity of concurrently solving a concrete cause. In the case of the judiciary interpretation, on the contrary, interpretation is just a means to solve a concrete cause. In these last situation, it is not about an act of interpretation, but about a (individual) legal act of application.

- Administrative interpretation is done by the administrative bodies in the process of application (of exercising) of the law.

The administration can emit general administrative acts of execution of the law (Government decisions, decisions and orders of the local councils) through which laws are interpreted, but these acts are not obligatory for courts, because of the fact that they are administrative acts, they are jurisdictionally controlled.

4.2. The unofficial interpretation (or doctrinary) does not have legal force, being optional (it does not have an obligatory nature) and it does not materialize in legal acts which have their being complied to and their application guaranteed by the state. It is represented by the opinions of the unofficial persons in touch with the elaboration and the application (and respect) of the law.

The unofficial interpretation made by specialists (scientists – jurists in the various scientific papers, treatises, courses, textbooks, monographs) is bestowed with a distinguished importance as a consequence of the analysis („de lege lata" or „de lege ferenda") made during the theoretical research of law, which ca be invoked in the process of the application of the law, but which is not mandatory.

The plea of the lawyer in a certain cause also has an optional interpretation; the court can take into consideration the arguments of the lawyer, if it so desires, brought forth in the case before the trial or it can reject the without any specific reason.

5. În deciphering the exact meaning of the legal norm the interpreter relies on a series of methods[20] named methods of interpretation.

The legal literature the existence of five inportant methods is consecrated[21]: the grammatical method, the historical method, the systematical method, the teleological method, and the logical method upon which we will mainly focus.

- The grammatical method is an elementary method of interpretation of legal norms and it is constituted out of using the morphological and sintactical analysis procedures of the text of the legal norm, starting from the meaning of the terms and expressions used, from the link between them, from the construction of the sentence.

Grammatical interpretation is oriented in three directions: etymological, syntactic and stylistic[22].

Etymological interpretation regards the original meaning given by the lawmaker to a term.

[20] The word "method" derives from the Greek "meta" = after + „odos"=way. Methods are an ensemble of rational procedures (elaborate set of rules) and rational operations, organized according to some principles in order to achieve a certain thing (see Gh. Mihai, op. cit, p. 495).

[21] Some authors like S. Popescu, M-L. Hrestic,A.Șerban,R.Stancu,M.Viziteu (See Teoria generală a dreptului, Pro Universitaria Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016) classify the methods of interpretation as intrinsic methods (that have at their basis the very texts that were interpreted, such as the grammatical method and the logical method) and extrinsic methods (that emphasize the external elements of the interpreted texts – the teleological method, the historical method and the systematical method). Other authors group methods of interpretation in analytical methods (the grammatical method and the logical method) and synthetical methods (the historical method and the systematical method).

This meaning could be a common one, or a technical one, or of specialty.

Te common meaning has priority if it is found in a provision of material law, presupposing that the lawmaker spoke to everyone's understanding.

The technical meaning has priority if the term is found in a provision of formal law, because in this kind of situations the technical language is used. But there are situations in which with the occasion of the interpretation it will be given the meaning requested by the context of the regulation, even if it corresponds to the technical scientific one.

The syntactical interpretation also imposes certain rules. Thus:

- a term used in the singular implies the plural as well and vice versa. In normative acts the singular is used, because it is a stronger way of expressing the impersonal nature of the legal norm. The singular exceeds the plural or vice versa, only when the law treats them separately or uses a quantitative formula of exclusion. If it were always considered that using the singular excludes the plural, absurd solutions would be reached, contrary to the vision of the lawmaker;
- when a term can be both a noun and an adjective, it's true role must be discernible;
- words are examined in a certain order: nouns together with their adjectives, verbs together with their adverbs;
- interpretation needs to keep sight of the specific meaning of the terms in the legal domain to which it refers in the moment when a solution to the cause is being searched for.

From the point of view of stylistic interpretation it is established that there is without doubt a style of the lawmaker, a different manner of expression for the judge and for the lawyer[23].

The stylistic technique uses, as a crutch, the linguistic context to which a word or sentence, which the interpreter wishes to determine, pertains; the more concise the text, the more common, elliptical, the more possible interpretations, it would seem.

In conclusion, the grammatical method represents an array of common reasonings through which we search for the authentic meaning of the legal norms. "The grammatical interpretation of the normative text is more likely a semantic activity – pragmatics specific to an intellectual act of adjusting the suitability of the normative judgment with the reality it refers to"[24].

1. The historical method permits the intimation of the historical conditions in which the normative act was adopted, the totality of the social and legal circumstances that stood at the basis of elaborating the law („occasio legis"), thus determining the aims desired by the lawmaker*(„ratio legis").*

Interpreting the legal norms through the historical method, the interpreter will have to:

- ascertain the mood in which the author of the normative act were, what were the reasons that determined them to legislate and how they represented the applicative future of the elaborated normative act;
- determine what was the will of the lawmaker that enacted the norm, studying for this purpose, the array of reasons made with the opportunity of the adoption of the law, the official statement of the debates, the reactions in the press of the time, the economic, political, and social situations of the time;
- to proceed to compare the actual regulations with the previous ones in the domain.

2. The systematic method allows for the interpretation of the legal norm and determination of its content through establishing the place it occupied in the system of law, through its classification in the economy of the normative act it pertains to and with other normative acts in the same of in a different branch of law.

The legal norm cannot be understood (interpreted) if it is isolated, broken off from the other legal norms. The necessity of interpretation through this method stems from this very unbreakable systematic bond between the components of an internal system of law.

The systematic interpretation is also defined by the fact that the interpreter "applies his own reasoning and does not base his conclusion on just a provision of law [...] instead he bases it on an ensemble of provisions simultaneously taken into consideration, that have an accumulated efficacy which will impose the choice of a certain meaning rather than another […] (thus) to have in mind a group of complementary provisions that are examined in conjunction with each other"[25]. Considering that a normative act constitutes a structured whole, there being links of logical coherency and legal consistency between its elements, based on logical legal principles, Savigny suggests the systematic method of interpretation through which we obtain the rational and just sense of the rule through the very investigation of these links in which the principles are employed.

Through the systematic method of interpretation:

- first and foremost what is checked is whether the law respects its position in the hierarchy of legal norms; applying the rule, the judge checks to see if there is a conflict between it and the superior law; if it is ascertained that such a conflict exists, it will give priority to the superior law;
- the interpreter has to establish the place of the law subject to interpretation in the system of positive law and even in relation to the fundamental principles of law, the affiliation of the law to a certain branch of law, if the law subject to interpretation is common or exceptional, in relation to the normative act in which it is enclosed, if the normative act is common or special, as well as the place of the legal norm subject to interpretation in the framework of the articles, sections, chapters, titles, books, parts of the law26. Thus, for example, legal norms in the special part of the Penal Code cannot be applied (interpreted) without making reference to the general part; equally, commercial legal norms must be in connection to the civil laws (contained in the Civil Code) etc.

The utility of this method – as is correctly affirmed by prof. I. Craiovan – is even more obvious in the case of incomplete rules (cross-referred rules and blank rules) which gain full content only through what is added through interpretation[27].

3. The teleological method (or by purpose)

In the situations when the interpretation through the aforementioned methods does not conclude or fails to accomplish the clarity and precision of a provision in a text of law, in the elucidation of it we can resort to the purpose aimed for by the lawmaker through adopting the respective normative text. Sometimes this purpose is explicitly formulated in the preamble of the respective normative act, other times one must begin from other clear texts of laws and from the results they led to or were in the process of leading to after their application.

Once the purpose of the lawmaker is established, the unclear legal provisions are to be given out of two or more possible interpretations, the one which is most consistently in tune with the purpose of the lawmaker. The presumption from which we begin for this kind of interpretation is, evidently, the identity or convergence of purposes aimed for by the lawmaker through the contained provisions in the same law or in different laws that regulate the same domain of social relationships.

Here the question that arises is if the interpretation must take account for the goals and will of the lawmaker, the actual author of the respective rule and who, sometimes, is at a great distance in time from the moment when the issue of interpretation arises, or from the aims and will of the current lawmaker.

Thus the teleological method is characterized by the investigation of the social purpose aimed at by the lawmaker, which is estimated to be of greater value today than the letter of the law. The usage of this method permits the intimation of what is called „ratio legis", meaning the finality, the reason for being[28]. For example, in the legal regulation of adoption, „ratio legis" is the restitution of a home to children who do not have a family[29].

6. The logical method of interpretation permits the formulation – by the interpreter – of certain rational assessments, achieved through generalizing operations, of logical analysis of the text of the legal norm, or analogy, through applying formal logic.

The logical method consists of using certain processes of general formal logic, such as inductive reasoning, deductive reasoning (syllogisms), the demonstration processes for unraveling the meaning of the legal norms.

As opposed to the historical interpretation which emphasizes occasio legis, logical interpretation emphasizes ratio legis and mens legis; logical interpretation appears to be a perfected variant of the other methods[30].

In what follows we will examine several arguments employed by this method.

- The per a contrario argument (or „a contrario") has at its basis the law of the excluded third party*(„tertium non datur"),* which means that in the case of contradicting notions, which cancel each other out, only one can be true, the other being false and the third possibility being nonexistent (qui dicit de uno negat de altero- statements about the one deny those of the contrary). The specialty literature specifies the idea according to which this argument has a limited value, having to be carefully employed, preferably only in the case of limitative legal enumerations and rules of exceptional nature[31]. Thus, if art. 73 of the Constitution shows which are the domains regulated by the organic law, it means that, a contrario, all other domains are regulated by ordinary law or, by case, constitutional laws (of revision of the Constitution).

The a contrario argument isn't, after all, a logical argument, but a simple assumption based on the silence of the lawmaker. It only has value only if it relies on extrinsic arguments: on the exceptional or limited nature of a provision, on ratio legis, on the genesis of the texts of on the practical result of the interpretation[32].

- The a fortiori argument (- all the more so) consists of extending a law from a hypothesis not provided in it, because that hypothesis is motivated by the law. Thus we have moved from a known subject to an unknown one on the basis of superiority of reasons.

[32] f, for example, a rule provides that "dogs are forbidden from entering", applying the a contrario argument, when I am walking a bear, I can enter with it. What is opposed to such an interpretation is the purpose of the law: interpreting ratio legis we arrive to the conclusion that "if entering with dogs if forbidden, even more so entering with bears is forbidden". Thus, the a contrario argument has value only if it supports the reason of law.(P. Pescatore, op. cit., p. 349.

Interpretation through the a fortiori argument is an extensive interpretation, applied to a larger sphere of deeds than the one originally covered by the law, because the reasoning used in drafting it are even more obvious in the given case.

Thus, if the lawmaker has forbidden an incapable person of selling their goods, it a fortiori forbidden them to donate the goods, for the donation is a more prejudicial action than selling. In the same way, if the right to property (which is the most important real right) can be gained through adverse possession, even more so can a property law clause of this right be acquired (usus, fructus etc.).

In the same sense, once bilateral civil acts, irrevocable in principle, can be annulled as a consequence of vitiated consent, there is an even more powerful reason for the annulment, on the same basis, of unilateral civil acts, because they, in principle, are revocable[33].

The a fortiori ratione rule – admits professor Gheorghe Mihai -, counts on the comparison of two situations, objects or events that are the same in nature, but have different degrees of importance (established through reporting to the same standard of value: good, useful, just, etc.); this expresses, in the activity of interpreting the rule, comparison through assessment[34].

The variants of the a fortiori argument are a majori ad minus and a minori ad minus.

- The a majori ad minus argument (- who can do more, can also do less) is at the foundation of the extension of the legal norm to a case not expressly provided in the law, but which, from a legal point of view, is evaluated as analogous but less important that the provided cases[35].

Also encountered under the form of qui potest plus, potest minus, this argument is specific to extensive interpretation. „In the history of law – affirms prof. Nicolae Popa – we only find an exception from this principle, when more could have been done, but not less. It is about the right the married women had over the dotal property, before Justinian. Thus, the woman could sell the property, but couldn't mortgage it, the mortgage being a civil legal act with a narrower scope of effects than the sale"[36].

Regarded as a form of a fortiori ratione, the argument represents a logical instrument through which the provisions of the rule develop towards those elements not contained within the typology of the hypothesis, but which express, with a more powerful motivation, the reasoning of the rule. The argument concerned is understood as a concentrated expression, in natural language, an appreciative reasoning scheme[37].

- The a minori ad minus argument, signifies the fact that if the law prohibits less, it implicitly prohibits more. In other words, if the lawmaker prohibits a certain class of actions because they damage certain values and purposes, then it a fortiori prohibits actions that can bring even further damage to them, even if they are not expressly mentioned in the formulation of the law. Thus, the principle is the following: if the lawmaker instituted for a certain legal situation an important interdiction, what follows is that for the same situation a similar interdiction should be applied but less severe. This way, if a person is prohibited from exercising his private rights, it will be ascertained that he is even more so excluded from exercising his political rights[38].
- The ad absurdum argument (- reduction to absurdity) presupposes establishing the truth of the thesis to be demonstrated through the refutation of the thesis which it contradicts. The interpreter demonstrates – resorting to this argument – that any other interpretation given to the text of the legal norm, besides the one given by him, leads to indubitable consequences, contrary to the law, absurd.

For example, if the law permits the party whose legitimate rights were injured by an administrative act, they should address the competent court to have it annulled ad absurdum it is deduced that the contested act can only be an individual act, one that produces, modifies or discharges a concrete legal report, because it is absurd to accept that subjective rights can be directly injured through legal normative acts that are general, abstract, and impersonal[39].

- The a simili ad simile argument(similar to the a fortiori argument*)*, relies on the idea that the lawmaker, regulating a situation, also established all similar cases. In other words, the regulation is applicable to all identical situations if the law does not derogate.

In criminal law the principle that prohibits the application of an analogy of law in the detriment of the accused produces is acknowledged. Although some authors are of opinion that even in this case sometimes the reasoning is done in the same fashion, but, in order to save face, they do not say that it is analogy, but an "extensive interpretation" of certain rules[40].

On the basis of this article it is ascertained, reasoning with a majori ad minus, that in the same conditions, we can also be granted other real rights, for example usufruct or easement, which are lesser than the right to property.

- The a pari ratione argument(also named analogia legis) is founded on the reasoning that for identical situations, identical solutions should be ruled. In the absence of a rule that should regulate a concrete situation, we can resort to a rule that regulates a similar situation. Also under the form of ubi eadem ratio, ibi idem ius (- where there is the same reason, the same provision is applied), this argument having as its basis the idea according to which the same case produces the same effects.
- The a pari argument is founded on the idea of legal equality which necessitates that in similar situations, the same normative provisions should be applied. Thus, it is not about identical situations, for which we needn't resort to analogy. Here the rule exists; it mustn't be analogically deduced, but applied rigorously to all cases of the same kind. The transition from identical (the same rule) to analogical (similar cases to those regulated by the rule) is in fact the transition from analogical to identical; in other words it is a creative operation or lifting, through interpretation, similar deeds to the convergent light of the existing rule. The rule becomes applicable to other cases than those it originally refers to, because they are found in the reasoning it encompasses[41].
- The a rationale legis stricta and a generali sensu arguments, are rather rules of linguistic interpretation that logic per se; they are about showing that, due to the fact that the respective text of the law is clear and precise, it requests to be applied to the letter, without restrictions or extensions. These rules rely on the principles, consecrated in the legal practice,, clara non sunt interpretanda, and ubi lex non distinguit, nec nos destinguere debemus respectively(- where the law doesn't distinguish, the interpreter must also not distinguish[42].
- The in dubio pro reo argument(doubt for the accused) is applicable in criminal law where, if there is doubt about the guilt of the accused of having committed a felony, this doubt is in favor of the accused[43].
- The ab eadum argument(- on the same route; equivalence) is used to avoid the sanction that intervenes for not obeying the legal form, if an equivalent form was used. The argument of equivalence it met in the matter of succession. For example, it is considered that the testament is valid if it does not contain a calendaristic date, but contains the mention that it was dawn up on Christmas, because, universally, the indicated day corresponds to the date of the 25th of December[44].

Sometimes even other arguments of logical interpretation are used, but their value is debatable[45]:

- the ad populam argument– founded on the existence of the agreement of a majority;
- the ad ignorantiam argument– the impossibility of proving the contrary in certain cases;
- the ex silentio argument – evokes the idea that a thing is stated if it was not negated by anyone.

After presenting the main arguments of the logic utilized in interpreting the legal norms, an aspect must be emphasized: none of these arguments is justifiable of purely logical grounds, bur presupposes evaluations and decisions from the judge or administrative body interpreter, evaluations regarding the degree of similarity, from a legal aspect, of the cases, the relative importance of different obligations, prohibitions, or rights, the purpose of the lawmaker[46]. Thus in identical situations it can happen that a court will consider the a simili reasoning applicable, and another will adopt a different solution using the a contrario argument. As U. Klug says „analogy and the a contrario argument, precisely like all other logical operations in legal logic, intervene only after the premises were clarified in advance, through interpretation. Which certainly does not exclude the fact that interpretation is accomplished, in itself, following logical laws […]"[47].

Usually, as another author remarks in the same sense in the analysis he does of legal arguments, decisions are made before conducting such an interference, the aforementioned being rather only the technical legal form utilized in the final motivation of the decision that is taken[48].

The methods of interpretation of legal norms are interdependent, they must be applied in a complementary and interfering fashion, the process of interpretation requiring at the same time the creativity of the interpreter. But, as Mircea Djuvara said, it is about a temperate, prudent creativity which must refer to the harmonious and rational understanding of the law, resorting to historical tradition, preparatory works, the principles of law, the sense of equity presumed by any law[49].

[42] An example for this would be the following: a French law from 1887 gave the state property over art and archeological objects found in Algeria in the concessioned lands, without making distinction between old and new concessions; in consequence, the law was applied to objects found on the concessioned lands before the year in which the law was promulgated, as well as on the lands concessioned after that date.

THE PLACE OF POLITICAL PARTIES IN A DEMOCRATIC STATE, THROUGH THE GLASS OF CONSTITUTIONAL REVIEW

Valentina BĂRBĂȚEANU[*]

Abstract

Political parties are nowadays key actors in democratic societies, shaping social mentalities, creating and following ideologies, inducing common vision, establishing targets and ideals. Their main goal is gaining the political power by conquering the access to the highest levels of decision in the State. They are based on the freedom of association and, unlike other associations, they have a specific constitutional and legal position because they are defining and giving expression to the citizens' political will, in respect of the principles of democracy. Romanian Basic Law provides that political pluralism represents one of the supreme values of the Romanian State governed by the rule of law. In this context, the Constitutional Court has solved, over the years, various issues regarding the political parties. Authorities of constitutional jurisdiction in European countries have also been asked to express, one way or another, their opinion in connection with the activity of the political parties. Taking into consideration their importance for a healthy democratic system, the European Commission for Democracy through Law -Venice Commission has paid special attention to the complexity of aspects involved by the protection of democratic values.

1.Introduction

The present study aims to analyze the topic of political parties as they depend, in various stages of their existence, by the authorities of constitutional jurisdiction's decisions, trying to highlight the role the latter play in the life of a political party. Basically, constitutional courts seek to preserve the values of democracy and the rule of law, as they are defined in the Constitution. In what concerns the political parties, constitutional jurisdictions may be asked to decide on the degree of political parties' conformity with the requirements enshrined in the Basic Law for their registration and operation, the ultimate penalty being the dissolution of the party declared unconstitutional. The issue in discussion also requires the analysis of some decisions rendered by the European Court of Human Rights in what concerns the respect of the fundamental right of association and freedom of expression by the common courts or the constitutional jurisdictions regarding the political parties. So, the importance of this study lies in emphasizing the need to comply with the constitutional and legal rules of the registration and operation of political parties. In clarifying this matter, the paper will present the case law of constitutional jurisdiction authority, in particular those rendered by the Constitutional Court of Romania, the German Federal Constitutional Court, the Constitutional Tribunal of Spain and the Turkish Constitutional Court. The paper will also try to point out the fact that political parties manage to turn into vectors for the political will of their members and/or of their supporters. Acquiring the state power, they manage to transform their ideologies into markers that influence the general will when endowed with binding force due to its embedding into rules laid down by the Parliament or Government, as authorities which are formed as a result of free and fair elections. They also contribute to the effective expression of every citizen's political options during the electoral process, by offering adequate options. In the specialized juridical literature, the problems involved by political parties were a frequently approached topic, especially in terms of political doctrines or in what concerns the way they intervene, how they act and how they evolve in the general landscape of the State and society. For example, an exhaustive presentation was made by Professor Maurice Duverger[1]. In the Romanian literature, reputable scholars like Dimitrie Gusti[2], Ion Deleanu[3] or Ioan Muraru[4] approached the complexity of the issues regarding political parties. Nevertheless, a study that conduct an analysis of the Romanian and foreign constitutional case law in this area is necessary, taking into consideration the recent cases that were solved in this field, not only by the Romanian Constitutional Court, but also by other foreign authorities of constitutional jurisdiction.

2.Framing The Political Parties In A Democratic Society

Authentic representative democracy and effective citizens' participation in the process of government would not be fully realized unless the political parties represent active entities in the life of the state. The whole State's architecture is based on the essential ability of political parties to shape and define the political will of citizens, conducting their beliefs and gathering them under the same vision. Due to the political parties, the ideas and opinions expressed by every individual, member of that party, have the potentiality of becoming general will, if the party succeeds in elections and its leaders gain the right to issue, as State's representatives, decisions endowed with binding force[5]. From this point of view, a very concise definition provides that a political party is „a group of people who try to achieve political power and who are united by common beliefs about how the country should be run"[6].

They are based mainly of the freedom of association, enshrined in Article 10 of the European Convention for Human Rights, and usually granted at the national constitutional level, as well. Freedom of expression is also a key element that define the activity of a political party. The goal of association in political parties is the intention to participate in the management of public affairs and the main means of doing that is the presentation of candidates to free and democratic elections.

The European Court of Human Rights has noted that political parties are a form of association essential to the proper functioning of democracy. The Court has also noted: "It is in the nature of the role they play that political parties, the only bodies which can come to power, also have the capacity to influence the whole of the regime in their countries. By the proposals for an overall societal model which they put before the electorate and by their capacity to implement those proposals once they come to power, political parties differ from other organisations which intervene in the political arena."[7].

Political parties also inter-connect the executive and legislative branches of government and shape the decision-making process in accordance with their own doctrine and with their own view on the legislative agenda within a system of government.

The European Commission for Democracy Through Law - the Venice Commission noticed that, given political parties' unique and vital role in the electoral process and democratic governance, it is commonly accepted for states to regulate their functioning insofar as is necessary to ensure effective, representative and fair democratic governance[8].

According to the Romanian Basic Law (Article 8), the political parties assist in defining and giving expression to the citizens' political will and they are urged to respect national sovereignty, territorial integrity, the legal order and principles of democracy. They are established and pursue their activities in accordance with the law. This fundamental rule, prescribed by the Romanian Constitution has to be read through the glass of the Venice Commission's view, who noticed that „striking the appropriate balance between state regulation of parties as public actors and respect for the fundamental rights of party members as private citizens, including their right to association, requires well-crafted and narrowly tailored legislation" [9].

It is also of particular importance that the regulations concerning political parties be elaborated also in accordance with the universal and regional legal instruments that provide the main landmarks in this field, most relevant being the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. Article 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights and Article 22 of the said Covenant protect the right to associate in political parties as part of the general freedom of assembly and association. In addition to these legally binding instruments applicable to states in this regard, there are also relevant political commitments persuasive upon the states members of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE). One of the most notable is the Document of the Copenhagen, which is the final act of the meeting of the Conference on the Human Dimension of the Commission for Security and Co-operation in Europe (CSCE), the so-called Copenhagen Document, but there are also a number of guiding documents which can provide an understanding of good practice with regards to legislation concerning political parties, like those adopted by the Venice Commission[10].

In this respect, Romanian Political Parties Law no.14/2003 regulates the whole range of aspects involved by creation, functioning and dissolution of political parties. In the post-communist era, Romania prizes the idea of a pluralist political society that has been established by the new democratic Basic Law adopted on the 8th of December 1991, in contrast with the previous period dominated by the unique party that monopolized the entire power of decision in the State.

In this context, it is worth noticing that the European Court of Human Rights has appreciated that political parties hold an "essential role in ensuring (…) the proper functioning of democracy"[11]. Thus, the State should enact legislation that facilitate a pluralistic political environment, that help the citizen to choose most appropriate political viewpoints, from a wider variety, contributing to the creation of a healthy democratic society.

3.Freedom Of Association And The Two Important Moments For A Political Party: Registration And Cessation Of Activity

In Romania, according to Article 40 paragraph 1 of the Basic Law, citizens may freely associate into political parties, trade unions, employers' associations and other forms of association. The purpose of the association in political parties is different from that of other associations established under Article 40 of the Constitution. The main goal of the political parties is to shape and express the political views of citizens and to materialize their political freedom, developing and strengthening political society and obtaining the votes of the majority of citizens in order to conquest and exercise the state power in accordance with its own political program[12]. Legal benchmarks for their activity are set by the Law no.14/2003, which provides that in their activity, political parties have to promote national values and interests and political pluralism. They also have to contribute to the formation of public opinion, participate with candidates in elections and in establishing a public authority and stimulate the participation of citizens in polls (Article 2).

4.Issues Of Constitutionality Regarding The Registration Of Political Parties

The registration application of the political party has to be addressed to the Bucharest Tribunal which examines it both from the point of view of fulfilling formal registration requirements and from the perspective of complying with the fundamental values enshrined in the Constitution and the law.

4.1.Issues of constitutionality regarding the formal requirements

According to Article 19 Paragraph 3 of the Law no. 14/2003 on political parties, among the requirements consisting in various documents, there appeared a list of at least 25 000 supporting signatures of founding members, residing in at least 18 state counties and in Bucharest, but no less than 700 persons for each of those counties and Bucharest. These legal provisions made the subject of the a posteriori constitutional review performed by the Constitutional Court[13]. Considering that the impugned regulation is an interference by the State authorities with the right of association, the Constitutional Court analysed, by applying a proportionality test, whether it is justified under the rigorous requirements of the European Court of Human Rights and of the Venice Commission. Regarding the legality of the challenged law, the Court found that it was originally provided by Decree-Law no. 8/1989 on the registration and operation of political parties and public organisations in Romania, that revived the political pluralism and set a minimum number of 251 founding members as preliminary requirement. Seven years later, the Law no. 27/1996 on political parties increased the number to 10,000; while the new law in 2003 (Law no. 14/2003 on political parties) increased it even more, to 25,000. According to the explanatory memorandum, expressed during the adoption of the latter bill, through the significant increase from the minimum 10,000 to 25,000 founding members, the legislator wished to avoid „the incorporation of certain political parties with reduced representation or of certain regional parties", aiming at the occurrence of „some persons who have the ability to submit lists of candidates in most state counties".

However, the Court found that although, in the abstract, this measure is adequate in the sense that it can lead to the fulfilment of its purpose, it is not necessary in a democratic society. The alleged requirement for the registration of a political party is excessive and disproportionate in the current social and political context of the country and in relation to the legal measures in force concerning the public funding of political parties and election campaigns, as well as the parliamentary representation of the electorate.

Having examined the reasons provided by the legislator at the moment of the adoption of Law no. 14/2003, the Constitutional Court found that they no longer reflect the current state of Romanian society marked by the natural historic and political evolution of the democratic system installed in late 1989. Thus, if the risk of creating a large number of political parties, of the „devaluation" of the idea of political party, of the fragmentation of their parliamentary representation and of an excessive burden of the State budget on account of their public funding represented an acceptable justification in the social and political context of the 1990s, the Court noted that, precisely at that time, the minimum number of founding members required for the registration of a political party was the lowest in the entire evolutionary history of the legislation, i.e. 251 members (during 1989-1996), which increased then to 10,000 (during 1996-2003). Then, in 2003, 14 years after the events in December 1989, which marked the change of the communist regime and the transition to a democratic form of government, the legislator significantly increased again this number, citing the same reasons.

The Court found that the possible negative effects that would occur in the absence of adopting the legal measure examined are counteracted by the existence of appropriate legal instruments and such a requirement can no longer be considered necessary.

Thus, the Court found that there is no fair balance between collective and individual interests, since, by the requirement of a very high representation, the subjective right of the persons concerned to register a political party meets a drastic restriction, which exceeds the possible benefits. Likewise, in order to establish and maintain the right balance, the legislator must use means which entail the lowest possible interference with the right of association. However, in this case, the requirement of the minimum number of founding members and their territorial dispersion exceeded what is fair and equitable in relation to the protected fundamental right, namely, the right of association.

For these reasons, the Court held that the challenged provisions of Article 19 paragraph 3 of Law no. 14/2003 on political parties, in relation to the current state of evolution of Romanian society, no longer meet the requirements of necessity and, by their excessive nature, impede the exercise of the right of association guaranteed by Article 40 of the Constitution, which is tantamount to affecting the right in its very substance. As a result, by majority vote, the Court allowed the exception of unconstitutionality and held these provisions to be unconstitutional.

The Court also held that Article 61 of the Constitution accords the sovereign power of law-making on Parliament, which is the supreme representative body of the Romanian people and the sole legislative authority of the country. Consequently, in order to remove the flaw of unconstitutionality, within its limited margin of appreciation, the legislator must re-examine the provisions of Article 19 pararaph 3 of Law no. 14/2003 in order to decrease the minimum number of founding members in the lists of supporting signatures for the registration of a political party and for reconfiguration of the requirement of territorial dispersion, ensuring that all requirements justifying such interferences by the State with the right of association are met.

Soon after this decision of the Constitutional Court, less then a month later, the Parliament amended the Law no.14/2003 and diminished massively the required number of signatures[14]. According to the new provisions, the list has to comprise the signatures of at least three founding members. This proves the positive effect the Constitutional Court's decisions can have on the effectiveness of fundamental rights and freedoms.

4.2.Issues regarding the compliance with the constitutional fundamental values

In this last-mentioned respect, Article 40 paragraph 2 of the Basic Law provides that political parties or organizations which, by their aims or activity, militate against political pluralism, the principles of a State governed by the rule of law, or against Romania's sovereignty, integrity or independence, shall be unconstitutional.

The registration application is submitted to the Bucharest Tribunal, which is, according to Article 18 of the Law no.14/2003, the court entitled to analyse and approve it. When it examines the registration application, the tribunal checks if the future political party that requests the registration observes all these imperatives. If the party's program proves beyond any reasonable doubt that it does not fall under the scope of the constitutional requirements, the tribunal will reject the application.

Nevertheless, the refuse to register the political party on the fore mentioned reasons has to be wisely balanced with the citizens' right to association. Romania has been subject to a decision where the European Court of Human Rights found that the Romanian State has violated Article 11 of the European Convention in the Case Of Partidul Comunistilor (Nepeceristi) and Ungureanu v. Romania, 3 February 2005. The Bucharest Tribunal rejected the application of registration of the said party, reasoning this decision on the fact that it follows from the party's statute and political programme that it „pursues the aim of establishing a humane State based on communist doctrine, which would imply that the constitutional and legal order in place since 1989 is inhumane and not founded on genuine democracy". The applicant appealed against that decision to the Bucharest Court of Appeal, which dismissed the appeal on the ground that the assessment made in the tribunal's decision had been correct.

Analysing the complaint lodged by the party and its leader, the European Court of Human Rights stated that there can be no democracy without pluralism and that is why freedom of expression as enshrined in Article 10 is applicable not only to information or ideas that are favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offend, shock or disturb. The fact that their activities form part of a collective exercise of the freedom of expression in itself entitles political parties to seek the protection of Articles 10 and 11 of the Convention (§§ 45). The Court underlined that it has previously held that a political party may campaign for a change in the law or the legal and constitutional structures of the State on two conditions: firstly, the means used to that end must in every respect be legal and democratic, and secondly, the change proposed must itself be compatible with fundamental democratic principles. It necessarily follows that a political party whose leaders incite to violence or put forward a policy which does not comply with one or more of the rules of democracy or which is aimed at the destruction of democracy and the flouting of the rights and freedoms recognised in a democracy cannot lay claim to the Convention's protection against penalties imposed on those grounds (§§ 46).

The Court noted that the national courts based their refusal of the applicants' application solely on an assessment of whether the PCN's statute and political programme complied with the provisions of political parties law (at that time, Legislative Decree no. 8/1989). In the same time, the Court also noticed that the PCN had not been politically active before applying for registration. It observed, in this connection, that neither the Romanian courts did not base their rejection decisions on any other document produced by the PCN or on any particular position taken by the leaders of the PCN (§§ 51). Examining the PCN's statute and political programme, the Court noticed that these documents laid emphasis on upholding the country's national sovereignty, territorial integrity and legal and constitutional order, and on the principles of democracy, including political pluralism, universal suffrage and freedom to take part in politics. It further noted that they did not contain any passages that could be considered a call for the use of violence, an uprising or any other form of rejection of democratic principles – an essential factor to be taken into consideration – or for the "dictatorship of the proletariat".

The Court considered one of the principal characteristics of democracy to be the possibility it offers of addressing through dialogue, without recourse to violence, issues raised by different strands of political opinion, even when they are irksome or disturbing. Democracy thrives on freedom of expression. From that point of view, there can be no justification for hindering a political group that complies with fundamental democratic principles solely because it has criticised the country's constitutional and legal order and sought a public debate in the political arena.

The Court noticed that national jurisdictions did not show any way in which the PCN's programme and statute were contrary to the country's constitutional and legal order and, in particular, to the fundamental principles of democracy. The Court also dismissed the Government's argument that Romania cannot allow the emergence of a new communist party to form the subject of a democratic debate. The European Court stressed that the PCN's programme could hardly have been belied by any practical action it took, since its application for registration was refused and it consequently did not even have time to take any action. It was thus penalised for conduct relating solely to the exercise of freedom of expression. The Court took into account the historical background, meaning Romania's experience of totalitarian communism prior to 1989. However, it observed that that context cannot by itself justify the need for the interference, especially as communist parties adhering to Marxist ideology exist in a number of countries that are signatories to the Convention (§§ 54-57).

A similar situation occurred in Spain, where the Constitutional Tribunal stated[15] that the refusal to register a political party, based solely on the suspicion that it could continue the activity of a banned political party, violates the fundamental freedom of association, by violating the right to create political parties. In the case, the Special Chamber of the Supreme Court declared the founding of the political party Sortu to be unlawful and refused its incorporation in the Register of Political Parties. In its judgment, the Supreme Court ruled that Sortu continued the unlawful activities of Herri Batasuna, Euskal Herritarrok and Batasuna, which were political parties banned in 2003 by a judgment pronounced by the same Chamber of the Supreme Court. Sortu appealed at the Constitutional Tribunal against that decision. The Constitutional Tribunal considered that the expressions in support of exclusively peaceful and democratic ways to achieve political objectives and the condemnation of terrorism (expressly including ETA) as an instrument of political action, comprised in the party's statute, should be regarded as a sufficient circumstantial evidence to counteract or dilute the probative force of other pieces of evidence from which it could be inferred that Sortu could continue or pursue the activity of legally banned and dissolved parties. Therefore, the suspicion that Sortu could continue the activity of outlawed parties could not constitute a legally sufficient argument to infringe the exercise of the freedom of association.

5. Cessation Of Activity Of A Political Party Due To Unconstitutional And/Or Unlawful Activity

It is possible that a party which initially complies with the requirements stated in the Basic Law, to disregard them during its activity. The constitutional provisions of Article 40 Paragraph 1 in the Romanian Basic Law that grant the freedom of association have to be read in conjunction with those of Article 30 Paragraph 7 that forbid defamation of Country and Nation, any instigation to a war of aggression, to national, racial, class or religious hatred, any incitement to discrimination, territorial separatism, or public violence, as well as any obscene conduct contrary to morals. In this situation, the Constitutional Court of Romania is competent to rule upon the challenges as to the unconstitutionality of a political party, according to Article 146 Letter k) of the Basic Law. A similar provision can be found in Article 39 of the Law no.47/1992 on the Organisation and Operation of the Constitutional Court.

To this end, the Court verifies the fulfillment of substantive requirements regarding the political party's activity, provided in Article 40 paragraph 2 of the Basic Law, which states that parties or organizations which, by their aims or activity, militate against political pluralism, against the rule of law or against the sovereignty, integrity or independence of Romania are unconstitutional. In the same time, exercising this type of constitutional review, the Court also takes into account Article 3 of the Political Parties Law No.14/2003, which states that only political associations that are duly established and that militate in favor of national sovereignty, state independence and unity, territorial integrity, legal order and constitutional democracy principles, may function as political parties. The same article states that political parties that, by their statutes, programs, propaganda or by other activities they organize, breach the fore mentioned constitutional provisions are prohibited.

The Romanian Constitutional Court has rendered only one decision regarding the constitutionality of a political party[16]. The complaint was rejected as inadmissibile, mainly because the plaintiff was not entitle by law to lodge such a complaint. Subjects which may apply to the Court to exercise this power are expressly and exhaustively listed in Article 39 Paragraph 2 of the Law no. 47/1992. Thus, the law grants this right only to the Government and the President of the Chamber of Deputies and the President of the Senat, based on a decision taken by the Chamber's majority of its members. In light of these legal provisions, the application was considered inadmissible, being drawn by a person that did not have the legal ability to call the Constitutional Court to rule over the constitutionality of a political party.

Moreover, the Court noted that an impediment to judging on the merits of the application lied in its very object. In this regard, the Court stated that, according to Article 146 letter k) of the Constitution, it has the power to decide on complaints regarding the constitutionality of a political party. The case concerned the Democratic Alliance of Hungarians in Romania (Uniunea Democrată Maghiară din România). As reflected in the electronic records of the Ministry of Justice, it is not listed in the register of political parties kept by the Bucharest Tribunal, but in the National Register of Nongovernmental Organizations. The Court stated that the assimilation made by the law in terms of participation in the electoral process does not lead to the transformation of the Democratic Alliance of Hungarians in Romania into a political party, but preserves its status of legal association. Since the Democratic Alliance of Hungarians in Romania do not fall under the provisions of the Law No.14/2003 on political parties, the Constitutional Court was not entitled to review its constitutionality and, therefore, it rejected the application as inadmissible.

A similar type of argumentation has been used by the Federal Constitutional Court of Germany[17] when the National Democratic Party of Germany (Nationaldemokratische Partei Deutschlands) drew an application asking the Court to ascertain that the mentioned party is not unconstitutional. The Court dismissed the applications as inadmissible, noteing that the Federal Constitutional Court Act does not provide a party with the option to invoke the Federal Constitutional Court's jurisdiction for a declaration of its constitutionality. Political parties are free to exercise their rights as long as the Federal Constitutional Court has not established their unconstitutionality. If it is contested that they are entitled to exercise these rights, they can take recourse to the courts[18].

The National Democratic Party of Germany (NDP), which was considered a party far to the right of the political spectrum[19], represented a subject that the Federal Constitutional Court dealt with in several ocasions. In 2001, the Court decided jointly on applications lodged by the Federal Government and the two chambers of the Federal Parliament, the Bundestag and the Bundesrat. The Court noticed the co-ordinated nature of the applications, lodged by the three politically highest ranking institutions of the Federal Republic of Germany, fact that indicated the extraordinary political importance of the case. During the proceedings, the Court learnt that several important functionaries of the NPD were, at the same time, working not only as party functionaries, but also as undercover agents of the Verfassungsschutz, the public authorities which investigated the NPD and prepared the case for the Constitutional Court. In March 2003, considering this information, the Constitutional Court decided that the proceedings had to be discontinued[20].

Very recently, on the 17th of January 2017, the Federal Constitutional Court re-opened the proceedings and rendered a decision regarding the constitutionality of the fore-mention party[21]. In order to do that, the Court firstly examined the admissibility of the application to prohibit the NPD. In this regard, it stated that there is neither an infringement of the strict requirement that there be no informants at the party's executive level (Staatsfreiheit) nor an infringement of the principle of fair trial that would preclude carrying out the proceedings. The applicant convincingly demonstrated to the Court that all police informants at the executive levels of the NPD had already been deactivated, at the latest, at the point in time at which the intention to file an application to prohibit the NPD had been announced, and that there had been no follow-up aimed at obtaining information. It could also be assumed that the NPD's procedural strategy has not been spied out with intelligence service means and that there have been sufficient precautions to ensure that information obtained incidentally through the observation of the NPD is not used to the party's detriment.

The applicant, the Bundesrat, requested the declaration that the NPD is unconstitutional because it seeks, by reason of its aims or the behaviour of its adherents, to undermine the free democratic basic order. The Court noticed that, indeed, the National Democratic Party of Germany advocates a concept aimed at abolishing the existing free democratic basic order. The NPD also intends to replace the existing constitutional system with an authoritarian national state that adheres to the idea of an ethnically defined "people's community" (Volksgemeinschaft). Its political concept disrespects human dignity and is incompatible with the principle of democracy. Furthermore, the NPD acts in a systematic manner and with sufficient intensity towards achieving its aims that are directed against the free democratic basic order. However, the Court noted that, currently, there is a lack of specific and weighty indications suggesting that this endeavour will be successful. For that reason the Second Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court unanimously rejected as unfounded the Bundesrat's application to establish the unconstitutionality of the NPD and its sub-organisations[22].

In the German constitutional case-law, there were two more decisions which implied the prohibition of political parties, both of them delivered on applications made by the Federal Government in November 1951. They challenged the constitutionality of a party of the extreme political right, the Sozialistische Reichspartei (SRP), and one party of the extreme political left, the Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands (KPD). Both parties were declared unconstitutional, the first one in 1952[23] and the second one[24], in 1956. The Court dissolved them, confiscated their assets and issued a ban on establishing organisations to replace the dissolved party.

Turkey is also one of the countries that faced the problem of potentially unconstitutional parties and the Constitutional Court has been called to solve this kind of cases. For instance, in one case, the Chief Public Prosecutor at the Court of Cassation launched a court action seeking the dissolution of the Rights and Freedoms Party (Hak ve Özgürlükler Partisi HAK-PAR). He claimed that the statute and programme of the Party described the "Kurdish problem" as "the main problem of Turkey". He pointed out that such an approach, drawing a distinction between Turks and Kurds and accepting the existence of a separate Kurdish nation, entailed the rejection of the concept of nationhood, which depends on conscience of citizenship. Analizying the application, the Constitutional Court reiterated that political parties are indispensable elements of democratic political life and they are free to determine policies and to suggest different solutions to society's social, economic and political problems. They can only be banned if their policies and activities pose a clear and present danger to the democratic regime. The HAK-PAR Party was only established a short time before the application and there is no evidence of its having committed unconstitutional acts since its establishment. It is therefore safe to say that the party does not pose a serious threat to the democratic regime[25].

In an other case, the Constitutional Court of Turkey decided the dissolution of the Democratic People's Party, based on the fact that the defendant party rejected the concept of a modern nation and its political program depended on racial and regional discrimination. The Court also noticed that there was made a discrimination between Turks and Kurds in the Party's manifesto and the party asserts that there is an ethnically Kurdish nation which is subjected to assimilation. In these circumstances, the Court concluded that it was clear that this kind of conception could corrupt the state order, which depended on territorial and national unity. The Court also found that the party aimed to create minorities by protecting, by promoting and by disseminating languages and cultures other than Turkish and Turkish culture[26].

6. Conclusions

The basic idea that it has been intended to be depicted in this study centers on the fact that regulations regarding political parties offer an image of the degree of democracy in each state and the way the legislator approaches this issue is defining for the stage of development of the society. The existence of the political parties itself is one of the signs of a genuine democracy. Nevertheless, the mere possibility granted by law to form a political party is not enough if the legal requirements are so restrictive that jeoperdize its institution. The fundamental right to association has to be permanently kept in mind by the legislative when it adopts legal provisions regarding the institution and the functioning of political parties.

The authorities of constitutional jurisdiction are the guardians of democracy and, in most European countries, they have the power to protect the values incorporated in the essence of any political party, which is mainly to express and shape the political will of citizens and to convey it to the highest levels of decision in the State. The aim of this paper was to highlight the importance of political parties in contemporary societies and the necessity to design a legal framework adapted to the constitutional exigencies required by the protection of the right to free association. At the same time, any sideslip has to be ammended. Constitutional jurisdictions hold the legal instruments to keep the balance in the political life, by sanctioning the infringments of the freedom of associations, on one hand, an, on the other hand, by banning those political parties that diverge from the standards of good faith in relation with the State or its institutions and put in peril the conquests of democracy by trying to establish a radical, extremist political order, atacking the values of democracy and underming the rule of law.

The sphere of political parties' activity is very wide and it offers many reasearch posibilities for legal scholars. Topics like the internal discipline and the responsibility of the members, the involvement in the electoral proceedings or the system of alliances political parties form in variouse moments of their existence on contingency basis are only few of them. A vast, intriguing and very proteic issue is also represented by the political doctrines chosen, followed and spread by political parties. In other words, the subject of political parties opens a very generous field of research and also rises awareness in what concerns their importance both in the life of individuals that thanks to them are able to participate in the State's decisions and in the State's life itself.

THE SEPARATION OF POWERS IN THE CONSTITUTIONS OF THE EU MEMBER STATES

Abstract

The purpose of this study consists of realizing and offering an overview of the manner in which the principle of separation of powers is consecrated in the constitutions of the EU member states.
We thereby aim to prove that there is no direct relationship between the form of government of a state, the expressis verbis constitutional regulation of the principle of separation of powers in the state and its effective observance, for the existence of the last fact being necessary the simultaneous concurrence of more social, economic and political factors at the level of the society as a whole.
Also, we aim to offer a perspective as realistic and comprehensive as possible regarding what does the principle of separation of powers imply, mostly from a legal point of view, as well as about the implications that its respecting or lack of it, as the case, does have at the level of a society.
Eventually, we hope to provide a relevant academic study regarding the subject of both great topicality and theoretical and practical interest regarding the fundamentals and especially the operating mode of the principle of separation of powers, a study which could serve, if it shall be taken into consideration by the political plan of the state, to the substantiation of some responsible decisions in the ongoing act of exercising the power.

Keywords: Constitution, EU member states, separation of powers, Parliament, Government, judicial power

1. Introduction

The object of the study consists of the principle of separation of powers in the constitutions of the EU member states.

Its importance results out of the necessity to observe in a fundamental manner the existence or inexistence of a direct relationship between the express or implicit constitutional consecration of the principle of separation of powers in the state, its form of government, the manner in which the three powers belong to the public authorities that exercise them, as well as the effective observance of the principle.

We aim, by aggregating some systematizations referring to the constitutions of all the EU member states, to prove the apparent lack of such relationship, considering that the effective observance of the principle cannot be caused by the express consecration of the principle, by one or another form of government or by the exercise of the powers by certain authorities together or independently. Ultimately, the effective observance of the principle is related to the degree of responsibility and maturity of those who possess and exercise the three powers, so of the society as a whole, having an indissoluble relationship with the level of general development of the respective society, implicitly with the quality of the educational system of that state, with its historical accumulations.

A study with an identical subject does not exist in the romanian doctrine (the joinder in a single document of all fundamental laws of the EU member states), this being a reason for us to invite, on this occasion, any interested person to deepen the research of the proposed subject. Of course, regarding the specialty literature referring to the principle of separation of powers, it must be regarded as a premise for the elaboration of this study, a short doctrinaire introspection.

2. The principle of separation of powers

2.1. Fixation of theoretical elements

Enunciated by John Locke in the paper Treatise on Civil Government (1690), the theory of separation of powers is completed and explained in detail by Charles-Louis de Secondat, baron de la Bréde et de Montesquieu in the famous paper The Spirit of Laws (1748). Montesquieu had shown in his paper that in any organised society, the principle of separation of powers is the basic instrument for the safety of the citizens, followed by the existence of the three great functions: the enactment of legal rules - the legislative function; the enforcement of these rules - the executive function; the judgment of litigations - the jurisdictional or the judicial function[1].

The theory of Montesquieu, approximately in a mirror with the one of Locke, represents, therefore, a reaction against the arbitrariness in the governance and the monarchical absolutism, the two philosophers aiming, through this theory, to ensure the observance of individual freedoms, to allow for the free development of the people. Montesquieu thereby came to distinguish precisely between the three powers which became classical nowadays, namely: the legislative power (or the power to create, modify and abrogate laws), the executive power (or the power to apply the laws, to actually manage the state) and the judicial power (or the power to punish the felons/criminals and to judge the litigations between private individuals, in the sense of "saying the law"). However, the last one – the judicial power – was not developed in the further research of Montesquieu, because of a perception rather ignorant which was specific to that age, considering it unimportant to the society, "almost null"[2]. Nevertheless, it is essential the fact that, in the parameters of theoretical analysis, Montesquieu mentioned the jurisdictional power, rather as a function of the state which must be regarded individually, which must operate distinctly, in order to allow the state to be considered democratic.

Besides, John Locke avoids as well to expressly affirm the existence of a judicial power, although he believes in the jurisdictional function which is realised by the state, this depending, in his opinion, on the legislative power. Therefore, Locke distinguishes three powers of the state, but four functions. Beginning from the fact that "the main purpose which urges people to create states and thereby to subdue to a government" is "the defense of property", Locke proves the existence of a jurisdictional function which is exercised by the state. In the same context, he shows that what does the state of nature lack, the state previous to the existence of society, is, first of all, an established and acknowledged law, second of all an acknowledged and impartial judge and, third of all, a power able to found, sustain and enforce a sentence[3].

The principle of separation of powers must not be interpreted as an absolute separation of the three powers of the state, but as the interdiction that one of the powers shall cumulate and exercise attributes specific to others, thus becoming a discretionary power in the state. More than that, the separation of powers must imply, however, a collaboration between the powers of the state in the general process of exercising the power of the state. By proceeding in such manner, a balance between the powers of the state is established, as each power is bound to limit its prerogatives to those entrusted to it by the Constitution[4].

Rousseau grasps, though, that the theory of separation of powers exhibits a fundamental vice, namely that, although the sovereignty cannot be divided in its principle, we still find it divided in its object. In other words, if we do not acknowledge the indivisibility of the sovereignty, it would be natural to not acknowledge the divisibility of power. However, Rousseau finds another two inseparable elements: to create laws and to maintain them efficient in activity. Still, this second aspect implies and justifies the supervision of the executive by the legislative. "The Government", the holder of the executive power – said Rousseau – is nothing but the "minister" of the legislative, an "intermediate body" of it and subordinate to it[5]. We must regard the theory of Rousseau through the prism of the age contemporary with him, of the conceptions of that period and, implicitly, of the language of that age.

In time, as the constitutional law and the human civilization evolved, the separation of powers consolidated as an essential operating mode of democratic states, as a mark for identifying the democracies, respectively for depicting what autocracies lack. The principle of separation of powers in the state naturally causes the emergence and application of the law constitutionality control without which the supremacy of the Constitution could not be ensured[6].

Doing a short review of the current situation at the global level, we may lay out certain observations. Therefore, while in the parliamentary political regimes operates the principle of equality between the Parliament and the Executive, thus realising the balance between these (Great Britain, Germany), in the semi-presidential political regimes, the head of the state (who is also, generally, the chief of the Executive, but the Executive is, essentially, bicephalous) is not politically liable to the Parliament, but the Government must earn the trust of the Parliament in order to exercise the function of governance, respectively to have its list and program proposed for governance approved (France, Romania). Specific to the presidential political regimes, as it is the one of the U.S.A., is the belonging of the executive function to the head of the state and his subordinates who do not hold the quality of ministers, as there is no concept or institution of Government, the belonging of the legislative function to the Parliament (bicameral in the U.S.A. example – the House of Representatives and the Senate), and of the judicial one to the Supreme Court (the supreme court in the state, generally expressly regulated by the Constitution) and the other courts established by the law[7].

The theory of separation of powers had a special role, maybe a decisive one, in the promotion of the representative system, namely in the democratic harness of the relationship between the sovereign holder of the power and the state organisation of the political power; in the searching or even the state organization and functioning of the power in such manner that the guarantees of full exercise of the human rights and of the citizen are ensured. As the Constitutional Court of Romania specified, "the separation of powers in the state does not imply the lack of a control mechanism between the power of the state, on the contrary it implies the existence of a mutual control, as well as realising a balance of forces between these. The acts of the executive power are censored through the administrative contentious, and this involves, among others, the possibility of the court to suspend the execution of the alleged unlawful act" (D.C.C. no. 637/2006; to see the most recent decisions of the Constitutional Court, namely no. 63/08.02.2017, no. 64/09.02.2017 and no. 68/27.02.2017)[8].

The Constitutional Court had constantly affirmed that it fulfills an exclusive role of "negative legislator", never a role of "positive legislator", so that it had not sanctioned "maturities" or "legislative gaps", although it was often confronted with such situations (Decision no. 761/17.12.2014). That is the reason why its decisions are, mostly, "simple decisions" or "extreme/categorical decisions" which establish their constitutionality or lack of it. However, in a moderate form, the Constitutional Court of Romania had recoursed to some intermediate decisions, through which the constitutionality or lack of it was established with certain reserves[9].

Despite its indisputable relevance, like any theory, the theory of separation of powers principle has its own critiques. Such a critique is the aging of the theory of separation of powers[10]. This is explained by the fact that the theory was elaborated on the background of some institutional problems exhibited by the power, during an age when political parties were not yet established. As a consequence, the emergence of political parties and their particular role in the configuration of legal and political institutions causes the nowadays separation to occur not between the Parliament and the Government, but between a majority, consisting of a winning – in elections – party or parties which hold the Parliament and the Government at the same time, and an opposition (or oppositions) which waits for the next elections "to take revenge". Such a scheme is, in principle, applicable anywhere, but more evident in the two-party constitutional systems[11].

Other critiques are those represented by the theory of the power uniqueness, respectively the argument of violating the divisibility of sovereignty. Both, however, are easily countered. The first one because it does not take into consideration the fact that the power of state is, in fact, a system of bodies which coexist and control each other, while the latter has critiques with arguments from the theory of fractionated sovereignty.

The principle of separation of powers is distinctly consecrated in different constitutions of the world, but it does exist regardless the shape that it takes. While in some constitutions it is expressly regulated through a legal provision (e.g. the Constitution of Moldavia, of Romania), in others it results implicitly from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the texts of the fundamental law (e.g. the Constitution of France, Belgium and Spain). In Romania, since the constiutional revision of 2003, art. 1 para. (4) of the Constitution provides that "the state is organized according to the principle of separation and balance of powers – legislative, executive and judicial – in the frame of the constitutional democracy"[12].

2.2. The consecration of the principle of separation of powers in the constitutions of the EU member states

In the following, we shall examine, in alphabetic order, the constitutions/fundamental laws/acts with constitutional value of all the European Union member states, in terms of existence of some specific expressis verbis regulations regarding the principle of separation of powers, respectively of an implicit regulation, in terms of the form of governement, as well as the mode of regulation in terms of organization, respectively the provision of exercise of the three powers in the state by the authorities consecrated by the fundamental law (the classic functions of the three powers.

Republic of Austria[13]

The Constitution of Austria consecrates expressis verbis the principle of separation of powers. Therefore, art. 94 para. (1) provides that "the judicial and the executive powers are separated at all levels of procedure".

Austria is a parliamentary republic (with federative structure), where the legislative power is exercised by the National Council (Nationalrat) together with the Federal Council (Bundesrat), the two of them forming the chambers of the Federal Assembly having the role of the Parliament of Austria (Bundesversammlung).

The executive power of the Federation is exercised by the Federal President (Bundespräsident) together with the Federal Government (Bundesregierung), and the judicial power is exercised by the Supreme Court, as well as by other courts established by the law. The Constitutional Court of Austria has a broader range of competences than those that are traditionally established in the attributions of a constitutional court.

The Constitution of Belgium does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

The Kingdom of Belgium is a hereditary constitutional monarchy, characterized by the fact that the legislative power is collectively exercised by the King, the Chamber of Representatives and the Senate, and the executive power is bicephalous, represented by the King and his ministers.

On the top of the judicial system is the Supreme Court, which ensures a unitary practice, followed by the High Council of Justice, respectively by the administrative jurisdictions. The Constitution, in its current form, also consecrates a Constitutional Court which realizes the control of constitutionality. In order to characterize the relationship between the public authorities, the doctrine specifies that the Belgian institutions are dominated by the principle of separation of powers.

Republic of Bulgaria[15]

The Constitution of Bulgaria consecrates expressis verbis the principle of separation of powers. Therefore, art. 8 provides that "the power of the state is divided between the legislative power, the executive and the judicial one".

Bulgaria is a parliamentary republic, having a bicephalous executive – President and Government. The legislative is exercised by the Parliament, and the judicial activity by the Supreme Court of Cassation, together with the Supreme Administrative Court, courts of appeal, departamental tribunals, military tribunals and district tribunals.

Czech Republic[16]

The Constitution of the Czech Republic does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

The Czech Republic is a parliamentary republic in which the legislative function is exercised by the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies, while the executive function is exercised by the President of the Republic together with the Government.

In the Czech Republic, the judicial power consists of judges and prosecutors, these having the role of making justice, respectively of representing the state in the activity of protecting the public interest. The Constitutional Court of the Czech Republic is, according to the Constitution, the judicial body responsible for the defense of the constitutionality.

Republic of Cyprus[17]

The Constitution of Cyprus does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

It is a presidential republic where the President is also the head of the Government (the Council of Ministers). At the moment, the country is almost completely governed after the model conferred by the English law.

The executive power is ensured by the President and the Vicepresident, together with the Council of Ministers consisting of seven Greek ministers and three Turkish ministers, and the legislative power of the Republic is held by the House of Representatives in all matters, excepting those matters reserved for the Greek chamber, respectively for the Turkish one, related to their communities. The Supreme Court has the role of the last recourse court and is competent in civil, criminal and administrative matter. Also, it exercises the attributions of a constitutional court.

Republic of Croatia[18]

The Constitution of Croatia does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

Croatia is a parliamentary republic, where the legislative power is exercised by the unicameral Parliament, and the executive power is exercised by the Governement consisting of the Prime-minister and the ministers. The attributions of the head of the state mainly regard the defense and the international relations of the state.

The judicial power is exercised by the courts, hierarchically organized and under the coordination of the Supreme Court, respectively by the National Judicial Council (having an administrative role for the proper functioning of the Justice), an independent organ which ensures the autonomy and the independence of the judicial power. The Constitutional Court of Croatia is an institutional entity distinctly regulated by the Constitution, with attributions specific to this form of special jurisdiction, consisting of 13 judges. A particularity of the Croatian constitutional court competences is its attribution to verify the constitutionality of the rulings pronounced by the common law courts, namely the right to control the judicial power in terms of constitutionality of its acts.

Kingdom of Denmark[19]

The Constitution of Denmark consecrates expressis verbis the principle of separation of the judicial power from the executive one. Therefore, art. 62 provides that "the administration of the justice act is always made independently in relation to the executive power".

It is a constitutional monarchy in which the legislative power is divided between the Parliament (Folketing) and the King, who has the supreme authority to rule, which he exercises through his ministers. They are appointed and dismissed by the King, including the Prime-minister. The executive power is exercised by the King (symbolically), the King having in reality only a decorative role of representing the Danish state. As a consequence, the King exercies the executive function only formally, because the attributions of the executive power are effectively exercised only by the Government and the public administration. According to the Constitution of Denmark, the judicial power is exercised by the courts established by the law, namely by professional judges.

Hellenic Republic[20]

The Constitution of Greece does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

The Hellenic Republic is organised by the model of the parliamentary republics. Although it is not expressly mentioned in art. 26 of the Constitution (which consecrates the powers in the state), Greece is organized and governed in accordance with the principle of separation and collaboration of powers in the state, as the legislative power is exercised by the Parliament together with the President of the Republic (who has certain limited attributions regarding the promulgation of laws and the right to resend for analysis to the Parliament some laws to which he has objections), the executive power belongs to the President of the Republic (who is obviously part of the executive power, considering the majority of his constitutional attributions) and to the Government. The judicial power is exercised by the courts organised by the law.

Republic of Estonia[21]

The Constitution of Estonia consecrates expressis verbis the principle of separation of powers. Therefore, art. 4 provides that "the activities of the Parliament, of the President, of the Government and of the courts are organized according to the principle of separation and balance of the powers".

Estonia is a parliamentary republic in which the Parliament represents the legislative power, and the Government represents the executive power. The justice is exclusively made by the courts, while the Supreme Court is the exclusive constitutional jurisdiction.

Republic of Finland[22]

The Constitution of Finland does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

The three classic powers of the Finnish parliamentary republic are expressly delimited by the Constitution. The legislative power is thereby exercised by the unicameral Parliament, and the executive power is exercised by the President of the Republic together with the Government. The judicial power is exercised by independent courts, the Supreme Court and the Supreme Administrative Court being the highest courts. Regarding the constitutionality control, it is exercised only a priori by the Commission for Constitutional Law.

Republic of France[23]

France is a semi-presidential republic, its Constitution effectively consecrating the separation of the executive and legislative powers – with the typical french block of constitutionality, which reunites norms of the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen (1789), respectively the Preambles of the Constitutions of 1946 and 1958 proposed by the president Charles de Gaulle (general, hero of France during the World War II), currently in force. Therefore, in an illustrative manner of ample symbolism, art. 16 of the Preamble provides that "any society in which the guarantee of rights is not ensured, and the separation of powers is not realized, has no Constitution"[24].

The specific of the regulations of the French Constitution is the lack of the classic hierarchy of the public authorities (the legislative, the executive, the judicial power), but another order is regulated, namely the President of the Republic, the Government and the Parliament. The dominant position of the executive is obvious, purpose openly declared by the authors of the Constitution. The text of the fundamental law consecrates only the judicial authority as terminology, this being in accordance with the French conception about the separation of powers, and the French Constitutional Council was a source of inspiration for the Romanian constitutional regulations of 1991.

Federal Republic of Germany[25]

The Constitution of Germany does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

Two mentions characterize the German constitutional order: the structure and the functions of the public authorities correspond to the federal structure of the state and the application of the classic principle of separation and balance of powers is obvious. The legislative power is represented by the Parliament consisting of two assemblies, namely the Bundestag (the representative body of the people) and the Bundesrat (the public authority through which the lands collaborate for the enactment of the laws and for the administration of the Federation, as well as for the European Union businesses), at the level of the whole state.

The Federal Government, together with the Bundestag, rules the state, consisting of the Federal Chancellor, who is liable for the establishment of the great political orientations, and the federal ministers. The Federal President does not hold decision-making functions, having an integrator role in political matters and a representation role in the international relations. The judicial power is exercised by the judges, independent and subordinated only to the law, and the supreme jurisdiction in the state is exercised by the Federal Constitutional Court.

The Constitution of Ireland does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

Ireland is a parlamentary republic in which the legislative power is exercised by a unicameral Parliament, in collaboration with the President of the state. The executive power is exercised „by or on the basis of the authority of the Government", attributions specific to this power belonging, however, to the President of the Republic, assisted by the Council of State. The Government is represented by the Prime-minister and ministers.

The judicial system of Ireland consists of first instance tribunals, court of appeal and court of final appeal. The court of final appeal is the Supreme Court and is competent in the recourse phase regarding the decisions of the High Court. In Ireland, the constitutionality control of the laws is realised by two courts: the Supreme Court and the High Court.

Republic of Italy[27]

The Constitution of Italy establishes the parliamentary republic system and does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

In the democractic parliamentary republic of Italy, the legislative power is exercised by the bicameral Parliament (Parlamento) consisting of the Chamber of Deputies (La Camera dei Deputati) and the Senate of the Republic (Il Senato della Repubblica), the executive power is exercised by the collegial body represented by the Council of Ministers (Il Consiglio dei Ministri), ruled by the President of Council of Ministers (Il Presidente del Consiglio dei Ministri), and the judicial power is exercised by the Court of Cassation and the other courts established by the law. The Constitutional Court consists of 15 judges.

Republic of Latvia[28]

The Constitution of Latvia does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

Latvia is a parliamentary republic characterized by the fact that, while the members of the Parliament are directly elected by the people, the President is elected by the Parliament. The Government is appointed by the President on the basis of the vote of confidence granted by the Parliament. The Prime-minister is appointed by the President, and the ministers by the Prime-minister.

Latvia uses a judicial system with three levels: district courts (municipal), regional courts and the Supreme Court. The Constitutional Court cannot take notice, thus acting only at the request of the persons (subjects of seisin) provided by the law.

Republic of Lithuania[29]

The Constitution of Lithuania does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

The particularity of the parliamentary republic of Lithuania is represented by the fact that both the Parliament and the President of the Republic are institutions elected by the people through vote, while the Prime-minister is appointed and dismissed by the President of the Republic, with the agreement of the Parliament, and the ministers are apppointed and dismissed by the President of the Republic on the basis of the proposal of the Prime-minister. The courts are the classic ones, namely the Supreme Court, the Court of Appeal, the regional courts and the local courts. The Constitutional Court consists of nine judges, each of them being appointed for a single mandate of nine years. Every three years, a third of the members of the Constitutional Court are renewed.

The Grand Duchy of Luxembourg[30]

The Constitution of Luxembourg does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

Luxembourg is a hereditary monarchy in which the executive power is exercised by the Grand Duke together with the Government consisting of the Prime-minister and more ministers. The legislative power belongs to the Chamber of Deputies. A second body, „Conseil d'État" (Council of State), consisting of 21 citizens appopinted by the Duke, has a consultative role for the Chamber of Deputies in the elaboration of laws.

In terms of judicial power, there are the courts (as first grade of jurisdiction) and tribunals (courts of judicial control), at the top being the Superior Court of Justice. The main attribution of the Constitutional Court is the prerogative to decide with regard to the compliance of the laws with the Constitution.

The Constitution of Malta does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

Malta is a parliamentary republic ruled in accordance with the principle of separation and collaboration of powers in the state. The legislative power is thereby exercised by the President of the Republic together with the unicameral Parliament, the executive power is exercised by the President of the republic with the support of the Government, and the judicial power is exercised by the courts which are independent in relation to the other two powers in the state. The judicial system is represented by the superior courts, ruled by judges, and inferior courts, chaired by magistrates. The superior courts include the Supreme Court and the Constitutional Court.

The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland[32]

The Constitution of the United Kingdom does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland is a hereditary constitutional monarchy, which operates on the basis of the principle of separation and collaboration of powers in the state and of the rule of laws adopted by the Parliament. Formally, the British monarch still rules not only the United Kingdom, but the whole Commonwealth, an association of states united under the British Crown. In fact, the executive power, which belonged to the absolute monarchs in the past, is exercised today by the Government still named „of Her Majesty's", ruled by a Prime-minister who is the head of the winning political party in the general election. The loss of the confidence of the Parliament (consisting of the House of Lords and the House of Commons) often has the consequence of losing the position of Prime-minister. It is that important for the legislative and executive powers to collaborate so that the British political regime operates at its best.

The collaboration and balance of the powers in the state binds the Prime-minister and the members of the Government to be members of the Parliament as well, otherwise they cannot hold executive functions of governance, thus excluding their vocation to hold the quality of ministers. Considering that the Great Britain does not have a written and formally supreme Constitution, there is no formally consecrated control of constitutionality or Constitutional Court.

United Kingdom of the Netherlands[33]

The Constitution of the United Kingdom of the Netherlands does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

It is a hereditary monarchy in which the legislative power belongs to the bicameral Parliament (General State) and the executive power to the Government (King and ministers). They enact laws in common, but the attributions of executive power are separated from the legislative ones, so that the Government enforces the laws enacted by the bicameral Dutch Parliament. The control of constitutionality is not explicitly identified in the constiutional provisions, this being specific to the Dutch legal system which allows, by not regulating in any form, the law – as legal act of the Parliament – to establish the regulations in this matter. The Constitution forbids, however, the courts of common law, namely the judicial power, in art. 120, the autonomy to arrogate by jurisprudential way the competence of exercising the control of constitutionality over laws and treaties.

Polish Republic[34]

The Constitution of Poland consecrates expressis verbis the principle of separation of the judicial power from the other two powers. Therefore, art. 173 provides that "the courts and tribunals constitute a separated and independent power in relation to the other powers in the state".

The Parliament (National Assembly) is bicameral, consisting of the Diet (Sejm) and Senate, and exercises the whole legislative power. The President of the Polish Republic and the Council of Ministers exercises the executive power.

In Poland, the justice is made by the Supreme Court, the courts of common law, the courts of administrative contentious and the military courts, while the judicial procedure contains at least two grades of jurisdiction. The Constitutional Tribunal is a court specialized in constitutional contentious, consisting of 15 judges individually appointed by the Diet for a mandate of nine years, from the persons acknowledged for their legal competences.

Portuguese Republic[35]

The Constitution of Portugal does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

The political powers in the semi-presidential republic of Portugal are exercised by the President, the Assembly of the Republic, the Government and the courts. They are separated, but interdependent. The President, among others, chairs the Council of State (the political body which advises the President of the Republic in the state problems) and summons the extraordinary meetings of the Assembly of the Republic. The Parliament (the Assembly of the Republic) is unicameral.

Besides the Constitutional Court, which is part of the national system of courts, there also exist the Supreme Court of Justice and the courts of first grade of jurisdiction and of second grade, the Supreme Administrative Court and the Court of Audit, as well as administrative and fiscal courts.

Slovak Republic[36]

The Constitution of Slovakia consecrates expressis verbis the principle of separation of the judicial power from the legislative and executive powers. Therefore, art. 141 para. (2) provides that "at all levels, the justice is separately exercised in relation to the other bodies of the state".

Slovakia is a parliamentary republic in which the legislative power is represented by the National Council of the Slovak Republic, a unicameral Parliament. The executive power is exercised by the President together with the Government ruled by the Prime-minister. The judicial power is represented by the Supreme Court of the Slovak Republic, the Constitutional Court, the courts and the Judicial Council of the Slovak Republic.

Republic of Slovenia[37]

The Constitution of Slovenia consecrates expressis verbis the principle of separation of powers. Therefore, art. 3 provides that "in Slovenia, the power belongs to the people. The citizens directly exercise this power" (the principle according to which the people are the unique holders of the national soverignty, and the public authorities exercise the sovereignty in the name of the people). „The people exercise this power through universal, free and periodic elections, and the essential authorities operate with the observance of the principle of separation of powers in the legislative, executive and judicial one.".

The legislative power is exercised by the National Assembly, and the executive power is exercised by the President of the Republic together with the Government. The judicial system of Slovenia is represented by ordinary courts. The Supreme Court is the highest court of the state, deciding on the ordinary and extraordinary appeals. The Constitution of Slovenia also regulates the establishment and the functioning of a constitutional court having only the role of exercising the control of constitutionality and consisting of nine judges.

The Constitution of Spain does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

At the top of the executive power of the parliamentary monarchy of Spain is the Government represented by ministers and ruled by the Prime-minister, while the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate form the two chambers of the Parliament. The King is the head of the state, the symbol of the unity and permanence of Spain, his role being more of a symbolic one. The General Council of the Judicial Power is the body which ensures the governance and the representation of this power (art. 122 of the Constitution of Spain). It consists of the President of the Supreme Court, who chairs the Council, and 20 members appointed by the King for a five-year period. The Constitutional Court consists of 12 judges and mainly exercises the typical attributions of law constitutionality control.

The Constitution of Sweden does not expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers, thus implicitly resulting from the constitutional provisions and the method of structuring the constitutional text.

Sweden is a constitutional parliamentary monarchy, characterized by the fact that the Head of the Swedish state is the King, and the executive power of the King is realized by the Government which is liable to the the unicameral Parliament, known as Riksdag. The King has a symbolic role, having some attributions of appointing high dignitaries, the Government, other important positions in the state, although the legal mechanism of exercising these attributions by the King moves, in reality, these decisions to the main public institutions and authorities, those that formulate the proposals for the head of the state.

The judicial activity is ensured by the Supreme Court (the highest court), the courts of appeal and district courts/tribunals, and in the administrative contentious matter there are regulated the Supreme Administrative Court, courts of appeal and administrative tribunals. The control of constitutionality is realized by the administrative jurisdictions or the courts of common law (especially by the Supreme Court of Sweden) and is focused on the causes which are effectively being judged. Although it may seem an attribution easy to be exercised by the courts of common law, in reality, this mechanism of judicial control on the constitutionality of the laws is rarely used in practice. A diffuse and preliminary control of constitutionality is firstly realized by the Parliament (Riksdag) during the stage of elaboration and adoption of laws, when the constitutional analyses are strictly realized. This system of preliminary diffuse control is traditionally used in all the other states which do not have special constitutional courts, the parliamentary assemblies paying increased attention to the compatibility of the laws from the project with the constitutional norms. It must be mentioned that the fundamental law of Sweden, together with the one of Austria and of other european states as well (the most recent fundamental laws or with the most recent significant changes), have an ample volume of legal norms, regulating in detail numerous areas of activity which are generally considered to be part of the competence of the Parliament in terms of adoption.

The Constitution of Hungary consecrates expressis verbis the principle of separation of powers. Therefore, art. C para. (1) of the Foundations provides that "the functioning of the Hungarian state is based on the principle of separation of powers in the state".

Hungary is a parliamentary republic in which the legislative power belongs to the National Assembly (Országgyűlés), which consists of a single chamber, and the executive power is exercised by the President, Prime-minister and Government.

The judicial power is exercised by the courts, namely Curia (the Supreme Court of Hungary), regional courts of appeal, district courts, administrative courts and labor law courts. Regarding the Constitutional Court, it consists of 15 members, elected with the vote of two thirds of the members of the National Assembly for a twelve-year mandate, from the legal experts with high professional preparation.

Romania

The Constitution of Romania consecrates expressis verbis the principle of separation of powers. Therefore, art. 1 para. (4) provides that "the state is organized according to the principle of separation and balance of powers – legislative, executive and judicial – in the frame of the constitutional democracy".

The legislative power is exercised by the bicameral Parliament. The executive power is exercised by the President together with the Government – chaired by the Prime-minister appointed by the President on the basis of the vote of confidence granted by the Parliament. The judicial power is exercised by the courts, tribunals, courts of appeal and the High Court of Cassation and Justice. The constitutional jurisdiction belongs to the Constitutional Court which consists of nine judges appointed for a nine-year mandate.

The main result obtained by realizing this study consists of proving the fact that the relationship which we had as a premise does not exist, namely the one between the express or implicit constitutional consecration of the principle of separation of powers in the state, its form of government, the manner in which the three powers belong to the public authorities that exercise them, as well as the effective observance of the principle.

The constitutions of ten European Union member states, out of all 28, expressly consecrate the principle of separation of powers in the state, namely: Austria, Bulgaria, Denmark, Estonia, France, Hungary, Poland, Romania, Slovakia and Slovenia. These are ten states with different levels of social, economic and political development, with different democratic and constitutional traditions, as well as with different forms of government. The other 18 states have constitutional norms which indirectly, implicitly or diffusely consecrate, in fact, the separation of powers, indicating the attributions of each classic public authority, on the basis of the functions which compose the principle of separation of powers: the legislative function given in the competence of the parliamentary assemblies, the executive function assigned to the Government and to the head of the state, respectively the judicial function granted to the courts consisting of judges.

Therefore, if we could talk about a common factor having the potential to consolidate the observance level of the principle of separation of powers in the state, that factor remains the general education of the society, the historical accumulations, all of these contributing to the formation of a generation of responsible citizens, among whom will be recruted the specialists of the essential state authorities which were previously analyzed, respectively the political class especially during the stage preliminary to the electoral process, citizens who shall make correct and grounded decisions, capable to understand the meaning and the basic content of the principle of separation of powers in the state, as a defining element of a democracy, as well as the importance of the supremacy of the Constitution over the whole state regulatory system.

THE PRINCIPLE OF SEPARATION OF POWERS - CONSTITUTIONAL GUARANTEE

Emilian CIONGARU*

Abstract

The principle of ensuring the legal bases of the State functioning is the fundamental principle of law which actually settles down the principle of separation of powers: legislative, executive and judicial power. Over the time, the principle of separation of powers, although in practice its enforcement experienced more than two centuries, it hasn't expressed itself in a pure form, not even in the most advanced democracies. Whether it is approached the thesis of a more flexible or more rigid separation of powers or the thesis on certain exceptions to those two situations specific to certain political regimes, the principle of separation of powers is the fundamental mechanism in ensuring a balance of powers and preventing the establishment of a dictatorial or authoritarian regime. The complex content of the rule of law consists of: the rule of law regency; the capitalization on the actual size of the fundamental rights and freedoms; the achievement of the balance/mutual cooperation of public authorities and the performance of free access to justice. If the form of State organization of the political power of the people is done by several groups or categories of State bodies with functions and features clearly defined and characterized by organizational and functional autonomy, as well as mutual balance and collaboration, it is emerging the principle of separation of the State powers balance.

Keywords: fundamental principle; principle of ensuring legal bases; principle of separation of powers; balance of powers.

1. Introductory elements regarding the concept of rule of law*

In current democracies, the rule of law became the foundation of society. In a brief definition which contains the idea one must start from, the rule of law means subordination of the State to the rule of law. Likewise, Léon Duguit shows that the State, by making the law, is obliged to observe it as long as it exists. The State may amend or repeal it, but as long as it exists, it can not do an act contrary, an administrative or jurisdictional act only within the limits set by this law and so the State is a rule of law. The State, under the same idea, is the litigant of its own courts. It may be a party to a suit; it can be convicted by its own judges and is kept as a simple individual to enforce the judgment given against it[1].

The rule of law was the criterion for the classification of States in of law and despotic, in legislator State, administrator State or judge State. The rule of law must not be confused with the principle of legality, because it is more than that.

The complex content of the rule of law consists of: the rule of law regency; the capitalization on the actual size of the fundamental rights and freedoms; the achievement of the balance/mutual cooperation of public authorities and the performance of free access to justice.

The rule of law must be accompanied by a guarantee scheme, which has as final purpose the self-limitation of the State by the law. This guarantee scheme is based on the following main rules: the amendment of the Constitution to be carried out only by an expressly authorized assembly, elected on democratic bases and to carry out the review procedure; the review itself should not impact on the fundamental values of the constitutional democracy; the existence of a constitutional control; the confinement of the exercise of rights and fundamental freedoms by the law only if necessary, but in proportion to the situation that caused it, without prejudice to the right or freedom and for the grounds expressly provided in the Constitution and the non-limitation of the free access to justice.

2. General considerations regarding the historical evolution of the principle of separation of powers

If the form of State organization of the political power of the people is done by several groups or categories of State bodies with functions and features clearly defined and characterized by organizational and functional autonomy, as well as mutual balance and collaboration, it is emerging the principle of separation of the State powers balance, a state that is specific to the coherence of juridical systems[2] of the democratic system of government.

Over the time, the principle of separation of powers[3], although it experienced in its enforcement a practice of more than two centuries, it was not expressed in a pure form not event in the advanced democracies.

The principle of separation of powers was set for the first time by Aristotle in his work Politics and was later developed by the school of natural law - Grotius, Wolff, Puffendorf - and then by John Locke, but finding crowning in Montesquieu's work.

Aristotle in his work, Politics, in Book IV, speaks of segregation of powers in the State, asserting that: In every State, there are three parties, which the legislature shall deal with if it's wise to appoint them as best as possible, given first any individual interests. These three parties once well organized, the whole State is necessarily well organized itself, and States can not effectively distinguish than by different organization of these three elements. The first of these parties is the general assembly that deliberates on political affairs, the second is the body of magistrates, which must decide the nature, the competences and the mode of appointment, the third is the body of judges.[4] The general assembly was the deliberate body, that is, the real sovereign of power. The body of judges included officials and formed the executive power. As per the courts, Aristotle shows they are made up of judges, and these judges make up the body of judges - the judiciary power.

John Locke argued in his book Essay on Civilian Government the existence of three powers in the State, namely the legislative, the executive - which oversees law enforcement, the federative, which represents the State in external relations, prerogative which included powers that remain available to the executive. Arguing the idea of separation of powers, the English philosopher John Locke pointed out that the temptation to seize power would be too high if the same persons who have the power to make laws would also have in their hands the power to enforce them, because they could exempt themselves to obey the laws which they make[5].

Therefore, in his opinion, in a well-organized State, the power to make laws should be vested in an assembly specially convened for that purpose, but after the laws have been adopted, assemblies should separate and obey the laws they have adopted.

Taking up and developing the ideas of John Locke, the true theoretician of this theory, Baron Charles Montesquieu and then all the liberal State theorists have seen the separation of powers the effective means to weaken the omnipotence of the State, spreading its prerogatives[6].

Whether discussing of a flexible or rigid separation of powers, by certain exceptions in both cases (specific to a regime or other), the principle of separation of powers - is the main mechanism to ensure a balance and to prevent a dictatorial regime.

In terms of terminology, the doctrine attributed two meanings to the separation of powers theory[7]:

- In a first meaning, also called original meaning - being the non-despotic form of political organization, in which not all powers are assigned to the same person or authority.
- In a second meaning that is emphasized by the modern doctrine, reference is made to the need for separation and independence of powers, specialized authorities of the State, to ensure the balance between them, to prevent a despotic governing and thus to secure the individual rights and freedoms.

Montesquieu expressed particularly eloquent this need: Because there is no possibility of abusing power, power must be defeated by power. When in one hand there is joint legislative and executive power, there is no freedom"[8].

For these reasons, the separation of powers is intended to provide a guarantee in the normal functioning of the relationship and the balance between them, representing one of the fundamental principles of the rule of law and with the purpose to satisfy of the national interest[9].

Even though between the three powers - legislative, executive and judicial there is no full separation, they must work together in the words of the principle - they must concert.

What is essential in these cooperation relationships between powers is to keep their independence and the separation of their judicial functions, also motivated by the need to exercise a mutual control.

According to another author[10], the separation of functions between the legislative and the executive is the most critical because of the interference and the emergence between them of a new trinity of mutual control and balance of powers: Parliament, Government and President.

This point of view, of the author mentioned above, can be estimated to be entirely justified and we might add, in support, the fact that this trinity, of which he is speaking, really contains a fragility to ensuring the balance between powers.

Although in this regard many examples of the lapse can be given, we can remind and submit to reflection only the present situation that characterizes the Romanian political life and the original way in which, quite often, these powers get to work...

Therefore, it is considered justified to emphasize that, regardless of the degree of flexibility of the cooperation relationships between powers for maintaining the separation and balance, it is necessary to drive a wedge primarily by any overlapping of functions conferred to every power, any substitution, and secondly - to distinguish between cooperation, mediation and interference.

3. Constitutional regulation of the principle of the separation and balance of powers

To be able to find a rationale for the title of this paper, we need to study the ways that can be used to argue whether, how much and how it is applied and observed the principle of separation and balance of powers. It would be appropriate if before any concrete examples of factual situations, we would first undertake an analysis in terms of the provisions governing this principle, starting with the Constitution provisions.

The Constitution, as any normative act, must keep up with social developments, adapt to the social, political, economic context and be able to respond to both internal and international trends[11].

Thus, in the Constitution, art. 1 para. (4) - entitled The Romanian State, there are mentioned three powers - legislative, executive and judicial - and that the State is organized on the principle of separation and balance - in the framework of the constitutional democracy.

In subsequent provisions - specifically Chapter VI, it can however be seen that one of the powers, namely the judicial power, becomes authority?

Before any opinion on the compliance or breaches of this principle of separation and balance of powers, mentioned in the Art. 1, to be first stated - to what extent these constitutional provisions are consistent with each other.

In particular, reference is made to the provisions of the Constitution[12] - headed The Prosecutors' Status, stating inter alia that their work is carried out under the authority of the Minister of Justice and under the hierarchical control principle.

So it would appear appropriate to make some observations on this text, motivated by the fact that, as it is well known, almost all members of the Government headed by Prime Minister were and are politically enlisted or politically controlled.

Consequently, the minister of justice, who should enjoy a maximum independence, in fact becomes an instrument of the executive, regardless of acknowledgement of party affiliation or declaration as independent.

Another remark: the text of this article speaks only of legality, impartiality and hierarchical control, the authority of the minister of justice, the principle of independence, accidentally or not - being absent.

Then the question is inherent: if this principle would have been found alongside the other principles previously mentioned, would have been inconsistent in terms of terminology with the hierarchical control, or the latter no longer justifies its existence?

It would seem so. To discuss about an independence to be hierarchically controlled is an antagonistic approach to the problem, or at least illogical.

Could this be the explanation for the omission to mention in the text of the principle of independence, or it was thought to be understood?!

Discretions can exist in this regard and one might conclude that in reality, the political decision-makers did not want the independence of this institution, for the simple fact that the Public Ministry is still an important leverage of power and the political forces could not do without so far.

This is why the Public Ministry's position within the judicial power was and still is a controversial and unresolved issue.

As per the wording under the authority of the Minister of Justice - it is hypothesized that this is not in fact than some apparent sweetening and a masking through substitution or avoidance of the term subordination.

The assumption can arise that any provision given to prosecutors by a State official, among other powers, is in total contradiction with the principle of impartiality and represents a serious threat to democracy.

Not infrequently, for the impartiality of a prosecutor, the question arose of how they can be impartial, given that not only they must obey the law, but also the mandatory provisions given by the Minister of Justice[13].

No less controversial is the status of magistrate given to the prosecutor, and on the other hand, the position and the role of the Public Ministry within the judicial power.

Referring to the institution it is clear that, in agreement with and with that title they bear - Prosecutor's Office attached to... - it continues to be attached to all courts at all levels - factually, within the [12] In the Art. 132 para. (1) of the Constitution it is stated that: ″Prosecutors operate according to the principle of legality, impartiality and hierarchical control, under the authority of the Minister of Justice″.

[13] Nicolae Cochinescu, Organization of the Judicial Power in Romania (Courts - Public Ministry - Special Jurisdictions), ("Lumina Lex" Publishing House, Bucharest, 1997), 406-431.

judicial power, operating according to the same principle: that of hierarchical control...

Also relevant is that they are still conferred identical powers to those of the judicial power, instead of this institution to be on an equal footing with the defence. It is envisaged regarding this inequality not only the status, duties and powers conferred to the prosecutor, but including their physical position in the court proceedings. In a plastic expression, the prosecutor stands at an altitude difference in relation to the defence.

A final example in finding the answer to the question:

In the Constitution[14] regulating the Structure of the Constitutional Court, it is stated that of the nine judges making it up, three are appointed by the Chamber of Deputies, three by the Senate and three by the President.

What conclusion could be drawn from the content of this text?

- In firstly that this prerogative of appointing judges to the Constitutional Court does not return equally to all the powers listed in Art. 1 of the Constitution.
- The only power of the three, being only the legislative power - which is represented by the two Chambers of Parliament.
- That the executive and judicial powers - were ″less equal″ in relation to the legislative power;
- That instead of the other two omitted powers, another power appeared - that conferred to the President to the detriment of the executive and judicial powers, which have been substituted.
- Equally true is the fact that increasingly more the executive power - by the multitude of ordinances and legislative packages - more or less assumed, came to substitute in turn the legislature, which it turned into a body of review. As it has been said in a more than elegant manner: Given that on average, the Governments of Romania have adopted annually in the last decade about 2,000 emergency ordinances, it is understood that our State passed all this time by 2,000 extraordinary situations, in other word, almost every day[15].

Undoubtedly this situation is actually the political will and thinking existing in the adoption of the Constitution 1991, including the time of the review.

In the spirit of separation, equality and balance between powers, an enshrined and thus constitutionally guaranteed principle, it can be asked whether still in line with these principles - wouldn't have been more equitable that the legislative power represented by the two chambers to submit only three proposals, not six, the executive in its turn to make three proposals - and instead of the president, the judicial power to make its three proposals...?! Of course, controversies existed, are and will still be, and the only regulatory document that might clarify, largely, or at least should begin to clarify these controversies would be the Constitution itself.

The Constitution is the supreme regulatory document that regulates the State organization and the exercise of national sovereignty and the holder of the sovereign power is the Romanian people and only the people exercises this power in two ways: through representative bodies and by referendum. Thus, these provisions confer a clear and limited mandate to the representative bodies that are entrusted with the exercise of power only, so certain powers and not the absolute power. It is not devolution of power but delegation of some power functions, and the only holder of power is and shall remain the Romanian people, resulting in significant legal consequences, including those relating to the responsibility of all public authorities before the people, responsibilities that can get clarified only under the legal provisions, specific to the rule of law.

4. Conclusions

In conclusion, as per the facts mentioned above, we may point out that the principle of separation and balance of powers in the State is the fundamental principle of the right guaranteed unequivocally by the Constitution as the supreme will of the people, as sovereignty specifically set by the people in and for the people's interest. To achieve this principle, a permanent and continuous cooperation of the State structures should exist in achieving the people's will, cooperation which entails clear delimitation of competences by Constitution, the existence of an organizational and functional autonomy, mutual control without the interference of a power in the duties and powers of the other, categorical constitutional guarantees of the commission fulfilment and the observance of the fundamental rights and freedoms of citizens, as supreme values of existence of any civilized society. The separation of powers does not mean their isolation because each branch of power participates in the functioning of the other through a system of mutual control and balancing. Thus, the separation between the legislative, the executive and judiciary powers aims to prevent the establishment of a dictatorial, tyrannical or totalitarian regime.

ASSESSMENTS REGARDING THE LEGAL NATURE OF AN ACT BETWEEN A LABOR LAW ACT, A NORMATIVE ADMINISTRATIVE ACT OR AN INDIVIDUAL ADMINISTRATIVE ACT

Marta-Claudia CLIZA*

Abstract

This article aims to establish the legal nature of a regulation, using an analysis of the characteristics and specific criteria of each type of act and concluding with the determination of the legal nature of such a regulation, either as a labor law act, a normative administrative act, or an individual administrative act.

Keywords: legal nature, normative act, individual act, labor law act, regulation.

1. Introduction

This study aims to analyze the features of the normative administrative acts, individual administrative acts, but also of those belonging to labor law.

Over the time, both the lawmaker and the doctrine have contributed to the shaping of certain criteria for distinguishing between the acts issued by the authorities, so that the qualification of an act as having an administrative nature (either normative or individual), or as belonging to the area of the labor law does not raise interpretation issues.

Notwithstanding the aforementioned, there are situations when the courts face difficulties, so that an uneven practice was reached, the decisions of the High Court of Cassation and Justice which established boundary lines in the interpretation of the legal regulations being completely justified.

Given that the theory has the desired results when combined with a case study, we will refer to a specific case, namely Sentence no. 225/January 30th, 2015 ruled by the Court of Appeal Bucharest, Division of Contentious Administrative and Fiscal, published as an extract on site juridice.ro[1].

2.1. Therefore, the Financial Supervisory Authority (former National Securities Commission[2]) requested before the courts the annulment of Regulation no. 4/2013. The criticized regulation introduced the right to an indemnity equivalent to 9 net salaries, upon the termination of the membership to the authority, in what concerns the personnel employed within the offices of NSC members.

It should be noted that in order for the aforementioned indemnity to be grated, the employed personnel was required not to choose to continue the employment relationships with the institution or not to had received another compensation, respectively a receivable right.

Therefore, Regulation no. 4/2013 concerns a certain category of definable persons. They are the persons working within NSC, occupying the functions provided by the organizational chart.

The position of the author of the article is interesting; firstly the author performs an authentic analysis of the criteria for distinguishing between normative administrative acts and individual administrative acts, by getting to admit the existence of the appearance of administrative act of individual nature of the Regulation. Notwithstanding, in the end, the author classifies Regulation no. 4/2013 as being an administrative act of normative nature.

Therefore, on the one hand, we will analyze whether or not the challenged act could belong to the labor area, as well as the considerations which led to the wrong conclusion of the author, in our opinion.

2.2. Does the challenged act envisage, by means of its content, the relationships which fall under the scope of the labor law?

A public authority is not engaged only in administrative law relationships (case in which the respective authority operates as a public authority according to Law no. 554/2004 of the Contentious Administrative[3]), but also in legal relationships belonging to other branches of law, such as labor law. In the latter case, the respective authority falls outside the scope of LCA.

In its turn, the case law of the contentious administrative courts, including of the Supreme Court, includes rulings whereby the administrative nature of an act issued by a state authority was not acknowledged, whenever it was found that the issuer did not act according to the special public power authorities it was empowered with[4].

It could be argued that the legal relationships established between NSC and the persons who work within this authority would be labor law relationships, based on the following grounds:

In what concerns the employed personnel art. 15 para. (1) NSC Articles of Organization provides that „NSC personnel shall be employed according to the provisions of Law no. 53/2003 – Labor Code, as further amended and supplemented".

In what concerns the relationship established between NSC and the member of the authority – even if this relationship is not carried out under an employment agreement – it is interesting to note that it falls under the scope of the employment relationships, under art. 1 para. (2)[5] and art. 278 para. (2)[6] of the Labor Code.

The relationship established between NSC and NSC member fulfills the main features of the employment relationships, as they are provided by the case law and the labor law doctrine:

a) the legal relationship established between NSC and NSC member is intuitu personae, as the designation in this position is performed intuitu personae;
b) NSC member is obviously a natural person;
c) NSC member is subordinated to the authority, the decisions of the NSC being mandatory for any member, the regulations issued by NSC on the organization and functioning of this institution not being exempted from this rule[7];
d) NSC member continuously carries out his activity during his term of office within an institutionalized organizational framework according to the working program established by means of the documents issued by NSC on the functioning of this authority;
e) NSC member receives a monthly remuneration for the activity carried out in his capacity within NSC; the income gained by the NSC member is considered salary income.

The administrative authority which is served by the NSC member and which the NSC member is subordinated to behaves as the employer of the member. The behavior of NSC institution towards NSC member is similar to the behavior of any employer towards its employees.

In the relation established with the NSC member, the institution acts as any other employer, respectively benefits from the provision of services, organized according to own regulations and procedures, and for this services, the institution pays the NSC member a monthly remuneration / indemnity and other rights established according to own regulations.

Taking into account all the aforementioned, we would be tempted to consider that, in what concerns the NSC member, we would find ourselves in the presence of a labor law relationship.

Although we cannot deny the connection of the labor law with the administrative law, we cannot ignore that these two branches of law are correlated, but in what concerns the settlement of employment disputes, professional reintegration of unemployed persons, as well as their social protection[8], not being able to extend the nature of act belonging to the labor law to any similar act of the authority.

Therefore, we cannot accept the argument according to which Regulation no. 4/2013 of NSC belongs to the labor law area, this being an administrative act, issued under public power terms, by an administrative authority.

Hereinafter, we will establish the appropriate nature of this administrative act, against the considerations of the Court of Appeal of Bucharest.

2.3. The arguments according to which (i) the publication special procedural forms would not have been fulfilled and (ii) the law qualifies an act in a certain way are not standalone.

Indeed, the concept of „publication" of the administrative acts represents the guarantee of the fulfillment of the lawfulness and transparency of the local government authority.

Notwithstanding, we cannot mandatorily extend this concept over all administrative acts. Therefore, it is important to analyze whether the act is normative or individual, by the full analysis of the effects it produces, as well as of the content of the act, therefore by means of the features of each of the two category of acts.

None of the aforementioned issues was analyzed, therefore the grammatical enforcement of the law was not reached. We believe that we cannot conclude on the nature of an administrative act as being normative or individual, only based on the classification provided by the law, without a thorough analysis of the content of the act.

Therefore, as it is well known in what concerns the normative administrative act, publishing[9] is an essential condition for its validity, unlike the absence of this obligation towards the individual act; the latter only has to be communicated to the recipients, even verbally. The most effective way to communicate an individual act is the handling of the act[10].

[9] According to art. 11 para. (2) letter b) of Law no. 24/2000 on the legislative technique regulations for the normative acts issuance: „The following shall not be subject to the regime of publication in the Official Journal of Romania: (...) b) normative acts classified according to

Therefore, an individual administrative act cannot be conditioned, according to its current legal framework, to take a certain form, except the written one, as a principle of the administrative acts. Furthermore, the doctrine[11] provides that an individual act can rarely have a verbal form, if the law expressly provides so.

Therefore, the argument according to which certain publishing special procedural forms were not fulfilled must not be applied ad litteram and this argument cannot represent a standalone ground for the classification of an administrative act as a normative one.

Such a classification would have been reasonable if the content of the act had been analyzed, in order to find if the features of a normative were met or it was rather about an individual act; all the more so as the fact that the act was published or not has no consequence on the lawfulness of an act and, therefore, it cannot change the nature of individual administrative act.

Despite the fact that the provisions of art. 7 para. (4) of the NSC Articles of organization list the individual acts of the authority, among which the regulations are not present, the court of law should have exercised more caution in the decision-making process. Therefore, the examination of the entire content of the document was required. The automatic application of the law, strictly by analyzing its grammatical regulations, without the content of the challenged act being granted the required attention, can only lead to a mechanical interpretation, denying the unitary nature of the act itself.

In this respect, the case law of the High Court of Cassation and Justice established that the classification of an infra-legislative act in one of the two aforementioned categories CANNOT be performed by „cutting" certain provisions of that act, thus affecting the unitary nature of the act, but by the full examination of its content, in the light of the features of each of the two categories of acts. In this regard, the High Court held that Government Resolution no. 349/2005 on waste storage is a normative one since it contains general rules, with repeated application, and its recipients are represented by an undetermined number of subjects (...)[12].

If the content of the act had been analyzed, it would have been noted that Regulation no. 4/2013 met the features of an individual administrative act, and not of a normative act. Therefore, according to the doctrine[13], the features of a normative administrative act are marked by the fact that the act includes general impersonal rules of conduct with repeated applicability, in order to be applied to an undetermined number of subjects.

The individual administrative act, on the other hand, shall not meet these features, a confusion between these two types of acts being impossible, if these defining features are taken into account.

Therefore, the extent of the legal effects, the nature of the measures provided by its content, the recipients of the act, and not the name of the act shall be the elements which have to be taken into account when establishing the legal nature of an administrative act[14].

The normative act includes general and impersonal rules of conducts, as the laws[15]. Instead, the individual act can be addressed to a sole person, as easy as it can consider hundreds, even thousands definable recipients[16]. Therefore, one of the most important criteria for distinguishing between the two types of administrative acts is represented by the definable feature of the persons which it is applied to.

The individual act becomes effective for a limited and determined / definable number of beneficiaries, a manifestation of will which creates, modifies or extinguishes rights and obligations in the benefit of or which are incumbent on its recipients[17].

Therefore, Regulation no. 4/2013 refers to changes on indemnities, salaries, various allowances, benefits, prizes, bonuses and other emoluments, vacations and additional vacations. All these elements are determined by reference exclusively to the persons employed within NSC, on various functions provided by the organizational chart of this authority.

Therefore, it has an internal nature, being applied only within the institution, in the relationships established between NSC as authority, on the one hand, and the persons activating within it, on the other hand.

[17] In order to substantiate the importance of the criterion on the definable nature of the administrative act recipients, see the following decisions of the High Court of Cassation and Justice: Decision no. 2110/2012; Decision no. 1718/2013; Decision no. 6926/2013.

As a matter of fact, the High Court of Cassation and Justice established the legal nature of individual administrative act in what concerns the acts issued by certain public authorities and institutions. The common feature of these acts is that they contemplate various matters of domestic organization of the respective authorities and produce effects exclusively in connection with the persons who carry out their activity within the authorities.

Therefore, the High Court of Cassation and Justice noted the nature of individual act in the following cases, on different acts, namely: Decision no. 1367 of March 18th, 2014[18]; Decision no. 3366 of September 23rd, 2014[19]; Decision no. 5632 of June 7th, 2013[20]; Decision no. 3263 of June 3rd, 2011[21].

Therefore, the challenged regulation took the shape of a regulation that considers determined subjects, produces its effects only in connection with its staff, civil servants or contractual agents, being, basically, an internal act of the authority[22]. Therefore, it should have been qualified as an administrative act with individual nature.

3. Conclusions

The challenged regulation does not belong to the area of the labor law and does not meet the aforementioned conditions in order to be deemed a normative act, as follows: it does not establish a general and impersonal rule of conduct, as it has limited applicability, the persons falling under the scope of this regulation being determined.

It can not be claimed that the regulation has general applicability, namely erga omnes, as long as the other employees of the other authorities do not benefit from the same rights. Furthermore, as we have already shown, in what concerns the assessment of the legal nature of the administrative act, the effects it produce, the nature of the measures provided by it and the recipients of the acts are the essential elements, and not the form or the name of the act.

Given all the aforementioned, we hereby conclude that Regulation no. 4/2013 of NSC meets the features of an administrative act of individual nature, and it cannot be legally qualified as having another legal nature.

CONFLICT OF INTERESTS' REGULATION ON ELECTED OFFICIALS

Marta-Claudia CLIZA[*]

Abstract

This article sheds an overview of the different perspectives that judicial courts grant regarding the same concept, namely the conflict of interest in relation to the elected officials. We will also analyze the ambiguous and contradictory interpretations that the Romanian legislation has to offer on the issue.

Keywords: conflict of interests, elected officials, local council, personal interests, patrimonial interests.

1. Introduction

This study aims a short analysis of the concept of conflict of interest in what concerns local elected officials. We will take into account the types of conflicts and the expression of the interest, according to its personal or patrimonial nature.

Furthermore, we will refer including to the relevant case law of the courts, in order to show the ways in which one can interpret the law applicable to the concept of conflict of interest.

The legislation applicable to local elected officials who find themselves in the situation of a conflict of interest is the following: Law no. 215/2001[1] of the local public administration, Law no. 161/2003[2] and Law no. 393/2004[3].

The aforementioned normative acts were adopted in order to establish the general framework for corruption preventing and combating, by establishing special measures, of substantive and procedural law, both in terms of incompatibility and in terms of the concept of conflict of interest[4].

It is indisputable that persons who may be in conflict of interest or incompatibility situation will have either to avoid such a situation or to undergo legal sanctions[5]. Public interest shall always prevail, therefore private interest of a person shall suffer a „censorship" at least psychologically and morally.

The purpose is to ensure the exercise of public functions and publicly appointed offices by using impartiality, integrity and transparency, while observing the primacy of public interest[6].

Therefore, the lawmaker sought the protection of social relationships in what concerns the good performance of the activities of local elected officials, activity which requires a fair and transparent conduct.

Notwithstanding, we cannot accept broader interpretations of the legislation even in situations where the existence of personal and/or patrimonial interest cannot be proved, in the end, the targeted person undergoing the penalties provided by the law.

2.1. The concept of conflict of interest.

Unlike the state of incompatibility, which is more clearly defined and explained by the lawmaker, the conflict of interest requires a special attention from the National Integrity Agency, and especially from the courts of law.

Therefore, according to the legislation in force[7], the conflict of interest represents the situation where the person exercising a publicly appointed office or a public function has a personal interest of patrimonial nature, which could influence the objective fulfillment of the duties incumbent on him/her, according to the Constitution and to other normative acts.

Furthermore, Recommendation 10/2000[8] of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe includes a similar definition of the conflict of interest

Furthermore, several disciplinary sanctions for councilors were introduced by Law no. 393/2004, such as warning, removal from the meeting, temporary exclusion from the works of the council and of the specialized commission, as well as the withdrawal of the meeting allowance for a term between 1-2 months.

[6] These are the principles underlying the prevention of conflict of interest, according to art. 71 of Law no. 161/2003.

in what concerns public officials: Conflict of interest arises from a situation in which the public official has a private interest which is such as to influence or appear to influence the impartial and objective nature of his or her official duties[9].

This notion was required to be included in the legislation, in order to sanction private interests, which is usually contrary to the public interest. Private interest varies, so that it can include a benefit for himself/herself, family, close relatives, friends, persons or organizations with whom he or she has business or political relations. In what concerns personal interest, this one can refer to any obligations against the aforementioned persons.

Therefore, following the assessment of art. 70 of Law no. 161/2003, two conditions have to be fulfilled in order to have a conflict of interest:

1. the participation in the making of a decision
2. the existence of a personal interest or a patrimonial interest[10].

We believe that these conditions should be met cumulatively, so that the mere participation in the adoption of a resolution does not lead to the sanction provided by the law, if personal and/or patrimonial interest did not exist, was not expressed and could not be proved.

2.2. Types of conflict of interest.

The legislation in force does not provide a classification of the conflicts of interest, but they can be of different types, namely: potential, actual and real, according to the National Integrity Agency[11].

Therefore, if a local official has interests likely to cause a conflict of interest, if a public decision would have to be made, it could be deemed as a potential conflict of interest.

The actual conflict of interest can occur if the local official finds himself in the situation to make a decision that would create advantages either for himself or for another person, regardless if we talk about a business partner or a close person of the official.

The third type of conflict of interest is the real one, highlighted by the situation where the local official participate in the making of a decision on which he/she has a personal interest, thus violating the legal provisions.

Similarly, even if concerning public officials and not local elected officials, Recommendation no. 10/2000 of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe provides a similar classification in what concerns the concept of conflict of interest. Therefore, art. 8 reveals these types of conflicts as being actual, potential or apparent.

We believe that the category of persons for which the conflict of interest is regulated is not relevant, due to the fact, from the conceptual point of view, this notion has the same defining features, regardless of where it is expressed, either in local public administration, or at central level.

For example, although the provisions of art. 87 – 91 of Law no. 161/2003 take into account the incompatibilities on local elected officials, since they fall in the section on incompatibilities, these provisions are also applicable in case of public functions[12].

Notwithstanding, we believe that the differences between the modalities of expression of the conflict of interest should be based only on the social danger level, depending on the position conferred to the concerned person. It is obviously more serious the existence of a conflict of interest at the level of a minister or parliamentary, than at the level of a local councilor or mayor.

Therefore, in the assessment of the de facto situation and the reality of the existence or inexistence of an expression of the conflict of interest, the elements of mitigating circumstances shall not be omitted, so that an improper application of the legislation in the field is not reached.

Given the aforementioned classifications, we believed that they should be developed and assessed by the lawmaker, and included in the legislation de lege ferenda, in order to avoid abuses. On the contrary, an uneven and inconsistent interpretation of the purpose of the law can be reached, both from the National Integrity Agency[13], and from the courts of law called to rule on the lawfulness of the assessment reports of NIA, due to the fact they have so great discretion that it can become subjective.

2.2. Personal interest and patrimonial interest, related to the relevant case law.

After reading the legal incident texts, it can be noted that there is a mismatch, two notions being included in the relevant legislation, namely: patrimonial interest, respectively personal interest.

In this respect, on the one hand, Law no. 215/2001 of the local public administration uses the term of „patrimonial interest", while, on the other hand, Law no. 161/2003 uses the expression of „personal interest of patrimonial nature". Furthermore, Law no. 393/2004 uses the term „personal interest".

[9] According to art. 13 of Recommendation no. 10/2000.

[10] The legislation provides a variant at least interpretable, by cumulating two notions, namely, personal interest, respectively patrimonial interest, the following expression resulting: „personal interest of patrimonial nature". We believe that the two types of interest should be treated separately, because there is no reason to require such an overlap.

The document is available in pdf. format on the following internet address: https://www.integritate.eu/Files/Files/Ghiduri%20utile%20alegeri%202016/GhidIncompatibilitatile &Conflicte%2010.10.2016.pdf, site accessed on March 1st, 2017.

[13] Hereinafter referred to as „NIA".

Therefore, we want to show that the lawmaker is not constant in defining, respectively in using these notions. Therefore, they end to be capable of various interpretations.

Therefore, if we were to place related laws in chronological order, the first regulation of this kind was Law no. 215/2001, the concept of "patrimonial interest" being found for the first time in its content.

Notwithstanding, although the concept of patrimonial interest was initially used, about 2 years later a second regulation emerges, the latter enshrining the concept of „personal interest of patrimonial nature", namely Law no. 161/2003.

Subsequently, the notion is restricted again to the formulation of personal interest in Law no. 393/2004, the lawmaker giving up the notion of „personal interest of patrimonial nature".

In what concerns the local elected officials, they have a personal interest in a certain matter, if they have the possibility to anticipate that a decision of the public authority they are part of could represent a benefit or an advantage for themselves or for other categories of persons, according to the law[14].

As it can be noted, due to the fact they have to anticipate and not to effectively participate in the making of a decision, the legislation is rather related to a potential conflict of interest.

Notwithstanding, this interpretation modality can also be used against persons to whom the existence of a personal / patrimonial interest cannot be proved, for the mere reason that a potential benefit / advantage could have been anticipated by them.

Furthermore, the case law showed that, in certain situations, the simple presence of a local elected official is sufficient in order for the court to consider that the person in question finds himself/herself in a conflict of interest, even if there is no personal and/or patrimonial interest proved by ANI.

It is true that the incidence of the conflict of interest is obvious, therefore there is no other way to interpret correctly the legislation and the de facto situation.

For example, the High Court of Cassation and Justice[15] showed that, in what concerns the provisions of art. 70 of Law no. 161/2003 and of art. 75 of Law no. 393/2004, the appellant, in the capacity of local councilor, found himself in a conflict of interest, provided that he participated in the approval of certain decisions of the local council whereby the lease, by public tender, of certain assets belonging to public and private domain of the city by a company in which he is shareholder, was decided.

The High Court of Cassation and Justice noted that, in this case, the party had a personal interest of patrimonial nature which could have influenced the objective fulfillment of the duties incumbent on him as local councilor, the claims of the plaintiff having no legal relevance, namely that the specialized department within the city hall established the rent for the disputed space and that a public tender was organized for the award of the use of this commercial space[16].

Furthermore, HCCJ also develops the concept of conflict of interest in relation to patrimonial interest. Therefore, the case law[17] of the Supreme Court notes that there have to be reasons that can be taken into account when establishing not only the existence, but also the possibility to influence the decisions of a person.

Art. 72 of Law no. 161/2003, provides that „the person exercising the function of member of the Government, secretary of state, deputy secretary of state or functions assimilated to them, shall be bound not to participate in the making of a decision in the exercise of the authority public function which cause a material benefit for himself/herself, for his/her spouse or first degree relatives".

Following the corroboration of the aforementioned provision with art. 70 of the same normative act, in order to have a conflict of interest, the condition on „personal interest of patrimonial nature" or „material benefit" for himself/herself, for his/her spouse or first degree relatives has to be fulfilled. This interpretation is the vision of the HCCJ, substantiated by Decision no. 5036 of April 18th, 2013.

Notwithstanding, the legislation grants the courts of law the possibility to appreciate that there is a conflict of interest if the targeted person physically takes part in the meetings where certain decisions/resolutions are adopted.

Although it could be argued that by means of the mere presence, even if the person abstained from voting, the person could influence the decision of the other members of the collegial body, it is required to make a distinction.

Therefore, there are cases where the existence of a personal or patrimonial interest or of other benefits which could result following the adoption of a resolution cannot be proved.

Therefore, we believe that we cannot equate such a circumstance (physical participation followed by voting abstention) and the situation where the existence

[14] See the list of art. 75 of Law no. 393/2004: „a) husband, wife, relatives or up to second degree relatives including; b) any natural person or legal entity they have engagement relation with, regardless of the nature; c) a trading company where they have the capacity of sole shareholder, director or they derive income from; d) another authority they belong to; e) any natural person or legal entity, other than the authority they belong to, which performed a payment to them or which incurred any expenses of them; f) an association or foundation they are members of".

[15] Hereinafter referred to as „HCCJ".

[16] Decision no. 451 of January 31st, 2014 pronounced in second appeal by the Division of contentious administrative and fiscal of the High Court of Cassation and Justice.

[17] Decision no. 5036 of April 18th, 2013 pronounced in second appeal by the Division of contentious administrative and fiscal of the High Court of Cassation and Justice.

of a conflict of interest is clear, the benefits being obvious.

Therefore, on the one hand, we take into account aforementioned decision no. 451/2014 of the HCCJ, where the allegations of NIA and the deductions of the courts are fully justified. On the other hand, Civil sentence no. 152/F of June 26th, 2014 pronounced by the Court of Appeal of Galați shows different interpretation of the conflict of interest in what concerns local elected officials.

In the aforementioned case, the existence of a conflict of interest of a local councilor could not be proved by reliable and credible evidence, as regulated by art. 70 – 71 and art. 77 of Law no. 161/2003.

Furthermore, there are no elements which fall under the scope of the legal definition of the conflict of interest, which refers to a personal interest of material nature or personal material benefit.

Notwithstanding, the court did not take into account the de facto actual situation or the personal circumstances of the case, noting the applicability of art. 75 letter f) of Law no. 393/2004: „Local elected officials have a personal interest in a certain matter, if they have the possibility to anticipate that a decision of the public authority they belong to could represent a benefit or an advantage for themselves or for: (...) lit. f) – an association or foundation they are members of".

In what concern the incident legal text, we would like to show the following:

We cannot equate the capacity of representative of the Local Council in a non-profit foundation, and a situation where a local elected official is a shareholder in a company, by benefiting directly or indirectly, by representatives, from the decisions he took part in.

The court of merits noted the participation of the local councilor in the meetings of the Local Council where two decisions on the increase of public contribution to the foundation budget were discussed and approved unanimously.

Notwithstanding, one of the founding members of the foundation is the Local Council, the function of vice-president being honorary, without any impact on the actual activity of the foundation. If he had been a member on own behalf and not by means of the capacity of local councilor, we would have accepted the thesis on the existence of the conflict of interest.

We hereby mention that, according to art. 75 of Law no. 393/2004, the conflict of interest exists if the local councilor votes in favor / against a foundation he is a member of in own behalf and not in the capacity of the representative of an entity, such as the Local Council.

A plurality of capacities results from the recitals of the resolution, namely the one of local councilor, respectively the one of vice-president of the foundation. However, this capacity is held under the office of local councilor and ends with the completion of the term of office.

The scope of the respective foundation is to support young talented, special skills people, inclined towards one of the following areas: education, culture, arts and sports.

Furthermore, art. 35 of the foundation by-laws provides the following: „The capacity of representative within the Foundation is lost with the de jure termination of the elected official's term of office".

It is interesting that the conflict of interest was not noted in connection with a potential capacity of member of the foundation, but only in relation to the function of vice-president, a function held in the capacity of representative of the Local Council[18], as a founding member[19] within the respective foundation.

This assumption does not meet the legal requirements, as the noted conflict of interest concerns the plurality between the function of local councilor and vice-president of the foundation, in which respect the local councilor would have participated in the adoption of certain decisions.

As we have already mentioned, the finding of the participation in the adoption of a decision is not sufficient, as long as the expression of personal and/or patrimonial interest is not proved, all the more so as the existence of any type of interest had not be proved in any way.

In case of incompatibilities, the existence of a plurality of capacity is sufficient. Therefore, an important aspect in what concerns the statute of councilor is the concept of incompatibility itself[20]. In this regard, the legislation21 is certainly clearer compared to the regulation of the conflict of interest.

Incompatibilities affect the principle of transparency and integrity of public authorities and institutions, there being a high risk that decision-making powers are exercised under non-impartiality, bias, under the violation of equal and non-discriminatory treatment principle. They represent obvious, serious situations, which cannot be said in case of conflict of interest.

[18] See Anton Trăilescu, "Drept administrativ", edition 4, C.H. Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, p. 42: "Local councils are deliberative authorities of public administration through which local autonomy is achieved, having the role of managing public affairs in communes and cities, under the terms of the law". We believe that the appointment of a representative within a philanthropic foundation fits to the idea of managing "public affairs", aiming to develop and help talented people from the respective commune and not to raise a conflict of interest.

[19] See Ioan Alexandru, "Drept administrativ", Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 2005, p. 253: "The Local Council has the initiative and decides in all matters of local interest", unless otherwise provided by law. Besides that the foundation has a philanthropic nature, it does not perform economic activities, the Local Council is one of the founding members, therefore it is natural to have decision power on the allocated budget. The fact that one of the councilors is the representative of the Local Council in the respective foundation, in our opinion, cannot fall under the scope of the concept of conflict of interest, regardless we speak about potential, actual or real conflict of interest.

[20] See Verginia Vedinaș, op. cit., p. 477.

[21] Section IV, Chapter III, Title IV, Book I of Law no. 161/2003.

If in case of incompatibilities the mere plurality of capacities is sufficient to apply legal penalties, conflict of interest requires special attention, meaning that the existence and expression of personal and/or patrimonial interest are required to be proved, by noting the elements of mitigating circumstances of a situation which corresponds to reality.

Given the aforementioned, we consider that there are no preconditions likely to threaten social values in the case where it was noted that a local council would have been in conflict, due to the fact it held the function of vice-president of a foundation, in the capacity of representative of the Local Council, the latter being one of the founding members of the respective foundation.

Another matter which will have to be subject to a short analysis is the penalty provided by the law for the ascertainment of the conflict of interest in what concerns the person in question. Art. 25¹ of Law no. 176/2010[22] provides that the person who was found in conflict of interest or incompatibility shall be deprived of the right to perform a public function or a publicly appointed office which is subject to the provisions of this law, except the electoral ones, for a term of 3 years as of the removal from the respective function or publicly appointed office or as of the de jure termination of the term of office.

There were different opinions and interpretations in what concerns this sanction, leading ultimately to their „cutting" by means of Decision no. 418 of July 3rd, 2014[23], pronounced by the Constitutional Court of Romania[24].

Phrase „same function" of art. 25 para. (2) thesis II of Law no. 176/2010 raised totally different interpretations. Therefore, on the one hand, it could be considered that the phrase concerned only the function on which the conflict of interest was ascertained, respectively the state of incompatibility. On the other hand, according to another opinion, if things had been so, the respective sanction would have been meaningless. Therefore, the limitation of the exercise of the right to be elected, both in case of the conflict of interest, and especially in case of incompatibilities, would consider all electable functions[25].

The reasoning of CCR consist in the following: „in the interpretation according to which a person on whom the state of incompatibility or conflict of interest was found can held another electable function than the one which generated the state of incompatibility or conflict of interest, the legal text is obviously contrary to the meaning contemplated by the lawmaker, who, by means of Law no. 176/2010, aimed to ensure the integrity and transparency in the exercise of all functions and publicly appointed offices and the scope of whom is to sanction the person in question by establishing the prohibition to hold any other electable functions[26]".

Notwithstanding, we consider that the interpretation according to which by means of phrase „same function", the lawmaker would have considered any electable function is contrary to the will of the lawmaker. Therefore, not only that the right of a person to be elected is unduly restricted, but it is added to the law.

In conclusion, these provisions should not have benefited from an extensive interpretation, therefore, we consider that a genuine constitutional control was not performed[27].

3. Conclusions

Although a conflict of interest does not mean ipso facto corruption, there is an increasingly acknowledgment of the fact that the occurrence of certain conflicts between personal interests and public obligations can lead to corruption[28].

Notwithstanding, given all the aforementioned, one of the most important consequences of the conflict of interest acknowledgment is the sanction itself, namely the limitation of the exercise of the right to be elected for three-year term.

Given the severity of the restriction for the violation of the conflict of interest regime, we consider that the applicable legislation consists in the interpretation of the facts.

Therefore, there are several approach possibilities. On the one hand, the theory on the existence of personal and / or patrimonial interest can be applied, in order to establish whether a person was in a conflict of interests. Therefore, it might be possible to resort to the analysis of the case subject to judgment by means of the existence of actual premises which effectively threaten the defended social values.

On the other side, the lawmaker could provide a clarification or development of the criteria based on which the persons in question are punished, in order not

Therefore, as an intermediate way, both the courts of law and the National Integrity Agency shall refrain from the unduly extension of legal text interpretation.

It would neither be appropriate to apply them mechanically, therefore it is required that the actual circumstances of the case subject to judgment are taken into account.

In this way, the pronunciation of contrary rulings, which do not take into account the actual facts of the case, the elements of mitigating circumstances, thus causing damage to the persons in question by means of the prohibition to exercise a public function or a publicly appointed office for three-year term, will be avoided.

HEALTH CLAIMS` NOTION IN THE CASE LAW OF THE EUROPEAN COURT OF JUSTICE

Alina Mihaela CONEA*

Abstract

Although an area traditionally reserved to the Member States, health policy is increasingly influenced by European Union regulatory framework and by the Court of Justice of European Union case law. This article surveys the Court of Justice of European Union jurisprudence that clarifies the health claims concept, in the light of the interactions with fundamental rights, public health and consumer protection.

Keywords: health claims, Court of Justice of European Union, consumer protection, health policy, food law.

1. Introduction

Health policy is traditionally an area with no or very little EU involvement. It is an area where the national interests prevails, and where member states have been reluctant to transfer competences to EU. Increasingly, however, member states 'health policy are influenced by EU, especially when the policy is linked to the single market[1].

The concept of "health claims" is one area where we can spot the interaction between the consumer interests, public health, free movement of goods and the interest of food and pharmaceutical business sector. This article surveys the Court of Justice of European Union jurisprudence that clarifies the health claims concept, in the light of this interactions.

Certain studies suggest that a multidisciplinary approach need to be carried out, using insights from food technological and medical, economic, legal and managerial sciences. The main finding is that the costs and uncertainties attached to health claims are important factors impacting the innovation efforts of companies, the willingness-to-pay of consumers and the effectiveness of public policy[2].

Besides, the field of European Union competences is closely related to the concept of supra-nationality[3].

Moreover, some analyses asserts that European legislation on foods and medicine has failed to keep pace with the developments in nutrition and medical science that now recognise many important contributions that diet and individual foods may make to the promotion and maintenance of health. EU food law prevents the communication of these benefits to consumers, whilst the law on medicinal products is established on a very broad basis that also encompasses foods making preventive, therapeutic or curative claims[4].

The opportunities for product innovation arising from this new legislation combined with protection of consumer interest in respect of controlling misleading advertising, while at the same time promoting public health, are noteworthy. Whether this legislation is driving product innovation and the development of health and nutritional food or whether it is a barrier to such developments is an area in need of investigation[5].

The present paper will place the concept of health claims in the framework of European Union (EU) legislation (Capitol 2) and then will survey the Court of Justice of European Union jurisprudence that attempts to clarify the issue (Capitol 3).

2. Regulatory framework

Rules for nutrition and health claims made on foods across the European Union are harmonized by the Regulation No1924/2006 ("The Regulation") of the European Parliament and of the Council of 20 December 2006. According to the Regulation, the Commission can authorises different health claims provided they are based on scientific evidence[6]. The European Food Safety Authority (EFSA) is responsible for evaluating the scientific evidence supporting health claims.

[6] Commission Regulation (EU) No 432/2012 established the list of permitted health claims, which is regularly updated.

The Regulation No1924/2006 is part of an extensive legal framework governing food[7], such as labelling, presentation and advertising of foodstuffs [8], food supplements[9], the addition of vitamins and minerals and of certain other substances to foods[10], foods intended for use in energy-restricted diets for weight reduction[11], exploitation and marketing of natural mineral waters[12], drinking water[13] or foodstuffs intended for particular nutritional uses[14].

Art. 2(5) of the Regulation provides the following definition for health claims: "any claim that states, suggests or implies that a relationship exists between a food category, a food or one of its constituents and health".

The Regulation distinguishes between three types of health claims which has to follow different procedures for authorization.

First, the Article 13 claims ('Function Health Claims') [15] are health claims describing or referring to: the growth, development and functions of the body; psychological and behavioral functions and slimming or weight-control[16].

Second, Article 14(1)(a) claims ('Risk Reduction Claims') [17] are health claims on reducing a risk factor in the development of a disease. The 'reduction of disease risk claim', definition provided by art.2(6) of the Regulation, means any health claim that states, suggests or implies that the consumption of a food category, a food or one of its constituents significantly reduces a risk factor in the development of a human disease.

The last one are the claims provided in Article 14(1)(b) (Health 'Claims referring to children's development')[18].

3. Case law

The Court of Justice of European Union case law considering health claims concept is approached pointing on the impact on fundamental rights, consumer protection and the definition of health claims.

3.1. Fundamental rights

In the case Deutsches Weintor[19], the reference to the Court has been made in proceedings between Deutsches Weintor, a German winegrowers' cooperative, and the department responsible for supervising the marketing of alcoholic beverages in the Land of Rhineland-Palatinate concerning the description of a wine as 'easily digestible' ('bekömmlich'), indicating reduced acidity levels. The German authority objected to the use of the description 'easily digestible' on the ground that it is a 'health claim', which, pursuant to the regulation 1924/2006, is not permitted for alcoholic beverages.

The court was asked to interpret whether the prohibition from using a health claim for alcoholic beverages, is compatible with Article 15(1) of the Charter, according to which everyone has the right to engage in work and to pursue a freely chosen or accepted occupation, and to Article 16 of the Charter, which guarantees the freedom to conduct a business.

In this regard, the court pointed out that a high level of human health protection has to be ensured in the definition and implementation of all the European Union's policies and activities, according to Article 35 of the Charter. It also underlies that health protection is among the principal aims of regulation 1924/2006, as this is present in recitals 1 and 18 in the preamble.

It follows that, the Court needed to reconcile the requirements of the protection of those various fundamental rights protected by the Union legal order, and striking a fair balance between them[20].

Accordingly, the Court determines, first, that the total prohibition of a health claim of the kind at issue is regarded as being necessary to ensure compliance with the requirements of human health protection provided in the Charter.

Secondly, as regards the freedom to choose an occupation and the freedom to conduct a business the courts indicates its case-law, underling the possibility to restrict the exercise of those freedoms, if those restrictions correspond to objectives of general interest pursued by the European Union and do not constitute, with regard to the aim pursued, a disproportionate and intolerable interference, impairing the very substance of those rights[21]. The courts affirms that the prohibition at issue does not in any way affect the actual substance of the freedom to choose an occupation or of the freedom to conduct a business[22].

In Neptune Distribution[23], the national court is asking essentially whether EU law must be interpreted as meaning that it precludes packaging, labels or advertising for natural mineral waters from containing claims or indications leading consumers to believe that the waters concerned are low or very low in sodium or salt[24]. Neptune Distribution sells and distributes the natural sparkling mineral waters denominated 'Saint-Yorre' and 'Vichy Célestins'. French authorities asked Neptune to remove any statement leading the consumer to believe that the waters in question are low or very low in salt or in sodium.

The court examines whether the need to ensure that the consumer has the most accurate and transparent information possible concerning the characteristics of goods is closely related to the protection of human health. The court concludes that protection of human health is a question of general interest which may justify limitations on the freedom of expression and information of a person carrying on a business or his freedom to conduct a business[25].

3.2. Consumer protection

Consumer protection was the main question in the case Verband Sozialer Wettbewerb[26], which concerned health claims communication addressed exclusively to health professionals. In this case, Innova Vital marketed a nutritional supplement in Germany known as 'Innova Mulsin® Vitamin D3' which is administered in the form of drops. Innova Vital sent exclusively to named doctors a written document presenting the nutritional supplement.

The request has been made in proceedings between the Verband Sozialer Wettbewerb eV, a German association safeguarding competition, and Innova Vital GmbH concerning the applicability of Regulation No 1924/2006 to nutrition or health claims made in a written document addressed exclusively to health professionals.

The Court ruled for the first time that the Regulation applies to nutrition and health claims made in commercial communications exclusively addressed to health professionals. This was interpreted as a major breakthrough as food business operators will need to take further precautionary steps to ensure that any information they communicate to health professionals either qualifies as non-commercial or complies with the Regulation[27].

Thus, the Court first analyzed the concept of a 'commercial communication' as the regulation does not contain a definition. For this purpose, the court used definitions present in other areas of EU law, used as a guide in order to ensure consistency of EU law[28]. The court conclude that the concept of a 'commercial communication' within the meaning of Article 1(2) of Regulation No 1924/2006, must be understood as covering, inter alia, a communication made in the form of advertising foods, designed to promote, directly or indirectly, those foods[29]. Such a communication may also take the form of an advertising document which food business operators address to health professionals[30]. In addition, the court affirmed that the regulation makes no distinction according to whether that addressee is a final consumer or a health professional[31].

Another reason was that health professionals risk forwarding, in all good faith, incorrect information on foods which are the subject of a commercial communication to final consumers[32].

Consequently, the application of that regulation to the nutrition or health claims made in a commercial communication addressed to professionals contributes to a high level of consumer protection, in the context of the internal market[33].

Some authors question whether it is possible to communicate scientific information without falling foul of Regulation No 1924/2006? Although the judgment in question allows economic operators to communicate objective information about new scientific advances to health professionals if such communications are of a non-commercial nature, it does not offer any criteria for use in defining the meaning of "objective information", or in which cases industry communications to health professionals are of a "commercial nature"[34].

Thus, the EU regulation is regarded as focusing relatively strongly on precaution and consumer understanding. The extent to which this hampers food innovations is in dispute[35].

In the case Herbaria Kräuterparadies[36], the relevant question was whether the EU law required minerals and vitamins to be added to foodstuffs labelled as having a specific nutritional and health function.

Herbaria manufactures 'Herbaria Blutquick — Eisen + Vitamine', a fruit juice mixture with herbal extracts which contains, in addition to plant ingredients of organic agricultural origin, non-organic vitamins and ferrous gluconate. Blutquick is advertised and marketed as a food supplement containing iron and vitamins, and its label bears a reference to organic production, together with the claim: 'Iron supports the normal formation of red blood cells and haemoglobin'.

The competent Bavarian authorities ordered Herbaria to remove the reference to organic farming in the labelling, advertising and marketing of Blutquick[37]. Herbaria took the view that Regulation No 1924/2006, required minerals and vitamins to be added to foodstuffs labelled as having a specific nutritional function. The stated purpose of a food supplement was the basis for the legal obligation to achieve the corresponding minimum values and that if those values could be achieved only by addition of substances, the addition was legally required[38].

However, the Court decide that it is for economic operators to determine the composition of their products and to decide how they want to portray them for marketing purposes. If they wish to market those products as a food supplement coming under Directive 2002/46, with nutrition or health claims as covered by Regulations 1924/2006 and 432/2012, or as a foodstuff intended for a particular nutritional use coming within the scope of Directive 2009/39 and Regulation No 953/2009, they must fulfil the relevant obligations laid down by the applicable EU rules. EU law does not guarantee that an economic operator will be allowed to market its products using any terms it finds to be most advantageous for promoting them[39].

In the light of the fact that the marketing of a foodstuff as a food supplement with nutrition or health claims is optional the Court rejected Herbaria arguments.

3.3. Definition of health claims

The definition of health claims was examined in cases Deutsches Weintor[40], Green-Swan Pharmaceuticals[41]and Nelsons v. Ayonnax Nutripharm, Bachblütentreff[42].

It is worth noting that the court sets as the starting-point for the definition of a 'health claim' within the meaning of that regulation the relationship that must exist between a food or one of its constituents and health.

On the one hand, that definition provides no information as to whether that relationship must be direct or indirect, or as to its intensity or duration. In those circumstances, the court understand the term 'relationship' in a broad sense[43]. On the other hand, the concept of a 'health claim' must cover not only a relationship implying an improvement in health as a result of the consumption of a food, but also any relationship which implies the absence or reduction of effects that are adverse or harmful to health and which would otherwise accompany or follow such consumption, and, therefore, the mere preservation of a good state of health despite that potentially harmful consumption[44].

Accordingly, the concept of a 'health claim' is deemed to refer not only to the effects of the consumption – in a specific instance – of a precise quantity of a food which is likely, normally, to have only temporary or fleeting effects, but also to those of the repeated, regular, even frequent consumption of such a food, the effects of which are, by contrast, not necessarily only temporary and fleeting[45].

In case Green-Swan Pharmaceuticals, the court considered that a 'health claim' within the meaning of Article 2(2)(5) of Regulation No 1924/2006 on nutrition and health claims made on foods is the relationship that must exist between a food or one of its constituents and health; that definition provides no information as to whether that relationship must be direct or indirect, or as to its intensity or duration, so that the term 'relationship' must be understood in a broad sense.

In that context, in order to be considered a 'reduction of disease risk claim', a health claim need not necessarily expressly state that the consumption of a category of food, a food or one of its constituents 'significantly' reduces a risk factor in the development of a human disease[46].

4. Concluding remarks

It is evident form the Court case law, that in striking a fair balance between various fundamental rights protected by the Union legal order, it favors both health and consumer protection. As regards the freedom to choose an occupation and the freedom to conduct a business the court reveals the possibility to restrict the exercise of those freedoms, if those restrictions correspond to objectives of general interest pursued by the European Union and do not constitute, with regard to the aim pursued, a disproportionate and intolerable interference, impairing the very substance of those rights.

Moreover, the court concludes that protection of human health is a question of general interest which may justify limitations on the freedom of expression and information of a person carrying on a business or his freedom to conduct a business

In one interesting decision, the court affirmed that the regulation makes no distinction according to whether that addressee is a final consumer or a health professional. Accordingly the EU regulation is regarded as focusing relatively strongly on precaution and consumer understanding.

It is worth noting that the definition of a 'health claim' within the meaning of that regulation is the relationship that must exist between a food or one of its constituents and health. The definition provides no information as to whether that relationship must be direct or indirect, or as to its intensity or duration In those circumstances, the court understand the term 'relationship' in a broad sense.

The literature affirms that the application of EU law to areas traditionally reserved to the Member States may produce a spillover effect[47] Member states have carefully isolated health services and policy from the EU since its inception, granting only narrow responsibilities and weak tools relevant to marginal areas of policy. Yet, today, the EU is emerging as one of the formative influences in health policy. The result is systematic encroachments on health policy by the EU, driven by the Court and justified by internal market rules and decisions.[48]

The case law in the field of health claims can be consider a contribution to the analysing of the theories of European integration and the role the Court plays.

WHAT IS THE PRICE FOR BREAKING EU LAW?

Ioana-Mihaela DIMITRIU[*]

Abstract

Financial sanctions, as lump sum and penalty payments, can be imposed to Member States that failed to implement a judgement establishing an infringement. This mechanism was introduced by the Maastricht Treaty and further developed by the Lisbon Treaty. This paper is an analysis of Article 260 TFEU and examines the evolution of the mechanism, the principles for applying sanctions, the method of calculating sanctions, but also the limits of this procedure.

Keywords: infringement, financial sanctions, lump sum, penalty payments, EU law

1. Introduction

Implementation of European Union law is not by far perfect, a standard that is neither realistic, nor reasonable. Although one of the fundamental values of the European Union is the rule of law, it becomes difficult, if not impossible to establish the degree of conformity[1]. Over time a system was developed that could track the degree of conformity, especially through coercive measures initiated by the European Commission and through decisions of the European Court of Justice[2].

Thus, assuring the implementation of European Union Law requires passing through 3 distinct stages: the collection of data by the Commission, the initiation of an infringement action under article 258 TFEU and application of financial sanctions. The first stage of the process[3] is also the most effective, since over 90% of procedures initiated by the Commission ends at this stage. The second stage consists of an infringement action initiated by the Commission before the ECJ asking the Court to declare that a Member State failed to fulfil its obligations. Should the Court agree with the Commission, it will issue a declaratory judgement stating the breach. In the third stage, and only if the Member State does not comply with the Court's judgement, the Commission can initiate a follow-up action against the Member State demanding, on the basis of art. 260 (2) TFEU, that financial sanctions be imposed[4].

Of crucial importance for the functioning of the European Union is for Member States to fully comply with the ECJ decisions. Otherwise, legal security, citizens' rights, equal treatment between member states, as well as the balance between rights and obligations of member states become questionable.

2. Regulatory developments in the Treaties

The Rome Treaties provided in article 171 that member states failing to fulfil their obligations should take the necessary measures to comply with the Court decision. If the state failed to implement a judgment establishing an infringement there were no sanctions provided. There was, though, in this situation, the possibility to introduce a new infringement action, the pressure on the state being quite limited in this scenario[5]. The small number of infringement actions and the lack of a sanction made this procedure inapplicable and inefficient[6].

The Maastricht Treaty amended article 171, thus including a sanctioning mechanism for Member States that did not comply with a previous decision of the Court of Justice which declared, on the basis of article 169, the existence of an infringement. The possibility of imposing a financial sanction, as lump sum or penalty payment, on a Member State that did not comply with a decision was thus introduced. The purpose of such sanctions was not to compensate for damages caused by a Member State, but to put economic pressure to bring the infringement to an end, to bestow the infringement procedure with coercive force and to offer member states a strong incentive to enforce decisions of the European Court of Justice[7]. Unfortunately, the instrument of imposing financial

[3] The main purpose of the procedure is to force a Member States who breached a provision of EU law to comply. This pre-litigation stage is dedicated to the dialogue between the Commission and the Member State concerned on the possible infringement. A significant aspect of these mechanisms is to prevent excessive recourse to the judicial system.

[4] Financial sanctions can be imposed even from the second stage of the procedure, based on article 260 (3) TFEU, in cases concerning failure to notify measures to transpose directives.

sanctions was very rarely used because there were still very few cases brought before the Court,[8] as the Commission only asked for penalty payments, making publicly available just the method for calculating these penalties, but not those of lump sums[9].

Through the Amsterdam Treaty amendments were brought to TEU and TEC, as well as a renumbering of articles, article 171 became article 228, with no modification to the content of the article[10].

An important amendment to the new article 260 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (former article 228 of TEC) was brought by the Lisbon Treaty, which consolidated two aspects of the mechanism: (i) it eliminates the reasoned opinion (the Commission has to carry out only one pre-litigation procedural stage, namely the sending of a letter of formal notice requesting the Member State to submit its observations), the procedure thus being accelerated in practice[11]; (ii) a new paragraph (3) was added to article 260 which creates a new instrument for non-compliance with the obligation to notify measures transposing a directive adopted under a legislative procedure (when it deems appropriate, the Commission makes a proposal to the Court to impose a sanction, a lump sum or a penalty payment, in the same judgement that declares the infringement).

3. From the Commission proposal to the decision of the Court

Both the Commission and the Court acts in the common interest of the European Union, trying to determine the most appropriate sanction and its amount, taking into consideration the circumstances of the case.

The procedure provided by article 260 has a specificity – a hybrid between adversarial and investigation nature[12]. Firstly, the Commission has a discretionary competence to notify the Court[13], but also proposing a sanction,[14] the Commission takes part in the procedure before the Court, the arguments in the letter of formal notice (reasoned opinion provided by article 258) provide the circumstances of the purpose of the procedure, and also the burden of proof is attributed to the Commission. All these elements provide a adversarial nature to the procedure. Secondly, the Commission has an important role in evaluating data in the pre-litigation stage, its role not being limited to submit the infringement, but also having to argue the necessity of imposing financial sanctions based on the information collected.

The Commission's proposals on financial sanctions are not mandatory for the Court, but are a useful point of reference[15]. Neither the guidelines such as those contained in the Commission's communications cannot bind the Court, but contribute to ensuring that the action taken by that institution is transparent, foreseeable and consistent with legal certainty[16], when submit its proposal to the Court[17].

In the contentious stage, the Court has the main role, although more limited than that of the Commission, since it does not have the possibility to collect information. The Court also has the possibility of imposing a penalty or not, this being an exclusive prerogative[18], and the obligation to fix the appropriate financial sanction and its amount (appropriate to the circumstances and proportionate both to the breach that has been found and to the ability to pay of the Member State concerned), on the basis of its discretionary competence[19].

Analysing the provisions of article 260 (3) "If the Court finds that there is an infringement it may impose a lump sum or penalty payment on the Member State concerned not exceeding the amount specified by the Commission", compared with article 260 (2), this limitation refers not only to the amount of the sanction chosen by the Commission, but also to the type of sanction. In other words, if the Commission were to request the Court to oblige a Member State to pay a penalty payment, the Court can't impose a bigger amount nor to apply a lump sum[20].

The Commission also has the possibility to reduce the amount of the initial penalty, or to limit the extent of its application, or even withdraw the action, taking into consideration the progress made by the [8] Since the entry into force of the Treaty of Maastricht only 3 cases were brought before the Court on the basis of article 171: Case C-387/97, Commission v Greece.; C-278/01, Commission v Spain; C-304/02, Commission v France.

[10] Between 1997-2006 there were 22 cases ruled under article 228 TEC, of which more than 50% against France (7), Germany (4) and Luxembourg (3).

[11] The mechanism provided by article 260 (2) TFEU is structurally similar to the non-litigation procedure in two steps from article 258 (letter of formal notice and reasoned opinion).

Member State towards conforming with the initial decision (the case of partial compliance)[21].

4. The effects of Court's decisions

Should the Court find a violation in the context of a procedure based on article 258, the Court simply declares that the Member State failed to fulfil its obligations, and its decision does not have any effect over the contested national provision[22]. Also, the Court held that it has no jurisdiction to impose to a Member State to comply with its decision in a specified period of time. Although article 260 TFEU does not provide a timeframe for complying with the Court's decisions, according to the case law[23] the process of complying with an infringement ruling must be initiated at once and completed as soon as possible[24].

The decision issued on the basis of article 260 TFEU has two different functions: firstly, establishes a positive obligation to take the necessary measures to comply with the judgment of the Court and, secondly, enables a different mechanism of coercion, namely imposing financial sanctions.

The decisions of the European Court of Justice have res judicata status and in case of difficulty of interpreting the meaning and scope of a judgment, the Court has the jurisdiction to interpret its decision, upon request of one of the parties or of a EU institution which can justify interest[25].

5. Determining the sanction

5.1. Two types of sanctions

The two types of financial sanctions that can be imposed upon a Member State that has not complied with its obligations are payment penalty and lump sum.

If payment penalties have a persuasive role, having the potential to determine the Member State to end as soon as possible the violation, the lump sum sanction has a deterrent role, having the potential to affect the public and private interests by not abiding with the initial decision, for the effective prevention of future violations of EU law, similar to the one in question[26].

Determining the sanction in the case of state who do not enforce decisions of the European Court of Justice need to rely on the purpose of applying the measure, specifically ensuring the application of EU law. Thus, if the lump sum reflects the Member State's failure to comply with previous decisions (especially if there was a prolonged delay), penalty payments sanctions act as an incentive for the Member State to end the violation as soon as possible[27].

Determining the sanction is important for two reasons: on one hand, which of the sanctions will be applied or if they will be applied cumulatively and, on the other hand, the amount of the sanction.

5.2. The criteria for determining the sanctions

The three fundamental criteria, such as developed by the Commission since 1996, are: the seriousness of the infringement, its duration and the need to ensure that the penalty itself is a deterrent to further infringements. Commission subsequently added further criteria which have emerged from the development of jurisprudence: the necessity of a "clear and uniform method" (Commission must justify its calculation of the amount to the Court) and that respects both the principle of proportionality[28] and the principle of equal treatment among the Member States.

In applying those criteria, the Court must take into account the impact of the infringement on general and particular interests, and the urgency of getting the Member State to comply with its obligations[29]. Although the Court does not quantify individual coefficients when determining financial sanctions, it does admit that the method of calculation proposed by the Commission is helpful in rendering the calculation of penalties comprehensible[30].

The seriousness of the infringement. The premise is that an infringement concerning non-compliance with a judgment is always serious. When determining the coefficient of seriousness the Commission will also take account of two parameters closely linked to the basic infringement which gave rise to the judgment for non-compliance, namely: the importance of the EU rules breached[31] and the impact of the infringement on general and particular [24] The Commission must leave sufficient time, a longer or shorter period according to the case, for the Member State to complete the process of compliance (2005 European Commission Communication, para. 22). See also Case C-387/97, Commission v Greece, paras. 82 and 92.

[28] A sanction should be appropriate to the circumstances and proportionate both to the breach found and to the ability to pay of the Member State concerned (see Case C-387/97, Commission v Greece, para. 90 and Case C-278/01, Commission v Spain, para. 41).

interests[32]. The coefficient of seriousness is listed on a scale between a minimum of 1 and a maximum of 20[33].

The duration of the infringement. Given the specific purpose of each kind of sanction, the Court of Justice has confirmed that the duration of the infringement must be taken into account both for the penalty payment and for the lump sum payment[34].

Regarding the duration, for the purpose of determining the sanction but also for calculating the amount we should take into consideration several parameters: the coefficient of duration, the number of days the infringement persists, date of entry into force of the payment obligation and the date the obligation to pay comes to an end.

- The coefficient for duration used in calculating the amount of the penalty payment

For article 260 (2) the period taken into account is the duration of the infringement from the date of the first Court judgment up to the date the Commission decides to refer the matter to the Court[35].

For article 260 (3) the period taken into account is the duration starting from the day following the expiry of the deadline for transposition in the directive in question up to the date the Commission decides to refer the matter to the Court[36].

This period will be taken into account by applying a multiplier (minimum 1 and maximum 3) to the basic lump sum[37]. However, the Court held in its case-law that the duration of the infringement must be assessed taking into account when it considers the facts and not the date the Commission decides to refer the matter to the Court,[38] its discretion not being limited by the scale of 1 to 3.

- The number of days the infringement persists used in calculating the lump sum

For article 260 (2) is calculated between the date of delivery of the judgment under article 258 and the date the infringement comes to an end, or, failing compliance, the date of delivery of the judgment under article 260 (2) TFEU.

For article 260 (3) is calculated between the day after the time limit for transposition set out in the directive expires and the date the infringement comes to an end, or, failing compliance, the date of delivery of the judgment under article 258 and article 260 (3) TFEU.

The deterrent effect. The sanction must be sufficiently high to ensure that: (i) the Member State decides to rectify its position and bring the infringement to an end (it must therefore be higher than the benefit that the Member State gains from the infringement); (ii) the Member State does not repeat the same offence[39].

The member state's ability to pay. In determining the amount of the sanction a "n" factor is taken into account defined as the geometric mean based, in part, on the gross domestic product (GDP) of the Member State in question and, in part, on the weighing of voting rights in the Council. In conclusion, since the country is bigger and economically stable, the "n" factor will be higher, so the ability to pay of each Member State[40].

5.3. Method of calculation

The method of calculation is the same for financial sanctions requested on the basis of article 260 (2), as well as for those requested on the basis of article 260 (3), taking into consideration that financial instruments are identical.

Moreover, the purpose of both types of sanctions is the same: to encourage a Member State to comply with an infringement judgment and, thus, to ensure the effective application of EU law – para. (2), and to strongly encourage Member States to transpose directives in the time period established by the legislative, thus ensuring the efficiency of the EU legislation – para (3). Also, the use by the Commission of an identical methodology is part of a coherent administration of the means that the Treaty put at its disposal, thus leading to more predictability for Member States.

The Commission will start calculating with a lower basic rate for the lump sum than for penalty payments.[41] In fact, it seems only fair that the daily amount of the penalty payment should be higher than the lump sum payment, since the behaviour of the Member State concerned is more reprehensible once the article 260 ruling has been delivered, since that involves a persistence of the infringement despite two consecutive judgments by the Court[42].

[32] The purpose of using this parameter is not to gain reparation for damages suffered by the victims of the infringement, but to consider the effects of an infringement from the point of view of the individuals or economic operators concerned (for example, the effects are not the same if infringement concerns a specific case or interests of an entire profession).

[40] The value of "n" factor is the same for calculating both sanctions.

[41] Basic flat-rate amount "lump sum payment" is corresponding to one third of the of basic flat-rate amount "penalty payment".

[42] The action brought by the Commission on December 4, 2014 against Portugal (OJ C 46, 9.2.2015).

Although in the majority of cases the Commission details and justifies the method of calculating the sanctions proposed, the Court is not required to submit details of its calculation. If for determining penalty payments there are several decisions where the Court nevertheless details its method of calculation, for establishing lump sums the Court seems to refuse to justify its decision in report to the method proposed by the Commission.

6. Periodic penalty payments

Definition. Periodic penalty payments are "the amount, calculated in principle by day of delay – without prejudice to any different reference period in specific cases – penalising non-compliance with a judgment of the Court, the penalty running from the day when the second judgment of the Court was served on the Member State concerned up to that on which the Member State brings the infringement to an end"[43].

Application. The imposition of a penalty payment is particularly suited to induce a Member State to put an end to an infringement which, in the absence of such a measure, tends to persist[44]. In other words, the imposition of a penalty payment is justified only if the Member State fails to comply with an earlier judgment of the Court at the date of the second ruling, given that full implementation is possible even on the day that the Courts delivers the article 260 judgement[45].

Penalty payments can be imposed on a daily[46], semester[47] or annual[48] basis. The amount of the penalty can be progressively reduced, depending on the evolution in the execution of the first judgment of the Court establishing the breach of obligations. Thus the periodic penalty payment has a degressive nature[49].

The first decision to impose the penalty payment. In 2000, the Court ruled for the first time that a Member State was required to pay periodic penalty payments. In the judgment of 4 July 2000, the Commission v Greece[50], Greece was called before the Court for failure to fulfil its obligations in the matter of waste collection centre in Crete and to ensure compliance with directives that regulate in this field.[51] Since it did not implement all the measures necessary to comply with the judgment of the Court of 7 April 1992, Greece was ordered to pay a penalty payment of EUR 20.000 per day of delay.

The method of calculating the daily penalty payment[52]. According to the Commission, fines should always be deterrent and never symbolic. The calculation of the amount of the daily penalty payment has two stages: 1. multiplication of a standard flat-rate amount[53] by a coefficient for seriousness and a coefficient for duration; 2. multiplication of the result obtained by an amount fixed by country (the "n" factor) taking into account the capacity of the Member State to pay and the number of votes it has in the Council.

Values. Daily penalty payments so far range from EUR 2.800 per day[54] to EUR 57.761.250 per semester[55].

7. Lump sum

Definition. The lump sum is a sanction "penalising the continuation of the infringement between the first judgment on non-compliance and the judgment delivered under article 260"[56].

Application. All the legal and factual elements surrounding the failure to fulfil obligations established constitute an indication that the effective prevention of future similar repeat infringements of EU law requires the adoption of a deterrent such as an order for payment of a lump sum[57].

The purpose of imposing a lump sum is to penalize the infringement for the period prior to the Court of Justice's decision under article 260 and thus to

[45] Case C-378/13, Commission v Greece, para. 47 read together with para. 51.

[46] The Court imposed in most cases penalty payments on a daily basis. For example, in case C-177/04, Commission v France, the Court opted for a periodic penalty imposed on a daily basis, given that enforcement involved the adoption of a legislative amendment.

[47] For example, in case C-378/13, Commission v Greece, the penalty payment was set on a semi-annual basis and was considered appropriate to enable the Commission to assess the Member State progress in enforcing the measures imposed.

[48] For example, in case C-278/01, Commission v Spain, paras. 45-46, the penalty payment was imposed annually following the Member States submission of the annual report on the implementation of the directive, and thus to avoid the situation when Member State could be forced to pay the fine for periods in which the infringement would actually have ceased.

[49] C-378/13, Commission v Greece, paras. 40, 60 and 61. In this case, the Court considered that reducing the penalty payment could only take place if Greece communicates to the Commission evidence which, beyond any doubt, proved to be in conformity.

[52] An example of calculation proposed by the Commission under article 260 (2) TFEU and the Court's reasoning can be found in Case C-109/08, Commission v Greece. Similarly, in case C-320/13 Commission v Poland, such a calculation was done under article 260 (3) TFEU, although the case was removed from the register of the Court because the Commission withdraw its action following the adoption by Poland of the necessary measures to comply with the first decision of the Court. So far, there is no case where the Court has used or interpreted the possibility of imposing financial sanctions from the first ruling of the Court. See, however, the Opinion of Advocate General Melchior Wathelet delivered on 11 December 2014 in case C-320/13, Commission v Poland.

[53] The standard flat-rate amount penalises the violation of principle of legality and the failure to comply with the judgments of the Court. On the method of determining this amount, see point 15 of the 2005 European Commission Communication.

strengthen the authority of the Court's judgments. The imposition of a lump sum is based more on assessment of the effects on public and private interests of the failure of the Member State concerned to comply with its obligations, in particular where the breach has persisted for a long period since the judgment which initially established it[58].

According to its initial view on this matter, the Commission's practice was systematically to ask for daily penalty payments and never for a lump sum to be imposed. The consequence was that Member States were often comply with the first ruling of the Court only at a late stage of the procedure, and sometimes only at the very end of the article 260 procedure, and so this late compliance not being sanctioned in any way. However, the Commission did not rule out the possibility of asking only for a lump sum to be imposed in certain situations[59], although there are no cases till today where the Commission only claimed for a lump sum payment pursuant to article 260 (2) or (3) TFEU.

There are cases where only a lump sum payment was imposed when the Member State's compliance with the first judgment was recorded in the course of the proceedings before the Court, even though the Commission asked for both a lump sum and a daily penalty payment. In assessing this progress, the Commission may consider that it is no longer necessary to impose a daily penalty payment and therefore withdraw that claim[60].

The first decision to impose this sanction. In 2005, the Court imposed this sanction in its judgment of 12 July 2005, Commission v France[61], where the cumulative penalty payment and lump sum payment was also imposed for the first time. According to the Court's decision, by fixing the amount of the lump sum, a fair assessment was made of the particular circumstances of the case. The French Republic was ordered to pay a lump sum of EUR 20.000.000.

The method of calculating the lump sum takes into account two values:[62] 1. minimum fixed lump sum;[63] 2. a daily amount multiplied by the number of days the infringement persists. This amount will apply when the result exceeds the minimum fixed lump sum. The condition for calculating such an amount is that at the time of its imposition (date of the judgment) this calculation is possible and the Court can decide on a fixed amount.

The method of calculating the daily amount that composes the lump sum is similar to setting the daily amount applicable for the daily penalty payment: multiplying a standard flat-rate amount by a coefficient for seriousness and then by the "n" factor, taking into account both the capacity of the Member State to pay and the number of votes it has in the Council.

A daily amount is determined first. Secondly, this daily amount is multiplied by the number of days the infringement persists in order to obtain the total amount of the lump sum. Therefore, it becomes necessary to compare, on the one hand, the cumulative total of the daily amount for determining the lump sum calculated until the Commission's decision (referral to the Court under article 260 TFEU) and, on the other hand, the minimum fixed lump sum established for the Member State concerned. Daily amount will be proposed by the Commission when the calculation result exceeds the minimum fixed lump sum.

Values. The largest lump sum imposed on a Member State as a result of the failure to comply with a judgment of the Court is EUR 40 million for Italy in Case C-196/13. In this case the Court ruled in over 20 waste cases where the Member State has failed to fulfil its obligations under European Union law. The infringement in question was characterized as of a general and persistent nature, the coefficient of gravity proposed by the Commission being 8 and, in terms of the duration of the infringement; it lasted for more than seven years, which is a considerable period.

The lowest lump sum is EUR 250.000 and it was imposed on the Czech Republic in case C-241/11, as a result of the non-enforcement of the judgment finding a breach of obligations following the partial transposition of Directive 2003/41/EC. The circumstances that led the Court to the imposition of a reduced amount were: (i) the Member State cooperated in good faith with the Commission; (ii) 19 months elapsed between the date of delivery of the first judgment and the date when the Czech Republic fully transposed Directive 2003/41 into domestic law and, consequently, brought its national legislation into conformity with that judgment; (iii) late compliance, by that Member State, with the first judgment had a limited effect on the internal market for occupational retirement provision and, therefore, on private and public interests.

8. The possibility to cumulate sanctions

The first decision to impose this sanction. The Court of Justice confirmed for the first time in its judgment of 12 July 2005, in Commission v France[64], [60] See Case C-184/11, Commission v Spain; Case C-241/11, Commission v Czech Republic; C-270/11, Commission v Sweden (the Commission stated that it had partially withdraw its claim with regard to daily penalties in the light of the transposition of Directive 2006/24 and the communication of the transposition measures in the course of the procedure before the Court, but retains its claim for the lump sum payment and the amount thereof).

[62] For an example of calculation proposed by the Commission under article 260 (2) TFEU see Case C-557/14, Commission v Portugal.

[63] This amount is set for each Member State according to the "n" factor. From 2010, these amounts are communicated annually by the Commission and are revised in line with inflation and GDP of each Member State.

the possibility of imposing cumulatively two kinds of financial sanction (penalty and lump sum) in cases where the infringement persisted for a considerable time and still tends to persist.

The judgment is of importance from two points of view: first, because it is the first decision where both types of sanctions were applied cumulatively and, second, because it demonstrates that the Commission's proposals are not binding the Court, the latter having full jurisdiction to impose the appropriate type of sanction and the amount thereof[65].

The Commission, Denmark, the Netherlands, Finland and the UK[66] supported the Court's arguments in favour of cumulative sanctions because of their common objective, of inducing a defaulting Member State to comply with a judgment establishing a breach of obligations and thereby of ensuring that EU law is in fact applied.[67] Both sanctions are complementary, in that each of them respectively seeks to achieve a deterrent effect.

Therewith, a combination of those measures should be regarded as one and the same means of achieving the objective laid down by article 260 TFEU, not only to induce the Member State concerned to comply with the initial judgment but also to reduce the possibility of similar infringements being committed again[68].

The active role of the Court in the application of sanctions. Although the Commission did not proposed a lump sum, the Court of Justice rejected the argument that it would need "political legitimacy" to impose financial sanctions unsolicited by the Commission and stated that the financial penalties imposed "must therefore be decided upon according to the degree of persuasion needed in order for the Member State in question to alter its conduct"[69].

From a procedural point of view, the principles of civil procedural law valid in all Member States, namely the principle of availability and the principle of the right to defence, have been invoked, according to which the courts cannot exceed the limits of the parties' claims. However, the Court has invoked the special nature of the article 260 TFEU procedure, the imposition of sanctions not having the purpose to compensate the damages caused by the wrongful Member State but to exert sufficient economic pressure to put an end to the infringement[70].

Implementation of article 260 (2) TFEU. In the last 5 years, the Court has ruled in 18 cases under article 260 (2), of which only one was rejected by the Court[71].

Implementation of article 260 (3) TFEU. The provisions of article 260 (3) TFEU represent the innovation of the Lisbon Treaty, which aims to give a stronger incentive to Member States to transpose directives within the deadlines laid down and hence to ensure real effectiveness in European Union law[72]. This new instrument creates a derogatory situation from the application of article 258 TFEU, namely the possibility for the Commission to suggest to the Court to impose a lump sum or penalty payment in the same judgment which finds that a Member State has failed to fulfil its obligation to notify measures transposing[73] a directive adopted under a legislative procedure[74].

The Commission announced in its 2011 Communication[75] that it will, in general, ask the Court to impose only a penalty payment, but depending on what the Member States do, the Commission will not hesitate to adjust its approach by seeking a lump sum in all cases. Subsequently, in its 2016 Communication[76], in the light of experience[77], the Commission stated that it tighten its practice and would systematically ask the Court to impose both a lump sum and a periodic penalty payment.

9. Conclusions

The European construction was founded on the basis of cooperation between Member States and the institutions of the European Union and on an automatic compliance with the rules of the new institutional construction. The accession of new Member States and the enlargement of attributions have triggered a lower and lower rate of conformity, making it necessary for [65] The Court imposed a cumulative penalty, although the Commission only requested a penalty payment of EUR 316.500 for each day of delay in implementing the measures necessary to comply with the judgment in Case C-64/88.

[74] The Commission points out in the abovementioned Communication that article 260 (3) TFEU cannot be used when non-legislative directives are not transposed. The Commission will therefore have to continue referring matters to the Court first by virtue of a procedure under article 258 and, in the event of failure to comply with a judgment, then by a second referral to the Court pursuant to article 260(2).

an intervention for ensuring the functionality of the Union[78].

Considering the fact that the decisions of the European Court of Justice are declaratory, from a juridical point of view they are redundant, since the Court has no jurisdiction to intervene in the legal order of the Member State or to impose a specific conduct in order to force the Member State to comply with the European Union law[79]. The financial sanctions imposed do not seem to have the expected deterrent effect, taking into consideration that, in certain cases, Member States do not take measures to transpose a directive until is very late, more specifically during judicial procedures initiated against them by the Commission and even late compliance before the ruling does not result in any sanction and so is not effectively discouraged.

We can say that non-compliance with EU law is very cheap especially in light of the fact that Member States may obtain such additional time, substantially nearly 10 years, to fulfil their obligations[80]. Of course the real economic costs of such behaviour of Member States is actually much higher counting the cost of human resources invested in such a process, the risk of awarding damages before national courts, and the cost of failing to reap the benefits of integration and common EU policies[81].

Practice has demonstrated that imposing financial sanctions has some limits that surpass its main purpose, that of ensuring the efficient application of EU law: (i) compliance only after the infringement procedures is in an advanced stage, often in the final stage; (ii) late execution, just before the Court deliver a judgement, does not lead to any sanctions and, thus, is not efficiently discouraged; (iii) after the Court has declared that a Member State has not complied with its obligations, the same Member State could allow the situation to continue; (iv) there is no mechanism for collecting payment in case a Member State refuses to comply and there is no express possibility to solicit an imputed notice or to impose upon a Member State to take specific measures.

Of course that the quantity of European provisions is not negligible, the EU legislative corpus that Member States need to comply with, transpose[82] or implement, is considerable, each corresponding to at least one possibility of non-compliance and accordingly to one infringement action[83].

We believe that the possible solutions that can be taken into consideration for consolidating the sanctioning system and thus ensuring the efficient implementation of EU law are:

1. Increasing the amount of the sanctions imposed, especially for Member States with a 'subscription' for non-compliance;
2. The possibility of imposing financial sanctions from the moment the Court finds that an infringement has occurred (this will enable the Commission to propose fines already in the article 258 procedures);
3. Reducing the timeframes in the infringement procedure;
4. Development of the Commission's support programs for Member States in transposing and implementing the legislation.

THE IMPACT OF PRELIMINARY RULINGS PRONOUNCED BY THE COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE EUROPEAN UNION ON THE ACTIVITY OF THE ROMANIAN COURTS OF LAW

Cornelia Beatrice Gabriela ENE-DINU[*]

Abstract

The creation of an area of freedom, security and justice represented an important project of building an Europe without frontiers where the citizens can enjoy the same rights, applied uniformly by the national courts, following the uniform interpretation thereof. The European law interpretation cohesion is ensured by the Court of Justice of the European Union by the mechanism of the preliminary procedure, which establishes cooperation between national courts of law and the European Court.

Keywords: national courts of law, European Union Court of Justice, European law, preliminary procedure, European court

1. Introduction

The integration of European law in the rule of law of the European Union Member States was made possible by the essential contribution of the Court of Justice which, by means of a law creative case law, established the founding principles of European law.

The jurisprudential establishment of these principles occurred in 1963, when the Court, by the ruling pronounced in case Van Geen en Loos[1], stated the principle of direct effect of European law in the national legal systems of the Member States. In 1964 the ruling in case Costa[2] was pronounced, whereby the Court established the principle of the primacy of European law over domestic law, according to which the Union represents a new rule of law which is autonomous and the originality of which is determined by the permanent transfer of powers from the Member States to the Union.

The principle of the primacy of European law, according to the Court, entails the non-application of the national regulation which is not consistent with the European regulation, and the role of the national court is to remove the former in favor of the latter. The European regulation replaces the domestic regulation, thus enabling the direct effect of European law.

Subsequently, in 1978, by ruling Simmental[3], the Court outlined that the principle of direct effect is the corollary of the principle of the primacy of European law. The direct effect and the primacy of European law are two complementary principles since the first represents the guarantee of the primacy of European law. If European law regulations were not applied directly in the national law, the principle of its primacy over domestic law would have no effect. On the same reasoning line, the case law of the Court provided the principle of the direct effect of European law previous to the principle of the supremacy of European law.

The integration of these principles and, through them, of the European regulations, in the domestic law of the Member States shall be incumbent on the Member States' courts of law[4].

These national courts judge the cases they acquired jurisdiction on under the procedural law specific to the national legislation of every state. As the procedural rules are different from one state to another, it is obvious that the principles of European law are different in what concerns procedural means used from one state to another. The Court agreed to grant these principles a principle value, thus establishing the procedural autonomy of the national courts by means of its case law. But procedural autonomy must ensure the full effectiveness of European law by means of effective national procedural means[5].

The procedural autonomy principle is a creation of the case law of the Court which, in case Luck decided that „the provisions of the treaty do not limit the right of the national competent courts to apply, from various procedural means provided by the national law system, those which are appropriate to guarantee the rights granted by community law[6]". In the same respect, in case Salgoil[7] the Court provided that „the domestic courts are bound to ensure rights protection, given that the role of the rule of law of each Member State is to indicate the powers of the courts and the legal classification of these rights under the criteria laid down by the domestic law".

In the same respect, by case Rewe, the Court provided that, according to the legal system „established by the provisions of the treaty, as the one provided by art. 177, national courts can use any procedural mean provided by the national law in order to guarantee the fulfillment of the direct effect of community law under the same conditions concerning admissibility and judgment procedure regulated by the national law in order to ensure its compliance"[8].

According to the ruling pronounced in case Rewe, the European law is applied in the exercise of the national procedural laws. Therefore, any national court can acquire jurisdiction on the settlement of cases where European law can be incident, but no court of law, regardless of its nature, can reject an European law ground by motivating the limits of its own competence.

Therefore, European law can be claimed in the context of all procedural stages provided by the national law, regardless of the branch of law or procedural stage of the case.

2. Content

The Romanian courts of law, in the context of the settlement of cases, shall be bound to apply the European law principles, there being many cases where they decided to apply art. 148 paragraph 2 of the Constitution which provides the principle of primacy of European law over the national law. According to the aforementioned constitutional text, „following the accession, the provisions of all constituent treaties of the European Union, as well as the other mandatory community regulations, shall take precedence over the contrary provisions of the domestic laws, under the fulfillment of the provisions of the Act of accession".

The impact of the European law in the settlement of cases by the Romanian courts of law can be structured as follows:

1. cases where the courts settle the cases without requesting a preliminary ruling and without applying previous European case law (theory of clear act);
2. cases where the courts apply the European law as it has already been interpreted by the Court (judicial precedent established by means of the case law of the Court)
3. the request for a preliminary ruling, the jurisdiction being acquired by the Court of Justice. Hereinafter, we will briefly present these three situations.

1) cases where the courts settle the cases without requesting a preliminary ruling and without applying previous European case law (theory of clear act);

In the judicial practice, this issue was raised in case of disputes substantiated on the provisions of art. 214^1-214^1 of the Tax Code, having as scope the annulment of the administrative fiscal act and the repayment of the special tax for the registration of second hand vehicles bought from other countries of the European Union.

On the merits, the plaintiffs claimed that the payment of this tax violates the provisions of former art. 90 of the Treaty establishing the European Community, currently art. 110 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, according to which no Member State shall apply directly or indirectly to the products of other Member States direct or other nature taxes higher than those applied, directly or indirectly, to similar national products. It was also shown that, in these cases, the principle of non-discrimination according to which imported and domestic products should be treated equally is violated due to the fact the tax is charged only for vehicles registered in the European Union and re-registered in Romania, while for the vehicles already registered in Romania this tax is not charged in case of a new registration.

The first court of law of Romania which ruled in such a case was the Tribunal of Arad, which noted the violation of the rights granted by the treaty, by contrary regulations of the national law and ordered, under art. 148 par. 2 of the Constitution, the direct application of the provisions of art. 110 of the Treaty (former art. 90), which is part of the Romanian rule of law as of January 1st, 2007[9].

Therefore, the plaintiff's petition was admitted, by establishing that the tax was illegally collected and ordered the defendant – the Public Finance Administration of Arad – to repay it.

Subsequently, other similar cases were registered on the dockets of other courts of law which pronounced similar rulings. The reasoning of the courts of law was sometimes more detailed, when the jurisdiction of the national court to interpret the provisions of the treaty was called into question.

Therefore, by analyzing the European incident provisions, a court of law noted the clarity of the European provisions, „not the issue on the interpretation of the provisions of art. 90 of the Treaty establishing the European Community was discussed in this case, these being very clear, but the direct application of the provisions of the Treaty"[10], which means claiming one of the conditions established by means of case law Cilfit by the Court of Justice.

2) cases where the courts apply the European law as it has already been interpreted by the Court (judicial precedent established by means of the case law of the Court).

The cases having as scope the repayment of the special tax for the registration of second hand vehicles bought from other countries of the European Union were settled by certain courts of law by claiming the judicial precedent consisting in the case law of the Court of Justice (ruling of the Court of July 13th, 2006 pronounced in case Akos Nadasdi/Vam- es Penzugyorseg Eszak-Alfoldi Regionalis Parancsnoksaga, C-290/05 and ruling of the Court of December 11th, 1990 pronounced in case EC Commission against Kingdom of Denmark, C-47/88) and the obligation on the observance by the national courts of the interpretation of European law[11].

These disputes, settled in accordance with the Treaty of Accession and the case law of the European Court represent an example of unitary judicial practice based on the direct application of European law by national courts.

3) The request for a preliminary ruling, the jurisdiction being acquired by the Court of Justice.

The first request for a preliminary ruling addressed by a Romanian court to the European Court of Justice was formulated by Dâmboviţa Tribunal within a dispute which contemplated the limitation of freedom of movement abroad.

The disputes substantiated on Law no. 248/2005 on the free movement of Romanian citizens abroad – which contemplate the requests of the Passports General Directorate to prohibit the access of Romanian citizens on the territory of an EU Member State for a term of up to three years, state from which they were expelled before January 1st, 2007 for illegal residence – raised in practice the matter of knowing to what extent the provisions of the domestic law (law no. 248/2005), are compatible with European law on the free movement of persons, especially in relation to Directive 2004/38/EC of the European Parliament and the Council of April 29th, 2004 on the right of citizens of the Union and their family members to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States.

The review of the European Union framework (art.27 para.1 of the aforementioned directive), highlights exhaustively only three grounds on which the state could restrict the freedom of movement of persons: public policy, public security or public health, while the domestic regulation (law no. 248/2005) provides the possibility to restrict the freedom of movement if the Romanian citizen has been returned from a state based on a readmission agreement, without making any distinction in what concerns the person of the citizen in question, respectively whether the person represents a danger for public policy, security or health of the state he has been returned from.

The application of this law led to the first request from Romania for a preliminary ruling. The request for preliminary ruling was filed by the Tribunal of Dâmboviţa, which requested to the European Court of Justice to pronounce on the interpretation of article 18 EC (European citizenship) and of article 27 of Directive 2004/38/EC of April 29th, 2004 on the right of citizens of the Union and their family members to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States.

This request was formulated within a dispute between the Ministry of Administration and Internal Affairs (Passport Directorate of Bucharest) and Mister Gheorghe Jipa.

Mister Jipa left Romania in September 2006 to settle in Belgium, but he was repatriated due to the fact he did not fulfill the conditions of residence on the territory of Belgium.

The Ministry of Administration and Internal Affairs notified the Tribunal of Dâmboviţa by means of a petition whereby it requested, under Law. 248/2005, the limitation of the right of Mister Jipa to move abroad for a period of maximum 3 years. The preliminary ruling request was formulated by the Tribunal of Dâmboviţa on January 17th, 2007 and consists of the following aspects:

1. Does article 18 EC have to be interpreted as being contrary to articles 38 and 39 of Law no. 248/ 2005?
   a) Do the provisions of aforementioned articles 38 and 39 represent an impediment for the free movement of persons provided by art. 18 EC?
   b) May an EU Member State restrict the free movement of its own citizens on the territory of another Member State?
   c) Does the concept of „illegal residence" for the purpose of the agreement concluded between Romania and Benelux fall within the concepts of „public policy" and „public security" provided by article 27 of Directive 2004/38/EEC, so that the free movement of a person can be restricted?
   d) If the answer to the previous question is affirmative, does article 27 of Directive 2004/38/EC have to be interpreting in the meaning that Member States may automatically restrict free movement and residence of the European Union citizens on grounds of public policy and public security, without analyzing the „conduct" of the person in question?

The arguments of the Advocate General of the ECJ, Mister J. Mazak, provided in case C- 33/07[12], were the following:

[11] Tribunal of Alba, Civil sentence no. 1129/CAF/2008 of September 18th, 2008, Court of Appeal of Alba, Civil decision no. 974/CA72008 of September 17th, 2008, Tribunal of Sibiu, Civil Sentence no. 415/CA of July 1st, 2008, not published.

[12] http://curia.europa.eu/jurisp; http://eurojurnal.eu/?p=48.

- as of January 1st, 2007, Mr. Jipa is a citizen of the European Union, and may therefore, from that date, rely on the rights conferred by that status, including against his Member State of origin (item 30).
- article 18(1) EC is directly applicable in the national rule of law, therefore the EU citizens have the right to leave the territory of a Member State, including their Member State of origin, to enter the territory of another Member State (item 31).
- the fact that Mister Jipa has not exercised its right to free movement yet does not entail the assimilation of this situation to an internal situation (case law Chen et Zhu, C-200/02 is cited). On the contrary, the case has a direct link with European law (item 34).
- the right to move freely within the territory of the Member States guaranteed by article 18 (1) EC would be rendered meaningless if the Member State of origin could, without valid justification, prohibit its own nationals from leaving its territory to enter the territory of another Member State (item 35). The Advocate General claims the previous case law of the Court on the free movement of persons (Pusa, C-224/02, Singh, C-370/90), and of the right to settle (International Transport Worker's Federation et The Finnish Seamen's Union, C-438/05, Daily Mail and General Trust, 81/87, Bosman, C-415/93). Therefore, such impediments are prohibited both in the Member State of origin and in the Member State of destination.
- according to article 4 of Directive 2004/38/EC, all Union citizens shall have the right to leave the territory of a Member State to travel to another Member State.

Based on these arguments, the Advocate General of ECJ claims that such a national legislation (Law no. 248/2005) violates European law.

Hereinafter, article 27 of Directive 2004/38/EC is analyzed in order to reveal the conditions under which the right to leave the territory of a Member State can be restricted.

Although title VI where article 27 is included refers only to the right of entry and residence, the Advocate General considers that it is clear from the wording that it regulates restrictions on the freedom of movement and therefore includes the right to leave a Member State (item 40). Hereinafter, it is recalled that any exception from freedom of movement must be interpreted restrictively. Furthermore, the concept of public policy may vary from one country to another, and it is therefore necessary in this matter to allow competent national authorities an area of discretion (item 41).

Both based on article 27(2) of Directive, and on previous case law, grounds extraneous to the individual case or considerations of general prevention cannot be accepted. On the contrary, it is necessary „a genuine and sufficiently serious threat affecting one of the fundamental interests of society" (item 42) (claimed case law: Bouchereau, C-30/77, Rutili, C-36/75). Therefore, a Member State cannot restrict the right to leave the Member State of origin merely on the basis that the person in question was repatriated from another Member State due to his „illegal residence".

The threat must be to the state which takes the measure to restrict free movement and not to the state from which he was returned (Belgium). The measure has to be adopted in compliance with the principle of proportionality and based exclusively on the personal conduct of the individual concerned. The Advocate General of ECJ considers that Mister Jipa does not constitute a danger to the fundamental interests of Romanian society thereby necessitating the adoption of measure by Romania limiting his right to freedom of movement.

Lastly, the Advocate General of ECJ recalls that the measure must not be adopted automatically, but by analyzing the personal conduct of the person in question.

By examining the case, the Court noted that „article 18 EC and article 27 of Directive 2004/38/CE [...] are not contrary to a national regulation which allows the restriction of the right of a national of another Member Sate to move on the territory of another Member State, especially on the basis that he was previously returned from this state due to his „illegal residence", provided that, on the one hand, the conduct of this national represents a genuine and sufficiently serious threat affecting one of the fundamental interests of society and, on the other hand, the restrictive measure is able to guarantee the fulfillment of its scope and does not exceed the framework required for its fulfillment.

The court has to determine whether the aforementioned conditions are applicable in the case referred for settlement"[13].

The operative part of the judgment of the Court answers the question raised at the beginning of the recitals as follows: European law is not contrary to a national legislation which allows the restriction of the right of a national of another Member Sate to move on the territory of another Member State, provided that certain requirements are fulfilled (the conduct represents a threat and the measure is able to guarantee the fulfillment of the scope).

In this case, the domestic law is partially incompatible with European law due to the fact it contains exceptions from free movement of persons other than those concerning public policy, security and health, provided by European law.

Therefore, given that Romania was bound to transpose until January 1st, 2007 the provisions of the Directive in domestic law – but until the date the petition was submitted, law no. 248/2005 had not been amended in order to be harmonized with the provisions of the Directive – and given the principle of the primacy of European law, the law applicable in disputes where the restriction of the right of free movement of a Romanian citizen is requested is the European law, respectively art. 27 and the following of Directive 2004/38/EC.

The opinion expressed by the High Court of Cassation and Justice in its case law was the same, namely „Community law shall prevail over the national law, by producing actual effects in the rule of law of the Member States, national judge being the one called to punish the contrary"[14].

3. Conclusions

When national law grants the court of law the right to apply ex officio a domestic rule of law, this right represents an obligation if the application of European law is incident[15]. But the court is not bund to claim ex officio the exception on the violation of European law if it were to give up procedural passivity specific to the principle of availability, relying on other facts and circumstances than those that the party which would have had an interest in the application of European law relied its petition.

The case law of the Court proves its concern to maintain a balance between procedural autonomy, on the one hand, and the obligation of the courts to ensure justice seekers a direct, immediate and effective protection of their rights granted by European law.

In conclusion, the ex officio claiming of European law, although it is not an absolute obligation, represents in practice a cautious solution, taking into account the principle on the liability of the state if a court expressly ignores European law when pronouncing a definitive ruling.

THE ECJ CASE-LAW ON THE ANNULMENT ACTION: GROUNDS, EFFECTS AND ILLEGALITY PLEA

Augustin FUEREA*

Abstract

For practitioners in the field, but also for academicians it is equally important to know that there exists, under certain circumstances, the possibility of bringing an action for annulment, having as object the legally binding EU acts. All questions concerning the action for annulment have their significance in the theory and practice of the field, but a consistent case-law is offered by the grounds for annulment, the plea of illegality and correlatively by the effects of the decision ruled within the action in for annulment, and these are some issues to which we shall refer further.

Keywords: the ECJ case-law; annulment for action; grounds; effects; the plea of illegality.

1. General aspects

The European Union's status of special subject of international law is given, in particular, by the atypical non-classic institutional system, special and different from the extremely known classic structure of Montesquieu type and its own legal order, by the legal system belonging to it, through its features that send to immediate, direct and imperative implementation of the rules of EU law. In the third place, especially in the latter stage of European construction, we notice a peculiar system of European diplomacy[1]. All the three issues above mentioned, taken as a whole, give a special character (status) to the European Union, as subject of international law. This special status is given equally by similarities of the European Union both to states and international organizations, and also by the differences between the European Union and states, respectively international organizations, in terms of their status as subjects of international law.

It is relevant for our analysis, the normative component which, at a closer look, has the same atypical and non-classic character, likely to confer, together with the other two, a special status to the European Union. Notable are the European Union's (ordinary and special) procedures for adopting rules of law, in terms of drafting (the initiative) and their adoption (institutions directly involved send, as bicameral rule, to the decision-making triangle - Commission, Council, Parliament) - and as an exception, we note the special procedures under which the executive, as an institution that owns the lead in the ordinary legislative procedure, is alternatively replaced either by the Council or the Parliament, in the special legislative procedure.

By symmetrically researching issues related to the adoption of rules of EU law, the annulment of the same rules is highlighting distinct features aimed at: acts that may be subject to an action for annulment; subjects of law that may bring an action for annulment (who may have active trial legitimisation); subjects of law against which an action for annulment (who may have passive trial legitimisation) may be brought; the time limit in which an action for annulment may be brought and the grounds (causes) for which an action for annulment may be brought. All these aspects are correlative with the effects of the decision ruled in the action for annulment to which other issues can be added.

For practitioners in the field, but also for academicians, it is equally important to know that there exists, under certain circumstances, such a possibility regulated in EU law, similar to the one existing in national law, with the cumulative fulfilment of certain conditions[2].

All questions listed above concerning the action for annulment have their significance in the theory and practice of the field, but a consistent case-law[3] is offered by the annulment grounds, the plea of illegality and correlatively by the effects of the decision ruled in the action for annulment, issues to which we shall refer further.

2. Grounds (causes) for annulment

The main and fundamental premises of the matter are provided by art. 263 TFEU, which in par.

(1) states that the Court in Luxembourg (the Court of Justice of the European Union) „reviews the legality of legislative acts, of acts of the Council, the Commission and the European Central Bank, other than recommendations and opinions (only the legally binding acts, according to art. 288 TFEU) and of regulations of the European Parliament and the European Council intended to produce legal effects towards third parties. „According to the same paragraph, CJEU controls the „legality of acts of the bodies, offices or agencies, as entities operating in the EU, under the condition above formulated, namely that the acts in question" take legal effects (give rise to rights and obligations) to third parties".

Enlightening for our approach is the second paragraph of art. 263 TFEU according to which „the Court has jurisdiction to rule on actions brought (...), for reasons of lack of competence, infringement of essential procedural requirements, infringement of the Treaties or of any rule of law relating to its application, or abuse of power".

Summarized, we note that, according to the matter premises cited above, there are four grounds that can determine the action for annulment of a legal act of the European Union, namely: the absence/ lack of competence („non-competence"); the infringement of essential procedural requirements; the infringement of the Treaties or of any rule of law relating to its application and the abuse of power.

Even if we were inclined to operate with some similarities existing also in national law (with the unconstitutional actions, i.e. contentious matters in the competence of the administrative courts), we shall not do this, however we cannot stop the reader to have such thoughts. The compared look represents to us the subject of a future approach.

Having a rich case-law on the matter, we reserve the possibility to rely, for each situation, only on those decisions that we consider relevant, noting that the historical case-law[4] of the Court of Justice of the European Union is extremely generous.

The lack of jurisdiction. One of the reasons very well known in the field, which has been dating from 1994, but it is important also nowadays, refers to the quite controversial field of competition, which knows new approaches, especially after the presidential elections from 2016 which were held in the US and after the European Brexit. Specifically, in the case of France v./ Commission[5], the Luxembourg Court ruled the annulment of an act of the EU executive (European Commission), act through which the foundations were laid for an agreement with the US to enforce competition law. The reason given by the court referred to the absence of the EU executive's jurisdiction to conclude such an agreement. On substance, the agreement had the purpose of „promoting cooperation, coordination and reducing the risk of disputes between the parties in the application of laws concerning the competition or of reducing their effects"[6].

The EU executive found that the legal nature of the agreement was different, meaning that" in reality, an administrative arrangement for the conclusion of which it is[7] „competent and „the failure to comply with the agreement would not determine the liability of the Community, but simply the termination of the agreement"[8]. The Court in Luxembourg, on the contrary, said that „the agreement is binding on the Community and it creates obligations, this is why it cannot be qualified as administrative agreement"[9], which is why it decided to cancel it. The cause of cancellation of the agreement was based on the fact that the EU executive had no power to its conclusion, established expressly by the Treaties.

From the doctrine in the field[10], it results that the lack of jurisdiction may arise in the case of delegation of powers from the Council to the Commission or to the Member States, but this issue arises also in the case of making decisions in the Commission, through the empowerment procedure.

The infringement of essential procedural requirements. By adopting the same logic of presentation, we find that the premises of the matter are art. 296 and 297 TFEU.

According to art. 296 par. (1) TFEU, „in the case where the Treaties do not specify the type of act to be adopted, the institutions shall select it from case to case with the compliance of the applicable procedures and the principle of proportionality". This is the general framework, as the second paragraph of art. 296 TFEU customizes, by sending to an essential procedural requirement, namely: „legal acts shall be justified and shall refer to any proposals, initiatives, recommendations, requests or opinions required by the Treaties". In this regard, the Court, in Case Sytraval[11], considered that „the Court of First Instance failed to draw the necessary distinction between the requirement to state reasons and the substantive legality of the decision. On the basis of an alleged insufficiency of reasoning, it criticised the Commission for a manifest error of assessment attributable to the inadequacy of the investigation carried out by that institution".

The doctrine of the field[12] is considerable, highlighting the following situations in which this plea may be invoked: 'non-compliance of rules with regard to drafting and adopting EU legal acts (e.g. how to vote in the institutions, the obligation to consult other institutions, bodies, agencies of the Union or Member States where the Treaties provide this); disregarding the rules concerning the compliance with the right of defence (it involves those rules ensuring the consultation with those concerned (...) before adopting a decision likely to seriously impair their interests); a failure of the obligation concerning the grounding of EU legal acts".

Article 297 section (1) para. 3[13] puts spotlight on the publicity issue, respectively on the notification of the Union's legal acts, which does not mean it is a breach of an essential procedural requirement, however, the consequences of the absence of publicity or notification in the field of bringing the action to court, lead to the ignorance of the date from which the deadline begins to run.

The infringement of the Treaties or of any rule of law relating to their application. There are two causes relevant for this ground of lack of competence, namely the case Portugal v./ Council[14] and Germany v./ Council[15].

The first cause for dismissal of an action, Portugal v./ Council aims at an important matter for that period, the '90s (more precisely 1996), but also for now, concerning the market access for textile products. The legal document that made the object of the invalidation claim, by Portugal to the Court, was Decision 96/386/EC of the Council, of 26 February 1996 on the conclusion of Memoranda of Understanding between the European Community and the Islamic Republic of Pakistan and between the European Community and the Republic of India on arrangements in the area of market access for textile products. The grounds that Portugal invoked, were related „on the one hand, to the infringement of certain fundamental WTO rules and principles and, on the other hand, to the infringement of certain fundamental rules and principles of the Community legal order"[16].

Contrary to previous decisions, in that particular case, the Court in Luxembourg said that „the claim of the Portuguese Republic according to which the contested decision was ruled by breaching certain rules and fundamental principles of the Community legal order, was unfounded"[17] and dismissed the action in its entirety[18].

In the second case, Germany v./ Council, the Court in Luxembourg annulled art. 1 para. (1) first indent of Decision 94/800/EC of 22 December 1994 concerning the conclusion on behalf of the European Community concerning its fields of competence, of the agreements of multilateral negotiations of the Uruguay Round (1986-1994) according to the request of Germany, on the fields of competence of the Council. It's about the conclusion, on behalf of the European Community, of the agreements of multilateral negotiations of the Uruguay Round (1986-1994), the Council approving the conclusion of the Framework Agreement on Bananas with the Republic of Costa Rica, Colombia, Republic of Nicaragua and the Republic of Venezuela. Germany argued that „the regime established by the Framework Agreement affected the fundamental rights of operators in categories A and C, namely the right to free exercise of the profession and property rights and discriminated in relation with the operators of category B"[19].

The specialized literature[20], by resorting to systematizing these violations of Treaties or of any rule of law relating to their application, highlights the following: „the error of law (concerning the applicable rule of law, the misinterpretation of the rule, the absence of any legal basis); the error of fact (on the facts that affect the application of the rule or assessment of the facts); the error of the facts to which the rule of law applies".

The misuse of law. It is not the same as the misuse of dominance, governed by article 102 TFEU, as anti-competitive practice. The consecration of this cancellation ground belongs to the Court's case-law according to which such an abuse acquires real dimension if an institution of the European Union „pursued (...) through the lack of caution which is tantamount to breaking the law, purposes other than those for which it has been assigned powers provided by the Treaty"[21].

3. The effects of the decision ruled in an action for annulment

We are capitalizing, according to the research system followed, the legislation and case-law specific to the matter.

From the point of view of legislation, the primary premises of the matter are provided by art. 264 TFEU, article in which it is stated that „in the case where the action is well founded, the Court of Justice of the EU declares the act null and void". In other words, the legal act in question ceases its legal effects, even after the entry into force. The effects are to the past and also to the future (ex tunc and ex nunc).

The jurisprudence accompanies the effects of such a judgment, thus resulting that the „Community court decision to cancel the contested act produces the disappearance retroactively of the act, to all litigants. Therefore, the parties should be put in the state before the adoption of the act"[22].

On the same subject is the P & O European Ferries decision (Vizcaya) SA v./ Commission, where the Court states that „the annulment lead to the retroactive disappearance of the [act] (...) with respect to all litigants"[23]. Moreover, in this case, the court stated that „such an annulment decision takes erga omnes effect, which gives it res judicata authority"[24].

Other issues stemming from the interpretation of art. 264 par. (2) TFEU[25] refer to the fact that an annulment decision may result in the total or partial nullity of a legal act of the Union.

Regarding the temporal effects of such a decision, in order to avoid prejudices that could be caused to individuals, the Court can order, including the remaining in force of the attacked legal act until the entitled institution adopts another act likely to replace the annulled one[26].

As a corollary of these effects, for reasons of pragmatism and timely manner, in full compliance with art. 266 par. (1) TFEU, „the institution, body, office or agency issuer of the void act or of which failure was declared contrary to the Treaties, shall take measures to comply with the decision of the Court of Justice of the European Union".

4. The plea of illegality

The current premises of the matter are provided by art. 277 TFEU.

From conceptual point of view, we see that art. 277 TFEU establishes what the practice called „plea of illegality". Thus, „under the reserve of the deadline stipulated in art. 263, sixth paragraph [TFEU - two months - our note], in the case of a litigation concerning an act of general application adopted by an institution, body, office or agency of the Union, any party is entitled to grounds specified in art. 263, second paragraph, in order to invoke before the Court of Justice of the European Union, the inapplicability of that act". In term of procedure, although the 2 month term expired and the legal act cannot be challenged anymore by an action for annulment, under the circumstance of a litigation which has as object, a regulation, for example, the plea of illegality can be invoked at any moment. In this situation, the Court will not annul the contested act, but it can declare it inapplicable. Consequently, the plea of illegality „is not a self-contained action, but it depends on a main action within which it may be exercised. (...) it is an ancillary action and the dismissal of the main action entails the inadmissibility of the exception"[27].

Article 277 TFEU establishes „the possibility for the Union court, that in the case of a main legal contest over the legality of an enforcement measure of an act with general application, to exercise an incident control over the legality of the mentioned act. For this purpose, any party to the dispute can invoke - either through the appeal against the enforcement measure or as a means of defence - all grounds provided in the action for annulment, even after the deadline for bringing an action against the act with general application"[28]. However, the same article 277 TFEU „reinforces the principle according to which the illegality of a rule entails the illegality of the measures taken for the enforcement thereof"[29].

This time from the European Union's case-law, art. 277 TFEU „reflects a general principle conferring upon any party the right to challenge, to obtain the annulment of a decision directly and individually concerned, the validity of previous institutional acts which represent the legal basis of the contested decision, if the party has no right to [25] Art. 264 par. (2) TFEU: „However, the Court shall indicate, if it considers it necessary, what are the effects of the void act that must be considered as definitive".

[26] For example, the Council of Ministers decided, in agreement with the unions for European civil servants, a pay rise by 10%. Finally, the Council adopted a regulation which stated only a 5% increase in salary. The Court therefore annulled the Council Act, but nevertheless it maintained it until the Council adopted an act which replaced it. Otherwise, the European civil servants would not receive any salary percentage (pt. 15 of the Decision Commission des Communautés européennes v./ Conseil des Communautés européennes, 81/72, ECLI:EU:C:1973:60).

bring, under art. 230 TEC[30], a direct action against acts that have prejudiced, without being able to request cancellation (...). The article aims at protecting the individual against the application of an unlawful legislative act, provided that the effects of the decision finding its inapplicability, are restricted to litigants and that the ruling does not affect the content of the act itself"[31].

Trying a definition, the specialized literature shows that the plea of illegality is „an incident remedy that serves to implement a general principle that refers to due process, and when it is invoked before a national court, it acts to compensate for the absence of direct action for annulment brought by individuals, in principle, against acts of general application"[32].

After analysing the documents that can be the object of the plea of illegality, it is still the case-law that supports our approach.

Thus, according to the Court, to the extent that art. 277 TFEU „is not intended to enable a party to contest the applicability of any general act in favour of an action, the content of a plea of illegality must be limited to what is essential to resolving the dispute. Therefore, the general act, of which unlawfulness is claimed, must be applicable, directly or indirectly, in the case which represents the object of the action and there must be a direct relationship between the contested individual decision and the general act in question. The existence of such a connection may, however, be inferred from the finding that the contested decision is based essentially on a provision of the act whose legality is in dispute, even if the latter does not formally represent its legal basis"[33].

For practitioners, but not only, very important are the following two aspects: the legal subjects that may determine the plea of illegality and the effects of the admission of the plea of illegality.

Referring to the first point, according to art. 277 TFEU „any part" of a litigation that has as object to contest a mandatory legal act of the Union can introduce the plea of illegality.

Regarding the possibility of states to invoke the plea of illegality, the Court has initially ruled that they cannot resort to such a remedy against a decision (as a legal act of the EU) that they have not attacked within the deadline set by art. 263 TFEU: „to allow a Member State, addressee of a decision (...) to challenge its validity (...), without taking into account the time limit laid down in art. 173 par. (3)[34] of the Treaty, would not be compatible with the principles governing the remedies imposed by the Treaty and would undermine the stability of the system and of the principle of legal certainty on which it is based"[35]. Subsequently, the Court revised its opinion to the effect that „the trenchant position in the matter of not attacking the Court's decisions was" tamed „by other actions under art. 263 TFEU, where the court ex officio verified whether the decision whose failure was attributed to a Member State had failed or not, the scope of competence of the State, if there were legal grounds for its adoption in order to avoid that that decision would be non-existent from the legal point of view"[36]. Referring to the possibility of the state to invoke the plea of illegality against a regulation, the specialized literature[37] ruled that „Member States should have the right to invoke [it] (...) against [this legal act of the European Union] that was not attacked (...) but which, because of its generality reveals its „shortcomings" only at the moment of its concrete application. Thus, these shortcomings cannot be discovered immediately, as in the case of regulations with individual addressee".

For the second issue, regarding the effects of the admission of the plea of illegality, this time, both the doctrine[38] and the case-law are relevant. From the point of view of the doctrine, the act under the grounds of which, the decision has been ruled, will be declared inapplicable in those precise circumstances. From the perspective of the case-law, the inapplicability of the European Union's legal act, established by the plea of illegality „has binding effect only between the parties to the dispute"[39].

5. Conclusions

We conclude by assessing that the Court of Justice of the European Union, supplemented by the doctrine of the field, both based on the application of EU legislation, contribute, obviously, to understanding the status of EU member state of over 10 years, by our country, with all that this status implies, in terms of rights and obligations.

THEORETICAL AND PRACTICAL CONSIDERATIONS ON SELF-DEFENSE IN INTERNATIONAL LAW

Andrei - Costin GRIMBERG*

Abstract

Attempts to legitimize war have been made since ancient times. In ancient Greece, for example, war was considered legitimate for the winners. Nowadays, the old Latin phrase "jus ad bellum", in whose name states have frequently engaged in warfare, has been abolished.

As a result, the UN Charter has established a complex system for the sanctioning of the aggressor state, designed to ensure and restore the international rule of law by putting an end to acts of violence and minimizing their consequences.

Self-defense is a right the states may exercise under well-established conditions and limitations only.

With respect to nations that are dominated by foreign states and are therefore seeking to gain their independence and exercise their legitimate rights by all means, including by war, it has been established that the use of armed force by the dominator-states is an act of aggression forbidden by the international rule of law.

The non-aggression principle is basically the one that has turned international law from a law of war into a law of peace, to the point where war is considered today as the most serious international crime.

Keywords: self-defense, aggression, principle, force, war, Article 51 of the UN Charter

Introduction

The use of armed force in international relations is probably the most profound of the problems which confront mankind.

Accordingly, the question of what uses of force are aggressive is inevitably of paramount importance. This is recognized on all sides.

Yet the possibility, the desirability, the practicality and the efficacy of defining aggression caused and still cause extreme controversy.

The problem of defining aggression goes back at least to 1923. The arguments then advanced, in the early days of the League of Nations, have continued to recur in United Nations debates, as recently as March 1972.

However, the same States have not always come with the same arguments. The principal proponent of a definition of aggression over the years has been the Soviet Union - a fact which, for more than one reason, has not promoted the adoption of a definition.

However, at times (for instance, in 1923 and 1945), representatives of the Soviet Government have opposed the adoption of any definition.

The principal opponents of a definition of aggression over the years have been the United Kingdom and the United States.

Still, in 1945, at the Nuremberg Trials, the United States favored adopting a definition, and, in 1968, it took an unenthusiastic lead, together with the United Kingdom and four other States, in advancing a definition in the United Nations.

Aggression can certainly be defined. The question is not whether a definition is possible, but whether a definition is desirable.

A number of definitions have been submitted to the League and United Nations bodies over the years.

Some definitions have been adopted in transient treaties to which a restricted number of States are or were parties[1].

Therefore, clearly, a definition can be devised, which is or was acceptable at least to some States.

And it is not impossible that, within the next year or two, the United Nations may actually succeed in adopting a definition acceptable to the community of States.

But if it does, it would remain to be seen how valuable such a definition would really be.

Yet, it should be noted that, at times, certain States, international bodies, and distinguished scholars have maintained that a definition of aggression is not possible[2].

Thus the League of Nations Permanent Advisory Commission held in 1923 that, under the conditions of modern warfare, "it would seem impossible to decide, even in theory, what constitutes a case of aggression."

Content

Self-defense[3] is a universally accepted exception[4] from the principle forbidding the use of force in international law, and has been subject to a careful scholarly scrutiny over time.

In the current international political context, it is of great significance for the international order that states understand clearly the relevance and application of force in international law.

The relevant dispositions in the UN Charter are sufficient for approaching the whole range of threats to international peace and security.

For these purposes, the UN Security Council may order a number of coercive actions in order to maintain and restore international peace and security.

However, even when a state has the legal right to use force, there may be prudence and principle related reasons for it not to exercise such right.

In international law, this basic normative intuition is codified for states in the UN Charter, Article 51. Article 51 is an exception to the Charter's general prohibition on the use of force, as set forth in Article 2 (4).

The prohibition on the use of force is at the heart of the Charter, given that the fundamental aim of the Charter and the UN organization created by the Charter is to "save succeeding generations from the scourge of war." It stands to reason that any right to use force as an exception to the general prohibition on resort to force would be narrow.

Article 51 permits a state to act in unilateral or collective self-defense only "if an armed attack occurs".

UN Charter Article 51 is not the only UN sanction of self-defense[5] to be disregarded by the ICJ. The Court also chooses to ignore a number of highly relevant United Nations Resolutions, passed by the General Assembly and the Security Council, addressing the legitimate and lawful use of force in self-defense by Member States.

For instance, the rationale behind General Assembly Resolution 3314 – "Definition of Aggression" – is highly relevant to the case at hand.

It states: "Convinced that the adoption of a definition of aggression ought to have the effect of deterring a potential aggressor, would simplify the determination of acts of aggression and the implementation of measures to suppress them and would also facilitate the protection of the rights and lawful interests of, and the rendering of assistance to the victim".

The reading of Article 51 shows that several requirements must be cumulatively fulfilled in order for the use of force in self-defense[6] to be legally permissible:

- Force may be used in self-defense only in relation to an 'armed attack', whether imminent or ongoing;

The 'armed attack' may include not only an attack against a state's territory, but also against emanations of the state, such as embassies and armed forces;

It means that the use of force is permissible only if there is a direct act of aggression against the state, article 51 of the UN Charter becoming thus applicable;

- The performed act of aggression, or the armed attack, has to be serious. The Charter empowers the Security Council[7] to decide whether the attack in question is a serious armed attack;
- The right of self-defense is activated only in case an unlawful act is committed.

Member states are not allowed to invoke the right of self-defense in order to implement the coercive measures imposed by the UN (for example: it is illegal to use force in order to impose peace and security when no armed attack has been previously committed);

- The exercise of the right of self-defense must comply with the criterion of 'proportionality' and 'necessity'.

Force is used to retaliate against the attacker, and it should stop when the threat is removed due to the force that has been primarily used;

- Force is legitimate only if there is an actual attack or the attack has already been committed.

Force is not allowed to be used in order to establish a certain type of justice, for conquering territories and carrying out reprisals;

- At the moment when UN Security Council has taken appropriate action against the aggressor, the individual right of self-defense turns into the collective[8] right of self-defense.

Force may be used in self-defense only if related to an "armed attack", either imminent or ongoing.

The notion of "armed attack"[9] may include not only an attack against the territory of a state, but also against some authorities of that state, such as its embassies and armed forces.

[9] Tom Ruys – "Armed Attack" and Article 51 of the UN Charter, Katholieke Universiteit, Belgium, 2010.

Force in legitimate self-defense may be used only when[10]: the attack consists of threatening force or use of force, when the attacker has the intention and capacity to attack, and the attack is directed from outside the territory controlled by the state.

In the meaning of article 51, an armed attack does not include only an attack against the territory of the state, including the airspace and inland sea waters, but also the attacks against the state authorities, such as its armed forces or embassies abroad.

An armed attack may also include, in certain circumstances, the attacks against individual citizens from abroad or civil ships and planes.

Therefore, an "armed attack" is a deliberate intervention against another state, without the agreement of that state or its subsequent consent, which has no legal grounds.

On the one hand, a state may use force in legitimate defense against an attack, only if the attack is "imminent".

On the other hand, there is always the risk of an early abuse[11] of self-defense, and that is why the use of force should be applied in good faith and based on clear and solid proofs.

However, the "imminence" criterion should be construed by considering the current types of threats, and should be applied based on the specific circumstances of every separate case.

The imminence criterion is in close connection with the necessity requirement.

Force may be used only when any further delay would result in the incapacity of a threatened state to defend itself efficiently against the attack, or to avoid the attack and its negative and irreversible consequences.

Upon the assessment of the imminence of the attack, one may refer to the seriousness of the attack, the attacker's capacity and the nature of the threat, for example, when the attack is likely to occur without any warning.

Force may be used only on an appropriate basis and, in fact, following an assessment of the facts, in good faith.

In the context of contemporary threats, imminence may not be construed based only a temporal criterion, but it should also reflect the wider circumstances of the threat.

An irreversible emergency should exist. Whether the attack is "imminent" depends on the nature of the threat and the possibility of approaching it efficiently, in any given stage.

The concept of what constitutes an "imminent" armed attack should develop so as to meet new circumstances and new threats.

For example, the resolutions passed by the Security Council in the wake of 11th September 2001 recognized both that large-scale terrorist action could constitute an armed attack that would give rise to the right of self-defense, and that force might, in certain circumstances, be used in self-defense against those who plan and perpetrate such acts and against those harboring them, if that is necessary to avert further such terrorist acts.

It was on that basis that United Kingdom forces participated in military action against Al-Qaida and the Taliban in Afghanistan.

It is right for the states to be able to act in self-defense in circumstances where there is evidence of further imminent attacks by terrorist groups, even if there is no specific evidence of where such an attack will take place, or of the precise nature of the attack[12].

Two further conditions apply where force is to be used in self-defense, in anticipation of an imminent armed attack.

First, military action should be used only as a last resort. It is necessary to use force in order to deal with the particular threat faced.

Secondly, the force used must be proportionate to the threat faced and must be limited to what is necessary to deal with the threat.

In addition, Article 51 of the Charter sets forth that, if a state resorts to military action in self-defense, the measures taken must be immediately reported to the Security Council.

The right to use force in self-defense continues until the Security Council has taken the measures required to maintain international peace and security[13].

Exercising one's right of self-defense should meet the "proportionality" criterion. The force to be used, on the whole, should not be excessive by comparison with the need for prevention or for putting an end to the attack.

The physical and economic consequences of the force used should not be excessive by comparison with the damage expected from the attack.

The proportionality principle was confirmed by the case law of the International Court of Justice and acknowledged as a well-established rule of the customary international law, the use of force in legitimate self-defense having to be "proportional to the armed attack and absolutely necessary for responding to such attack".

This means that the degree of force used should not be higher than the one required for putting an end to the attack or for removing the threat.

Given that the right of self-defense does not allow the use of force for "punishing" an aggressor, proportionality should not be construed as referring to some parity between the response and the damage already suffered because of an attack, for this could transform the concept of self-defense in some grounds for retribution, or could limit the use of force to less than required for resisting the attack.

The imminence criterion involves that any further delay in fighting against the deliberate attack would result in the incapacity of the state to defend itself efficiently against the attack.

For these purposes, necessity shall determine imminence: it is necessary to act before it is too late.

The question is whether "imminence" is a separate, independent criterion, or simply a part of the "necessity" criterion.

As an additional criterion, it serves, however, for emphasizing further that a response with force in such circumstances is at the limit of a judiciary category already exceptional and, as such, requires a corresponding high level of justification.

Forbidding threatening force, although as important as to its regulatory status regarding the interdiction of use, has been subject to fewer scholarly studies so far.

The relationship between the two interdictions – of use of force and threatening force should be constantly reviewed, and we should consider the possibility, hardly analyzed so far, of states using threatening force as a means of lawful defensive response: self-defense in the form of a threat.

The status of such concept according to international law is assessed, and the criteria it may govern are reviewed.

This article is based on an analogy between the traditional "forced" self-defense and the notion of threats as a means of self-defense.

However, the well-established self-defense rules may not be applied automatically to a defensive threat, mostly due to the practical differences between a response and threatening response involving real force.

That is why a clear understanding of the international law rules governing the use of force by states in self-defense is necessary.

The rules are challenged in light of what are considered the new terrorist threats and the possession of weapons of mass destruction; debates arose as to which ones need to be revised or redefined.

The study was based on various statements and actions of states, the latest developments at the level of the United Nations Organization, as well as on decisions of the International Court of Justice.

Conclusions

Currently, international law provides for self-defense and anticipatory self-defense for any situation threatening peace and security.

What is needed is to make the Security Council a reliable and effective body.

The doctrine of pre-emption cannot fit into the current international legal system, and it does not present compelling arguments for it to be accepted as a new norm of international law.

Self-defense must, as a right, reflect international realities and aspirations[14].

International law provides states with the 'inherent' right to defend themselves, while making the exercise of that right subject to law.

Modern methods of intelligence collection, such as satellite imagery and communications interceptions, now make it unnecessary to sit out an actual armed attack in order to wait for convincing proof of a state's hostile intent.

With the advent of weapons of mass destruction and their availability to international terrorists, the first blow can be devastating - far more devastating than the pinprick attacks on which the old rules were premised.

Terrorist organizations "of global reach" were unknown when Article 51 was drafted[15].

In order to flourish, they need to conduct training, raise money, and develop and stockpile weaponry – which, in turn, requires communications equipment, camps, technology, staffing, and offices. All this requires a sanctuary, which only states can provide - and which only states can take away.

After all, the final aim of any debates on this topic is to comply in full with the dispositions of the UN Charter, namely:

"Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.

Measures taken by Members in the exercise of this right of self-defense shall be immediately reported to the Security Council and shall not in any way affect the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under the present Charter to take at any time such action as it deems necessary in order to maintain or restore international peace and security[16]".

The use of force in contemporary international relations is one of the most significant acts any State can undertake.

Responding to an actual armed attack in self-defense, whereby the State seeks to protect its very existence[17], is one of the fundamental values of statehood that can be exercised.

The consequences, however, of launching anticipatory action and making an error of judgment that a presumed threat is not as great as anticipated, is one that all States must bear the highest levels of accountability and state responsibility for.

REGIME OF REFUGEES IN ROMANIA. THE LEGAL FRAMEWORK AND ITS RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

Oana – Adriana IACOB*

Abstract

The present paper offers a general overview of the legal framework of the Romanian asylum system and of its most recent developments, trigerred by the "refugee crisis" that created turmoils and generated debates at the European and international levels. Although traditionally a transit country for migrants, that remained largely unaffected by the crisis, the controversies around the issue and the perspective of an increase of the migration flow, represented an incentive for the adoption of measures at national level, aiming to improve the asylum system and the perspectives of social integration of those who were granted a form of international protection. This study aims to highlight these developments and to place them in a larger international/European context.

Keywords: migration, asylum system, refugee law

1. Introduction

The paper analyses the legal regime of the persons granted a form of international protection in Romania (refugees and persons with subsidiary protection), emphasizing the impact that the current situation, at international and European levels, has on its evolution.

Romania is party to the 1951 Geneva Convention regarding the status of refugees and to the 1967 New York Protocol supplementing the Geneva Convention, ratified by Law no 46/04.07.1991[1].

The Romanian legislative framework regarding asylum and migration reflects the country's international and European commitments and obligations.

Romania has traditionally been rather a transit country for migrants and its asylum and migration system was not configurated to cope with a larger number of arrivals.

Despite the turmoil generated by the "refugee crisis" within the European Union, in contrast with the flows that affected other neighboring European states, Romania continued to have a low number of third country national and a low rate of irregular migration[2].

Nevertheless, the debate generated by the international context in the field of asylum and migration led to some developments at national level, aiming to increase the capacity of the system.

The paper will present the general situation of asylum in Romania, the existent legal framework and the evolution of the asylum system within the current context.

2. General overview of the situation of asylum and migration in Romania[3]

According to the latest migration and migrant population statistics, published by Eurostat, a total of 3.8 million people immigrated to one of the EU-28 Member States during 2014. Among these 3.8 million immigrants during 2014, there were an estimated 1.6 million citizens of non-member countries[4].

With a total number of 98 586 foreign citizens residing legally on the Romanian territory in 2014, among which 57 471 third country nationals (most of them being nationals of the Republic of Moldova - 9838, Turkey - 8816 and China - 7359)[5], representing a share of 0.26% of the state's total population[6], Romania is one of the EU countries with a rather low number of migrants.

In 2015, there was a rise in the number of foreign citizens, in general (104 139)[7], with an increase of the number of third country nationals residing in Romania (60 257 - most of them being nationals of Moldova, Turkey and China), but there weren't any major fluctuations.

In 2016, the situation seemed to remain within the same parameters - there is an increase, but no major fluctuations in number or changes in the general profile of the migrant population: 112 114 foreign nationals, among which 64 903 third country nationals (most of them coming from Moldova – 10 485, Turkey – 9087 and China – 7727)[8].

A more significant evolution trend was observed in the field of asylum. According to the General Inspectorate for Immigration, in 2016 there were 1886 asylum requests registered, 49% more than in 2015, when there was a total of 1266 asylum requests. This was due to the fact that last year, 554 were relocated to Romania from Greece and Italy, in accordance with decisions taken at EU level. Most asylum seekers are coming from Syria (816), Iraq (472), Pakistan (93) and Afghanistan (80)[9]. Of the 1886 requests registered in 2016, to this date, 824 people were granted a form of protection in Romania[10]. The total number of refugees and persons with subsidiary protection in Romania is around 3000.

3. International and European legislation regarding asylum

3.1. The 1951 Geneva Convention and the 1967 New York Protocol

Romania is party to the 1951 Geneva Convention regarding the status of refugees and to the 1967 New York Protocol supplementing the Geneva Convention. Romania has ratified both the 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol in 1991, through Law no 46/04.07.1991[11].

According to the two universal international instruments, the term "refugee" designates any person that "owing to well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion, is outside the country of his nationality and is unable or, owing to such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country; or who, not having a nationality and being outside the country of his former habitual residence as a result of such events, is unable or, owing to such fear, is unwilling to return to it"[12].

The Geneva Convention establishes:

- inclusion clauses - basic criteria for the recognition of the refugee status (as stated in the above-mentioned definition);
- cessation clauses - "the conditions under which a refugee ceases to be a refugee. They are based on the consideration that international protection should not be granted where it is no longer necessary or justified" (Article 1 C (1) to (6) of the 1951 Convention)[13]: voluntary re-availment of national protection, voluntary re-acquisition of nationality, acquisition of a new nationality and protection, voluntary re-establishment in the country where persecution was feared, nationals/stateless persons whose reasons for becoming a refugee have ceased to exist.
- exclusion clauses - "The 1951 Convention, in Sections D, E and F of Article 1, contains provisions whereby persons otherwise having the characteristics of refugees (…) are excluded from refugee status. Such persons fall into three groups. The first group consists of persons already receiving United Nations protection or assistance; the second group deals with persons who are not considered to be in need of international protection; and the third group enumerates the categories of persons who are not considered to be deserving of international protection"[14].
- the principle of non-refoulement - basic obligation of receiving states, according to which "no refugee should be returned in any manner whatsoever to any country where he or she would be at risk of persecution"[15].

− standards of treatment - The Convention proposes, as a minimum standard, that refugees should receive at least the treatment which is accorded to aliens generally. Most-favored-nation treatment is called for in respect of the right of association (article 15), and the right to engage in wage-earning employment (article 17, paragraph 1). "National treatment", that is, treatment no different from that accorded to citizens, is to be granted in respect of a wide variety of matters, including the freedom to practice religion and as regards the religious education of children (article 4); the protection of artistic rights and industrial property (article 14); access to courts, legal assistance, and exemption from the requirement to give security for costs in court proceedings (article 16); rationing (article 20); elementary education (article 22, paragraph 1); public relief (article 23); labor legislation and social security (article 24, paragraph 1); and fiscal charges (article 29)[16].

3.2. European legislation

All EU Member States are parties to the to the 1951 Geneva Convention regarding the status of refugees and to the 1967 New York Protocol supplementing the Geneva Convention. These two international instruments are considered to be key elements providing "the cornerstone of the international legal regime for the protection of refugees" and form the basis of the European regulations regarding asylum.

Nevertheless, given the fact that the definition of the term "refugee", as prescribed by the Geneva Convention, was generally considered too restrictive, excluding large categories of persons who are in need of protection, but do not meet the criteria established by the Convention, the Conclusions of the 1999 European Council in Tampere state that these provisions "should also be completed with measures on subsidiary forms of protection offering an appropriate status to any person in need of such protection"[17].

The EU Member States also agreed over the necessity of establishing a common European Asylum system and, in consequence, in the following years, a series of measures were adopted for the improvement of the European legal framework in this field and the establishment of common procedures and a common asylum regime. These regulations were gradually improved and reformed.

Article 63 of the Treaty of Lisbon provides the legislative basis for the future European Asylum system:

The forms of international protection granted within the European Union are:

− the refugee status - granted in accordance with the 1951 Geneva Convention and the European legislation;

− the subsidiary protection - According to the *Q*ualification Directive *(*Directive 2011/95/EU), the subsidiary protection is granted to "a third country national or a stateless person who does not qualify as a refugee but in respect of whom substantial grounds have been shown for believing that the person concerned, if returned to his or her country of origin, or in the case of a stateless person, to his or her country of former habitual residence, would face a real risk of suffering serious harm". The serious harm consists of: "(a) the death penalty or execution; or (b) torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment of an applicant in the country of origin; or (c) serious and individual threat to a civilian's life or person by reason of indiscriminate violence in situations of international or internal armed conflict"[18].

− the temporary protection - defined in the Council Directive 2001/55/EC as "a procedure of exceptional character to provide, in the event of a mass influx or imminent mass influx of displaced persons from third countries who are unable to return to their country of origin, immediate and temporary protection to such persons, in particular if there is also a risk that the asylum system will be unable to process this influx without adverse effects for its efficient operation, in the interests of the persons concerned and other persons requesting protection"[19].

The main European regulations that form the legal basis of the European Asylum System are:

− The Qualification Directive - Directive 2011/95/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council on standards for the qualification of third-country nationals or stateless persons as beneficiaries of international protection, for a uniform status for refugees or for persons eligible for subsidiary protection, and for the content of the protection granted[20]; withdrawing international protection[21];

– The Regulations establishing the Dublin system:

- Regulation (EU) no 604/2013 of the European Parliament and of the Council establishing the criteria and mechanisms for determining the member state responsible for examining an application for international protection lodged in one of the Member States by a third-country national or a stateless person[23];
- Regulation (EU) no 603/2013 of the European Parliament and of the Council on the establishment of 'Eurodac' for the comparison of fingerprints[24].

– The Temporary Protection Directive - Council Directive 2001/55/EC of 20 July 2001 on minimum standards for giving temporary protection in the event of a mass influx of displaced persons and on measures promoting a balance of efforts between Member States in receiving such persons and bearing the consequences thereof[25].

The European Agenda on Migration, adopted on the 13th of May 2015 sets out a comprehensive approach for improving the management of migration in all its aspects. This included a commitment to prioritize implementation of the Common European Asylum System[26]. As a result, on the 23rd of September 2015, the European Commission adopted 40 infringement decisions against several Member States for failing to fully implement legislation making up the Common European Asylum System. Romania was among the states targeted by the infringement decisions, for failing to communicate the transposition of the Common Procedures Directive - Directive 2013/32/EU - and the Reception Conditions Directive - Directive 2013/33/EU[27].

Romania transposed the directives and regulations regarding the asylum and migration system in its national legislation.

The transposition of the Common Procedures Directive (Directive 2013/32/EU) and the Reception Conditions Directive (Directive 2013/33/EU) was completed through the Government Decision no 14/2016[28], adopted on the 19th of January 2016, after being partially transposed in December 2015, through Law no 331/2015. The two normative acts brought modifications to Law no 122/2006 regarding asylum in Romania and its Methodological Norms approved by Government Decision no. 1.521/2006. The latter law and its methodological norms had already transposed many of the core elements prescribed by the above-mentioned directives, that were established through the previous legal instruments (now reformed), respectively, the Council Directive 2003/9/EC laying down minimum standards for the reception of asylum seekers[29].

4. National legal framework regarding asylum[30]

4.1. Specific national legislation

The national legislative framework in the field of asylum is established by Law no 122/2006[31] with subsequent modifications and completions and the Methodological Norms for the enforcement of Law no 122/2006, approved by Government Decision no. 1.521/2006 with subsequent modifications and completions. The framework on the social integration of migrants who were granted a form of international protection in Romania is also regulated by Government Ordinance No. 44/2004, with subsequent modifications and completions and the Methodological Norms for the enforcement of Government Ordinance no.44/2004, approved by Government Decision no. 1.483/2004.

The general framework regulating the status of aliens in Romania (that is applicable in the field of asylum in situations not covered by the specific legislation) is established by Government Emergency Ordinance no 194/2002 on the regime of aliens in Romania, republished, with subsequent modifications and completions.

There are 3 forms of international protection granted by the Romanian state, in accordance with Law no 122/2006, that transposed the European regulations mentioned above (according to Art. 22 of Law no 122[32]):

- refugee status;
- subsidiary protection;
- temporary protection.

4.2. Asylum procedure

4.2.1. Processing the request

Any foreigner on the territory of Romania or at a border-crossing point may lodge an application for asylum. A person becomes an asylum seeker from the moment they request the protection of the Romanian state, in writing or verbally, in front of competent authorities (structures within the General Inspectorate for Immigration/ Border Police/ National Administration of Penitenciaries/ police units)[33].

The asylum request will be processed either through an ordinary procedure or through an accelerated procedure.

The ordinary asylum procedure is structured in two stages, administrative and judicial. In the administrative stage, the applications for asylum are examined on a case-by-case basis by administrative authorities, based on the interview of the asylum seeker, the documents in the personal file and the country of origin information. The administrative stage of the procedure falls within the competence of the Directorate for Asylum and Integration within the General Inspectorate for Immigration. It should last 30 days since the registration of the asylum request, but if it is deemed necessary the time limit may be extended. At the end of this stage, the General Inspectorate for Immigration will issue a decision that either: grants the refugee status; or grants subsidiary protection; or rejects the application for asylum. The possibility of granting subsidiary protection is analyzed if conditions for recognizing the refugee status are not met.

In the judicial stage, asylum seekers whose applications were rejected in the administrative stage may exercise two remedies and their situation shall be examined by the courts of law.

The accelerated procedure is within the competence of the Directorate for Asylum and Integration of the General Inspectorate for Immigration. This procedure is swifter (3 days) and it applies in specific cases of asylum requests that are: evidently unfounded; or submitted by persons who come from countries of origin that are considered to be safe; or submitted by persons who undertook activities that endanger the Romanian national security or the public order. In case the request is rejected, the applicant has one judicial remedy against the administrative decision.

If after the rejection of the asylum request, new elements are found, that did not exist or could not be invoked during the previous asylum procedure, the Directorate for Asylum and Integration from the General Inspectorate for Immigration may grant the applicant access to a new asylum procedure. If the request for a new procedure is approved, a new asylum procedure will start.

4.2.2. Basic rights of asylum seekers during the procedure

The rights of the asylum seekers during the asylum procedure are established by Law no 122/2006, with subsequent modifications and completions and the Methodological Norms for the enforcement of Law no 122/2006, approved by Government Decision no. 1.521/2006 with subsequent modifications and completions. Among the asylum seeker's basic rights are:

- The right to stay in Romania until the expiry of a 15 days period from the completion of the asylum procedure, if the request is rejected and protection is not granted[34].
- The right to assistance:

A.Legal assistance

B. Assistance provided by UNHCR and/or NGOs

C. Assistance for interpretation and translation, free of charge

D. Material assistance and accommodation:

– the right to benefit, throughout the procedure, upon request, from material reception conditions, in order to guarantee subsistence and protect the physical and mental health of the asylum seeker, in case he/she does not have the necessary material means[35].

– the right to be accommodated in reception and accommodation centers subordinated to the General Inspectorate for Immigration, until the cessation of the right to stay on the territory of Romania, in case of asylum seekers who do not have the necessary material means of support[36]. Currently, there are 6 such accommodation centers with an overall capacity of 900 places[37].

E. Medical assistance

F. Social assistance

- The right to work

– the right to be granted access to the labor market under the conditions laid down by the law for Romanian citizens, after the expiry of 3 months from the lodging of the application for asylum, if the asylum seeker is still subject to the administrative procedure aimed at determining a form of protection, as well as throughout the judicial procedure[38].

- The right to education

– the right of minor asylum seekers to be granted access to compulsory education under the same conditions as minor Romanian citizens[39];

- The right to participate in cultural adaptation activities - activities that should be organized by the General Inspectorate for Immigration in collaboration with NGOs active in the field of asylum.

4.3. Integration of beneficiaries of a form of protection

4.3.1. General provisions

The refugee status and the subsidiary protection are granted for an undetermined period. Thus, a system encouraging their social integration was created. Its legislative basis is found in Law no 122/2006 and its Methodological Norms, Government Ordinance no 44/2004 and its Methodological Norms.

The specific legislation on integration (respectively GO no 44/2004 with its subsequent modifications) defines social integration as "the active participation of foreigners who were granted a form of protection or a right of residence in Romania and citizens of Member States of the European Union and European economic Area in the economic, social and cultural development of Romanian society in order to prevent social exclusion, respectively to adapt to the conditions of Romanian society"[40]. Thus, the goal of the system should be that of creating a framework (through the involvement of all relevant institutions) that would enable foreigners to actively participate in the economic, social and cultural life[41].

Generally, each institutional actor (Ministry of Internal Affairs, Ministry of Education, Ministry of Labor, etc) is responsible for the integration of the beneficiaries of a form of protection in their field of competence. The General Inspectorate for Immigration provides through its regional structures, specific services aimed at facilitating the integration into Romanian society of persons granted refugee status or subsidiary protection. It also coordinates and monitors activities regarding the process of integration, that fall within the competence of other institutions[42].

4.3.2. Rights of beneficiaries of a form of protection (refugee status, subsidiary protection)

The beneficiaries of a form of protection are issued identification and travel documents, according to their status.

Generally, by virtue of the legal provisions in force, beneficiaries of a form of protection enjoy a treatment equal to the one granted to the Romanian citizens (with the exception of electoral rights and other specific situations). For instance, such equal treatment is granted to them regarding:

- the right to work (although there still are professions regulated by specific legislation, that are not fully accessible to beneficiaries of a form of protection- for example, in order to practice a medical profession in Romania, beneficiaries of a form of protection must either be a family member of a Romanian citizen or have obtained long term residence in Romania);
- the right to education (In order to be integrated into the Romanian education system, minors who were granted a form of protection in Romania benefit from a free of charge basic Romanian language course for a full academic year. While attending the Romanian language courses, minors who were granted a form of protection in Romania also participate in educational activities of a theoretical, practical or recreational nature, organized in schools, free of charge, without their attendance being registered in official records.)43
- the recognition of studies, diplomas, professional qualifications;
- access to social housing;
- access to social insurance, social assistance measures (including child allowance), health insurance;
- access to justice and administrative assistance.

4.3.3. Integration program

In order to facilitate the social integration of the beneficiaries of a form of protection, a series of services and activities are offered through a cooperative effort of public institutions, local communities and nongovernmental organizations active in the field, under the coordination of the General Inspectorate for Immigration, in the form of the integration program. Enrollment in the integration program takes place within 30 days from the granting of a form of protection and generally lasts for 6 months. The program is established and implemented based on the beneficiaries' needs, without any discrimination, by respecting their cultural background[44]. It may include activities such as:

a) "counseling and support activities for ensuring access to the following rights: right to employment, right to housing, right to medical and social assistance, social security, right to education;
b) b) cultural adaptation sessions;
c) c) Romanian language courses"[45].

In addition to that, beneficiaries of a form of protection that are registered and actively participate in the integration program may also be granted a non-

5. Latest legal developments in the field of asylum at national level[47]

5.1. The National Strategy on Immigration for the period 2015-2018

The National Strategy on Immigration (approved by Government Decision no 780/2015)[48] establishes the objectives at national level, in the field of migration, for the period 2015-2018, that will be implemented by the Romanian authorities through concrete actions and measure, based on action plans adopted annually. It was drafted in accordance with the priorities set by the European Agenda for Migration. The Strategy was adopted in September 2015 and reflects the main developments at international and EU levels. It has in view an improvement of the migration and asylum system, that currently is not fully equipped to cope with a larger migration flow. As shown above, Romania has been and still is mostly a transit country for migrants, with a rather low number of non-nationals with right of residence on Romanian soil. Nevertheless, Romania's European commitments, the expected Schengen adherence and the regional and international instabilities are expected to lead to an increased migration flow.

On July, the 2nd 2015, the Romanian Government has approved the Memorandum[49] for the implementation of the European Council's Conclusions from the 25th - 26th of June 2015[50], regarding the migration field. The Memorandum enshrines Romania's commitment to take in a quota of 1705 migrants, within the intra-EU relocation scheme, and 80 migrants who have been identified as in need of international protection, within the extra-EU resettlement program.

On the 14th of September 2015, the Justice and Home Affairs Council within the EU adopted a decision "establishing a temporary and exceptional relocation mechanism over two years from the frontline member states Italy and Greece to other member states"[51]. The mechanism envisioned the relocation of 40.000 persons in clear need of international protection. On the 22nd of September 2015, the European Union interior ministers met again in the Justice and Home Affairs Council and approved a plan to relocate 120,000 migrants "in clear need of international protection" over a period of two years from the frontline states Italy, Greece and Hungary to other 22 EU countries[52]. Through this plan, quotas were established based on "the size of economy and population of each state, the unemployment rate and the average number of asylum applications„[53]. The decision was taken by majority vote.

According to the relocation scheme, Romania was expected to receive 2475 people during the first year: 585 from Italy and 1890 from Greece[54]. Another quota of 2.171 migrants would be allocated to Romania in the second year. So, in September 2015, Romania was expecting to receive a total of 6.351 migrants within a time span of 2 years. Romania, initially has "sustained a position against the mandatory quotas, expressing its solidarity with other EU states, but, nevertheless, explaining that, for the time being, the "physical limit" of reception for Romania was 1785 people, with the possibility of improving and increasing its capacity in the future"[55].

In such a context, one of the 4 general strategic objectives set out by the national Strategy for Immigration for the period 2015-2018 was the improvement of the national asylum system, in order to increase its efficiency and ensure its conformity with the legal national, European and international standards.

The strategic objectives set out under the above mentioned general objective are:

1. continuing to ensure access to the asylum procedure and fully respect the principle of non-refoulement;
2. processing asylum requests in an efficient manner and in conformity with the existent legal national, European and international standards;
3. effective fight against the abuse of the asylum procedure;
4. ensuring a dignified standard of living for asylum seekers, in accordance with the national, European and international legal standards;
5. ensuring compatibility and interoperability with other EU Member States asylum systems, coordination with the European Asylum Support

5.2. Subsequent developments

5.2.1. Action Plan for 2015 and other developments

The National Strategy for Immigration for the period 2015-2018 was approved by Government Decision no 780/2015, alongside with the afferent Action Plan for the year 2015.

The Action Plan[57] established the concrete measures to be taken for the implementation of the general and specific strategic objectives, the time frame, the responsible institutions and the available funding. Many of the measures referring to the field of asylum - ranging from the improvement of the reception conditions (increasing accommodation capacity, better responding to needs of vulnerable groups, providing material, medical and social assistance to asylum seekers etc.) to enhancing inter-institutional cooperation and increasing the level of knowledge and information on asylum issues, at the level of local authorities - depend to a great extent on external funding from the EU (especially the Asylum, Migration and Integration Fund – a financial instrument set up for the period 2014 - 2020[58]) and on the cooperation with NGOs active in this field.

In October 2015, after some informal meetings with the representatives of the civil society, the Romanian Government announced its intention to create a platform of cooperation and dialogue with NGOs in order to better manage the efforts undertaken with the purpose of facilitating the social integration of refugees. Through Prime-Minister Decision no 312 from the 27th of November 2015, the Inter-ministerial Committee "the National Coalition for the Integration of Refugees" was founded. The Committee was supposed to meet monthly and whenever it was deemed necessary, with representatives of NGOs as permanent guests.

One of Romania's top priorities, according to the Strategy and its 2015 Action Plan, was the modification of the national legislation on asylum as to fully transpose the legal instruments that are the basis of the Common European Asylum System. Romania has completed the transposition of the Common Procedures Directive (Directive 2013/32/EU) and the Reception Conditions Directive (Directive 2013/33/EU) through the Government Decision no 14/2016[59], adopted on the 19th of January 2016, after being partially transposed in December 2015, through Law no 331/2015. One of the most important modifications was brought to the provisions regulating the material and financial assistance granted to asylum seekers, that hadn't been changed since 2006 and were below the limits of subsistence. Between 2006 and January 2016, asylum seekers received, upon request, food within the limit of 3 RON (0.67 euro) per person per day, accommodation within the limit of 1.8 RON (0.40 euro per person per day - if the asylum seeker is not housed in one of the reception and accommodation centers subordinated to the General Inspectorate of Immigration - and other expenses within the limit of 0.6 RON (0.13 euro) person per day. After the modification operated through Government Decision no 14/2016, "the asylum seeker shall receive, upon request, food within the limit of 10 RON (2.23 euros) per person per day, clothing within the limit of 67 RON (14.92 euros) per person per summer season and 100 RON (22.27 euros) per person per winter season and other expenses within the limit of 6 RON (1.34 euro) per person per day"[60].

Also, another important legislative development was the adoption in November 2015 of Government Emergency Ordinance (GEO) no 53/2015 for the establishment of measures applicable in case of a massive migration flow at the Romanian state border[61]. "According to this GEO, in such a case, by order of the general inspector, head of the Romanian Border Police, one or several integrated centers implementing activities for state border control, protection of public health and clarification of the legal status of foreign nationals crossing the border, may be founded. Foreign nationals that are object to such activities within the above mentioned integrated centers will be granted, free of charge, accommodation, food, medical assistance and personal hygiene materials, with consideration to their opinion and personal religious and cultural profile, regardless of their legal status"[62] On the 27th of April 2016, was published a draft Order of the Romanian Minister of Internal Affairs regarding the supply of food, the equippement of the accommodation locations and the provision of personal hygiene materials to foreign nationals that are object to activities carried out within the integrated centers mentioned by GEO no 53/2015[63]. "The draft order is meant to establish minimum measures in order to ensure a standard of living that guarantees subsistence and protects the physical and mental health of foreigners"[64].

5.2.2. Action Plans for 2016 and 2017

The Draft Action Plans for 2016 and 2017[65] target, among others, the improvement of reception conditions (with a focus on vulnerable groups also, as, at the practical level, the system is far from actually responding to their needs) and ensuring the access of asylum seekers and beneficiaries of a form of protection to their basic rights, facilitating integration of beneficiaries of a form of protection (modifications of Government Ordinance no 44/2004 on integration are also being prepared), enhancing inter-institutional cooperation (including through the Inter-ministerial Committee "the National Coalition for the integration of refugees") etc. - with great support from NGOs and the same financial focus on AMIF and external funding.

As to the stage of the implementation of the EU relocation scheme (that actually triggered the latest developments in the field of asylum), according to the General Inspectorate for Immigration, in 2016, 568 people were relocated from Greece (523) and Italy (45)[66].

6. Conclusions

Romania's asylum system, from a legislative point of view, is in accordance with the European legislation. However, since the country has a rather low number of migrants, there hasn't been an actual incentive to practically develop the system until now. The current international and European context have put it under scrutiny nonetheless, revealing its shortcomings and trigerring the necessity to adapt it even further to a prospective increase of the migration flow. An improvement of reception conditions for asylum seekers, and better interinstitutional cooperation in order to ensure access to rights and increase the integration perspectives for beneficiaries of a form of international protection in Romania are among the expectations to be fulfilled in the near future. But such improvements must, nevertheless, go beyond the letter of the law and eventually transpose themselves into good practices in order to prove their efficiency.

ATHLETES CITIZENSHIP ISSUE IN PUBLIC INTERNATIONAL LAW

Anca - Maria IONESCU*

Abstract

International Sports has not been spared the effects of globalization, and among these is the migration of athletes from one country to another. Lately nationality of athletes has become a major issue for professional sports and the principles on which it is based. The problem arose from the lack of a clear and consistent rules on sporting nationality for athletes representing a country in international competition. For a long time, the mere possession of nationality was sufficient to check this link to a particular state. This thesis, outlines how the rules for each sport varies quite considerably, from sports that allow a high degree of flexibility and movement for Olympics to sports that have somewhat restrictive regulations such as football or very restrictive like tennis. It also emphasizes the advantages and disadvantages of quick naturalization and provides some ideas for how this issue can be handled.

Keywords: sport nationality, international public law, sports law, athletes citizenship

1. Introduction

1.1. Introduction

Citizenship can be defined as "the legal bond between a person and a state." This definition is, inter alia, having regard to Article 2 (a) of the European Convention on Nationality (1997). Article 2 (a) immediately adds the words "and does not indicate the person's ethnic origin." In other words, citizenship is a legal concept and not a sociological concept or ethnicity.

Sport nationality (or: Citizenship in sport), is a complex matter with various manifestations. The main issue to be addressed in this thesis is how the so-called national teams representing the country in international competitions (Olympics, World and regional Championships and other international sporting events) are composed on the basis of a legal citizenship or their members are "special sports people" which means that an athlete is allowed to participate in the national team without meeting additional criteria of citizenship as a regular person should. The same question also concerns individual athletes representing the country in international competitions.

There are also national laws which contain specific rules for athletes who will represent the country, so it cannot be said that the term sports citizenship jurisdiction rests solely in organized sport.

In the context of the problems that were created by what may be called accelerated naturalization, changes to citizenship were becoming increasingly frequent in sports, for a number of reasons resulting in particular from “the desire to assert itself on the international stage in some countries and / or willingness of athletes to benefit from the best material conditions possible[1]”.

The rules for obtaining citizenship varies considerably from one country to another, which created an inequality sometimes unjustified from an athlete to another.

International sports authorities have been overwhelmed by this marginal phenomenon once it became suddenly a major problem in a large number of sports. They have to analyse each case to prioritize the most urgent ones first, while trying to maintain a certain level of fairness sports. However, the time has come to find comprehensive solutions as unique as valid for long term as where the Kalou Case (2006), an appropriate benchmark on this issue.

Discrimination on grounds of nationality is prohibited under EU law, which establishes the right of every citizen of the Union to move and reside freely within Member States. Also, EU legislation seeks to eliminate any discrimination based on nationality between workers of the Member States as regards employment, remuneration and other conditions of work and employment.

Equal treatment also concerns citizens of States which have signed agreements with the EU that contain non-discrimination clauses, and who are legally employed in the territory of Member States (" non-EU nationals ").

2. Problema cetățeniei persoanelor care participă la competițiile olimpice și sportive internaționale

Sport performance has not been spared by the effects of globalization, and among these is the migration of athletes from one country to another.

* MA, PhD Candidate Faculty of Law, University of Bucharest (e-mail: ionescuanca12@gmail.com).

[1] Accelerated naturalisation was the core issue in the Scientific Conference on Citizenship in sports. The importance of this conference was widely illustrated by participating in panel terminating the IOC President, Jacques Rogge, senior representatives of four international sports federations (e.g., basketball, ice hockey, skating and skiing).

Lately athletes citizenship has become a major issue for professional sports and the principles on which it is based. The problem arose from the lack of a clear and consistent rules on citizenship for sportsmen representing a country in international competitions.

Contrary to anti-doping regulations, matters regarding athletes citizenship has not reached a consensus on these regulations and is quite difficult to harmonize the laws of each member country of the IOC.

For a long time the mere possession of nationality was sufficient to check this link to a particular state. Since the 1990s, however, this criterion has been questioned, especially because each state has its own legislation relating to the granting of citizenship, resulting in inevitable inequalities. Thus there were cases in which citizenship was granted very easily, in a very short period of time, while other cases waited for years.

Given these differences, each international federation and each organizer of multi-sport competitions, including IOC adopted its own rules regarding the nationality of athletes, each with their own objectives to ensure continuity of their competitions, but also to avoid issues related to mobility and migration and to stop athletes migrating on financial considerations.

Despite the lack of harmonization, most international federations agree that citizenship is the primary state criterion used to judge the eligibility of athletes. This, however, is far from being the only consideration, and therefore, does not ensure the eligibility of athletes. For example, football players in the United Kingdom are all British citizens, but cannot claim to be eligible in each of the four federations 'national' located in the country.

Depending on the country they want to represent and the sport, athletes must follow certain rules, primarily rules are taken into account by the receiving State and the international federations governing more or less the matter. It is important to note that International Federations rules are consistent with the rules dictated by the International Olympic Committee and on participation in international competitions.

Regarding national legislation athletes can be employed as ordinary citizens and follow regular procedures for obtaining citizenship or hold a special status of athletes guaranteed by the national federation and follow special procedures for awarding citizenship if they are covered in that State.

In general the change of nationality for an athlete comes from a desire to participate in the Olympics which, unlike some national competitions and international competitions require the athlete to hold citizenship of the state they represent.

There are two types of migration of athletes who may have both benefits and disadvantages for both the host country and for athletes.

- The case of an athlete of a country poor or less developed economically but well developed in terms of sporting performance migrating to an economically developed country but not so important in terms of sport performance.
- The case of an athlete from a developed country migrate to a less developed country in terms of sporting performance.

In the first case, the examples belong mostly from former Soviet bloc countries or in Africa, athletes generally migrating to countries such as U.S., Germany or France. The main reason being the lack of financial and sometimes representation in international sport concerned of the receiving country.

So this behaviour should be viewed from two perspectives, that of the receiving country and the athlete that is migrating.

Olympics and other international sports events are an opportunity for countries to show their supremacy peacefully, so they developed the practice of borrowing athletes from countries with tradition in a particular sport in those with no tradition and notable results; or individual performance of the athlete facilitates its access in a country wishing to become notable in that sport.

The advantages arise if the receiving country wants to develop a sport with tradition and borrows one or more senior athletes with notable performances in international competitions and the Olympic Games. Thus the athlete can guarantee a place on the Olympic podium which entails advertising, sponsorship and new practitioners or followers of the respective sports. For athletes in the host state the presence of a technically superior athlete with classifications among the first places in the Olympics is a standard to achieve and facilitate easier access to the Olympics by eliminating qualifications (e.g. for specific sports. Skating).

Disadvantages arise when instead of trying to develop that sport states often resort to borrowing elites from other countries.

For athletes advantages are usually financial, migrating to countries in which they are offered the best conditions for practicing sports. But while there are practices to discourage this type of migration such as regulations of the international federations and also national federations that impede an athlete to participate in international competitions for a number of years, during which the athlete lose touch with international standards in the performance.

In the second case the migration phenomenon generally occurs in athletes from countries where competition and standards are very high that they do not meet requirements and standards necessary to represent the country of origin in international competitions, so they migrate to countries in which the standards and competition is weaker to qualify for spots allocated to them in international competitions and Olympic Games. Most often they choose to train further in the home.

The disadvantages are similar to those in the first case but with effects more serious for athletes and sports development in the host country, because in most cases, resources are limited and they come to the athlete of the developed country and not for the development and promotion of sport.

2.1. Special rules stated by states

When international law refers to citizenship, this reference should be understood as a reference to the general legal nationality of a state acquired under a purchase reason offered by State Citizenship Act. It is, for example, enacted by Article 15 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which states that everyone has the right to a nationality and that no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality nor to be denied the right to change his nationality. In addition to this general legal citizenship indicating formal legal bond between a person and a State Member, a state may, for special purposes, introduce a so-called "functional citizenship". If for some purposes functional citizenship is introduced reasons for the acquisition and loss of this specific citizens must be defined in detail.

According to De Groot the answer to the question if sports needs to develop a functional autonomous citizenship was desirable. In principle, the answer was negative. The rules for acquisition and loss of functional citizenship are a very complicated task, if someone does not want to use for example just a single criterion as birthplace for his functional nationality. Even criterion that is considered aa a national of the country of habitual residence needs considerable further elaboration, because the definition of residence differs from country to country. However, there was a reason attractive for the development of a functional citizenship, that would come very close to a separate sports nationality, but it was in fact a notion independent, so it was not necessary to regulate the reasons for the acquisition and loss detail.

To determine whether a person qualifies to represent a country in international sports competitions is used as a basic requirement of citizenship is the general of that state, but added requirements, further ensuring that citizenship is the manifestation of a genuine link between the state and the athlete concerned.

De Groot notes that in the international community of states there is an enormous variety of reasons and grounds for loss of citizenship acquisition. An indirect consequence of this for sports was unequal competition for states and shocking inequalities between athletes. There were also inequalities caused by differing attitudes of states regarding rapid naturalization. De Groot was of the opinion that, in all cases where a genuine link is missing, an additional residence requirement would be reasonable. The next question was, of course, what would be the required period of additional stay. He argued that the required period of habitual residence should be shorter than the smallest residence requirement for regular naturalization, which was three years.

If at the time of naturalization this condition was not fulfilled, a naturalized athlete should be eligible to represent his new country after two years they had lived on its territory (the period of stay directly before and after naturalization may be added). It should not be necessary for two years if the athlete had previously naturalized a continuous and uninterrupted residence of five years in that country.

Such a continuous period of residence in the past guaranteed the existence of a genuine link between the country and the newly acquired citizenship athlete. In these circumstances, there is no need to require an uninterrupted habitual residence two years before and / or after the time of naturalization. This rule of five years of residence was realistic imposed, given that young athletes have received frequent part of their education, sport and made a part of their sports careers in a country other than that in which they were born and maybe raised to a certain age[2].

2.1.1. Citizenship changes and disputes

One of the most famous cases of change of citizenship for the Olympics was Zola Budd, a South African runner who emigrated to the UK because there was a ban on Olympics apartheid in South Africa. Budd was eligible for British citizenship because her grandfather was born in Britain but British citizens accused the government of accelerated citizenship for her[3].

Other notable examples include runner Bernard Lagat of Kenya, who became US citizen in 2004. The Constitution of Kenya asked to give up Kenyan citizenship when becoming a citizen of another nation. Lagat competed for Kenya at the 2004 Athens Olympics, even though he has become a citizen of the United States. According to the Kenyan government, he was not a citizen, endangering the silver medal. Lagat said he began the process of citizenship in late 2003 and did not expect to become a US citizen until after the Athens Games[4].

Basketball player Becky Hammon was not considered for the Olympic team of the United States, but wanted to play in the Olympics, so she emigrated to Russia, where she already played in an internal league during the offseason of WNBA. Hamon received criticism from some Americans, including US national team coach, even being called unpatriotic[5].

Athletes born abroad contributed to the number of Olympic medals won by the United States since 2000 in a modest trend but increasing blurring national boundaries of the competition.

USA are a magnet for attracting veteran athletes to switch citizenship, according to analysis by The New York Times. Since 1992, about 50 athletes who competed in international events to their home countries (including 10 for China) have become citizens of the United States and Olympians, winning eight medals for the US. This practice has implications for American athletes who are excluded from precious Olympic areas and was also a reason for conflict between competing nations.

The International Olympic Committee requires a waiting period of three years, for an athlete who change their citizenship, although it will grant a waiver if the athlete is native and national federations give their consent.

Two American citizens have received permission from IOC: Equestrian Phillip P. Dutton, who won two gold medals for Australia; and canoeist Heather Corrie, who is also a British citizen. (Statistics The Times did not include people with dual citizenship or athletes who immigrated as children.)

On the other hand, among American athletes there were voices that questioned the way government officials to expedite the eligibility of foreign athletes on acquiring US citizenship, which entails and their ability to represent the United States at the Olympics. Thus increasing the difficulty of national qualifications for the Olympic team.

Few of the immigrants said they had chosen exclusively the US to continue their athletic career. Opportunity, freedom and education are defining the main reasons thereof.

Foreign high performance athletes advantage of EB-1 visa, the visa given to people with extraordinary abilities. This meant for renowned scientists, artists and athletes moving fast toward the front of the line for permanent residency. The US government has issued 2749 visas for foreign wives and their children in the fiscal year ended September 30, 2007, and statistics do not indicate the number of athletes who have benefited from this target.

An athlete who marries a US citizen can apply for citizenship for at least three years after obtaining permanent residency green cards, otherwise requiring a minimum of five years.

Since 2000 seven Olympic medals have been won by five immigrants who chose to represent the United States at the Olympics. They are of course considered elite in their countries and even criticized the decision to change nationality such as gymnast Annia Hatch from Cuba and synchronized swimmer Anna A. Kozlova from Russia, the United States brought by two Olympic medals each in 2004; Magnus Liljedahl a Swedish tennis player Monica Seles and two other medals in Yugoslavia in 2000 in Sydney, Australia; also Tanith Belbin and ice dancer from Canada at the 2006 Winter Olympics in Turin, Italy.

In the Netherlands, the situation was such that under Dutch law (Article 10), the implementing provisions of this law include special rules apply also for top athletes. According to the so-called rules of elite athletes achieving an exception is justified when it turns out that accelerated naturalization serve " a cultural interest to Netherlands ", which included also an interest in Dutch sports, which might happen with the representation of the Netherlands by participating in international sports competitions and games.

There is also a circular detailed of the Ministry of Health, Welfare and Sport, on 9 April 1999 to organizations of national sports regarding this matter. These guidelines determined the level of sports performance minimum needed to be eligible for accelerated naturalization.

Preferably, the athlete in question should also be role model for young people or formatting a campaign of fair play. During the proceedings, the witness indicated nationality law applicability for top athletes manifest regulations that allow accelerated naturalization notwithstanding the standard requirements.

The court ordered the minister to reassess its decision and improve the rationale behind it, following which the Minister appealed to the State Council as the highest court.

2.2. Special rules dictated by the International Olympic Committee regarding citizenship

ART.41 Nationality of Competitors

1. Any competitor in the Olympic Games must be a national of the country of the NOC which is entering such competitor.

2. All matters relating to the determination of the country which a competitor may represent in the Olympic Games shall be resolved by the IOC Executive Board[6].

Art. 41 of the Olympic Charter requires that an athlete be a citizen of the country for which they compete. If an athlete has dual citizenship, it can compete for either country as long as three years have passed since the athlete competed for the former country. However, if the NOC[7] and the international federations involved agree, then the IOC Executive Board may reduce or waive this period. This waiting period exists only for athletes who competed previously for one nation and want to compete for another. IOC is concerned only about citizenship issues related to cases in which individual nations have granted citizenship to athletes[8].

3. International federations regulations on citizenship athletes

One of the biggest challenges for the international federations is to determine when an athlete's situation requires a change to the eligibility criteria or not, ethically. As such, we must distinguish between athletes that have developed sports skills, after being naturalized and athletes who were naturalized because of their sporting skills. This issue is not easily legislated to take into consideration and differentiate these two cases. The first group was almost always penalized, leaving the door open of the second group to take advantage of the system.

The most controversial issues relate to athletes who are forbidden to change nationality, like in most team sports. Participants representing several of the largest international federation, at the Congress of Sports Citizenship held from 10 to 11 November 2005, concluded that the ban is indeed illegal. These prohibitive rules are still in effect in many international sports federations.

Another aspect of sport citizenship is worth examining the quotas set for the number of naturalized athletes allowed to participate in a national team. This means that some international federations would limit the number of athletes who have changed their nationality to their representative teams. This practice may conflict with the Court of Justice of the European Community, which prohibits discrimination linked to the time of acquiring the nationality of one of its Member States.

Overlapping rules governing citizenship is a challenge to the international federations. This means that athletes must undergo in parallel home state regulations, rules and regulations of international federations, multi-sports competition organizers, such as CIO. Unfortunately, these rules do not always coincide. The following would occur: athletes who have changed citizenship are eligible to represent their new country in accordance with international federations, but paradoxically, are not eligible to participate in the Olympics. The reverse is also possible. This lack of harmonization can give athletes the feeling of the victim and in the future could lead them to pursue legal action to be considered eligible to compete.

By their regulations, international federations seeks uniformity, regularity and equality, in order to protect the interests of their competitions. But this does not authorize the international federations to take measures to achieve them. International federations and multi-sports competition organizers must balance the interests and values of their legitimate rights of athletes. Each change of citizenship does not necessarily contradict the spirit of sport.

3.1. International Handball Federation (IHF)

International Handball Federation regulates the issue of changing citizenship in The Players Eligibility Code published on 8 July 2014 in accordance with art. 41 of the Olympic Charter.

Chapter VI, relating to athletes citizenship who are part of the national team, regulates the conditions that are required to be part of the national team, namely:

ART. 6 National Players

6.1 National team players shall meet the following conditions:

a)Citizenship of the country concerned. b)They shall not have played in any national team of another country in the three years preceding their first appearance in the national team in an official match. Official matches are considered to be: the qualifying matches for a continental championship, matches in a continental championship, qualifying matches for IHF World Championships and Olympic Games, matches in IHF World Championships and Olympic Games[9]

Eligibility Code also regulates the situation of players with two or more nationality, enabling them to choose the country whose national team to represent.

6.2 Player eligibility in case of multiple nationalities

A player who holds more than one nationality and who complies with 6.1., is eligible to officially represent one of those countries if:

a) he was born in the territory of the federation concerned or b) his biological mother or biological father were born in the territory of the federation concerned or c) he has been living in the territory of the federation concerned for more than 24 months in any period of his life.

The latter regulation enables the professional players who play very often for teams from countries other than their native country, to naturalise much easier in terms of legislation of the international federation, evithat the rules state he wishes to naturalise hold supremacy.

An interesting article is art. 6.3 limiting changing of citizenship at once, this article is interesting because it does not limit the express change nationality but limits the number of federations which can be ascribed to an athlete, creating a special body to resolve the situation where a federation is dissolved.

6.3 Change eligibility to play for a National Federation

It is only permitted to change the National Federation and thus to obtain eligibility to play for a new national team one time.In case of dissolution of an existing federation or a constitution of a new one, the IHF shall create a separate body to examine the cases should disputes over eligibility arise.

Another important aspect covered by IHF in chapter V of the Players Eligibility Code art.5.1-5.4 is the procedure whereby a player can be transferred from one national federation to another. This transfer is attested by International Transfer Certificate approved by IHF, requiring written approval of both federations involved and date of last participation as a player for the national team, the federation confirmation in writing where the athlete played.

3.2. International Football Federation (FIFA)

FIFA published on 18 June 2008 a statement addressed states federations explaining how to apply the rules concerning the eligibility for players who want to represent a country other than the one they are currently representing or for players who already own two citizenships[10].

Art.15 Principle

1. Any person holding a permanent nationality that is not dependent on residence in a certain country is eligible to play for the representative teams of the Association of that country. 2. With the exception of the conditions specified in article 18 below, any Player who has already participated in a match (either in full or in part) in an official competition of any category or any type of football for one Association may not play an international match for a representative team of another Association.

Unlike IHF rules, FIFA clearly defines the type of citizenship that player must hold to represent a particular state. The expression used in the text of the law is permanent nationality, which means that nationality should not be subject to a certain residence time the athlete should reside in that State.

Article 15, paragraph 2 defines the framework norm that allows exceptions for situations presented in art. 18 is important to note that the strict nature of this rule limits the right of players to represent another national team if they were part of a particular team representatives, regardless of the age or type of football played. To clarify the content of these regulations it should be noted that they relate to international competitions between teams representing federations states for example EURO, World Cup or Olympics, where teams representing Member States and not some clubs.

FIFA further regulation is more stringent than the IHF making it tougher for players eligibility requirements than other international sports. E.g:

Art.16 Nationality entitling players to represent more than one Association

1. A Player who, under the terms of art. 15, is eligible to represent more than one Association on account of his nationality,may play in an international match for one of these Associations only if, in addition to having the relevant nationality, he fulfils at least one of the following conditions:(a) He was born on the territory of the relevant Association;(b) His biological mother or biological father was born on the territory of the relevant Association; (c) His grandmother or grandfather was born on the territory of the relevant Association;(d) He has lived continuously on the territory of the relevant Association for at least two years.2. Regardless of par. 1 above, Associations sharing a common nationality may make an agreement under which item (d) ofpar. 1 of this article is deleted completely or amended to specify a longer time limit. Such agreements shall be lodged withand approved by the Executive Committee.

Regulations retain the same note as the IHF and does not cover national member federations but their subordinate.

Rules art. 17 refers to the acquisition of new citizenship for athletes conditions of this article are similar to Article 16, with one exception regarding the period of time that the athlete must be resident in that state. This time period has been extended to 5 years and the athlete must be at least 18 years old after the passage of time .

Art.17 Acquisition of a new nationality

Any Player who refers to art.15 par. 1 to assume a new nationality and who has not played international football in accordance with art. 15 par. 2 shall be eligible to play for the new representative team only if he fulfils one of the followingconditions:

(a) He was born on the territory of the relevant Association;(b) His biological mother or biological father was born on the territory of the relevant Association;(c) His grandmother or grandfather was born on the territory of the relevant Association;(d) He has lived continuously for at least fi ve years after reaching the age of 18 on the territory of the relevant Association. .

Implementing the rules of FIFA statutes contain regulations concerning the exchange federation represented in the article 18.

Art.18 Change of Association

1. If a Player has more than one nationality, or if a Player acquires a new nationality, or if a Player is eligible to play for several representative teams due to nationality, he may, only once, request to change the Association for which he is eligible to play international matches to the Association of another country of which he holds nationality, subject to the following conditions:

(a) He has not played a match (either in full or in part) in an official competition at "A" international level for his current Association, and at the time of his first full or partial appearance in an international match in an official competition for his current Association, he already had the nationality of the representative team for which he wishes to play.

(b) He is not permitted to play for his new Association in any competition in which he has already played for his previous Association.

2. If a Player who has been fielded by his Association in an international match in accordance with art.15 par. 2 permanently loses the nationality of that country without his consent or against his will due to a decision by a government authority, he may request permission to play for another Association whose nationality he already has or has acquired. 3. Any Player who has the right to change Associations in accordance with par. 1 and 2 above shall submit a written, substantiated request to the FIFA general secretariat. The Players' Status Committee shall decide on the request. The procedure will be in accordance with the Rules Governing the Procedures of the Players' Status Committee and the Dispute Resolution Chamber. Once the Player has filed his request, he is not eligible to play for any representative team until his request has been processed.

The above rules clearly illustrate that the procedure is followed in case of change of citizenship, as can be seen from the text shown above rules imposing restrictive conditions are quite difficult to change by state representative. Even if the ban to change his nationality more than once was declared illegal by the Conference on Athletes Citizenship 2015, this rule still appears within the regulations of the International Federations.

Legal texts are generally addressed to federations because the latter are deemed responsible for the eligibility of athletes they represent.

3.3. International Basketball Federation (FIBA)

Statute of the International Basketball Federation includes regulations related to fair play, how to organize national federations, rules on the status of professional players (in team sports, they have a different status from amateur players) but also rules relating to athletes citizenship that are part of national teams.

General Principles contain a unique rule that defines different rules for certain areas delineated and defined by the General Council of FIBA[11].

Art.12 General priciples

If necessary for reasons of mandatory international law, the Zones are authorised to draw up specific regulations applicable to club competitions within the Zone in question. Such regulations are subject to the prior approval of the FIBA Central Board prior to their implementation.

Art.13 Players with Two or More Nationalities

Any player with two legal nationalities or more, by birth or by naturalisation, may choose at any age the national team for which he wishes to play. Any such choice must be made in a written declaration to FIBA. This provision applies also to any player having acquired legal nationality by birth, or having the right to acquire a second nationality at birth, but who does not lay claim to this right until a given time in the future[12].

Unlike FIFA regulations and IHF, FIBA limits the number of people who have acquired citizenship of naturalized or by any other means by the age of 16.

Art.21. a. A national team participating in a Competition of FIBA may have only one player on its team who has acquired the legal nationality of that country by naturalisation or by any other means after having reached the age of sixteen (16). This provision applies also to any player having the right to acquire a second nationality at birth but who did not lay claim to this right until after having reached the age of sixteen (16).

b. For purposes of letter (a) above and in the event of doubts, any player claiming to have acquired a legal nationality before having reached the age of sixteen (16), without presenting the respective passport with a date of issue before the player's sixteenth birthday, requires a decision by the Secretary General confirming that he does not fall under the restriction of letter (a) above. In taking this decision the Secretary General shall take into account the following criteria:

-the number of years during which the player has lived in the country, for the national team of which he wishes to play;

-the number of seasons during which the player has participated in domestic competitions in the country of the national team for which he wishes to play;

-any other criteria capable of establishing a significant link between the player and the country, for the national team of which he wishes to play.

FIBA defines an age by which a player can exercise the right to acquire a new nationality by imposing a restriction contrary to international law, we can assume that this limitation has emerged through evolution in the performance of athletes at early age .

Another distinction in terms of age is contained in the regulations of art. 22-23.

Art. 22 A player who has played in a main official competition (see article 2-1) of FIBA before reaching his seventeenth (17) birthday may play for a national team of another country if both national member federations agree; in the absence of an agreement the Secretary General decides.

Art.23 A player who has played in a main official competition of FIBA (see article 2-1) after having reached his seventeenth (17) birthday may not play for a national team of another country. However, in exceptional circumstances the Secretary General may authorise such a player to play for the national team of his country of origin if he is ineligible to play for such country according to this article 3-23 and if this is in the interest of the development f basketball in this country. An administrative fee as stipulated in article 3-305 and decided by the Secretary General is payable to FIBA

Exceptional circumstances which require the authorization of the Secretary-General may arise lawsuits based on discrimination, because there is no uniform rule on such emergencies.

[12] Note: for exceptions see articles 3-20 and 3-21 of the FIBA Book 3.

3.4. International Skating Union(ISU)

Unlike the regulations contained in the statutes TEAMS team sports, individual sports enjoy lighter regulation. This lightness appeared likely to facilitate access to international competitions athlete. Novelty appears the need for an authentication certificate issued by ISU under certain conditions[13].

A. Clearance Certificate is required for Skaters in the following circumstances:

(i)any Skater (with the exception of Synchronized Skaters) who is not a citizen of the ISU Member's country, whom the ISU Member intends to enter in ISU Championships, other ISU Events and/or International Competitions in the coming season,

(ii)any Skater (with the exception of Synchronized Skaters) who is a citizen of the ISU Member's country and who has in the past represented another ISU Member in ISU Championships, other ISU Events and/or in International Competitions, whom the ISU Member intends to enter in ISU Championships, other ISU Events and/or International Competitions in the coming season.

B. For Skaters not yet in the possession of a Clearance Certificate, the respective ISU Member must submit to the ISU Secretariat by July 1 of each year an application for a Clearance Certificate, together with the documentary evidence and the completed Questionnaire as per sections B and E below.

In exceptional cases, when the requirements for obtaining a Clearance Certificate are fulfilled only after July 1, (e.g. grant of a new citizenship, completion of the 12 months residence period (see Rule 109 paragraph 2. a)), completion of the 12 months waiting period according to Rule 109 paragraph 2, receipt of a release from a former ISU Member according to Rule 109 paragraph 2. c)), the application may be submitted to the ISU Secretariat after July 1, but not later than thirty (30) days before the first day of the event in which the ISU Member desires to enter the Skater.

The application for partners of Pairs and Ice Dance couples may be submitted at any time, but not later than thirty (30) days before the first day of the event in which the ISU Member desires to enter the Skater

It seems that the International Skating Union believes that this agreement plus a suspension of one year is sufficient to change the state represented. So the regulations are laxer than in team sports, such participation is not limited to another state, there is no age limit up to which the athlete can use this procedure and it is not necessary to demonstrate residence. ISU gives validity of one year and accepts that certificate instead of documentary evidence of citizenship that have not yet been issued.

3.5. International Swimming Federation (FINA)

Before the start of the procedures for changing citizenship FINA requiers an official request from the federation. This procedure takes place only after the swimmer holds a valid nationality. Among the conditions imposed include[14]:

- Confirmation from the new club
- Confirmation from the new national federations
- Confirmation from the previous federation
- Statement from the federation as a swimmer was not at international competitions in the last 12 months
- List of official results from the club home

All these documents are assumed to be consistent, otherwise the request of the athlete may be rejected and the athlete subjected to penalties for statements inconsistent with the truth. The request may be submitted to FINA only after they have fulfilled the GR 2.5 and 2.6 of the General Regulation of the FINA.

GR 2.5 When a competitor or competition official represents his/her country in a competition, he/she shall be a citizen, whether by birth or naturalisation, of the nation he/she represents, provided that a naturalised citizen shall have lived in that country for at least one year prior to that competition. Competitors, who have more than one nationality according to the laws of the respective nations must choose one "Sport Nationality" and be affiliated to one Member only.

GR 2.6 Any competitor or competition official changing his affiliation from one national governing body to another must have resided in the territory of and been under the jurisdiction of the latter for at least twelve months prior to his first representation for the country.

Unlike other international federation FINA rules governing the case where an official, non competitor wants to change affiliation to a particular federation.

3.6. International Fencing Federation (FIE)

FIE status is much stricter than other individual sports federations presented so far. These are[15]:

9.2 FENCERS' NATIONALITY

9.2.1 At the Olympic Games a competitor's nationality is set by rules of the I.O.C. to which the F.I.E. must conform.

9.2.2 For official competitions of the F.I.E., competitors must be strictly of the nationality of the country which they are representing:

a) The fencer who enjoys multiple nationality must choose which country he wishes to represent. The fact that he has fenced for one of the countries implies that he has made a choice. If he wishes to represent another country of which he enjoys nationality, he must so advise the Office of the F.I.E. and he may only represent this other country after an interval of three years from when he advised the Central Office of the [13] ISU Clearance Certificate, ISU Statute.

[15] FIE Statue adopted in December 2016.

F.I.E., during which he can no longer represent the other country.

b) A fencer who has already represented a country and acquires a new nationality (from being stateless or through naturalisation) can only represent his new country after an interval of three years from his last participation in a competition for his previous country.

c) The fencer who acquires a new nationality as a result of marriage may fence for that new country immediately, without waiting three years.

d) The Executive Committee of the F.I.E., with the agreement of the member federations concerned, and only for just reasons, may reduce or dispense with the interval of three years.

e) The fencer who has never participated in an official competition of the F.I.E. or in a Regional Championships, is not constrained by these limitations concerning change of nationality and may fence for his new country immediately.

f) Any change in country which a fencer represents is definitive; no further change can be authorised.

g) In cases of dispute the Executive Committee of the F.I.E. will make a ruling, which is not subject to appeal.

9.2.3 For the FIE competitions fencers who are legally stateless may compete as long as they are registered by the member federation of the country in which they live.

The practical process for a request of modification of nationality is stated in the FIE Administrative Rules, "Licences and nationality" chapter.

4. Conclusions

Athletes citizenship issue is a current problem that must be considered from many angles to be understood correctly. On the one hand there are countries that want sport performance, without regard to nationality of sportspeople representing, and on the other hand there are athletes for which a country is only a means of reaching the Olympics.

As outlined in this thesis, the rules for each sport varies quite considerably, from sports that allow a high degree of flexibility and movement for Olympics such as individual sports and handball to regulations somewhat restrictive in football or very restrictive in tennis.

Because of the degree of participation, which varies in different sports, it is difficult to provide a set of rules to regulate and be effective for all sports. Indeed, in the world of free movement of workers and multiculturalism we are living now, some flexibility is certainly welcome, provided that establish an appropriate balance.

International federations take extra precautions to stop this process or diminish it benefits. International federations regulations aimed at bridging the gap between athletes who practice the same sport arisen due to different national laws. Despite these regulations, most cases are presented before an ethics committee that decides after the general criteria are met if the period of residence should be deleted. This practice can lead to discriminatory decisions and to prosecute the respective federation. Higher Forum International Federations, namely IOC tried to harmonize international law on citizenship by creating a set of universal rules for all sports available to participants in the Olympics. But unfortunately the international federations have diverged from this set of rules imposing stricter rules to stop this stream of migration. The autonomy of federations has created considerable differences between sports and automatically between individuals who practice them, giving rise to unlawful discrimination between persons.

The athletes citizenship must be addressed ethically and morally two principles that underpin sport performance, for example an American sportsman that has not caught the national team for the gymnastics team, decides to represent a country like Albania who has no tradition in this sport and no results. But this decision is not followed by naturalization of the athlete but rather it will follow the procedures of expedited naturalization and would probably never leave the US and do not know the language or positioning on the map of the state but represents that country in the Olympics and can win a medal for this. From an ethical standpoint this practice is condemned but there are still no legal regulations to discourage this phenomenon.

Regarding the states law is clear that they are supreme and only with their consent there is the phenomenon of rapid acceleration. Just as with international federations there is a huge discrepancy between states regulations, the difference being that states are not subjected to higher decision-making body such as IOC but have autonomy in this matter.

One possible way of solving the problem would be the conclusion of treaties between countries in some sports fields with a clear indication of the conditions which must be satisfied with the removal of the expedited naturalization. Another way of solving would be applying a much stricter set of rules of the IOC, after all the Olympics is the reason for naturalization of most athletes

This would help eliminate differences between sports, would ensure that athletes participating in Olympic events know the rules of citizenship, and to ensure that there is consistency between the different disciplines.

A BRIEF ANALYSIS ON BREXIT'S CONSEQUENCES ON THE CJEU'S JURISDICTION

Iuliana-Mădălina LARION[*]

Abstract

As the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland's effective withdrawal from the European Union advances, there is a growing interest on what solutions shall be found for the complex legal problems raised by Brexit. The research intends to highlight the main issues relevant for the Court of Justice of the European Union's jurisdiction, in an effort to better understand the possible consequences on the European Court's competence to receive, hear and solve cases involving the United Kingdom, as well as on the means to enforce its rulings. The study aims to anticipate and suggest possible approaches to the practical challenges that shall have to be addressed.

1. Brexit and its challenges

As this study is being written, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland's Government is preparing to notify the European Council of the state's intention to exercise its right to withdraw from the European Union (EU), using Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union[1]. The United Kingdom (UK) is taking the legal steps necessary to give full effect to the result of the referendum held on 23 June 2016.

Thus, the only withdrawal so far of a Member State from this international integration organisation has become imminent. This raises a lot of questions regarding the legal, economic and social aspects of the process, as well as questions about EU's future, once such a precedent is established[2].

The negotiations that will follow the formal use of Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union shall have their result enshrined in a withdrawal agreement. One of the legal issues that shall have to be taken into account is the matter of the Court of Justice of the European Union's jurisdiction in pending cases involving the UK.

The study shall present the possible consequences on the jurisdiction of the three courts which compose the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU): the Court of Justice[3], the General Court and the Civil Service Tribunal, focusing on their main competences, that is (i. e.) on the main types of actions they can solve. There is also the topic of the efficiency of the means to enforce the CJEU's rulings once UK's withdrawal becomes opposable to the other Member States.

So, for the Member States, including the UK, it is important to know what they can expect from the different stages of this process and how far the limits of the negotiations[4] could extend on the matter of CJEU's jurisdiction.

This brief analysis is meant to contribute to the debate among legal practitioners and officials from the Member States and to help clarify these legal problems. Its main objective is a better understanding of how the European Court works, what it can and cannot do with respect to a withdrawing Member State and how far reaching are the effects of its rulings beyond formal jurisdiction.

For achieving this purpose, the study shall present the powers of the three courts in a temporal correlation with the different stages of Brexit and shall suggest solutions to the legal and practical issues in discussion, supported by doctrinal opinions from established authors and by relevant examples from the CJEU's case-law.

Since the subject matter is rather recent and unprecedented, there are few contributions in legal literature, all the more reason to stimulate the pursuit of knowledge in this global society we share.

2. The jurisdiction of the Court of Justice of the European Union with respect to the withdrawing UK

2.1. Official date of Brexit

The first question to be addressed is what is the moment when Brexit becomes effective, i.e. the moment from which the UK ceases to have the rights and obligations of an EU Member State. The answer can be found in TEU, that establishes two alternative dates.

According to paragraph 3 of Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union[5] the UK shall no longer be bound by the Treaties establishing the EU from the day of entry into force of the withdrawal agreement or, failing that, two years after the day it has notified its intention to withdraw from the EU to the European Council. The period of two years may be extended by a unanimous decision of the European Council, in agreement with the state concerned.

Per a contrario, the UK is bound by the Treaties until the withdrawal agreement enters into force or, if it does not do so within the two-year period from the day the European Council is officially notified, two years after the day of notification. Hence, there is an aproximate period of two years, that may be extended, in which the UK is still under the CJEU's jurisdiction.

Three distinct stages can be of interest:

a) after the referendum, but prior to the official notification of the European Council;
b) after notification, up until the effective withdrawal date, a period in which negotiations shall take place;
c) after the day of effective withdrawal, a stage in wich, at least for a short or medium time after withdrawal, the EU law might still have an echo.

2.2. Prior to the official notification of the European Council

As we have seen, after the referendum the UK has taken the internal legal steps that would allow official notification of withdrawal. Since Article 50 paragraph 1 of the TEU states that a Member State shall decide to withdraw from the EU according to its own constitutional requirements, the UK has had to sort out if, following the result of the referendum, the Government needed the Parliament's approval to use Article 50 of the TEU[6]. The High Court answered that such a permission was necessary and its decision was confirmed by the UK's Supreme Court[7]. It also stated that the withdrawal process is irreversible, though prominent legal authors argued the contrary[8] and even expressed the view that this is a matter of interpretation for the Court of Justice, not for the internal court[9].

However, the Government did get the permission of the Parliament, the proper internal legislation was passed and official notification of the European Council is due until the end of March 2017.

During this time, the UK is under the complete jurisdiction of the CJEU, under all its aspects and it has to give full effect to all of the three court's rulings, just like any other Member State.

A succint presentation of the role and attributions of the three courts composing the Court of Justice of the European Union[10] is necessary in order to better understand what type of legal relations they can establish with a Member State, including the UK.

The main sedes materiae is Article 19 of the Treaty on European Union, Articles 256, 258-277 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU) and Protocol no. 3 to the TFEU on the statute of the Court of Justice of the European Union (the Statute)[11].

The role of the CJEU is to "ensure that in the interpretation and application of the Treaties the law is observed"[12]. For this purpose, the CJEU can function as a jurisdictional institution, and give rulings, as well as an advisory one, and render opinions.

Article 19 paraghraph 3 of the TEU summarizes CJEU's competence. It can: "(a) rule on actions brought by a Member State, an institution or a natural or legal person; (b) give preliminary rulings, at the request of courts or tribunals of the Member States, on the interpretation of Union law or the validity of acts adopted by the institutions; (c) rule in other cases provided for in the Treaties"[13]

From this text, it results that the CJEU's jurisdictional function is also divided into ruling on direct actions and on preliminary references.

One author observes that there are two categories of direct actions: "those over which the Court has jurisdiction by virtue of an agreement between the parties and those where the Court's jurisdiction is conferred by direct operation of the law"[14].

[5] Article 50, paragraph 3 of TEU reads: "The Treaties shall cease to apply to the State in question from the date of entry into force of the withdrawal agreement or, failing that, two years after the notification referred to in paragraph 2, unless the European Council, in agreement with the Member State concerned, unanimously decides to extend this period." The former may result from a contract concluded by the EU with a jurisdiction clause and "are not very important in practice"[15].

The latter are the actions that can be brought against a Member State, as part of the infringement procedure, for the alleged violation of EU law[16] and the actions against the EU and its institutions, such as annulment actions, actions regarding the EU's institutions' failure to act, the EU's non-contractual liability, actions against penalties[17] or staff cases.

Preliminary rulings procedure, on the other hand, is noncontencious[18] and can be started by a judicial body[19] from a Member State in order to obtain an answer on the interpretation of the Treaties or on the validity and interpretation of acts of the institutions, bodies, offices or agencies of the Union[20].

The Court of Justice, whose existence dates back to the creation of the three European Communities[21], is at the top of the judicial system created by the Member States of the EU, as shown by its competence and by the judicial remedies. The General Court, established in 1989, on the base of ammendments contained in the Single European Act[22], was meant to relieve the Court of Justice of its increasing case-load, which is why the Court of Justice has jurisdiction to do all of the above and the General Court only has jurisdiction to determine the cases expressly provided by Article 256 of the TFEU and Article 51 of the Statute. It can solve a part of the annulment actions, actions for failure to act, tort actions and contract cases, where the contract so provides.

Altough Article 256 paragraph 3 of the TFEU gives the General Court competence to answer preliminary references in specific areas laid down by the Statute, the Statute has not yet been modified in this respect[23].

The Civil Service Tribunal determines disputes between the EU and its staff. It was established in 2004, in order to take over these types of cases from the General Court[24], that was also experiencing an increasing case-load in the context of EU enlargement.

Due to this chronology, it is not surprising that there is a right to appeal the General Court's rulings to the Court of Justice and the Civil Service Tribunal's rulings to the General Court.

Concretely, until official notification of withdrawal is made, the UK's legal standing is untroubled. As the case may be, it can stand in any of the three courts as a plaintiff or a defendant in a direct action, it can be the subject of an infringement/enforcement action, it can make an appeal, it can ask the Court of Justice's opinion on the base of Article 218 paragraph 11 of the TFEU[25], its judicial bodies may ask for preliminary rulings, its nationals may be the subject of direct actions or staff cases etc.

2.3. Between official notification and effective withdrawal

This shall be a time when the UK is one foot out the door, but still a member of the EU, still bound by EU law[26] and, in our opinion, still completely under the jurisdiction of the CJEU.

This period is dedicated to negotiation between the Member States, that will have to solve a series of complex issues such as budget contributions, rights of UK and EU nationals[27], pending cases before the CJEU and so on28. But, as long as the UK still has all the rights and obligations set out in the Treaties, the negotiations cannot result in the partial or complete loss of jurisdiction over the UK until effective withdrawal. At the same time, the UK cannot adopt internal legislation to limit CJEU's jurisdiction or UK's courts and nationals access to the European Court, without infringing the principle of the supremacy of EU law and exposing itself to some form of punishment, on the basis of either EU law or public international law.

All of the three EU courts can receive, hear and solve cases involving the United Kingdom, acording to their competence. The only way in which CJEU's jurisdiction could be limited during this period is if an agreement would be negotiated on this aspect and if that agreement would enter into force before the withdrawal agreement and the two-year time-limit.

2.4. After UK's effective withdrawal from the EU

The UK shall no longer be a Member State and it shall no longer be under CJEU's jurisdiction. The CJEU shall lack competence, ratione personae, to receive, hear and solve cases involving the UK and the UK shall no longer be under the obligation to observe the Court's rulings. This raises the question of the fate of the pending cases. If a case has already been registered, will it no longer be heard? If it was heard, will it no longer be solved? And if it was solved, will the ruling no longer be observed and enforced?

However, "Article 50 is uncharted territory and therefore the content of the withdrawal agreement is uncertain. This is so not merely with respect to the precise details of the future relationship between the EU and the UK, but also more fundamentally with regard to what is put into the withdrawal agreement and what remains for resolution through some later treaty"[29].

Therefore, depending on the outcome of the negotiations and on the practical implications of some measures, the UK may retain some rights and some obligations under a form or another, to make the transition equitable for all the Member States and their nationals, including the UK and its nationals.

It is difficult to speculate on what an agreement on these issues shall include. It would be salutary if it would address the matter of the pending cases and establish criteria for the CJUE to keep jurisdiction over some of them. For example, such a criterion could be the date of the event giving rise to the dispute. If the facts of the matter are prior to effective Brexit, the European Court should be able, in principle, to continue determining the case and the UK should have to observe its ruling, even after withdrawal. This solution would be justified especially in those cases related to cross-border disputes governed by the rules of EU private international law[30] or to intellectual property litigation[31], where "A large part of UK legislation on intellectual rights comes from the European Union"[32].

For a more accurate image, it is useful to have a separate look at each of the main actions the three EU courts can solve[33], as presented above.

With respect to the direct actions, in the infringement/enforcement actions the UK can be a plaintiff, as well as a defendant. The legal basis for this action is represented by Articles 258-260 of the TFEU. The wording of these articles leads to the interpretation that the Member State status of the defendant has to subsist until a judgment is given, since the Court of Justice has to find "that a Member State has failed to fulfil an obligation under the Treaties"[34]. Thus, if the UK is a plaintiff, the action introduced before withdrawal against another Member State should be given a final judgment. Another solution could be to let the Comission decide if it chooses to continue the action UK has introduced or not.

On the other hand, if the UK is a defendant, the action cannot be solved after withdrawal, but the issue may be addressed during the negotiations for the conclusion of the withdrawal agreement, if it has relevance and importance for an amiable separation.

In annulment actions[35], the UK can only be a plaintiff[36], as the goal is for the Court of Justice or the General Court, as the case may be, to review the legality of EU acts. If the act is declared null and void, the ruling produces a retroactive effect (ex tunc) and an erga omnes effect.

If such an action is registered before effective withdrawal, the Court should be able to give its judgment even after the UK loses Member State status, as it is in everybody's best interest for legality to be established in a system based on the rule of law[37]. Even for a non-member UK the ruling of the Court could be relevant, for example, if UK courts had to solve post Brexit cases in which UK's internal law for intertemporal situations would lead to the conclusion that EU law still applies to the grounds of the matter. Since national courts do not have jurisdiction to decide on the annulment of EU law[38], they have to turn to the European Court's jurisprudence.

The same should be the solution for the other direct actions against the EU or its institutions, whether actions regarding EU's institutions' failure to act[39], EU's non-contractual liability[40] or staff cases[41], especially if the plaintiff is a UK national. The main arguments supporting this view are that the UK was a Member State at the time the action was registered, the facts of the dispute occurred prior effective withdrawal and it would be in agreement with the principles of legal certainty and with the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations, ensuring the highest degree of protection for the parties.

The preliminary reference procedure[42] is an instrument of dialogue with the Court of Justice given to the judicial bodies from the Member States. As we have argued, in detail, on another occasion[43], the Court of Justice should answer preliminary references registered and unsolved until effective withdrawal, as the judicial body did fulfil the condition of pertaining to a Member State at the time the reference was registered and an answer may still be necessary to the UK judicial body in order to solve the pending national case. A restrictive interpretation seems excessive and in discord with the two principles mentioned above, especially since the length of the proceedings is at the discretion of the Court of Justice. Otherwise, two references from UK courts registered the same day might find themselves in the absurd situation in wich one receives an answer and the other is rejected for lack of competence, depending solely on the duration of the procedure.

The solution is different for the references registered with the Court of Justice after Brexit, even if they arose from facts that happened before withdrawal, since Article 267 paragraph 1 of the TFEU expressly requires that the reference be made by a court or tribunal of a Member state, meaning that the judicial body would belong to a Member State at the time the reference is made.

As emphasized by other authors[44], it is also our opinion that the date of registration of an action with the European Court should be the moment taken into account in order to establish if the state is still a Member State or not and if the national or the judicial body is still from a Member State or not.

As to appeals against the rulings of the General Court or of the Civil Service Tribunal and applicatons for revision based on Article 44 of the Statute, it is our belief that the UK and its nationals should retain the right to appeal or ask for revision even after effective Brexit, if either were a party to the proceedings[45]. Producing a final solution to a case is essential for legal certainty. Therefore, it is the legitimate interest of the parties to use all the judicial remedies available, especially since they have little influence on the leghts of the procedure and cannot be sanctioned for not having been offered a final ruling before the UK's withdrawal.

If a ruling was given before effective Brexit, EU legal means of enforcement, like the infringement procedure, are no longer available in case the UK does not, after Brexit, give full effect to what the CJEU decided. For example, the UK could be ordered to pay a sum of money as a result of an infringement procedure conducted just before its withdrawal from the EU. If UK refuses to pay, there would only be recourse to means of public international law, ranging from diplomatic means to sanctions[46].

If the other Member States so require, perhaps it could be possible for the UK to accept to keep the obligation to obey any of the three court's rulings that were given in cases in which the UK or a UK national was a party to, as well as to observe the rulings that produce erga omnes effects, which have relevance for UK courts in pending or future cases, by inserting a provision in this respect in the withdrawal agreement, as well as some kind of enforcement means based on this new international treaty.

In the future, the UK might come again under the CJEU's jurisdiction, at least for some types of actions, like a direct action based on contractual liability[47], if it concludes a contract or an international agreement with the EU, as any other third country can. For example, if the UK becomes a member of the European Free Trade Association (EFTA), the Agreement on the European Economic Area already authorises courts and tribunals of the EFTA Member States to refer questions to the Court of Justice on the interpretation of an agreement rule[48].

3. Conclusions

The unexpected result of the referendum held in the UK on 23 June 2017 has given rise to many new challenges for the EU, which has to redefine itself, to regain the trust of EU nationals, to fermly address all the reasons for which it is vulnerable to a certain type of nationalist propaganda and to draw up a new vision for its future[49].

At the same time, Brexit represents an opportunity to witness something without precedent: a Member State's withdrawal from the EU, with all its legal and practical implications. Finding solutions for all the terms of this separation shall obviously be a highly complex task, but the prize shall be, in the end, a better understanding of how Article 50 of the TEU works and the development of EU law.

The study has approached the specific issue of the CJEU's jurisdiction throughout the withdrawal process: before the official notification of the European Council on the basis of Article 50 of the TEU, from the day of official notification until the day withdrawal becomes effective, i.e. EU law ceases to apply for the [45] The exception provided by Article 56 paragraph 3 of the Statute for Member States that were not parties and did not intervene in the main proceedings is not justified for former Member States. The former Member State does not have an interest to appeal anymore, since the obligation to observe the ruling as res judicata and as a part of the EU case-law ceases to exist.

UK and the period after withdrawal. Focusing on the main competences of the courts composing the CJEU, we have highlited to what extent CJEU shall or should retain jurisdiction during these different stages of Brexit and offered our opinion on what legal solutions could be chosen for pending cases in order for all the participants, including UK and its nationals, to obtain the highest legal protection possible.

The research is meant to raise awareness about the legal problems that have been identified, to sparkle more substantial debate, aimed at identifying all the aspects wich may be relevant for CJEU's jurisdiction in relation to a withdrawing state, to stimulate creativity in finding innovative answers to the questions raised and, perhaps, to inspire in determining the future content of the withdrawal agreement.

Further efforts could focus in detail on the infringement procedure, on any of the other direct actions or on the limits of the negotiations between Member States on the matter of CJEU's jurisdiction.

ASPECTS REGARDING THE TERMINATION OF THE LEGAL EFFECTS OF NORMATIVE ADMINISTRATIVE ACTS

Dan Constantin MÂȚĂ*

Abstract

The final cessation of the legal effects of administrative acts can be achieved by annulment and revocation. Both are legal operations that lead to the termination of legal effects of administrative acts. A controversial issue is the one regarding the authorities that may exercise the right of revocation and annulment of an administrative act. As concerns normative administrative acts, the specific manner of termination of enforcement of such acts is to repeal them. On the relationship between repeal on the one hand and cancellation and revocation on the other hand, various contradictory opinions were voiced in the legal doctrine. An aspect with important implications in the administrative practice is the one concerning the possibility of invalidating a normative administrative act before its entering into force. Finally, the article deals with the notion of non-existent administrative acts, which has become a constitutional institution as concerns administrative normative acts.

Keywords: administrative normative act, annulment, revocation, repeal, non-existence

1. Introduction *

The administrative act is one of the palpable forms of public administration bodies activity, coupled with the administrative acts and operations. The administrative act is a manifestation of will with the intention of producing legal effects, namely to create, modify or extinguish legal relations. It is the main form of activity of public administration, the other forms being accomplished for the preparation, drafting or enforcement of administrative acts.

In terms of incidence in the activity of public administration, it was noted that administrative acts are the predominant aspect in the activity of central public administration, while administrative acts and operations are more numerous in the activity of public administration at lower levels[1].

The doctrine defines the administrative act as "the main legal form of activity of public administration bodies, which consists of a unilateral and explicit manifestation of the will to create, modify or extinguish rights and obligations, in the enforcement of public power, under the main control of legality by judicial courts"[2].

The narrow sense of the administrative act is also defined by the legislator in art. 2 para. (1) letter c) of the Administrative Litigation Law no. 554/2004[3], with subsequent amendments. According to this text, the term "administrative act" means "the unilateral act of an individual or normative nature issued by a public authority, in the enforcement of public power, in view of organising law enforcement or of actually enforcing the law that creates, modifies or extinguishes legal relations".

Broadly, by an administrative act, one means any legal act emanating from public authorities under the enforcement of public power[4].

The distinction between the unilateral administrative act of an individual nature and the normative administrative act, performed by the legislator under the Law no. 554/2004, is traditionally accepted in the doctrine of administrative law also. According to the criterion of the extent of legal effects they produce, most authors divide administrative acts by normative administrative acts and individual administrative acts. According to this classification criterion, some authors also mention the internal acts category, their characteristic being that "they are enforced within a public authority or institution, generating effects in relation to the staff of said institution"[5].

Normative administrative acts contain general, impersonal rules, generating judicial effects for an undermined number of subjects. In this category, we mention the following: Government orders; Government decisions; decisions of the local council of a commune, city, municipality or of a Bucharest municipality sector; county council decisions; decisions of the General Council of Bucharest municipality, etc.

Individual administrative acts generate legal effect upon one or more specified subjects. Unlike the first category, these administrative acts are mostly issued by unipersonal bodies: decrees of the Romanian President; Prime Minister's decisions; Ministers orders; acts issued by the heads of central specialised bodies*;* Prefect orders; Mayor provisions; provisions of the county council president. Individual administrative acts may also be acts adopted by collegial bodies of public administration, such as Government decisions or decisions of the local council.

Between normative and individual administrative acts, there are important differences as concerns the moment when the administrative act starts generating legal effects and the termination of such effects. Below we are going to present some controversial issues relating to the termination of the legal effects of normative administrative acts, highlighting the necessary features in connection with individual administrative acts.

2. Manners of termination for the judicial effects of normative administrative acts

The legal relationships that arose on the basis of administrative acts can cease by means of a legal act with equal or greater force or following the occurrence of a material fact.

Legal acts that have the effect of terminating the legal effects of administrative acts are acts of authority ordering the annulment or revocation of the administrative act. Most authors also include suspension in this list[6], although the latter is a way to interrupt the legal effects of an administrative act and not to put a definitive end to them. In case of suspension, the administrative act becomes inapplicable on a temporary and provisional basis, but it continues to exist within the legal domain[7].

The doctrine states that it is necessary to distinguish between the suspension of a legal act and the suspension of its judicial effects. In the first case, the act in question no longer generates any effect whatsoever, while in the latter case only the legal effects of the act in question are interrupted[8].

Suspension occurs when there are doubts about the legality or appropriateness of an administrative act. The suspension can occur only after the entry into force of the act, that is after the moment when it begins to produce legal effects. The suspended administrative act may have a normative or an individual nature[9].

The suspension may occur by law (such as the suspension referred to in art. 123 para. (5) of the Constitution) or due to an act belonging to a public authority (the administrative court, the body which issued the act or the superior body)[10].

The occurrence of a material fact may be a way to terminate legal effects, as a rule, only for individual administrative acts. Among these material facts, the following can be mentioned: death of the subject the act is addressed to, termination of a legal entity, material execution of the act, the completion of a certain period of time[11].

For normative administrative acts, this manner of judicial effects termination is exceptional, being possible only for temporary normative administrative acts "whose legal effects cease by means of completion of the term - the material fact - for which they were issued"[12].

2.1. Annulment

Annulment was defined as the "legal operation consisting of a manifestation of will in order to determine directly the dissolution of an act and therefore the cessation of the definitive effects produced by it"[13]. The object of annulment can be both an individual administrative act and a normative administrative act.

In the literature, there is no single point of view on the relevant authorities certified to cancel administrative acts.

Most authors consider that the right to void administrative acts belongs to both superior administrative authorities and courts[14]. Administrative authorities exercise this right under the administrative subordination report. For example, under art. 28 para. (2) of the Law no. 90/2001 on the organisation and functioning of the Romanian Government and of ministries, as amended and supplemented, the Government is entitled while exercising hierarchical control, "to rescind illegal or inappropriate administrative acts issued by public authorities subordinated to it and to prefects".

Administrative courts exercise the right of annulment of administrative acts under art. 21, art. 52 and art. 126 para. (6) of the Constitution as well as under the Law no. 554/2004. Among the solutions that the administrative court can provide, art. 18 para. (1) of the Law no. 554/2004 also stipulates the annulment of the administrative act, in whole or in part.

Another opinion claims that the annulment must be understood as a way to abolish administrative acts exclusively reserved for the courts, while revocation is a way of abolishing reserved only to an administrative body[15]. To support this view it was stated that the issue is essentially terminological and that this distinction is required for revocation and annulment to acquire "internal consistency, which alone justifies their usefulness"[16]. The doctrine also highlighted the possibility that annulment would remain the responsibility of an administrative body when it is an administrative-jurisdictional authority[17].

We agree with the expressed opinion that it is possible for the annulment of the administrative act to be ruled by the administrative court and, exceptionally, by a jurisdictional-administrative organ. We underline the observation that, through its implications in the administrative and judicial practice, this issue is crucial to the legal regime of the administrative act and it is necessary to form the subject of an explicit provision in the future Administrative Procedure Code.

Within the boundaries of the current regulatory framework, an argument in favour of this theory ensues from the provisions of art. 1 para. (6) of the Law no. 554/2004: "The public authority issuing an unlawful unilateral administrative act may request its annulment to be court, if the act can no longer be revoked since it joined the circuit civil and generated legal effects". Even if by that provision, the legislator took into account the individual administrative acts whose legal effects escaped the field of the administrative law regime[18], we consider it relevant to legally delimitate the judicial operations that the issuing administrative bodies, respectively the administrative court can perform.

The effects of the annulment are different depending on whether the cancellation of the administrative act conducted done for reasons of unlawfulness or for inappropriate reasons.

Authors who claim that annulment can also be ordered by the hierarchically superior body emphasize this distinction given that, in this case, the administrative act may also be cancelled for lack of opportunity. Therefore, if the act was annulled on grounds of illegality, the effects occur both for the future (ex nunc) and for the past (ex tunc). When the act is annulled for reasons of untimely circumstances, the effects occur only for the future (ex nunc) as the act maintains its legal effects so far.

According to the opinion limiting the scope of the bodies that can rule the annulment of the administrative act only to the administrative courts sphere, it is stated that the abolition of the act can only be made on grounds of illegality. One must remember however that following the analysis of administrative case law, the doctrine recognised the possibility of the court to also investigate the timeliness of the administrative act issuance "in the context of finding an excessive enforcement of power by the authority issuing the administrative act"[19].

Regardless of the scope of the authorities that may rule annulment, we believe that it can be taken as a rule of the legal regime concerning the annulment of the administrative act that "the annulment of an administrative action has the effect of nullity of all subsequent legal acts that were conditioned, in terms of their legality, by the existence of the said administrative act"20. One also pointed out that beyond the validity of this principle, in practice there are many difficulties resulting from the absence of procedural means to unconditionally support this effect[21].

2.2. Revocation

Revocation is one way of terminating the legal effects of an administrative act by the express manifestation of will of the issuing administrative body or of the hierarchically superior body[22]. When the body that rules on the revocation is the issuing body of the act in question, revocation is also called retraction or withdrawal[23].

The doctrine emphasizes that revocation should also be understood as a principle of the legal regime of administrative acts. Although not specifically provided for in legislation, this principle is widely recognised in the specialty literature. Given the dominant place of the revocability principle in public law, it is considered that "revocation of administrative acts must be regarded as a manifestation of the public power regime specific to these acts"[24].

Following the approval of the Law no. 554/2004, it was pointed out that for the first time one regulated, in a partial manner, the issue of administrative acts revocation. While regulating the preliminary complaint requirement, art. 7 para. (1) of the law stipulates that "before addressing the competent administrative court, the person who considers himself harmed in his right or

In this regard, it was suggested nearly a decade ago that "the future of the Administrative Procedure Code would expressly enshrine the principle according to which annulment can only be imposed by the court and revocation would devolve exclusively on the issuing authority or on the hierarchically superior authority." in a legitimate interest by means of an individual administrative act, must request the issuing public authority or the superior authority, if any, within 30 days from the notification date of the document, to revoke it, in whole or in part".

Upon analysis of this text, it can be seen that the legislator referred exclusively to individual administrative acts in order to establish the duration of the 30 days term prior to formulating the complaint. Art. 7 para. 11 of the law stipulates that "in the case of the normative administrative act, the prior complaint may be made at any time".

Unlike individual administrative acts, in the case of normative administrative acts, the principle of revocability has an absolute nature[25]. This means that competent public administration authorities may at any time revoke or modify a normative administrative act by issuing another administrative act with a legal force at least equally binding.

The reasons that may entail revocation may be related to the illegality or inappropriateness of the administrative act. Depending on the time when they occur in relation to the issuance of the act, the grounds for revocation may be prior, simultaneous or subsequent.

In general, the legal effects determined by revocation are for the past (ex tunc) when the causes are prior or concurrent, or for the future (ex nunc) when the causes are subsequent to the issuing of the act[26]. As concerns normative administrative acts, it was pointed out that from the perspective of the requirements imposed by art. 15 para. (2) of the Constitution, those provisions may only be revoked with effect for the future (ex nunc), except for the more favourable acts of criminal matter[27].

Another important aspect is that revocation must be understood not only as a way to terminate legal effects but also as a way of abolishing an administrative act. For this reason, the doctrine underlined the impossibility to accept the existence of a partial revocation, the use of this concept within art. 7 para. (1) of the Law no. 554/2004 being considered a "terminological confusion"[28].

Repeal is defined as "the procedure provided for by law for the removal of existing normative acts"[29]. The doctrine mentions repeal as a distinct way for terminating the legal effects of normative administrative acts, included either in the category of annulment[30] or in that of revocation[31]. As concerns this latter perspective, it was mentioned that a particular feature of repeal is the possibility of the repeal being decided not only by public administration government bodies but also by the Parliament. Given the hierarchy of normative acts, the law may at any time repeal a normative administrative act, so unlike revocation which is "a way reserved for the Administration, repeal may be the work of both the Administration and the Parliament"[32].

Repeal is achieved by effect of the law or by adopting or issuing another administrative act of the same level or higher. When the provisions of a previous administrative act are contrary to a new regulation with a judicial force equal or superior, the repeal shall be deemed implicit[33]. Some authors consider tacit repeal as a form of amending normative administrative acts while considering the "constant need of the administrative body to adapt to changes occurring in the economic, social and political life, in order to ensure the public interest"[34].

Its effects are produced only for the future (ex nunc), regardless if it intervenes for inappropriateness or illegality of the administrative act subject to repeal[35].

The Law no. 24/2000 on legislative technique regulations for drafting normative acts, republished[36], amended and supplemented, considers repeal as a "legal event" that may arise after the entry into force of a normative act, together with modification, addition, republication, suspension "or the like" [art. 58 para. (1)].

Repeal may be full, when all legal provisions of the repealed normative administrative act cease, or partial, when certain provisions of that act continue to remain in force[37]. According to art. 64 para. (5) of the Law no. 24/2000 partial repeals "are similar to changes in normative acts, a partially repealed normative act remaining in force through its non-abrogated provisions ". Where successively, several partial repeals are involved, the last repeal will have to cover the whole normative act and not just the texts remained in force.

Repeal is definitive. In this respect, art. 64 para. (3) of the Law no. 24/2000 provides, as a principle, that „it is not admitted to re-enforce the initial normative act by means of repealing a previous repeal".

This rule is allows only one exception, also provided for by art. 64 para. (3) of the Law no. 24/2000:

"the provisions of Government ordinances stipulating abrogation norms that have been rejected by the Parliament".

The doctrine considers that the effect of "regeneration" of the rules repealed also operates in situations that upheld the objection of unconstitutionality of a repealing law or ordinance[38]. Jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court has consistently held the following interpretations: during the period between the entry into force of the repealing law and the publication of the decision finding the unconstitutionality of the repealing norm, the repealed provisions do not generate judicial effects, but after publication of the decision they "re-enter the active foundation of the law".

The Law no. 24/2000 stipulates in art. 58 para. (2) the possibility to repeal a normative act "highly important and complex" during the period between the date of publication in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I and the date set for its entry into force. This possibility is subject to the cumulative fulfilment of three conditions: a) the existence of a thoroughly justified situation (a concept that the Law no. 24/2000 does not define); b) the repeal needs to be ordered by the issuing authority of the act repealed; c) the termination should take effect at the same date as the normative act subjected to this legal event.

2.4. Non-existence

Inexistent administrative acts hold no appearance of legality and they cannot be enforced. By means of this feature, inexistent acts are essentially different from administered acts declared null and void which, enjoying the presumption of legality, generate legal effects until the finding of their nullity[39].

The lack of the administrative act theory is accepted by most authors, being considered a creation of the Romanian administrative legal doctrine between the two world wars[40].

The doctrine distinguishes between lack of fact and legal absence. In the first case, will was never expressed, under any form. In the second case, will was expressed but "the law, considering certain capital flaws affecting it, does not even recognize its existence"[41]. In other words, a distinction was established as concerns material absence, when the act does not exist in reality, and legal absence, when the "illegality is so grave and flagrant that goes beyond mere nullity"[42].

Non-existence can be established by any interested legal subject: the court, other public authorities, addressees of the inexistent act, other individuals and businesses.

Among the cases of non-existence the doctrine retained we can mention: the administrative act was issued under a law repealed; the administrative act was adopted or issued by a body with no material and territorial jurisdiction; the administrative act deals with a dispute incumbent upon the jurisdiction of a court[43].

In the case of normative administrative acts, we can find mentions regarding non-existence among the Constitution stipulations regarding the acts of the Romanian President and of the Government[44]. Thus, according to art. 100 para. (1) of the Constitution, failing to publish the presidential decree in the Official Gazette attracts "the lack of existence of the decree" and in accordance with art. 108 para. (4), failure to publish entails "the lack of existence of the decision or order".

Given these constitutional provisions, it was pointed out that currently non-existence ought to be considered „not only a concept, but also a constitutional institution"[45]. Consequently, it has been shown that failure to publish normative administrative acts attracts the sanction of non-existence should publication of said documents be a condition of validity. It is irrelevant whether the administrative acts in question are adopted or issued by central or local public administration authorities[46].

The doctrine emphasized the practical interest in establishing the lack of existence of an administrative act. Taking into account that acts cannot be challenged in administrative proceedings, attention was drawn upon the fact that "should courts fail to rule on the legality of these acts in a direct way, they can find their non-existence"[47]. The practical difficulties are obvious given that the regulatory framework does not provide (an aspect considered natural from a certain perspective) legal proceedings which have as their object the finding of non-existence of an administrative act[48].

3. Conclusions

Upon analysis, even sequential, of the ways for termination of the legal effects of administrative acts, one can see a need for regulation in this area. Legal doctrine, administrative practice and case law of administrative courts in recent decades have revealed a series of principles and rules of nature to clarify most controversial aspects. However, legislator intervention is imperative given that the administrative act is the main form of activity of public administration. Clarity and stability of the legal regime of the administrative act is likely to contribute not only to increase the efficiency of the administration but also to strengthen the legal safety for the recipients of the administration activity. We hope that in the near future the adoption of the Code of Administrative Procedure will be able to meet these requirements.

ANTITHETICAL PERSPECTIVE OF LEGAL FORMALISM AND LEGAL REALISM

Horatiu MARGOI[*]

Abstract

The necessity to outline a historical context is implicit in study of legal theories of formalism and realism. Understanding those notions presumes also understanding the social and polical context from the time of elaboration.
The main purpose of legal debates about this subject is to identify the preferable path for adjudicating particular cases, between mechanical application of existing legal rules and judge's possibility to use personal values, beliefs or ideological theories. The dispute about the measure of constraint by the text of the law has the aim of achieve the way to better decisions.

Keywords: Legal formalism, textualism, legal realism, political influences, legal decisions.

1. Introduction

The object of the present writing is to study the theoretical debate, between Legal formalists and Legal realists and to identify the definitions given to these notions.

Argumentations used by the adherents of both theories turned to account in understanding why the same laws are interpreted different modes. Legal Formalism and Legal realism are notions which can be examined especially in common law jurisprudence and juridical literature. But the importance and the use of the legal debate can not be neglected by the jurists from any legal system.

Regarding present concerns in our doctrine, the purpose of the article is to try to find answers to question that the judges from Romanian Constitutional and Supreme Courts are actually making the law when they interpret legislation.

Examinated notions are privileged in doctrine of common law community. Over decades there were many important partisans of both theories. Their solid arguments have enriched specialized literature from almost two centuries until these days.

The controversy brought to light interesting points of view concerning interpretation of legislation, especially by acting judges. One of the main gains is that after all the debate it is easier to understand decisions, even try to explain different adjudicating process.

A thorough from year 2008 research in law journals from United States pointed out the increasing number of articles having terms of Legal formalism and Legal realism in their titles. Until 1968, no article was published in a law journal with "formalism" or "formalist" in the title[1]. The first article title to include one of these terms was written by Grant Gilmore in 1968. From 1968 through 1979, nine articles had one of these terms in the title. From 1980 through 1989, the total was twenty-seven; from 1990 through 1999, it was sixty-eight; and from 2000 through 2007, forty-eight.[15] A search for titles with "realism" or "realist" (subtracting other usages of these common terms) shows a similar trajectory, moving from a relatively low frequency from the 1930s through the 1950s (a low of seven and high of sixteen), going up a bit in the 1960s and 1970s (numbering in the low twenties each decade), then jumping to a much higher level in the 1980s (sixty-five), 1990s (eighty-two), and 2000 through 2007 (sixty-four). It has to be mentioned that this counts only titles with a reference to the formalists or the realists. Many more articles (in the thousands) and books mention or discuss them[2].

1.1. Legal Formalism versus Legal Realism

Even before medieval Europe, kings had to show benevolence, merci, and above all, just as a condition to obtain the populace submission. In that period, kings were situated in a precise hierarchy under the religious leader. The common characteristic of that period was that every one of these rulers was supposed to be instituted by God Himself.

With all the achievements of our times, until these days, the religion justifies the limitless power of authorities as it is written in Apostol's Paul Epistle to the Romans (13:1-7)

Submission to the Authorities

Let everyone be subject to the governing authorities, for there is no authority except that which God has established. The authorities that exist have been established by God. Consequently, whoever rebels against the authority is rebelling against what God has instituted, and those who do so will bring judgment on themselves. [3] For rulers hold no terror for those who do right, but for those who do wrong. Do you want to be free from fear of the one in authority? Then do what is right and you will be commended. For the one in authority is God's servant for your good. But if you do wrong, be afraid, for rulers do not bear the sword for no reason. They are God's servants, agents of wrath to bring punishment on the wrongdoer. Therefore, it is necessary to submit to the authorities, not only because of possible punishment but also as a matter of conscience.

This is also why you pay taxes, for the authorities are God's servants, who give their full time to governing. Give to everyone what you owe them: If you owe taxes, pay taxes; if revenue, then revenue; if respect, then respect; if honor, then honor[3].

In order to obtain people's obedience, the rulers, with their authority received directly from God, kings among other duties, had to provide protection and well-being to them and to punish the wrongdoers. Even the equal rights weren't yet gained, and the privileged positions in those societies was obviously, there was an expectation of equitably treatments.

Only in presence of a benevolent ruler, the people will maintain their fidelity and the public welfare could be obtained.

And the solution of the equilibrium was Justice the only value that can provide or establish a fair balance between ruler and populace.

One of the important companions of Louis IX - also known as Saint Louis - Jean de Joinville, a crusader himself, describes the typical instance of king's justice:

During the summer he often went and sat in the woods of Vincennes after Mass. He would lean against an oak tree, and have us all sit round him. All those who had matters to be dealt with came and talk to him, without hindrance from an usher or anyone else. He himself would ask: Is there anyone here who has a case to be settled? Those who had one would stand up and said to them: Everyone be quiet and you will be given judgement, one after the another[4].

This kind of providing public justice was similar to King's Solomon which is also an iconic figure of fair judgement. Another similarity of these two kings was that neither one of them resolved cases based on a precise law. These are examples of how justice can be done analyzing the circumstances, and, regarding the precise context, giving the just resolution, by the entitled authority.

In modern society a new kingdom was established and the ruler of it is the Law. But, this new establishment came with a dispute between general rule of the law and the discretion to make justice of those which are entitled to apply it in this societies.

In Politics, Aristotle states: Rightly constituted laws should be the final sovereign; and personal rule, whether it be exercised by a single person or a body of persons, should be sovereign only in those matters on which law is unable, owing to the difficulty of framing general rules for all contingencies, to make an exact pronouncement[5].

In any democracy, the general rule of law has undisputedly preference, being emission of the people's representatives.

While the legislature generalizes, the judges decide over individual cases, based on the existent law.

The main danger in judicial interpretation in judicial interpretation of any law – is that judges will mistake their own predilections for the law[6]. Originalism does not aggravate the principal weakness of the system, for it establishes a historical criterion that is conceptually quite separate from the preferences of the judge himself[7].

It appears as a justified worry that unloosen discretion of judge could weaken the democratic legitimacy, making necessary a strict mechanism of applying the law.

Simply identifying the danger didn't make it easier to regard laws, reflecting judge's values and goals; often, laws appear rather to reflect compromises achieved by the different parties.

Studies of the legislative process stress the importance of interest groups, pursuing private goals rather than the public interest, in shaping legislation[8].

In this conditions it appeared a favorable ground for contradictious philosophies regarding adjudicating, and how is preferable for judges to decide cases.

One of them is a Formalist theory which considers that law is determinate in rationally, offering to the judge full and sufficient support for his decision.

Legal Formalism theory encourages the judge to adjudicate without prior appealing to moral or political ground using a mechanical deduction as it is found in Beccaria's model of the syllogism[9].

There are frequent situations when, in the law making process not all the legislators think at the same time, at the same things when, or a precise outcome is not prefered by all groups of interests. This kind of situations give birth to a serious question of authority transfer from legislator to judge.

Interpretation is a human enterprise which can not be carried out algorithmically by an expert system on a computer. But discretion can be hedged in by rules and misuse of these rules by a crafty or willful judge then can be exposed as an abuse of power. A more latitudinarian approach to interpretation, by contrast makes it hard to see when the judge has succumbed[10].

Irremovability conjugated with the fact that usually that to be judge is a lifetime option, gives a higher probability for her or him to show faith to a law than the lawmaker who adopted by a political conviction.

Even so, the judicial unanimity is not a guarantee if the interpret a of the law is a Textualist.

Fidelity to the text of law rather than legislator's thought, intention, or expectetion from his creation is decisive for judge.

The beauty and the real meaning of a law consists in legislator's and community's eyes that interprets the text at the moment of adoption. But law are made to be applied by generations.

So, the real meaning of any law must be found at any time in order to exclude any speculative interpretations with their undesirable consequences. The desideratum is to consolidate society's trust in the rule of the law.

Nontextual interpretation makes statesmen of judges, promotes the shifting of political blame from the political organs of government to judiciary. The consequence is the politicizing of judges and a decline of faith in democratic institutions[11].

It is an utopia to think that Textualism will exclude any hesitation in adjucating process. It's purpose is to achieve the necessary predictability in this activity that will gain the necessary trust in the rule of law.

The lack of predictability leads to weakness of any society and the increasing number of laws conduct also to a difficult acces to laws.

It is undisputed true that even a bad law is preffered to a lack of law but this does not mean that we must accept a inflation of rules.

Liberation from text is attractive to judges as well. It increases their ability to do what they think is good.

The quest for nontextual decision-making sometimes become a kind of mystical divination. Preffering the spirit to the letter, we should endlessly create new meanings[12].

The fact that almost every judge uses the phrase "begining with the words of the law" it doesn't mean necessary that judge has textualist convictions. The difference between textualist and non-textualist is determined by grade of remaing fidel to the text.

Textualists are conducted by Justinian's saying A verbis legis non est recendum, meaning not to depart from the words of the law. There is no doubt that we have to understand the context which presumes the purpose of the law.

The difference between textualist interpretation and so-called purposive interpretation is not that the former never considers purpose. It almost always does. The subject matter on the document is the context that helps to give words meaning[13].

But the textualists insist on four limitations[14]:

- The purpose must be derived ftrom the text,not from extrinsic sources
- The purpose must be defined precisely, and not in a fashion that smuggles in the answer to the question before the decision-maker
- The purpose is to be described as concretely as possible, not abstractly.
- Except in the rare case of an obvious scrivener's error, purpose cannot be used to contradict text or to supplement it.

Legal formalists try to impose what the text is really transmiting, not to speculate what it may imply. They adopt the definition of law as a set of rules and principles. This theory puts the law above institutions of political or social nature.

In opposition to legal formalism is the legal realism, starting from the point of view that notes the frequent contradictions of the law and the frequent exceptions from it.

In contrast, "legal realism" is the concept that the law, as a malleable and pliable body of guidelines, should be enforced creatively and liberally in order that the law serves good public policy and social interests[15]. Legal realists often believe that judges should develop and update law incrementally because they, as the closest branch in touch with economic, social, and technological realities, should and can adapt the law accordingly to meet those needs. They often believe judges should have broad discretion and decide matters on an individual basis, because legislatures are infamous for being slow or innate to act to such pressures for change[16].

For the realists, the judge decides by feeling and not by judgment and uses deliberative faculties not only to justify that intuition to himself, but to make it pass muster. They sought to weaken, if not dissolve, the law-politics dichotomy, by showing that the act of judging was not impersonal or mechanistic, but rather was necessarily infected by the judge's personal values[17].

Realists were certainly antiformalists. The doctrine of legal formalism holds that the law is an internally consistent and logical body of rules that is independent from the variable forms of its surrounding social institutions[18].

In doctrine it was said that formalist conceptualism served the end of limiting the scope of law in the sense that it limited occasions on which legal functionaries would assess conduct and therefore occasions on which persons would be called upon to justify their actions before such functionaries[19]. The realist and postrealist ambition, by contrast, is the expansion of these occasions, theory which it is inherent in the anti-formalist's treatment of law as an instrument for achieving social purposes. That treatment postulates a collective purpose or collectively determined end state as an objective, an organic beneficiary of this end-state and someone, presumably the legal functionary, as the formulator and implementor of the objective[20].

The Legal realism's suggestion for legal argumentation has the advantage of ambivalences as solution to the issue of whether judges make or find law. The judges who embrace this theory try to adjudicate without ignorance of the social coutcome and their decisions contain moral value choices.

The realists weigh the social context, case's circumstances, judge's ideologies, and professional consensus affirmingg that study of this elements should increase predictability of decisions[21].

3. Conclusions

The subject of whether judges make or find law will continue to concern legal practictioners and theorists. Judges exercise judgment (they make law) and the realist insight that judges are substantially constrained in that process by the social and institutional context in which they act (they find law)[22]. Confusion about how to understand the relation between these two insights is the most pronounced characteristic of the current state of legal theory[23].

The legal process theorists have moved away attention from essential legal principles to the process by which legal institutions operate. According to legal realist theory, specific rules cannot deduce from abstract legal principles.

Contrary to legal formalist theory, it is sustained that legal rules can be justified if they are created through a legitimate set of procedures by legitimate institutions keeping within their proper roles[24]. This approach to legal reasoning has three different facets: institutional competence, reasoned elaboration, and majoritarianism[25].

If we are trying to analyse in this context we can hope for clarification and enlightenment, but it cannot be found final answers. The analysis may clarify meanings and truths as they arise in different linguistic contexts or in different human situations, but there are no final answers because there is nothing fixed or final about the contexts or situations that we encounter in actual life[26].

DEFINING AGGRESSION IN THE LIGHT OF UNIVERSAL JURISDICTION

Raluca MIGA-BEȘTELIU[*]

Abstract

Historical background of the crime of aggresion, in the light of Nuremberg Principles of 1947 and UN General Asembly Resolution of 1974. The Rome Statute, which created an International Criminal Court, enlists the crime of aggression, as one of the four crimes under its ratione materiae competence. Uunlike the other three crimes, the Rome Statute does not define the aggression, untrusting this task to the Assembly of State Parties, as the most important negociating fora of the Court. The Kampala Amendements, issued as a result of those negotiations, offer a significant distinction between the definition of the crime of aggression, imputable to a person, which fells under the ICC specific competence, and the aggression as an act of a state. The principle of universal jurisdiction, applied in light of the complementarity betwen ICC and national courts, represents an important additional avenue towards impunity, an efective means to discourage aggression, as an individual crime and as a crime of a state.

Keywords: Crimes against peace, crime of aggression, act of aggression, Kampala Ammendements, universal jurisdiction, complementarity of ICC jurisdiction, impunity.

1. Historical Background

The crime of aggression is one of the four „most serious crime(s) of concern to the international community as a hole"[1], which are under the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court in the Hague ("ICC" or "the Court"). The crime of aggression is the only one whose definition was innitialy not included in the Statute (Part 2, Articles 6-8). According to Art.5, a definition of the crime of aggression was to be adopted, by the Assembly of States Parties at a later date, as an Amendement to the Statute[2].

During the first half of the 20th century, mainly after the first World War, numerous atempts did not conduct to the adoption of a legal, generally accepted definition of aggression - neither as a crime of an individual, nore as an act of a State[3].

The concept of aggression was introduced by Article 231 of the Treaty of Versailles in 1919, imposing on Germany the outbreak of the First World War: "Germany accepts the responsibility of Germany and her allies for causing all the loss and damage to which the Allied and Associated Governments and their nationals have been subjected, as a consequence of the war imposed upon them by the aggression of Germany and her allies".

In 1928, a General Treaty for the Renounciation of War was adopted and ratified by a large number of States. The treaty is considered as prohibiting „wars of aggression" and brings to the forfront the importance of an agreed definition of the concept. According to its provisions, state parties engage not to recourse to war and resolve peacefuly all "disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them."

Under the auspecies of the League of Nations, in July 1933, during the Conference for the Reduction and Limitation of Armaments, in answer to a proposal of the Soviet delegation and after intense diplomatic negotiations, a definition of aggression was agreed upon[4], and two Conventions for the Definition of Aggression were adopted and signed in London and ratified afterwards by a number of states, mainly the new States from Europe and Asia[5]. The Conventions defined an act of aggression by the following actions:

„Declaration of war upon another State; invasion by its armed forces, of the territory of another State, with or without a declaration of war; attack by its land, naval or air forces, with or without a declaration of war, on the territory, vessels or aircraft of another State; naval blockade of the coasts or ports of another State; provision of support to armed bands formed in its territory which have invaded the territory of another State, or refusal, notwithstanding the request of the invaded State, to take, in its own territory, all the measures in its power to deprive those bands of all assistance or protection"[6].

[6] Ironically, the only circumstances under which the League of Nations applied its definition of aggression were in December 14, 1939, when the League Assembly decided to expel from the organization a State member, the Soviet Union, following the invasion of Finland.

2. The Nuremberg Principles

In 1945, the London Charter of the International Military Tribunal identified three categories of crimes under the Tribunal jurisdiction: Crimes Against Peace („count 2"), War Crimes („count 3") and Crimes Against Humanity („count 4"). The Charter defined crimes against peace as: „planning, preparation, initiation or waging of a war of aggression, or a war in violation of international treaties, agreements or assurances, or participation in a common plan or conspiracy for the accomplishment of any of the forgoing".

In 1946, the final Judgment of the International Military Tribunal of Nuremberg, defininig the nature of the crimes against peace, stated that "to initiate a war of aggression, ... is not only an international crime; it is the supreme international crime, differing only from the war crimes in that it contains within itself the accumulated evil of the whole".

During the Cold War period, the issue of defining aggression continued to be an imperative, assumed in the fora of United Nations, mainly by the UN General Assembly and the International Law Commission.

In 1950, after the outbreak of the Corean war, debates on defining aggression gain new importance in the UN phora. The main confrontation took place beteen the western governements which intended to qualify North Korea and the Peoples Republic of China as aggressor states, and the Soviet Union. As a reaction, the soviet Government proposed to draft an UN Resolution defining aggression, based on the 1933 Convention.

Following this proposal, the General Assembly decided to entrust the International Law Commission (ILC) with the task to elaborate a definition of aggression. Due to large disagreements among the ILC members, it was decided that „the only practical course was to aim at a general and abstract definition (of aggression)".

In 1967, after several unsuccesessful attempts, the General Assembly created a Special Committee on the Question of Defining Aggression, composed of the representatives of thirty-five UN Member States.

The Special Committee held seven yearly sessions and in1974 recommended to the General Assembly for adoption a definition of aggression. On 14 December 1974, the UN General Assembly adopted by consensus the Resolution 3317/1974. The Resolution identifies seven actions, which decided and perpetrated by the government of a UN Member State, were qualified as aggression. In short, they were formulated as:

(a) Invasion or attack by the armed forces of a State of the territory of another State;(b) Bombardment of another State territory;(c) Blockade of the ports or coasts;(d) Attack by the armed forces of a State on the land, sea or air forces, or marine and air fleets of another State;(e) Uuse of armed forces of one State which are within the territory of another State with the agreement of the receiving State (f) Allowing its territory to be used by other State for perpetrating an act of aggression against a third State (g) Sending mercenaries to carry out acts of armed force against another State."

Since no description was considered to be exhaustive, Resolution 3317 introduces those seven actions by mentioning „such as... ". The formulation leaves open the possibility that in the future other actions might be aided to the list, qualifying as aggression

3. The Kampala Amendements to the ICC Statute.

The ratione materiae of the Court is described in Paragraph 1 of Article 5: „The jurisdiction of the Court shall be limited to the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole. The Court has jurisdiction in accordance with this Statute with respect to the following crimes: (a) The crime of genocide; (b) Crimes against humanity; (c) War crimes; (d) The crime of aggression."

Paragraph 2 of the same Article introduces the exceptionality of the fourth crime under the jurisdiction of the Court; it reads:

„The Court shall exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression once a provision is adopted, in accordance with articles 121 and 123, defining the crime and setting out the conditions under which the Court shall exercise jurisdiction with respect to this crime. Such a provision shall be consistent with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations."

According to Paragraph 2, the ICC can not exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression until a definition of this crime is agreed by the Assembly of State Parties, as the only authority empowered, under Articles 121 and 123 of the Statute, to amend the Statute.

In accordance with these provisions, a Review Conference was held, on June 11,2010, in Kampala,Uganda. The so called „Kampala Amendements" represent the result of the Review Conference. Representatives of 111 States Parties to the Rome Statute agreed by consensus to adopt a Resolution on the definition of aggression and the conditions for the exercise of ICC jurisdiction over this crime. The Resolution introduces an important distinction as the ratione materiae competence of the ICC by identifying and conecting two concepts:

- The crime of aggression, imputable to a person (who falls under the ratione personae competence of the ICC).
- The aggression, as an act of a state, consisting of one or several of the the seven acts, qualified as such by the Resolution 3317 adopted in 1974 by the UN General Assembly.

3.1. The crime of aggression, comited by an individual, is defined in the new Art. 8 bis (1) of the

Rome Statute, adopted at the Review Conference in Kampala, as:

„planning, preparation, initiation or execution, by a person in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a State, of an act of aggression which, by its character, gravity and scale, constitutes a manifest violation of the Charter of the United Nations."

3.2. The act of aggression, as an action attributable to a State, is described in Art.8 bis (2) of the Kampala Amendements, by literally reproducing the seven actions, already described in UN General Assembly Resolution 3317/1974.

Article 8 bis (2) enumerates, as aggression:

a) The invasion or attack by the armed forces of a State of the territory of another State, or any military occupation, however temporary, resulting from such invasion or attack, or any annexationby the use of force of the territory of another State or part thereof;
b) Bombardment by the armed forces of a State against the territory of another State or the use
c) of any weapon by a State against the territory of another State;
d) The blockade of the ports or coasts of a State by the armed forces of another State;
e) An attack by the armed forces of a State on the land, sea or air forces, or marine and air fleets of another State;
f) The use of armed forces of one State which are within the territory of another State with the agreement of the receiving State, in contravention of the conditions provided for in the agreement or any extension of their presence in such territory beyond the termination of the agreement;
g) The action of a State in allowing its territory, which it has placed at the disposal of another State, to be used by that other State for perpetrating an act of aggression against a third State;
h) The sending by or on behalf of a State of armed bands, groups, irregulars or mercenaries, which carry out acts of armed force against another State of such gravity as to amount to the acts listed above, or its substantial involvement therein."

3.3. The exceptionality of the crime of aggression, as compared with the other three crimes under the jurisdiction of the ICC, consists in the closer connection it imposes between: actions of an individual, the national or international criminal law and the issue of the use of force under the Chapter VII of UN Charter.

The crime of aggression is often qualified as „a leadership crime", since the author is usually in a position to "effectively exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a state". Often such a decision implies the use of force in violation of Art. 2.4 of the UN Charter.

It is not surprising that, during the Cold War, in 1974, when adopting the Resolution 3317, the General Assembly also called the attention of the Security Council to the Definition it adopted and recommended that the Security Council should, as appropriate, take account of that Definition as guidance in determining, in accordance with the Charter, the existence of an act of aggression, in light of the Art 39 of UN Charter[7].

Thus, under the Kampala Amendments[8] the ICC can exercise jurisdiction over individuals, responsible for comiting crimes of gression, under one of the following three situations:

- Acts of aggression committed by a state party to the ICC Statute, when the Security Council has made a determination, under Art. 39 of the Charter, that such an act of aggression has been committed by a UN Member State;
- Acts of aggression committed by any state, when the Security Council refers a situation of agression to the Court;
- When the ICC's Pre-Trial Division authorizes the Prosecutor to proceed with an investigation, if no determination is rendered by the Security Council, within six months of an incident.

Those relevant amendments to the Statute, however have not entered into force yet.

4. Complementarity betwen ICC and national courts jurisdiction, an efective means to prosecute international crimes of aggression.

The principle of complementarity between ICC and national courts is advanced in the Preamble of the Rome Statute (Paragraph 10) [9]. First and formoust the Preamble stresses that the four categories of crimes which constitute the competence ratione materiae of the Court must not go unpunished and that their effective prosecution must be assured by measures taken at national level: „Every state has a duty to exercise criminal jurisdiction for crimes of concern to the international community as a whole".

Art. 1 of the Rome Statute establishes expressis verbis the complementarity principle between ICC and national courts as follows:

„...(The Court) shall be a permanent institution and shall have the power to exercise its jurisiction over persons for the most serious crimes...as referred to in

[7] Article 39, in Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, provides that the UN Security Council shall determine the existence of any act of aggression and "shall make recommendations, or decide what measures shall be taken in accordance with Articles 41 and 42, to maintain or restore international peace and security".

[8] No sooner than January 1, 2017.

[9] Statute of the International Criminal Court, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/9 (1998).

this Statute, and shall be complementary to national criminal jurisdictions..."

For effective impunity, the cooperation at international level under the jurisdiction of the ICC should come only as a safeguard, the ICC beeing a court of last resort, exercising its above mentioned jurisdiction only when domestic courts are unwilling or unable to prosecute.

Art. 17 of the Rome Statute offers the full content of the principle of complementality betwen the Court and the national jurisdictions, by defining in its second and third Paragraphs the termes unwillingness and inability of national courts to „genuinly...carry out the investigation or prosecution"of a case.

The situations where a state is unwilling or unable, clearly described in Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Art.17, offer in fact a per a contrario definition of the principle of due process, which is actually the corner stone of complementarity Art. 17.2 provides in full that*:*

„In order to determine unwillingness in a particular case, the Court shall consider, having regard to the principles of due process recognized by international law, wheth er one or more of the following exist, as applicable:

a) The proceedings were or are being undertaken or the national decision was made for the purpose of shielding the person concerned from criminal responsibility for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court referred to in article;
b) There has been an unjustified delay in the proceedings which in the circumstances is inconsistent with an intent to bring the person concerned to justice;
c) The proceedings were not or are not being conducted independently or impartially, and they were or are being conducted in a manner which, in the circumstances, is inconsistent with an intent to bring the person concerned to justice.

Art. 17.3 determines some procedural circumstances which qualify the inability of a national court to offer due process:„... a total or substantial collapse or unavailability of the national judicial system,the State... being unable to obtain the accused or the necessary evidence or testimony or otherwise unable to carry out its proceedings."

5. Universal jurisdiction, an additional avenue towards impunity for crimes of aggression

5.1. The term jurisdiction, synonymous especially in common law systems, with competence, refers to the exercise of a State's authority to prescribe, to adjudicate and to enforce its legislation over persons and territory under its sovereignty. In a narrow meaning, the term jurisdiction points only to the exercise of contentious functions by a State's judicial bodies. In connection with the concept of jurisdiction, a main distinction is well observed between the State's competences over persons and over territory.

In principle, international law rules do not determine the content and exercise of each state's competences over persons, being only concerned with determining the limits of the exercise of such competences by a State, in its relations with other States. Nevertheless, in civil matters, States may agree, under certain conditions, to mutually accept the extension of the exercise of some competences of one State on the territory of another[10].

In criminal matters, on the contrary, the exercise of the State's jurisdiction is limited to national territory, by stringent requirements. Still, a range of exceptional circumstances in international relations, which offer a legal definition seem to have avoided even those strictly protected territorial limits of a State's criminal jurisdiction.

From this perspective, several distinctive principles have received over the years a certain degree of support, from both practice and doctrine: the principle of territoriality which stems directly from the exercise of State's sovereignty and takes into account the exercise of its criminal jurisdiction over all acts committed on the national territory, either by citizens or by foreigners[11]; the nationality principle (or active personality principle) refers to State's competence to submit to its jurisdiction criminal acts perpetrated by its nationals, on the territory of another State[12]; the passive personality principle which refers to the State's criminal jurisdiction over acts committed by foreigners abroad, significantly harmful to the rights or interests of the nationals of the forum; the principle of universal jurisdiction, adopted in time by a considerable number of states, allows the exercise *of any State'*s criminal jurisdiction over particularly serious crimes, such as piracy, slavery, genocide, crimes against humanity, certain war crimes, the crime of aggression, torture, terrorism, etc., committed on the territory of another state, regardless of the nationality of the authors (citizens or aliens alike) or of the victims.

[10] In certain legal relations, with one or more foreign elements (such as the whereabouts of the assets, the venue of the conclusion of the document or the foreign status of one of the parties), the rules of private international law of each State will be applied. Due to the diversity of the solutions of those rules, relatively few principles or customary rules of public international law have been imposed by state practice, concerning the exercise of their jurisdiction in civil matters.

[11] It is based on the State's right and duty to ensure public order within its national borders. Another reason which requires the application of this principle takes into account the management of the evidence, which is facilitated by the fact that authorities it is to be presented to are within the limits of the same territory, versus the venue of the offending acts (forum conveniens).

[12] Due to the diversity of national criminal legislations and constitutional principles for granting citizenship, positive conflicts in the exercise of criminal jurisdiction between several States may occur, when enforcing this principle.

5.2. Universal jurisdiction provides states with the authority, under international law, to prosecute certain universally condemned crimes, committed by foreign citizens, in foreign territory[13]. This principle is not the result of recent developments or initiatives. Equal to the other principles mentioned above, it was primarily imposed by custom, through States' legislation and case law. The importance it gained lately is mainly related to the role it is called to play in order to universally bring an end to impunity, for authors of „most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a hole.

The 1945 Nuremberg precedent accelerated the formation of a customary norm concerning individual responsability and punishment, in the name of universal jurisdiction, for crimes of aggression (identified as „crimes against peace", accordimg to Nurenberg Principles), crimes of war and crimes against humanity.

In the years since the Nuremberg and Tokyo prosecutions, there have been several notable domestic prosecutions based on universal jurisdiction, outside the context of WW II atrocities. A court in the United Kingdom relied on universal jurisdiction authorizing the extradition of former President of Chile, Augusto Pinochet, to Spain for acts of torture committed in Chile in the 1980s; Courts of Denmark and Germany have relied on universal jurisdiction in trying Croatian and Bosnian Serb nationals for war crimes and crimes against humanity committed in Bosnia in 1992; Courts in Belgium and Canada have invoked universal jurisdiction as a basis for prosecuting persons involved in the atrocities in Rwanda in 1994; United States employed universal jurisdiction in prosecuting Charles Taylor Jr. For torture committed in Sierra Leone in the 1990s.

In view of the customary nature of the principle of universal jurisdiction, the duty to prosecute those crimes concerns not only the states in whose territories such crimes have been committed or whose nationals were perpetrators; it applies to all states where perpetrators of such crimes are found.

After the entry into force of the K*ampala* definitions concerning aggression, State Parties to the Rome Statute could exercise universal criminal jurisdiction over the crime of aggression, imputable to a person.

5.3. Concerning the competence of the International Criminal Court to exercise universal jurisdiction, during the negotiations which led to the adoption of the Statute, a large number of states argued that the Court should be allowed to exercise universal jurisdiction. The proposal was defeated due in large part to opposition from the United States. A compromise was reached, allowing the Court to exercise universal jurisdiction only under the following limited circumstances:

- where the person accused of committing a crime is a national of a state party (or where the person's state has accepted the jurisdiction of the Court);
- where the alleged crime was committed on the territory of a state party;
- where the state on whose territory the crime was committed has accepted the jurisdiction of the Court); or,
- where one of the three situations mentioned above are referred to the Court by the UN Security Council.

6. The controvesial side of complementarity in light of the universal jurisdiction principle

6.1. Since the adoption of the ICC Statute, as a consequence of the duty of states to prosecute and the complementarity principle, there has been a proliferation of national laws establishing universal jurisdiction over international crimes. In 2016, in a survey of legislation around the world, Amnesty International identifed 145 countries having authorized their courts to exercise universal jurisdiction over the following crimes within the ICC's jurisdiction: war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide. Five countries (Azerbaijan, Belarus, Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, and Estonia) already have enacted laws giving their courts universal jurisdiction over the crime of aggression. Other countries have adopted laws giving their courts universal jurisdiction over "offenses against international law", under international treaties as well as customary internationa law. If aggression is viewed as falling into that category („offenses against international law"), these countries, too, might exercise universal jurisdiction over the crime of aggression.

6.2. An effect of the complementarity between the ICC and national courts, that should enhance the role of the Court is the risk that in national courts, defendants may not be treated with all the guarantees of due process, compared with those strictly followed by the ICC. In front of the Court, defendants are the beneficiaries of all the protections imposed by the UN International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, „whereas most national criminal-justice systems, by contrast, are far less even-handed , particularly those States have experienced atrocities serious enough to draw the Court's interest"[14].

The question one must answer is the following: is a case admissible under article 17 of the Rome Statute, if the Court has reasons to suspect an unfair national [13] Inter alia, a definition of univesal jurisdiction was adopted by in a Regulation of the United Nations Transitory Authority for Eastern Timor (UNTAES) on the creation of specific courts in Eastern Timor. It provides that : "universal jurisdiction means jurisdiction irrespective of *whether: (a) the(...) offence at issue was committed within the territory of East Timor; (b)the (...) offence was committed by an East Timorese citizen; (c) the victim of the (...) offence was an East Timorese citizen."(*UNTAET Regulation No. 2000/15, available at http//www.un.org/peace/etimor/untaetR/Reg0015E.pdf.

[14] See K.J.Heller,The shadow side of complementarity:the effect of article 17 of the Rome Statute on national due process, in Criminal Law Forum (2006) - Springer 2006. A particular situation in Sudan is described by the author, as an exemple: routinely sentences, unrepresented defendants setenced to death after secret trials,involving confessions obtained through torture, practiced by the Specialised Courts in which Sudan intended to prosecute those responsible for the atrocities in Darfur.

proceeding by the State asserting jurisdiction? Since, according to the Statute the Court has the competence to decide under such circumstences, it may quualifiy a State as unwilling to investigate or prosecute. In this respect,one should focus mainly on the conditions of independence or impartiallity (Art. 17.2.c) of the courts.The opinion has also been expressed that, if due process is not guaranteed, the State should be considered also unable (Art.17.3) to exercise jurisdiction over a particular case[15].

This is also the position taken by the authors of the Informal Expert Paper, commissioned in 2003 by the Office of the ICC Prosecutor, on complementarity[16]. According to this report, the Court should take into account a State's „legal regime of due process standards, rights of accused, and procedures" when determining whether it is able to investigate and prosecute. To avoid abuses, States which exercise universal jurisdiction have an obligation to ensure that adequate safeguards are established.

6.3. In criminal matters, the crime of aggression notwithstanding, one has to take into consideration that there might always be „another side of the coin". Sometimes, states might have an interest, in the name of complementarity, to establish universal jurisdiction over the crime of aggression, in order to shield the perpetrators of such a crime from the jurisdiction of the Court.

6.4. Under a different perspective, exercise of universal jurisdiction by national courts might also give rise to some other abuses. Such are the concerns perceived, for instance, in the Joint Separate opinion of three Judges of the International Court of Justice (Higgins, Kooiman and Burgenthal) in the Arrest Warrant case (April 11, 2000)[17], as well as those voiced in a document drafted by a Group of Scholars for the Pace in the Middle East[18]. In short, some of these limitations considered as safeguards are proposed: establishing a nexus between the state and the alleged transgression; providing mechanisms to prevent politicization; recognizing qualified immunities for certain governmental officials; requiring prior exhaustion of adequate and available domestic remedies, in the country of origin.

7. Some other reasons of concern in the light of the Kampala Amendements?

During the negociations of the Amendements in Kampala, US representatives expressed serious reservations, due to the before mentioned trend: the concern that many states will enact legislation, under the principle of universal jurisdiction, enabling domestic courts to prosecute crimes of aggression, commited by non-cytizens, outside the state territory.

In order to prevent that US citizens be prosecuted abroad for crimes of aggression, US and other countries pressed for some restrictive interpretations of the Amedemets. The compromise resulted in the adoption of an accopaning interpretative document, namely an Undersanding[19]. The document stipulates that „it is understood that the amendments shall not be interpreted as creating the right or obligation to exercise domestic jurisdiction with respect to an act of aggression committed by another State.

CERTAIN ISSUES ON THE DETENTION OF AN INDIVIDUAL

Andrei MURARU*

Abstract

The dynamics of the law is natural in the existence and evolution of the state legal system. The law has to be actual, always actual, if not in a perfect harmony, at least in an efficient harmony with the social status of a country. The constitution, by being itself a law, more precisely a fundamental law, has to comply with the existences of the system dynamics. But not in any way. In order to fulfill its regulating and especially, civilizing role, constitutional revisions have to meet certain substantiations of content and legislative technique, but also certain demands of constitutionalism. One of these demands is that the revision (amendment, supplementation, etc.) of a constitutional text is not a step backwards as regards democracy and rule of law. The efficiency of constitutional revisions is questionable if they restrict or remove classic rules and principles such as: freedom respect, property respect, free access to justice, earned rights, presumption of innocence.

Keywords: constitution, constitutionalism, constitution primacy, revision, fundamental rights and freedoms, guarantees

1. Introduction

1. The re-discussion of theoretical and practical issues on the detention of an individual, as a preventive measure, is relevant because we find ourselves in a period where one of the important matters which are in the attention of public authorities and public opinion is the revision of the Constitution.

There is no doubt that proposals for improvement of Title II of the Constitution, called Fundamental rights, freedoms and duties are also targeted by the efforts on the Constitution revision.

In what concerns the place of the regulations on the detention of an individual, in Title II, we recall some of the literature findings[1], namely:

a) Art. 23 of the Constitution regulates individual freedom and security. There are two categories in close connection expressing distinct legal realities. Individual freedom is human freedom to move freely, to think and speak freely. If the individual violates the laws of the state, the state repression is entitled to act. Notwithstanding, the action of the state against the individual is conditioned by certain rules which protect the individual and stop arbitrary actions of public authorities. These rules are provided by art. 23 and concern the detention of an individual, the arrest of an individual, the presumption of innocence, certain rules on criminal trial. All these are in fact guarantees in favor of the freedom of individual and form the category of individual security.

b) The security of individual in the constitutional context is traditionally considered as being part of the guarantees of the fundamental rights. And art. 152 para. (2) of the Constitution provides that „ no revision shall be made if it results in the suppression of the citizens' fundamental rights and freedoms, or of the safeguards thereof". Therefore, we will note that certain provisions of the constitution revision drafts which try to amend current rules on the detention of an individual have to be removed.

c) The detention of an individual, as a theoretical and practical matter, concerns both criminal science and constitutional law due to the fact it is a dimension of human rights and human rights are by excellence a subject of study for constitutional law, and of course, a subject of study for other disciplines. This explains why detailed explanations are found both in criminal science and in constitutional law books. No doubt, constitutional explanations must largely prevail due to the fact that, in the legal pyramid, the Constitution ranks the supreme position.

2. Concepts, correlations, doctrine

Therefore, it is shown that detention is a preventive measure, including deprivation of freedom, which can be ordered by the prosecutor or by the criminal investigation body[2].

Furthermore, the detention as a preventive criminal procedural measure is explained, being a measure whereby the person suspected of having committed an offense provided and punished by the law, is deprived of freedom by the competent authorities, on a strictly limited term[3].

The explanation of the detention is performed with details in the criminal procedure books.

Therefore Grigore Theodoru, under title the concept of procedural measures and their importance[4] establishes, among others, the following: public authorities may use coercive means in order for the normal performance of the criminal trial and for the fulfillment of its scope; the constraint may consist in the deprivation of freedom of these individuals, in the restriction of their freedom or of other rights and freedoms; these measures prevent absconding prosecution and trial, as well as execution of prison sentence; although individual freedom is established by the Constitution, art. 53 of the Constitution allows, in order to protect national safety, public order, criminal investigation performance, the restriction of its exercise, subject to proportionality and to the guarantee on the existence of the right or freedom; procedural coercive measures can only be taken during criminal trial; by representing a deprivation or restriction of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution, criminal procedural measures have an exceptional nature; the law has to establish their maximum term, to provide the possibility of withdrawing them and to regulate the cases when they cease de jure; in case of flagrant offenses, the detention measure adoption is mandatory. The same author[5] classifies criminal procedural measures in personal and actual, and the first category includes: deprivation of freedom (detention, arrest), the obligation of not leaving the locality or country, to undergo a medical treatment.

By analyzing the concept and the categories of preventive measures, Grigore Theodoru[6] shows that: according to art. 136 (Code of Criminal Procedural of 1968) para. (1), preventive measures are coercive instruments provided by the law which can be taken by criminal prosecution bodies, judges and courts of law, in order to ensure the good performance of the criminal trial or to prevent the absconding of the defendant from criminal prosecution, trial, or from the execution of sentence; this is why they are called preventive measures and exist in all law systems; the establishment of measures with different individual freedom restriction is recommended in the adoption of preventive measures; the law has to establish the legal guarantees required in order to prevent any abuse in taking and maintaining preventive measures; such guarantees are provided by art. 23 of the Constitution, in art. 5 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (1968), etc.

In what concerns the procedural nature of preventive measures, Grigore Theodoru concludes that: deprivation of freedom as preventive measure has a procedural nature; it is taken only within criminal trial; preventive detention is optional; deprivation of freedom is an exception to freedom rule[7].

Ion Neagu și Mircea Damaschin analyze the detention in the large context of procedural measures[8], in section on preventive measures. By analyzing critically the opinions already expressed in the doctrine, Ion Neagu and Mircea Damaschin formulate a more concise definition according to which preventive measures are coercion institutions which can be ordered by criminal judicial bodies, for the good performance of criminal trial and the fulfillment of the scope of the actions carried out in the criminal trial[9]. The author believes that procedural measures: have a nature adjacent to the main activity; have a temporary nature; have coercive purpose although not all measures entail the existence of coercion (protection measures or safety measures of medical nature); in special situations they have protective and not coercive purpose.

In what concerns the classification[10] of procedural measures, Ion Neagu notes the existence of the following: personal or actual procedural measures (on the basis of values); measures which concern the person of the suspect or defendant (detention, arrest) and measures which can be taken on other individuals (sequestration, protection of minors) – on the basis of the individual; measures which can be taken only in the criminal prosecution stage (detention); measures which can be taken only in the judgment stage (removal from the court room); measures which can be taken in both situations (arrest, sequestration) – on the basis of the stage of the criminal trial; coercive measures (arresting, sequestration) and protection measures (notification to the protection authority) – on the basis of the scope. By analyzing the preventive measures, Ion Neagu and Mircea Damaschin note that their legal regulations led to cases of non-unitary application of the criminal procedural law, causing the High Court of Cassation and Justice to make certain decisions in the settlement of second appeals in the interest of the law promoted in this field[11]. The detention is deemed a preventive measure, together with the arrest.

Due to the fact preventive measures entail individual freedom, they can be ordered if the following general conditions are met at the same time:

- there are substantiated evidence or indications which lead to the reasonable suspicion that an individual committed a crime;

− preventive measures are required for the good performance of the criminal trial, for the prevention of suspect's or defendant's absconding from criminal prosecution or judgment or for the prevention of another offense;

− there is no ground to prevent the initiation or pursuing of the criminal action;

− the preventive measure should be proportionate with the gravity of the accusation brought to the person this measure is taken against and should be required for the fulfillment of the scope pursued by ordering this measure;

− the suspect or defendant must be heard in the presence of a lawyer of their own choosing or appointed ex officio.

According to all the criminal procedural rules, these general conditions must be fulfilled for any of the preventive measures provided by the law[12].

By analyzing the detention, Ion Neagu and Mircea Damaschin[13] believe: this is the easiest of the measures involving freedom deprivation; as a preventive measure differs from three similar concepts, namely: criminals capturing under art. 310^2 and art. 61 para. (2); the individual detention by the police either for identity checking or for the fulfillment of an warrant for arrest under art. 266 para. (1); the prohibition to leave the courtroom until the end of the judicial investigation (in this respect, art. 381 para. (9) provides that heard witness shall remain in the room at the disposal of the court until the completion of the judicial investigation carried out in the respective session)

The conditions which must be fulfilled at the same time in order for this measure to be adopted are, according to art. 209 para. 1, in connection to art. 202, the following:

− there are substantiated evidence or indications which lead to the reasonable suspicion that an individual committed a crime;

− preventive measures are required for the good performance of the criminal trial, for the prevention of suspect's or defendant's absconding from criminal prosecution or judgment or for the prevention of another offense;

− there is no ground to prevent the initiation or pursuing of the criminal action;

− the preventive measure should be proportionate with the gravity of the accusation brought to the person this measure is taken against and should be required for the fulfillment of the scope pursued by ordering this measure;

The detention can be ordered both by the criminal investigation body and by the prosecutor. If the detention was ordered by the criminal investigation body, this is bound to notify immediately and by any means the prosecutor on the preventive measure adoption.

As a transposition of the fundamental principle of the right of defense in this field, the judicial body which adopted the measure is bound to notify the suspect or defendant, before the hearing, that he is entitled to be assisted by a lawyer of his own choosing or appointed ex officio and that he is entitled to make no statements, except the provision of information on his identity, by making him aware of the fact that what he says may be used against him. According to the provisions of art. 209 para. (2), the detained person shall be promptly informed in a language which he understands, on the crime he is suspected for and the reasons of the detention.

The detention measure can take no more than 24 hours. According to previous regulation, the term throughout which the person was deprived of freedom following the administrative measure of being taken to the police department, provided by art. 31 para. 1 letter b of Law no. 218/2002 on the organization and functioning of the Romanian Police was deducted from the aforementioned term.

According to current regulation, art. 209 para. (3), the term required for taking the suspect or defendant to the office of the judicial body is not included in the term of the detention.

According to art. 209 para. (10) the detention measure shall be ordered by ordinance, which shall include the grounds of the measure, day and time when the detention begins, as well as day and time when the detention ends.

Throughout the term of the detention, the criminal prosecution body can conclude that the conditions for preventive detention are concluded, case in which the prosecutor shall notify the judge of rights and freedoms in order to take the preventive detention measure in what concerns the detained suspect, at least 6 hours before the expiry of the retention term.

3. Constitutional regulations

In what concerns the detention of an individual, the Constitution, in art. 23, establishes the following:

− it shall be permitted only in the cases and under the procedure provided by law;

− it shall not exceed 24 hours;

− any person detained shall be promptly informed, in a language he understands, on the grounds for his detention;

− the release of a detained person shall be mandatory if the reasons for such steps have ceased to exist, as well as under other circumstances stipulated by the law.

The rule of art. 24 of the Constitution according to which all throughout the trial, the parties shall have the right to be assisted by a lawyer of their own choosing or appointed ex officio shall be added.

The constitutional text is clear and definite. No detention can last more than 24 hours. Upon the expiry thereof, the authority which ordered the detention has two options: the release; the obtaining of a preventive detention warrant.

It is important to note that the constitutional provision establishes the maximum term of the detention, but this does not mean that the person must be retained the respective number of hours, regardless of the situation. The authority which ordered the detention shall be entitled to maintain this status only for the time required to clarify the circumstances leading to it.

Therefore, the detention can last one hour, seven hours, etc. The legal liability of the authority for an unjustified term of the detention is out of question.

This is the reason why we will note the legal details in the field.

Legal regulations

We can add here several rules provided by the Code of criminal procedure, namely: the conditions which have to be fulfilled for the ordering of this measure are provided by art. 143 para. 1 and 2; the detention can be ordered both by the criminal prosecution body and by the prosecutor; it is required to notify the defendant that he is entitled to hire a lawyer and not to make any statement, by drawing his attention on the fact that what he declares can be used against him; the grounds of the detention are made available; the detention measure is ordered by ordinance, which has to provide the day and hour the detention began, and the release ordinance has to provide the day and hour the detention ceased; preventive detention measure can be taken throughout the detention term, under the terms of the law; the deputy or senator cannot be retained without the consent of the Chamber he is part of, after hearing him; in case of flagrant offense, they can be retained and the Ministry of Justice shall notify immediately the President of the Chamber on the detention; if the Chamber thus notified finds that there are no grounds for detention, it shall order the annulment of this measure (Ion Neagu criticizes this regulation in op. cit. p. 466).

4 Certain references to the Constitution revision draft which was discussed by the Constitutional Court of Romania and then in the doctrine[14] are also of great interest.

Art. 23 of the Constitution regulates individual freedom, thus establishing in para. (1) that individual freedom and security of a person are inviolable.

Paragraph (3) of this article establishes that „Detention shall not exceed 24 hours"

The President of Romania, in the exercise of the right provided by art. 150 (1) of the Constitution, upon the proposal of the Government, initiated the revision of the Constitution,[15] and in this context the revision of art. 23 para. (3). Therefore, the legislative proposal established that paragraph (3) shall read as follows: "Detention shall not exceed 48 hours." Therefore, the extension of the term of the detention from 24 hours to 48 hours was proposed.

Under art. 146 letter a) final thesis of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court pronounced on the revision initiative in favor of the legislative proposal, namely: the new wording of the constitutional text, by regulating the maximum term of detention, cannot be construed as resulting in the suppression of the guarantees of a fundamental right under art. 152 para. (2) of the Constitution; the proposed amendment responds to the obligation of the state to ensure a fair balance between the interest of defending fundamental rights of the individual and the interest of defending the rule of law, by taking into account the issues raised in practice by the current detention term, in what concerns the activity of the criminal prosecution bodies; the detention of a maximum term of 48 hours is justified for the effectiveness and efficiency of the measure.

The view of the Constitutional Court can not be deemed as resulting from a thorough examination of the doctrine, legislation and case law in the field. We will try to motivate this statement.

We hereby recall that personal freedom represented the subject of thorough analyses in the drafting of art. 23 of the Constitution (1990-1991), as well as in the Constituent Assembly[16]. This should be recalled because the historical method was and remains one of the main methods of interpretation of legal regulations.

In the Theses of the Constitution Draft submitted to the Constituent Assembly (Thesis 2) the Drafting Committee proposed the following wording:

"The right to personal security and freedom is guaranteed.

Prosecution, detention or arrest of an individual shall be permitted only in cases expressly provided by the law and in strict compliance with the legal procedure established for this purpose.

Detention shall not exceed 24 hours."[17]

The Constitution Draft submitted to the Constituent Assembly established the following:

"(1) Individual freedom and security of a person are inviolable.

(3) Detention shall not exceed 24 hours."

The debates held on the content of individual freedom and safety of a person explain history and motivate solutions. We believe that the maintenance of the view of the Drafting Committee submitted by one of its reporters presents undoubtedly an historical interest, meaning that: "It may be that in 2-3 years, when we improve justice apparatus, prosecution apparatus, therefore, everything that works in the judicial systems, these terms are exaggerated. We may ask the judges to pronounce a ruling in less than two months, for example. This may happen when we have everything required for a good functioning of justice. Therefore – this observation must be considered from now on– we do not have to brake, by means of the Constitution, the possibility that the legislation responds as best as possible to the requirements for the protection of life and freedom of person. This is why we, the committee, we dare to ask you to keep the text proposed by us"[18]. Therefore, basically, these discussions explained the constitutional provisions and opened perspectives for public freedoms.

Conclusions

I always considered that the provisions of art. 23 are earned rights, a victory of reason against abuses and dictatorship, a victory against the police state. The aforementioned legislative proposal has to be regarded as a step forward or as a step backwards?

A potential convincing answer to this question entails the elucidation of two issues:

1) Which is the legal nature of reason; 2) If the provisions of art. 152 para. (2) of the Constitution are applicable in this case[19].

1.1 After a thorough examination of art. 23 of the Constitution, it can be noted that two legal categories are regulated, which are undoubtedly connected but not the same, namely individual freedom and security of person. If freedom concerns physical liberty of a person, his right of acting and moving freely, of not being held in slavery or in any other servitude, of not being detained or arrested, except in cases and according to the forms expressly provided by the Constitution and laws, the security of a person represents all the guarantees which protect the person in cases where public authorities, in the application of the Constitution and the laws, take certain measures which concern individual freedom, guarantees which make sure that these measures are not illegal. This system of guarantees allows the repression of antisocial acts, but, at the same time, provides innocents the required legal protection[20].

A first finding is required: the content of the security of a person includes all the rules in the field of art. 23 of the Constitution: detention, arrest, hearings, procedures, presumption of innocence, etc. Therefore, art. 152 para. (2) of the Constitution concerns the security of the person as a whole, any revision of components being prohibited.

By analyzing briefly the doctrine we find that a valuable work[21] shows, among others, the following: the right to freedom and security is an inalienable right, which no one can give up, which concerns all persons; the European Court of Human Rights often stated in its case law, among others, that the main scope of art. 5 is the protection of individual against arbitrary actions of state authorities; the circumstances under which a person can be legally deprived of freedom have to receive a narrow and rigorous interpretation, due to the fact they are exceptions on a fundamental guarantee of individual freedom; deprivation of freedom can have direct and adverse consequences on the exercise of other individual rights and freedoms; the detention of the persons to be prosecuted should not be a rule; the right to freedom and the right to security, taken together, represent a fundamental right that takes no alternative – there is the status of freedom or the status of deprivation of freedom, etc.

Another successful work shows that "the guarantee of the substance", the respect of the essential content or of the essence of fundamental rights and freedoms is a major idea of comparative constitutional law which is recorded in modern constitutions[22]. The thesis according to which the security of the person falls into the category of guarantees of individual freedom is generally recognized, in this respect, the scientific works of real value being interesting and showing among others, the following: "The concept of security does not mean that the state can never prejudice individual freedom, but it does mean that guarantees have to be granted in this field to the individual in order for these prejudices not to be illegal... . Protective principles mainly consist in the organization of a criminal procedure which ensures not only the repression of crimes and offenses, but also grants innocents certain guarantees[23]. "Together with the term of individual freedom, the constitutional text also uses the expression of security of person. The security of the person consists of all the guarantees provided by the law whereby the person is protected if the state takes measures of deprivation of freedom against the respective person"[24]; "the meaning of the concept of security of person expresses the guarantees which

[18] Ioan Muraru, in Genesis, p. 347.

[19] According to this article, para. (2) no revision can be performed if it results in the suppression of fundamental rights and freedoms of the citizens or of the guarantees thereof (subl. ns.).

protect the person in case the state orders measures of deprivation of freedom"[25].

The Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union must also be taken into account, by providing in art. 6 the following: "any person has the right to freedom and security". The security of a person is therefore considered a fundamental right[26].

Given all these brief remarks, we can conclude the following: the security of a person which is often considered a fundamental right represents a guarantee of the fundamental rights in the Romanian Constitution system; all components of the security of person, as provided by art. 23 of the Constitution, form a single and indivisible block, therefore, the revision of a component is not allowed due to the fact it affects the whole block; the legislative revision proposal comes into conflict with art. 152 para. (2) and therefore it cannot be performed.

THE RIGHT TO HEALTH PROTECTION VERSUS ECONOMIC FREEDOM

Cristinel Ioan MURZEA[*]
Oana SARAMET[]

Abstract

Our assertion is that our freedom exists and can be manifested as long as we do not infringe upon anyone else's freedom. But is this contention still valid when we aim to protect our health by exercising our rights in this direction and, in the process, we encroach on another fundamental right such as economic freedom? The establishment, through fundamental national and international regulations, of the right to health preservation, entitles every human being to exist, to develop, as health, alongside life, is a goal that each and every one of us strives for. However, exercising economic freedom ensures our development and the chance to lead a better life. In this article our focus is on the analysis of some aspects regarding the limitations of exercising such fundamental rights.

1. Introduction

Law No. 349/2002 on the prevention and control of the effect of tobacco product use[1], as provisioned by article 1, adopted some measures regarding the prevention and control of the use of tobacco products by such means as: smoking bans in closed public spaces, tobacco product warning labels, organizing awareness and education campaigns for the population in order to protect the health of smokers and non-smokers from the harmful effects of smoking. We consider that this legislative act, which was passed during the pre-accession period to the European Union, precisely in order to be in full accordance with Directive 2001/37/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 5 June 2001 on the approximation of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the Member States concerning the manufacture, presentation and sale of tobacco products[2], outlined, for the first time, a fairly comprehensive legal framework to ensure the prevention and control of the effects of tobacco product use, with a view to guaranteeing the fundamental right to health protection[3].

Amendments and additions were brought to this law by means of primary legislative acts, specifically one Government emergency ordinance, two Government ordinances issued on the basis of an enabling law and six laws, two of which approved the two ordinances but they also brought amendments and additions to them. The last two laws were adopted by the Parliament of Romania in 2016, mostly in order to transpose into national law Directive 2014/40/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 3 April 2014 on the approximation of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the Member States concerning the manufacture, presentation and sale of tobacco and related products and repealing Directive 2001/37/EC, published in the Official Journal of the European Union No L 127, of 29.04.2014, the transposition deadline being 20 May 2016, according to article 29, section 1 of the Directive. The measures adopted by the European law and, consequently, by the national law were also determined by the need to guarantee a high level of health-related quality of life as well as consumer protection, without overlooking the observance of other fundamental, acknowledged and secured rights of the citizens of the European Union member states, and had to be consonant with the well-functioning of the European single market[4], by also taking into account the latest scientific research pointing to the harmful effects of tobacco use on health and to the health benefits of using electronic cigarettes instead of tobacco[5]. At point 59 of its Preamble, the above mentioned Directive admits that this legislative act will impact upon a series of fundamental rights, which does not however entail that the obligation to observe the fundamental rights and legal principles established by the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union will be modified.

The research that has been conducted so far revealed, beyond a shadow of a doubt, the harmful effects of tobacco use not only on the health of those who smoke these products but also on the health of those who passively inhale the toxic cigarette smoke[6]. Unfortunately, the studies revealed the great number of smokers but also of those who, rather paradoxically, support the increase of tax on tobacco products or who support the banning of cigarette advertisements in stores or who advocate for the banning of on-line selling of cigarettes. Moreover, among other aspects[7], it has been noted that in spite of the European Union's "consistent policy of tobacco control", structured on several segments, smoking remains "the most widely-spread avoidable cause of death in Europe, amounting to approximately 700 000 deaths per year"[8].

In these studies, there were also evaluations of the economic impact of tobacco use with regard to the expenses incurred by the financial support of this habit, but also for the prevention and control of the consequences that tobacco use has on health, costs that are sustained not only by those suffering from such illnesses and/or by their families, but also by the public health systems.

Nonetheless, one must not disregard the fact that the adoption of any prevention and control measures of tobacco use, its decrease in sales, the actual reduction of tobacco use, are not factors that economically affect businesses, the veritable industry which is organized and operated in connection with tobacco use.

But however affected the tobacco industry and commerce might be, thus even affecting a fundamental right stipulated by article 45 of the Constitution of Romania, republished, these are not comparable, in our opinion, to the impairment of the health of human beings and, implicitly, of their right to health protection, established by article 34 of the same instrument.

Bearing this situation in mind, one can only wonder what prevails in this world whose most prominent feature is mercantilism and where the fundamental rights of any human being are perceived as a luxury by some - is it the right to health preservation, to health care or the liberty to conduct economic activity?

2.1. Aspects regarding the right to health protection

Health is "a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity"[9], as the very Constitution of the World Health Organization define the state that we pursue and to which every individual is entitled at any moment of their existence. However, through the same act, the World Health Organization admitted, as early as 1946, that the right to health cannot be viewed solely as an individual right of every human being as it also has a collective aspect due to the fact that states are, first and foremost, the ones that have to contribute actively to assure the health of their citizens, without any discrimination whatsoever, by means of coherent policies and strategies.

Hence, in the Preamble of this Constitution, it is acknowledged that "the enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health is one of the fundamental rights of every human being without distinction of race,

[5] In this direction, article 1 of Law no.349/2002, as amended in 2016, provides that the object of this legislative act consists in the adoption of „various measures regarding the prevention and control of tobacco product use, by completely banning smoking in all closed public spaces, in the closed spaces from workplaces and on playgrounds, by labelling tobacco product packages, by carrying out awareness and education campaigns for the population, by informing consumers of the tobacco products that they intend to purchase by indicating the tar, nicotine and carbon monoxide content in the final products, by some measures regarding the use of ingredients in tobacco products". The same article also identifies the goal pursued by the adoption of such measures, namely a threefold goal: the protection of the health of smokers and non-smokers from the damaging effects of smoking, preventing the spread of smoking among minors and ensuring an adequate quality of life for the Romanian population, respectively.

[9] This definition is from the Preamble of the Constitution of the World Health Organization which was adopted at the International Health Conference and signed on 22 July 1946, and entered into force on 7 April 1948. Amendments were adopted by the World Health Assemblies and these resolutions came into force between 1977 and 2005. religion, political belief, economic or social condition". Conversely, it is claimed that "the health of all peoples is fundamental to the attainment of peace and security and is dependent upon the fullest co-operation of individuals and States", and that "the achievement of any State in the promotion and protection of health is of value to all".

The right to health and its preservation is established by international regulations even prior to the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights[10], which does not expressly allot an article to this right. However, by the provisions of article 25 on the right to a satisfactory living standard, the Declaration stipulates that one of the defining components of this right is health care provision, necessarily including medical care among the issues of interest. Then, article 12 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights[11], settles the two dimensions of the right to health care by clearly stipulating in paragraph (1) that all countries should recognize the right of every individual to benefit from the best attainable physical and mental state. Paragraph (2) of the same article conveys the collective dimension of this right and indicates several necessary measures that the states should adopt with a view to fully exercise this right.

From the aforementioned issues, one can consider the right to health and to its protection[12] not exclusively from the perspective of this right because many of its other facets can be highlighted[13]. Hence, there is the medical aspect owing to which the international community, by the organizations founded precisely for this aim, such as the World Health Organization, and by their specifically established attributions[14], but mostly the states have to contribute to the provision of hygiene and public health by systematizing medical assistance and the medical insurance system as well as by devising measures for the protection of the physical and mental health of all individuals, according to the provisions of Article 35 (2) and Article 35 (3) of our Constitution[15].

Moreover, this right has a dimension which is echoed by the right to a satisfactory living standard with regard to health, medical care, health insurance policies that every human being should benefit from, a view which is also shared by the provisions of article 47 of the Constitution of Romania, republished.

But the consideration of this right from the point of view of the right to a healthy environment, as the health of human beings is totally dependent upon the health of their environment, should not be disregarded. Hence, reasserting and aiming to expand the Declaration issued at the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment adopted in Stockholm on 16 June 1972, the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, through the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development16, which was adopted during the proceedings of the conference held between 3 June and 14 June 1992, stated in its first principle that people "are entitled to a healthy and productive life in harmony with nature". Also, in Principle 14, the same organization demanded the states to "cooperate effectively for discouraging and preventing the movement and transfer to other states of any activities and substances that could cause severe

[10] This Declaration was adopted by the UN General Assembly on 10 December 1948, by its Resolution 2171 A/III. Romania signed the Declaration on 14 December 1955, when it became member of the United Nation Organization, as it is settled by the Resolution R 955 (X) of the UN General Assembly.

[11] This Covenant was adopted and opened for signature by the United Nations General Assembly on December 16th 1966, Resolution 2200 A (XXI), entered into force on January 3rd 1976, according to art 27. Romania has ratified the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights on October 31st 1974, by Decree no 212 which was published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no 146 from November 20th 1974.

[14] Hence, for instance, in article 2 of its own Constitution, WHO has provided some of its functions such as: to act as the directing and co-ordinating authority on international health work, to establish and maintain effective collaboration with the United Nations, specialized agencies, governmental health administrations, professional groups and such other organizations as may be deemed appropriate, and to assist Governments, upon request, in strengthening health services.

[15] În Fact Sheet No. 31 from 2008, WHO identified a number of 115 states in the Constitutions of which the right to health or the right to health protection is regulated, and other six states identify, by means of their constitutional norms, the duties of the state regarding the development of public medical care services or regarding the allocation of funds from the state budget for this objective. See Fact Sheet No. 31 from 2008, op. cit., p.10. Moreover, it has been pointed out in various studies that more than a third of the world's countries have included provisions regarding the right to health or to the protection of health in their fundamental laws. In this sense, see H. Matsuura, The Effect of a Constitutional Right to Health on Population Health in 157 Countries, 1970–2007: the Role of Democratic Governance, in Program on the Global Demography of Aging - Working Paper Series, pp. 2-3, at: https://cdn1.sph.harvard.edu/wp-content/uploads/sites/1288/2013/10/PGDA_WP_106.pdf, accessed on 10.03.2017, or G. Hence, for instance, the Constitution of Bulgaria, in article 52, takes into consideration both the individual as well as the collective dimension of this right. Therefore the right to medical insurance guaranteeing affordable medical care and free medical care to citizens is ratified; but it is also established that State shall protect the health of all citizens, and shall exercise control over all medical facilities and over the production and trade in pharmaceuticals, biologically active substances and medical equipment. This Constitution also provides that Medical care shall be financed even from the state budget. Furthermore, article 40 of the Constitution of Slovakia provisions that every person shall have the right to protect his or her health, but also that through medical insurance, the citizens shall have the right to free health care and medical equipment for disabilities under the terms to be provided by law. These constitutions are available at: https://www.constituteproject.org/search?lang=en, accessed on: 17.03.2017.

environmental damage or which could be harmful to people's health".

One cannot overlook the fact that, at European level, the European Convention on Human Rights does not expressly establish the right to health or to its protection[17]. Yet, by its case law, the European Court of Human Rights increasingly resorts to the vague notion of "private and family life", thus encompassing in this frame-concept not only the right to live in a healthy environment, among other things, but also the right to health[18]. The physical and moral integrity of the individual, as a dimension of private life protection, but in some circumstances, it is chiefly the physical one that comprises the dimension of the right to health[19], according to the Court's case law[20].

On the other hand, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union acknowledges the existence of this right-lien[21], by stating that the right to health protection entails the right of every individual to have access to preventive medical assistance and to benefit from medical care, according to national legislation and practice. Furthermore, article 25, in its second sentence, also orders that a high level of protection of human health should be furnished by means of policies and actions at European Union level. Therefore, nowadays, there is an increasingly poignant orientation towards the need to secure the right to the highest possible health standard, but in order for this to materialize the characteristics of health systems must be identified, but working our way through this process is similar to the implementation of the right to a fair trial[22].

In fact, in the constitutional definition of the right to health, three criteria can be identified[23], namely the purpose of this right, "the right to health must contain the guarantee of the right to access health care rather than the right to a healthy environment or health insurance for all citizens of the country"[24], then that this "right must be an individual right enforceable through the independent judicial review or specific complaint process if no judicial review process is available for a country"[25], and in the end such a right has to be explicitly written in one or more provisions.

In light of all the above, we hold that, legitimately, "the right to health provides a framework that can be used across disciplines, communities and cultures (and, indeed, with sectors outside health) for developing, delivering and evaluating health-related policies, services and programmes to ensure they are robust, sustainable, effective, and equitable"[26].

Consequently, it is utterly undeniable that saving life is a basic element of social justice (and the access to life-saving treatment is a basic human right), but, at the same time, due to the ever more sophisticated and expensive means of modern medicine, this also constitutes a fundamental economic and political problem[27]. Or, in other words, universal health care is about more than our health—it is also a prescription for economic transformation, budget and tax reform, and public sector strengthening[28].

The securing and protection of health rely on policies, strategies and rules that are instated through national and international legislation, the public health system being bound and able to guarantee "a minimum level of health" to all human beings even when, by exercising their economic freedom, their health had been endangered by the manufacture and sale of goods and products that were harmful to their own health and to the health of others. Notwithstanding, economic freedom is exercised precisely for ensuring and protecting health, especially in the private sector.

[17] Nevertheless, the European Social Charter (Revised) adopted on 3 May 1996 in Strasbourg, which guarantees, in article 11 and article 13, both the right to health protection and the right to medical and social assistance, bearing upon both the individual and the collective dimensions of the right to health, entered into force at the level of the Council of Europe and was afterwards ratified by Romania through Law no. 74/1999, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 193/1999.

In this case, ECHR stated that „where a Government engages in hazardous activities, such as those in issue in the present case, which might have hidden adverse consequences on the health of those involved in such activities, respect for private and family life under Article 8 requires that an effective and accessible procedure be established which enables such persons to seek all relevant and appropriate information". Thus, a positive obligation of the states to engage in securing this dimension of the right to uphold private and family life by supplying necessary and relevant information was instated.

2.2. Aspects regarding economic freedom

Whereas the right to health protection is considered a third-generation right, economic freedom is included into the category of first-generation rights[29], being regulated by the Constitution of Romania only after its revision in 2003.

Legally speaking, economic freedom is of interest insomuch as concerns its content as well as its limitations because article 45 of the republished Constitution of Romania[30] expressly provides that one's right to conduct economic activities, to exercise free enterprise and to conduct all within the limitations of the law are guaranteed[31]. This constitutional provision also indicates the fact that this freedom is not an absolute one[32]. Actually, by its very case law, the Constitutional Court of Romania has confirmed the constitutional provisions whereby the free access of a person to an economic activity, free enterprise as well as their enactment can be pursued only according to the conditions expressly provided by the law. Hence, by Decision no. 556/2007[33], the Constitutional Court held that the state is required to instate economic conformity regulations that economic agents have to abide by and, conversely, it is the prerogative of the lawmaker to decide upon the adequate sanctions to be applied for their breach, as the people's free access to economic activities and the free enterprise are guaranteed under the "conditions expressly provided by the law". Also, by Decision no.162/2011[34], the same constitutional court reiterated that the principle of economic freedom is not an absolute right of the individual, but it is conditioned by the observance of the limitations laid down by law, boundaries that target the assurance of a certain economic conformity or the protection of general interests as well as the guarantee that the rights and legitimate interests of all individuals are being respected. Therefore, any state, especially through Government and Parliament, has a central role to play in advancing and defending economic freedom and non-economic rights, such as the right to health[35].

However, as economic freedom is considered a fundamental freedom, it represents a type of economic right, but this freedom does not include all types of economic rights, otherwise distinctly regulated by the Constitution, even though it is their grounding and their very reason of existence[36]. Therefore, this type of freedom also comprises economic freedom as delineated by article 135 of the Constitution of Romania (Republished) as being "the general principle of the Romanian state, on which the organization of economic activities on its territory is founded"[37].

On the other hand, we have to mention that the objectives of European Union, as found in TFEU and foremost in TEU, article 1 and 3 Par. 3, indicate, among others, the aim to sustain an internal market and to promote social justice[38]. In this sense, article 16 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union established the freedom to conduct commercial activities, which is acknowledged according to the law of the European Union and to national laws and practices. If economic freedoms are held to promote the internal market of the EU, where free trade and movement configure to aid the mutual aims and objectives of the member states of the EU, social rights, such as the right to health, advert to those serving to balance circumstances for citizens of the EU, conditions that are considered essential for human beings to live their life in dignity[39].

Economic freedom includes our freedoms to create, to explore our capabilities and talents through our choice of vocation, and to provide for ourselves and our family, but also involve the opportunity to acquire and own property, to exchange our goods and services with others in free markets at prices that are mutually agreeable, and to transact when and where we choose, but not least this freedom also involves our decisions that nurture those capacities, especially education and training, but also our lifestyle choices, health care, and nutrition[40].

[30] Other constitutions also regulate this fundamental freedom. Thus, for instance, in article 31, the Constitution of Estonia provides that Estonian citizens, but also Citizens of foreign states and stateless persons who are in Estonia, unless otherwise provided by law, have the right to engage in enterprise and to form commercial undertakings and unions, but conditions and procedure for the exercise of this right may be provided by law. Also, article 18 of the Constitution of Finland acknowledges, alongside the right to work, the freedom to engage in commercial activity that consists in everyone's right to earn his or her livelihood also by commercial activity of his or her choice.

The beneficiary of this fundamental right is, first and foremost, the individual who, when being considered from a legal perspective, is assimilated to the natural person[41]. However, taking into account the European legal framework, by article no.1, sentence I[42] of the First Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms as well as the case law of the European Court of Human Rights, and the content of economic freedom, the congruity of the normative components of this freedom with the constitutional principle of pluralism[43], including the rather inconsistent case law of the Constitution of Romania[44], we also consider that "economic freedom concerns all the participants from the economic field, namely the natural person but mostly the moral person"[45]. In this context, the moral person is both the private as well the public person. On the other hand, economic freedom also involves state obligations that are subsumed to the principle of economic freedom[46], the fundamental lawmaker[47] implicitly ruling in this direction by characterizing the Romanian economy as a market economy within which the state must also guarantee the freedom of trade but it also has to create the necessary conditions for the improvement of the quality of life. Hence, in our opinion, it is mandatory that the state should intercede through the adoption of the necessary legislative measures, either on its own initiative or by enforcing policies which are in accordance with the objectives of the European Union regarding the warranty, safeguarding and protection of such fundamental rights as the right to health protection, even if it would thus infringe upon the exercise of others, such as economic freedom.

Therefore, the human rights frame thus occupies the intersection between universal values and vision on one side, and particular political demands and policy prescriptions on the other[48]. In the quest for universal health care, rights can be marshalled both as a normative and as an analytical force to be deployed on a politically contested terrain[49].

More than that, we must admit that today we are witnessing conflicts between neoliberalism, the dominant economic policy framework in the world today, and the international human right to health[50]. In this context a human rights approach rests on a conception of health and health care as social or public goods of special importance that are designed to benefit the whole population[51]. In contrast, neoliberalism tends to promote the view of health care as a commodity whose price, availability, and distribution, like other consumer goods, should be left to the marketplace[52].

2.3. Decision no. 29 of 27 January 2016 on the constitutional challenge of the provisions of the Law for the completion and amendment of Law no. 349/2002 on the prevention and control of the effects of the use of tobacco products, of the Constitutional Court of Romania[53]

Subsequent to the formulation of a constitutional challenge by 33 senators regarding the alleged unconstitutionality of the Law for the completion and amendment of Law no. 349/2002 for the prevention and control of the effects of the use of tobacco products, at point 31 of its Decision, the Constitutional Court of Romania held that "the right to economic freedom has to be understood in connection with the observance of other rights and fundamental freedoms such as the right to life, the right to health and to a healthy environment" and "smoking bans in closed public spaces does not constitute, per se, a limitation of economic freedom but it represents a condition for conducting economic activities" in the sense of the constitutional text of article no.45 in which this right is established.

Moreover, making reference to the case law of the Constitutional court of Macedonia, which is relevant to the case in question, the Court laid emphasis on the fact that "smokers are granted access to all the places that the lawmaker defined as public spaces in which smoking is banned, but they must correlate their conduct with the conduct of the other non-smoking citizens, in a manner which is conformant to the conditions laid down by the law and which regard all the citizens" precisely because "the aim of such regulations is to protect life and health (as supreme values) which could be jeopardized by the irresponsible behaviour of smokers"[54].

Actually, not only the law adopted by the Parliament of Romania for the amendment of Law no. 349/2002[55], but also the decision of the Constitutional Court of Romania are conformant to the provisions of the above mentioned Directive 2014/40/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 3 April 2014, whose main objective, provisioned by article no.1, is to approximate the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the Member States in order to: facilitate the smooth functioning of the internal market for tobacco and related products, take as a base a high level of protection of human health, especially for young people, and to meet the obligations of the Union under the WHO Framework Convention for Tobacco Control ('FCTC')[56].

The constitutional regulations that guarantee the right to life and to living in a healthy and safe environment incur certain positive obligations of the state, yet smoking in public spaces is detrimental not only for the health of smokers but also to the health of others[57]. Many countries considered the smoking ban in public spaces a necessary step towards the protection of public health[58]. The smoking ban in pubs was considered to be a necessary and legitimate precaution for the protection of the right to live in a healthy environment, regarded, in our view, as a dimension of the right to health protection, as the commercial rights of the pub owners are not breached[59].

3. Conclusions

The right to health is a fundamental part of our human rights and of our understanding of a life in dignity[60]. Likewise, dignity and the value of the human being are fundamental values which are acknowledged and guaranteed as such by international and national regulations[61]. Furthermore, the same regulations warrant the recognition of all the rights and liberties of human beings, both collectively and individually, which does not entail that by exercising a right or liberty we are allowed to transgress the rights and liberties of others.

Economic freedom represents the condition for the achievement of other fundamental rights, such as even the right to health[62] or to the protection of health.

Nonetheless, this freedom cannot be exercised in an absolute manner either by natural persons or by their corresponding legal persons, much less when there is a risk of infringing on other fundamental rights and liberties, such as the right to health and to its protection. In such circumstances, it is the duty of the qualified international organizations and of the state to exercise their positive obligation to intervene, principally by legislative measures, in order to set boundaries for the exercise of economic freedom or, at least, to outline a legal framework in which this freedom could be exercised indiscriminately. Therefore, the exercise of economic freedom can be restrained by the public power, the guarantor of general interests and the guardian of the liberties of all, but only abiding by the principles of the democratic rule of law and by the "proceedings" established by article 53 of the (Republished) Constitution of Romania[63].

Whether it is the legal framework for the use of substances or products, such as tobacco and related products that could affect people's health, or the framework for securing the right to health and to its protection, their delineation must be carried out by taking into consideration the dimensions of economic freedom according to the constitutional provisions, without, however, jeopardizing the right to health and to its protection. Actually international human rights law is neutral, in principle, with regard to the type of economic system a state pursues, provided that it is

The WHO FCTC opened for signature on 16 June to 22 June 2003 in Geneva, and thereafter at the United Nations Headquarters in New York, the Depositary of the treaty, from 30 June 2003 to 29 June 2004. The Convention entered into force on 27 February 2005. According to art. 3 from WHO FCTC, the objective of this Convention and its protocols is to protect present and future generations from the devastating health, social, environmental and economic consequences of tobacco consumption and exposure to tobacco smoke by providing a framework for tobacco control measures to be implemented by the Parties at the national, regional and international levels in order to reduce continually and substantially the prevalence of tobacco use and exposure to tobacco smoke. In order to achieve the objective of this Convention and its protocols and to implement its provisions, the Parties must also to develop and support, at the national, regional and international levels, comprehensive multisectoral measures and coordinated responses, taking into consideration the need to take measures to protect all persons from exposure to tobacco smoke (according to art. 4 para 2 lett.b). consistent with democracy and the realization of human rights[64].

We consider that whenever the health of a human being is affected or could be affected by any economic activities, first and foremost, it is the duty of the states to intervene in such a way as to secure this fundamental right.

Hence, under any circumstances, health, the right to health and to its protection must, in our view, prevail over economic freedom, yet without "obliterating" it if exercised under the conditions and limitations laid down by the law.

In actual fact, we believe that the term for this right should be the right to health and to the protection of health, in order to encompass both the individual dimension of this right which regards every human being, as well as its collective dimension which entails the positive obligation of the state to guarantee its protection, ideally at the highest standard.

UNHCR AND NON-GOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS ROLE AND THEIR JOINT EFFORTS IN TACKLING THE EUROPEAN REFUGEE CRISIS FROM IT`S INCEPTION UNTIL PRESENT TIMES

Patricia Casandra PAPUC[*]

Abstract

In this study we will analyse UNHCR and Non-Governmental Organizations role and their joint efforts in tackling the European refugee crisis from it`s inception until present times. Their work is extremely important because even if the recommendations made by UNHCR together with NGOs are not legally binding they still represent important tools available and at the disposal of member states. Furthermore the field work that they perform is of vital importance for the well-being of refugees. We will conclude this study with a set of recommendations.

Keywords: UNHCR, NGOs, refugees, High Commissioner, European crisis.

Since 2015 until present times Europe has been confronted with the biggest refugee and migrant crisis after the end of the Second World War. In light of this development this study will cover two different types of institutions, institutions which are tackling together this crisis: on one hand the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and on the other hand the international non governmental organizations (NGOs)

The end of the Second World War symbolizes the beginning of a new era in international relations, an era focused on mapping a new international legislation meant to promote human rights across the globe, the biggest promoter being the United Nations, through the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. After it`s adoption it became one of the most important documents in the world in terms of emphasizing the fundamental rights and liberties of each individual. Nowadays in the international community the Universal Declaration of Human Rights has received a special status, unlike any other document of it`s kind"[1].

The errors of the Second World War have taught the international community that the individual is the most important , even if the individual is not a subject in international law, but the individual benefits directly from all the decisions taken at the highest level, such as those taken by member states of the European Union in tackling the refugee crisis for instance.

In addition many other regional intergovernmental institutions, international tribunals have been created across the globe to monitor and sanction those not following international law or human rights law.

Analysing the work of UNHCR and NGOs is of great importance in trying to understand the magnitude of the refugee crisis. These two entities work together, while UNHCR has a more broad scope and international exposure NGOs differ, from international NGOs to small local NGOs offering assistance and advice to UNHCR. Their work is extremely important because even if the recommendations made by UNHCR together with NGOs are not legally binding they still represent important tools available and at the disposal of member states. Furthermore the field work that they perform is of vital importance for the well-being of refugees.

The article seeks to ask a number of questions, such as : How did this refugee crisis started? Why now? How come so many people came to Europe instead of going to the neighbouring countries? What institutions should be handling the refugee crisis and how do they collaborate between eachother? Is the current legislation suited to handle accordingly the refugee crisis and if the answer is no, how should this legislation be changed?

This study will underline the fact that the international legislation concerning refugees cannot cope with the aggravating current crisis so a new legislation is needed.

2. Analysis on the refugee crisis and the refugee legislation in force

Regarding the question how did this refugee crisis started, one of the main reasons is the conflict in Syria, which has been going on for the last 6 years. Besides the Syrian situation there are still endless conflicts and internal struggles in countries such as Afghanistan, Somalia, Eritreea, political instability, poverty and persecution, global warming, factors which made many people flee their country and seek for a better life in Europe.

Even if there are many people in need who have arrived to the European shores, not all of them can receive international protection and this study will look at the citizens who obtain the refugee status, thus the protection of that state.

People have the right to seek asylum in other states according to article 14 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, article which recognizes the right of people to seek asylum from persection in any other countries"[2].

In order to offer refugees a proper legal framework the international community drafted the Convention related to the Statute of Refugees from 1951 and it`s Protocol in 1967 and in this document the concept of refugee is defined. A refugee is a person who has a well founded fear of being persecuted for reasons such as: race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or due to a political opinion and he is outside the country of his nationality and he cannot or due to this fear does not want to avail himself of the protection of that country[3].

Based on the definition given, refugees actually represent a different category of foreigners who at a specific time live on the territory of a state. The main feature of refugees is the fact that they cannot benefit from protection of their own country of origin or sometimes that they do not want that protection.

After analyzing this provision the following conclusion can be drawn, this provision is applicable under two circumstances generally speaking , the first one due to a fear of being persecuted and the second one due to a reasonable belief that the person is persecuted"[4].

Even if citizens have a right to asylum this does not mean that it has to be recognized by the international community. There is no general treaty which asserts the right to asylum, even if this right was proclaimed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, in article 14"[5].

Even if states have a wide margin of appreciation in terms of asylum requests, still since 2015 the European continent has been flooded with such requests. In trying to respond to the question why are asylum seekers coming to Europe and not the neighbouring countries there are several responses to this question: Europe is rich, is stable, some countries have a diverse job employment offer, also in some cases the neighbouring countries are not safe so asylum seekers do not go there. Globalization, internet access are also factors which lead many people to come to Europe. It was probably more difficult from a logistic point of view 20 years ago to leave Congo than it is now. Unfortunately also the smugglers are playing an important role in this situation. UNHCR and their NGO partners together with the European Union have taken numerous actions in order to respond to the refugee crisis.

Before starting to elaborate on the key activities performed by UNHCR together with NGOs the paper will first present the birth , structure and evolution of UNHCR.

3. UNHCR

3.1 UNHCR`s birth, structure and evolution

The Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) was created in 1950 during the aftermath of the Second World War, in order to help millions of Europeans who had fled or lost their homes.

According to its Statute, UNHCR has two principal functions: the first one is to provide international protection to refugees within its competence and the second one is to seek lasting solutions for refugees in co-operation with the governments"[6].

The Statute calls upon Governments to co-operate with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in the performance of his functions concerning refugees falling under the competence of his Office, especially by:

- Becoming parties to international conventions and taking all the steps needed in order to implement such conventions;
- Entering into agreements with the High Commissioner for the execution of measures calculated to improve the situation of refugees;
- Admitting refugees to their territories;
- Assisting the High Commissioner in his work to promote the voluntary repatriation of refugees;
- Promoting the assimilation of refugees;
- Providing refugees with travel and other documents;
- Permitting refugees to transfer their assets and mostly the assets necessary for their resettlement;
- Providing the High Commissioner with information related to the laws and regulations in different parts of the world"[7].

In 1954 UNHCR won a Nobel Prize for Peace for its work in Europe. Some of the major events where UNHCR took a leading role were: the Hungarian revolution, the decolonization of Africa, they also assisted the upproted people in Asia, Latin America, actions which helped them gain a second Nobel Prize for Peace.

Furthermore UNHCR got involved in the major refugee crisis in Africa, the Middle East and Asia, being also invited to offer their expertise in order to help many displaced people and statelessness people. A living proof of their development is represented by their projects and number of employees. UNHCR now has more then 10, 800 members representing staff and their employees work in 128 countries"[8].

In order to get a clear picture of the specific activities conducted by UNHCR in the next part of the article there will be a presentation of the role played by the High Commissioner.

3.2. The Role of the High Commissioner of UNHCR

The position of High Commissioner of the United Nations Refugee Agency is a position held for a period of 5 years and the High Commissioner is elected by the UN General Assembly. Article 8 of the Statute of the High Commissioner describes his functions:

- Advocating for the conclusion and ratification of international conventions for the protection of refugees;
- Lobbying for the execution of any measures required to improve the situation of refugees and to reduce the number requiring protection;
- Assisting governmental efforts to promote voluntary repatriation or assimilation;
- Promoting the admission of refugees;
- Struggling to obtain permission for refugees to transfer their assets and especially those necessary for their resettlement;
- Obtaining information concerning their number, conditions of refugees in their territories and the laws applicable to them;
- Maintaining a good cooperation with the Governments and intergovernmental organizations concerned;
- Establishing contact in a suitable manner with private organizations dealing with refugee questions;
- Aiding the coordination of the efforts of private organizations concerned with the well-being of refugees[9].

This description of the High Commissioner`s tasks has a complexe nature rather then a systematic one, but three general areas can be identified"[10]. First of all UNHCR`s High Commissioner has to facilitate the admission of refugees to the territories of the States where they can be protected, second of all it has to ensure that the rights of refugees are respected; third of all the High Commissioner has to work on finding a solution to the problem.

Because it is a subsidiary organ of the United Nations General Assembly, UNHCR does not only report to the General Assembly but it also may have its mandate modified through General Assembly resolutions. UNHCR`s Statute also provides for UNHCR to receive advice from the General Assembly in the form of resolutions and from the Executive Committee of the High Commissioner`s Programme, an advisory body created by the United Nations Economic and Social Council.

In order to respect it`s mandate, statute and mission the UNHCR drafted many important legal documents across it`s history, important legal documents, intitled by some the "UNHCR doctrine".

3.3. UNHCR`s doctrine and its importance in framing a better response to the crisis around the world

We introduced the UNCHR`s doctrine in this research because the legal work conducted by UNHCR since it`s beginnings has been highly valuable. But it was not taken into consideration to the greatest extent possible concerning the possible responses to the European refugee crisis. Furthemore there are still many debates pending on it`s status, if it represents a subsidiary source of international law or not. Our opinion is that the "UNHCR doctrine" represents a subsidiary source of international law and we will now present our arguments on this matter.

UNHCR developed through out the years a technique intitled the "UNHCR doctrine", which has significantly contributed to the evolution of UNHCR`s role in the development and evolution of international refugee law. "They are often formulated as a result of questions posed by States, differing positions taken by States, or positions adopted by States and opposed by UNHCR. The formulation of doctrine by UNHCR is neither simple nor done in isolation. UNHCR doctrinal positions can be influenced by numerous factors including: the views of non-governmental organisations, academics, and government officials; political considerations; State practice, and even different views within UNHCR, to name a few"[11].

The doctrinal positions of UNHCR are not legally binding on states. Due to the fact that these doctrinal positions are not created by States, they do not represent traditional sources of international law, as for example international customary law, treaties, conventions, or general principles of law. Article 38 of the International Court of Justice explains the international law sources:

- international conventions, whether general or particular;
- international custom;

− the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations;

− judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations which represent means for the determination of rules of law"[12].

We consider that UNHCR can have the same valuation as some academics. Actually looking at the international UNHCR personnel, the organization reflects a complexe and diverse perspective unlike a publicist for example who has a national approach. Even so, UNHCR doctrine is most of the times considered to be lege ferenda that is what the law should be rather than lex lata what the law actually is"[13].

„UNHCR doctrine" is influenced by so many factors. Most importantly UNHCR employees are doing a lot of ground work in terms of handling the European refugee crisis , this is why, we think that the doctrine, hence the doctrinal suggestions should be more valued by the international community. These recommendations made by UNHCR employees could be better put to use by the member states and maybe states could even consider making some of their suggestions mandatory through a legally binding document. Otherwise many recommendations made by UNHCR will remain as recommendations, never applicable due to the lack of the binding force on member states.

As previously mentioned the „UNHCR doctrine" has been developed also due to the ground work conducted by UNHCR employees, activities which we will now present.

3.4. UNHCR`s actions across the globe

The main actions taken by UNHCR across the globe are the following:

1. Advocacy: has as it`s aim to change policies and services that affect displaced and statelessness people on a national, regional and also international level.
2. Cash based interventions: refer to the fact that most refugees live in places where they have the same rights, including to markets and services as the local communities living there. For this reason refugees are provided with cash in order for them to live in a decent way and also to contribute as well to the local economy.
3. Education represents an important part of UNHCR`s mission because UNHCR reports show that "*refugees are five times more likely to be out of school than the global average. Only 50 per cent of the refugee children have access to primary education, compared with a global average of more than 90 per cent"*14
4. Environment, disasters and climate change: represent one of the most debated topics across the globe in present times. For this reason both climate change and the environment have a big impact on the work conducted by UNHCR.
5. Livelihoods: it is highly important for people to be given the opportunity to work and earn a living after fleeing war or persecution.
6. Public health: an example is given on the official website of UNHCR. The case of a family which fled conflict in the Democratic Republic of Congo and who now lives in a refugee settlement in Uganda.
7. Shelter: is vital in times of crisis and displacement and is also necessary in order to preserve personal security and dignity.
8. Asylum and migration: there is an expert staff team based in Geneva, intitled the Asylum Unit and Migration Unit. Their work entails addresing the many challenges encountered by refugees. In addition they offer support to regional teams in order to implement protection measures and also offer legal support and advice to UNHCR operations across the globe.
9. Coordinating assistance: is a necessary step in order to have a quick and effective intervention. This is why AID agencies can trully have a big impact when they collaborate between each other.
10. Endind statelessness: is a problem the world is confronted with. According to official numbers :" *today, at least 10 million people around the world are denied a nationality. As a result they often aren`t allowed to go to school, see a doctor, get a job, open a bank account, buy a house or even get married".*15
11. Innovation: UNHCR is trying to connect the refugees because most of the times these people live without being in contact with their families, access basic services and obtain relevant information for them.
12. Protection is given to refugees by UNHCR because even if governments normally offer basic human rights to their citizens this does not necessarily apply to refugees as well.
13. Safeguarding individuals refers to the fact that every human being deserves a life without the fear of discrimination and persecution.
14. Solutions are offered as well because it is not only relevant to protect and assist all the refugees but also to help them rebuild their lives.

In order for the UNHCR to perform all these activities the organization has various partners: governments, donors, private sectors supporters, UN sister organizations and last but not least international non governmental organizations, organizations that we will analyse at this stage of the article.

4. International Non Governmental Organizations and their role

The term „non-governmental organization" or NGO was born in 1945 due to a need for the UN to make a difference in it`s Charter between the participation rights for intergovernmental specialized agencies and those for private entities.

At the United Nations all types of private entites can be recognised as NGOs, the only conditions that they have to fulfil are the following: they have to be independent, non-profit-making and non-criminal.

NGOs are different one from another. Some can be global and have a central authority or they can have a federal system. NGOs can be national, regional, international, international umbrella NGOs, a network of NGOs which can lobby at the UN for example.

This term of non-governmental organization was not in use before the UN was formed. Even if there were agencies alongise the League of Nations (the predecessor of the United Nations) still the concept was introduced at the San Franscisco conference, which established the UN in 1945.

The conference which established the UN brought other changes as well. At this conference they enlarged the status of the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC) and introduced an article related to the relationship between ECOSOC and NGOs, through article 71. The Economic and Social Council can make appropriate arrangements for consultation with non-governmental organizations., where there are common interests. These types of arrangements can be made with international organizations and when it is required also with national organizations after consultation with the member of the United Nations concerned"[16].

When refering to the structure of an NGO some elements may be taken into consideration. It starts from an agreement which is formed by its scope, the principles, how it is organized, how does it work, the application procedure if you want to became a member, how is the organization structured and it`s functions "[17].

Due to the importance of NGOs the Council of Europe adopted a Convention in 1986, Convention which recognizes the legal personality of the international non governmental organizations and establishes the conditions in order to receive this recognition: "they must be non- profit, have an international utility, they must be created from an national agreement based on the legislation of one of the parties, they must exercise their authority in at least two states and have the headquarters on the territory of one of them and part of the activity on the territory of the other party"[18].

An interesting fact when analysing NGOs is that there are international NGOs which also perform governmental duties and as a result their influence in the state is increasing. In agreement with the law, all the organizations which are founded by individuals are treated as NGOs even if some of them also perform governmental duties (such as the Red Cross or Interpol). Their increasing role contributes to the decrease of the state as an actor in terms of international relations "[19].

As previously mentioned in this article we are highlighting the importance of NGOs in the international sphere, importance which is constantly increasing. NGOs are advocating for the protection of rules and international conventions. In addition they are also asked for their expertise on this matter, they are also called upon by international tribunals as amicus curiaes "[20].

How do people start a venture of this kind? A venture of this kind starts from sharing a mutual interest, people get together and feel the need to be part of something, but in order for that organization to obtain a legal personality it can only be founded by respecting the national legislation of that specific state. "[21].

In the following part the study will cover the existing partnership between UNHCR and NGOs, focusing on their work in crisis areas across the globe, emphasizing their response to the European refugee crisis.

5. The partnership between UNHCR and NGOs and their work across the globe

As one historian of UNHCR has put it: "No element has been more vital to the successful conduct of the programmes of the UNHCR than the close partnership between UNHCR and the non-governmental organizations"[22].

This relevant partnership between the UNHCR and different NGOs has been underlined since the 50s, through out the declaration of Dr. Van Heuven Groedhard, the first High Commissioner for Refugees in 1954: " The UNHCR has had the most excellent relations with the voluntary agencies. Their work is in a true sense of the term indispensable and invaluable for refugees"[23].

UNHCR has been working with NGOs since the early 50s when the forcibly diplaced crisis erupted. Due to the fact that other emerging refugee crisis erupted in the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s especially in Africa, Asia and Central America so did the collaboration between UNHCR and a wide range of new humanitarian organizations and NGOs focused on refugees.

In order to uniformise the work conducted by UNHCR and set a standard in terms of work quality, in 2007 it adopted the Global Humanitarian Platform`s "Principles of Partnership" that set out the common standards of transparence, equality and an approach oriented towards results. This "Principles of Partnership" was afterwards added to the " Framework for Implementing with Partners" as an approach to collaborative partnerships.

There is also an Annual Consultation with NGOs and this consultation includes both national and international NGOs from across the globe. Furthermore it provides an important forum for NGOs and states to discuss, network, share opinions and views, from the perspective of equal partners.

Nowadays the UNHCR relies a lot on NGOs to implement a big diversity of projects, which include areas such as logistics, shelter, protection, aid distribution, sanitation and many others.

Due to the diversity of their projects there has been a section created on the website of UNHCR for partners interested to collaborate with them, so they are invited to register on the partner portal, a tool used to improve the communication between UNHCR and its partners.

6. UNHCR`s and NGOs responses to the European refugee crisis

The refugee crisis which erupted in 2015 lead over a million people to come to Europe half of them coming from Syria, all of them being forced by the same desire, that of seeking a better life for them and for their families.

The ongoing conflict and violence in Syria, Iraq and other places have caused a serious displacement, driving many refugees to seek safety in the immediate region. In addition a large number of families, women and unaccompanied children undertook dangerous journeys across several countries and were often exploited by smugglers, another problem on the UNHCR agenda.

In order to respond to this crisis UNHCR : "mobilized over 600 staff and resources in 20 different locations to provide live-saving assistance and protection. This include provision of humanitarian assistance, efforts to improve accommodation and shelter during the winter months, establishing 24/7 presence at all countries entry points and in a number of exit points to ensure continuous protection monitoring and intervention, efforts to reunite separated families and identification of persons with specific needs, including separated and unaccompanied children and referral to appropiate services"[24].

UNHCR also lobbyed at a European level, calling states to act together, in a responsable manner, with solidarity, following their international obligations.

In addition: "following the closure of borders in countries in the Western Balkans in early March, UNHCR began immediately shifting resources to increase reception capacity and services to the more than 55 000 asylum seekers and refugees now in Greece in support of the efforts of the Greek authorities"[25].

In the following year in 2016 a further 347, 000 refugees and migrants have arrived to Europe, following the one million who came in 2015.

UNHCR and other entities have tried to find solutions to the problem. One of the steps taken in this direction is adding the International Organization on Migration (IOM) to the UN family, initiative launched during the first summit on refugees and migration which took place in New York in 19/20 September 2016. Furthermore UNHCR together with IOM and their partners drafted a new plan to respond to Europe`s Refugee and Migrant situation, plan which we will shortly present in the following paragraphs.

The Regional Refugee and Migrant Response Plan was officially launched on the 19th of January 2017. The Regional Refugee and Migrant Response Plan aims at complementing government efforts in order to ensure safe access to asylum and the protection of refugees and migrants. The plan is also aimed at achieving long-term solutions for an orderly migration.

This plan emphasized the need for long-term solutions and it includes the following: a complexe relocation scheme, support for voluntary returns and reinforced alternative legal patways to perilous journeys, including as well resettlement and family reunification.

Special attention is given to vulnerable groups such as refugee and migrant children , women and girls.

Another new element is represented by the pilot projects included in the framework of the plan, pilot projects meant to respond to the needs of unaccompanied and separated children in Europe.

[23] http://www.unhcr.org/non-governmental-organizations.html.
[25] http://www.unhcr.org/europe-emergency.html.

In addition the plan also has a diverse geographical exposure, since it covers diverse countries and areas , from Turkey to Southern Europen, Western Balkans and Central Europe, including Western and Northern Europe.

This response plan also has a big budget: "The total financial requirements amount to UDS 691 million, with a population planning figure of up to 340, 000 people, based on previous arrivals trends and people present in countries who will receive support through the plan"[26].

Furthermore UNHCR based on it`s work experience with NGOs and other entities drafted a document with recommendations for the EU, in terms of handling the refugee crisis, document intitled :" Stabilizing the situation of Refugees and migrants in Europe[27]". This document was released on the 7th of March 2017 to the EU Heads of State and Turkey in Brussels. The main recommendations are the following:

1. UNHCR will implement the hot spot approach and the relocation scheme which refers to:
   a) carry out proper registration;
   b) implement the relocation scheme for asylum seekers;
   c) ensure the effective return of individuals who are no longer in need of international protection;
2. They will support the emergency response in Greece;
3. Improve compliance with the EU asylum acquis;
4. Improve the opportunities for resettlement;
5. Improve the protection safeguards for individuals at risk;
   d) Enhance the operations for search and rescue;
   e) Develop systems which better protect unaccompanied and separated children;
   f) Develop measures meant to prevent and respond to sexual and gender-based violence;
   g) Develop protection measures in order to address smuggling and trafficking ;
   h) Develop protection measures against exclusion, racism, xenophobia and islamophobia;
6. Develop proper European systems in order to allocate responsability for asylum seekers in the mid-term.

7. Conclusion

The refugee crisis has shaken the European continent to a great extent. The continent , the EU particularly does not have a unified voice in terms of handling the refugee crisis. Even so there are powerful institutions and organizations meant to protect and offer a chance to those seeking for help.

Since the crisis erupted the international community has taken numerous steps. More funding has been allocated by the European Union and by other important actors to tackle this issue, UNHCR has deployed more people in crisis areas together with local, national and international NGOs, without which the work of UNHCR would be almost impossible. Furthermore the International Organization on Migration has been added to the extended UN family, which means more funding, more projects and a joint collaboration. Nowadays it is impossible to analyse the migration crisis apart from the refugee crisis, the difference between the two categories are the reasons which lead these people to flee their country, for migrants it is an option while for refugees it is a necessity.

In the study we have emphasized the fact that the new action plan taken by UNHCR, NGOs together with IOM and the action plan sent to the EU member states have many great recommendations, but the constant problem remains the fact that there are not binding documents. We consider some of the research conducted by UNHCR as pure doctrine and we consider it to be a subsidiary source of international law, more specifically international refugee law.

Given these considerations the Convention and Protocol related to the Status of Refugees should be amended, in terms of "who" qualifies for the refugee status. The definition is too broad, offering thus states a wide margin of appreciation and not only that. Climate change, one of the biggest issues of our days should be included in the general scope as well as female genital mutilation, a practice common in several african countries. We consider both climate change and genital mutilation as solid reasons which force people to flee their country because their life and human dignity are at stake. If the Convention and Protocol related to the Status of Refugees are improved than this will impact the European Union as well which afterwards has to pass new Directives, enlarging thus the scope of refugee protection.

Furthermore the Convention and Protocol related to the Status of Refugees should include a subsidiary protection provision for those asylum seekers who did not receive the refugee status but should receive some sort of international protection.

In order to respond to this crisis the collaboration between UNHCR, NGOs , IOM, the EU and other agencies has to improve. Desperate situations, require desperate measures and the international community should always keep in mind the fact that: refugee rights are human rights.

REFLECTIONS ON THE PRINCIPLE "JUSTICE IS EQUAL FOR ALL" IN THE ROMANIAN CONSTITUTIONS AND IN COMPARATIVE LAW – SELECTIVE ASPECTS

Nicolae PAVEL[*]

Abstract

At the onset of the study it is necessary to mention that its topic will be circumscribed to regulations on the principle Justice is equal for all in the Romanian Constitutions and in comparative law – selective aspects.
By this approach, the proposed study opens a complex and complete vision, but not exhaustive, to the reflections on the principle Justice is equal for all in the Romanian Constitutions and in comparative law. In comparative law analysis, we will keep a symmetrical approach to identifying regulations on the principle Justice is equal for all in the Constitutions of other countries. The subject of the scientific endeavor will be circumscribed to the scientific analysis of its parts, as follows: 1. Introduction. 2. Identification of constitutional rules on the principle Justice is equal for all in the Constitution of Romania and comparative law. 3. Highlights Romanian doctrine and comparative law on the principle Justice is equal for all. 4. Jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court on the principle Justice is equal for all (selective aspects). 5. Conclusions.

Keywords: constitutional, justice, principle, comparative law.

1. Introduction

The object of study of this scientific approach will be circumscribed to the scientific analysis of its three main parts, as follows:

1. Identification of constitutional rules on the principle Justice is equal for all in the Constitution of Romania and comparative law.
2. Highlights Romanian doctrine and comparative law on the principle Justice is equal for all.
3. Highlights Romanian doctrine and comparative law on the principle Justice is equal for all.
4. Jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court on the principle Justice is equal for all (selective aspects).

As per the bibliographic research, the principle justice is equal for all is new in its formulation, but it is not new in its existence. Starting from this axiom, and paraphrasing K. Mbaye we may say that: „The history of the principle justice is equal for all is confounded with the history of people".

Concerning the requirement justice is equal in constitutional doctrine the following specifications are made: "The requirement justice is equal, reflects the principle written down in the Human Rights Proclamation which sets forth that Law should be equal for all, whether it protects, or defends, but also the general provision set out by art. 16 par. (1) of the Constitution according to which Citizens are equal before the law and of public authorities, without privileges or discriminations"

Also referring to the requirement justice is equal, it is worth mentioning that the Constitution of the United States of America, the first Constitution in writing worldwide, which in Section I, entitled Defining the citizen status; the states' ban to restrict the citizens privileges, of Amendment 14 entitled Citizen rights protection – ratified in 1868 establishes the following principles: "no state can deprive any individual from life, freedom or property without following the natural course of legal procedures; or can it refuse any individual under its jurisdiction equal protection of laws". Moreover, in our opinion, these principles are components of the right to a fair trial.

Further on, referring to the requirement justice is equal, we intend to mention the Constitution of Belgium of 7 February 1831, a constitution recognized as the third written constitution in the world, which in art. 6 par. (1) thesis I establishes the following constitutional principle: "There is no distinction of class within the state, Belgians are equal before the law".

Concerning the requirement justice is equal, I selected for this paper from among the international documents in the line of Human Rights, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, an iconic document in the history of human rights, which establishes the following principle regarding the requirement, justice is equal, in the contents of art. 7 par. (1) thesis I: "All humans are equal before the law and have, with no discrimination, the right to equal protection of the law".

What seems relevant for us to highlight in this paper is the approach to the requirement justice is equal, in Romanian constitutional and legal system starting with the first document with constitutional value, i.e. The developer Statute of the Paris Convention from 7/19 August 1858 until this day, i.e. The Romanian Constitution revised in 2003, form of republished Romanian Constitution of 1991.

[*] Lecturer, PhD; Associate Researcher Faculty of Juridical Sciences, Political and Administrative "Spiru Haret" University; Institute of Legal Research "Acad. Andrei Rădulescu" of the Romanian Academy (email:.nicolaepavel0@yahoo.com).

Considering the debate on this generous topic for over 145 year of constitutional evolution of the requirement justice is equal, in Romania it should be mentioned since the beginning the need of a diachronic approach of this topic by the identification of all the Romanian Constitutions which regulated the constitutional status during this.

Moreover, we should specify that during the mentioned period, Romania experienced several forms of government, i.e., monarchy, people's republic, socialist republic and semi-presidential republic.

In the field of comparative law, in order to maintain a symmetry of approach with the Romanian constitutional system, the regulations at the constitutional level, concerning the requirement justice is equal, were identified in the normative content of the selected constitutions, i.e.: 1. The Belgian Constitution as updated following the constitutional revisions of 6 January 2014, containing the latest revisions. 2. The French Constitution of 4 October 1958, in force at the date of constitutional review of 23 July 2008 containing the latest revisions.

For a full but not exhaustive coverage of the field of study, doctrinal and jurisprudential landmarks are presented on the requirement justice is equal.

It is also worth mentioning that the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court of Romania will contribute to constitutionalizing the requirement justice is equal.

This research opens by this approach a complex and complete view, but not exhaustive in the current scope regarding the requirement justice is equal.

In our opinion, the studied field is important for the constitutional doctrine, for the doctrine of parliamentary law, for the doctrine of comparative law, for the general theory of law, for the legislative work of elaboration of the legislative measures, for the legislative technique, and for the research in the field covered by the theme of this research.

Even if the regulation and theorization of the requirement justice is equal goes back in time to the first constitutions written in the world, the theoretical interest for resuming it is determined by the fact that the existing field literature has not always paid enough attention to the three aspects, regulatory, theoretical and jurisprudential regarding the requirement justice is equal, analysed in this paper.

2. Identification of constitutional rules on the principle Justice is equal for all in the Constitutions of Romania and comparative law

2.1. Identification of constitutional rules on the principle Justice is equal for all in the Constitutions of Romania

2.1.1. The developer Statute of the Paris Convention of 7/19 August 1858[1]

A special discussion is required in relation with the Developer Statute of the Convention of 7/19 august 1858. In our opinion, the Statute may be considered a Constitution, considering the provisions of art. 17 stating the following: All civil servants, with no exception, on taking office, are liable to swear allegiance to the Constitution and laws of the country and faith in God (Prince).

The systematic analysis of the normative content of the Statute shows that this content includes no provisions regarding the requirement justice is equal.

2.1.2. The Romanian Constitution of 1866[2]

We should state that the Fundamental Law of Belgium of 1831 was a source of inspiration for the constitutions of other states among which the Romanian Constitution of 1866.

The systematic analysis of the normative content of the Constitution shows that the latter includes in art. 10 theses II of Title II, entitled On the rights of the Romanians the following principle regarding the requirement, justice is equal, under the following phrasing: "All Romanians are equal before the law…."

2.1.3. The Romanian Constitution of 23 March 1923[3]

At the onset of the study it is imperative to specify that the Fundamental Law of Romania of 1866 remained effective for 57 years, while important economic and political transformations occurred.

The systematic analysis of the normative content of the Constitution shows that in art. 8 par. (2) Title III, entitled On the rights of the Romanians enshrines the following principle regarding the requirement, justice is equal, under the following phrasing: "All Romanians, irrespective of ethnic origin, language or religion, are equal before the law ...."

2.1.4. The Romanian Constitution of 28 February 1938[4]

We should specify in the introduction of the study that the Fundamental Law of Romania of 1923 remained effective for 15 years.

[4] Ibidem, op. cit. 95-119.

Under the historic circumstances of 1938, the new Constitution draft was submitted to plebiscite on 24 February 1938. The Constitution is promulgated and was published in the Official Gazette Part I, no. 48, from 27 February 1938.

The systematic analysis of the normative content of the Constitution shows that in art. 5 par. (1), Chapter I, of Title II, entitled On the duties of the Romanians, enshrines the following principle regarding the requirement justice is equal, under the following phrasing: "All Romanian citizens, irrespective of ethnic origin and religious faith are equal before the law….".

2.1.5. The Constitution of 13 April 1948[5]

The systematic analysis of the normative content of the Constitution shows that in art. 16 of Title III, entitled Fundamental rights and duties of the citizens, enshrines the following principle regarding the requirement justice is equal, under the following phrasing: "All the citizens of the People's Republic of Romania, irrespective of gender, nationality, race, religion or cultural background are equal before the law ".

2.1.6. The Constitution of 24 September 1952[6]

2.1.7. The Constitution of 21 August 1965, republished[7]

2.1.8. The Constitution of Romania of 8 December 1991[8]

The systematic analysis of the normative content of the Constitution shows that in art. 16 par. (1) having the marginal phrasing Equal rights, in Chapter I of Title II, entitled Common provisions, enshrines the following principle regarding the requirement justice is equal, under the following phrasing: "The citizens are equal before the law and public authorities, without privileges or discriminations".

2.1.9. The Constitution of Romania of 2003[9], the republished form of the Constitution of Romania of 1991

The systematic analysis of the normative content of the Constitution of Romania of 2003, the republished form of the Constitution of Romania of 1991, includes that following dual regulations:

a) in the content of art. 16 par. (1) having the marginal phrasing Equal rights, of Chapter I, Title II, entitled Common provisions, enshrines the following principle regarding the requirement justice is equal, under the following phrasing: "The citizens are equal before the law and public authorities, without privileges or discriminations".

We may notice that the text of this article is identical with the text of art. 16 par. (1) of the Constitution of Romania of 8 December 1991.

b) in the content of art. 124 par. (2) having the marginal phrasing Realization of justice, in Section I of Chapter VI, entitled The Courts, explicitly enshrines for the first time in Romanian constitutional system the principle Justice is equal for all.

2.1.10. The Draft Law on revision of the Constitution of Romania[10]

The systematic analysis of the normative content of the Draft Law on the revision of the Constitution of Romania shows that art. 124 par. (2) of the Constitution is not proposed for revision.

2.2. Identification of constitutional rules on the principle Justice is equal for all in comparative law.

In the field of comparative law, in order to maintain a symmetry of approach with the Romanian constitutional system, the regulations at the constitutional level, regarding the requirement justice is equal, were identified in the normative content of the selected constitutions, i.e.: 1. The Belgian Constitution as updated following the constitutional revisions of 6 January 2014, containing the latest revisions. 2. The French Constitution of 4 October 1958, in force at the date constitutional review of 23 July 2008 containing the latest revisions.

At the onset of the subparagraph, we emphasize that the principle Justice is equal for all, is not provided in the above-mentioned in the Constitutions.

2.2.1. The Belgian Constitution as updated following the constitutional revisions of 6 January 2014, containing the latest revisions[11].

The requirement justice is equal reflects the principle set out by art. 10 par. (2) thesis I, under the following phrasing: "The Belgians are equal before the law".

2.2.2. The French Constitution of 4 October 1958, in force at the date constitutional review of 23 July 2008 containing the latest revisions[12].

The analysis of the normative content of the Constitution of France of 4 October 1958 shows that this constitution between the content of the Constitution and the Preamble the following three documents' titles are inserted:

1. The Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen of 26 August 1789
2. The Preamble to the Constitution of 26 October 1946
3. The Environmental Charter of 2004 This triad was called by the Constitutional Council of France Block of constitutionality.

The theory of the Block of constitutionality was analysed by the Constitutional Council, by the study regarding *Reflections on the constitutionality by reporting*13.

The „Block of constitutionality" does not exist; defined as the set of norms with constitutional value, it is not even certain that it would have ever existed. The Rules for Reference of the constitutionality review, which are above all constitutional rules, are not limited to the constitutional rules; they also cover rules outside the Constitution it refers to.

Although old, this situation has experienced these last years a considerable expansion, so that today it is allowed to distinguish three sources of constitutionality:

a) the first – in every sense of the term – refers to the constitutional rules set forth by the Constitution of 4 October 1958 as well as those set forth by texts, old or modern, provided in its Preamble.
b) the second category contains norms with no original constitutional value, but which serve as the foundation of the constitutionality review because the Constitution imposes it.
c) the third regroups the general principles, unsolicited in the constitutional texts, but inferred from certain constitutional provisions by the judge. It is not useful to go back to the first category of such sources so long as their existence is known; it is more interesting instead the enrichment of the sources of constitutionality based on certain constitutional provisions which aim at norms outside the Constitution which are deprived, at least initially, of constitutional value. This technique is not new and it is actually the source of the expression „block of constitutionality".

3. Highlights of Romanian doctrine and comparative law on the principle Justice is equal for all.

3.1. Highlights of Romanian doctrine on the principle Justice is equal for all.

We will select from the Romanian doctrine the opinions of certain well-known, reputed authors, who studied the principle Justice is equal for all

3.1.1. A first opinion[14] mentioned for this study analyses the principle Justice is equal.

The requirement justice is equal, reflects the general provision set forth by art. 16 par. (1) of the Constitution according to which "Citizens are equal before the law and public authorities, without privileges or discriminations ".

The idea is resumed in Law no. 304/2004 which, in art. 2 par. (1), sets forth that justice is equal for all, in art. 7 par. (1) provides that all persons are equal before the law, without privileges or discriminations, and in art. 7 par. (2) which sets out that justice is served equally for all persons, irrespective of race, ethnic origin, language, religion, gender, sexual orientation, opinion, political affiliation, wealth or origin or social status or other discriminatory criteria.

Moreover, art. 4 par. (1) of Law no. 304/2004 sets out for the judges and prosecutors the obligation to assure a non-discriminatory legal treatment for all the participants in legal proceedings.

The principle of equal justice means that all persons having equal vocation should be judged by the same courts and according the same legal provisions, either substantive or procedural.

Equality does not mean uniformity, so that the existence of special legal provisions or provisions of certain jurisdictional bodies, even courts, specialized does not mean disregarding this principle.

If from the legal point of view the principle of equality is enshrined, the more delicate issue is to actually achieve equality before the law, because starting and running a trial involve costs and specialized knowledge.

3.1.2. A second opinion[15] mentioned for this study analyses equal justice.

Equal justice implies the same procedural rules and granting procedural rights equally to all the parties involved in a trial. Equality is one of the principles of law enshrined both in the international legal documents and in the domestic legislation of the states.

The Constitution of Romania provides in art. 16 that "Citizens are equal before the law and public authorities, without privileges or discriminations". Based on the principle of equal justice, all persons are entitled to be judged by the same courts and according to the same legal proceedings.

[15] Ştefan Deaconu, Political Institutions (Bucharest, CH Beck, 2012) 378-379.

Any provisions which would make a person unable to benefit from the same procedural rules as another person would be incompatible with the principle of equal justice. The jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights mentions about "equality of arms" before the courts.

But equality does not mean uniformity because every litigation brought before the courts has its own characteristics.

3.2. Highlights of comparative law doctrine on the principle Justice is equal for all

3.2.1. A first opinion[16] mentions this study analyses the Block of constitutionality.

The Constitutional Council of France and the constitutional judge cannot exercise control on the norms presented in the confrontation with the reference constitutional norms, which are as a whole the block of constitutionality.

About this, the Constitutional Council plays an essential role. Indeed, the norms of reference certainly derive from the Constitution, but it often happens that this might need an interpretation. It is the Council which must do it, which determines it to phrase a certain number of constitutional norms and in so doing established the contours and limits of the block of constitutionality.

The admitted norms will be examined, the excluded ones and the problems which might cause potential divergences among some of these norms.

a) Accepted norms

They all originate in the Constitution noticing that if many are expressly set out here, others are present implicitly or abusively, which requires an intervention of the Constitutional Council.

1) The norms set out by the constitutional text – These norms are the most numerous ones and are found not only in the body of the Constitution itself, but also in the texts referred to by its Preamble.

In relation with the constitutional text proper, the fact that every article integrates, irrespective of its content, in the block of constitutionality belongs to the obvious truth.

Besides, the Constitutional Council quotes a certain number in its decisions. In relation with this subject, we will hold that certain provisions act more often than others due to their content as norms of reference and it happens to the Council to assess globally the conformity with the Constitution, without referring to a specific article.

As regards the preamble and the texts it refers to, i.e the Declaration of 1789, the preamble of 1946 and henceforth the Environmental Charter of 2004, it is important to point out that they are an important part of the block of constitutionality.

2) The norms set by the Constitutional Council – three hypotheses may be distinguished.

Most often the Council limits itself to specifying the meaning of the constitutional text, a meaning unknown until then, and which can be quite different from that resulting from simply reading.

b) Non-accepted norms

They are in particular the regulations of the parliamentary meetings and international or community norms.

c) Potential divergences and contradictions among the constitutional norms.

These divergences and contradictions may actually produce because it often happens that this reference of the Constitutional Council should discuss several norms with constitutional value.

3.2.2. A second opinion[17] mentioned for this study analyses the principle Justice is equal.

The general principles of public law are no longer enshrined in a written rule. This is their very originality. It could be them, such as the principle of equality before the law, put in relation with a constitutional text similar to that of art. 10 of the Constitution, that it would lose what is the clearest in their utility: to be a source of subsidiary law.

By definition, these principles apply only in the absence of an express text. Among the general principles of public law which have no relation with any text of positive law, the principle of consistency was highlighted which affects the state, public services and public function as well as that of their adaptation to the needs of the mission it assumes.

Two issues draw the attention in relation with that. The first is related to the delimitation of the general principles of public law.

It is jurisprudence which highlights them and expresses them and, in its absence, the doctrine.

The second problem refers to the juridical value of these principles. Where these fundamental principles find their juridical value expressly or implicitly enshrined by the Constitution – as in the preamble to the French Constitution of 1946 – their authority could not be questioned: they have the same value as the other constitutional provisions.

Where, just like in Belgian law, the value of the fundamental principles remains undetermined, their authority raises discussions.

It would seem advisable to recognize their identical value to that of the written rules from where they are induced.

The general principle will be conferred, where the case may be, the value of a constitutional text, of legislative provisions or of a regulatory measure.

4. Jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court on the principle Justice is equal for all (selective aspects).

In the decision of the Constitutional Court, selected for this study, I mentioned only the motivations of the Court which are directly related to the principle Justice is equal for all, regulated by the fundamental law.

4.1. Decision of the Constitutional Court no. 711/2016 regarding the exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions of art. 18 par. (2) third thesis of Law no. 2/2013 regarding certain measures for relieving the courts, and to prepare the enforcement of Law no. 134/2010 regarding the Code of civil procedure, as published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 166 of 7 March 2017[18].

The Constitutional Court was notified by the High Court of Cassation and Justice – First Civil Division, on the exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions of art. 483 par. (2) Code of civil procedure.

Considering the elements held by the Constitutional Court, the court finds that it cannot be argued that the provisions which regulate only the possibility of phrasing the appeal in the case of labour disputes would contravene the constitutional provisions of art. 124 par. (2) according to which "Justice is unique, impartial and equal for all ".

For the above-described, the Court overrules as groundless the exception of unconstitutionality.

4.2. Decision of the Constitutional Court no. 635/2016 regarding the exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions of art. 22 par. (2) of Law no. 85/2006 on the insolvency procedure, as published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 37 of 12 January 2017[19].

The Constitutional Court was notified by the Insolvency Consultant - S.P.R.L. and YNA Consulting - S.P.R.L. (the trustee of Izometal Magellan - S.R.L.), with the exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions of art. 22 par. (2) of Law no. 85/2006 on the insolvency procedure.

The Court deems that as it is groundless and the criticism of the authors of the exception of unconstitutionality according to which the possibility of replacing the trustee by the syndic judge, ex officio, would contravene the provisions of art. 24 and of art. 124 par. (2) of the Constitution, as this duty of the syndic judge circumscribes, in accordance with art. 11 par. (2) of Law no. 85/2006, the judicial review of the trustee's and/or liquidator's activity, a review exercised by the syndic judge.

Considering the above, the Court overrules as groundless the exception of unconstitutionality.

5. Conclusions

5.1. The objective of the study entitled: Reflections on the principle Justice is equal for all in the Romanian Constitutions and in comparative law – selective aspects, was in our opinion attained.

5.2. The main directions of study to attain the proposed objective were the following:

1. The identification of constitutional rules on the principle Justice is equal for all in the Constitution of Romania. I approached this theme, for the reason that the fundamental law of Romania – the Constitution, sets out the fundamental principles referring to the principle Justice is equal for all, which will be developed in the legislation or other subsequent regulations.

Moreover, I proceeded to the diachronic approach of the identification of these principles in the Romanian Constitutions, to turn to good account the evolution of the Romanian constitutional system for a term of over one hundred years, starting with The developer Statute of the Paris Convention of 7/19 August 1858, and ending with the work The Constitution of Romania as revised in 2003, the republished form of the Constitution of Romania of 1991.

2. The identification of constitutional rules on the principle Justice is equal for all *in comparative law. Approaching the principle of symmetry, I proceeded to the identification of constitutional rules on the principle Justice is equal for all *in comparative law.

I selected from comparative law the following: The Belgian Constitution as updated following the constitutional revisions of 6 January 2014, containing the latest revisions. 2. The French Constitution of 4 October 1958, in force at the date constitutional review of 23 July 2008 containing the latest revisions. This selection may be motivated considering that these states are deemed in the doctrine among the first three states in the world which elaborated a written constitution.

3. The highlights of Romanian doctrine and comparative law on the principle Justice is equal for all.

In this paragraph, we highlighted the Romanian contributions in the line of comparative law, concerning the principle Justice is equal for all, in the Romanian, Belgian and French doctrine.

4. The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court of Romanian on the principle Justice is equal for all. In this paragraph, the last Decision of the Constitutional Court were selected, which in our opinion, contributed to the constitutionalization of the subsequent regulations on the principle Justice is equal for all.

5. The four parts of the work may be considered a contribution to the extension of the research in the matter of Reflections on regulation of the principle Justice is equal for all, in the Romanian Constitutions and in comparative law, in accordance with the current trend in the field.

ECJ CASE-LAW ON THE CONCEPT OF „PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION" USED IN ARTICLE 45 PARAGRAPH (4) TFEU

Roxana-Mariana POPESCU[*]

Abstract

According to Article 45 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU), „the freedom of movement for workers shall be secured within the Union". This freedom entails the abolition of any discrimination based on nationality between the workers of Member States as regards to employment, remuneration and other working conditions. However, Article 45 paragraph (4) establishes an exception in the sense that its provisions do not apply to employment in the public administration. The concept of public administration is autonomous in the sense that it is determined by the Court of Justice of the European Union, and not by the Member States.

Keywords: ECJ case-law; the concept of „public administration"; Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU.

1. Introduction

As already known, one of the main rights of citizens[1] of Member States of the European Union is to be gainfully employed anywhere in the European Union, under conditions equal to those imposed by the host Member State, to its own nationals. This is possible under Title IV – The free movement of persons, services and capital, Chapter 1 - Workers, Article 45 and under the following articles of the Treaty on the functioning of the European Union. Thus, pursuant to Article 45 paragraph (1) „the free movement of workers shall be secured within the Union". Next, paragraph (3) stipulates the provision meant to give insight to the free movement of workers, namely: „the free movement of workers entails the right:

- to accept real employment offers;
- to move freely for this purpose in the Member States;
- to stay in a Member State for the purpose of employment in accordance with the laws, regulations and administrative provisions governing the employment of workers in that state;
- to remain on the territory of a Member State after having been employed in that state, under the conditions which will be subject to rules adopted by the Commission".

„Therefore, the free movement of persons, as a fundamental freedom in the EU, includes the right of every citizen of a Member State of the European Union to move to another Member State with the purpose to accept a genuine employment offer, to reside within the host State for the purpose of employment in accordance with the laws, regulations and administrative provisions governing the employment of workers of that state and to remain in that Member State after having been employed in that state"[2]. However, according to paragraph (4) of the same Article 45 TFEU, „provisions (...) [mentioned] do not apply to employment in the public administration". Otherwise said, Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU constitutes an exception from the free movement of workers.

At national level there is, however, a list that includes jobs involving state sovereignty and that can, therefore be reserved only to its own citizens, being thus „closed" for citizens of other European Union Member States. It is the competence of the administration to determine, from case to case, according to the nature of duties and responsibilities involved in the job concerned, whether it can be offered to nationals[3] of the European Union, or only to its own

[1] The provisions of the EU treaties refer to citizenship, and not nationality, and condition the EU citizenship of the existence of citizenship of a Member State (Art. 9 TEU and art. 20 paragraph (1) sentences 2 and 3 TFEU: „any person holding the nationality of a Member State is citizen of the Union. The citizenship of the Union does not replace the national citizenship but it is additional to it"). Thus, in strictly constitutional terms, the citizenship of the Union, established by the Treaty of Maastricht of 1992 and developed by the Treaty of Lisbon of 2007, it is not comparable to that given to a citizen of one of the 28 Member States. EU citizenship puts people under the protection of EU law (according to Augustin Fuerea, Dreptul Uniunii Europene – principii, acțiuni, libertăți, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, p. 193). EU citizenship confers a number of rights to citizens of the Member States and strengthens the protection of their interests. Systematized, these are: the right to movement and to reside freely within Member States; the right to vote and to be elected to the European Parliament and in municipal elections in their Member State of residence, under the same conditions as nationals of that State; the right to enjoy, on the territory of a third country in which the Member State of which they are nationals, is not represented, protection by the diplomatic and consular authorities of any Member State under the same conditions as nationals of that State; the right to petition the European Parliament, to apply to the Ombudsman and the right to address the institutions and advisory bodies of the Union, in any of the Treaty languages and to obtain a reply in the same language. For details, see Elena Emilia Ștefan, Rolul jucat de Ombudsman în îmbunătățirea activității administrației publice, Revista de Drept Public, no. 3/2014, pp.127-135.

[3] In the Romanian law, the concept of „national" is defined in Law no. 157/2005 ratifying the Treaty of Accession of Romania to the European Union, art. 3 according to which 'within the meaning of the Accession Treaty, of the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe, citizens. This situation is compounded by the fact that, at EU level, the content of the concept of „public administration" is not in the content of primary or secondary legislation. That is why the „basic principles of interpretation of Article 45 paragraph (4) have been set[4] „judicially".

2. The scope of the exception regarding the „public administration"

In 1973, the Court of Justice in Luxembourg[5] was asked the question „whether, under the exception provided in Article 48 paragraph (4) of the Treaty [now Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU] can be excluded from the rule of non-discrimination[6] formulated (...) [in a legal instrument of secondary law] workers employed in the public service of a Member State (...) under an employment contract governed by private law"[7]. To answer that question, the Court considered it necessary to establish the scope of the exception relating to public administration. Thus, according to the Court, 'the scope of the exception provided in Article 48 paragraph (4) can be determined by the setting of the legal relation between the employee and the administration which employs him/her[8]. In the absence of any difference in the above provision, there is of no interest whether a worker is employed as a worker, employee or official[9], much less if the employment relation is subject to public law or private law [and that is because] those legal classifications vary depending on national laws, and therefore cannot provide the requisite criteria of interpretation of Community law". The Court held that the „exception under that provision envisaged employment only for jobs in public administration and that the legal nature of the relation between worker and administration was irrelevant in that regard"[10].

Therefore, under the Court of Justice of the European Union, „in the system of the Treaty, the principles of free movement and equality of treatment of workers within the Community, exemptions permitted [Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU] cannot cover a scope going beyond the purpose for which that exemption clause was introduced. Interests that it protects allow Member States to respect them through the possibility of restricting the admission of foreign nationals to certain activities in the public administration. This provision cannot justify discriminatory measures on remuneration and other conditions of employment against workers, once admitted in the administrative service"[11].

3. Limits of the notion of „public administration"

The Court of Justice of the European Union was not pleased only with identifying the scope of the exception relating to public administration and, in 1982, it resumed the issue of the exception provided in Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU in the case Commission v./Belgium[12]. In the present case, the Commission brought an action to declare that Belgium, „by requiring or permitting the imperative claim of the Belgian citizenship as a condition of recruitment for jobs not covered by Article 48 paragraph (4) EEC Treaty [now Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU] did not fulfill its obligations under Article 48 of the Treaty and Regulation (EEC) No. 1612/68 on the free movement of workers within the Community"[13]. In fact, holding the Belgian citizenship represented a condition of access to jobs in the Belgian local authorities and public enterprises, regardless of the nature of duties that were to be fulfilled. Examples of such jobs were those of unskilled workers in rail, nurses and guards at night. The permanent Representation of the Kingdom of Belgium replied to the accusations which were brought, in particular, that:

- „the condition of citizenship found in dispute meets the requirements of the Belgian Constitution, which states that" ... only Belgians can be admitted to be employed in the civilian and military service, with some exceptions that can be established by law, for special cases";
- the Commission's interpretation of Article 48 paragraph (4) of the Treaty requires establishing a distinction within each administrative entity, between jobs related to the exercise of public authority and those which do not belong to it, and thus raises a problem the solution of which should be found by all Member States, at Community level"[14].

In turn, the Commission argued that the exception concerning the public administration[15] „refers only to jobs the practice of which requires effective participation in public authority, implying the existence of the power of decision on persons of private law or which questions the national interests, especially those involving the internal or external security of the state. In addition, the Commission added that the conditions for applying that exemption clause were not met for jobs such as those covered by the offers of jobs concerned"[16].

According to the Court, Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU „brings out of the scope of the first three paragraphs of this article, several jobs involving direct or indirect participation in the exercise of public power and functions which are meant to protect the general interests of the State or of other public authorities. Such jobs involve, indeed, from the holders' side, the existence of a special solidarity relation with the State, as well as reciprocity of rights and obligations, which represent the ground of the citizenship bond. Thus, depending on the objective pursued by [art. 45 paragraph (4) TFEU] (...) it must be set the scope of the exemption that the article brings to the principles of free movement and equal treatment enshrined in the first three paragraphs of that article. Determining the scope of the article [Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU] generates, however, particular difficulties because, in different Member States, the public authorities assume responsibilities with economic and social character or engage in activities that cannot be identified with those of the typical functions of the public administration, but which, on the contrary, by their nature, are within the scope of application of the Treaty. Under these conditions, the extent of the exception provided by [Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU] on functions related to the State or other bodies governed by public law, but which, at the same time, does not involve any association with tasks of the public administration itself, would result in the circumvention of the application of the Treaty principles, of a considerable number of jobs and in creating inequalities between Member States, depending on the disparities that characterize the structure of the State and certain sectors of economic life"[17].

The Court remained consistent to this view, resuming it in other cases. Thus, in Lawrie-Blum[18] case, the Court stressed that „the positions in the public service within the meaning of Article 48 paragraph (4) excluded from the scope of paragraphs (1) to (3) of this article, mean in fact a series of jobs involving direct or indirect participation in the exercise of public powers and functions which are conceived to protect the general interests of the State or of other public collectivities and involving therefore, from the holders' part, the existence of a special solidarity with the State, and reciprocity of rights and obligations grounding the bond of citizenship. The jobs excluded are only those which, having regard to their respective duties and responsibilities, may take specific characteristics of administration activities in the areas described above"[19]. In the case of Allué and Coonan [20], the Court answered the national Court that „jobs for teachers do not involve a direct or indirect participation in public authority and functions which aim at protecting the general interests of the State and other public authorities, and do not imply the existence of a special relation of solidarity with the State and the reciprocity of rights and obligations underlying the bond of citizenship"[21].

Also, in the case Commission v./Luxemburg[22], the Court noted that „according to its case-law, (...) [the notion of public administration] for jobs involving direct or indirect participation in the exercise of public authority and functions designed to protect the general interests of the State or other public authorities, and which entails assuming from those occupying them, the existence of a special relation of solidarity with the State, and reciprocity of rights and duties that are the foundation of the citizenship bond. However, the exception provided in Article 48, paragraph 4, does not apply to jobs which, although covered by the State or other public bodies, still do not involve any association with tasks within the public administration itself"[23].

The Court held in Case Bleis[24] that jobs excluded from the scope of Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU „ are those which, having regard to the tasks and responsibilities involved, are apt to display the characteristics of the specific activities of the public service in the spheres described above"[25].

In the judgment Colegio de Oficiales de la Marina Mercante Española[26], the Court stated that 'the concept of public administration, within the meaning of [Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU] must be interpreted and applied uniformly in all Member States of the [European Union] and therefore this cannot be left entirely to the sole discretion of Member States"[27]. This is why further, the Court repeats that the exception provided in Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU „does not apply to jobs, which, although related to a public body or otherwise, does not involve any association with tasks of the public administration itself"[28]. According to the Court, a Member State can reserve to its nationals, the job of captain and first mate on ships from the private field, flying its flag only if the rights and powers conferred under public law are effectively exercised regularly and do not represent a very small part of their activities.

Therefore, „a State cannot fit certain activities, for example, of economic or social type, within the derogation provided by the Treaty, by simply including them in the field of public law of the State and by their implementation"[29]. The Court held that „regardless of their classification in the Member State, nurses, teachers – of primary school or high school - as well as language assistants at universities are not employed in the public service"[30] within the meaning of Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU and that is because there is no „special bond of loyalty and reciprocity of rights and obligations between the State and the employee"[31]. From the Court's case-law, it results that „jobs of which it can be said that they require such loyalty and that they depend on the nationality bond"[32] shall include, cumulatively, two aspects, namely: 1. the participation in the exercise of powers conferred by public law and 2. it must assume duties designed to protect the general interests of the state"[33].

4. Conclusions

Under a constant case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union, the concept of „public administration" within the meaning of Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU concerns the employment which implies direct or indirect participation in the exercise of public powers and duties which have as object the preservation of the general interests of the State or of other public authorities and imply, thus from their holders, the existence of a special solidarity relation with the State, as well as reciprocity of rights and obligations which underlie the bond of citizenship. These criteria must be evaluated, from case to case, depending on the nature of the tasks and responsibilities involved in the job in question.

However, the notion of „public administration" within the meaning of Article 45 paragraph (4) TFEU must be given a uniform interpretation and application throughout the Union and cannot therefore be left to the sole discretion of Member States. In addition, this exception must be given an interpretation which limits its scope to what it is strictly necessary in order to preserve the interests which the Member States can protect.

The case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union should be taken into consideration by Member State authorities when they decide which jobs of the public sector are reserved for nationals. This aspect has been recognized including by the European Commission[34].

JURISPRUDENTIAL ISSUES CONCERNING THE BENEFICIARIES OF PROVISIONS OF ARTICLE 49 TFEU

Roxana-Mariana POPESCU*

Abstract

From the interpretation of Article 49 paragraph (1) TFEU it results that restrictions on the freedom of establishment are removed for the purpose to pursue independent activities under conditions of equality with nationals of the Member State of establishment. The beneficiaries of Article 49 TFEU are people moving from the territory of the State of origin (nationals of a Member State) on the territory of another Member State in order to pursue an independent activity, but only under the case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union; beneficiaries of these rights are also the Member State nationals who obtained qualifications or training in another Member State and then go back to their home state to conduct a business on grounds of that qualification or professional training.

Keywords: Article 49 TFEU; beneficiaries; ECJ case-law; recognition of professional qualifications; recognition of professional training.

1. General aspects

Under Article 49 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU), at the level of the European Union, „restrictions on the freedom of establishment of nationals of a Member State in another Member State are prohibited. This prohibition aims also at restrictions on the setting up of agencies, branches or subsidiaries by nationals of any Member State established in another Member State. The freedom of establishment includes access to independent activities and their exercise, as well as the setting up and management of undertakings, and in particular of companies or firms[1] (...) under the conditions laid down for its own nationals, by the law of the country of establishment". Thus, from the interpretation of Article 49 paragraph (1) TFEU it results that, on the one hand, restrictions on the freedom of establishment are eliminated and, on the other hand, the right „to pursue independent activities on equal terms with nationals of the Member State of establishment"[2] is set. After first reading the article, it can be interpreted that the beneficiaries of the rights mentioned above are only those persons moving from the territory of origin (they are nationals of a certain Member State). Furthermore, „its requirements are satisfied if the person exercising the right of establishment is treated the same as citizens"[3] of the host State (the State where the person moved). In reality, after a careful study of the doctrine of specialty, but especially of the case-law of the Court of Justice of the European Union[4], it is clear that Article 49 TFEU „received a broad interpretation on the two issues"[5] within the meaning that „citizens can, under certain conditions, capitalize the provisions of Article 49 against their own state"[6].

2. The direct beneficiaries of provisions of Article 49 TFEU

As mentioned before, the main beneficiaries of provisions of Article 49 TFEU are people moving from the country of origin to another Member State of the European Union. Invoking this right, by its beneficiaries, before the national authorities[7], is now possible after the Court of Justice in Luxembourg has given direct effect to Article 49 TFEU since 1974 in his famous judgment ruled in Reyners[8] case. In that case, Conseil d'Etat in Belgium addressed the Court two questions on the interpretation of Articles 52[9] and 55[10] of the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community (TEEC) concerning the establishment right, related to exercising the profession of lawyer. Those questions were raised in an action brought by a Dutch citizen, „holder of a legal degree under which in Belgium, the access to the profession of lawyer was granted, and who was excluded from that profession on account of his nationality, following the Royal Decree of August 24, 1970 regarding the title and the exercise of the legal profession of lawyer". Regarding the article that is the subject of our study, Conseil d'Etat wanted to know if Article 52 TEEC was, from the end of the transitional period, a „directly applicable provision". It must be mentioned that the question was raised on grounds of the absence, at that time, of certain directives adopted in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty, in order to attain the freedom of establishment as regards to a particular activity, although the transition period for adopting them had expired. In those circumstances, the Court considered that the Treaty had foreseen „that the freedom of establishment should be done at the end of the transitional period", which is why it asserted that Article 52 required such a precise obligation of result, the execution of which had to be facilitated, but not conditional to the implementation of a program of progressive measures"[11]. According to the Court, „the fact that this progressive character has not been complied with, leaves the obligation itself intact, after the deadline stipulated for its fulfillment"[12]. Therefore, „from the end of the transitional period, Article 52 of the Treaty has been a provision directly applicable, even despite the absence in a specific area, of directives set"[13] by the Treaty, though, added the Court", such directives have not lost all interest since they have preserved an important area of application of measures meant to facilitate the effective exercise of the right to the freedom of establishment"[14].

Two years later, in 1976, under the same conditions under which directives to attain the freedom of establishment concerning a particular activity were not adopted, the Court went back on the direct effect of Article 49 TFEU, in Thieffry[15] judgment. In that case, Cour d'appel de Paris formulated a question on the interpretation of article 57[16] TCEE on the mutual recognition of professional qualifications for the access to independent activities, especially for the purpose of admission in order to exercise the profession of lawyer. In fact, a Belgian lawyer was not admitted into the Ordre des lawyers auprès de la Cour de Paris (the Paris Bar), though he was the holder of a „Belgian degree of doctor of law, the equivalence of which to the university degree in French law was recognized by a French university, and who subsequently obtained „certificat d'aptitude à la profession d'avocat" (certificate of qualification for the legal profession of lawyer), after successfully passing that examination, in accordance with the French law"[17]. The reason to refuse the admission requirement was that „the person concerned did not hold a degree to justify a university degree or a PhD degree in French law"[18]. In Thierry, unlike Reyners, the reason for rejecting the application for registration in the bar was not that of citizenship, but the rejection was based on the recognition of professional qualifications. In those circumstances, the Court requested to be answered to the following question: „the fact to require a national of a Member State wishing to practice the profession of lawyer in another Member State, the national diploma provided by the law of the country of establishment, while the diploma which he obtained in his home country was the subject of recognition of equivalence by the university authorities of the country of establishment and allowed him to pass in that country the qualification examination for the legal profession of lawyer - examination which he passed - is it, in the absence of the directives set out (...) [by] the Treaty of Rome, an obstacle that goes beyond what is necessary to achieve the objective of Community provisions in question?"[19]. The Luxembourg Court held that „when the freedom of establishment provided in Article 52 [the current Article 49 TFEU] can be attained in a Member State either under the laws, regulations and administrative provisions[20] in force or under practices of the Government or of professional bodies, the genuine enjoyment of this freedom should not be denied to a person covered by Community law, just because, for a particular profession, the directives provided in Article 57 of the Treaty have not been adopted yet"[21]. The Court therefore prohibits national authorities of the host State to refuse access to the Bar of nationals of other Member States, on the grounds that they do not hold a French qualification, even if directives in this field have not been adopted yet.

In the same vein, the Court ruled in the case Patrick v./ Ministre des affaires culturelles[22]. In that case, a British national, holder of a diploma in architecture issued in the UK by the Architectural Association, requested permission to exercise the profession of architect in France and his permission „was refused on the ground that, under [a] law of (...) 1940, that authorization had (...) exceptional character (...) [because] there was no mutual agreement between France and the applicant's home country and that, in the absence of a specific convention to have that purpose, between the Member States of the EEC and, in particular, between France and the United Kingdom, the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community cannot replace it [and] art. TEEC 52-58, which refer to the freedom of establishment (...) [send] to achieve this freedom, to Council directives which have not been adopted yet". The Court wanted to know whether at the state of Community law on 9 August 1973 [...] a British national had reason to invoke in his favor, the benefit of the right of establishment to practice the profession of architect in a Member State of the Community"[23]. The Court's answer was emphatic in the sense that „a national of a (...) Member State, who holds a title recognized by the competent authorities of the Member State of establishment, equivalent to a degree issued and required in that State, shall enjoy the right of access to the architectural profession and to its exercise, under the same conditions as nationals of the Member State of establishment without having to meet additional conditions"[24].

In the same context, of beneficiaries of provisions of Article 49 TFEU, it is also included the recognition of equivalence of diplomas, aspect that has been the subject of the judgment ruled in the case Heylens[25]. „By its question, the referring Court seeks essentially to ascertain whether, when in a Member State, the access to a remunerated profession is subject to the holding of a national degree or of degrees obtained abroad, but recognized as its/their equivalent, the principle of free movement of workers enshrined in Article 48 of the Treaty [the EC][26] requires that the decision refusing to a worker, national of another Member State, the recognition of the equivalence of the degree issued by the Member State of which national he is, to be able to be subject to appeal in Court and to be motivated. The Court held that „since the requirement concerning the qualifications required to practice a certain profession must be reconciled with the imperatives of the free movement of workers, the recognition procedure of the equivalence of degrees should enable national authorities to ensure objectively that the degree obtained abroad attested that the holder had knowledge and qualifications if not identical, at least equivalent to those certified by the national degree. Assessing the equivalence of the degree obtained abroad must be made by taking into account exclusively the level of knowledge and skills that the degree, given the nature and duration of the studies and practical training which it attests as achieved, presumes to be acquired by its holder"[27]. The Court therefore considers that „when in a Member State, the access to a remunerated profession is subject to the holding of a national degree or of a degree obtained abroad recognized as its equivalent, the principle of free movement of workers enshrined in Article 48 of the Treaty requires that the decision refusing a worker, national of another Member State, the recognition of the equivalence of the degree issued by the Member State, the national of which he is, to be able to be subject to an appeal[28] in Court which may check its legality in relation to Community law and enables the party concerned to ascertain the grounds for the decision"[29].

Another important moment in the evolution of the direct effect of Article 49 TFEU is the judgment in the case Vlassopoulou[30]. Vlassopoulou represents the boundary between the period in which there was no legislation adopted to facilitate access to independent activities and their exercise and the period characterized by the adoption of directives concerning the mutual recognition of degrees, certificates and other formal qualifications, as well as for the coordination of laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the Member States relating to the access to and exercise of self-employment. In that case, the Court pointed out that although on December 21, 1989, was adopted Directive 89/48 / EEC on the general system for the recognition of higher education diplomas awarded for professional training lasting at least three years[31], it „did not apply to facts from [that] case"[32] because the transposition deadline was January 4, 1991 and the facts occurred prior to that date. Thus, the Court held that „a Member State notified on an application for authorization to pursue a profession to which the access is conditioned under national law, by the possession of a degree or professional qualification, has the obligation to take into consideration the degrees, certificates and other titles which the person concerned has obtained in order to pursue the same profession in another Member State by comparing the abilities certified by those degrees with the knowledge and qualifications required by the national rules"[33]. „The examination procedure should allow host authorities to ensure, objectively, that the foreign diploma certifies that the holder has knowledge and qualifications if not identical, at least equivalent to those attested by the national diploma. Assessing the equivalency of the degree obtained abroad must be exclusively made by taking into consideration the knowledge and skills that this degree, by taking into account the nature and duration of studies and practical training referred to in the degree, permits to infer that they were acquired by its holder"[34].

The situation did not change even when, the Member States implemented the necessary legislation to facilitate access to independent activities and their exercise, i.e. those Directives on the mutual recognition of diplomas, certificates and other evidence of formal qualifications and for coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the Member States relating to the access to and exercise of self-employment. In this regard, we mention Borrell[35]judgment where the Court resumed the previous case, as follows: section 11 of the judgment resumed section 16 of Vlassopoulou judgment; section 12 resumed section 13 of Heylens judgment and section 13 was taken from section 17 of Vlassopoulou. The same happened in Aranitis[36] judgment, the Court providing the solution by resorting to the jurisprudence already established prior to adopting the legislation to facilitate the access to independent activities and their exercise: pt. 31 of the judgment resumed Vlassopoulou (pt. 16) and Borrell (pt. 11) jurisprudence.

The analysis of the Court's decisions required Member States, „despite the diversity of national educational systems and training, and in the absence of coordination legislation at EU level, Article 49 TFEU imposes a clear obligation on the national authorities, to examine thoroughly the qualifications held by an EU national, to inform the person concerned of the reasons for which its qualification was not considered equivalent and to comply with his/her rights during the procedure"[37]. Under the Court's case-law, Member States cannot refuse the access of a citizen of an EU Member State, on the territory of another Member State, the access to a profession, because he does not have a qualification obtained in the host country or because, in the host state, a national recognition of the equivalence of foreign qualifications does not exist yet.

3. Expanding the provisions of Article 49 TFEU to the citizens of their home state

As mentioned before, Article 49 TFEU „received a broad interpretation on the two issues"[38] in the sense that „citizens can, under certain conditions, capitalize the provisions of Article 49 against their own state"[39]. An important role went to the Court of Justice of the European Union, which, in the judgment ruled in the case Knoors[40] argued that the fundamental freedoms of the European Union „would not be fully achieved if Member States could refuse the benefit of provisions of Community law to those of their nationals who have used the existing facilities of free movement and establishment and who acquired, by their virtue, their professional qualifications, specified by the directive, in a Member State other than the one whose nationality they already hold"[41]. The Court added that while „it is true that the Treaty provisions relating to the establishment and provision of services cannot be applied to situations which are purely internal to a Member State, it is no less true that the reference in Article 52 [now Article 49 TFEU] to „nationals of a Member State" who wish to establish themselves „in another Member State" cannot be interpreted so as to exclude from the benefit of Community law, the own nationals of a Member State, when they, by virtue of the fact that they resided legally in a Member State and gained a professional qualification recognized by the provisions of Community law are, in terms of their state of origin, in a situation that can be assimilated to that of all other subjects enjoying rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Treaty"[42].

4. Conclusions

Recognizing the right of establishment of persons practicing an independent activity was and still is an inexhaustible source for the Court in Luxembourg to enrich its case-law. Under the case-law[43] of the CJEU, Article 49 TFEU can be invoked by any citizen of a Member State of the European Union in another Member State, regardless of the country where the person concerned obtained a qualification or vocational training, as well as of citizens of a Member State who completed a qualification or professional training in another Member State and then returned to their home state to conduct a business under that qualification or professional training.

THE POTENTIAL AND LIMITATIONS OF TRUTH AND RECONCILIATION COMMISSIONS IN GENERATING JUDICIAL AND NON-JUDICIAL EFFECTS. THE PRESIDENTIAL COMMISSION FOR THE ANALYSIS OF THE COMMUNIST DICTATORSHIP IN ROMANIA.

Bianca Elena RADU*

Abstract

The transition periods that succeed totalitarian regimes are characterized by the efforts of new governments to recognize the violations of human rights that were committed in the past, to implement legitimate mechanisms to clarify the causes but also the consequences of the violation of human rights by the previous regimes, both at the individual and community level. The truth commissions represent one of these mechanisms, concentrating on the testimonies of the victims and on the recognition of their suffering. Depending on the case, the recommendations of the truth commissions have the role of generating judicial and non-judicial effects, of contributing and completing the bringing into effect of the penal justice, of facilitating the processes of restoration, of preventing the re-iteration of new abuses.

The present paper proposes to analyse the limitations and the transformative potential of the recommendations included in the report done by the Presidential Commission for the analysis of the communist dictatorship in Romania. We will analyse whether the information contained in this report has been useful in the judicial procedures (prosecutorial indictment and judges' motivation) which resulted in the conviction of Ioan Ficior and Alexandru Vișinescu, but also on other two civil sentences. The research approach imposes the use of a content analysis of the official and public documents, a comparative analysis and a historic analysis.

Keywords: Truth and Reconciliation Commissions, Lustration Law, Presidential Commission for the analysis of the communist dictatorship in Romania, Ioan Ficior, Alexandru Vișinescu.

1. Introduction

The Truth and Reconciliation Commissions represent the first complex process through which different segments of the population reunite to elaborate policies that are useful to reforms and new democratic constructs within a society. The activity of the Commissions exercises influences upon victims, but also on the community in general, upon the penal and civil trial cases, but also on non-judicial mechanisms. The central idea of the paper is to go beyond the description of the attributes of the Commissions and to capture how the activity of these Commissions can be useful in judicial processes. In the first part, we will argue for the necessity of these Commissions to exist, we will define the concept of a Truth and Reconciliation Commission and we will comment on its attributes. What we tried to do through the types of Commissions presented as examples (from Argentina and South Africa) was to underline the theoretical model of the paper. In other words, we will follow how the information contained in the report elaborated by the Commissions can supply evidence or can offer historic details that are useful in the penal and civil processes from transition periods (judicial effects) and how they can determine non-judicial effects as well (the feeling of justice, moral rehabilitation, the recognition of the sufferings of victims). In the second part of the paper we will analyse the impact of the activity and the report of the Presidential commission for the analysis of the communist dictatorship in Romania on the penal trials against Ioan Ficior and Alexandru Vișinescu, but also on other two civil sentences elaborated in the past years.

2.1. Why are restoration devices needed during the transition periods that succeed abusive regimes?

The societies that have been marked by protracted and generalised violence, by abuses and violations of human rights directed towards their own citizens are often socially fragmented and unprepared to function under new governing regimes. The crossing from one model of societal stability to another model of stability is done during a period of time named political, judicial and economic transition. During this entire transition process, what is taken into account is the change at the level of the macrostructure (the crossing from a totalitarian/authoritarian government to a democratic government, from a state of conflict, violence to one of peace), the changes at the level of the medial structure (new institutions, the outlining of a democratic culture based on independence and the good collaboration between the three state powers, the judicial, executive and legislative power) and the change at the microstructure (citizens, and their support to legitimate the new forms of government).

This reconstructive stage of the new social and judicial order can only be achieved through the support of the citizens, by regaining their trust in the new institutions of government. However, a significant number of citizens have suffered abuses, and have been oppressed by the old regime. In many cases, their abusers are free or, what's more, they are in leadership positions, in the organisational structures that are responsible for the construction of new societies. At this point, divisions within the society interfere, citizens who suffered abuses in the old regime manifesting mistrust and a lack of will in supporting the new reforms. The latter wish for their suffering to be recognised, for their abusers to be identified and punished for crimes and abuses committed, they wish for the truth to be made public so as to distinguish between abusers and the abused, between criminals and victims in the new social and judicial order. Despite the fact that that quest is dangerous, complex and often involves protracted advocacy by victims already marginalized by their societies.., those who demand an accounting for the past are increasingly prevailing[1].

On the other hand, the states have the obligation to propose concrete measures to rectify the prejudice suffered by the victims or their descendants. These obligations are provided by relevant documents such as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (Article 8), the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Article 2), the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhumane or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (Article 14).

The manner in which societies have chosen to confront the past, to manage the crises associated with periods of transition, to consolidate the citizens' trust in the act of justice and to create the basis for the new social institutions differ from one continent to another, from one country to another. Two such cases will be mentioned, the Cambodian case where the past was politically instrumented[2], and the case of South Africa, which is recognised for the most solid and functional Truth and Reconciliation Commission in the world.

After the fall of Khmer Rouge's regime in 1980, the new government from Cambodia, formed from the affiliates of the old leader, decided not to make the violent past public and to cut the young generations' access to the truth, proposing forgiving without confronting the past. The politics that was chosen was one of forgetfulness and of the fear of speaking about the atrocities previously committed, in spite of the fact that one fifth of the population had been killed by the old regime[3] and despite the recommendations from the UN experts to create a Truth and Reconciliation Commission. A special role was held by the international community which invested both human and financial resources, so that in 2006, 36 years after the fall of Rouge's regime, extraordinary chambers have started functioning in the Cambodian courts (after an accord signed in 2003 between the government and the UN) for the prosecution of those who are guilty of the atrocities committed by the old regime. The international community cannot however be a substitute for the lack of mobility from behalf of the majority of citizens. Without public support, without the support of citizens who are animated by the desire of knowing the truth, the processes of social reconstruction are difficult to carry through.

Over a period of 45 years in South Africa, the National African Congress conducted a politics characterised by treatments that were discriminatory, abusive, and criminal against a coloured majority population and activists who militated for their rights. In 1994, after Nelson Mandela was elected president, a central place in the public space and within groups of professionals was occupied by questions such as: how do we relate to the past?; can those who committed abuses and crimes during Apartheid be forgiven?; if yes, under what conditions?. The answers to such questions imposed the creation of a Truth and Reconciliation Commission. In 1995 the Promotion of National Unity and Reconciliation Act was voted in Parliament, and in 1996 the Commission formed of 17 members chosen through public nominalisation and selection started functioning, under the coordination of Archbishop Desmond Tutu. Being supported by a human and financial resource (300 employees and $1.8 million for the first two and a half years)[4], the Commission had as responsibilities to offer individual amnesties (a particularity of this committee), to cite witnesses, to collect evidence, to start a witness protection programme for those who decided to testify. 2000 out of the 21000 victims who decided to testify have done so publicly, a TV channel being specially created to familiarise the population with the purpose of hearings and with the steps taken by the commission[5]. Out of the 7115 requests for amnesty that were submitted, 4500 were rejected while for the ones that were accepted the Commission decided on amnesty only if the political factor occupied a determining place in the motivation of the crime. In the cases where the persons who submitted a request for individual amnesty had committed severe crimes, the individuals were heard publicly before the members of the Commission, the legal representatives of the victims or before the victims themselves.

There were numerous attempts to slow down the activity of the Commission from the representatives of the former government and of former leaders (former presidents P. Botha and F. Klerk, representative Mbeki, etc) and numerous questions about the efficiency of the Commission regarding the complex process of reconciliation in South Africa. A relevant aspect however for the research approach of the present study is the presence of the complementariness between traditional justice and the Truth and Reconciliation Commissions. The Truth and Reconciliation Commission from South Africa offered evidence in the courts records of those who were guilty of severe crimes, such an example being former president Botha, who was convicted and fined.

The two examples mentioned above had as a purpose to trace the ends of a vaster web of options. Between choosing not to confront the past and creating a model Truth and Reconciliation Commission, there are other ways as well that have been adopted by new governments during transition periods: lustration, public access to security archives, material and moral compensations for the victims, convictions of abusers, the rehabilitation of victims who had been detained, truth and reconciliation commissions.

Lustration and the access to security archives are more often encountered in Central and Eastern Europe. Lustration is based on the presumption according to which the new regime cannot be legitimate unless the access of former office holders to public positions is forbidden. After numerous difficulties regarding the implementation of such a law, the countries from Central and Eastern Europe have chosen different paths: the Czech Republic adopted a first lustration law in 1991, then renewed it in 1996, and subsequently in 2000 for 5 years; according to the political orientation of the government Hungary had several attempts, namely they voted the lustration law in 1994, in 1996 they restricted its applicability, while in 2000 they returned to the tougher variant of the law; Poland voted the law in 1997 and started applying it in 1998; Romania voted for the law in 2012).

Truth commissions on the other hand are methods that have become familiar after the 80s in Africa (Chad 1990, Nigeria 1999, Sierra Leone 2000, Ghana 2002, Congo 2003, Morocco 2004, Liberia 2006, Kenya 2008, Togo 2009, Ivory Coast 2011), Asia (South Korea 2000 and 2005, Panama 2001, East Timor 2002, Solomon Islands 2008, Thailand 2010) and South America (Argentina 1983, Uruguay 1984 and 2000, Chile 1989 and 2003, El Salvador 1992, Guatemala 1994, Ecuador 1996 and2007, Peru 2001, Paraguay 2003, Honduras 2010).

2.3. What are Truth and Reconciliation Commissions

Truth and Reconciliation Commissions (TRC) enlist in the current that promotes human rights in the 20th century and represent an instrument of transitional justice, a non-judicial instrument through which generalised abuses that have been committed in the recent past of a country are investigated. The International Centre for Transitional Justice (ICTJ) has pointed out around 40 such commissions at the international level starting with the 80s[6].

They are named Truth Commissions since their existence is justified by a wider concept about truth during periods of crisis, where the exceedance of abuses and the violence models from the recent past impose an approach to match. Certainly, the search for the truth finds itself at the centre of the functioning of traditional justice, but it occupies a special position during transition periods. The individuals who suffered want for the truth about their traumatic past to be revealed, a desire that is animated by a vast series of motives amongst which we can mention: moral rehabilitation, recovery of prejudice, the desire for these atrocities to not repeat themselves, liberation from the burden of the past, the desire for justice to be served for them, to participate in the construction of new institutions based on trust and under legitimate conditions.

Another objective of the Commissions is reconciliation, so that at a different level, a more profound one, the right to the truth could lead to a possible forgiveness from behalf of those who were abused. Although the abuser-victim encounter is commonly found as a desideratum in the theoretical models, and it is very rarely applied in practice, reconciliation can manifest itself under different forms: an official recognition of the traumatic past by those who committed violence or by the new governments, the adoption of a new constitution that guarantees fundamental rights and freedoms, free and transparent elections according to international standards, the freeing of political prisoners etc.

Priscilla Hayner systematizes the attributes of the Truth and Reconciliation Commissions within a comprehensive definition: A truth commission concentrates its activity on events from the past, investigates models of violence that took place over a period of time, directly targets the affected population in a wider sense as well, basing itself on information about its experience, functions over a limited period of time, it is officially recognised and authorised to function by the governments of the states in question, and has as a final result the elaboration of a report which includes the results of the activities but also a series of recommendations for reforms[7].

A series of clarifications are needed regarding the existence and functioning of Commissions.

A first aspect would be related to the moment in time when these commissions start their activity but also to the period of time that is necessary for them to function. In regards to the moment when the Commission starts functioning, researchers in the field consider that there is a connection of direct proportionality between the former and the efficiency of the Commission. If a Commission starts to function at a moment that is as close as possible to the installation of the transition, its activity can benefit both from the support of the population whose memory is still connected to the events from the recent past and from political support, from easier access to information in order to establish the people responsibilities for the violence committed[8]. In regards to the period of time in which a commission can function, it is considered that on average it would not be indicated for it to exceed two-three years despite the fact that it has a complex series of responsibilities such as sorting and organising documents, processing the testimonies from the most important cases, elaborating a report with clear recommendations. The logic according to which the Commissions should have a clear deadline that is limited to a short period of time comes from the possibility that their recommendations could be implemented. If the functioning time of the Commission is very long as it was in the case of Uganda 1986 (9 years), there would be the risk for the public and the representatives of the government to lose their interest in its activity.

Another relevant aspect would be connected to the members of the Commission. The Commissions could be exclusively formed from national members, mixed or international. Depending on the case, the international members are associated with the neutrality and efficiency of the Commission's activity while national members are associated with a good knowledge of the complex situation of the transition from the countries in question. Advantages and disadvantages are encountered in both cases. We could recall the case of the Commission from El Salvador where all of the members were foreign. The moment when the Commission recommended in the final report that a meaningful number of members of the military forces should be excluded from the army since they had committed abuses, the members of the Commission received death threats, two of them leaving the country[9].

The members of the Commissions have the responsibility of collecting evidence, analysing files, ensuring the physical, psychological and moral protection of witnesses, elaborating a final report. The professional and moral profile of the members represents an important indicator in the functioning of the Commissions. In spite of the fact that such a Commission is decided by the executive powers of the state, its members must be chosen according to criteria of impartiality, through public selection, and by excluding political criteria. A positive example would be the one of the Commission from Ecuador where a part of the members of the Commission were representatives of non-governmental organizations, a hailed decision since the commissions represent an instrument of civil societies.

The third aspect that we will refer to is connected to the legitimacy of the existence of Commissions. Their creation depends on the society's history and cultural, economic and political particularities. For a Commission to be legitimate and efficient, it would have to be a response in the search for truth and justice from behalf of the society in general and of the victims in particular. An ideal model to follow would presuppose a preliminary consultation with the victims and their families, with the representatives of the civil society.

The last aspect that will be mentioned is related to the activities that the Commissions have the right to carry out: accessing archives; conducting public or private interviews; collecting information from the testimonies from the victims, their families, various witnesses or even from abusers, in certain situations; accessing official documents. Some Commissions also have the authority to send citations, to share the results of their work with the judicial authorities, to make recommendations for those responsible of crimes and violent acts to be legally convicted, to publish the names of those who committed abuses[10].

The first body that fulfilled the attributes of a Commission, even though it was not called a Truth and Reconciliation Commission, was the Commission from Argentina, created under President Raul Alfonsin in 1983. During the 1978-1983 military dictatorship, between 10000 and 30000 people were arrested, tortured or went missing. The Commission was named National Commission on the Disappeared (CONADEP) and functioned for a period of 9 months, its activity being widely disseminated to the public through mass-media. The CONADEP report, edited in 1984 and containing 50000 pages was entitled Nunca Mas (Never Again), was translated in various languages and was based on thorough investigations: documentation regarding the disappearing of 8961 people, 7000 testimonies, 1500 interviews about the approximately 300 torture centres and the methods used by the military dictatorship during 1976-1983.[11]

What is relevant for the present study is the manner in which the information concentrated in the CONADEP report came to be material presented to prosecutors and was used as key evidence in the trials that resulted in the conviction of those who were responsible for the abuses from the past. Despite the periods of pardon and amnesty that followed under the new president Menem, in 2009, 1400 of individuals guilty of crimes were convicted and 68% of them were arrested in 2011.

This report represented a first part of what Kathryn Sikkink calls "justice cascade" at both the national and international level, "a basis for the modern human rights movement"[12].

In Central and Eastern Europe the methods of the transitional justice through which the confrontation with the traumatic past was chosen differ from other regions. The countries chose to select and to locally apply either lustration laws, as aforementioned, or access to the security files and less the instrument represented by the Truth and Reconciliation Commissions, there having therefore been only three such commissions created (two in Germany) and one in Romania. The totalitarian regime was based on the control exercised by the political police that instituted terror and submission at a wide level, the state extending its tentacles in the private life of citizens as well. Any attempt at expressing an opinion that was in disagreement with the values of the state party or any act of resistance was severely punished either with acts of physical, psychological or moral violence or with the confinement of those in question. The access to educational and medical services was forbidden to individuals who came from other social mediums than the ones preferred by the regime.

The first Commission from Central and Eastern Europe was also the first German Commission called the Commission of Inquiry for the Assessment and Consequences of the Socialist Unity Party Dictatorship in Germany which functioned between 1992 and 1994. Created by the German Parliament and coordinated by Rainer Eppelman, the Commission did not have the right to cite witnesses, but investigated the 1949-1989 period by using archives, academic papers, testimonies from those involved, public hearings[13]. (Commission of Inquiry for the Assessment and Consequences of the Socialist Unity Party –SED- Dictatorship in Germany, 1992-1994).

In addition to investigating the acts, this Commission had a symbolic mission, namely the investigation of the consequences of the practices used by the old regime. In other words, it was not desired for the behavioural patterns of the oppressors as well as the generalised terror rooted in the old regime to have unwanted consequences on democratic reforms.

The report was finalised in June 1994 and it covered all of the initially proposed objectives: the practices of the Stasi security German forces and of the acting power, the role of the ideology in education and in day-to-day life, the functioning of the church, the relationship between state and church, the justice system, and the opposition[14].

One of the recommendations targeted the creation of another such commission, so that in 1995 the Commission of Inquiry for the Assessment and Elimination of the Consequences of the SED Dictatorship in the German Process of Unification started its activity, being formed from members of Parliament and independent members. Thus, the process of accepting the mistakes of the past was continued and the efforts to incorporate it in the new democratic construct materialized with the intention of not repeating the same mistakes.

2.4. The Presidential Commission for the Analysis of the Communist Dictatorship in Romania

The necessity to recognise the crimes committed during the communist regime, and their illegitimate traumatic character has been supported by a considerable number of intellectuals, who signed a petition that was pushed through in March 2006, before the acting President, T.Băsescu[15]. The Romanian civil society supported in turn this initiative of condemning the abusive acts that were perpetrated during the totalitarian regime which was temporally delimitated from 6 March 1945 to the Revolution of December 1989[16]. The Presidential Commission for the Analysis of the Communist Dictatorship in Romania (PCACDR) was thus founded in April 2006, by presidential decision[17].

The PCACDR was mandated to point out the violations brought to human rights by the totalitarian regime during its almost 50 years of existence, to elaborate a report about the manner in which the institutional practices that lead to "the perpetuation of the communist dictatorship" worked and how the political leaders of the time maintained the institutional structure and resorted to actions that resulted in abuses and crimes.

Throughout the few months it functioned, the members of the Commission concentrated on consulting the archives, and on the studies that had been previously published by them or by other experts. Unlike other Commissions, the PCACDR did not base itself on information obtained either from public or private hearings or from conducting interviews or visiting detention centres[18]. At the end of their activity, the members of the PCACDR elaborated a 666 page report with the following structure: An Introduction entitled "The nature, purpose and effects of the totalitarian communist regime: Ideology, power and political practice in Romania, 1945-1989", followed by three chapters (The Romanian Communist Party – chapter I, The Repression – chapter II, Society, Economy, Culture – chapter III) and a section of Conclusions entitled "The necessity to analyse, renounce and condemn the communist regime". The report ends with the biographies of the nomenclature[19].

The report was adopted by the president of Romania as an official document and was made public through the website of the Presidential Administration[20] being set to be published as a book in 2007. On 18 December 2006, during a common meeting between the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate from Parliament, the acting President, T. Băsescu, faced up to the conclusions of the final Report of the PCACDR[21]. This moment marked the official condemnation of the "inhumane, constantly, methodically and perseveringly repressive nature of the communist regimes"[22].

In the report it is mentioned that the "communist regime in Romania (1945-1989) was illegitimate and criminal", so that under its management there were "indefeasible crimes against humanity"[23] that were perpetrated. In the same final concluding section, in the subsection entitled "So as to not forget, to condemn, to never repeat", the report contains a set of recommendations centred on: 1. condemnation; 2. memorisation; 3. legislation and justice; 4. investigation and archives; 5. education.

In regards to the recommendations for legislation and justice, there were a series of changes that were made:

1.changes regarding the recommendation of "declaring the crimes and the abuses of the communist regimes – according to existing evidence – as being crimes against humanity and, in consequence, as judicially indefeasible".

On 25 June 2009 the Law no. 286 from the 2009-Penal Code was adopted, published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no. 510 from 24 July 2009, and came into effect on 1 February 2014. Under title XII (Crimes of genocide against humanity and of war) in Chapter I crimes of genocide and those against humanity are incriminated – art. 428 CP (genocide); art. 439 CP (infractions against humanity).

Article 153 par. 2 letter a of the 2009 Penal Code is devoted to the indefeasibility of the infractions against humanity: "the prescription does not remove the penal responsibility in the case of genocide, crimes against humanity and of war no matter the date when they were committed."

2.changes regarding the recommendation of "immediately adopting the Lustration Law".

On 19 May 2010, the Romanian Parliament adopted the Lustration Law regarding the temporary limitation of access to certain positions and public offices for persons who were a part of the power structures and of the repressive apparatus of the communist regime during 6 March 1945- 22 December 1989.

Under art. 146 letter a from the Constitution, the law was submitted to the constitutionality examination and through the Decision no 820 from 7 June 2010, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 420 from 23 June 2010, the Constitutional Court ascertained that the criticised law was unconstitutional.

The Constitutional Court retained the following arguments of unconstitutionality[24].

In the conception of the criticised law the judicial responsibility and the sanctioning are founded on the holding of a dignity or position in the structures and the repressive apparatus of the former totalitarian communist regime. The judicial responsibility, no matter its nature, is a responsibility that is mainly individual and exists only based on judicial incidents and judicial acts perpetrated by a person, and not on presumptions.

The Lustration Law is excessive in relation to its legitimate purpose, since it does not allow the individualisation of the measure. Even though the criticised law allows resorting to the justice system to justify the interdiction of the right to run for and be elected in positions and dignities, it does not bring under regulation an adequate mechanism with the purpose of establishing the carrying out of some concrete activities directed against fundamental rights and liberties. In other words, the law does not offer adequate guarantees for judicial control over the application of restrictive measures.

Lustration is allowed only in relation to those individuals who effectively took part, together with state organisations, in severe violations of human rights and liberties.

The dispositions of art. 2 from the Lustration Law exceeds the constitutional frame, providing a new interdiction of the right to access public positions, which does not respect art. 53 from the Constitution that refers to restraining the exercising of certain rights or some liberties.

The Lustration Law prejudices the principle of non-retroactivity of the law established in art. 15 par. (2) from the Constitution, according to which "The law rules only for the future, with the exception of the penal or misdemeanour law that is more favourable". The law is applied for acts and actions perpetrated after it came in effect.

The Lustration Law was adopted 21 years after the fall of communism. For this reason, the belated character of the law, without having a decisive role in itself, is considered by the Court as being relevant for the disproportionality of the restrictive measures, even though a legitimate purpose was pursued through them. The proportionality of the measure toward the pursued purpose must be looked at, in each case, through the prism of the evaluation of the political situation of the country, as well as through the prism of other circumstances. In this sense, the Court also invoked the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights regarding the legitimacy of the lustration law in time, (the case of Zdanoka v. Latvia 2004, the case of Partidul Comuniștilor (Nepecerişti) v. Romania 2005).

As a result of the giving of the unconstitutionality decision, the Senate re-examined the Lustration Law and rejected it.

After the debates regarding the Lustration Law, the Chamber of Deputies adopted a regulation with a different judicial content on 28.02.2012.

Through the Decision no. 308 from 28 March 2012, published in the Official Gazette no. 309 from 9.05.2012[25], the Constitutional Court admitted notification forwarded by the President of the High Court of Cassation and Justice of Romania (I.C.C.J.) and ascertained that the Lustration Law regarding the temporary limitation of access to public positions and dignities for individuals who were a part of the power structures and the repressive apparatus of the communist regime during 6 March 1945 – 22 December 1989 is unconstitutional.

The Court ascertained that, by going through the re-examination procedure and adopting the law under the form that is the object of the examination of constitutionality in the cause in question, Parliament did not respect the constitutional provisions contained in art. 147 par. (2) regarding the effects of the decisions given by the Constitutional Court within the a priori constitutionality examination, which stipulate the Parliament's obligation to re-examine the dispositions from the law that have been determined as being unconstitutional.

The Court retained that, under the conditions where the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies proceeded to re-examining the Lustration Law regarding the temporary limitation of the access to public positions and dignities for individuals who were a part of the power structures and the repressive apparatus of the communist regime from 6 March 1945 – 22 December 1989 and to adopting the law, even though it was in a modified form, the two Chambers of Parliament did not respect the constitutional provisions that refer to the effects of the decisions made by the Constitutional Court.

In February 2013, the Senate rejected the Lustration Law, while on 6.03.2013, the Judicial Committee from the Chamber of Deputies rejected the Lustration Law as well.

3.changes regarding the recommendation of adopting laws that target reparations.

On 2 June 2009 the Law no. 221/2009 regarding convictions with a political character and the administrative measures that are related to them, and with verdicts given during 6 March 1945 – 22 December 1989 was adopted, then published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 396 from 11 June 2009, and it came into effect on 14.06.2009. This law underwent changes through the OUG no. 32/2010, the Law no. 202/2010, and the Law no. 42/2013.

The Romanian Parliament adopted the Law 226/2011 regarding moral and material restorations for the former active military force that had been abusively removed from the army during 23 August 1944 – 31 December 1961, which was published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no. 854 from 2 December 2011. This law was changed through the Law no. 27/2014, published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no. 201 from 21 March 2014 and through the Law no. 80/2015, published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no. 263 from 20 April 2015.

Ficior Ioan

Through the penal sentence no. 58/F, given on 30 March 2016 by the Bucharest Appeal Court, 2nd Penal Division[26], under art. 358 par. 1 and par. 3 with the application of art. 41 par. 2 of the Penal Code from 1968 (with the regulations in effect during the period between the changes brought through the Decree-Law no. 6/1990 and the Law no. 140/1996), with the application of art. 5 from the Penal Code, sentenced the accused Ficior Ioan to 20 years in prison, for the infraction of illiberal treatments. It forbade the accused, under art. 65 of the Penal Code from 1968, the rights provided by art. 64 par. 1 letters a, b, c and e from the same code over a period of 7 years as a complementary sentence, after the execution of the main prison sentence or after the latter is considered as having been executed. Under art. 67 par. 1 and 2 of the Penal Code from 1968 the Court ruled for the military demotion of the accused, as a complementary sentence.

The Court forbade the accused, under art. 71 of the Penal Code from 1968, the rights provided by art. 64 par. 1 letters a, b, c and e from the same code, throughout the execution of the main prison sentence, as an accessory sentence. The Court admitted in part the civil actions formulated by the civil parties M.I., D.M., G.N., B.I.D., M.C.EV, R.I., S.M.M., H.M., it obligated the accused in solidarity with the parties responsible from a civil point of view the Romanian State (through the Ministry of Public Finance), the Ministry of Internal Affairs and the National Administration of Penitentiaries to pay €20. 000 to the civil party B.I.D., €40. 000 to the civil party M.I., €70. 000 to the civil party D.M, €30. 000 to the civil party G.N., €40. 000 to the civil party M.C.EV., €40 000 to the civil party R.I., €40. 000 to the civil party S.M.M., and €30. 000 to the civil party H.M., in its equivalent in lei, at the official exchange rate of the NRB (National Bank of Romania) at the moment of payment, under the title of moral compensations.

Under art. 404 par. 4 letter c the Court maintained as a measure of insurance a seizure on the pension of the accused as it was ruled through the closure from 16 October 2015, to guarantee the payment of compensations and of judicial expenses, up to the sum of €310. 000 (in its equivalent in lei at the official exchange rate of the NRB, at the moment of payment of compensations) and to the sum established under judicial expenses.

In order to give this sentence, the Court retained that, during 1958-1963, the accused, as a lieutenant and commander of the Work colony in Periprava, through repeated material acts, which consisted of actions and inactions that alternated in time, that were committed by violating or disregarding the law or the obligations imposed by the positions he held, as a result of discretionary and abusive exercise of his attributions, having as a warrant an adversity relationship declared not just by the accused but also by those who acted under his guidance, from political reasons, he submitted the collective of detainees, incarcerated in this camp, "the enemies of the people", who were categorically found under his power and at his discretion and that of the regime of the time, to illiberal, inhumane, and degrading treatments, to both physical and psychological torture, to extermination. In its motivation, in regards to the penal side of the cause, the Court assessed that:

- the actions of the accused were incriminated under all of the successive penal laws;
- the actions of the accused became indefeasible no matter the applicable law;
- to determine the penal law that is more favourable, what is imposed is not the examination of the incrimination conditions, but the penal treatment that is applicable under each law in part;
- the penal law that is more favourable for the accused from the point of view of the punishing treatment is the Penal Code from 1968, in the regulation existing during the time between the changes brought to the Code through the Decree-Law no. 6/1990 and the Law 140/1996, since during this period the special minimum was identical, but the special maximum was of 20 years, the lowest out of all the maximal punishments provided by law in the successive penal laws.

In regards to the civil side of the cause, the Court ascertained that the civil parties are entitled to receive moral compensations, based on the punishable civil responsibility, some of the parties being considered for direct prejudice, other civil parties being considered for indirect prejudice, since they are collateral victims of the actions from the present cause.

Comments: The research approach of this paper follows the role of the activity of the Presidential Commission and of the report it elaborated in generating judicial and non-judicial effects.

Regarding generating judicial effects, we can recall that:

In the indictment act drafted by the representative of the General Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice of Romania and presented in the reasoning of the Penal sentence, the Final Report of the Presidential Commission for the Analysis of the Communist Dictatorship in Romania is mentioned among the administered evidence. The Court listed also among the administered evidence, the Final Report of the Presidential Commission. The fragment taken from the Report emphasises both the historic context and the details regarding the extermination conditions and practices stipulated in the secret regulations. "The prison, the place where offenders carry out their sentence and are disciplined, became in communist Romania the place where what took place was the elimination, re-education, torture, surveillance, and physical and psychological destruction of all of those who opposed, could have opposed or could not accept the new political-economic-social order disposed by communist authorities. Naturally, by copying the Soviet model of the Gulag, Romanian communist leaders institutionally and procedurally transformed – in terms of the detention regime – the entire inherited penitentiary system, by gradually adding to it the form and substance of an infernal truth...The militarization of the penitentiary, and especially the new secret regulation intended for the prisons where the political detainees were taken, adopted in September 1948, copied from or inspired by the Soviet ones marked the passing toward the slow, physical and psychological extermination of opposers, through a complete isolation from families and society, through starvation and inhumane living conditions, through the lack of medical assistance and through constant surveillance." (p. 231, The Report of the Presidential Commission)

In regards to the role of the Report of the Presidential Commission in generating non-judicial effects it can be mentioned the latter are a direct consequence of the final judgement of the torturer Ioan Ficior and, thus, an indirect consequence of the adoption of the report and, implicitly, of the activity of the Presidential Commission. There are two directions that could be mentioned:

- At an individual level, for the individuals who represented civil parties in this trial, the moral compensations also signify the recognition of the moral, psychological and physical abuses suffered by the victims or their survivors. The official recognition brings with it the rehabilitation of the victims or of their relatives as well. As it can be observed from the theoretical model, the Commissions have the purpose of investigating and making the truth known but also of reconciling the parties. These moral compensations could be a path toward reconciliation;
- At a collective level, the fact that there was an official recognition of the abuses that were committed by the past regime could signify the shaping of a sense of justice, which is extremely important in receiving the vote of confidence from the population in order to legitimise the reforms and the new forms of governing. The sense of justice is the one that prevails, despite the fact that the torturer Ficior received a final verdict many years after the fall of communism, and in spite of the fact that this conviction cannot save the suffering of the victims and cannot neutralise the barbaric practices of the abusers. This conviction contains in itself a symbolic value: the promotion of the truth with the purpose of both rehabilitating the dignity of fellow men and understanding the past in order to not repeat the reproduction of regimes where torturers can use the law to commit crimes and destroy lives.

Vișinescu Alexandru

Through the penal sentence no. 122/F given on 20 April 2015 by the Bucharest Court of Appeal, 1st Penal Division[27], under art. 358 par. 1 and par. 3 corroborated with art. 41 par. 2 from the 1968 Penal Code (with the regulations in effect during the period between the changes brought through the Decree-Law no. 6/1990 and the Law no. 140/1996) with the application of art. 5 from the Penal Code, sentenced the accused Vișinescu Alexandru to the main sentence of 20 years in prison, for committing the infraction of illiberal treatments (infraction against humanity), on an ongoing basis.

Under art. 65 par. 2 and par. 3 from the 1968 Penal Code, the Court forbade the accused, under the title of complementary sentence, to exercise the rights provided by art. 64 par. 1 letter a, letter b, letter c and letter e from the same code, over a period of 5 years after executing his main sentence or after the latter is considered as having been executed. Under art. 67 par. 1 and par. 2 from the 1968 Penal Code, the Court disposed, under the title of complementary sentence, the military demotion of the accused (having the rank of lieutenant -colonel in reserve). Under art. 71 par. 1, par. 2 and par. 3 from the 1968 Penal code, the Court forbade the accused, under the title of accessory sentence, to exercise the rights provided in art. 64 par. 1 letter a, letter b, letter c and letter e from the same code, over the period when the main sentence is being executed.Under art. 397 par. 1 reported to art. 25 par. 1 and to art. 19 par. 1, par. 2 and par. 5 from the Code of penal procedure, the Court admitted, in part, the civil actions formulated in the penal trial by the civil parties I.E., E.N. and C.A.M. and obligated the accused, in solidarity with the parties responsible from a civil point of view the Romanian State (through the Ministry of Public Finance), the Ministry of Internal Affairs and the National Administration of Penitentiaries to pay €100 000 (in its equivalent in lei at the official exchange rate of the National Bank of Romania at the moment of payment) to the civil party I.E., €50 000 (in its equivalent in lei at the official exchange rate of the National Bank of Romania at the moment of payment) to the civil party E.N., and €150 000 (in its equivalent in lei at the official exchange rate of the National Bank of Romania at the moment of payment) to the civil party C.A.-M., under the title of moral compensations.

Under art. 404 par. 4 letter c reported to art. 249 par. 5 thesis I from the Code of penal procedure, maintained the ensuring measures (sequestration and seizure), instituted through the closing from 22 October 2014 for the restoration of the prejudice, on the assets of the accused up to the sum of €300 000 (in its equivalent in lei at the official exchange rate of the National Bank of Romania at the moment of payment of moral compensations toward the civil parties).

In order to give this sentence, the Court retained that, during 1 July 1956 – 13 April 1963, the accused, as commander of the Râmnicu-Sărat Pententiary, according to a unique resolution, through repeated material acts (consisting of actions and inactions), which alternated in time according to the specific nature of each type of such acts, committed by violating or disregarding the law or of the obligations imposed by that quality or as a result of a discretionary exercise, by abusing his position, of his attributions, having as a warrant an adversity relation taken on by him, submitted, due to political reasons, the collective of "counter-revolutionary" detainees imprisoned in the given penitentiary, the other side of the same relation, found under his power, to illiberal treatments (inhumane and degrading), torture (physical and psychological) and extermination.

In its motivation, in regards to the penal side of the cause, the Court assessed the following:

- the actions committed by the accused are

[27] Sentința penală nr. 122/F given on 20 April 2015 by the Bucharest Court of Appeal, 1st Penal Division, final through the Sentința penală nr. 51/A given on 10 February 2016 by the High Court of Cassation and Justice -Penal Division, unpublished.

incriminated by all the penal laws that succeeded from the first material acts of execution to present;

- the penal responsibility of the accused for the actions retained in his duty, is not removed through prescription;
- the determination of the more favourable penal law, according art. 5 from the Penal Code, must be done in relation to the criterion of the sanctioning treatment provided in the incrimination norms from the moment when the actions were committed;
- the penal law that is more favourable to the accused, by taking into consideration the criterion of the sanctioning treatment, is the 1968 Penal Code, in the regulation existing in the period between the changes brought by the Decree-Law no. 6/1990 and the Law no. 140/1996, since the incrimination norm contained in art. 358 par. 1 and par. 3 from that code provides, in the case of the prison sentence, the minimal special maximum of 20 years in prison, to which, only optionally, in considering the ongoing form of the infraction, provided by art. 41 par. 2, an increase of up to 5 years, according to art. 42 reported to art. 34 par, 1 letter a and par. 2 can be added.

In regards to the civil side of the cause, the Court ascertained that all the three civil parties are entitled to receive compensations, based on the punishable civil responsibility of the author of the illicit action (the accused) – art. 998 from the 1864 Civil Code and of the legal persons who answer from a civil point of view for the action in question together with the accused (art. 1000 par. 3 from the 1864 Civil Code).

Comments:

Just as in the previous case, following the theoretical model of the paper, we will take the role of the Report of the Presidential Commission in generating judicial and non-judicial effects.

Judicial effects:

If in the previous case we could observe that the information in the report was administered as inscribed evidence, in this case the situation is slightly different.

First of all, on page 186 from the Report it is mentioned that "Vișinescu, the director of the Râmnicu Sărat prison in 1951, personally tortured Ion Mihalache, and he also refused him medical assistance, even more, in the middle of winter, he would order for water to be thrown on him, in his cell.." Even though this information was not administered as inscribed evidence for the accused V.A., it is proof of the practices used by the latter, practices mentioned both in the speech for the prosecution and in the sentence motivation.

The label of torturer attributed to the accused V.A. is found both in the court decisions and in the Report of the Presidential Commission.

Second of all, the High Court of Cassation and Justice of Romania ascertained that the penal responsibility for the imputed actions to the accused V.A. was declared indefeasible by law, before the prescription date provided at the moment when the actions were committed to came to fruition. From that moment on one cannot discuss the prescription institution and its effect in relation to the more favourable penal law. In the part of the report of the Presidential Commission allotted to recommendations regarding legislation and justice, it is mentioned that it would be advisable to declare the crimes and abuses of the communist regime as being crimes against humanity and, as a result, judicially indefeasible. One cannot omit the consonance that exists between this conviction, the recommendations from the Report and the enactment of article 153 par. 2 letter a from the 2009 Penal Code whose content was aforementioned.

Non-judicial effects:

First of all, V.A. represents the first case where a torturer was sentenced for crimes against humanity directed towards the opponents of the communist regime who were imprisoned at the Râmnicu Sărat Penitentiary. In the theoretical model we mentioned the concept of "justice cascade", in other words of the inherent potential of these types of trials to generate other similar trials, with the purpose of instituting again the sense of justice with the community.

Second of all, the notification was done by the Institute for the Investigation of Communist Crimes and the Memory of the Romanian Exile, a governmental institution, but which is supported by the journalists from the Gândul Daily. This translated the fact that the civil society had an important role. As it was mentioned in the theoretical model, the Truth and Reconciliation represent an instrument that would not have existed in any country if it had not been supported by various organizations and associations of the civil society. This conviction represents a success for the actions undertaken by the civil society, with at least two relevant meanings. Without the civil society, the democratic systems cannot be called democratic, in other words what took place was a step toward consolidating the democratic levers in the Romanian society. The recognition of the suffering has an effect of absolution for both the victims and the civil society, and just as in the first case it can contribute to the activation of networks of trust in social institutions and especially in justice.

2.5.2. Civil Trials

Compensations, Law no. 221/2009

Through the civil sentence no. 192 from 15 June 2010, T.G.-Civil Division admitted in part the civil action formulated by the complainants P.C. and P.E. in contradiction with the defendant, the Ministry of Public Finance, and obligated the defendant to pay 80. 000 RON under the title of moral compensations to the complainants. The Court assessed that under art. 5 from the Law no. 221/2009 the complainants, as wife and son, are entitled to demand the assignment of civil compensations for the moral prejudice they suffered by convicting the author of these actions. The civil sentence was change by the Craiova Court of Appeal – Civil Division, through the Civil Decision no. 333 from 25 October 2010, in the sense that the defendant was obligated to pay 40. 000 RON in moral compensations to the complainants, while the rest of the dispositions from the attacked Sentence were maintained. Through the Decision no. 6133/2011 from 25.10.2010 of the Craiova Court of Appeal, 1st Civil Division[28] and obligated the defendant to pay €40. 000, under the title of moral compensations to the complainants, in its equivalent in RON at the moment of payment.

In its motivation, the First instance court makes reference to the Final Report of the Presidentialc, a report that offers information about the inhumane conditions from communist prisons and about the physical, psychological and moral abuses to which political detainees were submitted. It is also mentioned that these abuses had as purpose the physical elimination of the detainees before they were to be freed from prison.

This case constitutes another example where the information from the Report of the Presidential Commission are useful for the act of justice.

The judicial effects can be highlighted through the fact that the complainants received, after the application of the restoration law, moral compensations.

Non-judicial effects are a consequence of the fact that the complainants have the feeling that justice has been served and that they benefitted from a moral rehabilitation from the prejudice suffered.

Restoration of prejudice from judicial errors

Through the Civil Sentence no. 1420/C/2011[29] given on 10.10.2011, the Neamț Court House, 1st Civil Division, admitted, in part, the action formulated by the complainant P.A.Ș. in contradiction with the defendant the Romanian State through the Ministry of Public Finance, and as a result ascertained the political character of the administrative measure of dislocation and establishment of mandatory residence, from commune H., District R., in P.N., between 2.03.1949-30.12.1958, of the author of the complaint, P.A.. The head of claim which had compensations as an object was rejected as unfounded.

In order to give this sentence, the Court appreciated that the administrative measure consisting in dislocation and establishment of mandatory residence taken in regards to the author of the complaint has a political character.

In its motivation, the Court in assessing the political character of the dislocations that took place on 2 March 1949 refers, beside other documents, to the Report of the Presidential Commission for the analysis of the communist dictatorship in Romania as well. The judge, based on the information from the report, highlights the conditions and the practices from 1945-1964 as well as the consequence of applying them, respectively the violation of fundamental human rights.

This is important for the research approach of the paper since it represents an example in which the information from the Report of the Presidential Commission contributes to carrying out the act of justice (the report generate judicial effects). The acknowledgement of the political character of the administrative measure also determines non-judicial effects such as the recognition of the sufferings and the moral rehabilitation of the complainant citizen.

3. Conclusions

During periods of crisis, justice abounds in cases that distinguish themselves both through their high number and through the particular severity of the actions that were committed. It is not just the traditional justice that experiences a particular challenge during these periods, but also a meaningful part of the citizens who lived in the old regimes, thus existing, from their part, a higher demand to receive justice and to have a functional justice system.

The Truth and Reconciliation Commissions are known as bodies that function over a limited period of time, with the purpose of helping society, in its entirety, to pass on to another stage of its reconstruction, after the fall of previous regimes. In the domain of Transitional Justice, one can notice a respectable number of studies about the history of Truth and Reconciliation Commissions or about the functions that they carry out. However, there are fewer studies that focus on the relationship between Truth and Reconciliation Commissions and traditional justice. The present study fits in the category of the latter, since it highlighted the bridges between Commissions and traditional justice. It highlighted how the activity of the Commissions can complement the classic act of justice just as the archives or the information provided by the Commissions can become evidence or can be useful to offer historic details or information that describes the context in which the abuses and the violation of human rights took place.

The reports that the Truth and Reconciliation Commissions encode the task of seeking out the truth of recent history and propose certain directions to follow in order to make the crossing to new social institutions and to new justice systems. The Presidential Commission for the analysis of the communist dictatorship in Romania (recognised for the limited period of time when it operated – 3 months) elaborated a report that represents an official document of the Romanian State, a document through which the moral, psychological and physical abuses, the crimes and the cruelty acts committed by the communist regime were publicly condemned. Even though the Commission was created 7 years after the fall of the communist regime and a few months before Romania's admission to the EU, its activity marked on the one hand the acceptance of the totalitarian and traumatic past, the recognition of the abuses that were committed, and on the other hand it opened a new stage in the clarification of the historic truth and of the direction that should be followed by the Romanian society.

The micro-research undertaken within this study attained its proposed objectives , namely it highlighted the judicial and non-judicial effects generated by the Raport of the Presidential Commission in the case of two penal trials and some civil sentences. Thus, the inherent connection between the judicial (convictions, decisions) and the non-judicial (moral compensations, the recognition of sufferings), between the human rights perspective (the right to the truth, to rehabilitation, the right to know) and the legal one (trials against those who are guilty, the awarding of restorations) have been pointed out.

The research approach consisted in articulating a theoretical model of analysis (in the first part of the paper) and in its application on the cases that were selected for analysis, in the second part. Certainly, in order to extract solid conclusions, an analysis of more cases would have been called for. This could be considered as the limitation of the present study.

A first comment would be related to the fact that the convictions of the two torturers do not represent more than a fragment from a series of abominable abuses committed by individuals with the same behavioural pattern. There are questions that could be addressed, such as: what do these convictions solve, why so late, why are there only two trials that have final convictions? The paper does not wish to launch itself in such analyses that go beyond the scope of the established research objective. It could however be stated that these convictions represent a step forward in regards to the act of justice, the application of the new legislation, but also a moment with a particular symbolic charge so that, beyond the numbers that usually quantify efficiency, one could return trust to the citizens who wish and have the right to know the truth and to have the feeling that justice is being served.

Another comment would be related to the recommendations of the Report of the Presidential Commission regarding justice and legislation. It could be stated that these recommendations are similar overall with those made by the EU. It could also be stated that the Report of the Presidential Commission is not the one that triggered certain changes in this domain (new laws). As a final note of the conclusion, it is considered that it is not the competitions that are useful in these cases, but the complementations. As long as the direction is that of progress and of consolidating democracy, such complementations can only be beneficial.

DELEGATED ACTS AND IMPLEMENTING ACTS – NEW LEGAL ACTS OF THE EUROPEAN UNION

Oana-Mihaela SALOMIA*

Abstract

The Lisbon Treaty has introduced a new generic title – "legal acts" referring to the secondary European Union Law acts (art. 288-289 TFEU), compulsory or not, but also to the new delegated acts and implementing acts.
These new acts could be adopted by the European Commission which generally has the legislative initiative power and, in special cases, by the Council, in accordance with the art. 290 TFEU and art. 291 TFEU.
It is obvious that new competences are allowed to the European Commission which is in charge with the application and protection of the European Union law on the basis of the art. 17 TEU; the power of the Commission to adopt compulsory acts, even that they are not legislative, could be used in order to increase the enforcement procedures against the Member States which do not respect the European Union law.
This new category of legal acts are adopted on the basis of the specific procedure and they could be entitled such as the "classic" secondary EU law acts, namely regulations or directives.
In conclusion, this new category of acts could represent an appropriate instrument used by the Commission ensuring the unitary application of the EU law and its respect by the Member States.

1. Introduction

The European Union represents a special subject of international law having the features of an international intergovernmental organization with legal personality and, also, some peculiarities that any other organization does not present such as, for example, the direct application of the European Union law and its supremacy in the regard with the national law, the legislative procedure and direct election of the European Parliament by the people of the Member States, the specific compulsory sources of law and the European citizenship[1].

The European Union objectives are realized by the institutions in the respect of its competences laid down in the treaty in accordance with art. 13. 2 of the Treaty of the European Union (TEU): "Each institution shall act within the limits of the powers conferred on it in the Treaties, and in conformity with the procedures, conditions and objectives set out in them". The EU institutions have the role to adopt compulsory rules and specific soft law; the EU legal acts are mentioned in the art.288 Treaty on the functioning of the European Union (TFEU), art.290 TFEU and art.291 TFEU.

2. Content

The Lisbon Treaty did introduce the term of "legal acts" defining the legislative acts and the non-legislative acts including the new delegated acts and implementing acts[2].

The legislative acts are adopted on the basis of the legislative procedure, ordinary or specially, such as regulation, directive and decision[3]; they are compulsory acts for the institutions and Member States.

The new introduced acts increase the power of the European Commission in the regulatory field where

2.1 Delegated acts and implementing acts – general description

In conformity with the art.290 TFEU, "a legislative act may delegate to the Commission the power to adopt non-legislative acts of general application to supplement or amend certain non-essential elements of the legislative act". It is obvious that this provision from the Treaty does not represent per se the legal basis for adopting by the Commission the delegated act and it is mandatory that a legislative act gives to the Commission this specific power; therefore, the European Parliament and the Council preserve the full competence in the legislative field.

This non-legislative delegation is limited in terms of purposes and duration[4] because the Treaty stipulates clearly that "the objectives, content, scope and duration of the delegation of power shall be explicitly defined in the legislative acts" and "the essential elements of an area shall be reserved for the legislative act and accordingly shall not be the subject of a delegation of power".

If the delegated acts with general application are adopted on the basis of a legislative act, the implementing acts are adopted in accordance with "the legally binding Union acts" which are not defined by the Treaty; if a delegated act represents a legally compulsory act it will be possible that an implementing act could have a delegated act as legal basis[5].

The implementing acts could be adopted by the Commission in order to ensure the uniform conditions for implementing the legally binding Union acts by the Member States (art. 291 TFEU)[6]; in accordance with art. 4.3 TEU laying down the fundamental "principle of sincere cooperation", "the Member States shall take any appropriate measure, general or particular, to ensure fulfillment of the obligations arising out of the Treaties or resulting from the acts of the institutions of the Union", the lack of such measures giving to the European Commission the right to start the infringement procedure and propose the enforcement measures through a specific procedure at the Court of Justice of the European Union (art 258-260 TFEU). In this context, it is obvious that "The uniform application of EU law throughout all Member States is essential for the success of the EU. The Commission therefore attaches high importance to ensuring the effective application of EU law. The challenge of applying, implementing and enforcing European Union legislation is shared at EU and Member State level"[7].

The limits of the Commission's power to adopt such acts are mentioned in the art. 11 of the Regulation (EU) no 182/2011 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 16 February 2011 laying down the rules and general principles concerning mechanisms for control by Member States of the Commission's exercise of implementing powers: "Where a basic act (a legally binding Union act) is adopted under the ordinary legislative procedure, either the European Parliament or the Council may at any time indicate to the Commission that, in its view, a draft implementing act exceeds the implementing powers provided for in the basic act. In such a case, the Commission shall review the draft implementing act, taking account of the positions expressed, and shall inform the European Parliament and the Council whether it intends to maintain, amend or withdraw the draft implementing act".

"In duly justified specific cases and in the cases provided for in Articles 24 and 26 of the Treaty on European Union" (on the common foreign and security policy), the Council has the power to adopt implementing acts.

The legislative or non-legislative trait of these acts is not specified by the Treaty, but, it seems that they are non-legislative acts taking into account the following:

- The Council cannot solely adopt legislative acts without the involvement/participation of the European Parliament[8] within the legislative ordinary or specially procedure;

- The European Commission has not the competence to adopt legislative act having only the initiative power;
- In the field of the common foreign and security policy, the "decisions … shall be taken by the European Council and the Council acting unanimously…. The adoption of legislative acts shall be excluded".

On the adopting procedure of the delegated and implementing acts, the Treaty lays down specific provisions:

- "Legislative acts shall explicitly lay down the conditions to which the delegation is subject; these conditions may be as follows:
  a) the European Parliament or the Council may decide to revoke the delegation;
  b) the delegated act may enter into force only if no objection has been expressed by the European Parliament or the Council within a period set by the legislative act[9].

For the purposes of (a) and (b), the European Parliament shall act by a majority of its component members, and the Council by a qualified majority".

- "The European Parliament and the Council, acting by means of regulations in accordance with the ordinary legislative procedure, shall lay down in advance the rules and general principles concerning mechanisms for control by Member States of the Commission's exercise of implementing powers"; this type of the control exercised by the Member State is not mentioned for the delegated act because the terms of the delegation are very clearly stipulated by the legislative act which gives that power to the Commission. In this context, it is necessary to mark out the role of the Commission as "Guardian of the Treaties"[10] acting for the EU interests and the status of the Council as institution representing the Member States interests.

The reform of the comitology procedure

The Regulation (EU) no 182/2011 of the European Parliament and the Council lays down "the rules and general principles concerning mechanisms for control by EU countries of the Commission's exercise of implementing powers". "This control is performed by means of what is known in EU jargon as 'comitology' procedures[11], i.e. the Commission is assisted by committees consisting of EU countries' representatives and chaired by a representative of the Commission[12]".

According with the art. 2 of the this Regulation, „a basic act (a legally binding Union act) may provide for the application of the advisory procedure or the examination procedure, taking into account the nature or the impact of the implementing act required[13].

The examination procedure[14] applies, in particular, for the adoption of:

a) implementing acts of general scope;
b) other implementing acts relating to:

1. programmes with substantial implications;
2. the common agricultural and common fisheries policies;

1. The ordinary legislative procedure shall consist in the joint adoption by the European Parliament and the Council of a regulation, directive or decision on a proposal from the Commission. This procedure is defined in Article 294.

2. In the specific cases provided for by the Treaties, the adoption of a regulation, directive or decision by the European Parliament with the participation of the Council, or by the latter with the participation of the European Parliament, shall constitute a special legislative procedure.

It should lead to the rationalization of the burdensome comitology system and encourage the use of „sunset" clauses that would mandate the legislator to review a law after a certain, specified time"/

[13] Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on the implementation of Regulation (EU) 182/2011 COM(2016) 92 final:

Acts adopted under examination procedure		Acts adopted under the advisory procedure
2011	1 311	77
2012	1 591	121
2014	1 437	122

The examination procedure is clearly the procedure applicable in the majority of cases, only about 10% of the opinions are adopted by advisory procedure. This reflects largely the split of management/regulatory versus advisory procedure under the previous regime.

[14] Art. 5 of the Regulation (EU) no 182/2011

1. Where the examination procedure applies, the committee shall deliver its opinion by the majority laid down in Article 16(4) and (5) of the Treaty on European Union and, where applicable, Article 238(3) TFEU, for acts to be adopted on a proposal from the Commission. The votes of the representatives of the Member States within the committee shall be weighted in the manner set out in those Articles.

2. Where the committee delivers a positive opinion, the Commission shall adopt the draft implementing act.

http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=uriserv:ai0043: „Commission implementing acts must receive the support of a qualified majority (a weighted system of voting where 16 of the 28 EU countries must vote in favor and these votes must represent at least 65 % of the EU's population) of the committee".

3. the environment, security and safety, or protection of the health or safety, of humans, animals or plants;
4. the common commercial policy;
5. taxation".

„The advisory procedure[15] applies, as a general rule, for the adoption of implementing acts not falling within the ambit" of the previous fields; the advisory procedure may apply for the adoption of the mentioned implementing acts in duly justified cases.

The Regulation lays down also the rules on the "appeal committee", "adoption of implementing acts in exceptional cases" and the situations requiring "immediately applicable implementing acts".

The "comitology" procedure has been set up at the EU level in order to guarantee the participation of the Member States at the regulatory processes ensuring the respect of the repartition of the competences between the Member States and European Union under the principle of conferral and, implicitly, the respect of the principle laid down in the art.1 TEU which provides with that the decisions must be "taken as openly as possible and as closely as possible to the citizen".

2.4 The respect of the proportionality principle

On the adoption procedure of the legal acts, it also important to stress tha the Lisbon Treaty introduces the compulsory respect of the principle of proportionality mentioned by the art. 5.4 TEU; "where the Treaties do not specify the type of act to be adopted, the institutions shall select it on a case-by-case basis, in compliance with the applicable procedures and with the principle of proportionality" (art. 296 TFEU). Also, the "legal acts shall state the reasons on which they are based and shall refer to any proposals, initiatives, recommendations, requests or opinions required by the Treaties"; the text of the art. 296 TFEU does not distinguish the legal acts, legislative or not and, consequently, this obligation for the EU institutions applying also to the delegated and implementing acts.

2.5 The designation of the delegated acts and implementing acts

Other important issue regarding the new acts introduced by Lisbon Treaty concerns the nomenclature[16]/designation of the acts – they are regulations, directives and decisions[17] which are per se legislative acts and accordingly the general traits of the EU law apply to these acts, namely supremacy or primacy, direct effect, direct applicability and immediately application[18]; the Member States must ensure the respect of these acts in the same conditions as for the typical legislative acts in accordance with the art.4.3 TEU[19].

In this context, the hierarchy of the legal acts or secondary EU law seems to be clear and the Lisbon Treaty puts on the top the legislative acts followed by the non-legislative acts and implementing acts[20]; it could be considered as a theoretical hierarchy taking into account the fact that in practice all these acts are compulsory for the Member States.

The mandatory trait of these acts gives the possibility to the Court of Justice of the European Union to hear and determine an action brought by natural or legal persons against acts of the institutions, bodies, offices or agencies of the European Union (which are addressed to them or are of direct and individual concern to them) and against regulatory acts (which concern them directly and which do not entail implementing measures)[21].

Accordingly with the art. 263 TFEU[22], it still remains under discussion if a citizen of a Member State could introduce such action on the basis of the general

[15] Art. 4 of the Regulation (EU) no 182/2011

1. Where the advisory procedure applies, the committee shall deliver its opinion, if necessary by taking a vote. If the committee takes a vote, the opinion shall be delivered by a simple majority of its component members.

2. The Commission shall decide on the draft implementing act to be adopted, taking the utmost account of the conclusions drawn from the discussions within the committee and of the opinion delivered.

[17] See for example, Commission Delegated Decision (EU) 2016/790 of 13 January 2016 amending Annex V to Directive 2005/36/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council as regards the evidence of formal qualifications and the titles of training courses (notified under document C(2016) 1) - http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/?uri=CELEX:32016D0790

This delegated decision is adopted by the Commission on the basis of the art. 21a.4 of the Directive 2005/36/EC as amended which mentions: "In order to take due account of legislative and administrative developments in the Member States, and on condition that the laws, regulations and administrative provisions notified pursuant to paragraph 1 of this Article are in conformity with the conditions set out in this Chapter, the Commission shall be empowered to adopt delegated acts in accordance with Article 57c in order to amend points 5.1.1 to 5.1.4, 5.2.2, 5.3.2, 5.3.3, 5.4.2, 5.5.2, 5.6.2 and 5.7.1 of Annex V….". The art. 2 of the delegated decision lays down that „This Decision is addressed to the Member States" and it is clear that this act applies directly into the legislation of the Member States.

[18] Fuerea, Manualul Uniunii Europene, 250.

[19] Duff, 56: „In theory, the Commission is responsible for overseeing the implementation of the legal acts at the European level. In practice, of course, the Commission needs the participation of the states both o formulate the necessary implementing measures and to monitor their efficacy."

Art. 263 TFEU

„The Court of Justice of the European Union shall review the legality of legislative acts, of acts of the Council, of the Commission and of the European Central Bank, other than recommendations and opinions, and of acts of the European Parliament and of the European Council intended to produce legal effects vis-à-vis third parties".

[22] Art. 263 TFEU

„Any natural or legal person may, under the conditions laid down in the first and second paragraphs, institute proceedings against an act addressed to that person or which is of direct and individual concern to them, and against a regulatory act which is of direct concern to them and does not entail implementing measures".

application[23] of the delegated acts and the fact that the implementing acts are addressed to the Member States in order to ensure the correct and uniform application of the EU law by these subjects of law.

If the delegated acts are defined as "regulatory acts" mentioned by the art.263 TFEU, having general application, it will be possible to introduce such as action respecting the decision of the Tribunal which stated that "It must be concluded that the fourth paragraph of Article 263 TFEU, read in conjunction with its first paragraph, permits a natural or legal person to institute proceedings against an act addressed to that person and also (i) against a legislative or regulatory act of general application which is of direct and individual concern to them and (ii) against certain acts of general application, namely regulatory acts which are of direct concern to them and do not entail implementing measures. Furthermore, such an interpretation of the word 'regulatory', and of the equivalent word in the different language versions of the FEU Treaty, as opposed to the word 'legislative', is also apparent from a number of other provisions of the FEU Treaty"[24].

4. Conclusions

These new categories of acts introduced by the Lisbon Treaty increase the power of the European Commission as executive institution[25] and impose to the Member States the obligation for respecting these acts adopted by the Commission in the same conditions as for the acts adopted by the Council and European Parliament – the EU legislative institutions.

In this regard, it is very important to stress that the new Communication from the Commission EU law: Better results through better application (2017/C 18/02) refers directly to the implementing act when it lays down that "The Member States have the primary responsibility for transposing, applying and implementing EU law correctly"[26].

It is obvious that the EU rules addressed to the Member States could contain some rights for the citizens of those States and for that it is compulsory to apply or transpose in time and correctly these rules; the new perspective of the European Commission on the EU's future underlines also the necessity to adapt the content and the form of the acts adopted by the institutions to the expectations of the European citizens namely in the field of Single Market: "Given the strong focus on reducing regulation at EU level, differences persist or increase in areas such as consumer, social and environmental standards, as well as in taxation and in the use of public subsidies. Citizens' rights derived from EU law may become restricted over time. Decision-making may be simpler to understand but the capacity to act collectively is limited. This may widen the gap between expectations and delivery at all levels"[27].

These competences in the regulatory field could transform the Commission into a national executive institution taking into account that at national level it happens the same situation where the Government[28] – the executive power adopts compulsory normative acts which, for example in Romania, have not the same nomenclature as for the acts adopted by the Parliament; nevertheless, "as the subtle re-balancing of the [23] In the case-law Jégo-Quéré vs Commission, T-117/01, the Tribunal did stated that a legal person could claim the annulation of a legislative act with a general application in some conditions: „It is, however, necessary to consider whether, notwithstanding their general scope, the contested provisions may nevertheless be regarded as being of direct and individual concern to the applicant. According to settled case-law, the fact that a provision is of general application does not prevent it from being of direct and individual concern to some of the economic operators whom it affects"(para. 25). "It must be concluded that the criterion of direct concern is fulfilled in the present case. For a person to be directly concerned by a Community measure, the latter must directly affect the legal situation of the individual and leave no discretion to the addressees of that measure who are entrusted with the task of implementing it, such implementation being purely automatic and resulting from Community rules without the application of other intermediate rules" (para.26).

The Court did pronounced the annulment of the Tribunal's decision in the case law C-263/02: „However, it is not appropriate for an action for annulment before the Community Court to be available to an individual who contests the validity of a measure of general application, such as a regulation, which does not distinguish him individually in the same way as an addressee, even if it could be shown, following an examination by that Court of the particular national procedural rules, that those rules do not allow the individual to bring proceedings to contest the validity of the Community measure at issue".

[25] Duff, 56: "The Treaty of Lisbon makes progress in clarifying who could delegate executive authority to the Commission an under what terms. A greater willingness on behalf of the legislator to delegate technical minutiae to the Commission has been recorded in the new treaty".

„....the Commission attaches importance to ensuring that national legislation complies with EU law since incorrect national legislation systematically undermines citizens' ability to assert their rights including their fundamental rights, and to draw fully the benefits from EU legislation".

„Under the recently signed Inter-institutional Agreement on Better Law-Making (Interinstitutional Agreement between the European Parliament, the Council of the European Union and the European Commission on Better Law-Making, OJ L 123 of 12.5.2016, p. 1), the European Parliament, the Council and the Commission recognize their joint responsibility in delivering high-quality Union legislation. The Joint Declaration on the EU's legislative priorities for 2017 reiterates the commitment to promoting the proper implementation and enforcement of existing legislation (Joint Declaration on the EU's legislative priorities for 2017 signed by the Presidents of the European Parliament, the Council and the Commission on 13 December)".

THE EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS AND ITS CASE-LAW ON ENVIRONMENTAL MATTERS

Laura-Cristiana SPĂTARU-NEGURĂ*

Abstract

Only recently the environmental protection has become a real concern of the international community. Despite the fact that no human rights treaties, such as the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, contain a right to the environment explicitly, they have been interpreted as including environmental protection obligations for the Contracting States. Very often we hear about environmental degradation. The purpose of this article is to provide the most relevant examples from the European Court of Human Rights case-law in this field in order to strengthen the environmental protection at the national level.

1. Introductive Remarks

The main purpose of this article is to increase the understanding between the protection of human rights under the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (hereinafter the "Convention") and the environment. We consider that this is necessary in order to strengthen the environmental protection at the national level, having in mind that the European Court for Human Rights (hereinafter the "ECHR" or the "Court") represents the most developped regional jurisdiction on human rights[1]. To achieve this purpose, the present paper seeks to provide examples from the European Court of Human Rights case-law in this field.

Although the European Convention on Human Rights does not expressely guarantee a right to a healthy, quiet and sound environment, very often the European Court of Human Rights has been called to judge if the Contracting States have violated certain individual[2] rights in cases with impact on environmental issues. As it is stated in the European Court for Human Rights's (hereinafter the "ECHR" or the "Court") case-law and it is widely recognized, the European Convention on Human Rights is "a living instrument (…) which must be interpreted in the light of present-day conditions"[3]. Therefore the Convention indirectly offers a certain protection degree for environmental matters as it may be discovered from a research of the Court's evolving case-law.

As it is stated in the legal doctrine, "the human being is the central area of interest for the lawmaker"[4].

Through time, individuals have filed complaints against the Contracting States arguing that a breach of the Convention rights has resulted from adverse environmental factors.

As stated in the legal doctrine "human rights concern the universal identity of the human being and are underlying on the principle of equality of all human beings"[5], therefore all individuals have the right to complain if the domestic authorities[6], natural or legal persons violate their rights under the Convention in certain conditions.

Through time, individuals have filed complaints against the Contracting States[7] of the Convention, arguing that a breach of the Convention rights has resulted from adverse environmental factors, among others. This thing is due to the fact that each individual has the right to enjoy a healthy environment[8].

Among the topics that we have discovered in the ECHR's case-law, we mention the following, without being exhaustive: dangerous industrial activities, exposure to nuclear radiation, industrial emissions, natural disasters, environmental risks, industrial pollution, noise pollution[9], urban development, waste collection, management, treatment and disposal, water supply contamination, mobile phone antennas, passive smoking in detention. The most invoqued articles of the Convention in this respect are: the right to life (Article 2), the prohibition of inhuman or degrading treatement (Article 3), the right to liberty and security (Article 5), the right to a fair trial (Article 6), the right to respect for private and family life and home (Article 8), the freedom of expression (Article 10), the freedom of assembly and association (Article 11), the right to an effective remedy (Article 13), the protection of property (Article 1 of Protocol No. 1 to the Convention).

2. The ECHR and the Environmental Matters

It is obvious that the Contracting States have the obligation to protect the victims from adverse environmental factors, otherwise their legal responsibility may be invoked[10]. The ECHR's case-law on environmental matters is quite significative and for the purposes of this paper we have chosen certain matters to exemplify the position of the Court. In order to investigate this, we will proceed to a category analysis of the most relevant cases dealt by the Court. We are aware that our analysis is not exhaustive.

2.1. Waste collection, management, treatment and disposal

The waste is an important issue in our daily life. Our current society undeniably produces more trash than any other to date. But sometimes waste collection, management and disposal can give rise to human rights violation.

A first case that we mention in this regard is a case against Romania, the Branduse[11] case. The applicant, Mr. Branduse complained among others about the offensive smells created by a former refuse tip situated about 20 metres away from the prison he was incarcerated, arguing that its quality of life and its well-being were affected by the respective smells. Although at the beginning not many specialists believed that Mr Branduse will win this case, the Court held that there had been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention because the Romanian authorities failed to take the adequate measures to solve the problem. From the file investigation, it was revealed that the tip was operated effectively between 1998 and 2003, and that after 2003 it was used by private individuals because the Romanian authorities did not ensure the effective closure of the respective site. It is important to retain that it had been operated without proper authorization, and closed without the necessary closing authorization. Additionally, although the authorities should have carried out preliminary studies to measure the pollution effects, this was done only in 2006 after a fire on the site. According to the studies, the high level of pollution exceeded the standards established and the persons living near the site had to put up with considerable levels of nuisance caused by offensive smells, therefore the activity was incompatible with the environmental requirements.

In a case against Italy, Di Sarno and Others[12], the Court had to rule again on the collection, treatment and disposal of waste. The case regarded the state of emergency during 15 years in relation to waste collection, treatment and disposal in Campania, an Italian region, where the applicants lived and worked, including a five months period in which rubbish piled up in the streets. The applicants complained that the Italian State had caused serious damage to their environment and jeoperdied their lives and health because it did not take the necessary and adequate measures to ensure the waste management and it did not implement the appropriate legislation and administrative policies. Considering that these waste activities were hazardous, the Court established that the Italian State had a duty to adopt reasonable and appropriate measures capable of safeguarding the right of those concerned to a healthy and protected environment. In the absence of such measures, the Court found that Article 8 of the Convention was violated in its substantive aspect, especially because for a very long period of time the authorities were unable to ensure the proper functioning of the waste collection, treatment and disposal service, fact that resulted in the breach of the right to respect the private lives and homes of the applicants. It is also interesting that the Court held that the Article 8 in its procedural aspect had not been violated because the studies made by the authorities had been published, therefore the information obligation has been respected, the people concerned being able to learn about the potential risks to which they were exposed in continuing to live there. Because the applicants did not have access to an effective remedy in the Italian legal system, by which to obtain redress for the damage incured, the Court also retained that Article 13 of the Convention was breached.

There is a pending application that arouses our curiosity, Locascia and Others v. Italy[13]. This case was brought by 19 applicants who lived in the same province as above, Campania. They complained about the danger to their health and the interference with their private life and home caused by the operation of a private waste disposal plant and by the failure of the Italian authorities to secure, clean-up and reclaim the area after its closure. We look forward to the Court's judgment in this case.

2.2. Water supply contamination

In the case of Dzemyuk v. Ukraine[14], the applicant argued that the construction of a cemetery near his house had led to the water supply contamination, which left his home virtually uninhabitable and his land unusable. He further alleged that the burial ceremonies were quite disturbant and that the authorities failed to enforce the final and binding judgment declaring the cemetery illegal. The Court considered that the interference with the applicant's right to respect for his private and family life and for his home had not been lawful and therefore Article 8 of the Convention was breached. At the analysis of the submissions of the Ukrainian Government, it resulted that it did not even dispute the fact that it was built and used in breach of the domestic regulations; moreover the Court underlined that the conclusions of the environmental authorities had also been disregarded, and the final and binding judicial decisions ordering to close the cemetery had never been enforced.

2.3. Industrial pollution

A very well known environmental case dealt by the Court is Lopez Ostra v. Spain[15], in which the applicant, who lived in a heavy concentration leather industry city, complained of the municipal authorities inactivity in respect of the nuisance caused by a waste-treatment plant situated a few metres away from her home (that she beard for three years, before moving away). She considered the national authorities as being responsible because they adopted a passive attitude regarding this matter. The Court held that Article 8 of the Convention was violated in her respect because the State had not succeeded in striking a fair balance between the economic well-being of the town and the applicant's effective enjoyment of her right to respect for her home and her private and family life. In the end, they decided to move out from their home at the advice of the applicant's daughter's paediatrician and when they realized that the situation could continue indefinitely. Although the applicant tried to construe an argument that the situation amounted to degrading treatment, the Court firmly rejected this perspective, by helding that no violation of Article 3 of the Convention had been in the case.

In a case against Russia, Fadeyeva v. Russia[16], the applicant complained that the operation of a steel plant in close proximity of her home endangered her health and well-being. The Court held that there had been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention since Russia failed to strike a fair balance between the community's interests and Ms Fadeleyeva's effective enjoyment of her right to respect for her home and her private life. The Court underlined that Russia should not have authorized the operation of a polluting enterprise in the middle of a densely populated town, and if it did so, then a certain territory around the plant should be free of any dwelling, since the toxic emissions from that enterprise exceeded the safe limits provided by the domestic legislation. The Court noted that in this case, the Russian State did not offer the applicant any effective solution to help her move from the dangerous area and did not design or apply effective measures which would take into account the interests of the local population.

In Giacomelli v. Italy[17], the applicant (who lived for more than 50 years in a house located 30 metres away from a plant used for the storage and treatment of "special waste" classified as either hazardous or non-hazardous), complained that the persistent noise and harmful emissions coming from the plant represented a serious threat to her environment and a permanent risk to her health and home. The Court held that Article 8 of the Convention was violated in this case because Italy had not succeeded in stricking a fair balance between the interest of the community in having a plant for the treatment of toxic industrial waste and the applicant's effective enjoyment of her right to respect for her home and her private and family life. Along the time, the authorities discovered on two occasions that the plant's operation was incompatible with environmental regulations on account of its unsuitable geographical location and that there was a specific risk to the health of the local residents. Thus, for several years, the applicant's right to respect for her home had been seriously impaired by the dangerous activities carried out at the plant built very near her home.

In Tatar v. Romania[18], the applicants alleged that the tehnological process used by a company in their gold mining activity, in the vicinity of their home, put their lives in danger. In 2010 an environmental accident occurred at the site. A UN study underlined that a dam had breached, releasing into the environment about 100,000 m^3 of dangerous substances, cyanide-contaminated tailings water. Additionally, the applicants also complained that the authorities did not act regarding the numerous complaints lodged by the first applicant about the threat to their lives, to the entire community environment and to his son's health who suffered of asthma. After analyzing the case, the Court held that there had been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention, stating that the Romanian authorities failed in their duty to assess the risks that such activity might entail, as well as to take the adequate measures in order to protect the individual rights of the persons living near the site to respect for their private lives and homes and their right to enjoy a healthy and protected environment. Therefore, the State had a duty to ensure the protection of these persons especially by regulating, authorizing, setting-up, operating, safety and monitoring this industry activity which was dangerous to the human health and to the environment. The Court noted that after the accident in 2000, the company continued to operate in breach of the precautionary principle and it pointed out that the Romanian authorities had to ensure public access to the results of the studies done because Romania had a duty to guarantee the right of members of the public to participate in the decision-making process concerning environmental issues.

In Dubetska and Others v. Ukraine[19], the applicants complained that their health had suffered and their house and living environment had been damaged because of a State-owned coal mine operating near their houses. The claimants also complained that the national authorities had done nothing to prevent or to remedy this situation. The Court found that Article 8 of the Convention was breached in this case and it established that the Ukrainian Government had an obligation to take appropriate measures to remedy the applicant's situation. The Court observed in its analysis that the national authorities had been aware of the adverse environmental effects of the mine and factory, but had not found a solution to diminish the level pollution in order not to be harmful for the people living in the vicinity of the facilities. Although the Government took some measures in the 12 years analysed in the case (i.e. penalizing the factory director, order the applicants' resettlement, building up of a centralized aqueduct), the Court considered that Ukraine had not found an effective solution to the applicants' situation.

In a case against Poland, the Apanasewicz[20] case, the Court had to deal again on environmental matters. In 1988, the owner of a land plot adjacent to the one of the applicant built a concrete works, without having any building permit. The owner started operating it immediately and enlarged it gradually. In 1989 the applicant brought domestic proceedings in order to put an end to the environmental harm that she had suffered (e.g. pollution, health problems, inedible harvest). The domestic courts ordered in 2001 to close the factory, but despite the two sets of enforcement proceedings, not even at the moment of the ECHR judgment the factory had not been closed. The applicant also complained of a failure to enforce the 2001 judgment. The Court held that Article 6 paragraph 1 and Article 8 of the Convention were violated (Article 6 because of the overall duration of the proceedings, the State's lack of diligence, the insufficient use of the coercive measures available that conduct to the fact that the applicant did not have effective judicial protection; Article 8 because the authorities had not discharged their obligation to protect the applicant's right to respect for her private and family life against the interference caused by her neighbour's activity).

2.4. Dangerous industrial activities

Environmental cases brought to the ECHR have sometimes raised sensitive problems such as death of the close relatives. Such case is Őneryildiz v. Turkey[21], when a methane explosion which occurred at a rubbish tip used jointly by four district councils, in April 1993, and the refuse erupting from the pile of waste engulfed more than ten houses situated below it (including the applicant's dwelling built without any authorization on the land surrounding it). The applicant lost nine close relatives and he complained in particular that no measures had been taken to prevent an explosion despite the expert report that drawn the authorities' attention to the need to act preventively because the risk to occur such explosion was not unlikely.

The Court found that there had been a violation of both sides of Article 2 of the Convention: under its substantive limb (for the lack of appropriate procedure to prevent the accidental death of the applicant's relatives), and under its procedural limb (for the lack of adequate protection by law safeguarding the right to life). The Turkish authorities did not inform the inhabitants about the risks they ran by living there, and even if they did, they did not take the practical measures to avoid the risks of explosion and the inhabitants' death. Overall, the regulatory framework proved to be defective and inadequate. Aditionally, the Court ruled that other articles of the Convention have also been violated: Article 1 of Protocol No. 1 and Article 13.

3. Concluding Remarks

From the analysis of the Court's case-law, we can derive three conclusions. Firstly, the human rights provided by the Convention can be directly affected by adverse environmental factors (e.g. chemical factories with toxic emissions). Secondly, the adverse environmental factors give rise to certain procedural rights for the injured individuals (e.g. the right to be informed by the authorities, the possibility to participate in the decision-making processes, the access to justice). Thirdly, the environment protection can be a legitimate aim justifying the State's interference with certain individual human rights (e.g. Article 8 of the Convention can be restricted if it is necessary for environmental protection).

After analyzing the ECHR's relevant case-law, we can underline that although the Convention does not define the term environment, the only thing that matters is the impact on the individual, than the environment that the Court is concerned with.

In a nutshell, the extent of each State's obligations depends on factors such as the harmfulness of the dangerous activities and the foreseeability of the risks to life. Moreover, the States must ensure that the administrative and legislative framework is properly implemented and that violations of the Convention are repressed and punished as appropriate.

Despite the concerted efforts of the national public authorities[22] with the international organizations, in the following years we will still encounter many varieties of environmental adverse factors, and many States that do not act with responsibility[23] towards their nationals or other categories of individuals found on their territory[24]. But the question related to the present study is how will the Court deal those cases? The answer is simple: TIME will answer this question.

HUMAN BEINGS TRAFFICKING IN THE EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS CASE-LAW

Laura-Cristiana SPĂTARU-NEGURĂ*

Abstract

After last year's analysis regarding the European Union's commitment to fight against the human beings trafficking, we have considered to further explore the human beings trafficking approach in the European Court of Human Rights case-law, the most developped regional jurisdiction on human rights.
Surprisingly, the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms does not make an express reference to the human beings trafficking. However, we have to bear in mind that the Convention is a living instrument, its interpretation being made in the light of the present-day conditions. Thus, taking into consideration the global threat of this phenomenon, it is more obvious than ever that the Convention could not neglect this issue.

1. Introductive Remarks

Through this study, we propose an analysis to increase the understanding between the protection of human rights under the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (hereinafter the "European Convention on Human Rights" or the "Convention") and one of the most serious global threats, the human beings trafficking. This is really necessary in order to strengthen human protection at the national level, having in mind that the European Court for Human Rights (hereinafter the "ECHR" or the "Court") represents the most developped regional jurisdiction on human rights[1]. To attain this purpose, the present study seeks to provide the most relevant examples from the Court's case-law.

Right from the beginning, we underline that the Convention does not make any express reference to the human beings trafficking (although the Convention prohibits "slavery and the slave trade in all forms" under Article 4). This should not surprise us, having in view that the Convention was inspired by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights proclaimed in 1948 by the General Assembly of the United Nations, which does not expressely address the human beings trafficking problem either.

However, as it is stated in the Court's case-law and it is widely recognized in the legal doctrine, the Convention is "a living instrument (…) which must be interpreted in the light of present-day conditions"[2], fact that raises many challenges for its judges.

As underlined in the legal doctrine "human rights concern the universal identity of the human being and are underlying on the principle of equality of all human beings"[3], therefore all individuals have the right to complain if the domestic authorities[4], natural or legal persons violate their individual rights under the Convention in certain conditions.

Through time, individuals have filed complaints against the Contracting States of the Convention[5], arguing that a breach of the Convention rights has resulted from human trafficking, among others. As it is easy to imagine, this thing is possible because each individual has the right not to be submitted to slavery.

2. ECHR's Relevant Case-law

It is obvious that the Contracting States have the obligation to protect the victims of trafficking, otherwise their legal responsibility may be invoked[6]. In order to investigate this topic, we will proceed to a chronological analysis of the most relevant cases dealt by the Court during the time.

One interesting case is Siliadin v. France[7], in which the Court found that it involved a servitude situation, therefore not exactly slavery. The applicant was a Togo minor citizen brought to France by a relative of her father, where she had been forced to work as a maid for many years, thirteen hours a day, and seven days a week. She was vulnerable and isolated, with her identification papers confiscated, no financial resources and afraid to contact the authorities because of her irregular imigration status. The Court recognized that Ms Siliadin was held in servitude, because of the lack of freedom and of the work hours on every week day. This case represented a significant milestone with regard to the increase of the human beings trafficking phenomenon, the victim being considered to be placed in a state of servitude.

The most relevant case in this respect is the case of Rantsev v. Cyprus and Russia[8]. On short, the applicant was the father of a young lady who died in Cyprus, where she went for working as a cabaret "artiste". The applicant complained that the Cypriot authorities had not done everything they could to protect his daughter from trafficking while she was alive, as well as to punish the responsible persons for her ill-treatment and death. Moreover, Mr Rantsev complained that the Russian authorities failed to protect his daughter, Ms Rantseva, from trafficking, as well as to investigate her trafficking and death.

As underlined in Rantsev v. Cyprus and Russia, in 2010, the Court recognized that the global phenomenon of trafficking in human beings "has increased significantly in recent years"[9], fact that determines the Court to be very cautious. In the same judgment, the Court appreciated that "trafficking in human beings, by its very nature and aim of exploitation, is based on the exercise of powers attaching to the right of ownership. It treats human beings as commodities to be bought and sold and put to forced labour, often for little or no payment, usually in the sex industry but also elsewhere (…). It implies close surveillance of the activities of victims, whose movements are often circumscribed (…). It involves the use of violence and threats against victims, who live and work under poor conditions (…)"[10].

Moreover "[t]here can be no doubt that trafficking threatens the human dignity and fundamental freedoms of its victims and cannot be considered compatible with a democratic society and the values expounded in the Convention"[11].

The ECHR held that human beings trafficking was prohibited by Article 4 of the Convention (the prohibition of slavery and forced labour), therefore Cyprus was found guilty for violating its positive obligations set under this article for two aspects: (i) its failure to set up an appropriate legal and administrative framework to combat trafficking and (ii) the failure of the police to take operational measures to protect Ms Rantseva from trafficking, although there was a credible suspicion that she might have been a victim of trafficking in human beings. Cyprus was also found guilty for violating Article 2 of the Convention (the right to life), as a result of the authorities to effectively investigate Ms Rantseva's death.

Additionally, the Court held that Russia also violated Article 4 of the Convention (the prohibition of slavery and forced labour) because it failed to investigate how Ms Rantseva had been recruited and to take steps to identify the recruiters and the recruitation methods.

In 2011, the Court ruled in the case V.F. v. France[12], which concerned the applicant's procedure for deportation to country of origin, Nigeria. The applicant underlined that if she were deported to Nigeria, she would be at risk of being forced back to prostitution that she managed to escape very hardly, being also subject to reprisals, and without being protected by the Nigerian authorities, she considered that the French authorities were not allowed to expel potential victims of human trafficking. Although the Court was aware of the high level of Nigerian women trafficked to France and acknowledged their difficulties for obtaining protection from the authorities, the Court declared the application inadmissible because it was manifestly ill-founded. The reason, for which the Court did that, was because the applicant did not manage to prove that the police knew or, at least, should have known, that she was a human trafficking victim. As for the risk of being forced into prostitution once arrived in Nigeria, the judges considered that she would have received assistance from the Nigerian authorities on her return, despite the fact that the specific domestic legislation had not fully achieved its aims.

Another interesting case dealt by the Court is M. and Others v. Italy and Bulgaria[13]. The applicants, M. and her parents, Bulgarian citizens of Roma origin, arrived to Italy in order to find work, following a promise of work in the villa of a Roma man of Serbian origin. They alleged that six days later, beaten and threaten with death, they were forced to leave the Italian village and to return to Bulgaria, leaving their daughter there. They complained that their daughter was detained at gunpoint, forced to work and to steal, as well as sexually abused by the respective Roma family, claiming that the Italian authorities failed to investigate the case in an adequate manner. More specifically, they complained that Italy had breached Article 3 of the Convention (prohibition of torture and inhuman or degrading treatment) because it did not prevent M.'s ill-treatment by securing her speedy release, Article 4 of the Convention (prohibition of slavery), based on human beings trafficking, as well as Article 14 of the Convention (prohibition of discrimination) for racial discrimination. Although the Court agreed that the circumstances could have amounted to human trafficking, the Court rejected all the complaints (except on Article 3 found as a violation on the grounds of ineffective investigation) because the evidence submitted was not enough to prove the truthfulness of their allegations. Thus, the Court did not accept that the respective circumstances had amounted to the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons for the purpose of exploitation, forced labour or services, slavery, servitude or the removal of organs.

Another case that could have been interesting is F.A. v. the United Kingdom[14], which raised the question of human beings trafficking of a Ghanaian national to United Kingdom. Unfortunatelly the Court found the complaints inadmissible because they had not been raised in an appeal to the Upper Tribunal, fact that drove to the failure of meeting the admissibility criteria set in the Convention.

In a very recent case, L.E. v. Greece[15], the Court had to deal again on human beings trafficking. The case concerned a complaint made by a Nigerian citizen who was forced into prostitution in Greece. Although she was recognized as a human trafficking victim for sexual exploitation, the applicant had been required to wait almost one year after informing the authorities about her situation, before she was granted the status of a victim. The Court found that there had been a violation of Article 4 of the Convention because the effectiveness of the preliminary inquiry and subsequent investigations of the case had been compromised by several shortcomings and it found several delays and failings of the Greek State's procedural obligations. Moreover, the Court held that in the case there were also violated (i) Article 6 paragraph 1 of the Convention (because the length of the proceedings had been excessive and did not meet the "reasonable time" requirement) and (ii) Article 13 of the Convention (because of the absence in the Greek legislation of a remedy by which the applicant could have enforced her right to a reasonable time hearing).

Another relevant case dealt very recently by the Court is J and Others v. Austria[16], which concerned the investigation made by the Austrian authorities into a human trafficking allegation (human trafficking and forced labour). Two Filipino nationals who were working as maids or au pairs in the United Arab Emirates were the applicants in this case. They alleged that their employers confiscated their passports and exploited them, facts that reminded us about the Siliadin case. The applicants claimed that this treatment continued during a short trip to Vienna, where they managed to escape. Following a criminal complaint against their employers, the Austrian authorities found that they do not have jurisdiction over the alleged offences commited abroad, deciding also to discontinue the investigation in this case concerning the events in Vienna. The applicants argued that the Austrian authorities had failed to protect them and to carry out an effective and exhaustive investigation based on their allegations, especially that they had a duty under international law to investigate also those events which had occurred abroad. The Court found that there had been no obligation under the Convention for the Austrian authorities to investigate the foreign elements (the recruitment made in Philippines or the exploitation in the United Arab Emirates), because the States are not held under Article 4 of the Convention to provide for universal jurisdiction over the human trafficking cases commited abroad. As for the Austrian events, the Court noted that the authorities were diligent, taking all the reasonable steps in the respective situation: supported the applicants through a Government funded NGO, interviewed them by special police officers, granted them residence and work permits, imposed a personal data disclosure ban for their protection. Since no mutual legal assistance agreement existed between Austria and the United Arab Emirates, no further steps in this case were possible. For these reasons, the Court found that the Austrian authorities had complied with their duty to protect the applicants; therefore there had been no violation of Articles 4 and 3 of the Convention.

Although not finalized, two other cases against Greece are interesting for our research and we are waiting for the Courts' judgments.

The first case is the Chowdury and Others v. Greece[17], in which the applicants, 42 Bangladesh nationals, were recruited in Greece, without having a Greek work permit, in order to work at the main strawberry farm in Manolada. They alleged that the respective work amounted to forced or compulsory labour. In the application, the claimants argued that Greece failed to comply with its positive obligation to prevent them from being subjected to human trafficking, to adopt preventive measures to that end or to penalize their employers.

[17] Chowdury and Others v. Greece, application no. 21884/15, communicated to the Greek Government on 09.09.2015.

The second case is T.I. and Others v. Greece[18], in which the three applicants, Russian nationals, who were recognized as victims of human trafficking, complained of the Greek State's failure to discharge its obligations to penalize and prosecute acts relating to human trafficking in their case. The applicants invoked the violation of Articles 4, 6 and 13 of the Convention.

We look forward to discover the Court's approach in those two cases.

But in the Court's case law there were times when the Court had to analyse the respect of the Convention as for the measures taken by the Contracting States against traffickers, for instance Kaya v. Germany[19] and Tas v. Belgium[20].

In the Kaya case, the applicant, a Turkish national living in Germany for thirty years, was convicted for attempted aggravated trafficking in human beings and battery. After he has served two thirds of his prison sentence, he was expelled from Germany to Turkey, because the courts considered that he could continue to pose a serious threat to the public. The applicant alleged that his deportation to Turkey had breached Article 8 of the Convention (the right to respect his private and family life). Having in mind that the applicant's expulsion was based because he had been sentenced for serious offences in Germany and that he had been eventually able to return to Germany, the Court held that the German authorities' actions were in conformity with the Convention and that no violation of Article 8 could be retained.

In the Tas case, which concerned the confiscation of the premises used in the connection with human trafficking, the Court declared the application as inadmissible, being manifestly ill-founded. The arguments held by the Court were that taking into account the States' margin of appreciation in controlling the use of property in combating criminal activities, then the interference with the applicant's right to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions had not been disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued, i.e. to combat human trafficking.

3. Concluding Remarks

After the analysis of the Court's case-law we can conclude that, although the Convention does not mention if there is a formal hierarchy of the human rights enshrined in it, it is recognized the fact that "a balance has to be achieved between conflicting interests, usually those of the individual balanced against those of the community, but occasionally the rights of one individual must be balanced against those of another"[21]. As it is stated in the legal doctrine, "the human being is the central area of interest for the lawmaker"[22].

The doctrine divides the rights set out in the Convention into unqualified rights (some of which are non-derogable) and qualified rights[23].

In the category of unqualified rights we can include the human beings trafficking under the umbrella of prohibition of slavery and forced labour as defined in Article 4 (prohibition of torture), which is also an absolute right, because no derogations under Article 15 (derogation in time of an emergency) are permitted. Other unqualified rights are the right of life in Article 2 (subject to some exceptions), prohibition of torture, inhuman or degrading treatment in Article 3, the right to liberty and security in Article 5, the right to a fair trial in Article 6, the prohibition of punishment without law in Article 7, the right to marry in Article 12, the right to an effective remedy in Article 13, the prohibition of discrimination in Article 14, the right to education and the right to free elections in Article 3 of Protocol 1; and the prohibition of the death penalty in Protocols 6 and 13.

Qualified rights are the ones which are mentioned in the Convention, but the Contracting States may interfere with it for the purpose of securing certain interests: the right to respect for private and family life enshrined in Article 8, together with the freedom of thought, conscience and religion in Article 9, freedom of expression in Article 10, freedom of assembly and association in Article 11, protection of property in Article 1 of the Protocol 1, freedom of movement in Article 2 of Protocol 4.

Any interference with a qualified right will require that the Contracting State prove that the interference was justified: the interference was according to law, the aim was to protect a recognized interest and the interference was necessary in a democratic society.

Despite the concerted efforts of the national public authorities[24] with the international organizations, in the following years we will still encounter many varieties of the human beings trafficking (from prostitution to organ harvesting), and many States that do not act with responsibility[25] towards their nationals or other categories of individuals found on their territory[26].

As a response to the importance of trafficking in human beings, international organizations try to move forward. For instance, the Council of Europe had also adopted the Convention on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings in 2005 which was the first convention to recognize in an express manner the fact that the human beings trafficking represents a violation of human rights and an offence to the dignity and integrity of each human being.

But the question related to the present paper is how will the Court deal those cases? The answer is simple: TIME will answer this question.

ROMANIA – RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS AFTER 10 YEARS FROM JOINING THE EUROPEAN UNION

Alexandra STĂNCIULESCU[*]

Abstract

On the 1st of January 2017, Romania celebrated 10 years of being a member of the European Union. The European Union is both, a major and important subject of international law and an international organization, which created a legal system that regulates economic, political and social issues, binding 28 members. The main purposes of becoming a part of the European family include a significant growth of living standards, a strong accent on the respect of fundamental rights and equity between the citizens of the European Union, of social politics, environment protection and nevertheless support in developing a countryâ s economy. After the fall of communism, Romania saw the opportunity of becoming a member of the European Union and started the long process of joining this organization. After 10 years from the completion of the accession process, the results can be interesting. So, the purpose of the following paper is to highlight the advantages and disadvantages of being a member of the European Union and the objectives are to determine which were the conditions that Romania had to fulfill in order to become a EU member, how this membership changed our legal system, which are our rights and obligations as a EU member today and which are the effects from 2007 and now.

Keywords: rights, obligations, European Union, Romania, member

Introduction

The following paper's objective is to analyze the road that Romania had to walk on and to adapt to in order to become a full member of the European Union, with all the rights and obligations that come with this status. As a country with an emerging economy and with a history that changed so much the power mechanism, after the 1989 Revolution, Romania had the opportunity to fast forward onto being a part of the European family. Steps toward a relationship with the European Economic Community were made since the 1970`s. Both the Socialist Republic of Romania and the EEC[1] were interested in concluding agreements, still Romania saw this entity as if it were another subject of international law, such as a country, but with much more to gain from, seeing its foundation and with no intention of being a part of it. Through this article, we will try to present, explain and comment the last 10 years and more since the EU-Romania relationship has started, going over the starting conditions that this country had to fulfill in order to become a member, the harmonization process of the Romanian legislation, the rights and obligations that came along with the new status and, in the final, some conclusions on all the facts and information presented above.

Taking into consideration the current context, the turning and evolution of the EU in the present and, also, the fact that it is a decade long since Romania took a step to be a part of the European family, the studied matter tends to create an overall on Romania's past, present and future and tries to underline the importance of its actions regarding the EU. In the highlight of Winston Churchill's famous speech at the University of Zurich, when he said, and we quote, "We must build a kind of United States of Europe…The structure of the United States of Europe, if well and truly built, will be such as to make the material strength of a single state less important…If at first all the States of Europe are not willing or able to join the Union, we must nevertheless proceed to assemble and combine those who will and those who can.", we are able to observe that, in order to obtain the final stage of unification, each country plays an important part. So, it is a matter of will and ability, two attributes that a state can choose to have or not. After 10 years, Romania can still make a choice in any direction, taking into consideration the current circumstances and, even though, it isn't a major actor on the political scene of the European Union, it can make a difference.

We will try to approach as many sources as we can in order to achieve a fully documented research and, for that matter, a series of relevant conclusions.

The studied subject, as presented in the article's title, "Romania – rights and obligations after 10 years from joining the European Union" has a quite recent approach, because the decade anniversary was on 1st of January 2017. You will find that the article's content has a variety of specialized literature references, but all in all, the object and final conclusions of the article are marked by a personal touch.

players with our emotions will present to the Romanians this historical victory as the result of their generosity and heroism. In fact, the becoming of our country as an EU member and of each of one of us as a European citizen is the result of the efforts, aspirations and endeavor of each and all of us"[2]. This quote futures two important ideas, which are found kind of antagonistic and these are: firstly, the idea that, at the surface, only the politicians, officials and other major players on the political scene have contributed to our realizations as a nation towards an united European future and secondly, that the entire populations, each and one of us as individuals have played our part in Romania's current status. In our opinion, both ideas have their root in truth. Mainly, because, essentially, our country's interests were, and still are, represented by the people we elected to do so and these people carried on the negotiations, meetings and official talks that led us to where our country is today and also because, the effects of the entire integration process have been felt by every Romanian citizen. Reasons for this come from the fact that laws have been changed in order to assimilate the European acquis, consequently new rights and obligations have been created and also some already existent have been modified.

In order to pursue the article's objective, we come back on the initial premises that Romania's EU membership stood on.

We remind you that the first European community was created in 1951, when France, Germany, Belgium, Luxembourg, Italy and the Netherlands signed the treaty that established the European Coal and Steel Community, followed by two other European communities in 1957, when the same states signed the enforcing treaties of the European Economic Community and European Atomic Energy Community. Currently, the European Union is the biggest and most important single market in the world and also a very important actor on the political, social, economical and cultural international scene.

In order to approach this massive and exclusive family, interested countries had to have not only the willing and political ambition to join it, but also they had to adopt a series of standards which entitled them to an eventual candidacy. At the beginning, these standards aimed only the technical and economical domains, but in order to fulfill a proper coordination and to comply with the principles of good practice, much more domains were included as mandatory for reaching standard levels[3].

One interesting fact is that Romania was the first country from Central and East Europe to establish official relations with the European Community, starting with the communism period and to acknowledge it as a single subject of international law. These started around 1970's, when negotiations were initialized in order to sign a series of agreements regarding agro-food products, after that in order to implement a common customs regime and also to undo Romanian products in the EEC space. In this way, in 1974 Romania became the first East European country to be included in the EEC`s Generalized System of Preferences (GSP), allowing for easier access of Romanian agricultural products to the EEC market and, in 1980, the only country from the Soviet bloc to sign a comprehensive trade agreement with the EEC[4]. After 1987, the relation between our country and the EEC started to deteriorate due to Romania's unpredictable ruler, culminating with the Council and the European Commission suspending talks with Romania, because its authorities were accused of human rights violation.

After the fall of communism, new diplomatic relations are established between Romania and the European Community. The following period marks a new beginning for both our country and the European family, starting with the adoption of the Maastricht Treaty (1992), which introduced the term of "European Union" and created this new and unique entity that functioned on three pillars: 1. The European Communities pillar; 2. The Common Foreign and Security Policy pillar and 3. Police and Judicial Co-operation in Criminal Matters pillar.

In 1991, the European Commission offers Romania a special guest status along the European Community and also includes it into the PHARE[5] assistance programme.

In 1993, the Europe Agreement establishing an association between the European Economic Communities and their Member States, of the one part, and Romania, of the other part is signed. The main objective of this agreement was to prepare Romania for the integration, focusing on the economical relations and institutionalized political dialogue. Some of the premises that determined both parties to interact were based on one hand on the traditional links existing between the Community, its Member States and Romania and the common values that they shared, the wish to strengthen these links and to establish close and lasting relations, based on reciprocity and, on the other hand, the importance of establishing and enhancing in Europe a system of stability based on cooperation, with the Community as one of the cornerstones, willing to set up instruments of cooperation and economic, technical and financial assistance on a global and multiannual basis[6].

[5] Poland and Hungary Assistance for the Restructuring of the Economy - initially described as the international efforts to provide economic support to the emerging Polish and Hungarian democracies - is the EU's main financial instrument for accession of the Central and Eastern European countries.It was launched as a specific EC programme, initiated by Council Regulation No. 3906/89. Its funding is used to channel technical, economic and infrastructural expertise and assistance to recipient states. The aim is to help these countries achieve market economies based on free enterprise and private initiative.

On 22th June 1995, Romania proceeded to the official application to join the European Union, depositing also its National Pre-Accession Strategy and a declaration signed by the President of the Republic, the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies and the Prime Minister and the leaders of all the political parties represented in Parliament, which expressed Romania's political will to pursue the consolidation and development of the rule of law, political pluralism, the separation of powers, free elections, respect for human rights and the establishment of a market economy compatible with the principles governing the European Union.

The general previewed advantages and disadvantages of joining the European Union foreshadowed were:

1. advantages:

- the growth of the living standard by accessing the single market, which meant new legislation in this area with all the ensuing consequences, new investment opportunities, free movement of goods, services and capitals and so on;
- the adoption of high standards in the social politics domain, which meant underlining the importance of respecting fundamental rights, equality between the EU citizens, non-discrimination, protecting the environment and other;
- gaining the benefits of being an EU citizen, such as free movement of persons, equal access to job opportunities all around the member states, equality in rights and representation in the EU institutions;
- obtaining financial and institutional support in the agriculture domain, as a priority, but also in other important domains, and other.

2. disadvantages:

- even though, economical growth was foreshadowed, the internal administration needed a reform in order to comply with the high standards of the EU legislation, so Romania had to be up to this;
- the lack of administrative capacity and projects on European funds management could have significantly slowed the rhythm of growing the living standard
- another fact that could have affected the process of smooth integration was the lack of professional staff and expertise in pursuing and conducting the stages to reaching the required standards;
- regarding the agriculture sector, farms could have trouble in adapting to the veterinary norms, dictated by the European acquis;
- once a member of the EU (and also not forgetting the membership of NATO), Romania's geostrategic policy suffers some changes by becoming a border-state of this organization.
- In 1997, the European Council, at European Commission's request, issued an official opinion on Romania's adhesion application. The final conclusions were presented as follows:
- the current improvement in Romania, following the arrival in power of a new government, indicates that Romania is on its way to satisfy the political criteria;
- Romania has made considerable progress in the creation of a market economy, but it would still face serious difficulties to cope with competitive pressure and market forces within the Union in the medium term;
- despite the progress that has been made, Romania has neither transposed nor taken on the essential elements of the acquis, particularly as regards the internal market. It is therefore uncertain whether Romania will be in a position to assume the obligations of membership in the medium term. In addition, considerable efforts will be needed in the areas of environment, transport, employment and social affairs, justice and home affairs as well as agriculture. More generally, substantial administrative reform will be indispensable if Romania is to have the structures to apply and enforce the acquis effectively.

In the light of these considerations, the Commission considers that negotiations for accession to the European Union should be opened with Romania as soon as it has made sufficient progress in satisfying the conditions of membership defined by the European Council in Copenhagen.

The reinforced pre-accession strategy will help Romania to prepare itself better to meet the obligations of membership, and to take action to improve the shortcomings identified in the Opinions"[7].

The criteria established at the Copenhagen European Council mentioned above aimed those candidate countries of Central and Eastern Europe who wished to become members of the Union and meant meeting the following conditions:

- stability of institutions guaranteeing democracy, the rule of law, human rights and respect for and protection of minorities;
- the existence of a functioning market economy, as well as the ability to cope with competitive pressures and market forces within the Union;
- the ability to take on the obligations of membership, including adherence to the aims of political, economic and monetary union.

After two reports presented in 1998 and 1999 by the European Commission on Romania's progress in meeting the necessary conditions in order to become a member of the EU, the European Council from 1999 decided to convene bilateral intergovernmental conferences in February 2000 to begin negotiations with Romania, Slovakia, Latvia, Lithuania, Bulgaria and Malta on the conditions for their entry into the Union and the ensuing Treaty adjustments[8].

As we can observe, negotiations implied a serious changing mechanism that involved a variety of actors and factors which would play an important role in reforming all of Romania's administration policies, institutions and legislation. As we were saying at the beginning of this paper and as we can now deduct, everyone was involved directly or indirectly involved in this process.

Hereinafter, we will resume the main rights and obligations assumed by Romania during the integration process. These rights and obligations are in force to this day, suffering the specific modifications that were applied through the adoption of the following treaties: Treaty of Amsterdam (signed in 1997, came into force in 1999); Treaty of Nice (signed in 2001, came into force in 2003) and last, but not least, Treaty of Lisbon (signed in 2007, came into force in 2009). Even though Romania officially joined the EU in 2007, the amendments made by each treaty produced effects also on our side.

According to art. 26 from the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union:

"1.The Union shall adopt measures with the aim of establishing or ensuring the functioning of the internal market, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Treaties.

2. The internal market shall comprise an area without internal frontiers in which the free movement of goods, persons, services and capital is ensured in accordance with the provisions of the Treaties.

3. The Council, on a proposal from the Commission, shall determine the guidelines and conditions necessary to ensure balanced progress in all the sectors concerned. "

- Free movement of goods

The European legislation talks about conformity assessments bodies and accreditation, standardization and market surveillance bodies. In order to develop a functioning market in accordance with the EU standards, Romania had to implement a new mechanism that required, among others, a clear delimitation between the attributions of the organisms mentioned above, a well prepared staff, a procedure improvement and last, but not least, an efficient control system.

The 2005 Comprehensive Monitoring Report on Romania concluded as stated: "Romania is generally meeting the requirements for membership in the field of new approach sectoral legislation and in the non-harmonised area and is expected to be able to apply this acquis from accession. Attention should be paid to ensuring that legislative alignment is completed in the near future and that administrative preparations continue. In the nonharmonised area Romania should continue to remove barriers to trade and implement the mutual recognition principle in its legislation. Increased efforts are needed as regards horizontal and procedural measures and old approach sectoral legislation. In order to complete accession preparations, Romania must considerably upgrade its administrative capacities in the field of accreditation. Enhanced efforts are still needed to complete transposition of the old approach acquis and to revise marketing authorisations for pharmaceuticals. Particular attention must be paid to completing the alignment and implementation of legislation in the area of foodstuffs. Additional efforts are required to strengthen the administrative capacity of all institutions involved in food safety issues. Public procurement continues to be an area of serious concern. While legislative alignment needs to be completed, substantial shortcomings remain in the implementation and enforcement of legislation. Administrative capacities at all levels need to be urgently 33 strengthened; coordination improved and staff continuity, recruitment and training ensured. Unless legislation is fully aligned, coherent and implemented correctly, there is a serious risk that Romania would not have a functioning public procurement system in place in time."

- Free movement of people

The basic idea of the free movement of people principle is the elimination of discrimination regarding the conditions to enter a member state, study, travel, work, employment and remuneration.

Currently, the main rights and obligations under the Directive 2004/38/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 29 April 2004 on the right of citizens of the Union and their family members to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States are:

- For stays of under three months: the only requirement for Union citizens is that they possess a valid identity document or passport. The host Member State may require the persons concerned to register their presence in the country.
- For stays of over three months: EU citizens and their family members — if not working — must have sufficient resources and sickness insurance to ensure that they do not become a burden on the social services of the host Member State during their stay. Union citizens do not need residence permits, although Member States may require them to register with the authorities. Family members of Union citizens who are not nationals of a Member State must apply for a residence permit, valid for the duration of their stay or a five-year period.
- Right of permanent residence: Union citizens acquire this right after a five-year period of uninterrupted legal residence, provided that an expulsion decision has not been enforced against them. This right is no longer subject to any conditions. The same rule applies to family members who are not nationals of a Member State and who have lived with a Union citizen for five years. The right of permanent residence is lost only in the event of more than two successive years' absence from the host Member State.

- Restrictions on the right of entry and the right of residence: Union citizens or members of their family may be expelled from the host Member State on grounds of public policy, public security or public health. Guarantees are provided to ensure that such decisions are not taken on economic grounds, comply with the proportionality principle and are based on personal conduct, among others[9].

These rights and obligations apply to Romanian citizens to the present, but making a short retrospective we observe the adapting process through the eyes of 2005 Comprehensive Monitoring Report on Romania, which said: "Romania is generally meeting the commitments and requirements arising from the accession negotiations in the areas of mutual recognition of professional qualifications, free movement of workers and coordination of social security systems, and is expected to be in a position to implement this acquis from accession. However, the administrative capacity still needs to be further developed. In the area of free movement of workers, Romania needs to ensure that its legislation fully complies with the case law of the Court of Justice regarding access to public sector posts in Romania. Preparations also need to be completed for the introduction of the European Health Insurance Card as from accession." We signal a particular case regarding the possibility of a Member State to apply restrictions over the labor market. In 2007, Ireland decided to impose some restrictions on free movement for the citizens of Bulgaria and Romania, who were the subject to the employment permit requirements which applied before they joined the EU. The Irish Government decided to end restrictions on Bulgarians and Romanians accessing the Irish labor market with effect from 1 January 2012[10].

- Free movement of services

This principle translates the need to ensure that the right of establishment and the freedom to provide services anywhere in the EU is not hampered by national legislation. In order to achieve this objective, Romania`s first aims were to harmonize the authorization conditions and the prudential rules, the control in the origin country, granting a single license and the mutual recognition of national supervision standards. In this sector, the pre-accession process was limited to the following conclusion mentioned in the 2005 Comprehensive Monitoring Report on Romania: "Romania is generally meeting the requirements for membership in terms of transposition of the acquis in the area of banking, investment services and securities markets and information-society regulations. Subject to steady progress being maintained both in completing the transposition, implementation of the legislation and administrative capacity, Romania should have functioning systems in place by accession. Particular attention should be paid to the strengthening of the Insurance Supervisory Commission. Increased efforts are needed to meet the commitments and requirements for accession in the areas of the right of establishment and the freedom to provide non-financial services and the protection of personal data. Work must be accelerated to complete the alignment in those areas, as well as to eliminate legal and administrative restrictions to establishment and freedom to provide services. Significant efforts are needed to ensure that the newly established Authority for Personal Data Processing becomes fully operational and is effectively implementing the data protection acquis (see Chapter 24 – Justice and home affairs). As regards the insurance sector, weak enforcement of rules on third party liability on motor insurance remains problematic. Increased efforts to enforce motor insurance legislation are now needed in order to ensure that Romania will be ready in this area by the time of accession."

- Free movement of capital

This principle was an effect of the Maastricht Treaty signed in 1992, as a precondition before adopting the single currency. Romania's commitment towards the implementation of this principle aimed to liberalize the capital movements in a gradual matter until its official accession to the EU. This implied changes in our legislation regarding the terminology on capital operations, accounting report, the organization of card payment, the right to establishment and freedom to provide services, investment services, regulated markets and others. The conclusion expressed in the same 2005 report mentioned above: "Romania is generally meeting the commitments and requirements arising from the accession negotiations in the field of capital movements and payments and is expected to be in a position to implement the acquis as from accession. It is also meeting the commitments and requirements arising from the accession negotiations in the field of payment systems. Increased efforts are needed in the area of money laundering, where alignment to the Financial Action Task Force standards has still to be completed and enforcement needs substantial improvement."

- Agriculture

Generally speaking, until this day, accession negotiations in the agricultural chapter focus on the procedures for future direct payments, support to rural development or on the need for transitional measures facilitating integration into the EU, taking into account the specific circumstances of the agricultural sector in the candidate countries in the process. The agricultural and rural development chapter includes a large number of binding rules, many of which are regulations that are directly applicable. The proper application of these rules and their effective enforcement by an efficient public administration is essential for the functioning of the Common Agriculture Policy[11]. Starting with 1992, until 2007, CAP[12] has been reformed in order to achieve the main purpose of permitting the communautaire agriculture to be more competitive and to positively contribute to the local, national and community efforts of landscaping and protecting the environment.

So, Romania benefited of several funds of the CAP for rural development and direct payments. The main programme before accession was SAPARD (Special Accesssion Programme for Agriculture and Rural Development) and after becoming a EU member, SAPARD became DRDP (National Rural Development Programme).

The conclusions brought by the 2005 Comprehensive Monitoring Report on Romania were: "Romania is generally meeting the commitments and requirements arising from the accession negotiations, among the horizontal issues as regards the Farm Accountancy Data Network, organic farming and state aid, rural development; in the veterinary field, common measures; and as regards phytosanitary issues. Subject to good progress being maintained in these areas, Romania should be in a position to implement this acquis from accession. Increased efforts are needed in the areas of quality policy, trade mechanisms, and all of the relevant common market organisations (CMO); in the veterinary field as regards animal welfare, zootechnics, animal nutrition and trade in live animals and animal products. Unless efforts are accelerated in these areas, there is a risk that functioning systems will not be in place at accession. Serious concerns exist in relation to Romania's preparations to set up its Paying Agencies and to implement the Integrated Administration and Control System (IACS). Serious concerns exist also in relation to the identification and registration of animals and the establishment of functioning border inspection posts in the field of veterinary control system in the internal market. Furthermore in the veterinary area, similar serious concerns remain regarding TSE and animal by-products (concerning the collection system of cadavers, the absence of rendering plants), animal disease control measures (for Classical Swine Fever) and veterinary public health (the upgrading of agri-food establishments). Unless immediate action is taken, Romania will not be in a position to implement the acquis in these areas by the date of accession."

We will resume our presentation at only four of the 31 chapter structures[13] that where undergone during the negotiations for Romania's accession to the European Union.

An important component of the integration process regards the harmonization of Romania's internal legislation to the EU legislation. Art. 70 from the Europe Agreement establishing an association between the European Economic Communities and their Member States, of the one part, and Romania, of the other part stipulated that "The approximation of laws shall extend to the following areas in particular: customs law, company law, banking law, company accounts and taxes, intellectual property, protection of

In order to pursue this purpose, an essential element for the approximation of Romanian laws to the EU norms and standards was the Position Paper. This document had the role to present the existing situation regarding the transposition into the national law, on one hand and to present, in a succinct way, how Romania will transpose the main normative EU acts in the future. The institutions responsible for the correct and efficient implementation were also mentioned in the Position Paper. Another important instrument was the National Programme for accession to the European Union which included the strategic plan of how the accession process will be carried out[14].

Conclusions

Taking into consideration all the facts and information presented in the section above, we can observe that after a period of struggling, Romania's future changed in order to be a part of the big Europe family created starting with 1951. One of many the reasons that determined our country to become a member of the European Union was to obtain several advantages that were offered to all of the member states, including the highly developed countries. A space of security, freedom and justice was promised and considerable efforts were made in order to achieve these objectives. The European Commission final report before accessions, stated: "There has been some progress in the areas of judicial reform and the fight against corruption, money-laundering and organized crime, but further tangible results are needed. This report identifies those issues which require further work. It draws attention to provisions in the acquis and the Accession Treaty which are designed to safeguard the proper functioning of EU policies and institutions following accession. In line with the findings of this report, the Commission, after consulting the Member States, will set up a mechanism for cooperation and verification of progress in the areas of judicial reform and the fight against corruption, money-laundering and organized crime. For this purpose, benchmarks have been established which refer to the particular circumstances of each country. The Commission has adopted the necessary legal provisions to ensure the proper management of EU agricultural funds. The report underlines that the existing rules contain the necessary guarantees for the proper management of EU structural funds, and other programmes.(…) Overall, Bulgaria and Romania have made far-reaching efforts to adapt their legislation and administration to the laws and rules of the European Union. This has largely brought them into line with prevailing standards and practices within the European Union. Sustained support from the European Union will be available for addressing the remaining issues. Sufficient guarantees exist in the acquis and the Accession Treaty to ensure the proper functioning of EU policies and institutions. As a result of the progress made, Bulgaria and Romania will be in a position to take on the rights and obligations of EU membership on 1 January 2007. The Commission looks forward to welcoming Bulgaria and Romania as fully-fledged members of the European Union on this date"[15].

What can we say about Romania's outcome after 10 years of EU membership? We have the same rights and obligations as all the other members regarding the free movement of good, persons, services and capital, agriculture policy and other regulated domains by the European Union legislation, any discrimination between European citizens being banned. Romania made great progress in the macroeconomic adjustment and carrying out convergence criteria including in terms of preparation for accession to the euro area. Approaching the standards dictated by the European Union rules and regulations, but also by its principles, Romania placed itself on a new course, reaching out for better living conditions and highly compliance of the fundamental human rights and also for continuing the practice of the rule of law in a democratic state.

This paper aims to realize a balanced report on Romania's pre and post accession general status and it is expected to fulfill a short, but succinct mission in observing the role that the European Union played for our country.

We recommend further research on this subject, mainly because it is a very complex and vast domain and the effects of being an EU member are perpetual and can be approached from different points of view. In 2017, Romania started a new government mandate and even though the popular vote has been clear, people, Romanian citizens, but also from all around the Europe, felt the need to express their public concern about respecting the rule of law in all matters and at all levels, from the simple individual to the president of the country. In this current context, a thorough analyze of how is in Romania the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism for on judicial reform and corruption applied is necessary and recommended.

As a final statement regarding the European Union's current context, in which Romania plays its part as a member state, we will quote Antonio Tajani, the President of the European Union Parliament: "I feel like a sailor who is working hard to survive the tempest, and I'm convinced that we will ride out of the storm, and reach safe harbor"[16].

THE GAMER GENERATION – FUTURE DRONE PILOTS

Andrei-Alexandru STOICA*

Abstract

Drones or unmanned piloted vehicles represent the pinnacle of ranged weapon technology that ensure a fast strike, low cost and with almost no boots on the ground. This type of new technology also brings a new requirement for governments that use these devices, a requirement that dated air force training cannot offer, but a mobile phone or controller can offer it wholesome. The idea of downplaying war to sound very hip and cool and fun for the younger crowd has been around since the 1970's, when the Vietnam war recruiters were using the idea that war was a good investment for children and teens, because it offered them a future-proof job and access to entertaining tools, but kept out the negative aspects of participating in an armed conflict. Now we see a resurgence in the way military recruiters use such trends to draw in the crowd.

In this regard, the situation of using children and teens, or more precisely ones who have video-games as a time investing hobby, has been considered by the regulated armed forces for some time now, but due to international treaties that govern child protection this has been deemed impossible to accomplish. Should child protection treaties be revised or not, and if they should, could drones be the entry point for taking part in armed conflicts or other armed situations?

Keywords: drones, soldiers, videogames, treaties, conventions.

This paper will focus on answering issues regarding the usage of children as potential drone pilots and how international law tries to fight a known issue in governemnts around the world. Furthermore, the paper will focus on how international law subjects dealt with child recruitment and how modern military practices outpace the law of nations. To effectively define the focuses, this paper will outline current legal instruments and practices of states, even if said states did ratify some or all legal instruments, they still do not uphold them and furthermore, disobey them entirely because internal legal instruments allow them do so.

While other authors have indeed offered their point of view on child recruitment in regular armed forces, this paper took inspiration from Tonje Hessen Schei's work entitled "Drone", a war documentary with human rights focuses, and tries to outline more legal instruments that are already existent in the struggle to prevent armed forces recruiting children as drone pilots and military hackers.

2. Keeping children off the battlefield and the efficiency of treaties that enforce such an action.

2.1. The definition of children under the Convention on the Rights of the Child (1989) and its Optional Protocol.

As per article 1 of the aforementioned Convention, a child is considered anyone who is below the age of 18 years old, unless national law state otherwise[1]. This is also further enforced by the Optional Protocol, where it expressly forbids incorporating persons bellow the age of 18 as direct participants[2]. Such a prohibition has been circumvented by non-state actors in armed conflicts mainly because it was a psychological weapon and because children were easy to draft and motivate to participate.

Under the Geneva Conventions (1949) and the Additional Protocols, according to article 77 paragraph 2 of Additional Protocol I, parties should refrain from using persons bellow the age of 15 as direct participants, but for those that are between the age of 15 and 18, the older ones will have priority in taking up direct combatant roles[3]. This is tied to the constant activity of the United Nations and the Security Council who has adopted ever since 1999 a regular debate on "Children in armed conflict"[4] and as such has periodic reports published on implementing a strategy to help war stricken communities and to protect children of all ages from the horrors of war.

While this debate launched without aiming the action at a specific non-state actor or government, it did however outline the fact that this issue will be handled by the UN Security Council as it sees fit. The most recent report of the U.N.S.C.[5] and the Human Rights Watch, entitled „Extreme Measures: abuses against children detained as national security threats"[6] is considered a tip of the iceberg type of situation where children have been detained on an extensive scale because they have been considered a real threat to national security in Nigeria and Syria. This may be true in the conventional way of fighting in an armed conflict, meaning with on the ground and in the trenches, but what if they were fighting from a location, far away from said battlefield, and connected from a computer or with a joystick?

These types of situations have to draw out the fact that persons bellow the age of 18 have become more active in how new generations of armed conflicts have been waged in this century. This is further pointed out in the UNSC report[7] where it's stated that a lot of states that have been confronted with the issue of terrorism and child soldiers have adapted their national legislation to allow the detention and questioning of participants bellow the age of 18 as potential terrorists, all the meanwhile allowing them to be treated as other adults, meaning they get beaten up, tortured or killed in prisons.

This raises a lot of questions on how a person bellow the age of 18 would be treated if he or she was a drone pilot that was detained on the battlefield. Would they get better treatment or even should they be treated in other ways as a regular adult soldier? The UNSC resolution requires states to comply with child protection laws, but so far, states such as Israel have failed to comply and offer proper child demilitarization or even basic child protection laws and have gone ahead and prosecuted the alleged terrorists as full spectrum warriors.

Other situations that are blatantly disregarded are those regarding children being already targets of drone strikes[8]. Such a situation was called even in 2015 a barbaric practice by tagging children as „fun-sized terrorists". To try an add a more awareness even among drone pilots, the Foundation for Fundamental Rights asked an artist in Pakistan to make a giant picture of a child and place it in a heavy bombed region[9], but sadly this did not ease the situation as attacks continued regardless of the ongoing campaign.

However, even if children are not yet recruited directly in the military, signs that things are changing in how the military considers who should be part of it. Recently the Swiss Army has decided that it should change its military recruiting algorithms by incorporating overweight people in their service[10]. This is coming at a time when cyber security and robotics threatening to become major areas in regular military situations. This is in line to how the U.S.A. has decided to create new military algorithms even from 2016[11] when former Secretary of Defense Ashton Carter stated that the military standards are due for a reform and that overweight people, pot smokers and single parents should be allowed in the military in different roles. Seeing as how these categories are usually people who are very versed in using computers and joysticks they make the perfect targets for future drone pilots and military hackers.

2.2. Why videogames are the entry point for convincing children to become part of the military.

First of all, what are videogames? Videogames, as the Webster Dictionary[12] puts it, is "an electronic game played by means of images on a video screen and often emphasizing fast action".

This means that playing games that have a heavy military theme could create a false sense of reality on how warfare is being handled in real life and could impact a child's expectations[13]. The U.S.A. Army tried to recruit children by offering them a contract stipulating that once they reach a certain age they have to enroll in either a military school or directly in the military, but this practice was seen as prohibited since it forced the child into military service at a later stage in life.

Human rights activist and documentary maker Tonje Hessen Schei[14] stated that confirmed reports from locations where gamers usually gather are frequently visited by army recruiters who bring a drone mission simulator and allow participants of the event, who are aged 10 or older, to partake in a mission to take out different military targets and terrorists in hoping that they would be entertained and join the military. The activist goes furthermore and claims that game designers are actually creating videogames with the formats the military suggests them to as to create a better interface for future pilots or military personal.

Furthermore, Professor Philip Alston stated in 2010[15] that the „PlayStation mentality" is a key factor in how drone pilots are being trained and factor why killing has become a more viable option rather than capturing and also why collateral damage is no longer an issue.

3. Could child protection treaties be modified for the new generation of military personnel?

3.1. Why video games are the new tools for recruiting military personnel.

Video games are currently considered a spectrum of the entertainment sector that outgrew other conventional mainstream entertainment sectors by a large margin. The military have a longstanding reputation of partaking in the development of games or influencing some studios to develop certain interfaces[16].

Such an example is the popular game America's Army, a game that debuted in 2002 on the personal computer and PlayStation 2 and now expands to 5 games in the series with the latest in 2015. The game debuted at an annual gaming convention known as E3 and in 2002, the US Army used this momentum to release a video game that was both a recruiting tool and also a training simulator for people interested in a military career[17], but what the game also teaches is that international law and with a high regard, international humanitarian law, is something very subjective.

In this regard, the game teaches people that attacking hospitals or using new weapons is perfectly legal if the enemy is present there. The issue with such situations is that a lot of the player base is comprised of children who are very easily influenced and as such can be molded in developing a desire to join a military branch later on in life.

However, this trend has been in a tug-of-war situation, as the International Committee of the Red Cross has stepped up their presence in this sector as trying to teach young gamers about the risks of war and that justice exists for those who abuse their positions[1819]. This created the chance for players to create content and use the created content to learn about war crimes and the protected emblems of the Red Cross, while also learning that killing should not be the focus of the armed conflict, but rather obtaining an advantage.

Sadly, the ongoing trend in the U.S.A. set a precedent for other states like Norway or Sweden and it will further outline how military recruiters will transform small and harmless robotics events into giant recruiting events for future military researchers and pilots[20]. This is the case where human rights activists from Child Soldiers International have argued that during a 2013 event in Ohio, high-school students were exposed to a heavy military themed event in which they were being briefed about the benefits of drones and also they were exposed to military trainers who were teaching them how to build drones and rockets and how to use them in the field.

3.2. Are treaties still relevant?

To answer this as bluntly as possible, yes they are relevant. The current child protection treaties forbid armies to recruit children bellow the age of 18 for active combat roles[21]. This was outlined in conferences held under a political-level initiative of U.N. member states to form a working group that strives towards the disarmament and reintegration of children taking part in armed conflicts and to further the U.N. General Assembly Resolution from 1996[22] which created the Special Representative for Children and Armed Conflict. From this stage, the UN Security Council cataloged the recruiting of children bellow the age of 18 to take part in direct armed conflict as a threat to peace[23] and going even further as to incorporating it in the Rome Statute of 1998, through which the International Criminal Court was created, to make child recruiting a war crime.

The Security Council also considered that struggle against the usage and recruiting of children to be a high issue that will always be in the attention of the UNSC and the Secretary-General of the U.N[24] and starting with 2014 the UNSC started a campaign entitled Children. Not Soldiers to end military recruiters from going to schools to influence children into joining the military[25].

Unfortunately, as the Drone documentary proves, governments did not follow-through with the UNSC resolution to reduce military recruiter presence in schools and even went further as to request that the Playstation generation be moved from the bedroom/living room to the frontlines against terrorism[26]. The former drone deputy commander in the RAF considers that current pilots suffer from fatigue and stress and as such a younger generation needs to take the lead in the fight against terrorism, since most of them are acquainted with the drone interface and controls from over playing console and personal computer games during their teenage years.

This is further noticeable in the USA where the Supreme Court in 2006[27] ruled that military recruiters will be allowed on school premise only if other groups that promote career orientation are allowed and will not receive extra benefits. This comes at a time when schools were trying to fight the Pentagon's presence on school grounds which sometimes meant that if a school would not allow recruiters to partake in their mission or discriminate regarding sexual orientation, then that school would lose funding. But after 2006, universities and law schools are not allowed to ban military recruiters for this reason, because federal law requires equal access for the military. This issue has been seen in Scotland as well when in 2007[28] teacher unions tried to push out the military out but failed to gather the require momentum to ban the recruiting of minors in schools.

While child protection treaties remain steadfast, governments are trying to find a loophole so that they can recruit potential soldiers into their fold, even if international campaigns and internal opposition is met. This was done by allowing legal interpretations of personal information protection laws to be in favor of national defense interests. For example, in the USA, in 1982 Congress voted on allowing the Department of Defense to establish a data-base of every person who is aged 17 and up as a potential recruit for the military, and also to store that information for up to 3 years[29]. Later on, in the early 2000s, Congress enacted a more forcible language towards schools and universities in the way of forcing them to accept the presence of a military recruiter on school grounds while failure to comply was met with harsh political backlash. Later on, Congress amended the legal documents as to allow parents to decide whether or not their child should be added to the Department of Defense watch list.

In Europe, the United Kingdom is the only government that allows the recruitment of teens in the army, as long as they are at least 16 years old[3031]. This means that they will not see active combat until the age of 18 but until then they will have a supportive role in the regular army. This has been seen as a paradox to the normal European practice, where the minimum age of enlisting is 18 for any role in the regular army.

In this regard it is worrying that children are allowed to join the military branch in Europe, this aspect being noted in the Concluding observations on the fifth period report of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland conducted by the UN[32] and the Open letter to the Ministry of Defence[33] from May 2016 where both UK Parliament members alongside NGOs, teacher and parent unions and the UN request that the UK stop accepting enlisting requests from children that are between the age of 15 and 18 as it contradicts the Convention on the Rights of the Child. Unfortunately, the requests fell on deaf ears since the UK has one of the biggest military presence in the world and is also a permanent Security Council member, meaning that the UK and the USA can legally get teenagers to join the army and also shape them as future military hackers or drone pilots.

4. Conclusions

While most states around the world race to acquire drone technology and the means to build it, the privilegded states such as Israel, U.S.A. and the U.K. have developed enough tech that they require more manpower to use it and maintain it. This means that state will try to find potential manpower in the private sector or try to supplement its lack of manpower by preparing younger generations to take up the role of legal combatants.

This paper has a dual role, first being that to spread awareness of the ongoing practice of recruiting or promoting military carreers to teens or younger audiences and second, to try and outline the constant work that the U.N. has achieved in the struggle to prohibit children from taking part in armed conflicts, yet the political will of certain states comes as counterproductive to the work of the entire U.N. system.

While it is true that the U.N. has certain areas in which it cannot intervene as much as it should, the peer preasure it can create could later on force states to adopt a certain conduit that is moral and on par with democratic states. Other than the U.N., only NGOs and other working groups can deter the ongoing child recruitment mechanisms and stop exposing them to military opportunists.

JUSTICE AT THE CROSSROADS: BETWEEN THE MAINTENANCE OF THE COOPERATION AND VERIFICATION MECHANISM AND ITS RAISINGS

Florin STOICA*

Abstract

Although it is a highly debated topic, Report of the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism for the judiciary (CVM) is a taboo subject, stirring both political forces and judicial institutions in Romania. Even though progress over time are notable we have to analyze how useful is this instrument for judicial independence and our system has achieved the necessary maturity. Romanian judicial reform can continue or not with the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism, is the biggest topic of debate.

Keywords: Report, Judicial institution, Political forces, Reform, organization, progress

1. Introduction

During the ten years since the establishment of the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism (CVM) of justice, Romania has made notable progress in reforming the judiciary and fighting corruption, which allowed a better, even acid alignment with European legislation, policies and programs.

In its most recent report of the European Commission, submitted to CVM for Romania on January 27, 2017, the results of the work of authorities is mentioned again, referring to both the executive system and also to the legislative and judiciary systems. Although compared with previous years', report identified progress in various areas, the judiciary and fight against corruption remain a problem for Romania, that would give rise to rather justified or not so justified major movements of civil society.

The last report[1] published can be considered as a positive one, as noted also by the Romanian authorities. Although this would broadly be the third positive report, all of these might have a common point, which would be that lawmakers are being criticized especially when it comes to protecting a colleague's legal problem. Several problems persist, but have reduced acuity, compared to the debut of this monitoring. The report highlights internal affairs issues from multiple points of view.

Under this mechanism, the European Commission has committed to assist Romania to remedy the shortcomings in the judiciary system, and to periodically check progress compared to the four benchmarks set for judiciary reform and the fight against corruption. For CVM to accomplish the purpose of establishing or monitoring the progress level of Justice and Home Affairs, European Commission prepares annual reports, which analyze developments and make recommendations to improve the four chapters.

The Commission also pointed out that CVM continue to play an important role in Romania, being a driver of reforms and encouraging to maintain the consistency of results. But also, internal voices continue to question whether the level of growth and progress could continue without this instrument of coercion to be started.

In the Maturity of the Romanian society, the reorganized institutions could not continue its journey without CVM analyzing their activity. Thus, in our study we will go through the last report and through the noted progress so that we make a comparative analysis of the reform in justice dating back to the first established reports to present times. Also, this study comes to enlighten the dispute between the supporters and the contesters of these reports.

2. Content

Even though Romania became a full member of the European Union, with effect from 1 January 2007, at the same time, the European Commission established, the monitoring of the judiciary system and Home Affairs Chapter. The justification for this monitoring would be that at that time in Romania there could be identified certain shortcomings in the area of justice reform and in the fight against corruption. The reasoning WHY was that, these deficiencies could hinder the effective application of legi lation, policies and programmes of the European Community. Such a Mechanism is set up for cooperation and verification by decision No.2006/928/EC of 13 December 2006.

Reference objectives have been established under the same legislation, both for Romania and Bulgaria[2]. These are being tracked by the European Commission and after its fulfilment this would lead to the removal of the monitoring process.

4 reference targets were instituted for Romania: the strengthening of the capacity and the liability of the Superior Council of Magistracy , by ensuring greater transparency and enhanced efficiency of Justice (1); the establishment of an integrity agency with responsibilities relating to the verifying of wealth, potential incompatibilities and conflicts of interest, leading to the application of dissuasive sanctions (2); removal of highlevel corruption (3); Elimination of corruption at the level of local administrations (4). The Commission shall produce annual reports through which it examines, monitors and makes recommendations for the four goals.

The first report was issued in June, 6 months after the completion of the procedures for integration emphasizing that: "Romania has amplified its efforts, at the highest levels, in the fight against corruption. Even if these efforts are recognized, there is still a lot left to be done. The progress realized in this short period of time from the begining of the cooperation and verification mechanism is still insufficient[3]". Thus, starting with the first reports, experts stressed on the need of stronger institutions for figthing against corruption and the deeply rooted problems of the system.

The experts recommended a clearer legislation in the field of anticorruption and respect of the separation of powers, leaving aside the political implications in the judiciary. Therefore, the first report's conclusion was that "overall, Romania has made some progress in the reform of the judiciary", but "the progress made in the field of treatment of high-level corruption is still insufficient[4]."

Second report of the European Commission, published in 2008, examines the first year of accession, and concludes that Romania has continued to make efforts to remedy deficiencies but these are pretty insignificant especially in key areas, such as in the fight against high-level corruption, compelling results have not yet been made. The Genereal Directorate against Corruption started to have positive results, but still weak in relation to the seriousness of the problems.

Within this report, the concern that lawmakers change the law in favour of the defendats was noted for the first time. Thus, we do so by reference to the law which provided the changes in investigation and prosecution of criminal trials. This bill of law which stipulated, inter alia, the limitation of prosecution to 6 months, the authorization of the search, registration or interception of communications only by previously informing the suspect, and fraud with prejudice of up to 9 million euro would have been considered a minor offence, with a maximum penalty of five years in prison. In conclusion this report points out the danger which Romania would be subject to and the effects that these changes would have in relation to foreign partners, especially in the case of joint investigations, with the Member States, the fight against terrorism and the prosecution of cross-border crime[5]".

The 2009 report represents the moment that CVM gave the solution of accelerating the process of criminal trials.

By the time of the 2009 report, one of the greatest problems was the length of the criminal trials, many of them culminating after the prescription has passed, and the main cause was the discontinuation of the criminal process led by exceptions of unconstitutionality. So until the resolution of the Constitutional Court, the trial would stagnate, and the frequency of these exceptions was quite high. It became an excess of a procedural nature, and European experts recommended the legislature to amend the law of the functioning of the Constitutional Court, in order to eliminate these situations. But not only these excesses were the cause of the delay in the criminal procedure, thus, the experts also identified excesses of a procedural nature which involved invoking the exception of illegality.

The recommendations in this case involved the limitations of such situations by modifying the law[6].

The first totally negative report was from 2010[7]. However, the only positive outcome was the work of DNA.

Although there were no huge performances, DNA held the best record of the supervised institutions. The performance of this institution consists of a growing number of high-level corruption cases, arraingments and the number of court final judgments.

In what concerned the rest of the established targets, the European Commission stated massive deficiencies. Experts stressed on the lack of political commitment in supporting the reform process and the lack of cooperation between the parties in the judiciary system.

The report published in 2011, can be briefly described as a negative one, especially from the point of view of confiscating the proceeds of crime. Thus, experts stressed on the fact that "the effectiveness of the fight against corruption is affected by the existence of serious problems in the system of recovery of the proceeds of crime. In Romania, assets obtained illegally are seized to a very small extent, mainly because of the limited possibilities for confiscation as provided by law, judicial restrictive practices and lack of proactive behaviour of the criminal investigation body[8]". In the same report there were also outlined notable pozitive results about the efficiency of court proceedings.

Maybe the toughest report yet, was the report published in the year 2012, which highlit the acute political crisis in Romania that affected the rule of law. In this report, Romania is criticized in extremely tough terms. Thus, the Commission emphasized: "... Challenging the judicial decisions on a political level, undermining the Constitutional Court, overturning established procedures and removing the key mechanisms by which the powers of the State controle other subsequent powers, question the Government's commitment to respect the rule of law and independence of the judicial system[9] ".

This report mentions for the first time the press and its role in shaping public opinion, but also high pressures laid against judicial institutions.

The conclusions of this report note that "in some important areas, the changes occurred primarily as a result of external pressure. The fact that it takes an external pressure raises questions about the sustainability and irreversible state of the reform, emphasised in the context of recent events[10]".

The report also criticises the opposition from political actors to give the consent for DNA to commence the criminal proceedings of politicians[11].

The report given in 2013 is also a report of media harassment campaigns and pressure on justice. Such political chaos generated in 2012, have prompted the issuance of a report after 6 months, not after one year as it used to be. This report is characterized by hardness, in terms of critisism brought to political people and the media, which could be accused of partisanship or even manipulation. The work of the National Council of the Audiovisual sector has been the subject of analysis and criticism. European experts have delivered this report on the basis of numerous complaints from the people affected by such slippage.

European experts note the media pressures on the justice system and looked concerned by the effectiveness of the surveillance activity carried out by the National Audiovisual Council. Among the recommendations issued by the European experts was the need to review existing rules in order to ensure that press freedom is accompanied by adequate protection of institutions and fundamental rights of persons, and to provide effective remedies.

Also of great concern was the report from 2014, by which events from 2013 were analyzed. European experts had in mind two important subjects: the one where the Government, at that time, suddenly changed people with others in key positions from DNA without any transparent procedure for selecting and the episode dubbed "Black Tuesday".

Thus in the context of the report, the experts note: "on the basis of the CVM reports published so far it can be seen that progress was not easily obtained, and something obtained in an area may be restricted or denied by the setbacks in another area. In December 2013, Parliament's actions have demonstrated that the principles and objectives of the reform continue to be put to the test, for those principles to be reiterated, the intervention of the Constitutional Court was necessary[12]".

One of the actions that led to this harsh analysis was the problem of temporary appointments of Deputy at DNA, which were revoked, and the appointments made by the Minister of justice were lacking in transparency. The report examined procedures including those proposed in the second wave of appointments and linked DNA's decisions with the critisism invoked by the politicians.

Experts have made a broad analysis of the events of December 2013, known as "Black Tuesday", when there changes brought to the penal code by the Parliament without a debate or public consultation. The purpose of these changes was clear, namely removing MP's from the scope of the legislation applicable to the offences of corruption, as taking bribes, trafficking influence and abuse of Office. In other words the activity of the institutions fighting against corruption were elluded.

After the many negative reports in the year 2014, the first positive report was published. Obviously, it contains exceptions, namely those relating to Parliament's decisions.

The year of 2014 culminated with the entry into force of the New Codes[13] (criminal law and criminal procedure), and the European Commission welcomed the manner by which the jurisdictional system "adopted" rapidly the two institutions namely the judge of preliminary room and judge of rights and freedoms. This represent the success of major institutions: Ministry of Justice, the High Court of Cassation and justice (HCCJ), CSM, the Public Ministry and the National Institute of Magistracy (NIM).

However, these positive results, as the Commission stated, have been overshadowed by Parliament, through the rejection of requests from DNA to investigate and arrest various members of the Parliament. European experts noted the answer of the Parliament as arbitrary and without any objective criteria.

The Commission noted positively the rejection of the draft law on amnesty that would have protected from lawsuits or investigations, the corrupt politicians, but also drew attention to the danger that this situation would lead.

The best report on Romania is the one published in January 2016. It is considered to be most appreciative report addressing justice in Romania. The character of the work is appreciative of the structures in the field of judiciary which is regarded as "a sign that the underlying trend regarding the independence of the judiciary is positive and that any person who commits an offence is not situated above the law"[14].

As in my previous article[15], the European Commission has noted both positive and negative results, but it has thus been made reference to the fact that in 2015 there were more and more critical voices against the Magistrates "expressed by politicians and in the media, and the lack of respect for judicial decisions ", these have included high-ranking officials. In 2015 one-third of the applications made by DNA to waiver immunity of some MPs in order to allow the initiation of investigations or enforcement measures of preventive detention, were dispelled by the Parliament.

So if in the Commission's MCV Reports on 2014, 2015 and 2016 we could highlight a trend and a positive balance sheet that indicates significant progress and increasingly irreversible nature of reforms implemented in the framework of CVM, in the year 2017 report notes that a number of key elements cannot be considered as being fulfilled. This positive trend was reconfirmed also in 2016, by analyzing the institutions of the judiciary which are in interdependence with the political changes. Therefore, during the 10-year follow-up, if you should compare the institutions and the judiciary since its debut in 2007, this year, we find an impressive evolution, even if in different periods the progress has been hindered, the reference objectives appear to be achieved.

2.2. The Analysis of the 4 goals of CVM report, achieved through the prism of the last report.

As mentioned above, even if they are amazing improvements in the 10-year follow-up, the European experts identified a number of key issues, whose evolution has been quite slow, and that according to the previous reports remained unresolved. Thus, the present report cannot conclude that the reference objectives are, at this stage, to be fulfilled in a satisfactory manner. The number of referrals is very limited, which is why their fulfillment will result in closure of the provisional reference individual goals and, subsequently, the CVM.

Thus, these key recommendations refer to the concentration of responsibilities and accountability required by the Romanian authorities and internal guarantees which are necessary to ensure the irreversible character of the results. Irreversibility will be supported through the development of mechanisms of reporting and accountability after the completion of the CVM.

European experts have the oppinion that the objectives can be met through monitoring CVM recommendations in the report and after picking up this tool, through the development of other procedures. However the speed of the process will depend on how quickly Romania will be able to accomplish them irreversibly and to avoid negative developments that put into question the progress that has been already made. Thus, even the small influence on low deficiencies can lead not only to progress of the mechanism but also to its transforming into a simple monitoring of the results. Though, to go beyond this step Romania must act to implement the recommendations contained in the final report.

As the Council repeatedly note[16], CVM can be removed when all four reference targets that apply to Romania can be considered as fulfilled in a satisfactory manner. The reference objectives pursued are those defined at the time of accession and those that cover essential aspects for the operation of a Member State-the independence and effectiveness of the judiciary, the integrity and the fight against corruption.

Although the reference objectives are independent, there are also important interconnections, which have an impact on their fulfilment. Benchmarking involves the analysis of structural conditions (such as laws, institutions and resources), of the results and their balance sheet with the possibility to consider that the advances are irreversible.

2.2.1. The judicial process

As the prime objective of reference we can identify as being the judiciary. This goal was meant from the beginnging, to be an independent system, impartial and efficient, based on strengthening the consistency of the judicial process, as well as improving transparency and accountability. Thus, experts note substantial institutional and normative progress. The Superior Council of Magistracy (SCM) has established itself as a manager of the judiciary and has demonstrated its ability to fulfil its constitutional role, particularly in regard to defending the independence of the judiciary, an essential role.

So during the year 2016, public perception of judicial independence and confidence in the judicial system has gained credibility[17]. Just as in other reports it was found there were shadows cast from this trend: attacks from politicians and the media, and directed against the magistrates and judicial institutions. In 2016 the attacks against the National Anticorruption Directorate were quite virulent.

Even if we note the performance of the system, European, experts identified some negative aspects such as balancing the workload of different Courts and sections within the same Court, such as the method of finding solutions regarding the discrepancies between the workload of the big courts and of the smaller ones, and the distribution of tasks between judges and clerks. Legislation in this area has not progressed in 2016, and simple management actions could not provide a solution to solve these problems.

A major breakthrough in this chapter may be established by the fact that at present all the tools are available for monitoring the functioning of the courts and of the human resources situation and the fact that there is a comprehensive strategy for the development of the judicial system by 2015-2020.

Regarding the appointment of magistrates, especially for the highest roles, the year 2016 was a key one. Although the appointments made did not register issues of professionalism or integrity,the process used did not allow the introduction of clear procedures, that are open and transparent to select all candidates, to strengthen in a fixed and permanent system[18].

With regard to reforming the administration of the judiciary, the SCM(CSM) is responsible for professional and disciplinary punishment of deviations of the magistrates, and the Commission notes that the decision-making chain seems to have become more predictable and consistent.

Another point in the analysis is the one relating to legislative reform, so Romania has adopted and implemented the new civil code and the new penal code, and the related codes of procedure,in order to modernize the material right and improve the effectiveness and consistency of the judicial process. These major reforms may be considered to be almost completed. However, the completion of these reforms, as foreseen in the report's recommendations on 2016, has shown a degree of difficulty, and presents a number of deficiencies. On the civil side, the civil code and the code of civil procedure, the provisions of which have necessitated new infrastructure have been deferred successively, suggesting deficiencies at the level of planning.

For the criminal side, respectively for the criminal code and the criminal procedure code, the inward processing procedure by decisions of the Constitutional Court has proved difficult, and developed a surprising approach from the Parliament. The Constitutional Court through its decisions has imposed a number of changes to both the penal code and the code of criminal procedure by the Government, but unoperated changes by the end of the year 2016. The proposals put on the table seemed that weaken the anticorruption struggle, even though they were not adopted.

The role of the Constitutional Court continued to be important and to maintain the independence of the judiciary and through its decisions, sought to provide solutions to problems linked to the balance of powers and respect for fundamental rights which could not be resolved solely by the judiciary. Of the 12 decisions in 2016, most were common criminal provisions that have been taken to comply with the European Convention on human rights.

At the time of accession a major problem constituted in the absence of recurrence of such judgments, MCV's 2016 report found signs of shifting cultural paradigm in terms of consistency within the judicial system. The Commission has adopted successive recommendations in 2014, 2015 and 2016 on the subject, which was recognised as a structural deficiency also by the ECHR[19]. Such a trend observed during the year 2016, is setting up the new National Agency of managing Preserved Property.

As a conclusion concerning the objective number 1, Romania recorded substantial progress with respect to the objective reference no. 1, but nevertheless insufficient to be able to consider this task completed. More such efforts are needed to demonstrate a positive balance in certain areas, such as respect for the independence of the judiciary in Romania's public life, completing the reform of the criminal code and civil code, and ensuring efficiency in the execution of judgments by all those concerned.

2.2.2. The integrity and the National Agency for Integrity

The second goal of reference set up by the mechanism of verification and cooperation, refers to the establishment of an integrity agency with responsibilities in the field of verification of assets, incompatibilities and potential conflicts of interest, and with the power to adopt binding decisions which may lead to the application of dissuasive sanctions. Romania currently has a comprehensive legal framework in the field of integrity for public officials, and the National Agency for integrity is recognized as an independent institution which implements those rules. The upcoming changes regarding ANI, include a new tool, the system PREVENT ex ante checks of public procurement, whose legislation was completed in 2016. That legislation will have to include all conflicts of interest as defined by the new law.

As an overview, it can be said clearly that Romania has made progress in terms of reference objective No. 2 and it can be considered that the National Integrity Agency is an institution essential to the system. This was demonstrated by the fact that in 2016 it has been entrusted with the development of the system PREVENT, a system that will deal with ex ante checks on conflicts of interests in the public procurement, whose functioning will have to be demonstrated in 2017. Also, the Agency has a key role in the national Anticorruption Strategy 2016-2020 in preventing corruption.

2.2.3. Combating corruption at high level

The objective reference number 3 refers to the objectivity and professionalism with which the case of accusations of high-level corruption are being treated.

The Commission considers that the phenomenon of corruption is a deeply rooted problem in society, with consequences for both the system and the economy. This issue is identified as a major problem in Romania both in polls[20] and in Euro barometer concerning CVM[21].

CVM reports along monitoring have remarked a positive character, the steady growth in terms of investigation and prosecution in cases of high-level corruption, and delivery of judgment in such cases with a clear acceleration after 2011. The Commission noted the solidity with which institutions involved in investigating and prosecuting cases of corruption at high levels and in the delivery of the judgment in such cases. Thus the completion of such cases have led to these positive results.

National Anticorruption Directorate's activity is broad and involves investigating a large number of cases and thus submitting each year to sue hundreds of people accused of corruption in the medium and high level. The activity is then transferred to the High Court of Cassation and justice and the courts of appeal, who judge final convictions in a huge number of corruption cases at high and middle level,. Later on, a positive activity is recorded in the purpose of confiscation of the goods to recover the damage caused by the offences of corruption. The Balance sheet of activity is steady and 2016 and proves their professionalism and independence. However, the repetition of some similar offences demonstrates that corruption prevention measures have not been effective.

During the monitoring, the Commission stressed on the link between the effectiveness of anticorruption activity and reaction of media and the political class. In 2016, the political class continued to bring public criticism towards some magistrates and to the justice system in general.

Another recurring problem noted by the report of CVM is the absence systematic approach which could explain denials to lift parliamentary immunity to allow investigations or preventative measures. As in the case of the other targets although they were recognised by the Commission for substantial progress, the third objective reference cannot be removed.

2.2.4. Combating corruption at all levels

The fourth benchmark considered in our analysis is considering additional measures to prevent and fight corruption, in particular within the local administration.

Although aperent harmless corruption on a small or medium level, is also on the table analysis of European experts. This type of corruption is a real flaw in the public system, because it can have consequences for the economic and social development of Romania. Such an area where the emergence of this phenomenon is particularly destructive for investments, is procurement. Another area where corruption has serious consequences is health. The solutions identified in this case are prevention and proactive approach of the government to block opportunities for corruption.

Commission recommends accelerating progress in asset recovery, which will be certified by the National new agency to administer seized property (ANABI), which began operating in January 2017.

Experts welcome the habbit of prioritizing the prosecution of corruption at lower level that became part of the prosecution activity and remains a priority for them. Also recommended, are additional measures to remedy this problem. In order to simplify this procedure the national anti-corruption strategy was developed, which is the central tool for preventing corruption in the public administration at national and local level.

Although previous anti-corruption strategies have generated slow progress, the Government adopted a new anti-corruption strategy 2016-2020 in August 2016, seeking, in particular, specific measures to address identified deficiencies. However what characterizes this strategy is the possibility that it will implement the measures effectively in all sectors, especially at the local level, where many observers see the risk of corruption as particularly high.

Although anticorruption measures, were introduced by successive executives and there have been made intensive efforts, noted by experts of the European Commission towards achieving the fourth benchmark, even this objective can not be regarded as fulfilled. Impediments consist of the implementation of preventive policies defined recently.

2.2.5. Main recommendations

European experts believe that the reform should continue following same process, and internal safeguards must be further strengthened in order to ensure the irreversibility necessary for meeting the benchmarks satisfactorily.

The Commission makes recommendations on appointments, thus it shapes the implementation of a clear, objective and independent system of appointing senior prosecutors, based on clear and transparent criteria, with appeal to support the Venice Commission.

As a persistent problem throughout the 10 years of monitoring reffering to respect for the judges and compliance to judges and the judicial process, the Commission's recommendation for a code of conduct for parliamentarians to provide clear provisions on mutual respect between institutions and to specify clear that parliamentarians and parliamentary process must respect the independence of the judiciary. Such a Code of Conduct similar could be adopted for ministers.

Recommendations on judicial reform at the end of the present phaze of reforming the penal code and establishing an action plan to complete the remaining provisions of the civil code, involving all the actors leading the judiciary. At the same time, experts recommend to further improve the transparency and predictability of the legislative process. Thus, the decision-making process, the Government and Parliament should ensure full transparency and take due account of consultations with the relevant authorities. Consultations will be conducted also with other interested parties in related legislative activity codes, anticorruption laws, laws on integrity (incompatibilities, conflicts of interest, illicit wealth), the laws of justice (on the organization of justice). Institutional transparency for the year 2016 is given as an example of good practice[22].

Regarding the issues of consistency of judgments, the Commission recommends the further use of appeals in the interests of the law and the preliminary questions.

As shown in the reference number 1 objective, observance and enforcement of judgments is part and parcel of judicial efficiency[23]. The Commission's recommendations relating to the implementation of an appropriate action plan to remedy the dispute over the execution of judgments and the application by the Government of the case law generated by the courts, as well as the establishment of an internal mechanism for monitoring aimed at fulfilling this plan. Experts stress the importance of the implementation of the plan as well as the development of the role of judicial institutions.

European experts also stress on the importance of the implementation of the PREVENT system, and on the introduction of a practice of drawing up reports of ex-ante verification for checks carried out by the National Agency for integrity and National Agency for public procurement.

For benchmarks 3 and 4, on Fighting corruption, commission issued recommendations on the adoption of objective criteria for taking decisions and reasons for these decisions in order to waive the immunity of parliamentarians, to ensure that immunity is not used to avoid investigation and criminal prosecution offenses of corruption.

In developing such measures the executive will ask for help from the Venice Commission and GRECO[24]. It also recommends the establishment of a reporting mechanism decision on immunity. It is also recommended that the implementation of the National Anticorruption Strategy, remains within the deadlines set by the Government in August 2016, but also making the of the National Agency of Seized Goods fully operational.

2.2.6. Criticism of Annual CVM Report

Reffering to the last report, there is a lot of criticism coming from socio-professional categories directly involved in the judiciary. Thus, Magistrates Association in Romania noticed that the system's evolution is analyzed only in terms of fighting corruption, the involved few institutions are the only ones which have such an activity assigned. Similarly, when referring progress in fighting high-level corruption, report covers only the DNA and Î.C.C.J. (High Court of Justice) (In that order!), With a focus on "independence or effectiveness of DNA", forgetting the role of appeal courts and other courts. The report could also be criticized that "excessive workload of the courts", which continues to 'strike the consistency of judgments "and" additional obstacles related to more general aspects of the legislative process "are not so comprehensive so that ther shape a clear picture of the realities of the judiciary or deepen the problems of this system[25]. The Association criticizes the lack of realism about the role of SCM, which is, as emphasized in the report, disconnected from the profession. One of the arguments is the lack of references to protests of the magistrates. The Magistrates Association press release indicates infrastructure problems that prevent real efficiency of the judicial system. But also the lack of transparency in data collection for processing the monitoring reports. In other words, magistrates do not dispute the evolution of the Romanian judicial system but they deny only the embellished results.

In the light of developments in the system, presented above, but also taking account of the critical positions of professionals in the field, we could ask ourselves if this tool has been useful, if it is still useful and whether developments in the Romanian judicial system would also be recorded without a coercive tool. The alignment of policies, legislation and programmes of the European Community would have been possible without the establishment of a mechanism for cooperation and verification of the internal affairs and justice. Those problems that were monitored could have put at risk the economic development, but a package of measures and a series of internal institutions could successfully replace the terror of this instrument.

However, the notable results obtained and the remaining of small issues to be rectified, might justify a lifting of this monitoring. Also, the latest report underlines this. The evolution of the Romanian judicial system is consistent with national and international legislation, and it follows its course, benefiting from technical and logistical means of the present times.

4. Conclusions

Latest reports of CVM Commission, namely in the years 2014, 2015 and 2016 are characterized by a tendency to positivity as indicated by the notable progress achieved by reforms implemented under the CVM. The result of successive monitoring, acquires irreversibility through active involvement of judicial institutions. Although during the 10 years of developments in the CVM there were periods when the reform had reduced speed, Romania recorded major progress towards meeting the benchmarks contained in the CVM.

Amid these major advances, a number of key issues identified in previous reports remain unresolved and this is the reason that we can not conclude that the benchmarks are, at this stage, carried out in a satisfactory manner, in order to remove this instrument. The latest report can identify a small number of key recommendations to reach provisional closure of individual benchmarks and subsequently MCV process. Most of the key recommendations relate to ensuring the irreversibility of the results, which is reached by imposing responsibility and accountability imposed by the Romanian authorities. This will be supported also by further development of the reporting mechanisms and the mechanisms to ensure accountability after closing CVM. So meeting these key recommendations will result in lifting after the next monitoring this instrument for monitoring and verification, but the speed at which the tasks will be carried through will depend on making these results permanent. Besides that, the negative developments should be avoided in order not to be left questioning the progress. However, the report for 2017 will have to contain entries reported by magistrates, in order to ensure transparency and objectivity.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST IN ADMINISTRATIVE LAW

Elena Emilia ȘTEFAN[*]

Abstract

We are currently witnessing, on the one hand, new forms of relationships between public and private sector, such as public-private partnership agreements, concession agreements, etc. and on the other hand, the expectations of citizens towards public authorities are increasingly higher in what concerns the lawfulness and transparency of their activities in terms of protecting citizen's interest.

Therefore, in this study, we aim to analyze how the conflict of interest is regulated within the area of the administrative law and to present the new conception of the lawmaker in what concerns this topic, taking into account the European tendencies.

Keywords: conflict of interest, public procurement, integrity warning, the National Integrity Agency, SEAP (Electronic System for Public Procurement)

1. Introduction

In administrative law, public interest takes precedence over particular interest and the subjects of the administrative relationships[1] are in a position of legal inequality. The law should be constantly changing, adjusted to the economic realities and should protect the citizen. Legislative inconsistency weakens citizen's confidence in public authorities.

The conflict of interest, as provided by the legislation in force has a double regulation, oscillating between criminal law and administrative law. This study mainly aims to present the status of the legislation on the conflict of interest. Since the law is meant to reconcile the aspirations of the justice with the demands of the society, the presence of the judge in the area of the law is absolutely required[2].

According to Decision no. 390 of July 3rd, 2014[3] of the Constitutional Court, a legal concept can have a content and autonomous meaning, different from one law to another, provided that the law using the respective term defines it. Therefore, in our opinion, this is a potential explanation of the fact that the concept of conflict of interest from the criminal law is different from the concept of conflict of interest from the administrative law.

As recently stated in a paper, the doctrine and the judicial practice[4] played an important role[5] in the activity of the European Communities and of the European Union itself. In connection with the aforementioned, this study mainly aims to present the status of the legislation on the conflict of interest and then to add the point of view of the doctrine and the case law on this topic.

2. Content

2.1. The concept of conflict of interest in the criminal law

The offense of conflict of interest was provided by Criminal Code of 1969 by Law no. 278/2006 for the amendment and supplementation of the Criminal Code[6] (...) in art. 253¹ Criminal Code and currently[7] it is provided by art. 301 of the Criminal Code[8] in force.

Art. 301 of the Criminal Code defines in para.(1) the conflict of interest as being „the conduct of the public officials who, while carrying out their professional duties, committed an act or participated in making a decision that resulted, directly or indirectly, in a material gain for themselves, their spouses, for a relative including second level relatives, or for another person with whom they were in trading or labor relationships for the past 5 years or from whom they had or have benefits of any nature and shall be punishable by no less than 1 year and no more than 5 years of imprisonment and the ban from exercising the right to hold a public office".

In this context, we reiterate a fact which has already been stated in a paper, according to which, the principle of lawfulness in the activity of the justice concerns two important aspects: the lawfulness of the courts and the lawfulness of criminal offenses and penalties[9]. The mandatory nature of the rule of law is ensured, if required, by the coercive force of the state[10].

The Constitutional Court, by means of Decision no. 603/2015[11] admitted the motion to dismiss on grounds of lack of constitutionality and noted that expression "trading relationships" of art. 301 para.(1) is not constitutional. On this occasion, the Court established that the constitutional standard on the protection of individual freedom requires its limitation to be performed within a normative framework which, on the one hand, establishes explicitly the cases of limitation of this constitutional value, and, on the other hand, provides clearly, precisely and predictably these cases[12].

Given this, the Court notes that the lack of clarity, precision and predictability of expression "trading relationships" of the criticized text makes unclear and unpredictable the conditions of individual freedom restriction, a fundamental right provided by art. 23 of the Constitution.

Furthermore, the discretion of the lawmaker when questioning art. 23 of the Constitution, undergoes a strict control of the Constitutional Court, being therefore a limited one[13]. Taking into account the definition given to the public official for the purpose of the Criminal Code, the public official provided by law no. 188/1999 is always identified with the active subject of the offense of conflict of interest, the concept of public official for the purpose of criminal law being more comprehensive[14], according to Decision no. 603/2015 of the Constitutional Court, previously cited.

2.2. The concept of conflict of interest in the administrative law

In the administrative law, the regulation of the conflict of interest is performed from a different perspective. At the European level, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development issued in 2013 the Guidelines for Managing of Conflict of Interest in the Public Service[15]. It is interesting that the guidelines distinguish between three concepts: actual conflict of interest, apparent conflict of interest, potential conflict de of interest.

Therefore, a conflict of interest involves a conflict between the public duty and private interests of a public official, in which the public official has private-capacity interests which could improperly influence the performance of the official duties and responsibilities. This definition, according to the Guidelines, has the same meaning as the actual conflict of interest, the Guidelines note that a conflict of interest situation can thus be current or it may be found to have existed at some time in the past.

An apparent conflict of interest can be said to exist when it appears that a public official's private interests could improperly influence the performance of the duties but this is not in fact the case.

A potential conflict arises where a public official has private interests which are such that a conflict of interest would arise if the public official were to become involved in relevant (conflicting) official responsibilities in the future.

Furthermore, we also mention Recommendation no. 10 (2000) of the Committee of Ministers to Member States on Codes of conduct for public officials which refers in art. 10 to the conflict of interest and takes into account only public officials[16].

Paragraph (1) of art. 10 of the Recommendation provides the following: "Conflict of interest arises from a situation in which the public official has a private interest which is such as to influence or appear to influence the impartial and objective nature of his or her official duties", and paragraph (2): „The public official's private interest includes any advantages to himself or herself, to his or her family, parents, friends or persons or organizations with whom he or she has or has had business or political relations. It includes also any liability, whether financial or civil, relating thereto."

From this point of view, we consider that it would be interesting to analyze the evolution of the conflict of interest by comparing the legislations with strong legal tradition in Europe, as we are aware of the fact that nowadays most legislative changes are transplanted from other legal systems[17].

At national level, the conflict of interest was regulated in terms of administrative law by Law no.

161/2003 on certain measures to ensure transparency in the exercise of publicly appointed offices, public functions and in business environment, to prevent and sanction corruption[18]. Title IV of this law is expressly entitled: "Conflict of interest and incompatibilities regime in the exercise of publicly appointed offices and public functions".

Law no. 161/2003 on certain measures to ensure transparency in the exercise of publicly appointed offices, public functions and in business environment, to prevent and sanction corruption defines the conflict of interest in art. 70 as follows: "the conflict of interest means the situation where a person exercising a publicly appointed office or a public function has a financial interest or an interest which can influence the objective fulfillment of the duties incumbent on him or her according to the Constitution or to other normative acts". At the same time, as shown on another occasion, the framework law provides expressly the situations involving conflict of interest for public officials in art. 79[19].

The conflict of interest for presidents and vice-presidents of the county councils or local and county councilors is provided by Law no. 215/2001 on public administration in art. 47 and for mayors, deputy mayors, general mayor, deputy mayors of Bucharest the legislation provides that they are not entitled to issue an administrative act or to conclude a legal act, or to issue an order, in the exercise of the function, which produces a material benefit for themselves, spouses or first level relatives. In case of a conflict of interest, if they are related to the conflict of interest situation, all legal or administrative acts concluded directly or indirectly by intermediaries, under the violation of the legal provisions on the conflict of interest shall be deemed void[20].

The public authority which is competent to check the conflicts of interest was especially established by Law no. 144/2007 on the establishment, organization and functioning of the National Integrity Agency[21]. The action for the annulment of the legal or administrative acts concluded under the violation of the legal provisions on the conflict of interest can be taken by the Agency even if the person in question no longer holds the respective function[22].

On a regular basis, reports are published on the official web page[23] of the National Integrity Agency, on the status of the procedure relating to incompatibilities, conflicts of interest, confiscation of assets, legal liability proceedings, and in this respect court decisions, etc. are published, as well as statements of assets and interests. It is interesting that the National Integrity Agency publishes on the web page the cases of potential conflicts of interest, for example in case of local elected officials specifying the following: criminal and administrative conflict of interest.

2.3. The conflict of interest in the field of public procurement, according to the latest legislative amendments

Throughout 2016 a package of laws was adopted on public procurement and concession. Law no. 100/2016 on the concession of works and services[24] provides expressly the conflict of interest in Chapter III - called: Rules for participation in the award procedure, art. 42-46. The conflict of interest is defined in art. 43 as follows: "any situation where the members of the staff of the contracting entity who are involved in the performance of the award procedure or who can influence the result thereof have, directly or indirectly, a financial or economic interest or other personal interest which could be construed as an element which compromises their impartiality or independence in the award procedure".

Five situations likely to generate conflict of interest are detailed in this law. Furthermore, an interdiction is provided for 12 month term as of the conclusion of the agreement for the winning tenderer the contracting entity concluded the concession agreement with, namely the tenderer shall not be entitled to conclude any other agreements on service provision, directly or indirectly, for the performance of the concession agreement, with natural persons or legal entities which were involved in the process of control/evaluation of participation requests / tender offers submitted within an award procedure or employees/former employees of the contracting entities the contractual relations of whom ceased after the award of the concession agreement. The penalty for the breach of this prohibition is the rescission or de jure termination of the concession agreement, according to art. 45 of the law. Legal liability enables lawfulness, as the simple confirmation of sanction measures would not be effective if the application thereof did not pursue the restoration of the rights established by law[25].

2.3.1. The procedure in case a potential conflict of interest is identified.

The contracting entity shall be bound to provide in the concession documents the name of the persons holding decision making functions within the contracting authority.

If the contracting entity founds a situation which is likely to cause conflict of interest, it shall perform the required procedures in order to establish if the respective situation represents a conflict of interest situation and shall describe to the candidate /tenderer who finds himself in the respective situation, the reasons which, in the opinion of the contracting entity, are likely to cause a conflict of interest.

Furthermore, the contracting entity shall be bound to submit a point a view to the candidate/ tenderer.

The measures ordered by the contracting entity, when establishing the existence of a conflict of interest, for the removal of the circumstances causing the respective conflict of interest are the following:

- The replacement of the persons in charge with the evaluation / control of the tender offers / participation requests, when their impartiality is affected and when possible;
- The rejection of the tenderer / candidate who has relations with decision-making function persons within the contracting entity.

2.3.2. The integrity warning

Law no. 184/2016 establishing a mechanism for preventing conflicts of interest regarding the award of the public procurement agreements[26] is a recent normative act in connection with the subject analyzed by us. The content of the law provides that it shall become effective within 6 month as of the publishing in the Official Journal of Romania and shall be exclusively applicable to the procedures for the award of public procurement agreements initiated after the enforcement of the law.

Law no. 184/2016 establishes the ex ante check mechanism in terms of the situations which can generate conflict of interest within the procedures initiated by the electronic public procurement system, so that they are removed without the respective procedures being affected. A Prevention System – an integrated computer system for the prevention and identification of potential conflict of interest is established within the National Integrity Agency. The system operates based on the data recorded in the integrity forms registered with SEAP at the time of the performance of the procedures for the award of public procurement agreements and processed by the integrity inspectors, according to the law.

The law introduces a new concept, respectively: the integrity warning. Art. 7 of the law details the meaning of the integrity warning. More precisely, in the event the integrity inspectors within N.I.A., following the performed checks, detect the prerequisites of a potential conflict of interest, they shall be bound to deliver the integrity warning issued by the Prevention System, within no more than 3 business days as of the receipt of the filled in form, Section II.

The lack of an integrity warning or the lack of measures ordered by the head of the contracting authority, as a consequence of the integrity warning, shall not preclude the performance of identification, evaluation and investigation procedures or the civil, disciplinary, administrative, contraventional or criminal liability of the persons who violated the legal provisions.

Upon the receipt of the integrity warning, the head of the contracting authority shall be bound to take all the necessary measures to overcome the conflict of interest. Such measures might consist in: replacing the member of the evaluation committee, excluding the tenderers / candidates / associated tenderers /subcontractors / third parties who find themselves in a potential conflict of interest, according to specific regulation.

The failure to take measures following the receipt of an integrity warning or the failure to fill in the integrity form triggers ex officio the conflict of interest evaluation procedure, following the completion of the award procedure, exclusively with the persons who are subject to the provisions of Law no. 176/2010. The National Integrity Agency shall check if the measures required for the removal of the conflict of interest situation were implemented, according to its specific duties.

3. Conclusions

As the title of this study is called, we hereby analyzed the specific legislation of the conflict of interest in order to identify the modality it is regulated. The conflict of interest, on the one hand, is provided as an offense, and on the other hand, is provided by the administrative law. Currently, we note that the legislation is not unified yet, despite the new package of laws and this thing shall be reflected by the litigations to be submitted before the courts of law and in what concerns the mechanism of ex ante prevention of the conflict of interest in the public procurement procedure, we will see how effective it is after this legislation enters into force.

PUBLIC PROCUREMENT IN THE LIGHT OF THE NEW LEGISLATIVE CHANGES

Elena Emilia ȘTEFAN*

Abstract

The package of laws on public procurement and concessions of Romania which entered into force in May 2016 came with many new elements. Therefore, in this study, we aim to present the new conception of the lawmaker towards this subject. Not least, we will analyze the role of the National Council for Solving Complaints in the procedure for the award of public procurement agreements and other elements in what concerns the complaints in the field of public procurement.

Keywords: National Council for Solving Complaints, public procurement, remedies, law, aggrieved party.

In May 2016 a new package of laws on public procurement and concessions was published in the Official Journal of Romania, as follows: Law no. 98/2016 on public procurement[1]; Law no. 99/2016 on sectorial procurement[2]; Law no. 100/2016 on the concessions of works and services[3]; Law no. 101/2016 on remedies and appeals concerning the award of public procurement agreements, sectorial agreements and of works concession agreements and service concession agreements, and for the organization and functioning of the National Council for Solving Complaints[4].

Following the adoption of this package of laws in the field of public procurement, Government Emergency Ordinance no. 34/2006 on the award of public procurement agreements, public works concession agreements and service concession agreements was repealed[5]. Currently, there is not a case law established based on these legislative changes yet. In the current historical context in which the humanity escalates a new stage of civilization, thus embracing the „unity in diversity", the role of the general principles of law, a legal expression of the fundamental relations of the society, is amplified[6].

On another occasion we showed that, at European level, currently, there are tendencies of unification of the legislation in this field, three Directives being adopted, the Member States having to amend the legislation so that to ensure their implementation at national level[7]:

- Directive 2014/23/EU on the award of concession contracts[8];
- Directive 2014/24/EU on public procurement[9];
- Directive 2014/25/EU on procurement by entities operating in the water, energy, transport and postal services sectors[10].

The primacy of the European Union law[11] requires to the national courts, in particular, to guarantee to the litigants the rights which arise from its directives, when the national law precludes the fulfillment thereof[12]. As we have recently shown, the European Union law embraces the theory of monism, namely the existence of a single legal order comprising the international law and the domestic law in an unitary system[13]. Every state has enacted its law according to own socio-political requirements, traditions and values proclaimed by it[14]. Therefore, no state has a legislation that is valid for all times[15], the national lawmaker being always focused on social life and on discovering the needs of the society, thus proceeding with the amendment of the legislative framework.

In this context, we mention that, in what concerns national law, Law no. 554/2004 introduces as a ground for revision, in art. 21 para.(2): the ruling of final and irrevocable judgments by violating the principle of precedence of Community law (...)[16]. As the doctrine showed, the new ground for revision (...) was designed as a domestic remedy, in case of final and irrevocable judgments, pronounced by means of the violation of the principle of precedence of the European Union law, regulated by art. 148 para. (2) of the Constitution of Romania, for the purpose of fulfilling the general obligation incumbent on the Member States under art. 10 of the Treaty[17] establishing the European Community[18].

2.1. Public procurement concept

A number of vulnerabilities of the public procurement system of Romania, both legislative and practical, was found in a project[19], and we hereby list selectively a few of them: incomplete and unstable legislation marked by ambiguity, non-transparent ministry orders, the lack of sanctions for public authorities, limited practice regarding appeals due to high costs and lack of confidence in the effectiveness of the appeals. In the last two decades, the case law of the Court of Justice and the European Union Tribunal in the field of public procurement proved to be extremely rich, more than 200 specific cases being registered on the dockets of the two courts[20].

In what concerns public procurement and concessions, we must provide the following: the concessions of goods are still subject to Government Emergency Ordinance no. 54/2006 on the regime of the agreements of public property goods concession and the concessions of services[21], works, sectoral procurement are subject to the package of laws of 2016. A summary of the new package of laws has been recently published on A.N.A.P.[22] (the National Agency for Public Procurement) official site. A.N.A.P. was established by Government Emergency Ordinance no. 13/2015[23].

The concept of public procurement is defined by art.3 para.(1) of Law no. 98/2016 on classic public procurement, as follows: "the procurement of works, products or services under a public procurement agreement by one or more contracting authorities from economic operators designated by them, regardless if the works, products or services are intended for the fulfillment of a public interest".

According to art. 7 of the law, the contracting authority shall be entitled to purchase directly products or services if the estimated value of the procurement, VAT excluded, is less than RON 132,519, respectively works, if the estimated value of the procurement, VAT excluded, is less than RON 441,730.

Throughout the application of the award procedure, the contracting entity shall be bound to take all the measures in order to prevent and to identify conflict of interest situations, in order to avoid distortion of competition and to ensure equal treatment for all economic operators.

Law no. 98/2016 on public procurement regulates the following procedures for the award of public procurement agreement: open tendering, restricted tendering, competitive negotiation, competitive dialogue, partnership for innovation, negotiation without prior publication, design contest, simplified procedure, procedure applicable in case of social services and other specific services: open tendering; restricted tendering; competitive negotiation; competitive dialogue; Partnership for innovation; Negotiation without prior publication; Design contest. Furthermore, the law also refers to the procedure applicable in case of social services and other specific services as well as to the simplified procedure which is initiated by publishing a simplified contract notice in SEAP, accompanied by the relating award documentation.

The new elements are, among others, the right of the contracting authority to resort to the award of public procurement agreement in case of division into lots, provided that this information is included in the procurement documents; the awarding criteria, in order to establish the most advantageous offer, are the following: lowest price, lowest cost, best value for money, best value for cost.

The concept of ESPD was introduced – the European Single Procurement Document which refers to the fact that the updated declaration on own risk, as preliminary evidence, instead of certificates issued by public authorities or third parties certifies that the economic operator meets the following conditions:

a) He/she is not in any of the exclusion situations (...)
b) He/she fulfills the capacity criteria, as requested by the contracting authority
c) If the case may be, he/she fulfills the selection criteria established by the contracting authority, according to the provisions of this law.

In what concerns sectoral procurement, Law no. 99/2016 defines it as follows: "the procurement of works, products or services under a sectoral agreement, by one or more contracting authorities from economic operators designated by them, provided that the purchased works, products or services are intended for the performance of one of the relevant activities: gas and thermal energy, electric power, water, transport services, ports and airports, postal services, extraction of oil and natural gas – exploration and extraction of coal or other solid fuels".

2.2. National Council for Solving Complaints

Law no. 101/2016 on remedies and appeals concerning the award of public procurement agreements, sectoral agreements and of works concession agreements and service concession agreements, and for the organization and functioning of the National Council for Solving Complaints, regulates matters related to the membership of the Council, status of the personnel of the Council, complaints settlement procedure, the remedy against the decisions of the Council etc.

The National Council for Solving Complaints is an independent body with administrative – jurisdictional activity and legal personality and operates according to Law no. 101/2016. The Council has a web page which can be accessed[24] and where we can find information such as: activity reports, complaints submission form, decisions etc.

The National Council for Solving Complaints has 36 members, selected by competition and appointed by the decision of the Prime Minister. The members of the Council are special status public official called: counselors for solving complaints in the field of public procurement.

The new law introduces the obligation of the aggrieved party to deliver a prior notification, before the submission of the complaint. Under the penalty of rejection the complaint as inadmissible, which can be claimed ex officio, before resorting to the N.C.S.C. or to the court of law, the party which deems itself aggrieved shall be bound to notify the contracting authority on the request of remedy in full or in part of the alleged violation of the legislation on public procurement or concessions within 10 days or 5 days.

2.3. The aggrieved party concept

Further on, we will clarify the concept of aggrieved party, according to the new legislation in the filed of public procurement

Therefore, the concept of aggrieved party under this law is defined as follows: "Any person who considers himself/herself aggrieved in his/her right or legitimate interest by an act of a contracting authority or by the failure to solve a request within the legal deadline can claim the annulment of the act, the obligation of the contracting authority to issue an act or to adopt remedy measures, the recognition of the claimed right or legitimate interest, by administrative jurisdictional or judiciary means, according to the provisions of this law".

On the other hand, art. 52 para.1) of the Constitution establishes the fundamental right of any person aggrieved in his/her legitimate rights or interests by a public authority, by means of an administrative act or by the failure of a public authority to solve his/her request within the legal deadline, shall be entitled to the acknowledgement of his/her claimed right or legitimate interest, the annulment of the act and settlement of the damage, a right which represents the guarantee for citizens' protection against public authorities abuses and for free access to justice[25].

Free access to justice is established by art. 21 of the Constitution and consists in that every person is entitled to bring cases before the law for the defense of his/her legitimate rights, freedoms and interests[26].

Law no. 101/2016 on remedies and appeals concerning the award of public procurement agreements, sectoral agreements and of works concession agreements and service concession agreements, and for the organization and functioning of the National Council for Solving Complaints defines in art. 3 para.(1) letter f) the meaning of aggrieved party: "any economic operator who fulfill the following conditions:

- has or had an interest in connection with the award procedure;
- suffered, suffers or is likely to suffer damage as consequence of an act of the contracting authority, likely to cause legal effects or, as a consequence of the failure to solve within the legal deadline a request on the award procedure". Therefore, the concept of aggrieved party has a broader meaning in the sense of the new package of laws on public procurement compared to art. 52 of the Constitution.

2.4. The law applicable to litigations in the field of public procurement Hereinafter, we will analyze if the provisions of Law no. 554/2004 of the contentious administrative or of Law no. 101/2016 on remedies and appeals concerning the award of public procurement agreements (...) are applicable in what concerns litigations which occur in public procurement procedure.

In the field of public procurement, as a remedy measure, by way of derogation from art. 1 para.(6) of Law no. 554/2004, the contracting authority can revoke / cancel own acts or the entire award procedure following the receipt of a notification the authority finds substantiated[27].

In what concerns the means chosen for complaints, Law no. 101/2016 establishes the alternative jurisdiction, the aggrieved party being allowed to choose the administrative-jurisdictional means, respectively by resorting to the N.C.S.C. or the judiciary means, by resorting to the tribunal, the division of the contentious administrative and fiscal. In this case it is easy to note that this is an alternative jurisdiction.

The difference between the two options of the aggrieved person is that, in case of the judiciary complaint, the applicant shall be bound to pay a stamp duty, unlike the other option, where no fee has to be paid. According to the Constitution, art. 21 par.(4), administrative special jurisdiction is optional and free of charge, excluding the administrative appeals28. No constitutional provision prohibits the legal establishment of a prior administrative procedure, without jurisdictional nature, such as graceful or hierarchical administrative appeal procedure[29].

Given that Law no. 101/2016 is a law dedicated to complaints and appeals in the field of public procurement, the possibility of aggrieved parties to resort to court actions brought against the acts of the contracting authorities in this field is removed under Law no. 554/2004, this special law of remedies derogates from[30].

The fulfillment of the law depends on whether it is accepted and assumed as a value and a rule by the members of the society. In this regard, the understanding of the fulfillment of the law is an act of assessment and search of the justice and of the other acknowledged values [31].

3. Conclusions

As the title of this study is called, we hereby analyzed a large bibliographic material in order to identify the new legislative elements of the public procurement field. If before 2016 there was a single normative act, respectively a Government Ordinance, nowadays, we have a package of laws applicable to public procurement procedures and concessions.

Although the public procurement legislation was harmonized with the European legislation, according to an official announcement, in 2016, a large number of fraud cases were found in this field[32]. Therefore, the Romanian Police declared that, in 2016, by means of the Directorate for Investigation of Economic Crimes, after checking the lawfulness of the conclusion and performance of public procurement agreements, they filed 946 criminal cases. The damage caused to the state budget, according to the respective announcement, by illegal performance of public procurement agreements, amounted to more than 5 billion RON, and for the recovery of such amount precautionary measures were ordered amounting to 1.7 billion RON.

Not least, a great competition[33] is noted between the economic operators participating in public procurement procedure.

TEN YEARS AFTER ROMANIA'S ACCESSION TO THE EUROPEAN UNION: COSTS, BENEFITS AND PERSPECTIVES

Dan VĂTĂMAN[*]

Abstract

This year we celebrate ten years since Romania became full-fledged Member of the European Union, a decade in which our country have seen a remarkable evolution marked by huge transformations and irreversible processes of reform which led to the modernization of the society and economic development. Despite these undeniable achievements which had a positive impact on the quality of life of Romanian citizens, a great number of people are disappointed because still facing poverty and economic underdevelopment, aspect that makes them to express disapproval of the fact that Romania is a Member State of European Union. In the light of this paradox, the aim of this study is to put in antithesis the advantages and disadvantages of the Romania's accession to the European Union, all this in relation to the current international context and the challenges facing the European Union.

Keywords: European integration process; tenth anniversary of Romania's accession to the European Union; reform measures; costs and benefits; prosperity and development.

1. Introduction

On January 1st 2017 we celebrated 10 years since Romania became full-fledged Member of the European Union and also on 25th March 2017 we celebrated the 60th anniversary of the signing of the Treaties of Rome, one of the most remarkable historical moments of the European integration process. These two anniversaries represent real moments of joy for the Romanian people, the overwhelming majority of people being convinced that Romania's accession to the European Union was beneficial for our country which have seen a remarkable evolution marked by huge transformations and irreversible processes of reform which led to the modernization of the society and economic development[1].

Despite these undeniable achievements which had a positive impact on the quality of life of Romanian citizens, a great number of people are disappointed because still facing poverty and economic underdevelopment, aspect that makes them to express disapproval of the fact that Romania is a Member State of European Union.

In the light of this paradox, the aim of the present study is to put in antithesis the advantages and disadvantages of the Romania's accession to the European Union, this approach being made by reporting to the assumed obligations and related rights of our country as shown in Treaty of Accession and Act concerning conditions of Accession as well as the Treaties on which the European Union is founded.

In the context of growing Euroscepticism and Populism in Romania and not only (this trend is fueled by populist politicians across Europe) it is important to remind people that in this period of ten years remarkable developments have taken place, especially in the field of judiciary reform and fight against corruption, two key issues for Romanian society.

For this purpose, the objectives of this study are to highlight the substantial progress already achieved in the areas of judicial reform and the fight against corruption, achievements highlighted by the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism (CVM) reports where are underlined "a positive trend and a track record pointing to strong progress and growing irreversibility of the reforms in Romania"[2]. On the other hand, it must be put in question the outstanding key issues whose fulfillment would lead to the provisional closing of individual benchmarks, and then the conclusion of the CVM process. Not least, it is necessary to highlight also the Romanian citizens' perception about advantages and disadvantages of the Romania's accession to the European Union.

Although the specialized literature comprises several studies on this topic, I am convinced that a new study is necessary in the context of expressed concerns, both at the European level and especially at the national level, caused by Romanian Government attempt to change and amend law No. 286/2009 regarding the criminal code and the law No. 135/2010 regarding the criminal procedure code.

2. General aspects concerning the establishment and evolution of the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism (CVM)

Given that the European Union is founded on the rule of law, a principle common to all Member States, in order to accession Romania has had to fulfill a number of conditions, including the existence of an impartial, independent and effective judicial and administrative system properly equipped to fight corruption.

Whilst noting the considerable efforts to complete Romania's preparations for membership, the European Commission has identified a series of remaining issues, in particular in the accountability and efficiency of the judicial system and law enforcement bodies. Consequently, pursuant to the provisions of the Treaties on which the European Union is founded and having regard to the Act concerning the conditions of accession of Romania (in particular Articles 37 and 38 thereof), the European Commission has adopted a decision to set up the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism (CVM)[3].

According to this decision, Romania shall report each year to the European Commission on the progress made in addressing each of the four benchmarks provided for, respectively:

- Ensure a more transparent, and efficient judicial process notably by enhancing the capacity and accountability of the Superior Council of Magistracy;
- Establish an integrity agency with responsibilities for verifying assets, incompatibilities and potential conflicts of interest, and for issuing mandatory decisions on the basis of which dissuasive sanctions can be taken;
- Building on progress already made, continue to conduct professional, non-partisan investigations into allegations of high-level corruption;
- Take further measures to prevent and fight against corruption, in particular within the local government[4].

Thus, the CMV was set up to address shortcomings in judicial reform and the fight against corruption, the Romanian authorities were responsible for proving that the judicial system works and that investigations in corruption cases leading to arrests and, depending on the court's judgment, convictions and confiscation of goods. Over the years, the European Commission has presented a series of evaluation reports on the progress made by Romania, these reports being the result of a careful process of analysis by the Commission, drawing on close cooperation with Romanian institutions, as well as the input of civil society and other stakeholders, including other Member States[5].

3. Romania' progress in the fields of judicial reform and fight against corruption as shown in the CMV reports Judicial reform and the fight against corruption have been key issues for Romanian society over the last 10 years. Therefore, the CVM has made a major contribution to a transformative process in Romania, playing an important role as driver for reform, as well as a tool to track progress.

In its overall assessment of Romania's progress, the Commission has highlighted that the 10 years' perspective of developments under the CVM shows that, despite some periods when reform lost momentum and was questioned, Romania has made major progress towards the CVM benchmarks[6].

The European Commission has pointed a positive trend and a track record pointing to strong progress and growing irreversibility of the reforms. At the same time, a number of key issues already identified in earlier reports have remained outstanding for which reason the Commission made a number of recommendations and invited Romania to take action to fulfil them in an irreversible way, and also to avoid in the future the negative steps which call into question the progress made so far.

In the area of judicial reform the CVM goals was focused on establishing an independent, impartial, and efficient system, strengthening the consistency of the judicial process, and improving transparency and accountability. Thus, in this domain has been registered a substantial legislative and institutional progress, among achievements can be mentioned: adoption and implementation of new Civil and Criminal Codes with a view to modernizing the substantive law and improving the efficiency and consistency of the judicial process; strengthening the role of the Superior Council of the Magistracy which has established itself as manager of the judicial system; rigour of entry procedures into the magistracy, supported by obligatory training by the National Institute of Magistracy.

Despite these positive developments and strong public perception of judicial independence and trust in the judiciary, there are still a number of unresolved issues and, more than that, the reform is facing with political and media attacks on magistrates and judicial institutions, especially against the National Anti-corruption Directorate. Also, it must be mentioned the fact that only in 2016 the Constitutional Court adopted 12 decisions which annulling some provisions of the new Criminal Code and Code of Criminal Procedures and the Parliament or Government did not meet the legal term to align the codes with Constitutional Court decisions. Moreover, the situation became even worse on 31 January 2017 when the Government adopted an emergency ordinance (Ordinance 13/2017) proposing amendments to the Criminal Code and Code of Criminal Procedures. The government's intended measure to modify provisions on the corruption crimes of abuse of office and conflict of interest had resulted in the largest street rallies since the fall of communism in 1989, where hundreds of thousands of Romanians were demonstrated every evening asking for the government to resign.

With reference to the second benchmark concerning the integrity framework and the National Integrity Agency, as shown in the Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Progress in Romania under the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism, Romania has made substantial progress and currently has a comprehensive framework for integrity for public officials, and the National Integrity Agency has established itself as an independent institution to implement these rules[7]. However, the legal framework for integrity, the set of laws defining the situations of conflicts of interests and incompatibilities for civil servants and elected or appointed officials, has been regularly re-opened in Parliament. It has not yet been possible to put in place a clear, consolidated legal framework as the bedrock for sustainability and some decisions by Parliament have still appeared to question or delay the implementation of final court decisions confirming the Agency's reports[8].

With regard to the third benchmark namely tackling high-level corruption, the European Commission acknowledges that the achievements of Romania in this area have rightly attracted widespread recognition and substantial progress has been made. In this regard, the Commission reports reveal a steadily growing track record in terms of investigating, prosecuting and deciding upon high-level corruption cases, with a clear acceleration in the last years. Unfortunately, the repetition of similar offences suggests that corruption prevention has not been effective, reason for that the Commission has appreciated that only maintaining both the pace and the consistent direction of reform would allow this benchmark to be closed quickly.

In terms of the tackling corruption at all levels, according to the last European Commission report, medium and low-level corruption is widely perceived to be a problem in Romania, with consequences for Romania's economic and social development. The Commission pointed that progress was slow and the application of prevention measures ineffective, with insufficient political will from the top of the institutions to implement corruption prevention measures. Also welcomed the adoption by the government of a new anti-corruption strategy for 2016–2020 in August 2016, notably seeking to target the identified weaknesses with specific measures. Thus, the Commission concluded that though some progress has been made there are however important remaining shortcomings which need to be addressed in the future and the reform needs to continue on the same path[9].

4. Romanian citizens' perception about advantages and disadvantages of the Romania's accession to the European Union

In order to join to the European Union, any country must meet the conditions for membership (conditions known as the "Copenhagen criteria") which include a free-market economy, a stable democracy and the rule of law, and the acceptance of all EU legislation.

Before Romania's accession to the European Union the European Commission has identified remaining issues in particular in the accountability and efficiency of the judicial system and law enforcement bodies, where further efforts were needed to ensure the capacity of our country to implement and apply the measures adopted to establish the internal market and the area of freedom, security and justice. Therefore, according to the assumed obligations stated in Treaty of Accession and Act concerning conditions of Accession, Romania was forced to adopt reform measures which inevitably led to the modernization of the society and economic development[10]. In addition, the efforts of the Romanian authorities had positive effects on the image of the country at international level and, at the same time, on the lives of Romanian citizens.

Although these developments had a positive impact on the quality of life of Romanian citizens, a great number of people are disappointed because still facing poverty and economic underdevelopment, aspect that makes them to express disapproval of the fact that Romania is a Member State of European Union.

According to Standard Eurobarometer 85 released in spring 2016, the Romanians asked about life in the European Union showed that the most important issues facing Romania at the moment are unemployment, immigration, economic situation, terrorism or health and social security. For this reason 78% of subjects responded that the current situation in national economy is "total bad" and 55% of them showed that tend to not trust in European Union and, perhaps most worrying, 38% of Romanians responded that they do not feel European citizens[11].

As well, according to Standard Eurobarometer 86 released in November 2016, economic situation, health and social security and unemployment remain by far the most important issues facing Romania, according to respondents. As shown in Eurobarometer report, the European Union now has a positive image for a 50% of Romanians what is seen as a "significant increase" following the decrease seen between autumn 2015 and spring 2016[12]. This result could be a cause for optimism or pessimism depending on how each individual responds to the following question: "Is the glass half empty or half full?"

Despite this negative perception of Romanians about life in European Union, a change has occurred in relation with situation regarding corruption and judicial shortcomings. In accordance with Flash Eurobarometer 445, more Romanians thought that the situation regarding corruption and judicial shortcomings had improved and things would get better in the next few years. Thus, a significant majority agreed that the action of the European Union through the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism (CVM) has had a very positive impact on tackling shortcomings in the judicial system and corruption. We see that, despite concerted actions of populist politicians and some interest groups which demanded that CVM to be stopped immediately, a large majority of Romanians agree that the European Union has a legitimate role to play in tackling corruption and shortcomings in the judicial system and, furthermore, this action should continue until convergence with other EU Member States' standards has been reached[13].

5. Conclusions

As I pointed out above, Romania's accession to the European Union on 1 January 2007 represents a milestone in our history. From that moment Romania has known a remarkable evolution marked by huge transformations and irreversible processes of reform which led to the modernization of the society and also economic development. As a result of Romania's accession to the European Union the Romanian citizens has achieved not only the right to move and reside freely within the territory of the EU countries but also the right to be treated like any other EU citizens with equal access to all fundamental rights as enshrined in the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights.

The paradox is that although it is obvious that Romania was making significant progress, fact also recognized by European officials, continue to be one of the poorest countries in the European Union. Therefore, a large part of Romanians are confronted currently with poverty which not subside although Romania has continued to produce economic growth. Under these circumstances we might ask: Why the transition in Romania was accompanied by an explosive increase in poverty? Does poverty have connection with Corruption? The answer is certainly "YES", because corruption and poverty go hand-in-hand, existing a direct correlation between them.

Unfortunately this scourge is threatening the lives of too many people and for this reason, not just in my opinion, is necessary that the fight against corruption to continue, because this is only way to get out of this vicious circle.

As we have seen, Romania is currently making a true anti-corruption revolution, spearhead being the National Anticorruption Directorate. The fight against this scourge is supported by most Romanians which do not hesitate to penalize any measure which they deem an alarming retreat in the country's fight against corruption. This fact has been conclusively demonstrated this year when hundreds of thousands of Romanians expressed their revolt and dissatisfaction within some large mass protests against the Government's attempt to adopt an emergency ordinance on collective pardon and also the controversial emergency ordinance no. 13 /2017 which attempted a major change in the criminal public policy of the Romanian state.

In essence the message conveyed by people asking Romanian legislative authorities to create laws for the people and not against them (or even worse in interest of politicians) and also have urged the public authorities and officials to abide by the law and respect democracy.

Looking back at the 10 years that have passed since Romania's accession to the European Union and taking into account the problems that still face our country is definitely clear that only option our country is continuation the reforms and concrete steps to address corruption at all levels. This is the only way we can convince our European partners that Romania is a reliable partner which demonstrate seriousness and responsibility.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE CALCULATION OF DAMAGES IN INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY INFRINGEMENT CASES. RIGHT HOLDER'S LOSS AND UNFAIR PROFITS OF THE INFRINGER. CUMULATION

Paul-George BUTA*

Abstract

This short article deals with a specific problem of interpretation of Romanian law on the enforcement of IP rights, namely the possibility of having the court set damages to the right holder by taking into account both the right holder's loss and the infringer's unfair profits. The two criteria for the assessment of damages are specifically provided for by law and are also expressly provided for by the EU IP Rights Enforcement Directive which was implemented in Romania. While the possibility of referring to either of the two remains uncontested, the possibility of cumulating the two has been denied in some decisions of the Romanian High Court. In order to do so the High Court has interpreted Romanian law so as to comply with the provisions of the EU Directive read by taking into account one of the recitals to the directive which seems to only allow for the criteria to be used alternatively and not cumulatively.

The article examines this interpretation and concludes that the curt ought not to have referred to the text of the EU Directive and that, even if it would do so, could not base its interpretation on the recital, as it did and should have come to the conclusion that the cumulation of the two criteria is possible. In order to do so the article examines the implementation of the Directive in Romanian law, the limitations that the CJEU has imposed on the interpretation of EU acts, the history of the enacting of the EU provisions at issue and the context of the provisions within the directive.

1. Introduction

1.1. Prologue

The issue of damages, although traditionally "an afterthought", nowadays rises more and more to the forefront of the debate on IP law as the remedies are recognized to be "the big motivators" in IP litigation[1].

This is even more the case in IP litigation than in other civil litigation since there are special rules that govern the calculation of damages in IP infringement cases which supersede the civil law provisions generally applicable in tort cases.

These provisions have developed in Romanian law in time, together with efforts to harmonize Romanian law with international and EU law which Romania needed to transpose in order to comply with international obligations.

Since these provisions originate in a limited number of sources and since this same limited number of sources has led the development of provisions on IP damages in significant number of states, one is to expect a high level of homogeneity in the court practice of these states.

As this article will show, there are still numerous points of divergence on at least the issue here discussed and this divergence can be traced back to a possible equivocal reading of the relevant piece of EU law.

Nevertheless, the present article will propose a reading of the provision in question and a solution to the problem of cumulating right holder's loss and infringer's profits under Romanian law.

1.2. The provisions at issue

The main provision concerned is article 14 of the Romanian Government's Emergency Ordinance no. 100 of 14 July 2005[2] (hereinafter "GEO 100/2005"), which reads: "

On application of the injured party the competent court shall order the infringer who, with intent, has engaged in an infringing activity, to pay the right holder damages appropriate to the actual prejudice suffered by him as a result of the infringement.

1. When the court sets the damages it shall take into account:
   a) all appropriate aspects, such as the negative economic consequences, especially loss of benefit by the injured party, the unfair benefits accrued to the infringer of the protected industrial property right and, where appropriate, elements, other than economic factors, such as the moral prejudice caused to the right holder; or
   b) as an alternative, where appropriate, it will set the damages as a lump sum on the basis of elements such as at least the amount of royalties or the value of rights which would have been due, if the infringer of the protected industrial property right would have requested authorisation to use the intellectual property right in question.

2. When the infringer of the protected industrial property right has, with intent, engaged in an infringing activity the competent court may order the covering of benefits or the payment of damages, susceptible of being pre-established".

Article 13 of the IP Enforcement Directive reads:"

1. Member States shall ensure that the competent judicial authorities, on application of the injured party, order the infringer who knowingly, or with reasonable grounds to know, engaged in an infringing activity, to pay the right holder damages appropriate to the actual prejudice suffered by him as a result of the infringement.

   When the judicial authorities set the damages:

   a) they shall take into account all appropriate aspects, such as the negative economic consequences, including lost profits, which the injured party has suffered, any unfair profits made by the infringer and, in appropriate cases, elements other than economic factors, such as the moral prejudice caused to the right holder by the infringement;
   b) as an alternative to (a), they may, in appropriate cases, set the damages as a lump sum on the basis of elements such as at least the amount of royalties or fees which would have been due if the infringer had requested authorisation to use the intellectual property right in question.

2. Where the infringer did not knowingly, or with reasonable grounds to know, engage in infringing activity, Member States may lay down that the judicial authorities may order the recovery of profits or the payment of damages, which may be pre-established".

2.1. A different approach in implementation

The preamble to GEO 100/2005 and article 21 thereof clearly indicate that the purpose of enacting this instrument was the transposition of Directive 2004/48/CE of 29 April 2004 on the enforcement of intellectual property rights[3] (hereinafter "the IP Enforcement Directive"). However, the differences in the implementation of the directive and the subsequent legislative developments in Romania seem to have diverged, at least to some extent, from this narrow purpose as will be seen below.

First of all, GEO 100/2005 clearly indicates that its scope is limited to "industrial property rights". Article 1 of the act states that "(1) The present Government Emergency Ordinance provides for measures, procedures and reparation of damages meant to insure that industrial property rights are respected. (2) For the purposes of this Government Emergency Ordinance, the expression industrial property rights includes all industrial property rights provided for by national or EC law or by the international treaties and conventions in this field, to which Romania is a party". This was confirmed by the authors having analyzed the text of GEO 100/2005[4] who pointed at the clear distinction made by the Paris Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property of 20 March 1883 and the Convention for the creation of the World Intellectual Property Organization signed in Stockholm on 14 July 1967, Romania being a party to both these conventions and therefore bound by the distinctions there made.

This clearly goes against the purpose of the IP Enforcement Directive which has sought, as its title clearly indicates, that the measures provided therein apply to all intellectual property rights, including industrial property rights, copyright and related rights. For instance, ever since the first European Commission proposal, article 1 clearly indicated that the Directive was to apply to "intellectual property rights" [5]. Moreover, the text of the proposal clearly indicates that it was meant to deal with both industrial property rights and copyright and related rights, for example by listing the substantive law of intellectual property to include, among others, trademarks, designs, patents, copyright and related rights, by including within the measures in the acquis communautaire with regard to the enforcement of intellectual property rights references to both industrial property rights and copyright and related rights, by specifically referencing provisions concerning copyright in recitals 15, 18 and 26 and in articles 2 par. (2), 6 and 21 par. (1) as well as in the Annex containing a "List of provisions of Community and European law relating to the protection of intellectual property". The fact that the IP Enforcement Directive concerned all intellectual property rights (and not just industrial property rights) was also acknowledged in the Romanian literature[6].

Even though the second paragraph was amended by means of Law no. 280/2005 for the approval of Government Emergency Ordinance no 100/2005 on the enforcement of industrial property rights[7], par. (2) of article 1 was changed as follows: "For the purposes of this Government Emergency Ordinance~~,~~ the expression industrial property rights includes all industrial property rights provided for by national or EC law or by the international treaties and conventions in this field~~,~~ to which Romania is a party" (strikethrough added). While deletion of the last comma is a sensible amendment, deletion of the first comma is not and much less so the apparent enlargement of the scope of the provision to encompass "all rights provided for by" law, thus not only industrial or intellectual property rights but any rights, of any nature, provided by national, EC or international law. Such enlargement would defeat the purpose of indicating in the – still unamended – par. (1) of the same article, the scope as being limited to industrial property rights, now enlarged by par. (2) to encompass virtually any right provided by law.

The IP Enforcement Directive was also transposed in Romanian law in what concerns copyright, but was done so by means of a separate act, Government Emergency Ordinance no. 123 of 1 September 2005, concerning the modification and amendment of Law no. 8/1996 on copyright and related rights[8], which clearly indicated, both in the Government's Statement of Motives and in article 79, that the prime reason for its adoption was the need to implement this particular EU Directive.

Choosing to separately implement the IP Enforcement Directive in respect of industrial property rights on the one hand and copyright and related rights on the other is not only a divergence in form but also in substance since, in what damages are concerned, these were added by point 62 of Government Emergency Ordinance no. 123/2005 to par. (2) of article 139 in Law no. 8/1996 with the following wording: "In setting damages the court takes into account: a) either criteria such as the negative economic consequences, especially loss of benefit by the injured party, the unfair benefits accrued to the infringer and, where appropriate, other elements than economic factors, such as the moral prejudice caused to the right holder; b) or damages set at the triple of sums that would have been legally due for the type of use corresponding to the infringing acts, where the criteria under a) could not be applied".

While the complete disappearance of par. (3) can be attributed to the original faulty transposition of the Directive text, letter b) of article 139 par. (2) of Law no. 8/1996 is no mere transposition but the creation of a new regime, whereby in situations where the criteria under letter a) can't be applied (which is stricter than an alternative, where appropriate, as used in GEO 100/2005), the infringer shall be obliged to three times the "sums that would have been legally due" (different than "a lump sum on the basis of elements such as at least the amount of royalties or the value of rights which would have been due" had proper authorization been sought).

The above serves to indicate that the Romanian legislator has diverged in the implementation of the IP Enforcement Directive from a pure transposition of the directive's provisions and has enacted a regime for the enforcement of IP rights with some particularities.

2.2. The problem of cumulation in the calculation of damages

The problem in the practice of the Romanian courts stems from the reading of article 14 par. (2) of GEO 100/2005 and article 139 par. (2) of Law no. 8/1996.

The High Court has indicated, in three decisions[9], that, in setting the damages, the court may not order damages having regard to both the right holder's loss and the infringer's unfair benefits. The court has indicated that the provisions in national law are "not clear and unequivocal, given the exemplifying character of the hypotheses, which arises from the use of the word "especially"". In order to interpret the national provisions the court has looked at the provisions of recital 26 of the preamble to the IP Enforcement Directive (transposed by the national provisions) which reads "With a view to compensating for the prejudice suffered as a result of an infringement committed by an infringer who engaged in an activity in the knowledge, or with reasonable grounds for knowing, that it would give rise to such an infringement, the amount of damages awarded to the right holder should take account of all appropriate aspects, such as loss of earnings incurred by the right holder, or unfair profits made by the infringer and, where appropriate, any moral prejudice caused to the right holder" (emphasis added).

For the court, the use of the conjunction "or" in the enumeration in recital 26 indicates that the EU legislator has meant for the two criteria (even if given as examples) to be alternative and not cumulative.

Moreover the court has indicated that the right holder, as plaintiff, has the choice of which criteria to claim under (either of the two being susceptible of cumulation with moral damages), such choice pertaining to the litigation strategy envisaged by the right holder and by the anticipation of the evidentiary burden presupposed by any of the hypotheses and by the volume of the infringement.

Therefore the position of the Romanian High Court is that the right holder can only claim damages under one of the two criteria provided for in the national law: either as loss of his own benefit or as unfair benefits accrued to the infringer, but not both. In order to arrive at this conclusion the High Court has based its assessment solely on the provisions of recital 26 of the preamble to the IP Enforcement Directive.

2.3. The limits of using the preamble of the Directive in order to interpret a provision of EU law

The first issue to be dealt with concerns determining the interpretative power than can be attributed to recital 26 of the preamble to the IP Enforcement Directive.

The CJEU has established that "the preamble to a Community act has no binding legal force and cannot be relied on either as a ground for derogating from the actual provisions of the act in question or for interpreting those provisions in a manner clearly contrary to their wording (Case C-162/97 Nilsson and Others [1998] ECR I-7477, paragraph 54, and Case C-308/97 Manfredi [1998] ECR I-7685, paragraph 30)" [10].

It is therefore indisputable that recital 26 of the preamble to the IP Enforcement Directive on its own has no binding legal force and therefore can't be relied on in order to (i) derogate from the provisions or to (ii) interpret those provisions "in a manner clearly contrary to their wording".

Our argument is that the provisions in Romanian law are unequivocal and that a grammatical interpretation of the provisions clearly allows for both the loss to the right holder and the unfair benefits obtained by the infringer are to be taken into account by the court on setting the damages.

This is because article 14 par. (2) letter (a) of GEO 100/2005 states: "all appropriate aspects, such as the negative economic consequences, especially loss of benefit by the injured party, the unfair benefits accrued to the infringer of the protected industrial property right and, where appropriate, elements, other than economic factors", which would have one read that the court ought to take into account all aspects, among which (without being limited to) economic factors of which the court should especially look at the right holder's loss of benefit, the infringer's unfair benefits and, only where appropriate, factors other than the economic ones.

The same is true for article 139 par. (2) letter (a) of Law no. 8/1996 with the only difference that taking into account "all appropriate aspects" is not expressly mentioned.

Therefore the fact that there are two economic factors enumerated which the law requires courts to especially have in mind (without them being considered as alternatives being expressly provided for) indicates that the legislature's intent was for the courts to have both factors, especially, in mind, without excluding the possibility that other economic factors could be considered.

This appears all the more true when one looks at another difference between the Romanian legal provisions and those of the IP Enforcement Directive. Thus, article 13 par. (1) letter (a) of the IP Enforcement Directive makes no use of the word "especially", as do the Romanian provisions. These provisions are therefore even less likely to be considered equivocal than their EU counterparts. Use of the word especially before the enumeration of lost benefits and unfair benefits can therefore only mean either that lost benefits are to be considered "especially" while unfair benefits are to be still taken under consideration but not "especially" (meaning that cumulation of the two is still possible) or that the two elements enumerated are to be considered foremost, with others possibly taken under consideration as well, depending on the case. Given the fact that the law clearly requires the court to take into account "all appropriate aspects" and there can be no discernible reason for the loss of benefit to be preferred to unfair benefits, we tend to favor the latter interpretation.

Either way, to our mind, there can be no reading of the Romanian provisions that can be considered equivocal on the possibility of the court taking into consideration both the loss of benefit and the unfair benefits when setting the damages to be awarded to the right holder.

If we were to consider that the Romanian provisions were indeed unclear and therefore called for an interpretation and that in such interpretation of the provisions the court were to seek guidance in the IP Enforcement Directive and, furthermore, in so doing, that the court would look at recital 26 of the preamble the question that needs to be answered is whether an interpretation to the effect that cumulation is not allowed would be "clearly contrary to the wording" of article 13 par. (1) letter (a) of the IP Enforcement Directive.

In Tyson Parketthandel[11] the CJEU has indicated that in order to assess whether an interpretation of a provision in light of the preamble would be "clearly contrary to the wording" of that provision one should first verify whether there was an error in drafting the provision in question[12]. Then, one would need to see whether the provision, as read without the help of the preamble, "is consistent with the system established by" the EU act in question[13].

If the answer is in the negative to the first inquiry and in the affirmative to the second, the recital cannot be relied on to interpret the provision in question since such interpretation would be "in a manner clearly contrary to the wording of that provision" [14].

In our case the answer to the first inquiry is clearly in the negative since there is no point in the travaux préparatoires or the text of the IP Enforcement Directive as translated in the other languages that could lead one to consider that the drafting of article 13 par. (1) letter (a) could be considered an error.

In respect of the second inquiry, this would require that the reading of the provision as is (i.e. as permitting cumulation) be looked at having regard to the context and the objectives of the IP Enforcement Directive as a whole, in order to determine whether such reading is consistent with the system thus established.

The CJEU has done so in Liffers[15], holding that: "In that regard, according to the Court's settled case-law, for the purpose of interpreting a provision of EU law, it is necessary to consider not only its wording but also the context in which it occurs and the objectives pursued by the rules of which it is part. […]

As regards, lastly, the objectives pursued by Directive 2004/48, it must first of all be pointed out that, according to recital 10 thereof, the objective of that directive is to ensure, inter alia, a high, equivalent and homogeneous level of intellectual property protection in the internal market.

Next, recital 17 of that directive indicates that the measures, procedures and remedies provided for therein should be determined in each case in such a manner as to take due account of the specific characteristics of that case.

Finally, recital 26 of the directive states, inter alia, that, with a view to compensating for the prejudice suffered as a result of an infringement committed by an infringer, the amount of damages awarded to the holder of the intellectual property right should take account of all appropriate aspects, including any moral prejudice caused to the right holder.

It thus follows from recitals 10, 17 and 26 of Directive 2004/48 that the objective of that directive is to attain a high level of protection of intellectual property rights that takes into account the specific aspects of each given case and is based on a method of calculating damages that addresses those specific aspects" (citations omitted).

Therefore, the system that the IP Enforcement Directive seeks to create is one that provides "a high level of protection of intellectual property rights that takes into account the specific aspects of each given case and is based on a method of calculating damages that addresses those specific aspects".

Moreover, in OTK[16] the CJEU has held that "It should be noted, first of all, that, as is apparent from recital 3, Directive 2004/48 seeks to ensure that the substantive law on intellectual property is applied effectively in the European Union. Thus, Article 3(2) of the directive requires the measures, procedures and remedies provided for by the Member States to be effective, proportionate and dissuasive.

Whilst recital 10 of Directive 2004/48 refers, in this context, to the objective of ensuring a high, equivalent and 'homogeneous' level of protection, of intellectual property in the internal market, the fact remains that, as is apparent from Article 2(1), the directive applies without prejudice to the means which are or may be provided for, in particular, in national legislation, in so far as those means may be more favourable for right holders. It is quite clear from recital 7 of the directive that the term 'means' that is used is general in nature, encompassing the calculation of damages.

Consequently, as the Court has already held, Directive 2004/48 lays down a minimum standard concerning the enforcement of intellectual property rights and does not prevent the Member States from laying down measures that are more protective" (citations omitted).

Thus, in both Liffers and OTK, the CJEU has made clear that the system envisaged by the IP Enforcement Directive is one ensuring a high, equivalent and homogenous level of protection of intellectual property rights, including from the point of view of calculation of damages, such system needing to be effective, proportionate and dissuasive, while not precluding application of any more favorable terms to the right holder.

Therefore, reading article 13 par. (1) letter (a) in a manner that would restrict the manner of calculation of damages that can be sought by the right holder appears to be contrary to the system that the IP Enforcement Directive seeks to impose.

This is all the more true when taking into account the fact that the equivocal reading of the provision seems to stem more from the different wording used in recital 26 than from the wording of the provision at issue itself.

2.4. A look at the enactment of the EU provision at issue

The EU Commission's "Proposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council on measures and procedures to ensure the enforcement of intellectual property rights"[17] provided, in article 17, that

1. Member States shall lay down that the judicial authorities shall order an infringer to pay the right holder adequate damages in reparation of the damage incurred by the latter as a result of his intellectual property right being infringed through the infringer having engaged in an activity in the knowledge, or with reasonable grounds for knowing, that it would give rise to such an infringement.

[16] CJEU, Stowarzyszenie „Oławska Telewizja Kablowa" v. Stowarzyszenie Filmowców Polskich (C-367/15), Decision of 25 January 2017, ECLI:EU:C:2017:36, par. 21-23.

[17] European Commission, "Proposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council on measures and procedures to ensure the enforcement of intellectual property rights", 30 January 2003, COM/2003/0046 final.

To this end, the competent authorities shall award, at the request of the prejudiced party:

a) either damages set at double the royalties or fees which would have been due if the infringer had requested authorisation to use the intellectual property right in question;
b) or compensatory damages corresponding to the actual prejudice (including lost profits) suffered by the right holder as a result of the infringement.

In appropriate cases, Member States shall lay down that the prejudice suffered can also be deemed to include elements other than economic factors, such as the moral prejudice caused to the right holder by the infringement.

2. In the case provided for in paragraph 1, point (b), Member States may provide for the recovery, for the benefit of the right holder, of all the profits made by the infringer which are attributable to that infringement and which are not taken into account when calculating the compensatory damages.

For calculating the amount of the profits made by the infringer, the right holder is bound to provide evidence only with regard to the amount of the gross income achieved by the infringer, with the latter being bound to provide evidence of his deductible expenses and profits attributable to factors other than the protected object" (emphasis added).

Recital 24 of the preamble to the proposal was even more explicit: "With a view to compensating for the prejudice suffered as a result of an infringement committed by an infringer who has engaged in an activity in the knowledge, or with reasonable grounds for knowing, that it would give rise to such an infringement, the amount of damages awarded to the right holder should be set either at a fixed rate equal to double the royalties or fees which would have been due if the infringer had requested authorisation to use the intellectual property right in question (the aim being to allow for compensation based on an objective criterion while taking account of the expenses incurred by the right holder, such as the costs of identification and research), or according to the actual prejudice (including loss of earnings) suffered by the right holder (compensatory damages), to which must be added the profits made by the infringer, which are not taken into account in calculating the compensatory damages. It must also be possible to take into account other elements, such as the moral prejudice caused to the right holder" (emphasis added).

This was also included in the EU Commission's explanatory memorandum: "Article 17 on damages supplements the provisions of Article 45 of the TRIPS Agreement. Paragraph 1 confirms the principle that the damages are intended to compensate for the prejudice suffered because of an infringement committed intentionally or by mistake. Paragraph 1 accordingly lays down that the prejudiced party is entitled either to fixed-rate damages equal to double the amount of the royalties or fees which would have been due if the infringer had requested authorisation (the aim being to provide for full compensation for the prejudice suffered, which is sometimes difficult for the right holder to determine. This provision does not constitute punitive damages; rather, it allows for compensation based on an objective criterion while taking account of the expense incurred by the right holder such as administrative expenses incurred in identifying the infringement and researching its origin) or to compensatory damages (corresponding to the losses suffered by the right holder, including loss of earnings). It is further laid down that elements other than economic factors may be taken into account in calculating the damages, such as the moral prejudice caused to the right holder by the infringement. Paragraph 2 provides that, in appropriate cases, profits made by the infringer which are not taken into account in calculating the compensatory damages may be added. The idea is to provide a deterrent against, for example, intentional infringements perpetrated on a commercial scale. For calculating the aforementioned profits, the right holder is bound to provide evidence only with regard to the amount of the gross income achieved by the infringer, with the latter being bound to provide evidence of his deductible expenses and profits attributable to factors alien to the infringement" (emphasis added).

This proposal was not significantly altered in the Draft European Parliament's Resolution on the proposal for a directive of the European Parliament and of the Council on measures and procedures to ensure the enforcement of intellectual property rights (COM(2003) 46 – C5-0055/2003 – 2003/0024(COD)), amendment 38, which concerned article 17, solely inverting the order of the two existing sub-paragraphs of par. (1) and inserting the possibility of awarding pre-established damages, where available[18].

However, on 9 March 2004, when the proposal was put to a vote in the European Parliament, one EMP has stated that "In December, the Committee on Legal Affairs and the Internal Market voted for a text, which is not going to be approved today, but rather certain amendments are going to be approved which differ radically from what was voted for in that meeting of the committee" [19].

In fact, the consolidated text of the Council of the European Union of the Proposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council on measures and procedures to ensure the enforcement of intellectual property rights issued on 19 December [18] EU Parliament, "Report of the Committee on Legal Affairs and the Internal Market on the proposal for a directive of the European Parliament and of the Council on measures and procedures to ensure the enforcement of intellectual property rights", 5 December 2003, PE 332.524, A5-0468/2003.

[19] "Debates on Tuesday, 9 March 2004, Strassbourg", European Parliament, accessed 21 April 2017, http://www.europarl.europa.eu/sides/getDoc.do?pubRef=-//EP//TEXT+CRE+20040309+ITEM-003+DOC+XML+V0//EN&language=EN.

2003[20] (only two weeks after the Report of the European Parliament's Committee on Legal Affairs and the Internal Market) provided, in article 17, that "The damages shall be set by the judicial authorities: (a) either by taking into account all appropriate aspects, such as negative economic consequences, including lost profits, which the injured party has suffered, as well as any unfair profits made by the infringer" (emphasis added). The consolidated text also provided for the deletion of paragraph (2) as it existed in the Commission's proposal.

Therefore, even by taking into account developments in the Council, the view was that all profits unfairly made by the infringer were to be taken into account, together with negative economic consequences to the right holder (including lost profits) in the calculation of damages.

The UK's delegation to the Council's proposal of 26 January 2004[21], which offered a version more closely resembling the final wording of the provision, consolidated the two subparagraphs of par. (1), maintained the deletion of par. (2) and read "The damages, which shall be of a non-punitive nature, may take into account all appropriate aspects, such as the foreseeable negative economic consequences which the injured party has suffered, including lost profits and any royalties or fees which would have been due if the infringer had requested authorization to use the intellectual property right in question, or any unfair profits made by the infringer, and may include elements other than economic factors".

Interestingly enough, the justification indicated in the UK delegation's proposal was that "the level of damages must be determined by the judicial authorities of the Member States. The judicial authorities must retain discretion to take into account all the circumstances of the individual case in assessing damages". Therefore, even in this proposal, the objective was not to impose a limit on the possibility of cumulating criteria in the calculation of damages but rather to keep open to the courts all possibilities in using and combining these criteria when setting damages, all with the taking into account of the specific circumstances of each individual case.

The Council proposal for the amendment of the recitals on 3 February 2004[22] provided itself in recital 24 that "the amount of damages awarded to the right holder should be set up either as a lump sum […], or according to the actual prejudice (including loss of earnings) suffered by the right holder […], to which must be added any unfair profits made by the infringer" (emphasis added).

An important change has occurred in the 9 February 2004 Council proposal in preparation of agreement at the first reading[23], where recital 24 was amended to the wording of what is now recital 26 ("the amount of damages awarded to the right holder should take account of all appropriate aspects, such as loss of earnings incurred by the right holder, or unfair profits made by the infringer and, where appropriate, any moral prejudice caused to the right holder") but article 17 par. (1) provided that "When the judicial authorities set the damages, they shall take into account all appropriate aspects, such as the negative economic consequences, including lost profits, which the injured party has suffered, as well as any unfair profits made by the infringer and, in appropriate cases, […] elements other than economic factors, such as the moral prejudice caused to the right holder by the infringement" (emphasis added).

This is particularly relevant because it shows that the wording of the recital as amended was either thought to reflect or at least not affect the possibility of the unfair profits being taken into account together (by use of "as well as any unfair profits") with the negative economic consequences (including lost profits) to the right holder.

In the text agreed by the Permanent Representatives Committee on 16 February 2004[24] recital 24 was maintained as in the preparation and article 17 was amended to the current wording of article 13 in the IP Enforcement Directive.

The cumulation of these criteria in the setting of damages was envisaged all throughout the complicated EU legislative process and was provided for expressly, in plain words, even when the recital (now 26) was amended to its current form. In the absence of any express indication to the contrary, this seems like a strong indication that the proposed rewording in recital 24 (now 26) and, subsequently, article 17 (now 13) – such rewording for both the provisions having been finally approved in accordance with the text agreed by COREPER 1 in February[25] - has not altered this intention.

2.5. The effect of the EU provision on the interpretation of the national provisions at issue

As has been shown above, there is strong evidence that article 13 par. (1) letter (a) in the IP Enforcement Directive should be read and/or interpreted as allowing the cumulation of the right holder's loss of benefit and the infringer's unfair profits as criteria for the setting of damages in IP infringement cases and this irrespective of the provisions of recital 26 of the preamble to the directive.

There is moreover a question as to whether the Romanian courts should, as the High Court has, base their interpretation of the relevant provisions of Romanian law solely on the interpretation of the IP Enforcement Directive, i.e. whether the Romanian courts ought to consider the boundaries set by (or derived from) the IP Enforcement Directive as definitive boundaries that may not have been exceeded by the Romanian legislator on the implementation of the directive.

As the CJEU has held in OTK[26], "as is apparent from Article 2(1), the directive applies without prejudice to the means which are or may be provided for, in particular, in national legislation, in so far as those means may be more favourable for right holders. It is quite clear from recital 7 of the directive that the term 'means' that is used is general in nature, encompassing the calculation of damages. Consequently, as the Court has already held, Directive 2004/48 lays down a minimum standard concerning the enforcement of intellectual property rights and does not prevent the Member States from laying down measures that are more protective" (emphasis added).

Therefore, even if the High Court's conclusion that the IP Enforcement Directive precluded the cumulation of the right holder's loss of benefit and the infringer's unfair profits as criteria for the setting of damages in IP infringement cases, in order to hold that the Romanian legal provisions did not allow such cumulation, it should have verified whether such provisions were not "more favorable for right holders" or "more protective" and thus exceeded the limits of the IP Enforcement Directive and, consequently, could not be narrowed down to fit that scope.

Since, as the CJEU has held in OTK, "It is quite clear from recital 7 of the directive that the term 'means' that is used is general in nature, encompassing the calculation of damages"[27], the possibility of using cumulatively the two criteria for the calculation of damages appears as "more favorable to right holders" than the lack of such a possibility, the narrowing down of such more favorable provisions to match that of the IP Enforcement Directive seems to run counter to the provisions and objectives of that very directive.

The conclusion that the High Court's analysis has not so taken into account the limits of the IP Enforcement Directive's scope is further enforced by the fact that the High Court has held that the IUP Enforcement Directive, having been transposed in national legislation, takes precedence in its application over the provisions of article 45 par. (1) of TRIPS[28]. In fact, recital 5 of the preamble to the IP Enforcement Directive states that "This Directive should not affect Member States' international obligations, including those under the TRIPS Agreement" and, article 2 par. (3) letter (b) provides that „This Directive shall not affect: [...] (b) Member States' international obligations and notably the TRIPS Agreement, including those relating to criminal procedures and penalties".

Therefore, even when considering the provisions of TRIPS, or other international legislation, the provisions of the IP Enforcement Directive (as implemented in national law) should not be taken to affect Member States' obligations under these international acts and, where overlaps exist, the conflict should be solved by reference to article 2 par. (1) of the directive (since this would be a conflict of internal legal provisions, all such acts being taken to be part of internal law), by application of the means more favourable to right holders.

Moreover, the interpreting of these provisions should not be narrowed down by application of other, general provisions of national law since, as the High Court has stated[29], these are provisions of special law, which apply with precedence over those of general law, following the principle specialia generalibus derogant. Therefore, as indficated by the High Court[30], traditional limits on the calculation of damages in tort do not apply where calculating damages for IP infringement, the latter being regulated with precedence by the legal provisions at issue.

3. Conclusions

Since, as shown above, the provisions of article 14 par. (2) letter (a) of GEO 100/2005 and article 139 par. (2) letter (a) of Law no. 8/1996 cannot be taken to bar cumulation of the right holder's loss of benefit and the infringer's unfair profits as criteria for the setting of damages in IP infringement cases, since not even by reference to article 13 par. (1) letter (a) of the IP Enforcement Directive cannot be read nor interpreted as imposing such ban and since such provisions might even exceed (if taken as more favorable to the right holders) the scope of the IP Enforcement Directive, such cumulation should be allowed.

More research is to be conducted in order to determine how such criteria are to be applied in practice, the High Court indicating in one of its decisions[31] that, although the phrase "unfair benefits" is an independent concept, exceeding economic profits alone, the determination of such must take account of the part of the benefits that could be attributable to the infringer's licit activity and therefore not attributable to the infringement at issue.

ARBITRABILITY OF DISPUTES RELATED TO INTELECTUAL PROPERTY RIGHTS

Ruxandra I. CHIRU[*]

Abstract

The present study is aimed for the intellectual property rights holders and specialists in intellectual property law, that are invited to use, promote and implement arbitration as a winning alternative means of solving disputes. The author presents the arbitration as the main method of alternative dispute resolution and analyses the conditions in which arbitration may be used for settling disputes related to intellectual property rights. In this respect, the paper largely presents the main conditions: the dispute has to be liable for settlement by means of arbitration, the parties have to conclude an arbitration agreement, the arbitration agreement has to be valid and effective and the dispute has to be included in the provisions of the arbitration agreement. The author also reviews the types of arbitration used by the World Intellectual Property Organization Centre for Arbitration and Mediation, the World Trade Organization, the Romanian Copyright Office and the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, presenting some ruling of arbitral tribunals concerning arbitrability issues.

General considerations regarding arbitrability

- The arbitration represents settlement of disputes activity administered by an alternative jurisdiction with private nature, separately regulated by Civil Procedure Code both the one in force, as well as the one adopted in 1865 by the means of the 4th Book intituled "About Arbitration". Arbitration is an effective alternative to state justice, presenting many advantages for the parties to the judicial process, including:
- The flexibility of proceedings – the parties have the freedom to choose the applicable procedure rules (with the condition not to breach public order and imperative provisions of the law), the type of arbitration –ad-hoc or institutionalized, the arbitrators that are to settle the dispute, the organising institution, the place of arbitration etc.;
- Arbitrator specialisation – the parties have the possibility to choose individuals with professional specialisation in the field referred to judgement increasing the confidence and offering the guarantee upon the competence of the ones that are to settle the dispute;
- Confidentiality of arbitration – conducting the arbitral proceedings is performed in a closed circle with the exclusive participation of parties and their representatives which ensures the commercial secret and avoids negative publicity, having a very important role in order for the commercial relationship between parties to continue;
- The period for settlement of conflict is much shorter than in the case of a judicial trial – if the parties do not convene otherwise, the arbitral tribunal must settle the request for arbitration within 6 months from its establishment, respectively 12 months for international arbitration, under the sanction of arbitration caducity;
- Arbitral awards are final and binding for the parties, having the possibility to be enforced just as judicial judgements;
- Arbitral awards may be cancelled only by the action for annulment and only for the limiting reasons provided by Art.608 of Civil Procedure Code.

International commercial arbitration is the "preferred method of dispute settlement that emanate from international commerce"[1]. Besides the above mentioned advantages, the parties can be mistrustful in judicial practices, political systems and foreign economical structures[2], due to unawareness or too little knowledge upon national legislation from origin countries of contractual partners, choosing arbitration being the best solution. Another important advantage is New York Convention (1958)[3] on Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards to which Romania is signatory party among other 156 countries worldwide, facilitating recognition and approval of enforcement of arbitral awards rendered by international arbitration.

The term "arbitrability" represents a status, disputes' nature, being arbitrable, respectively meeting cumulative conditions: 1) the dispute may be settled by the means of arbitration; 2) the parties concluded an

Disputes related to intellectual property rights that may be settled by arbitration proceedings

It is in the best interest of all specialists in intellectual property rights and owners of these rights to know in which cases they may turn to arbitration and as to where and when. That is, because the assets as intellectual property of successful enterprises around the world are increasing in number and more valuable and the disputes that have as object the breach of certain intellectual property rights are ever more, the stakes for these disputes are often huge.

According to the provisions contained in Art 2 (viii) within the Convention for Establishing World Intellectual Property Organisation, Stockholm, 1967[4], intellectual property includes the rights related to: "literary, artistic and scientific works, performances of performing artists, phonograms and broadcastings, inventions in all fields of human endeavour, scientific discoveries, industrial designs, trademarks, service marks, and commercial names and designations, protection against unfair competition and all other rights resulting from intellectual activity in the industrial, scientific, literary and artistic fields".

Pursuant to the provisions provided by international conventions, taken over also by Romanian law, sub-branches of intellectual property are: copyright, related rights and sui-generis rights of database producers on one hand and industrial property rights on the other hand, each of them having patrimonial and non-patrimonial (moral) content. The rights emanating from intellectual creations are closely related to authors' personality, because "the author's personality is extended in work"[5], and such special connection offers the author firstly the moral non-patrimonial rights, from which derives patrimonial rights, evaluable in money. Intellectual property rights have a very complex dual nature and the two components are separately regulated and protected. Exemplifying, there are moral rights of intellectual property: right to decide if and in what extent and when the work shall be published, right to request the acknowledgement as author of the work, right to ask for observing the integrity of work, right to withdraw the work. There are considered intellectual patrimonial rights: the right to authorise or forbid the reproduction of work, distribution, renting, leasing, broadcasting, creating derived work, the rights that emanate from a registration request for an industrial property object (patent, industrial design, utility model), exclusive right of use and to oppose any kind of use or detriment brought to work without right to do so, right of priority or exposure, as well as all rights settled by contract with third parties exploiting the objects of intellectual property.

The first condition for arbitrability – what kind of disputes and with regard to what type of intellectual property rights may be settled by arbitration – it must be assessed in close connection with national legal provisions, respectively if and which are the arbitrable disputes and if there are legal exceptions with regard to the settlement by arbitration of disputes with regard to the intellectual property rights.

„ The concept of arbitrability, properly so called, relates to public policy limitations upon arbitration as a method of settling disputes. Each state may decide, in accordance with its own economic and social policy, which matters may be settled by arbitration and which may not. In international cases, arbitrability involves the balancing of competing policy considerations. The legislators and courts in each country must balance the importance of reserving matters of public interest (such as human rights or criminal law issues) to the courts against the public interest in the encouragement of arbitration in commercial matters"[6].

In Romania, the types of disputes related to intellectual property that may be settled by arbitration are regulated by general law –the arbitration procedure[7] from the Civil Procedure Code – and special laws, specific to different types of property rights – copyrights, related rights and industrial property.

Pursuant to provisions of the New Civil Procedure Code all disputes upon which the law do not provide otherwise are arbitrable, except for the ones related to civil status, individuals capacity, inheritance disputes, family relationships and the rights upon which the parties cannot order (Art. 542 of Civil Procedure Code). The previous regulations limited the domain of disputes that may be settled by means of arbitration "patrimonial disputes […], except for the ones related to rights upon which the law forbids to make an amicably settlement" (Art. 340 from the previous Civil Procedure Code[8]). While within previous Civil Procedure Code patrimonial disputes were forming the only category of disputes liable to be settled by means of arbitration, being excluded from the domain of arbitrability un-transactional patrimonial disputes and non-patrimonial disputes, the new procedural regulation increased the variety of arbitrable disputes by eliminating the condition as regards the patrimonial nature – although the disputes expressly excluded from the possibility of settlement by arbitration subsumes, in fact, all non-patrimonial rights[9], it remains the possibility of existence of non-patrimonial rights others than the ones related to civil status, individual capacity, inheritance debate or family relationships. It's about disputes related to interpretation of certain contractual clauses that are not valuable in cash, however they have most of the times pecuniary consequences upon parties, and also about disputes related to evacuation.

Art. 1112 with regard to disputes' arbitrability, dedicated to international arbitration process, falls however as the previous Civil Procedure Code within the segment of patrimonial arbitrable disputes: "Any patrimonial case may be the object of arbitration if it is related to rights upon which the parties can freely order and the state law where the arbitration court seats do not reserves the exclusive jurisdiction to judicial courts".

If patrimonial disputes related to intellectual property are arbitrable, as they are about rights upon which the parties can order, in case of non-patrimonial disputes we must assess the extent the parties may have such rights and if they can exert non-patrimonial rights[10].

Thus, as regards the industrial property rights, we may have disputes raised from exploitation contracts concluded by the owners of rights with third parties that can be settled by arbitration – although the laws regarding industrial property rights do not mention expressly the possibility of settlement by arbitration, it is understood, if not otherwise provided by an expressed legal exception, the existing option for arbitral procedure.

It remains however under question the possibility of the arbitral tribunal to order upon the validity of industrial property right[11], such possibility may be raised also in the defence.

General rule is that it is necessary to complete certain administrative formalities under the competence of State Office for Inventions and Trademarks (OSIM) in order to obtain the ownership of an industrial property right or, depending on the country where the request is formulated and the necessity of acknowledging the right abroad, by other similar bodies, national, Community, European or international. Such formalities are legally regulated and binding in order to acknowledge the right of industrial property upon an invention, industrial design, etc. and in order to benefit of the legal protection of that certain right, nationally – national legislations, Community – directives and European regulations, international – T.R.I.P.S. Agreement, Paris Convention for protection of industrial property etc. An exception to this rule is the case of commercial secrets and undisclosed information, for which there is not (yet) a formal procedure of acquisition or acknowledgement of the right upon them.

The view of the doctrine, which I do share, points out the issue of validity upon an industrial property title (patent, registration certificate) that cannot be settled by arbitration due to the fact that special laws grounding these titles are in exclusive jurisdiction of state court, furthermore, in Romania; there is only one, namely Bucharest Tribunal. This means that the validity of protection title is not arbitrable based on a direct provision of the law related to public order. Raising in defence of an exception upon validity of an industrial property right cannot be held and assessed by the arbitral tribunal (there is a similar issue raising in front of the arbitral tribunal forgery and use of forgery on documents submitted by the opposing party), the respondent having the right to challenge industrial property rights before courts of law. Also, such a registered request on the docket of the courts of law could determine suspending the settlement of arbitral dispute pursuant to Art.413 Para.1, point 1 of the Civil Procedure Code, until the final settlement of appeal. The solution of declining jurisdiction is not a valid one, contesting the validity of industrial property title in defence – and not by a counterclaim –not being a separate count of claim by which the arbitral tribunal could consider itself vested and, on the other hand, not capable of affecting the will of the parties, content of the statement of claim and jurisdiction upon settlement of the arbitral tribunal.

In another opinion[12], in case there shall be raised, in defence, issues that challenge the very right of intellectual property, the arbitral dispute cannot continue until the settlement of such problems by the court of law. It is not clear though who shall notify the court of law, considering that a possible decline may be targeting, as stated above, only counts of claim that the arbitral tribunal has been vested with.

It is worth mentioning that in Romanian law the exclusive jurisdiction related to the requests of annulment upon industrial property rights awarded by OSIM pertains to Bucharest Tribunal, the reason being the necessity of defending public prerogatives of State to award, acknowledge and protect industrial property rights[13]. Decisions within judicial judgements are, according to law, registered with OSIM. The exclusive jurisdiction of OSIM and courts of law is related to public order, observing the protection erga omnes of the rights emanating from the industrial property rights. Referral to jurisdiction of courts of law is imperative, arbitration being excluded (an arbitral award is binding only for the parties; it cannot obtain an erga omnes effect).

In this sense, Law no. 64/1991 on patents[14] provides within Art. 48-54 that the actions related to non-patrimonial personal rights of patents owners fall under the exclusive jurisdiction of law courts. Likewise, Law no. 84/1998 on trademarks and geographical indications[15] (Art. 45-49, 54, 60, 85) and Law no. 129/1992 on protection of designs and models[16] (Art. 25, 42).

In conclusion, the difference between arbitrable/non-arbitrable has as criteria causa petendi, meaning that when the legal grounds constitute the legal provisions related to the existence of intellectual property right, the dispute is not arbitrable, while the legal ground related to contractual responsibility, delictual responsibility, unjust enrichment or undue payments, the dispute is, basically, arbitrable[17]. Determination of arbitral jurisdictional extent is a matter of public order; nevertheless, considering its importance, the arbitrability is separately regulated by national and international legislations[18].

The disputes arising from infringement of rights which do not question the validity of protection title are arbitrable. Thus, it can be settled by arbitration – of course if the parties concluded an arbitral convention – disputes arising from assignment contracts, licence contracts, franchise contracts, infringement of holder or successor rights, disputes between assignor and the assignee or the ones between licensors and licensees to the extent disputes are related to rights the parties may provide.

The disputes emanated from raising industrial property rights with regard to the ones that do not impose completing formalities, as unregistered trademark, unregistered design, domain name, symbol, may be settled by arbitration, holders being able to order upon them unconditionally.

In the field of copyright and related rights, Law no. 8/1996[19] separates clearly the patrimonial rights listed within Art. 13 and 21, and moral rights (Art. 10). While disputes having as object patrimonial rights are in principle arbitrable – they may be subject for certain contracts concluded with pecuniary interest and the holders may order upon it – the law provides that moral rights "cannot make the object of any waiver or alienation"[20], they cannot be transactional, their holders cannot order upon them, thus, on first impression, disputes related to infringement cannot be settled by arbitration. However, I do not see why arbitration could not be vested with the settlement of certain requests finding infringement of moral rights and granting compensations, upon such matter parties being able to settle amicably anytime and in front of any jurisdiction.

Concluding an arbitration agreement

In which cases and on what intellectual property rights, the parties may conclude arbitration agreements? What are the forms of arbitration agreements?

The arbitration agreement is "the keystone of arbitration"[21], which is the manifestation of the will of the parties to settle the disputes between them by arbitration, excluding the disputes covered by agreement from jurisdiction of the courts.

The arbitral convention may be concluded either in the form of an arbitral clause included in the contract either as a compromise – a subsequent agreement which targets certain dispute, concluded even after the dispute is registered before a court (including arbitral courts).

The two forms of arbitration agreement are independent of each other, the inclusion of a arbitral clause in the parties' contract allowing them to submit directly to the competent arbitral institution or, in case of ad-hoc arbitration, to constitute directly the tribunal, without the necessity to conclude a compromise[22].

Both the arbitral clause and the compromise represent autonomous commitments and not parts of the contract[23]. The arbitral clause shall remain in effect and binding upon the parties even after termination of contract.

Written form is requested ad validitatem. Art. 548 Para 1 of the Civil Procedure Code is strict upon the form of arbitral convention stipulating that "shall be concluded in writing under penalty of nullity". Likewise, the New York Convention (1958) on Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards, a Convention which enjoys broad international appreciation and whose value is widely recognized[24], Art. II, provides that "Each Contracting State shall recognize an agreement in writing under which the parties undertake to submit to arbitration all or any differences" that "The term "agreement in writing" shall include an arbitral clause in a contract or an arbitration agreement, signed by the parties or contained in an exchange of letters or telegrams"[25].

Valid and operative arbitration agreement

Towards the nature of arbitration agreement, general provisions may apply on the validity of an agreement as provided by Civil Code, Art. 1179: the ability of the parties to contract; consent of the parties; specified and legal object; legal and moral cause.

According to special provisions contained in Book IV About Arbitration from the Civil Procedure Code, an arbitration agreement is invalid or ineffective in cases where the parties agree to settle by arbitration disputes concerning "rights on which the parties cannot order" (Art. 542 Para. 1 of the Civil Procedure Code).

It's about objective arbitrability, determined by the nature of the dispute – not any kind of dispute is liable to be settled by arbitration, however the doctrine[26] speaks equally about subjective arbitrability – capacity of legal persons of public law to conclude an arbitration agreement. The issue of State ability to conclude arbitration agreements has been widely discussed[27], based on Civil Procedure Code provisions, which provides that "The State and public authorities have the ability to conclude arbitration agreements only if authorized by law or international conventions to which Romania is part" (Art. 542 Para. 2), and "If one party to the arbitration agreement is a State, a state-owned or state-controlled organization, the party may not invoke its own right to contest the arbitrability of a dispute or its capacity to be a party to the arbitration" (Art. 1112 Para. 2, on international arbitral process), as well as the Geneva Convention of 1961[28] providing at Art. II(1) that "capacity of legal persons of public law to resort to arbitration", the latter having "the power to conclude valid arbitration agreements" in international commercial disputes.

An arbitration convention having as object non-arbitrable disputes infringes public order and is, therefore, invalid in accordance with provisions of Art. 11 of Civil Code. However, if the arbitral tribunal crosses over this nullity and settles a dispute based on an illicit arbitration agreement, the arbitral award may be cancelled by a request for annulment[29] according to Art. 608 Para. 1 Letter a) of Civil Procedure Code "the dispute was not liable for settlement by arbitration" or letter h), "the arbitral award infringes public order, morals or mandatory provisions of law".

In international arbitration, New York Convention of 1958 provides that recognition and enforcement of foreign arbitral awards shall be refused if "The subject matter of the difference is not capable of settlement by arbitration under the law of that country" (Art. V(2)).

Classification of dispute in the domain of disputes included in arbitral agreement

Parties are free to decide what types of disputes shall be submitted for settlement to the arbitration court. Thus, arbitration clauses may refer to "any dispute arising out of or in connection with the contract" or "disputes concerning performance of the contract", in this case disputes concerning termination of contract falling under the jurisdiction of the state courts. If the parties conclude a compromise, the arbitral tribunal only has jurisdiction to settle the dispute forming the object of compromise, any other dispute being a matter under the jurisdiction of national courts.

In determining the arbitrability of a dispute, the arbitral tribunal must consider whether the parties have agreed to defer to arbitration the type of dispute that has been vested for settlement.

In next chapters, I will present the main institutions that organize arbitration proceedings to which natural and legal persons in Romania may turn to settle disputes concerning intellectual property rights.

Arbitration organised by the World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO)

The World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO) is the global forum for intellectual property services, policy, information and cooperation, established by the Convention establishing the World Intellectual Property Organization, Stockholm, 1967, and having as main objective "to promote the protection of intellectual property throughout the world through cooperation among States and, where appropriate, in collaboration with any other international organization" (Art. 3 of the Convention Establishing WIPO).

In 1994, it had been established the WIPO Arbitration and Mediation Center, with its headquarters in Geneva (Switzerland), having as purpose to promote resolution of intellectual property disputes by mediation and arbitration. Developed by leading experts in cross-border dispute settlement, the arbitration, mediation and expert determination procedures offered by the Center are widely recognized as particularly appropriate for technology, entertainment and other disputes involving intellectual property[30].

In intellectual property, arbitration shall be conducted on disputes arising from copyrights and related rights, trademarks, geographical indications, designs and models, patents, utility models, layout-designs of integrated circuits, anti-competitive practices etc.

WIPO Arbitration Rules[31] may be used for settling all types of arbitrable civil disputes, being however adapted for certain areas of intellectual property in order to suit the specificity of this complex field[32].

A special feature of the arbitral proceedings conducted under the WIPO Arbitration and Mediation Center is the choice of arbitrators by the Center as Appointing Authority, but only after consulting the parties, who are invited to submit proposals to be considered at the time of appointment[33].

Another feature worthy to be noticed is the expedited arbitration procedure, considered by WIPO experts to be necessary in certain areas, to counteract the disadvantages of standard arbitration that may sometimes extend over a long period of time. By this different set of rules, shortened time frames are established compared to standard rules, so the dispute should be declared closed within three month and the final award should be made within one month (as opposed to nine month and three month respectively under the WIPO Arbitration Rules).

Arbitration organized by the World Trade Organization[34]

The World Trade Organization was established on 1 January 1995, under the Marrakesh Agreement signed on 15 April 1994, replacing the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), having the main role of supervising a large number of treaties defining the "rules of trade" between nations.

Annex 1C to the Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization is the Agreement of Trade Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights – T.R.I.P.S. This agreement provides for minimum standards for various regulations in the intellectual property field and represents one of the most important multilateral instruments regarding globalization of rules on intellectual property.

For all domains in relation to which it provides supervision, including intellectual property, the World Trade Organization provides services of dispute settlement between Member States on breach of any agreement or promise under WTO. According to the data available on the Organization's site[35], WTO has one of the most active international dispute settlement mechanisms in the world – over 500 disputes have been bought and over 350 ruling have been issued since WTO was established, representing "the WTO's unique contribution to the stability of the global economy"[36].

The general rules of dispute settlement are comprised in WTO Agreement for dispute settlement, called DSU – Dispute Settlement Understanding. These rules and special procedures are binding for all WTO members and their application is ensured by the sole dispute settlement body set up within the WTO General Council. Dispute resolution is achieved through specific methods, such as consulting, the panel of experts, conciliation, mediation and arbitration.

Art. 21.3 of the DSU provides for the possibility to initiate arbitration procedures whenever neither the parties nor the WTO were able to establish a "reasonable period of time" in which a Member State found to be in violation of its WTO obligations must comply with the ruling and recommendations of the WTO Dispute Settlement Body. Arbitrators are selected in accordance with the above mentioned rules either by the parties to the arbitration or by the General Director of WTO.

Arbitration organized by the Romanian Copyright Office (ORDA)

The arbitral tribunals established under the auspices of the Romanian Copyright Office settle disputes concerning copyright and related rights as defined by Law no.8/1996 on copyright and related rights.

The arbitral procedure is regulated by Art. 130 – 131^2 of Law no. 8/1996, Section III on "Functions of Collective Management Organizations". According to these provisions, collective management organizations in the field of copyrights and related rights shall develop methodologies for their fields, including economic rights payable that have to be negotiated with users for the payment of these rights (Art. 130 Para 1 letter b). These methodologies are negotiated within a commission established by the decision of the general director of the Romanian Copyright Office, constituted from one representative for each of the main collective management organizations operating for each category of rights and one representative for each of the main associative structures of users (Art. 131 Para. 2). Negotiations take place during 30 days at the most from the date of the establishment of the commission and the outcome of negotiations is recorded in a protocol filed with the Romanian Copyright Office and published in the Official Journal (Art. 131^2 Para. 1 and 2). Once published, methodologies are binding for all users in the field for which they were negotiated, as well as for all manufacturers and importers of media and devices for which compensatory remuneration for private copy is due[37].

When entities forming a party that is going to participate in the negotiations could not agree upon a common point of view to be presented to the other party, or the two parties under negotiations could not agree upon a unique form of the methodology within the 30 days as provided by law, or the collective management organizations could not agree upon the conclusion of a protocol for the distribution of remunerations and for the establishment of the fee due to the sole collector, the Romanian Copyright Office may be required to initiate arbitration proceedings (Art. 131^2 Para. 3).

An important issue debated within the doctrine is the voluntary or mandatory nature of ORDA arbitration procedure. If at first glance, the expression "may be required" would show the optional nature of arbitral proceedings, which is otherwise a particular issue of the arbitration procedure as regulated by the Civil Procedure Code and sustained by some authors[38], at a closer scrutiny, the procedure regulated by Law no. 8/1996 is the only procedure that allows, in the absence of agreement between the parties, elaboration of methodologies for collection and distribution of economic rights due to copyright and related rights holders, without which the entire activity of collective management organizations would be blocked[39]. Thus, we are talking about a mandatory procedure.

The arbitral tribunal is established by drawing lots in front of the parties of five standing arbitrators and three substitute arbitrators that shall replace, in the order of the drawing of the lots, the unavailable standing arbitrators. Within 5 days of the appointment of arbitrators, ORDA convenes at its headquarters the appointed arbitrators and the parties, when the arbitral tribunal shall establish its fee by negotiating with the parties, which is equally shared by both parties in arbitration, the first date of arbitration, no later than five days, and the place of arbitration. The arbitral tribunal's final award, comprising the final form of the methodologies subject to arbitration, shall be filed with the Romanian Copyright Office within 30 days from the first date of arbitration, period of time that may be extended, reasoned, with maximum 15 days. The arbitral award may be appealed at the Bucharest Court of Appeal and the decision of the Court of Appeal shall be final and binding, being submitted to the Romanian Copyright Office and published in the Official Journal for enforceability (Art. 131^2 Para. 9).

Studying all these provisions of Law no. 8/1996, we see that ORDA arbitration does not cover basic principles of arbitration as established by the Civil Procedure Code and also by international regulations – the procedure is not a voluntary one, it is not based on the parties' consent, the arbitrators are not appointed by the parties, the arbitral award may not be subject to the action for annulment regulated by Art. 608 of the Civil Procedure Code. It is in fact a mandatory manner of solving a particular type of problems occurred in a precisely determined area, having a clearly regulated nature[40].

Arbitration procedures organized by the Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania

The Court of International Commercial Arbitration attached to the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania[41] is the oldest arbitral institution in Romania, being established in 1953 for settling international commercial disputes.

Today, the Court of International Commercial Arbitration acts as a permanent arbitral institution near the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Romania, reorganized in accordance with Law no. 335/2007 of the chambers of commerce in Romania[42], and settles domestic and international civil disputes in accordance with its own arbitral procedure rules, as well as the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code, having a very good reputation earned because of its Romanian and foreign specialists with high qualification registered on its List of arbitrators, as well as because of the high quality of the arbitral awards rendered under its auspices.

The Court of International Commercial Arbitration settles commercial disputes from all economic sectors – construction, financing, investment, insurance, public procurement, energy, intellectual property.

Studying the jurisprudence of the Court of International Commercial Arbitration, I identified several cases settled by arbitration, concerning intellectual property disputes on property rights that did not call into question the title of protection, in relation to which the arbitral courts retained their liability for settlement by means of arbitration.

Thus, in a dispute[43] concerning compensation for unlawful use of a patent on heating equipment for Diesel engines, the arbitral tribunal held its own jurisdiction under the arbitration agreement concluded by the parties, jurisdiction that was actually not disputed by the parties, administered evidences and settled the dispute by final award.

In another dispute[44] concerning the termination of a contract for the purchase of software – adaptation and implementation of a system of integrated management for insurance and reinsurance services, for supplier's culpable un-fulfilment of its contractual obligations, the arbitral tribunal held that "the parties concluded a valid arbitration agreement", the jurisdiction of the arbitral court not being questioned nor challenged by them. In settling the dispute, the arbitral tribunal examined the applicability of the special provisions of Art.46 Para.3 of Law no. 8/1996 on copyright and related rights, according to which*: "The person ordering the work shall be entitled to terminate the contract if the work does not meet the established conditions: In case of contract denunciation, the amounts cashed by the author remain to the latter. In case he executed preparatory work for a work which was the subject of an order contract, the author is entitled to reimbursement of incurred expenses."* and found that, in this dispute, "it is about the purchase of a computer program, subject to copyright in accordance with Art.7 letter a) of Law no. 8/1996, that had to be achieved, adapted, implemented and handed over to the beneficiary by the supplier", being about "an order contract for future work being subject, among others, to the provisions of Law no.8/1996 on copyright and related rights". For these reasons, it found the rightful termination of the contract, but rejected the claim for reimbursement of the advance, showing that an order providing for the refund of the amounts received as advances by the supplier "would be contrary, in part, to some imperative legal provisions in place for the protection of authors of future works and which cannot be derogated from by the parties' will (Art. 5 Civil Code)".

In an arbitral award rendered in 2008[45], which concerned a dispute arising out of breach of contractual payment obligations from a advertising services contract, under which, inter alia, the claimant made an advertisement related to which infringement of copyrights was invoked by means of counterclaim, with the consequent interruption of broadcast, it was found that the arbitral tribunal has jurisdiction in accordance with the arbitration agreement concluded by the parties by means of an arbitration clause included in the contract. The jurisdiction was challenged by the claimant as regards the settlement of the counterclaim, as it concerned claims based on alleged violations of Law no. 8/1996 on copyright and related rights, showing that both the law and the arbitration clause except disputes on intellectual property from the jurisdiction of arbitration, and that the counterclaim "is not arbitrable, is not liable to be settled by arbitration since it concerned copyrights arising out of an audiovisual work". The arbitral tribunal joined the exception on jurisdiction with the substance of the case and rejected it, including its liability to be solved by arbitration, arguing that the counterclaim referred to infringement of commercial obligations arising out of the contract and not to copyright infringement, since that was a claim based on ordinary law, not a dispute about intellectual property.

In another dispute[46] settled under the auspices of the Court of International Commercial Arbitration, which dealt with a breach of payment obligations arising out of a products and services delivery contract – delivery, installation, commissioning, maintenance and updating a software, and damages under the penalty clause of 50% of the contract value for beneficiary's breach of the confidentiality obligation provided by the contract, the arbitral tribunal retained its jurisdiction to settle the dispute in accordance with the arbitration agreement – the arbitration clause agreed between the parties in the contract, jurisdiction that was actually not disputed by the parties. With regard to the claim for damages, the claimant stated that the parties had determined that the intellectual property right on the software belongs to the claimant, the beneficiary having the obligation of confidentiality – databases, reports, price lists – assumed under the contract, being a commercial secret on which it recognised intellectual property rights in favour of the claimant. Both parties confirmed that the copyright for the main software program belonged to a company in Finland, with whom the claimant concluded a distribution contract for Romania, however the claimant invoked the copyright over some "created and developed related software", without which the main software could not be used in Romania. The arbitral tribunal rejected the claim for damages, retaining that the intellectual property rights on the software belong to the company in Finland, that "birth, content and extinction of copyright on an intellectual creation work are subject to the law of the State where it was acknowledged by the public for the first time" (Art. 2.624 Civil Code), that "copyright on computer programs is harmonised throughout European Union Member States by (EC) Directive no. 24 of 23 April 2009 on the legal protection of computer programs, and the Directive was implemented in Finland, the country where the owner of the computer program right had its headquarters […], as well as in Romania, where it is claimed that the Claimant's own rights were born", that „the assignment of the right to use a computer program does not imply transfer of the copyright on it" (Art. 75 Para. 2 of Law no. 8/1996) and that the confidentiality clause is contrary to the provisions of the distribution contract concluded between the claimant and the owner of the copyright on the software, by which the right to use the program was transmitted only, the claimant not having the copyright owner's consent for making derivative works (Art. 8 of Law no. 8/1996).

I believe that settling disputes concerning intellectual property rights through arbitration has several advantages worthy of being considered by holders of those rights, as well as specialists in this field that is in constant change and development, of course, with strict observance of the limitations established by national laws and international conventions.

LI-FI TECHNOLOGY AND THE NEW CONCEPT OF DATA TRANSFER SECURITY

Ramona DUMITRAȘCU *

Abstract

Li-Fi is a wireless technology that transmits high-speed data using visible light communication (VLC), it can achieve speeds of 224 gigabits per second in the lab. The potential Li-Fi technology can change a lot in virtual word considering it can provide transmission at 1 GB per second - that's 100 times faster than current average Wi-Fi speeds. By flickering the light from a single LED, Li-Fi technology can transmit far more data than a cellular tower, using Visible Light Communication (VLC) technology - a medium that uses visible light between 400 and 800 terahertz (THz). It works basically like an incredibly advanced form of Morse code - flicking an LED on and off at extreme speeds and can be used to write and transmit things in binary code. The benefit of Li-Fi over Wi-Fi, other than potentially much faster speeds, is that because light cannot pass through walls, it makes it a whole lot more secure.

1. Introduction

Demand for wireless data is increasing day by day which is escalating the congestion in radio spectrum. In present scenario the bandwidth capacity which is available is finite and not capable enough to sustain with the constantly increasing demand of wireless data. Wireless Fidelity dubbed as Wi-Fi has been in use from almost years to provide the internet services to all the required places right from home to humungous organizations. But it has limited bandwidth of about 54-100 megabits per second (Mbps). With High definition video & audios available for the viewers, it is becoming intricate to transfer them to the user flawlessly. The problem of speed & consistency even doubles when support is to be given to multiple devices because of splitting up of bandwidth between devices. The beauty of Wi-Fi is its easy and simple to set up network but threatening part is to provide security. To overcome technological boundaries of Wi-Fi, a new paradigm is in, which is Li-Fi[1].

Transfer of data from one place to another is one of the most important day-to-day activities. The current wireless networks that connect us to the internet are very slow when multiple devices are connected. As the number of devices that access the internet increases, the fixed bandwidth available makes it more and more difficult to enjoy high data transfer rates and connect to a secure network. But, radio waves are just a small part of the spectrum available for data transfer. A solution to this problem is by the use of Li-Fi. Li-Fi stands for ”Light- Fidelity”. Li-Fi is transmission of data through illumination by taking the fiber out of fiber optics by sending data through an LED light bulb that varies in intensity faster than the human eye can follow.

Li-Fi is the term some have used to label the fast and cheap wireless communication system, which is the optical version of Wi-Fi. Li-Fi uses visible light instead of Gigahertz radio waves for data transfer.

The idea of Li-Fi was introduced by a German physicist, Dr. Harald Hass, which he also referred to as data through illumination. The term Li-Fi was first used by a german scientist Dr. Harald Haas in his TED Global talk on Visible Light Communication[2].

According to Hass, the light which he referred to as D-Light, can be used to produce data rates higher than 10 Gigabits per second which is much faster than our average broadband connection.

Li-Fi can play a major role in relieving the heavy loads which the current wireless systems face since it adds a new and unutilized bandwidth of visible light to the currently available radio waves for data transfer. Thus it offers much larger frequency band (300 THz) compared to that available in RF communications (300 GHz). Also, more data coming through the visible spectrum could help alleviate concerns that the electromagnetic waves that come with Wi-Fi could adversely affect our health.

Li-Fi can be the technology for the future where data for laptops, smart phones, and tablets will be transmitted through the light in a room. Security would not be an issue because if you can‘t see the light, you can‘t access the data. As a result, it can be used in high security military areas where RF communication is prone to eavesdropping[3].

Light waves do not penetrate through walls. So, they can't be intercept and misused[4].

2. Content

Light Fidelity, Li-Fi, is a relatively new form of wireless communication technology. It uses light signals to communicate data. The excitement surrounding Li-Fi is because it has proven to have higher speeds than Wi-Fi. In the lab, Li-Fi has reached speeds of 224 gigabits per second. The same lab field tested Li-Fi technology in a factory based in Estonia and achieved transmission rates at 1 gigabit per second.

Professor Harald Hass wanted to turn the world's light bulbs into wireless routers. "All we need to do is fit a small microchip to every potential illumination device and this would then combine two basic functionalities, illumination, and wireless data transmission. In the future we will not only have 14 billion light bulbs, we may have 14 billion Li-Fis deployed worldwide for a cleaner, greener, and even brighter future" (Harald Hass Ted Talk 2011).

Herald Hass has proved that data can be transmitted over the light spectrum - this makes Li-Fi a form of optical wireless communication. Li-Fi uses infra-red and ultra-violet (visible light) waves to communicate data. Infra-red and ultra-violet spectrums can carry more information than radio frequency waves. This is why Li-Fi can achieve greater speeds than Wi-Fi.In simple terms, Li-Fi can be thought of as a lightbased Wi-Fi. That is, it uses light instead of radio waves to transmit information. And instead of Wi- Fi modems, Li-Fi would use transceiver-fitted LED lamps that can light a room as well as transmit and receive information. Since simple light bulbs are used, there can technically be any number of access points[5].

Currently, Li-Fi technology is focused on using the light from light-emitting diodes (LEDS) to communicate data. LEDs have become very popular around the world for their efficiency, low environmental impact, and longevity. The LED lights in homes and offices can be turned into wireless routers. LED light bulbs are a semiconductor light source, therefore, the constant electricity supply to the bulb can be altered to make it brighter or dimmer. Using visible light communication (VLC) the current in the LED bulb is flicked on and off at very high rate, functioning like a complex Morse code involving 1s and 0s. The flicking will happen at a speed too fast for the human eye to notice, so humans and animals will not be impacted. Li-Fi will continue after you have switched the lights off because the LEDs will be lit and signaling at a low light level that cannot be recognized by the human eye. To access the Li-Fi network you simply need a device to detect the light signals, with a component to decipher the light signals.

Wi-Fi uses radio frequency waves, a technology which has limited space and is quickly reaching its capacity. The limited capacity is why the radio frequency spectrum is heavily regulated in the US a nd it also provoked many security liabilities.

One of the most endearing facets of Li-Fi is that it uses the visible light spectrum. The visible light spectrum is 10 000 times larger than the radio frequency spectrum and is unregulated. So you don't need a license to take advantage of the light spectrum.

Another upside to Li-Fi is that it uses light spectrum and not radio frequency. Therefore, it emits no electromagnetic interference. This makes it more suitable for highly sensitive areas. Electromagnetic interference can affect communication in areas like mines or disrupt sensitive equipment in places like hospitals.

Data is fed into an LED light bulb which is fitted with signal processing technology. The LED bulb pulses the data at a high non-visible rate to the photodetector. The pulses are interpreted by the receiver into an electrical signal, the electronic signal is then converted back to binary data which is the web content we consume. The LED lights will be networked, so multiple users can access data using a single LED light or move from one LED light to another without affecting their access.

Although Li-Fi has faster speeds than Wi-Fi, it has a very short range. The further away you are from the light source, the slower the speed. That being said, you don't necessarily need to be under the LED light to access Li-Fi because it can use light reflections on surfaces, including walls, to achieve speeds averaging 70 MB/s. Unlike Wi-Fi, Li-Fi cannot penetrate walls because it uses light spectrum. Although not being able to penetrate walls limits the range of Li-Fi, it also makes the technology much more secure. It ensures that users can limit the area of accessibility. The security aspect of Li-Fi has both technology and defence firms very interested.

Due to the speeds that Li-Fi can reach, and its spatial limits, the technology IS ESPECTED TO work well alongside cellular and Wi-Fi technology as an additional option for connectivity. Li-Fi can be used to syphon off heavy traffic from cellular and Wi-Fi networks. For example, Li-Fi can be made available in densely populated areas like a shopping mall or sports stadium, allowing users to consume content rich media like videos or live streaming. As the users will be on the Li-Fi network, this will free up cellular and Wi-Fi network capacity in that area. This is because the uplinks require little capacity - it is the downlinks that strain the networks. The Internet of Things (IoT) is a revolution that has a lot of experts asking, where will we find the capacity to handle all that data? Li-Fi has proven itself as a viable, efficient and secure solution. A home, office or factory could run its own high capacity network over Li-Fi without adversely affecting public capacity[6]. Moreover, there are areas where radio simply does not work, or is not permitted such as underwater and in aircraft cabins. The possibilities are nearly unlimited[7].

Security of the data transfer is currently one of the most important concerns. Visible light can be reflected but generally does not penetrate materials which can be a security advantage and perhaps a coverage disadvantage[8]. Wi-Fi communication is vulnerable to hackers as it penetrates easily through walls. Radio waves can penetrate through walls. This leads to many security concerns as they can be easily intercepted. Light of course does not penetrate through walls and thus data transmission using light waves is more secure Yet, one serious disadvantage of the. Li-Fi technology ist that it requires line of sight. If the intensity of an external source of illumination such as sun is greater than the intensity of the transmitting LED array then the data to be transmitted is washed out. The receiver cannot transmit back or provide feedback to the transmitter[9].

Arguably the most important criteria of choosing and using the transfer data through internet is the security of the transfer. As we all know, wireless signals delivered by radio waves can go through walls into the outside world, where hackers and other malicious entities might be waiting. Light, on the other hand, can't pass through walls, which means that it's more likely to stay secure than a wireless signal broadcast to the entire vicinity[10]. As long as transparent materials like windows are covered, access to a Li-Fi channel is limited to devices inside the room.

This raises the possibility of creating secure ad-hoc networks in meeting rooms for example – enabling participants to share data without risk of data leaking out. Communication only takes place where the light can be seen, therefore the light can be directed towards certain areas within the office. This creates possibilities in open plan offices to create network zones. Maybe one part of the office connects to a project network, alternatively if you walk to another area you are granted public Internet access. On the building infrastructure side, the sender (light bulb) and receiver (sensor) are not necessarily the same device, or even in the exact same spot.

The communication is fundamentally uni-directional. Two uni-directional channels are used back-to-back to create communications. While this in essence is an accident of the technology, it could be used creatively to build security enclaves as the solution effectively has data-diodes built in[11].

Li-fe is a free band and doesn't need license and it uses light[12]. Li-Fi is a visible light communication medium, which is not, required any kinds of spectrum license. It is we didn't pay any amount for communication and license[13].

It is a proven fact that Li-Fi is more secure as compared to traditional Wi-Fi. This is because Wi-Fi routers are generally used by attackers to enter a network and strong firewalls are also unable to safeguard your network from these attackers. One of the common reasons behind this is that the range of Wi-Fi routers is an important factor which enables these security breaches into your Wi-Fi network.

On the other hand, Li-Fi uses light which limits the range of the internet connection and it cannot be increased at any cost. Thus, not letting the bulb be lightened or dimmed manually. This peculiar feature of Li-Fi will protect your network from interference from your neighbours.

Along with those blazing speeds, Li-Fi offers security benefits beyond strong passwords and AES encryption. Because it uses visible light to transmit data, it can't pass through walls, making it practically as secure as sharing files with an external Thunderbolt drive. Furthermore, since light waves don't interfere with other radio signals like Wi-Fi does, it could even be used safely on planes, in hospitals, and in other areas where interference is an issue.

Li-Fi, could provide a substantially increased solution to enhance data security to businesses seeking to improve data protection, from government and defence organisations, to financial, public sector, pharmaceutical, or any 'high data risk' industries.By exploiting specific properties of light, the Li-Fi system prevents both sides of the communications link being intercepted. Professor Haas explains: "Let us consider what Li-Fi means for the security of public and corporate internet access. Wi-Fi signals propagate in all directions and pass through walls and all data within range can be recorded. Because Li-Fi signals travel in directional beams between an access point and a terminal, and vice versa, a potential interceptor would need to be in the overlapping space of both light beams. Even an unencrypted Li-Fi access point provides better security than Wi-Fi". "Li-Fi removes the uncertainty of joining a network", he continues. "In a typical Li-Fi installation, ceiling lights which transmit and receive the data are part of the premises and this creates a chain of accountability for the security of the users' data. The inherent security advantages of Li-Fi and the accountability that it offers, provide a supplement to the emerging need for greater data security and responsibility"[14].

Having a global view on the new transfer data technology through by LI-FI one can easily conclude on it's major advantages such as: high speed transmission as high as 500 mbps or 30 GB per minute, Li- Fi uses light rather than radio frequency signals, VLC could be used safely in aircraft, Li-Fi can be integrated into medical devices and in hospitals as this technology does not deal with radio so it can easily be used in such places where Bluetooth, infrared, Wi-Fi and internet are banned. In this way, it will be most helpful transferring medium for us. Li-Fi is efficient under water in sea, where Wi-Fi does not work at. There are around 19 billion bulbs worldwide, they just need to be replaced with LED ones that transmit data. We reckon VLC is at a factor of ten, cheaper than Wi-Fi. Security is another benefit, since light does not penetrate through walls. By implanting the technology worldwide every street lamp would be a free access point. Li-Fi may solve issues such as the shortage of radio frequency bandwidth. Visible light spectrum has 10,000 time broad spectrum in comparison to radio frequency used in Wi-Fi[15].

The genial recognition of Haas to use led frequency as a replacement for wi-fi radio-frequency; enhancing the usable band with tremendously and at the same time making the message transmission more secure and less harmful (no magnetic field interference) has, however a possible disadvantage to be investigated: although led frequencies are not perceived by the human eye as such, it is uncertain weather the brain as such is not aware of the fluctuation of light- the essence of the message. Let it be understood that this issue gas been linked to the occurrence of epilepsy and other related symptoms. Although I am fully aware that this thesis has nothing to do with the essence and the purpose of this article, namely security issues in transfer of data and intellectual property issues I do have the opinion that ignoring the safety and well-being of humans supersede any other arguments.

3. Conclusions

Internet offers without a doubt unlimited possibilities in accessibility, for anyone and everyone to utilize which implies transparency and as consequence, total exposure which automatically will result in vulnerability. Until recently, enormous resources (people, money, research, security) have been allocated to protect and secure the data transfer. This resulted into a huge industry of software programs meant to protect the information, the intellectual property and the secret of communication. Until recently the solution of safety was always searched into software and only lately the revolution of the Li-Fi technology revealed that actually software-like solutions can be solved by changing the way of communicating online. Although many of the previous inventions still remain extremely useful, such us encryption and it variations, other might just not be useful anymore, such us firewalls.

TRADEMARK PROTECTION SYSTEMS – USE VS. REGISTRATION

George-Mihai IRIMESCU[*]

Abstract

The main purpose of the paper is comparing different trademark protection system, focusing on European jurisdictions and the relevant legislations.
The comparison focuses on the Romanian jurisdiction, as representative for the attributive system, and the Italian jurisdiction, which the doctrine considers representative for the declarative system. For each of them, the relevance of both use and registration are presented in terms of acquiring, consolidating or loosing protection.
By presenting the first to use and first to file systems, the article aims to compare them by outlining the advantages and disadvantages of both systems, and also by showing what they have in common in terms of legal consequences.
The article also describes the approach of international conventions with respect to trademark protection system, focusing on the legislation of the European Union, which is also directly relevant to both jurisdictions chosen to outline the two systems.
Finally, brief commentaries regarding the notion of "use" are made, along with conclusion regarding the analyzed trademark protections systems.

1. Introduction - The main trademark protection systems

The doctrine identified three trademark protection and acquiring trademark rights systems: the first to use system (realist or declarative), the first to file system (or attributive) or the mixt system (or dualist)[1].

The declarative system is that system where the trademark rights are acquired by the first person who put the trademark in the commercial circuit. Thus, the occupation is made through the effective use of a mark.

The first to use system does not, however, exclude registration trademark proceedings in the jurisdictions where it is present. In these countries, however, the effect of the trademark application is in principle a declarative one, and not of constituting rights, the act of use being independent of any trademark application, with nuances that we will further show.

Moreover, the act of use should be public and exercised animo domini, in other words showing the intention of the owner to appropriate that trademark, the continuous use being a condition to consolidate the right[2] (and not one to acquire the right, as could be interpreted in some situations in the attributive system). We consider there is a fine limit between a certain use duration that serves to determine the seriousness of use and the intention to appropriate, having therefore an attributive role, and the continuation of use that only consolidates the right. Although the intention to appropriate the mark is undoubtedly a subjective attitude, it is proven by means of objective, exterior facts, a possible indication being the continuity of use. However, such a limitation, that implies degree of subjectivity, has more of a theoretical importance than a practical one.

Thus, in order to obtain trademark protection in this system, the doctrine identifies an objective condition (the public use of the trademark) and a subjective condition (the intention of appropriation), which could be proven by any means available, since these are legal facts[3].

In the attributive system, the trademark right is acquired through registration before the national or regional intellectual property offices. Thus the right to a trademark belongs to the first person that filed a valid trademark application for a distinctive sign, with the condition it is registered when the procedure is finalized. However, although the prior use is not, as a rule, opposable, the use or non-use of a trademark do have legal consequences, as we will further detail.

The mixt system combine the characteristics of the two trademark acquisition systems, and it could be identified in the legislations of different states as the delayed attributive system (specific to the British law), the delayed system (where the trademark is not examined on the merits) and the preliminary approval system (used in the Swiss law)[4].

However, it should be noted that the first two systems should not be seen as totally opposed. In both systems the use of a trademark, as well as its registration before the relevant office, have legal consequences.

2. Historical aspects regarding trademark protection in Romania

Although nowadays, at least at continental level, the attributive system is preferred (especially due to the international conventions as well as due to the relevant European legislation), the "occupation" system, of use priority, was initially preferred by the Romanian legislator for a long period[5].

The first normative act which regulated the trademark protection in Romania was The Law on factory and trade marks from April 15, 1879. This law established the first to use system. Thus, the law stated that the trademark adopted by a trader could not be used by another trader and could not be adopted by another trader. Moreover, by means of the Regulation entered into force one month later, the procedure of filing an application with the Trade Tribunal was established, conferring 15 years of exclusive rights to the owner of such application6. Although the provisions regarding the trademark application with the tribunal could have led to the conclusion that the system established by this law is actually a mixt system, this application had rather a declarative role, and not that of a rights constituent, the right to a trademark being owned and recognized to that who firstly used it. Moreover, according to the case-law from the 1950's, the rights to a trademark were owned by that who filed the application only if it has not been previously used[7].

The law from 1879 was the result of the freshly gained independence of Romania and of the Trade Convention signed in 1875 with the Austro-Hungarian Empire, which compelled Romania to issue a normative act which conferred protection to Austro-Hungarian industrialists and traders in Romania. Therefore, although the Romanian economy, mostly agrarian, was not in need of such a normative act, The Law on factory and trademarks represented the execution of the afore-mentioned convention. It established the optional principle of factory and trademarks and comprised a single provision regarding consumers' protection, which sanctioned the fraud in their detriment[8].

Given that this law did not correspond anymore to the political and economic context of the 20th century, it was abolished by Law no. 28 of December 29, 1967 regarding factory, trade and service marks, which established in the Romanian legislation the first to file system, by filing an application with The General Direction for Metrology, Standards and Patents. Thus, article 4 of this law stated that "Factory, trade and service marks mat be used only after their registration according to the current law. The marks may be used only for the goods, works or the services for which they were registered". Moreover, article 18 stated that "the registration of a mark confers the owner an exclusive right to use the mark for the goods, works and services for which the registration was made, for a 10-year term from the filing date". Besides, this law renounced the optional character of the trademark, and established the obligation to register the trademarks covering goods, but not for services: "The producing undertakings from the Socialist Republic of Romania are obliged to register and use the factory marks for all their goods designated to the internal consume. The registration of trade marks by sales undertakings and of service marks by undertakings that execute works or provide services, as well as use by them of the registered marks, is optional"[9].

As we will further detail, the current trademarks law continues to establish the first-to-file system, a solution that is adopted by all the systems of the Member States of the Paris Union.

3. The attributive system – its application in the Romanian law

Article 4 from Law no. 84/1998 on trademarks and geographical indications, republished (hereinafter "The Trademarks Law") settles the attributive system in the Romanian law, having the following content: "The right to a trademark shall be acquired and protected by registration with RoPTO. Community trademarks shall benefit from protection on the territory of Romania in accordance with the provisions of the Community Trademark Regulation (a.n. European)"[10].

Thus, the trademark right is acquired through registration before the State Office for Inventions and Trademarks, on national way, or on international way through the system set by the Madrid Protocol, or through registration before the European Union Intellectual Property Office, as European trademarks are valid on the Romanian territory starting with January 01, 2007.

Moving forward, article 36 para. 1, states that "the registration of a trademark shall confer on its owner an exclusive right in that trademark", the subsequent paragraphs and articles regulating in more detail the actions available to a trademark owner for protecting its rights[11].

Thus, the current regulation kept the attributive system adopted since the law of 1967[12].

As shown above, the attributive system is not characterized only by the fact that the trademark application is a condition for obtaining protection, but also by the fact that a trademark, in order to get registered, is subject to examination on relative and absolute grounds. Thus, the doctrine very well underlines that the registration should not be confused with the filed trademark application[13]. Hence, procedural-wise, the trademark application is the initial moment of the trademark registration proceedings, and its major importance consists in establishing the date from which the trademark owner enjoys protection of the right deriving from its trademark (except priorities or other specific legal situations). The registration, however, which represents successfully finalizing the examination proceedings, is the moment that consolidates the provisional trademark rights acquired through filing the trademark, and represents the final moment of the registration before the office.

However, even if the singular public act of use is not constituent of rights, using a trademark or, on the other side, refraining from use, have significant consequences both in the sense of acquiring protection for a trademark as well as in the sense of losing it.

One of the most important legal consequences of using a trademark is acquiring protection for unregistered trademarks by proving the well-known status thereof.

According to the Trademarks Law, the well-known trademark is defined as "a trademark that is widely known to the segment of the public concerned by the goods or services to which it applies, without being required either registration or use thereof in Romania for the trademark to be opposable"[14].

The Regulation for Implementing Law no. 84 / 1998 on Trademarks and Geographical Indications (hereafter referred to as The Trademarks Regulation) defines "the level of awareness of the well-known trademark as the extend to which the consumer public segment is aware of the existence of the trademark. The geographical area is defined as the area of knowledge on the Romanian territory of the well-known trademark"[15].

Given that well-known trademarks are protected without the need of registration thereof, we can affirm that protection of well-known trademarks is one of the exceptions through which the declarative system is still present in the Romanian legislation. There is, however, an essential difference between protection of well-known trademarks and a trademark protected in the first to use system. Thus, regarding the well-known trademark, the continuous use could be an essential element which leads to the acquirement of rights, by fulfilling the conditions imposed by the Trademarks Law or the Joint Recommendation Concerning Provisions on the Protection of Well Known Marks, adopted by the Assembly of the Paris Union for the Protection of Industrial Property and the General Assembly of the World Intellectual Property Organization. On the other hand, as we outlined above, in the case of the first to use system, continuing the trademark use has solely the purpose of consolidating the rights acquired through the first use.

It should also be mentioned that proving the well-known status of a mark, according to the Romanian legislation, does not represent a singular effort. In other words, the owner of a well-known trademark is held to prove the well-known status of its trademark with the occasion of each case, each conflict or matter where it is involved and such proof is deemed necessary. Even if once proven the well-known status with the occasion of the first conflict the subsequent demonstration already enjoy a solid basis, we should not lose sight of the fact that, once the following conflict will appear, the owner will have to demonstrate that the well-known status of its trademark was at least maintained. To this end, we consider the legal provisions in the Republic of Moldova interesting, where the owner of a trademark, with the occasion of a conflict that involves a presumably well-known trademark, has the possibility to file a request of acknowledgement of its well-known status with the Chișinău Court of Appeal[16]. In case the well-known trademark status is accepted, the trademark is entered into the Well-known Trademarks Register, being afterwards published in the Intellectual Property Official Bulletin[17]. We can therefore conclude that these provisions, beside a greater efficiency from the perspective of the owners of the well-known trademarks, which are held to prove the well-known status of their trademark with the occasion of the first rights conflict where they are involved, brings the regime of well-known trademarks closer to the attributive system. This way, the right of the first person who made proves for the first time of the intensive and serious use of that trademark on the territory of the Republic of Moldova is recognized, basically, through a registration.

Regarding this system established by the legislation in the Republic of Moldova, although it presents considerable advantages especially for practitioners, we believe that it is not fully in line with the market situation. Thus, the well-known status of a mark is a dynamic situation, fluctuating, to be assessed at various key moments of different procedures. Once a trademark is entered in such a register, the person that will have to make the effort to initiate actions for removing the trademark from the register in question is the counterpart which, for various reasons, may not wish to and assume such effort, although the opposed trademark meanwhile lost the well-known character.

The Romanian legislation also sets rights acquisitive legal effects for the use of a trademark in the case of filing for registration a trademark that is devoid of distinctive character, as a consequence of distinctiveness aquired through use. Article 5 para. (2) provides that "the provisions of paragraph (1), letters (b) - (d) shall not apply if, prior to the date of the application for registration of a mark and by reason of its use, the mark has acquired a distinctive character"[18]. More specifically, letters b)-d) of paragraph 1 formulate the following absolute grounds for which a mark is refused registration: the trademark is devoid of distinctive character, the trademark is composed exclusively of signs or indications which have become customary in the current language or in bona fide and established practices of the trade and the trademarks which consist exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, geographical origin or the time of production of the goods or of rendering of the service, or other characteristics of the goods or services.

Thus, this article provides protection to trademarks that, although after examination thereof are not considered sufficiently distinctive to be registered, due to their intensive use have acquired distinctiveness so that they can be registered. Distinctiveness must be proved before the date of filing of the refused trademark.

Moreover, the new Trademarks Directive brings completions in this respect. As regards the absolute grounds for refusal, the old directive provided that a trademark is accepted for registration, for trademarks devoid of distinctiveness, descriptive or generic, if before the filing date of the trademark application it has acquired distinctive character through use. Similarly, in case of a cancellation action, Member States had only the possibility (not the obligation) to provide that a trademark shall not be canceled if the acquired distinctiveness is proven before the date proceedings were initiated[19]. The current Directive, however, eliminated the optional nature, for Member States, regarding the adoption of this solution if in case of the cancellation action, as they are now obliged to provide for this possibility in the national legislations[20].

We believe, however, that both regulations (i.e. those concerning the protection of well-known trademarks and distinctiveness acquired through use) are based on the same principle, namely the protection acquired by a trademark due to its enhanced distinctness acquired through extensive use. Only the prerequisites differ: well-known trademarks are based on the premises that the trademark owner did not file a trademark application for registration of the sign as a trademark before the relevant office, while in the second case, a trademark could not be registered due to lack of inherent distinctiveness, usually established within the examination by means of a provisional refusal. Thus, both result in protection just like a registered trademark, or in its very registration, for a trademark which was not filed for registration or that would not otherwise have been registered, due to its outstanding distinctiveness acquired through use on the market.

Regarding the distinctiveness acquired through use, it is usually a requirement to be fulfilled in case of registration of trademarks consisting of colors or combinations of colors. On one hand, RoPTO's practice has shown that, generally, a color per se is not considered sufficiently distinctive to be registered as a trade mark. It is also considered to be against the interest of market participants that certain holders appropriate, only by means of a trademark application, monopoly over a particular color. Thus, by its decision of April 03, 2014, RoPTO's Board of Appeal rejected the appeal filed by the applicant a mark color (blue) for goods and services in Classes 29, 31 and 35. In this regard, the Board stated the following: "The Commission notes that, within the evidence filed by the appellee – applicant, with the purpose of acquiring distinctiveness through the use of the trademark consisting of the color blue Code Pantone Light Blue 072C, there is no written document – poll, market survey – which clearly show that the trademark applied for registration - blue square (...) - could be recognized by the average consumer as belonging to the applicant (...). In addition, all the evidence filed by the appellee - applicant (packages), is for trademarks that contain the blue color and other word and figurative elements, and not for trademarks or designs / packaging containing only the blue color per se"[21].

Another situation where the use of a trademark has a rights acquisitive effect is the extension of the protection of a trademark through demonstrating its reputation or renown. The legal provisions established after the republication of the Trademarks Law in 2010, on the one hand emerging from the old regulations regarding the well-known trademark and due to the need to harmonize the legislation on industrial property acquis communautaire read as follows: "registration of a trademark shall also be refused or, if registered, shall be susceptible of being cancelled if (...) the trademark is identical with or similar to an earlier trademark registered in Romania, within the meaning of the paragraph (2) and it is intended for registration or it is already registered for goods and services which are not similar to those for which the earlier trademark is registered, where the earlier trademark has a reputation in Romania and where, by the use of the subsequent trademark, unfair advantage would be taken of the distinctive character or the reputation of the earlier trademark or if such a use would be detrimental to the distinctive character or reputation of the earlier trademark"[22]. A similar provision is aimed at protecting European trademarks with reputation in Romania[23]. Without going into further details, we only emphasize that for trademarks with reputation, indeed, the longstanding and extensive use has the effect of extending protection of a trademark proprietor beyond the goods and / or services for which the trademark is protected. There are two essential additional conditions: the need that the trademark whose reputation is claimed to be registered and to demonstrate that use of the subsequent trademark is detrimental to the distinctive character of the trademark with reputation.

On the other hand, lack of the use may result both into revocation of the trademark rights of the owner and into the ineffectiveness of the opposability of a registered trademark.

For example, in opposition proceedings, the applicant of the contested trademark has the possibility to request the opponent to furnish proof the use of the opposed trademark for a continuous period of five years preceding the date of publication of the filed trademark, if the opposed trademark was registered for more than five years. The opponent has either the possibility to demonstrate the use of its trademark or to bring proof of the legitimate reasons that enabled him to use it[24]. If the opponent does not prove the use of its trademark, or the filed evidence is considered insufficient, the opposition will be rejected for those goods and / or services for which the proof of use has not been made. Thus, although the opposing trademarks' holder does not lose its exclusive rights with respect to those goods or services for the future, in that particular case will not be able to claim his rights.

Much more energetic to this end is filing, by any interested person, of a revocation action "if, within a continuous period of 5 years, as from the date of its entry in the Trademark Register, the trademark has not been put to genuine use on the territory of Romania in connection with the goods or services in respect of which it is registered or if such use has been suspended for a continuous period of 5 years, and there are no proper reasons for non-use"[25]. This legal provision has as purpose "cleaning the register" of the so-called "blocking trademarks"[26].

Regarding this legal provision, we make only a brief comment concerning the international registration of trademarks designating Romania. These trademarks are not entered into the National Trademark Register. Consequently, the interpretation of the date from which the calculation of the five year period after which the trademark becomes vulnerable for on-use is unclear from the perspective of this article. However, EUIPO case law has outlined the following solution, while arguing an appeal matter where proof of use for an international trademark designating Romania was required:

"Under article 5(2) of the Madrid Agreement, the Designated Offices have a period of 12 months after the entry of the mark in the International Register to issue a (provisional) refusal of protection. (...)Where (provisional) refusals have been issued (...), the registration proceedings will be considered as terminated only once the respective proceedings have been finally concluded and a final notice has been sent to WIPO by the Designated Office. Austria and Romania are among the Member States that use the 12 months deadline to issue a provisional refusal (...). The Office will on its own motion apply the one year deadline for international registrations governed by the Madrid Agreement.(...) It is for the parties to claim any date that is later than these dates". In this case, EUIPO considered that the date from which the 5-year period starts to run for the Romanian designation of the trademark is the publication date of the decision of grant in the WIPO Gazette[27].

One last point we want to emphasize regarding the consequences of using a trademark in the attributive system effect is to strengthen the rights to an already registered trademark, meaning that a trademark, although registered, may have difficulties in opposing the registration of other trademarks because of its weak distinctiveness. To this end, we take into consideration the Common Communication on the Common Practice of Relative Grounds of Refusal – Likelihood of Confusion (Impact of non-distinctive/weak components) issued by EUIPO on October 02, 2014. According to them, the coincidence of trademarks in a weakly distinctive element could be insufficient in the overall assessment of the likelihood of confusion between the trademarks[28]. Thus, it could be in the interest of the trademark holder to demonstrate the enhanced distinctiveness of its trademark or of the components of its trademarks, and this will be done through the evidence of use that it will be able to furnish.

In conclusion, we wish to underline a series of advantages and disadvantages of the attributive system, as they were identified by the doctrine:

Clearly, the main advantage is that a registered trademark confers a clear date from which the owner's trademark rights commence, thus providing a dose of certainty to legal relations. Also, third parties may have a relative image of the trademark rights valid in the market, by simply accessing the relevant registers. Therefore, such a system can create predictability regarding the possibility to register rights. The disadvantages are that the attributive system permits the registration of "blocking trademarks". Thus, a register may be crowded with registered trademarks which the holder does not intend to actually use, or with trademarks registered for more goods or services that are not actually used by the holder. Even if there is the remedy of the revocation action, it is not available for interested persons but only after a period of five years from the registration of the mark has passed (or even more if the proprietor of the blocking trademark fails to pay the publication and issuance of trademark certificate fees). Then, for the owners who use the trademark before registration thereof, the time elapsed between the time of putting the trademark on the market and filing the trademark application before the competent office may give the chance to bad faith third parties to file that trademark. For the remedy provided by law against those third parties, namely the cancellation action based on bad faith, it is not always easy to prove grounds[29].

Also, with reference to trademarks devoid of distinctiveness that enjoy protection only after demonstrating their distinctness acquired through use, it was noted that the temporal element can pose risks to the proprietor of those marks. If such a trademark is filed too early, it will be refused as devoid of distinctiveness and its holder will not have sufficient evidence to prove its distinctiveness acquired through use. In contrast, a long wait may present the risk that another trader who noticed the attractiveness of the trademark, files it on its behalf, or files a variation thereof, leaving the person who used the trademark for a long time with limited possibilities to take action against it (the evidence that is sufficient to demonstrate acquired distinctness may be insufficient to demonstrate the well-known status)[30].

We add to the above a further advantage of the attributive system, namely that an entry in a register provides a more clear picture of the scope of protection of a trademark, both with respect to the designated goods or services and with respect to the exact determination of the protected trademark. To this end, certain registers, including that of the RoPTO, also provide information about disclaimers filed with respect to certain components of the protected trademark. Lastly, there are registers, such as EUIPO's, which in the name of transparency, provide information regarding the whole history of the registration procedure of a trademark, including certain filed oppositions, their text, texts of the refusals, office actions, corresponding decisions and so on. On the other hand, with respect to the declarative system, we consider the dynamism of trade relations as a fundamental advantage. Even if the difficulty of enforceability is often cited as a drawback we are of the opinion that nothing prevents the holder to file an application with the purpose of assuring the publicity of its rights, without prejudice to the rights acquired rapidly as a result of use.

An advantage of the attributive system is the fact that the priority date, obtained by filing a trademark application in a Member State of the Paris Convention can be invoked within 6 months in any Member State of the Convention. In this regard, article 4 of the Paris Convention refers to the "filing" as a moment generating the priority period, and not to any other way of obtaining a trademark right[31]. The doctrine also noted that the priority issue is not characteristic for the declarative system[32].

We believe, however, that this opinion should be nuanced, in the sense that there is a situation where the use of a trademark is generating priority, namely by using it ("presentation of certain goods or services under the trademark") in an international exhibition as defined by the Convention on international exhibitions signed in Paris in 1928 and ratified by Romania in 1972. However, it is true that the date of introduction of a product in an exhibition cannot extend the priority date given by a filing in a Member State of the Convention[33]. Also, as we will show below, filing a trademark application is not incompatible with the declarative system. We therefore believe that the existence of a filing, whether or not generating a trademark right, is sufficient for claiming priority under the Paris Convention. Also, as we will show in more detail below, the Paris Convention refers only to the existence of a filing.

4. The declarative system – applicability in the Italian law

As mentioned above, in the declarative system, the right to a trademark belongs to the person that firstly used on the market a certain distinctive sign. Thus, obtaining protection for a trademark does not require the fulfillment of any formalities, be it an application, a statement or issuance of any title[34].

The doctrine states that in case of the declarative system the trademark registration procedure before the national office is not excluded. However, the trademark application has a declarative role, the filing being a means of making the right public, the application representing a public and certain date of taking the trademark in possession. Regarding the scope of protection, according to a part of the doctrine, it covers only the goods or services mentioned in the list covered by the application, and thus the application sets the limits of the protection, while another part believes that the protection extends by default to similar goods or services. Also, an application allows the holder to initiate criminal proceedings for infringement (until the filing the owner only had as available means of defense the civil action for damages, the trademark reproduction representing tort). Also, the application can be filed at the request of the assignee of a trademark appropriated by use, provided that it has been assigned from the first possessor[35].

Regarding the scope of protection, we believe that the assessment must be conducted primarily related to the goods and / or services for which the mark is actually used, and the filed application must be consistent with this reality. Otherwise, we may find ourselves in the situation of "bypassing" the declarative system, or in the presence of a mixt system.

In practice the question of the scope of protection was raised, especially in the case of complex marks. An application, having a declaratory value, provides protection for each component of the trademark? We believe that this issue should be dealt with on a case by case basis, taking into account the overall comparison of the trademarks in conflict. Also, another question is what happens if the application differs in some elements of that mark being the subject the first to use protection? In this case we also consider that an application should be considered linked to a mark which was previously used to the extent that the application does not differ in essentials elements compared to the latter, as it is appreciated, in contrast, in the attribute system, where it is established that a different trademark is an act of use of the registered trademark if it does not differ essentially from the registered trademark.

As regards infringement proceedings, the issue of the retroactivity of the right to file such action for acts that occurred before the application was raised. The greater part of the doctrine considers that infringement proceedings may be directed only against acts of imitation that occurred after the time of filing the application, until then the acts of imitation being only unlawful civil acts, being considered that from this point of view the application acquires attributive character[36].

Moreover, in the use priority system, the application creates an ownership presumption in the favor of the person that filed it. Thus, if a conflict arises between the first occupant of the trademark (through use) and the later occupant (through an application), trademark rights will be recognized to the first occupant to the extent the it would be able to reverse the presumption of ownership of the applicant, proving the conditions of obtaining protection through use. However, if this proof is not made, or there is no evidenced prior right obtained through use, this application will have attributive character, the subsequent acts of use not being opposable to the applicant[37].

However, even in the declarative system, registration of a trademark with the national office may also have attributive character in the situation where at the filing date there is no prior right acquired by another person through use. Thus, the acts of use, subsequent to the filing of such an application, may not be invoked against the holder of that application[38]. It is therefore noticed that the trademark right obtained through the use is independent to the application[39].

The doctrine has identified Italy as a jurisdiction that applies the declarative system of rights. Without wishing to dispute the classification of trademark protection systems accepted by the majority doctrine, we believe that Italy has rather a system in which the use (in the absence of a prior application) and an application (in the absence of previous use) have quasi-identical legal consequences, which is a genuine mixt system in which both use priority and registration priority are accepted.

However, given that Italy is a continental jurisdiction that establishes many elements of the declarative system, we will exemplify the above through the Italian legislation in force, as follows:

Article 12 of the Industrial Property Code introduces the concept of "novelty", when establishes that the signs cannot be registered as trademarks if at the filing date "they are identical or similar to a sign known as a trademark or distinctive sign" for certain goods and / or services, if due to the identity or similarity between the trademarks and due to the identity or similarity between the goods and services there is a likelihood of confusion from the public, which may also include a likelihood of association. This first paragraph continues by stating that the marks are well-known (notorious) in the light of article 6 bis of the Paris Convention. Also, this article provides that a trademark that does not enjoy well-known status, or only a local reputation, does not cause lack of novelty, but a third party that has used the trademark earlier may continue to use that trademark, even in advertising purposes, within the limits of local circulation, despite that the later mark is registered. In those circumstances, the person who has used the trademark keeps the right to use it, but cannot oppose the earlier mark[40].

Analyzing the above, we find that a well-known trademark, in the Italian protection system, has the same legal consequences as in the Romanian law, namely may represent an obstacle to the registration of a subsequent trade mark. However, although simple use, which is not transformed into well-known status, does not confer any rights in the Romanian law, in the Italian law it is accepted that the one who used the trademark may keep his right to do so, in spite of a regitered mark, and even more, regulates the concept of local notoriety, which, again, is not regulated in the Romanian law, as there is no situation where a trademark holder may have rights to a mark only locally. However, the conclusion remains that in the Romanian law use cannot oppose registration unless it is sufficiently intense so that it translates into well-known status.

Moreover, according to the following paragraph, signs may not be registered as trademarks if they are identical or similar to a sign already known as a company name or as a sign used in commerce, if due to the identity or similarity of the signs and the identity or similarity of the commercial activity of that who used the mark and the goods and services for which the mark is filed, there is a likelihood of confusion for the public, which may include the likelihood of association. In this case also, the sign cannot be an obstacle to registration if it is not well-known or if it enjoys a simply local well-known status[41].

In the case of these signs also, the well-known status is the one that enables the enforceability against a further registration.

Lastly, article 25 of this law states that the grounds above also apply if the cancellation of a trademark is requested. Thus, if the same conditions are met, a used trademark can not only be opposed against trademark applications, but also when seeking the cancellation of a registered trademark[42].

Although the Industrial Property Code is not perhaps sufficiently convincing in shaping the declarative nature of the trademark protection system in Italy, the Italian Civil Code takes several additional steps in this direction. Thus, although article 2569 confers exclusive rights to the person who registers a trademark in accordance with the law provisions, article 2571 states that the one who holds an unregistered trademark is entitled to continue using the trademark, even after it was registered by a third person, but within the limits of its initial use[43]. This is the general rule under which the provisions described above from the Italian Industrial Property Code stipulated their detailed provision.

It is also noteworthy that the owner of an unregistered trademark, valid in Italy, has the possibility to successfully oppose the registration of a European trademark or to apply for cancellation (invalidation) of a European registration. Thus, the Council Regulation (EC) No 207/2009 of 26 February 2009 on the European Union trade mark (hereinafter referred to as "European Trademark Regulation") provides at article 8(4) that "upon opposition by the proprietor of a non-registered trade mark or of another sign used in the course of trade of more than mere local significance, the trade mark applied for shall not be registered where and to the extent that, pursuant to the Union legislation or the law of the Member State governing that sign rights to that sign were acquired prior to the date of application for registration of the EU trade mark, or the date of the priority claimed for the application for registration of the EU trade mark and that sign confers on its proprietor the right to prohibit the use of a subsequent trade mark"[44]. Article 53 confers the same rights in case of invalidation of a European trademark[45].

[45] Art. 53 para. 1 letter c) of the Council Regulation (EC) No 207/2009 of 26 February 2009 on the European Union trade mark published in the OJ L 78 of March 24, 2009.

In other words, the European trademark Regulation allows that national unregistered trademarks are opposed European trademark applications in the conditions determined by the national law in the jurisdiction where they valid. One of the decisions of reference regarding the applicability of this legal provision, referring to opposing an unregistered Italian trademark is the decision of the Court of Justice of the European Union in Case C-263 / 09P "Elio Fiorucci", whereby it is outlined that the person requesting cancellation of a mark by invoking a prior right protected according to the national law is required to provide EUIPO not only information and clarification on the circumstances leading to the conclusion that his right is protected, but also to offer information on the content of the legal provisions according to which his rights are protected[46].

The declarative system becomes therefore important even for holders of rights in jurisdictions applying the attributive system. For example, a Romanian holder of a European trademark may face an opposition filed by an Italian owner, for instance, of an unregistered trademark valid in this territory.

Moving forward, article 1298 of the Civil Code also offers to the person that is the owner of an unregistered sign the possibility to defend its right through the unfair competition action. This article confers protection to the owner of some distinctive signs legitimately used, without making any distinction whether they are registered or not[47].

Regarding the advantages and disadvantages of the declarative system, the doctrine has identified that, in the case of the first to use system, the use by another trader of an occupied sign held is presumed to be of bad faith. Or, as correctly pointed out, a presumption of bad faith is incompatible with the general principles of many law systems, including the Romanian system. Bad faith is a subjective element that must be proved. A trader can use a trademark occupied by another simply by not knowing it is owned by another party, through ignorance, and we agree that no one could presume that a trader knows absolutely all the marks that appeared on the market[48]. Thus, as correctly emphasized, "the development of the industry and trade and use on a larger and larger scale of trademarks made this presumption of bad faith for acquiring the trademark rights through use priority to meet reality increasingly less"[49].

The owner of a trademark acquired through use has, however, a number of advantages. As mentioned above, it can be transmitted, even if there is no trademark application filed for that mark. We believe that such a possibility provides dynamism to the market. However, as we mentioned, occupation through use assumes two facts, the objective fact of using, and the subjective intention of appropriation. Could therefore an assignment of an unregistered trademark be challenged, as lacking object, by the interested person(s), if disputed that the initial use did not fulfill the conditions under the law provisions? Does the assignor have, in such a scenario, the obligation to guarantee the existence of the object of the contract? In the registration priority system, the existence of the trademark in registers is clear evidence of the existence of the object.

Also, the owner of a trademark acquired through use will have the possibility of filing an application[50], without its previous use being opposable, as determining lack of novelty (solution that we find normal). Thus, once appropriated through use, a trademark is more likely to be formally accepted to registration, which could be useful for the holder, for example, to further register the trademark on the international route or to enjoy priority under the Paris Convention.

Also in the context of the use priority the question of the admissibility of the trademark right acquisition by acquisitive prescription was raised. It was correctly concluded, however, that this institution is not applicable to the trademark law, since trademarks are intangible assets, while the acquisitive prescription is applicable to tangible assets, which finds itself in the possession of one owner (as opposed to an incorporeal good, which could be used simultaneously by multiple persons)[51].

5. The mixt systems

We have already shown that mixt systems are those that combine both features of the attributive system and the declarative system, as legal effects are granted both to the factual existence of the trademark and to the act of trademark registration.

Such a system is the delayed attributive system, applicable, according to the doctrine, to the United Kingdom system, according to which the declarative application turns, after a certain period of time, into definitive proof of the trademark right for the proprietor of the filed trademark.

Indeed, the national trademarks law (Trade Marks Act) offers an added importance to trademark use. For instance, article 32.3 states that within the trademark application the applicant must declare that the trademark is used by him or by third parties with his consent, or that he has a bona fide intention of using it[52]. This text is of great importance especially in conjunction with the legal provisions stating the refusal to register a trademark that was filed in bad faith (ground that can be basis for the cancellation of a trademark). Therefore, if an applicant did not have the bona fide intention to use the trademark for which protection was requested, its trademark may be refused or canceled. In this regard, it is interesting that one of the scenarios in which a trademark application was deemed to have been filed in bad faith is when the trademark has been applied for a much broader spectrum of goods and / or services, other than those for which the trademark may be used. However, the case law has considered that, even if an applicant did not have the intention to use the trademark for certain goods or services covered by the trademark application at the date of filing, but proves that he has taken its use into account afterwards, it can overcome an eventual appeal based on bad-faith[53]. We believe, therefore, that in such a system, the so-called "blocking marks" filed for all classes of goods and services are more vulnerable to being canceled than in a classical attributive system.

However, one of the most important consequences of the use of a trademark in the United Kingdom is the possibility of protecting unregistered trademarks via the "passing-off" action. This legal mechanism is born in the English jurisprudence, and involves three elements: firstly that a trademark has reputation or enjoys at least goodwill (hence thee passing-off does not represent a possibility for new trademarks or trademarks unused in the course of trade), the fact that the false representation of the trademark has occurred or is possible and, thirdly, that there is a risk of damage[54].

Also, in the Swiss law, considered representative for preliminary approval system, establishes in principle that the right to trademark is obtained by registration in the trademarks register[55]. Also, well-known unregistered trademarks are protected in Switzerland according to the Paris Convention[56]. The law also allows the person who has used a trademark, even if later it was registered by a third party, to continue to use it as it was used before the filing of the new trademark[57].

6. The approach of the new Directive and of international treaties

Regarding the European Union, within the recitals of Directive (EU) 2015/2436 of the European Parliament and of the Council of December 16, 2015 to approximate the laws of the Member States relating to trademarks (hereinafter referred to as "the Directive"), at paragraph 11 of the recitals, it is provided that "This Directive should not deprive the Member States of the right to continue to protect trademarks acquired through use but should take them into account only with regard to their relationship with trademarks acquired by registration"[58]. Consequently, even though the Directive does not suppress the right of Member States to continue to protect trademarks acquired through the first to use system, reaffirms the first to file system. Thus, the Member States of the European Union and of the European Economic Area, in virtue of this Directive, may provide for a mixt protection system at best.

The Directive also permits the protection of unregistered trademarks, to the extent that they are protected in the jurisdictions of the Member States where they are invoked. Specifically, the following relative grounds for refusal are set: "Any Member State may provide that a trade mark is not to be registered or, if registered, is liable to be declared invalid where, and to the extent that rights to a non-registered trade mark or to another sign used in the course of trade were acquired prior to the date of application for registration of the subsequent trade mark, or the date of the priority claimed for the application for registration of the subsequent trade mark, and that non-registered trade mark or other sign confers on its proprietor the right to prohibit the use of a subsequent trade mark"[59].

Moreover, especially related to the use of registered trademarks, the same recitals state that "a registered trade mark should only be protected in so far as it is actually used and a registered earlier trade mark should not enable its proprietor to oppose or invalidate a later trade mark if that proprietor has not put his trade mark to genuine use. Furthermore, Member States should provide that a trade mark may not be successfully invoked in infringement proceedings if it is established, as a result of a plea, that the trade mark could be revoked or, when the action is brought against a later right, could have been revoked at the time when the later right was acquired"[60]. Articles 16-19 and 44-47 of the Directive provide in detail the consequences of not using a trademark in the opposition proceedings, in the infringement action or when an invalidation action is in place.

We can thus conclude that the Directive imposes national legislations to adopt the system of acquiring rights through registration, also establishing, in balance, legal sanctions for failing to use them in order to avoid unjustified charging of registers with blocking trademarks or trademarks that are simply unused. However, the Directive allows Member States to offer acquisitive effects to the trademark use, even the possibility to enforce the rights acquired through their use, according to the national law, without the purpose of regulating these aspects in detail or a harmonization of the legislations of the Member States relating to rights acquired through use of a trademark.

The Paris Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property encourages the filing of trademark application in view of the possibility of claiming the conventional priority. Thus, the Convention does not allow for the possibility of claiming priority resulting from a right acquired through use, in the sense of obtaining protection in the declarative systems. However, the following two nuances should be considered: firstly, the Convention provides that "any person who has duly filed an application (...) of a trademark, in one of the countries of the Union, or his successor in title, shall enjoy, for the purpose of filing in the other countries, a right of priority during the periods hereinafter fixed"[61]. The nature of the application is described further: "Any filing that is equivalent to a regular national filing under the domestic legislation of any country of the Union or under bilateral or multilateral treaties concluded between countries of the Union shall be recognized as giving rise to the right of priority. By a regular national filing is meant any filing that is adequate to establish the date on which the application was filed in the country concerned, whatever may be the subsequent fate of the application"[62].

We believe, however, that this possibility does not necessarily refer to the member states that have established an attributive system, nor does it impose such a system to the member states of the Union. What is relevant in the applicability of the provisions relating to the conventional priority is the existence of an application, regardless whether it has an attributive or simply a declarative role. Therefore, one can say that the convention encourages the creation of national applications, but does not go so far as to impose an attributive system.

We also referred above to the exhibition priority. We believe, however, that such use is not of the nature of the use that confers legal protection in declarative systems, as it is merely a possibility provided by law to obtain effective protection from the date when the applicant actually used the sign in an exhihbition and intending to register it later. Moreover, this type of priority can only be claimed in the context of an attributive system in which protection is sought by filing an application with claiming this priority.

The remaining provisions contained in the Convention refer to the protection of registered trademarks, regulating legal situations such as use of the trademark in a form that differs from the form in which it was registered, the effects of not using a registered trademark as well as various absolute or relative grounds of refusal of registration of a trademark. However, the Convention makes no express reference and does not exclude the possibility of obtaining protection through use. We believe that this principle is clearly stated with respect to services marks under Art. 6sexies: "The countries of the Union undertake to protect service marks. They shall not be required to provide for the registration of such marks"[63].

It is also interesting to analyze the trademark protection system under the Madrid Agreement Concerning the International Registration of Marks and Protocol Relating to the Madrid Agreement Concerning the International Registration of Marks, adopted at Madrid on June 27, 1989.

At first glance, these international agreements would require at least a mixt system to the signatory states, since they lay the foundations of an international registration based on filing trademark applications and examination by the national offices. However, the Agreement provides that "from the date of the registration so effected at the International Bureau (...), the protection of the mark in each of the contracting countries concerned shall be the same as if the mark had been filed therein direct"[64]. Further, the Protocol retrieves identical provisions[65]. We interpret this provision as meaning that the application filed at national level will have either attributive or declarative value, depending on the protection system applied by the signatory State.

We also mention, without going into details, that the Singapore Treaty on the Law of Trademarks, from March 13-31, 2006, ratified by Romania through Law no. 360/2007 and the related regulations, and the Trademark Law Treaty, adopted at Geneva on October 27 1994, to which Romania adhered through the Law no. 4/1998 – Official Bulletin no. 10/1998 contain, among others, provisions relating to the registration procedure before the national offices.

The TRIPS Agreement contains provision regarding the registration of a trademark and use of [61] Art. 4 of the Convention on the Protection of Industrial Property of March 20, 1883, Paris, as revised and modified, ratified by Romania through Decree nr. 1.177/1968, published in the Official Gazette no. 1 of January 6, 1969 from Paris regarding the Protection of Industrial Property of March 20, 1883.

[62] Idem.

[64] Art. 4 para. (1) of the Madrid Agreement Concerning the International Registration of Marks, in the form revised at Stockholm at July 14, 1967, ratified by Romania through Decree no.1176 of December 28, 1968 – Official Bulletin no.1/06.01.1969.

[65] Art. 4 para. (1) letter a) of the Protocol Relating to the Madrid Agreement Concerning the International Registration of Marks adopted at Madrid on June 27, 1989, ratified by Romania through Law 5/1998 – Official Bulletin no.11/15.01.1998.

the mark in the context of its registration, without reference to the possibility of obtaining protection through the use and covers only the rights acquired by the owner through registration. It is also stipulated that this agreement does not prevent the signatory states to provide that protection may also be obtained through use[66].

Taking all the above into consideration, it is clear that the international agreements encourage the application of the attributive system and especially the filing of trademark applications, probably due to the increased legal security such a certain filing date provides. However, the treaties do not exclude that member states to provide for the possibility of obtaining protection through use, either implicitly or explicitly. However, such a possibility is rather discouraged, by not being regulated internationally and in some cases not even mentioned.

Conclusions

As can be seen from the above, "use" is a notion whose meaning must be interpreted according to the legal consequences are assigned thereof in different national legislations.

Thus, use of a trademark may be creating rights in the declarative systems, the further use thereof representing the consolidation of the acquired right. Also, in the attributive system, use has mainly the purpose of preserving the right acquired through registration, but can also be rights constitutive when intensive use of an unregistered trademark determines its well-known status.

In the doctrine was outlined, as an essential function of the use of a trademark, guaranteeing the identity of the origin of the goods or services bearing that trademark, by the end consumer, allowing him, without any likelihood of confusion, to distinguish those goods or services from those of other traders[67]. Thus, use is the one that allows the creation of the components of distinctiveness - product / service, trademark, consumer.

Also, closely linked to the notion of "using" are the notions of "non-use" and "effective use" of a trademark.

For example, the Trademarks Law considers actual use of a trademark "use of the trademark in a form that differs in certain respects from that of the registered trademark, but which does not impair its distinctive character"[68]. Consequently, the way a certain trademark is used is also analyzed, given that, due to certain limitations in practice (the trademark arrangement in promotional materials, on packaging, etc.), it can be used differently from the way it was registered.

Finally, it can be concluded that, irrespective of the protection system in question, nt alloeing unused trademarks is mainly essential, from an administrative standpoint to not overcrowd registers with trademarks that are not actually used, and economically for not preventing other market participants to use the mark if they wanted[69].

It is also interesting to analyze the value of the trademark application in each jurisdiction separately, which can have both attribute value or a simple right advertising value. In this context, it can also be concluded that the international treaties to which Romania is a party, although encourages the applicability of the attributive system and, in particular, filing trademark application at national level, does not prohibit the existence of a system where protection is given by use. However, such a possibility is not regulated in detail.

Regarding the different trademark protection systems, some authors consider that differentiating them is a rather theoretical concern, both the use and registration of a trademark playing different roles depending on the laws of each state[70].

Indeed, we believe that the use and the act of registration are indispensable to any trademark protection system, in different doses and with different legal consequences depending on the context of each jurisdiction separately. As a general trend, if indeed registration really has begun to play an increasingly prominent role in acquiring the trademark right, particularly due to the efforts to harmonize jurisdictions and due to international conventions that provide preference to the registration priority system, use starts to have an increasingly important role for the conservation of rights[71].

Thus, we believe that an increased attention should be given to a more detailed regulation of the possibility of obtaining rights through use, being a system closer to the commercial dynamism that characterizes contemporary society.

PROTECTION OF WORKS TITLES FROM THE PERSPECTIVE OF COPYRIGHT PROTECTION AND TRADEMARK PROTECTION

George-Mihai IRIMESCU[*]

Abstract

The main purpose of the paper is assessing the possibilities of protecting the titles of works.
One possibility is the protection by means of registered or unregistered trademarks. This route presents difficulties because of the distinctiveness perspective. In this sense, the European case-law has recently developed a constant practice and outlined a series of criteria that should be taken into consideration when examining a trademark consisting of a title.
Another possibility is protecting the title under the provisions of the copyright law. From this respect, the practice has not yet determined a constant practice. However, the dominant opinion is that the originality criterion should be taken into consideration when assessing the protection of a tile.
Finally, brief conclusion are made, including short remarks on the cumulative protection of titles, both as trademarks and under the copyright law.

Keywords: titles, copyright, originality, trademark, distinctiveness.

1. Introductory remarks

According to the explanatory dictionary of the Romanian language, the "title" is defined, among other definitions, as a "word or text placed at the beginning of a work or a distinct part of it, indicating summatically or suggestively its content". It is also defined as "the part written from the beginning of a movie that indicates the name of the film, the makers, and the studio that produced it[1]".

The title is, therefore, that word or group of words by which we refer to a work. It is that part of the work that will bear the reputation of the author, or, on the contrary, the burden of a negative reception. Which will remain in the author's record and will remain closely related to his name for posterity.

Although the title is, therefore, of great significance for the author of the work it is designing, as we will further see, its protection encounters real practical difficulties.

In this respect, at a practical level, there are two ways that can be taken into account for the protection of works, namely their protection as trademarks (registered or unregistered), and their protection through copyright law, which we will further detail.

2. Protection of titles as trademarks

Regarding the admisibility of protection as trademarks for titles, related to titles of publications (here we ae considering newspapers, magazines and books), the doctrine emphasizes that the old Romanian regulations contained an express provision through which the titles could be protected as trademarks, regardless of the protection they enjoyed from the standpoint of copyright. Subsequently, the doctrine considered that a distinction should be made between titles of works in general, including film titles, and titles of newspapers, magazines or collections, in the sense that only the latter may enjoy trademark protection. This vision was based on the fact that titles of such periodicals are meant to identify the origin of some commercial activities, materialized through press goods or services[2]. As we will further see, with respect to publications, collections or series, this is one of the lines followed by the European jurisprudence in the matter.

Furher, the main objections to the registration of titles of works as trademarks were identified by the doctrine. It has thus been emphasized that titles do not individualize a corporeal object, a merchandise, but an intangible work, namely the intellectual creation that bears that title. As counter-argument, it is argued that, although the work is intangible, it must not be forgotten that it enters the commercial circuit as bodily objects designed to individualize the form that the work takes[3]. However, we consider this counter argument as departing from the definition of the mark, in the sense that, although product individualisation is one of the roles of the mark, the title will not indicate its commercial origin. For example, considering that the commercial origin is the publishing house that put that book into circulation, the title will not determine it, and consumers will not make a direct link between the title and the marketer. In other words, the title will not meet the distinctiveness condition, even if it will be placed on a product with which the public is in contact. In this respect, different editions of a book may be published by different publishers, and so the title will not be able to determine the commercial origin of the product. We can, however, bring another counter-argument, in the sense that the incorporality of the product that bears the mark is not an argument in the sense of not the name as a trademark. A service, for example, although it i not corporal, could bear a trademark.

Another objection raised was the lack of independence of the title in relation to the work, an objection that was contradicted by the case-law in some matters. Also, if for isolated works the title is considered to reflect their content, for newspapers and magazines the solution was different[4]. Again, this solution was adopted by the European office. Regarding the independence of titles, obviously the title of a periodical is independent of its content, the title being constantly in relation to a dynamic content that changes from one issue to the other, which ultimately becomes the subject of copyright. Moreover, in the case of periodicals, in this context, it would be more appropriate to refer to the titles of individual articles than to those of publications. Regarding the independence of titles of works in general, since a title may be carried out by several adaptations of the work of different nature (that is, by derivative works different from the original work), we consider that the title has a certain degree of independence with respect to the work.

With regard to the evolution of the European case-law, although initially, much more generous and permissive with the registration of titles as trademarks, it has begun to crystallize over time a relatively constant practice on this issue. In this respect, we mention that in 2001 EUIPO (at that time OHIM) registered the European trademark THE LION KING no. 002048957 for goods and services in Classes 09 and 41 for which, if that mark had been filed at present, it may have been refused, in accordance with the practice developed over time[5].

Legal provisions considered relevant to the analysis of the registrability of titles as trademarks are contained in art. 7 para. (b) and (c) of the Trade Mark Regulation and reads as follows: The following shall not be registered: (b) trade marks which are devoid of any distinctive character; And (c) trade marks which consist exclusively of signs or indications which may serve, in trade, to designate the kind, quality, quantity, intended purpose, value, geographical origin or the time of production of the goods or of rendering of the service, or other characteristics of the goods or service[6].

The EUIPO Practice Guidelines, concerning the applicability of letter b), contains a special sub-chapter dedicated to book titles. Accordingly, "Trade marks consisting solely of a famous story or book title may be non-distinctive under Article 7(1)(b) in relation to goods and services which could have that story as their subject matter. The reason for this is that certain stories (or their titles) have become so long established and well known that they have 'entered into the language' and are incapable of being ascribed any meaning other than that of a particular story. For example 'Peter Pan' or 'Cinderella' or 'The Iliad' are perfectly capable of being distinctive trade marks for (e.g.) paint, clothing or pencils. However, they are incapable of performing a distinctive role in relation to (e.g.) books or films because consumers will simply think that these goods refer to the story of Peter Pan or Cinderella, this being the only meaning of the terms concerned"[7].

The Guidelines further emphasize that such objections should be presented in very limited cases, such as those in which the title in question is sufficiently well known to the relevant consumer and the mark attributed to certain goods / services may be perceived as referring first of all to a famous book story or title. The issuance of a decision on lack of distinctive character is more likely when it can be shown that several versions of the story have been published and / or there have been numerous television, theater and film adaptations available to a wide audience. Thus, depending on the nature of the wotk designated by the title in question which is filed as trademark, printed matter, films, recordings, plays and performances are goods or services with respect to which objections may be made[8].

As a consequence, the Office seeks to systematize the practice by following the two criteria: one relating to the reputation of that title and the second by the type of work it identifies in order to determine the goods or services for which the mark is not distinctive. However, as we shall see, these two criteria bear a high degree of subjectivity, so they need to be carefully considered on a case-by-case basis.

As far as point c) is concerned, the EUIPO Guidelines do not make a direct reference to possible objections risen to the protection of titles of works. However, as emphasized below, it is a ground invoked by the European Office in its refusals.

Thus, as stated above, Disney Enterprises has filed for registration the trademark THE JUNGLE BOOK for classes 3, 9, 14, 16, 18, 20, 21, 24, 25, 28, 29, 30, 32 and 41 of goods and services. On 16 January 2013, the Office issued a provisional refusal to the effect that the mark was refused for some of the goods and services in classes 09, 16 and 41, generally consisting of supports for audio-video materials, printed matter, or entertainment. The Office argued that "trade marks consisting solely of a famous story or book title may be non-distinctive under Article 7(1)(b) in relation to goods and services which could have that story as their subject matter". The Office also claims that certain stories or titles have "entered into language", so it is impossible to be given any meaning other than that of the story in question. He claimed, according to the EUIPO Guidelines, that the JUNGLE BOOK had numerous television, theater and movie adaptations available to a wide audience[9].

However, we consider that the proprietor of such a mark may "bypass" the lack of protection as a result of the lack of distinctiveness for those goods and services which may be subject to that work in the light of the provisions relating to the reputation of the trademark. Thus, if a trademark becomes known for certain adjacent goods, such as, for example, toys in class 28, and such a reputation would have been recognized by the law, it can also successfully oppose the use of its trademark for goods for which the trademark has been refused. Of course, it seems hard to believe that a certain trademark consisting of a title could become famous for complementary goods as long as they are well-known in connection with the work that it designates. In such a scenario, however, it would be interesting to see whether the lack of distinctiveness of the mark for these goods would be accepted as sufficient defense of the defendant. We believe that yes, since the reason for not registering distinctive signs is precisely to leave them to the free use of market participants.

Another conclusion to be drawn is that, in the case of titles, time does not flow in favor of the possibility of registering them as a trademark, as is the case for other marks, which can enhance their distinctiveness through long-term use, or even obtain greater distinctiveness by acquiring the well-known status or reputation. To the contrary, in the case of well-known titles, there is a risk of potential objections from the office before which the mark has been filed.

EUIPO's case-law has also shown that the range of goods for which a certain title may or may not be registered as trademark is flexible and needs to be analyzed on a case-by-case basis. Thus, without going into the details on the merits of the case, in accordance with the practice of the EUIPO's Board of Appeal, in a cancellation action for the mark PINOCCHIO, it held that that mark was not distinctive for various types of toys in Class 28[10]. The reasoning was probably the fact that a Pinocchio toy might be the character itself, which was a toy that came alive. Therefore, although these goods are generally not intrinsically linked to the subject of a particular work, in this case toys, dolls or other such goods were themselves part of the subject of the work.

Another conclusion to be drawn from EUIPO's case-law is the range of works that a title designates. We shall exemplify by the following quotation in the famous decision Dr. No: "However, in the present case, an examination of the documents submitted by the applicant shows that the signs Dr. No and Dr. NO do not indicate the commercial origin of the films, but rather their artistic origin. For the average consumer, the signs in question, affixed to the covers of the video cassettes or to the DVDs, help to distinguish that film from other films in the 'James Bond' series. The commercial origin of the film is indicated by other signs, such as '007' or 'James Bond', which are affixed to the covers of the video cassettes or to the DVDs, and which show that its commercial origin is the company producing the films in the 'James Bond' series. Moreover, even if the profits that the film Dr. No had generated within the Community are capable of showing the commercial success of the film in that territory, the fact remains that they cannot show that the signs in question are used as indicators of commercial origin[11]". The conclusion we can draw from this paragraph is as follows: Dr. No is able to identify a particular work, namely one of the short stories written by Ian Fleming and the first movie of the James Bond series. Therefore, there may normally be objections to its registration as a mark, insofar as the designated goods / services refer to the subject of the work. But James Bond, although it is the name of the protagonist, and is the title of a series, or a franchise, it can fulfill its trademark role and can indicate a commercial origin. Therefore, it can also be registered for such goods. And, in fact, there are European trademarks JAMES BOND registered for goods and services in classes 09, 16 and 41[12].

As regards the Romanian Office for Inventions and Trademarks, it registered in 2014 the trademark #Selfie application number M 2014 01028 for goods and services in classes 09, 16 and 41[13]. This is the title of a successful film among the Romanian consumers, being on the third place in the top of the Romanian films after 2010, one of the films that surpassed it, ranked first, being tits sequel[14]. In this context, can we say that RoPTO does not follow the practice established by the European office? Not necessarily. Thus, while it is true that the registered trade mark covers goods and services to which the European office considers a title lacks distinctive character (magnetic data carriers, entertainment), the movie was launched in May 2014, 3 months before the application date[15]. Thus, the reputation condition could not have been fulfilled.

Another conflict before RoPTO was between the YELLOW SUBMARINE trademark owned by Subafilms Limited and the YELLOW SUBMARINE trademark filed by a Romanian applicant. Subafilms Limited is a company created by the members of the well-known band Beatles to manage the rights for the name YELLOW SUBMARINE. In connection with this name, it should be mentioned that this was not only the well-known song of the band, but also the title of an animated film that had as protagonists members of the rock group.

As regards the earlier mark YELLOW SUBMARINE, as mentioned above, this is evidence that the Alicante Office was more permissive in admitting trademark registrations representing titles, this mark, filed in 1999, being registered for goods and services in classes 09, 16 or 41. The contested mark designates public catering and temporary accommodation services, covered by the earlier marks. Thus, the complementarity of services in class 43 with the goods and services covered by the earlier mark and the reputation of the earlier marks in the European Union were invoked. The Board of Appeal accepted the arguments of the applicant and abolished the decision to register the trade mark in question[16].

A similar solution, concerning the same earlier marks, was issued by EUIPO in 2007. Thus, the YELLOW SUBMARINE marks and their reputation were successfully invoked against the registration of a trademark application with the same verbal element filed for goods in class 31. In this case, the filed trademark was also rejected[17].

It should be noted, therefore, that the distinctiveness of the earlier marks has not been raised nor at national or European level. However, we are of the opinion that such a problem would have been difficult to be rised, since, once registered, the mark enjoys a presumption of distinctiveness, which the Office takes notice of and which may be disputed by the other party, argument which was not invoked.

Can a title be protected as an unregistered trademark? As regards Romania, although this is a jurisdiction conferring exclusive rights for a trademark generally through registration, the well-known mark is one of the exceptions provided by the Trademarks Law.

With regard to well-known trademarks, we consider in this context to be of particular relevance the doctrine of protection of well-known trademarks, in the sense that the acquisition of the trademark rights by proving the well-known status of a trademark has the same effect as its registration. In other words, a natural consequence of this is that a well known mark must fulfill the same conditions as a registered trademark, namely: to be licit, susceptible of being graphicaly represented, distinctive and available. In the absence of these conditions, the item may be percieved as a well known sign, but not a well known trademark[18].

Or, we believe that these considerations are the answers to the above question. Thus, even if a title has been well known, in the absence of distinctiveness for the goods / services for which it is well-known, it can not be relied on as a legally enforceable right.

We conclude that titles, as well-known trademarks, may be opposed, similar to trademarks, to goods and services for which they are distinctive (or to those similar to them).

3. Protection of titles throuogh the copyright law

As mentioned above, the main function of a title is to identify a particular work.

Regarding their protection from the perspective of the Copyright Law, the doctrine has underlined that the current regulation makes no express reference. As a consequence, the titles are neither excluded from protection, nor do they automatically enjoy protection as a part of the work. It is therefore clear from the general provisions that "the titles of works, in order to enjoy the protection of copyright, must satisfy the general requirement of originality"[19].

In this respect, we refer to the legal provisions that determine the subject of the copyright as follows: "The original works of intellectual creation in the literary, artistic or scientific field are the object of copyright, irespective of the way of creation, the way or the form of expression and regardless of their value and destination (...)[20]". At least at a theoretical level, titles fall within this definition, being indisputably an intellectual creation of their author, who may or may not fulfill the condition of originality.

As far as the national case-law is concerned, there have not been many decisions defining a route for determining whether the title of a work is protected by copyright or not. The doctrine, however, cites a fragment of one of the few decisions that have approached - even incidentally - this problem, which noted that "because copyright extends to essential parts of the work, the title of the novel (n Shogun) is part of copyright protection"[21].

This perspective offered by this decision can offer an interesting solution to the protection of titles through copyright, but we believe that it should be redrafted, on the one hand, and correlated with the condition of originality, on the other hand, as it was also emphasized in the relevant doctrine.

Thus, with regard to the first aspect, we think it is preferable for the title to be considered a part of the work that is the subject of copyright. "Extending", as it was called in that decision, implies a preexisting right which, as a result of the law or other act or legal act, is "extended" to this extrinsic element - the title. Or, we believe that the title can only be considered a part of the work that is the subject of copyright.

The next step is to answer the following question: to what extent taking over a title is coptright infringement? In this sense, we consider that, relative to any part of the work, its takeover can not be imputed if the fragment is not itself characterized by originality. And if, in terms of a fragment of a work, the originality can be given by the construction of phrases or by a certain combination of words, with respect to titles, consisting even o one word, we think that the requisition of their originality requirement should be greater in order not to reach the unnatural situation where a certain term is thus monopolized. We therefore do not agree that protection should be extended automatically to any title.

We also want to emphasize that notoriety should not be confused with originality. "The Great Dictator" is undoubtedly one of the most well-known films in Charlie Chaplin's film and worlds cinema. Can it be considered an original title?

In the doctrine, some interesting considerations have been signaled regarding the proof of the originality of a work. Thus, the cited author points out that in Romania, unlike in France, for instance, the courts accept a presumption of originality in favor of the copyright claimant, the contrary proof being the burden of the party to whom that right is opposed. It is, in our opinion, reasonaly empahsised, that such an approach is not in the spirit of regulations in the field of intellectual property protection, since if the applicant himself does not prove the originality, in fact, he does not prove the validity of the opposed right. This approach would create even more practical difficulties in the situation where the person who should prove his / her right is a defendant, given that, according to the regulations in the matter, the plaintif is required to prove his / her claims. In such a situation, the defendant would be protected by a simple presumption, which should, in turn, be overturned by the applicant[22].

The older doctrine has drawn a still valid practice, as we will show through the decisions that we will further analyze. Thus, the legislative provisions of the GDR in 1987 are highlighted, which, although perhaps they are no longer up to date, are interesting in the sense that they describe the comment on the Shogun decision above: "copyright extends to the work in its entirety, to its parts and to the title, to the extent that it has an individual creative character"[23]. Or, we consider the "individual creative character" the most appropriate definition of the originality of the title in the context of the protection under the provisions of copyright.

The above-mentioned paper also makes a commentary on the French case-law, which, while adopting the originality solution, is not unanimous, and the French courts appear to be reluctant to recognize the original character of the titles. Also, as a general conclusion, it is noted that the general tendency for periodic titles is to be protected under the trademark regime, the German doctrine being more leaning towards making a distinction between titles of works and publications[24]. We find it natural, since they designate rather the commercial origin of the product (the newspaper), regardless of the varying content of each issue.

As regards the State Office for Inventions and Trademarks, the few available decisions seem to have adopted a filter of originality to determine the opposability of a copyright protected title. Thus, in a decision in 2009, he stated that "although Law no. 8/1996 does not expressly provide for the titles of the works as making the object of protection, since the phrase "CU LĂUTARII DUPĂ MINE" is original and was created and registered in the Register entitled "Declaration's Bulletin" by the composer Ion Vasilescu in 1939, the Commission finds that the provisions of Rule 15 2 letter f) of GD 833/1998 are applicable". Also in this decision are cited the doctrinal claims according to which the originality of the title should be appreciated independently of the rest of the work. Also, the originality in this decision is described by the fact that "from the evidence submitted to the case by the intimate opponent, the phrase "CU LĂUTARII DUPĂ MINE" is identified with the name of the composer Ion Vasilescu[25]". Or, we believe that this phrase perhaps defines in the best manner the concept of originality with regard to a title.

As the relevant case-law shows, the Alicante Office, in its turn, examines the originality of the titles in order to determine whether a particular title is opposable as copyright. According to the EUIPO Guidelines, for a copyright to be enforceable in a cancellation action, it is the complainant's duty to show the applicable national legislation in force and to argue why the alleged copyright in that Member State could be successfully opposed[26].

Thus, an applicant of Swedish origin, in a cancellation action before EUIPO, has invoked, among its rights, the copyright in the publication title on the name LEGALLY YOURS. In this case, the plaintif cited the relevant provisions of the Swedish legislation and provided minimal explanations regarding their incidence. With regard to these claims, the Commission noted that "it can be said that Swedish copyright law requires the subject of a copyright to be a product of mental labour which indicates a certain degree of "independence and originality". However, the Cancellation Division points out that the applicant has not shown that the sign "LEGALLY YOURS" would suffice to fulfil these requirements. It is not shown that a two-word title of a magazine would constitute a "work" under Swedish copyright law. It must also be noted that one of the words of the title is "LEGALLY", which is not particularly original in relation to a magazine targeted at the legal industry, and might not, therefore, achieve the degree of originality required under Swedish copyright law". Finally, the Board underlines that the applicant has not sufficiently argued that the title of a literary or artistic work hinders the registration of a subsequent mark under Swedish law[27].

Conclusions

Taking the above into consideration, we can conclude that, at least at the theoretical level, the titles could be protected both as trademarks as well as through the law on copyright.

However, the reigstration of titles as trademarks for goods or services that are directly related to the work may raise the issues of distinctiveness. Thus, a trademark may be refused for such goods or services, or if it is registered it may be cancelled. We also note that in this case the acquisition of reputation by a title makes it harder for it to be register ed, and does not facilitate the process, as it is not the case of a possible distinctiveness acquired on the market. It is therefore advisable to register the trademark consisting of a title as quickly as possible, if not prior to the release of the work, without, however, disregarding the risk that it could be subsequently canceled for certain products or services.

It should also be borne in mind that denominations of publications, series or franchises are easier to register, as they rather have the role of designating a commercial origin, not the name of a precise work.

As regards the protection of the title under the copyright law, the dominant opinion in practice and jurisprudence is directed towards the analyse of the title through the filter of originality.

Finally, can there be a cumulate protection between copyright and trademark protection? We consider that if a title succeeds simultaneously in fulfilling the condition of distinctiveness and that of originality, the law does not prevent the existence of cumullative protection for that name. In this respect, however, the practice raises the following question: can registration of a title as a mark be eluded by the provisions on the limited duration of copyright? If the answer is affirmative, can one say that such protection is against the general interest?

We believe that any response should be nuanced and take into account many factors, as highlighted in an article published by Thomson Reuters. The following points should be considered: in the first place, copyright protection and trademark protection have different purposes. Thus, copyright protects the author, while the trademark protects the public on the likelihood of confusion. Therefore, there can be no sign of equality between copyright protection and trademark protection, so that the latter is not a extension of the first. It must also be borne in mind that copyright protects the exploitation of a work, while the function of the mark is to identify the commercial origin. Thus, in terms of opposition, a copyright may oppose unauthorized reproduction of a work, while the mark is opposed to use as a trademark[28].

THE RESALE RIGHT

Ana-Maria MARINESCU*

Abstract

The article analyses one of the most important rights of the authors of original works of art namely: the resale right. It will be analyzed the subject matter of the resale right, the works of art to which the resale right relates, the rates applicable to the resale right, the persons entitled to receive royalties, the term of protection of the resale right, third-country nationals entitled to receive royalties and the right to obtain information. Also, the article will refer to the EU Directive in the field: Directive 2001/84/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 27 September 2001 on the resale right for the benefit of the author of an original work of art. It will be the subject of the article, also, the European Court of Justice jurisprudence related to the resale right, for example the judgment in the case C-518/08 (VEGAP vs. ADAGP), underlying that, in the light of the objectives pursued by Directive 2001/84, Member States may make their own legislative choice in determining the categories of persons capable of benefiting from the resale right after the death of the author of a work of art. One of parts of the article, will analyses the collective management for the resale right, especially: the terms of the collective management, forms of the collective management and examples. For all the above mentioned reasons, the article will refer to the main aspects of the resale right in a comprehensive manner and will analyses in a scientifically manner this very important right of the authors of original works of art.

1. Introduction

The resale right is one of the most important rights of authors of original works of art. The resale right was born in France in 1920 and since then it developed, currently being recognized by sixty national legislations[1]. In 2001, the European Commission recognizing the importance and the value of this right adopts the Directive 2001/84/EC on resale rights for the benefit of the authors of original works of art. The major objective of the Directive was to ensure the proper working of the modern and contemporary art market in the European Union[2] and to end the discrimination suffered by some artists resulting from where it their works are resold[3].

As was pointed out in the doctrine[4], the resale right was meant to repair an injustice done to young authors of original works of art, being at the beginning of their career, which are selling their woks with a low price and then becoming famous their works are sold with very high prices. From these resale profit only the assignees. This was the reason for which was regulated the resale right in order to compensate in an equitable manner the lost brought to the authors of original works of art and for them to benefit also from the successive resale of their works. For the above mentioned reasons, the resale right was termed in the doctrine[5] as a pecuniary right to a fair partition.

In favor of the resale right, was taken also into account the fact that the communication to the public and the reproduction rights, have an insignificant value as regards the original works of art

From this point of view, the resale right is becoming the most important economic right of the authors of original works of art and the most common way to exploit the original works of art.

Although the state of knowledge in the concerned field is high enough, the article aims to point the most important aspects regarding the resale right. In order to do this, the article will present the applicable statutory provisions as regards the object, the subject and the content of the resale right, the EU Directive on resale rights for the benefit of the authors of original works of art, will analyses the European Court of Justice jurisprudence related to the resale right, for example the judgment in the Case C-518/08 (VEGAP vs. ADAGP) and some aspects related to the collective management of the resale right.

Convention, but the Convention provides that the resale right is available only if legislation in the country to which the author belongs so permits. The right is therefore optional and subject to the rule of reciprocity.

In 2001, after barely surviving its perilous journey between the Commission, the European Parliament and the Council (and back again), the Resale Right Directive[6] was finally adopted[7].

The Directive promoted harmonization of the substantive conditions for the application of the resale right:

1. eligibility and the duration of protection;
2. the categories of works of art to which the resale right applies;
3. the scope of the acts to be covered i.e. all acts involving dealers in works of art;
4. the royalty rates applicable across defined price bands;
5. the maximum threshold for a minimum resale price attracting the right (€3,000);
6. provisions on third country nationals entitled to receive royalties.

Member States had to implement this Directive before 1 January 2006.

On the Report on the Implementation and Effect of the Resale Right Directive[8] dated 14.12.2011, the European Commission stated that 4 Member States did not implemented the Directive: Austria, Ireland, the Netherlands and the UK. These Member States enjoyed a transitional period to 1 January 2010 during which they could choose not to apply the resale right to the works of eligible deceased artists. These Member States, together with Malta, made use of this provision, and of the option to extend the derogation period for a further 2 years. This derogation ended on 1 January 2012, at which point the Directive was fully implemented in all Member States.

The subject matter of the resale right[9] - the author of an original work of art will benefit of the resale right, defined as an inalienable right, which cannot be waived, even in advance, to receive a royalty based on the sale price obtained for any resale of the work, subsequent to the first transfer of the work by the author.

The resale right will apply to all acts of resale involving as sellers, buyers or intermediaries art market professionals, such as salesrooms, art galleries and, in general, any dealers in works of art.

From the above mentioned aspects, result the characteristics of the resale right: inalienable and it cannot be waived. These characteristics transform the resale right in a unique[10] economic right of the authors, because all the economic rights of the authors can be transferred or renounced.

Also, the unique characteristics of the resale right result from the fact that is not a right to authorize or to prohibit the use of the work, but a possibility to receive a royalty based on the sale price obtained for any resale of the work, subsequent to the first transfer of the work by the author.

The debtors of the resale right are the sellers, buyers or intermediaries art market professionals, such as salesrooms, art galleries and, in general, any dealers in works of art. So, the debtor of the correlative obligation of the author resale right is, in all the cases, the seller[11].

The works of art to which the resale right relates[12] are the original works of graphic or plastic art such as pictures, collages, paintings, drawings, engravings, prints, lithographs, sculptures, tapestries, ceramics, glassware and photographs, provided they are made by the artist himself or are copies considered to be original works of art. Results that are covered by the resale right the original works of art and the copies considered to be original works of art. In order to comply with the Directive, the copies of works of art have to fulfill the following conditions: have been made in limited numbers by the artist himself or under his authority and have been numbered, signed or otherwise duly authorized by the artist.

Therefore, the works of art to which the resale right relates are the ones done personally by the author and the ones done with its authorization, for example by heirs or third parties.

The Directive sets a minimum sale price from which the sales shall be subject to resale right. This minimum sale price may not under any circumstances exceed EUR 3 000[13].

One of the most interesting aspects of the Directive refers to the rates applied to the selling price. In the case of the minimum sale price, the rate may not be lower than 4 %[14]. The total amount of the royalty may not exceed EUR 12.500.

The Directive sets down the term of protection provided in the Council Directive 93/98/EEC of 29 October 1993 harmonizing the term of protection of copyright and certain related rights[15] and the Berne Convention[16]: the life of the author and for 70 years after his death, irrespective of the date when the work is lawfully made available to the public.

The resale right affects directly only trade in Contemporary and Modern fine art i.e. works by EU living artists, or by EU artists deceased within 70 years of sale.

The Directive allowed Member States to provide for compulsory or optional collective management of the resale right royalty[17]. While the majority of Member States provides for obligatory collective management of the resale right, a significant number opted for optional collective management. Beyond this, the Directive is silent on the implementation and administration of the right. There are significant divergences in the national systems resulting in differences in terms of ease and cost of administration, both for art market professionals and collecting societies administering the resale right.

The collective management organizations that are administering the resale right in Europe are: Bildrecht[18] (Austria), SABAM[19] (Belgium), SOFAM[20] (Belgium), GESTOR[21] (Czech Republic), COPYDAN[22] (Denmark), EAU[23] (Estonia), KUVASTO[24] (Finland), ADAGP[25] (France), La Saif[26] (France), Bild-Kunst[27] (Germany), FOEBUS[28] (Greece)[29], IVARO[30] (Ireland), Myndstef[31] (Island) SIAE[32] (Italy), AKKA-LAA[33] (Latvia), LATGA[34] (Lithuania), PICTORIGHT[35] (Netherlands), BONO[36] (Norway), SPAUTORES[37] (Portugal), LITA[38] (Slovakia), VEGAP[39] (Spain), Bildupphovsratt[40] (Sweden), Prolitteris[41] (Switzerland) and DACS[42] (UK).

In Romania, the collective management organization which is administering the resale right is VISARTA[43].

In Romania, the Directive was fully implemented in Law no. 8/1996 on copyright and related rights, as amended and supplemented (hereinafter Law no. 8/1996), in the articles 21-23.

The art. 21 (1) of Law no. 8/1996 stipulates that the resale right is applying to original works of graphic or plastic art or of photographic works. From this point of view, the Law is limiting the works subject to the resale right only to works of graphic or plastic art or of photographic works. The Law is not enumerating like the Directive the works to which the resale right is applying. From this point of view, in the specialized literature[44] was mentioned that the enumeration from the Directive should had been implemented also in the Law no. 8/1996, because only to this works the resale right can be recognized.

The right is applying also to the copies of the original works of art or photographic works that have been made in a limited number by their author himself or with his consent[45]. As was stated also in the doctrine[46], the number of the copies that are considered original works of art, with the condition that the copies were made by the author, was not regulated either by the Directive or by the Law and is stipulated in the Fiscal Code[47]: 8 copies for tapestries and glassware and 30 copies for photos.

Regarding the rates applied to the selling price, the Law establishes the following[48]:

a) from EUR 300 to EUR 3,000 – 5%;

c) from EUR 50,000.01 to EUR 200,000 – 3%;
d) from EUR 200,000.01 to EUR 350,000 – 1%;
e) from EUR 350,000.01 to EUR 500,000 – 0.5%;
f) over EUR 500,000 – 0.25%.

These rates are fixed in the same manner like in the Directive.

Therefore the minimum reselling price is EUR 300. Also, the total amount of the royalty may not exceed EUR 12.500. The minimum sale price is justified by the fact that under this amount the costs for administering the resale right can be higher than the amount obtained by the author.

The seller have the following obligations:

- to convey to the author the information regarding the resale of the work, the price paid and the place where the wok is, in 2 months from the selling date.
- to withhold from the net selling price, without adding other fees and to pay to the author of the amount owed.

The article 21 (6) of the Law provides that the beneficiaries of the resale right or the representatives thereof may request, within 3 years as of the date of resale, to the persons subject matter of the resale right the necessary information in order to insure the payment of all owed amounts. This obligation is provided also in the art. 9 of the Directive.

Also, according to articles 22 and 23 of the Law, the owner or possessor of a work have the obligations:

- to allow the author access to it and place it at his disposal where necessary for the exercise of his copyright, provided that the owner or possessor's legitimate interests are not thereby prejudiced. The owner or possessor may in such a case claim a sufficient guarantee from the author for the security of the work, and also the insurance thereof for an amount representing the market value of the original, as well an adequate remuneration.
- not to destroy the work before having offered it to the author at the cost price of the material and where the return of the original is not possible, the owner shall allow the author to make a copy of the work in an appropriate manner.

A special regulation is established in the case of an architectural structure, for which the author shall have the right only to take photographs of the work and to request the return of reproductions of the projects[49]. This disposition of the Law is in accordance with the nature of the architectural work.

As stated in the doctrine[50], having in mind the frugifer nature of the resale right, it least all the life of the author and is the subject of being inherited for 70 years after the death of author, according to article 25 of Law no. 8/1996[51]. Accordingly, the resale is the subject of the legal inheritance for a period of 70 years and can be transferred also by testament[52].

In Romania, according with art. 123^1 (1) lit. c) Law no. 8/1996, the resale right is managed compulsory by the collective management organizations.

Regarding the resale right, the European Court of Justice had ruled only in 2 cases:

The first decisions of the European Court of Justice regarding the resale right was taken in the Case C-518/08 (VEGAP vs. ADAGP)[53].

The French legislation limits the beneficiaries of that resale right after the death of the artist to his heirs and excludes all legatees. The artist cannot therefore bequeath that right by will.

The painter Salvador Dalí died on 23 January 1989 in Spain, leaving five heirs at law, who were family members. In addition, by his will, Salvador Dalí established the Spanish State as sole legatee over his intellectual property rights. Those rights are administered by the Fundación Gala-Salvador Dalí, a foundation established under Spanish law, created in 1983 at the initiative of the painter himself.

In 1997 the Fundación Gala-Salvador Dalí granted to VEGAP, a Spanish society, an exclusive worldwide mandate to manage collectively and exercise copyright over the works of Salvador Dalí. VEGAP has, in addition, a contract with its French counterpart, ADAGP, which is responsible for the management of Salvador Dalí's copyright in France. Since then, ADAGP has collected amounts in respect of the exploitation of Salvador Dalí's works, which were transferred by VEGAP to the Fundación Gala Salvador Dalí, with the exception of those in respect of the resale right. Pursuant to French legislation, ADAGP paid the amounts in respect of the resale right directly to Salvador Dalí's heirs. Taking the view that, under Salvador Dalí's will and Spanish law, the royalties levied upon sales at auction of the artist's works in France should be paid to it, the Fundación Gala-Salvador Dalí and VEGAP summonsed ADAGP before

If there are no heirs, the exercise of these rights shall devolve upon the collective administration organization mandated by the author during his lifetime or, failing a mandate, to the collective administration organization with the largest membership in the area of creation concerned.

(2) The person who, after the copyright protection has expired, legally discloses for the first time a previously unpublished work to the public shall enjoy protection equivalent to that of the author's economic rights. the Tribunale de Grande Instance de Paris (Paris Regional Court) for payment of those royalties.

In the course of those proceedings, the French court referred to the Court of Justice the question whether Directive 2001/84 precludes a provision of national law which reserves the benefit of the resale right solely to the artist's heirs, to the exclusion of testamentary legatees.

The European Court of Justice Decision in the case C-518/08 (VEGAP vs. ADAGP) stated that art. 6 (1) of the Resale Right Directive[54] must be interpreted in the sense that is not opposing to a national disposition which reserve the benefit of the resale right only to the legal inheritors of the author, excluding the testamentary legatees[55].

For stating this Decision, the Court took into account on the one hand, the fact that the Directive is intended to assure a certain level of remuneration of authors and this purpose is not compromised by the devolution of the resale right to some legal subjects by excluding others after the death of the artist. On the other hand, although the EU legislator had in mind that legatees to benefit of the resale right after the death of the author, didn't considered that is advisable to interfere in the field of the inheritance national laws, leaving to each state the competence to define the categories of legatees. Results that in the light of the Directive the Member States have the liberty to establish the categories of persons which can benefit of the resale right after the death of author.

That being so, the Court explains however that it is for the referring court to take due account of all the relevant rules for the resolution of conflicts of laws of succession in order to determine which national law governs the succession of Salvador Dalí's resale right and, therefore, who is the actual successor to that right under that national law.

The second judgment, rendered by the European Court of Justice on 26 February 2015, regarding the resale right was taken in the Case C–41/14 (Christie's France SNC vs. Syndicat national des antiquaires)[56].

In the framework of two interesting and contradictory cases rendered by the Court of Appeal of Paris, the French Supreme Court referred a preliminary question to the European Court of Justice: can an auction house transfer the responsibility of paying the royalty from the seller to the buyer by contract?

Article 1(4) of Directive 2001/84/EC states that "The royalty shall be payable by the seller", and that Member States may provide that buyers or intermediary art market professionals, such as salesrooms, art galleries and, in general, any dealers in works of art "shall alone be liable or shall share liability with the seller for payment of the royalty".

The Court stated that "Article 1(4) of Directive 2001/84/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 27 September 2001 on the resale right for the benefit of the author of an original work of art must be interpreted as not precluding the person by whom the resale royalty is payable, designated as such by national law, whether that is the seller or an art market professional involved in the transaction, from agreeing with any other person, including the buyer, that other person will definitively bear, in whole or in part, the cost of the royalty, provided that a contractual arrangement of that kind does not affect the obligations and liability which the person by whom the royalty is payable has towards the author".

To explain its position, the European Court of Justice states that the objectives of this Directive are (1) to ensure that authors of graphic and plastic works of art share the economic success of their original works of art (para.15), and (2) to 'eliminate differences between laws which lead, inter alia, to unequal treatment between artists depending on where their works are sold' (para. 16). This is why Article 1(1) of the Directive provides, for the benefit of an author, a resale right, defined as an inalienable right (para. 17), which has to be actually paid to the author (para. 18). Nevertheless, Member States alone may determine the person who is responsible for payment of the royalty to the author (para. 19).

The European Court of Justice specifies that under Article 1(4) of the Directive, if a Member State decides to provide that the royalty is to be payable by a person other than the seller, it must select that person from among the professional persons referred to in Article 1(2), i.e. sellers, buyers or intermediaries (para. 24).

The European Court of Justice finally admits that its position 'may to some extent have a distorting effect on the functioning of the internal market', but that effect is only indirect, since it would arise as a result of contractual arrangements that are independent of the payment of the royalty to the author, who will in any event receive payment (para. 31).

For the above mentioned reasons, about the judgment was said that it will satisfy the auction houses and art dealers in Europe[57].

As comparative law, article L. 122-8 of the French Intellectual Property Code defines the resale right (droit de suite) as "a non-transferable right to participate in the proceeds of any sale of a work after the first sale by the artist or his/her beneficiaries, when [54] Article 6 Persons entitled to receive royalties.

1. The royalty provided for under Article 1 shall be payable to the author of the work and, subject to Article 8(2), after his death to those entitled under him/her.

2. Member States may provide for compulsory or optional collective management of the royalty provided for under Article 1.

an art market professional is involved as seller, buyer or broker".

According to article L. 122-8 of the French Intellectual Property Code the beneficiary of the resale right are the "creators of original graphic and plastic works who are citizens of a member state of the European Community or a country party to the agreement on the European economic area".

The resale right can also benefit to:

- artists who are not citizens of a member state of the European community or a country party to the agreement on the European economic area "when their national legislation grants this right to artists from the countries mentioned above and their beneficiaries and for the period during which they are allowed to exercise this right in their country" (principle of reciprocity);
- artists who are not citizens of a member state of the European community or a country party to the agreement on the European economic area "who, during their artistic career, have participated in French artistic life and have lived in France for at least five years, even if non-consecutive".

The resale right cannot be assigned (by the users and by the artists) and it cannot be bequeathed. On the death of the artist, it "continues in favour of his/her heirs and, for the beneficial title stipulated in article L. 123-6, his/her spouse, with the exclusion of all legatees and assigns, during the current calendar year and for the following 70 years".

The French Intellectual Property Code precisely defines the works to which the resale right might be applicable, namely:

- graphic and plastic works of art

The resale right is only applicable to graphic and plastic works of art.

Article R. 122-3 stipulates that this includes works "such as pictures, collages, paintings, drawings, engravings, prints, lithographs, sculptures, tapestries, ceramics, glassware, photographs and plastic creations on audiovisual and digital media".

The list is not limitative ("such as"): all graphic and plastic works of art – in particular design works and applied arts – are included.

- "original" works

The resale right is only due for "original" works. This is a specific criterion of originality, which is not the same as the one on which copyright protection is dependent.

As per article L. 122-8, original works are "the works created by the artist him/herself and the copies produced in a limited quantity by the artist him/herself or under his/her control".

Two categories of works must therefore be considered as original:

- Works created by the artist him/herself: painting done by the painter, furniture made in a single copy, marble sculpted by the artist, etc.
- Works made in a limited quantity by the artist him/herself or under his/her control: bronze sculptures, copies of photographs, limited edition designer items. Article R. 122-3 requires that such works are "numbered or signed or otherwise duly authorized by the artist".

This second point marks the boundary between copies produced "industrially", which can generate revenues on the basis of the reproduction right, and copies made in a limited number by the artist or under his/her control, which, as originals, have an increased valued on the art market: in such a case, the artist can perfectly legitimately participate in this enhancement in value thanks to this resale right.

The requirement of a "limited" number of copies does not mean that this number must be small: it simply means that the number of copies made must be finite. In this regard, the presence of numbering or a signature confirms this limited nature. But if other elements can demonstrate unequivocally that the artist has only authorized a limited number of copies, the works concerned will be eligible for the resale right.

The intellectual property code stipulates that the following in particular should be considered to be originals (article R. 122-3):

a) Original engravings, prints and lithographs produced in a limited quantity from one or more plates;
b) Copies of sculptures, limited to twelve, including numbered copies and artist's proofs;
c) Handmade tapestries and textile works of art, based on original models provided by the artist, limited to eight copies;
d) Enamelwork pieces made completely by hand and signed by the artist, limited to eight numbered copies and four artist's proofs;
e) Signed photographic works, limited to thirty copies, regardless of the format and medium;
f) Plastic creations on audiovisual or digital medium, limited to twelve copies."

For other types of works, three general criteria apply: the copy will be considered an original work if it has been either numbered, signed or duly authorized in another way by the artist.

The resale right only applies to sales in which "an art market professional is involved as seller, buyer or broker" (article L. 122-8 of the Intellectual Property Code); this includes galleries, auction houses, art dealers, etc.

The French Intellectual Property Code also requires that the sale "take place on French territory" or that it is "subject to value added tax" there[58].

However, certain sales are excluded from the scope of the resale right:

- Sales of works for a price under EUR 750 (article R. 122-5).
- The first transfer of the work (sale, gift) made by the artist or his/her beneficiaries (article L. 122-8).
- Resale within less than three years after the direct [58] Art. R. 122-2 French Intellectual Property Code.

purchase of the work from the artist, provided that the resale price does not exceed EUR 10,000.

The amount of the resale royalty is determined by applying a percentage to the sale price of the work excluding tax: price awarded by auction for public auctions, sale price received by seller in other cases[59].

It is calculated by applying a reducing schedule based on the amount for which the work is sold (article R. 122-6):

- 4% for the first tranche of the sale price up to EUR 50,000;
- 3% for the tranche of the sale price between EUR 50,000.01 and EUR 200,000;
- 1% for the tranche of the sale price between EUR 200,000.01 and EUR 350,000;
- 0.5% for the tranche of the sale price between EUR 350,000.01 and EUR 500,000;
- 0.25% for the tranche of the sale price over EUR 500,000.00.

The resale royalty is limited to EUR 12,500. Unfortunately for creators of visual arts, it is the only royalty to be limited.

As example[60], for a work sold for EUR 230,000, the resale royalty due will be EUR 6,800, i.e.:

- EUR 2,000 for the first tranche of the sale price (4% x EUR 50,000);
- EUR 4,500 for the second tranche (3% x EUR 150,000);
- EUR 300 for the third tranche (1% x EUR 3,000).

According to article L. 122-8 of the intellectual property code, "the resale royalty is payable by the seller".

However, the art professional involved in the sale is responsible for making the payment (if the sale takes place between two professionals, the seller will be responsible).

Art professionals must inform specially approved collecting societies of any sale on which the resale royalty is due[61].

Failure to declare sales or pay the resale royalty is punishable by the fine stipulated for third category offences[62].

3. Conclusions

Romanian legal regulations concerning the resale right are compliant with the ones provided in the Directive 2001/84/EC.

Accordingly to the detail analyze presented, the main conclusion that rises is that for creators of visual arts, the resale right is currently the most important right in economic terms.

THE LEGAL PROTECTION OF IDEAS

Viorel ROȘ[*]
Andreea LIVĂDARIU[]

Abstract

Ideas are purely abstract elements. They pre-exist to creations, are grounded on them, however no one in any field of creation does not have monopoly upon raw ideas. In order to prevent invoking some privative right upon them and, in order to make sure that they are remining no one's and to all in the same time, in order to prevent blocking the creative and research activity by their possible closeness, they are expressly excluded from protection. Romania makes an exception from this rule because by a law whose object of regulation is constituted by good conduct in scientific research, „introducing within your work texts, expressions, ideas, demonstrations, data, hypotheses, theories, results or scientific methods extracted from written works (...) of other authors without mentioning such fact and without indicating the original sources" constitutes plagiarism. And if you retrieve from your own works any idea, theory, or method without indicating such fact, it is called self-plagiarism.

Keywords: idea, protectable intellectual creations, unfair competition, exclusion from the protection, know-how.

1. The philosophical notion of idea

Text In philosophy, the idea is a fundamental concept. The etymology of the word is Greek originating from „eida" (eidos), which means „I've seen". Socrates[1] was the first philosopher conceived a theory of ideas (unfortunate idea, because they have found within reasons for sentencing him to death), theory which his disciple Plato[2] takes over and develops (however himself also was partially unsatisfied by it by the end of his life) and which Aristotle[3] the disciple of the second one has criticised it in his turn (it became Aristotle's habit to nit-pick his master all the time), without entirely disavowing it. However, we today know that Aristotle made a lot of mistakes himself, sometimes bad (i.e. Geocentrism theory, which is the worst of his mistakes), although his ideas have changed the European education for hundreds of years and still indebted till this day.

Socrates is the father of maieutic[4], the art of giving rise of ideas in the mind of people, a learning method that pursues bringing to light the thoughts and/or ideas by the means of reflexive dialog, of „midwifing ideas" that are already in there, like the child in the womb of his mother and do nothing else but to reborn following the persistent questioning and provoked answers. And we should underline that Socrates is the one who used the word „to midwife" with the meaning of bringing ideas to life, taking advantage of a family experience: his mother was a midwife, his father was a sculptor and by making a

[1] Socrates (470-399 BC.). His works have not been preserved, however the didactic theses of the latter are made known by his most important discipol, Plato, who stood by him for 8 years and also by Xenofon. Socrates was phisically ugly (outraging the Atheniens, who belived that inner beauty comes from phisical beauty), inteligent, kind, modest, patient, cheerful, pleasant, simpe, brave, with a profound respect for laws. „He did not write any single row, however it survived by the thoughts shared to others, by his way of life and not less by the way he died,to many authors of philosophical tomes scattered in the dust of the ages". D. Cosma, Socrates, Bruno, Galilei, Sport Turism Publishing, București, 1982, p. 11. His influence was so great that the ancient Greek philosophers are divided into Presocratic, the grata Socratics (Socrates, Plato, Aristotel) and post or small Socratic. Not few are those who compare its role and destiny with the ones of Jesus.

[2] Plato (427-347 BC.) was Socrate's pupil. He has established (toghether with Socrate and Aristotel) the basis of philosophy, politics and science. He had decisively influenced chrestian thinking through Saint Augustin, Nitzsche naming cristianity as being „Platoicism for the mases". Considered by Petre Țuțea the greatest thinker of Europe. Plato's theory of ideas is found in several of his works (Phaidon, the Republic, the Banquet and Phaidros).

[3] Aristotel (384-322 B.C.) was Plato's pupil and then teacher at his Academy, school to which he had been loial to as long as Plato lived. He left the Academuy after his death (previously naming, his nephew, Speusip, as ruler, for fear that Aristotle will not impose its own philosophy). Aristotel was Alexander the Great's teacher for seven years, his military skills and his triumf in wars is due also to the education received from Aristotle. Former pupil, becoming king, provided to its former teacher generous research funding, Aristotel becoming the first case in history of a scientist to whom research funding was provided. Of the 150 written books (145 by Diogenes Laertios) today only 47 are known. The most famous of his works is Metafizics (however the title was not given by Aristotel, but by Andronicus from Rhodos, the editor of all philosofer's works known today. The education in Europe was considered, especially in the 13th-17th centuries, as being aristotelic and is still tributary to the Aristotelian conception. The main University Centre of aristotelism was Padova University. The padovian Aristotelism was the curricular model of the first institutions of high education within Romanian Countries (Royal Academies in Bucharest and Iasi). Out of all great philosophers of Antiquity, for the Cristian Church the most dangerous was Aristotel, his ideea being the most compatible with Christian dogmas, his acceptance by Cristian Church was realised with the help of Thomas d`Aquino works, the theolog who is to Cristianity the same as Averoes is to muslims and Maimonide to Judaism.

[4] Maieutics is a method of reaching the truth. Maieutike, in Greek, is the skill to midwife children and Socrates considerd that he was "midwifing" ideas in order to show the people the truth. Socrates' technique represents a efficient modality to explore deeply ideeas and knoledge. The method cam be used sucessfully for learning, because it stimulated independent thinking and gives students the feeling of "property", discovering themselves what they learn by this method. Socrates spent the last days of his life having dialogs with friends that did not leave him, urging them to think for themselves and ask difficult but essential questions.

comparison between bringing into this world of a new-born with the help of a midwife and bringing to light ideas in people's minds, work to which he had become a master.

Socrates has priority also in formulating the theory of ideas and, by imitating the philosopher's typical attitude, namely being ironical benevolent (even with their judges), we might say that we are fortunate that as there was no law to establish a privative right upon it, Plato and Aristotle were able to freely take over, develop (Plato), heavily revise it (Aristotle) and give it back to the descendants for the good of philosophy and law science, in order to understand what is knowledge, to understand why awareness upon ignorance is the first step to evolution, why you need to know yourself[5], which are the highest virtues, what is reason and many more philosophy concepts. As many acted and still do, philosophers pursuing them to this day. However, we shall see that the priority of formulating his theory, that cannot be challenged, could be exactly the solid argument for acknowledgement of ideas moral protection theory in favour of Socrates and for the resolution according to which the refusal of legal protection of ideas is justified.

What would be the theory of ideas today if Socrates would have had an exclusive right upon it? What would be the theory of Socrates, without the contributions of Plato and Aristotle, and of so many other philosophers and philosophical currents that are based on the thinking of the great Socrates?! And what would they have used this theory for and so many others that they have formulated, if such theories were untouchable by virtue of their exclusive and perpetually recognized right!

Pursuant to the theory formulated by Socrates for the common individual the senses are the meaning to reach knowledge, the object of knowledge being the one perceptible to senses and especially to the sense of vision or such knowledge is limited or even useless. That is why, in his famous dialogues, he sought to free the minds of his interlocutors from the hindrances of logical thinking, the power of seduction of the sensible, knowledge through the senses so that they could penetrate the world of ideas, a world of essences and abstractions.

To truly see, to "see" ideas, concepts that are things of the spirit, you must have "the eyes of the mind", eyes that is nothing but reason, which has the quality of being the same in all people.

Reason is the one that allows us to make judgments and demonstrations, is what we should consult when looking for the good, the truth or the state of health of the mind or soul by virtue of which science is. The reason is joining spirits, unlike the senses and interests that divide people.

Socrates names such reason the voice of moral consciousness, the inner voice (his daemon), a voice that tells him what to do and what he does not do to the astonishment, distrust or hatred of those with whom he talks.

The non-conformist Socrates (walking barefoot with shabby clothes lacked any material means, though he could have earned much by teaching, was adored by many and hated by even more Athenians[6]), the lover of wisdom and self-knowledge, the seeker without rest of supreme virtues (good and truth), deplored those who believed that in order to become real, things must be palpable and said that people who see (only) with their eyes are, in fact, blind.

However, Socrates' theory that reality, the world of ideas, is not available to those who, being narrow minded, use only their senses to understand, his ironic dialogues[7], as well as the "discussions" he had with his daemon who questioned everything and who no one else besides him heard, not only failed to free the minds of everyone, but, on the contrary, hurt the pride of many who he made enemies of (among those being his three denouncers[8]), and caused the fury of the Athenians, adding to the (political, religious, and philosophical) reasons for which, misunderstood being, he ended up condemned to death by poisoning[9].

Sentence that executed it without crunching, refusing the support of friends who wanted to save him, not to create a precedent that would question the law. In fact, these key words of the philosopher: "the only thing I know is that I do not know anything" sounded less self-irony and more mockery in the ears of those who literally interpreted them, since they came from the one proclaimed by The Oracle of Delphi "the freest, the most righteous and the wisest of the people", few were those who have understood the profound meaning of the statement and its philosophy.

Among them, Cicero who said that Socrates "lowered the philosophy from heaven, placed it in the city and even in the houses of men", an appreciation that is more suggestive, more meaningful and more successful than that of modern philosophers, who considers it "the most important figure of the history of [5] Knowing yourself is the slogan of the Seven Wise Men of Greece. The motto is the creation of Thales of Milet, one of the seven.

[6] Sentenced to death (according to some sources 280/222, 280/278 after another) he refused to be rescued, and at his death theaters were closed in sign of national mourning, an exceptional measure for the time.

[7] Dialogues that he himself provoked, entering into dialogue anytime, anywhere, on any problem, with anyone no matter of their status and not few were those who, following the discussions with him, were leaving despaired, finding that they do not know anymore what they previously thought they knew, and this attitude, through which he managed to upset many, proved to be ultimately imprudent.

[8] Of these, one was also sentenced to death (Meletos, obscure poet) and the other two Lycon, an obscure orator and Anytos, a tanner who Socrates reproached that he did not educate his son and who remained in history and as one who in another process was acquitted because he bribed all the judges, were later punished to exile.

[9] Hated by the narrow-minded spirits, Socrates was accused with the crime of not recognizing the gods acknoledged by the city (atheism), introducing new divinities (his own daemon) and corrupting young people, being condemned to death by poisoning, after provoking once again the wrath of those who judged him, telling them that for the good he had done, he should be living on public expense.

Greek thinking and from which all the later trends of philosophy derive" (woody language!). As it is easy to see, the appreciation of Socrates is about the same but ... dressed in another form of expression.

The methodical Plato, starting from the opposition between the senses and reason, between the reality and the knowledge that Socrates has made, resumed the theory of ideas and developed it in several papers. Plato made a categorical distinction between the world (existence) and sensitive world (existence) intelligible. The first (sensitive existence) is the world that our senses offer us, the world that is accessible to knowledge through senses. The sensible world, says Plato, is the only one in which the narrow-minded and the uneducated[10] believe and have access to, is the world of bodily and natural phenomena, a changing, transient, continually moving and transforming world, a world of contradictions.

In opposition to the sensitive existence, the intelligible existence is accessible to rational type of knowledge, it is the metaphysical world of essential reality, the world of Ideas, a world invisible to our corporeal eyes. For Plato, only the world of ideas is true reality, this being the only immutable, eternal, constant. It is a world that does not exist as a result of our intelligence (which is just a window to this world), but is above it, a world that exists in the spirit of every human before his birth.

The sensible world (of beings, objects) is but a pale, imperfect copy of the perfect world of ideas, physical bodies having no reality unless they participate in ideas as prototypes. By the way of the senses we cannot reach the knowledge of the intelligible world of essences.

According to Plato, the term "idea" designates and represents the essence of things, which remains stable and permanent in reality. The idea is the model, the prototype, the primordial form of all beings and all the things in the world and of abstract concepts, among which the highest are the good, the virtue, the truth, the beautiful. Essence is what makes one thing to be what it is, is that something without which one thing cannot even be conceived. Ideas are characterized by the fact that they are simple, they exist in themselves and by themselves, they represent an eternal existence (like the immortal soul), universal, unchangeable (immutable) and universal.

For Aristotle, a disciple of Plato and with whom he was, not often, in disagreement, between the senses and reason there is a continuous relationship, a connection that never disappears, making the senses and reason inseparable. According to Aristotle, the act of knowledge starts with sensations, without them, reason being unable to reach an objective knowledge. But while senses cannot exceed the limits of perception, reason, overcomes perception, abstracts and formulates concepts.

And yet, Aristotle also speaks of imagination, which is independent of senses, opinions that are products of imagination, imagery provided by imagination, and which are appreciated by the intellect as true or false, as good or bad, and distinguish between immobile substances, known only by reason (divine realities, for example) and moving substances, which belong to the physical world and are perceptible by the senses.

Does Aristotle contradict Plato's theory of ideas? Yes and no! We have previously shown that Plato himself, in his old age, declared himself unsatisfied with his theory and subjected to revision (the Parmenides dialogue contains a critique of the theory of ideas, but not a waiver of it, because abandoning it seemed to him not only inadmissible, but also to create greater difficulties than accepting it). But even if Aristotle was almost ruthless with his master, whom he criticized whenever he thought he was wrong[11], he was not totally disagreeing with Plato as to the theory of ideas, and Plato's merit, that of addressing the problem, is above all criticism.

2. The concept of "idea" in law

Does our incursion in the history of philosophy of ideas help us with our approach? For pragmatists in the world we live in, it is hard to understand how a wise man like Socrates, who could have lived as a Sybarite if he had capitalized his knowledge into money, chose, as he himself said, "neither to take money to speak, nor to be silent if he does not take money". In their eyes, Socrates probably deserved his sentence to death (recent facts show: re-judged after 2400 years in Chicago and Athens, the jurors pronounced contradictory verdicts, the first guilty and innocence, the others[12]) and with him the theory of ideas developed by him should have died. Because the pragmatists among whom we live or the pragmatists who live among us (we do not know which are more) are two kinds: some for which intellectual ideas and creations should be free to use, and for this, intellectual property rights must be abrogated. The others are for whom

[10] To initiate is the action of bringing someone into the science of things they did not know. Initiates are those who have reached a level of evolution far superior to that of an ordinary man. Those whose shared and accumulated teachings allow them to enter the world of concepts concealed by the fine veil of the world of senses. They are the ones who distinguish between illusion and reality.

[11] Aristotle was only paraphrased by Ammonius Saccas who in his work "Aristotle's Life", said: "Amicus Palton, sed magis amica veritas". In fact, in his work "Nicomahic Ethics", Aristotle said: "Even if friendship and truth are our dear ones, it is proper to give preference to the truth". The idea is the same for them both: theory must be based on truth not on the authority of the formulator, but the form of expression is different.

[12] He was acquitted in an organized trial in Athens in 2012 by a court of 10 known judges from several countries. But in another trial in Chicago, a jury of 1,000 people found him guilty. The truth is, the judge said, that the punishment he would have applied was just a fine, but admitting that Socrates was an eccentric, influenced the young people of Athens and contradicted the gods who have memory and are grudge-bearing.

ideas and creations should be the object of holy property right!

What is the purpose for philosophers' discussions about ideas, since they make a theory of ideas without defining the idea or at least without defining it in the meaning of those who, by misconception, out of grudge, because it revealed an unpleasant truth about them and out of envy for his science, even sent to death one of the philosophers?

First of all, we find that the theory of ideas not only out survived the one who "midwifed it", but also that it was resumed and debated by others and that it is either warmly embraced by some or criticized by others (with respect and goodwill, the discussions between the philosophers being more temperate, and the disagreements between them acknowledged as it should in science and not just because they are generating new queries or arguments), or enriched in arguments by those who have been irremediably captivated by the philosopher who lived his life in poverty and died refusing to save himself in order to save a principle of law and a principle of life: the one of law supremacy and the one who says that to die for your ideas is the only way to be above them[13].

Then, because the theory of ideas, although it does not provide solutions to the delicate problem of the appropriate legal regime, helps to identify it. Because, despite the difficulties of understanding the theory of ideas, or the lack of interest in profoundness and even the criticisms formulated by Aristotle for it, this theory, except for being forever gained in philosophy, in the science of law, really offers an argument, extracted from what is essential in it, for refusing legal protection of ideas. Thus, its useful to law and to the solution adopted regarding their regime in all legal systems (except for the Romanian one), the idea that the ideas (the repetition is voluntary, it seems necessary) are part of the inner world of people, in opposition to the outside world of things perceived by our senses. That idea is an "image" that exists (only) in the mind of the one who is "midwifing" it, or of the one who resumes it or of those who resume it, believing in it. That idea is a mental representation without its own existence outside the mind of its believer (and outside of which it cannot exist), but which is not dependent on the mind of the one who thinks it.

That ideas are something above thoughts and are more than our thoughts[14]. That ideas have an objective-ontological status, while thoughts have subjective-psychological status. And we would add that, all ideas have the right to be contemplated by contemporaries and history (again Socratics are an example: remember the critique of Plato's theories often made by his disciple Aristotle), at least to know which are good and which can do the evil in front of which we must react to prevent it, when it is possible (remember, of course, that the idea of the pure race has begun the Holocaust).

And for this they must be free. Besides, we say, and we do it instinctively, that we have discovered an idea, not that we have formulated an idea! But, discovering is not one and the same thing as creating, because creating means doing, by intellectual activity, something that did not exist before, meaning to change reality in an original way.

Last but not least, because it is not the least important of the arguments, it must be said that all those who formulated, resumed, developed and give us the theory of ideas (and not only) could be a good example for us: Socratics dominate all philosophical systems. But they have not accused each other and they are not accused either nor the post-Socratics of having stolen the ideas of others, or of stealing one another's ideas. It is true, they did not escape of plagiarism accusations either, but it is even more true that the plagiarists of that time did not make the distinction between ideas and works.

In usual language of today, the term "idea" is used to designate what the mind conceives or what it may conceive, which is represented in spirit. But also, to generically designate different forms of logical knowledge, such as: general principles, abstract rules, conceptions, theses (broad, fundamental), theories, concepts or scientific discoveries; methods (accounting, education, etc.) or algorithms (based on which computer programs are written), thinking, how to see, opinions, suggestions, solutions, plans, projects, etc[15].

Encyclopaedic dictionaries identify over 12 meanings of the term, which are the domains in which the notion is used (philosophy, religion, medicine, psychology). In law in general and in intellectual property law in particular, the notion of idea, which has a special importance, is not far away from the philosophical one, the view that the idea is essence, is a spiritual representation of all things and beings, a representation of something, whether that something exists outside, or that it has a purely intellectual existence. It is different from thought and above thoughts. It is essence, imagination, symbol, vision, faith.

And it seems useful for our approach to remind that ideas, both in the science of law and in philosophy, are characterized by the fact that they are simple, that they exist in themselves and by themselves, that they exist in all of us and for all of us, that they are precursors to the mind who revealed them, that they by themselves do not change reality, that ideas represent an everlasting universal existence (like the immortal soul), unchangeable (immutable), or that no one can be stopped to "midwife" the ideas, nor to disclose them, because they are equally available to all people, and all the aforementioned make the ideas un-appropriable.

[13] It's a pity that Albert Camus said it before.
[14] Thoughts, says Nitzsche, are just the shadows of our sensations.
[15] The Explanatory Dictionary of Romanian Language.

When and how do ideas become work, protectable intellectual creations?

Ideas (we are talking about the good ones, of course) are the raw material of progress[16], the engine of development in all areas of human activity.

The bad ones, which have not been few, not a few times, have made our lives an inferno. Ideas are found in all areas of knowledge, scientific research, and in all genres of artistic creation. Ideas are everywhere and are just waiting to be discovered.

The Copyright Law does not define either the work or the idea. The lack of definitions is most likely a deliberate gap of the legislator who had deliberately refused to obey those who interpret it and apply it, by defining these complex notions, to certain constraints. It is just that to regulate by special law access to a special protection regime and with such significant consequences, given the rights conferred and the fact that this regime deviates a lot from the common law of goods, obligations, contracts and persons, without defining these notions and leave it to the judges, seems to us, nevertheless, a paradox. The Copyright Law offers, however, the elements by which the notion of work (not the one of idea) can be defined. We are talking about the legal references made to individuals who perform intellectual activity, to their intellectual creations, the legal reality of creation and intellectual activity. The law does not use the word "spirit" or derivative of it, but as it is synonymous (partly because it has other meanings, see DEX) with "intellectual", we will also use it to avoid some repetitions, but also because it seems to us in some expressions to be more suggestive.

The notions creation and individuals (creator) cannot be dissociated, because the creator cannot be but a natural person. Only the human being (alone or together with others, independently or in relation of dependence with an employer), as endowed with the power of observing, spying, working with theoretical concepts, understanding and judging, making nature work for the benefit of people, with artistic sense and power to create, can change the environment. Only the creator, physical person, can add to what is already in the world around him, using his mind, his hand and/or tools. This is obvious (at least in the current state of knowledge), and per a contrario interpretation makes it possible to define creation.

The legal entities have no creative capacity, but they can be intellectual property rights transferees and are among the most important and wealthiest in the world of patrimonial rights holders on creations of all kinds. It is true that in the case of collective works, through a legal fiction, they are original holders of rights to creations (made by their initiative, under their coordination and material support), however not even in these cases, legal persons cannot be the authors.

As regards the "creations" made by animals, the latter (the animals) are "goods", "things" in the sense of common law, objects of the right of property of man, and consequently cannot be "creators" in the sense of intellectual property rights. There are animals that "create" works and are the subject of transactions, but only the human intervention on them can transform these creations into protectable works. In the case of "creations" that are the consequence of natural phenomena such as boreal auras, soil erosion that changes landscape, the form of rocks or cliffs (see "Babele") etc. cannot be protected creations, because they lack what creation is about, the deliberate, conscious change for creative purpose. But it is no less true that such incidents could be the source of intellectual creations made by artists. A well-known Romanian lawyer, Virgil Popovici, a talented plastic artist, was transforming creatively roots of trees (obviously, there are many artists doing that), making exceptional works of them (but not only such works were created by late Virgil Popovici). Not even in the case of "creations" made by machines, things are not different: machines are things and they cannot "create spiritually". No less true is that some of them are the tools by which creators perform works. For example, the photography camera or the filming camera, but in these cases, what gives the outcome a creation status is the man's sufficiently important intervention to make out of a mechanical operation a work of art. In the case of computer-assisted works, it is obvious that human intervention, if any, will confer the outcome the status of protectable work. If there is no such human creative intervention, the outcome produced by the computer will not be protectable.

Human conscious activity, performed with the will to create, to add something new to what exists, and this is a necessary condition for us to find ourselves in front of a creation of the spirit, an intellectual creation. In a certain way, creative work still has the biblical meaning, in which "Creation" means the act by which God created the world, with space and time, from nothing, through His word and will.

Mutatis mutandis, for people, "to create" means to do something that did not exist before, and the word "creation" designates the action (of creation) and its outcome, namely the product of creative work, in its various forms of expression (literary works, artistic work, scientific, computer software, architectural works, plastic art, artistic photographs, inventions, utility models, designs, models etc.). God has left much to man to make life more enjoyable, lighter, safer.

Human activity, to be creative in the above-mentioned meaning, cannot be the fruit of hazard, of chance, even if it cannot be completely excluded from the creative process and sometimes plays a very important role. The case of penicillin discovered by Alexander Fleming in 1928 is a proof, but this is not the [16] Surely the same thing has been said by many others before us. We have identified among them for example, Bertie Charles Forbes (1880-1954), the founder of Forbes magasine, who said that "ideas are the raw material of progress". http://www.intelepciune.ro /citate_celebre_maxime_cugetari_despre_Idee_224.html only case in which the hazard played a decisive role, and we remind that even in the case of penicillin, from the discovery of the antibacterial properties of the blue mold and the idea that this could be useful for the treatment of certain illness until the achievement of the drug that saved millions of lives, the road was long: 12 years of research and testing were necessary for the discovery and the idea to materialize in a miraculous pharmaceutical product[17]. And it is obvious that what changed reality was the creative activity following the discovery of the antibacterial properties of blue mold, and not the discovery itself, which happened anyway by chance.

Spontaneous realization, the one lacking creative activity, lacking will to create and conscious creative process, cannot be considered as intellectual creation and cannot be protected. For example, simple conversations between people, no matter how intelligent they are, no matter how full of substance, dialogues in television shows on different themes (not those in which roles are interpreted from works, of course), the movements of athletes in an arena (not those of circus performers), not following a creative process, will not be protected. Some improvisations may, however, have the status of intellectual creation. For example, an artist on stage who forgets his role and starts to improvise. But in the case of the ones without discernment, the issue seems more delicate. If the person creates in moments of lucidity with the will to create, the outcome will be a protectable creation. If he created in moments when the discernment is lacking, it is difficult to admit that the result is a work of his spirit[18].

The same goes for those who, in various ways, bring to public knowledge, raw historical facts, information, data from any field, songs, customs, words used in various places, etc., if these people did not perform creative activity and not have done nothing but reveal what existed before their discovery, communicating to the public simple data and facts that do not alter reality by their intervention. Historical information provided to the public in specialized papers are also not protected, susceptible to protection being merely the personal way of expressing it (if any). For example, the fact that Mrs. Clara, the wife of Basarab I and mother of Vlaicu Vodă was a Catholic bigot and who wanted to Catholicize Wallachia, are historical facts. These were processed by Alexandru Davila in the play "Vlaicu Vodă" (1902), but also in many other historical works, such as Constantin Gane - "Past lives of ladies and gentlemen" (1941), which are truly intellectual creations and the theme can be taken by anyone who wants it and does it differently than others. Historical works are, of course, full of such data, and writers often process them in their own way of expressing, without branching the rights of historians.

We can, in relation to the above, define the protective intellectual creation (the work) as the product of the spiritual activity carried out with the will to achieve something that did not exist before, to modify the existing reality, the product of that activity from which a creation of spirit is born, in a more general sense, to include technical creations in its definition, an object upon which the creator is recognized with an intellectual property right. What is protected by the laws of intellectual property is the form of expression, the form in which the idea was put into the work, the form of original expression. The idea is put into value in an original creation (not through the idea or ideas underlying it) or in a new creation, useful and applicable in industry repeatedly and with the same result, but the idea itself is not protected. Form must exist and be perceptible to the senses. The idea does not! Form should not be mistaken, it should not be mistaken with the merits in the case of copyrighted creations. In the case of new and useful works in the industry, the form is of interest only to the extent that it helps the merits to be understood, clear, reproducible by the specialist without any creative activity.

Ideas...! In the activity of intellectual creation, ideas are the ones from which the works are born and give substance to the works, but our conception on the role of ideas in works and of the idea-work or work-idea dichotomy has evolved much in the last two centuries of intellectual property history. And I am reminding, the French Revolutionaries of 1791, for example, did not make the distinction that we are doing today, since the work and the idea were one and the same to them. This follows from the statement made on January 7, 1791, by Stanislas de Boufflers in his Report on the Law of Inventions: "If there is a real property for man, this is his thought; It is the least susceptible to alter, it is personal, it is independent, it precedes any transaction; Neither the tree that grows in the field is not so indisputable own by the owner of the land as the idea that is produced by the spirit of man and belongs to the author." Citing to the right value the contribution of the said revolutionary (which proved to be not exactly original[19]), we can only say that the distinction between ideas and works was natural and necessary, as well as the distinction between the work and the support the work is placed.

However, we hear lately, and more often, statements such as: "In such a work we have found no idea", or "the thesis X lacks any personal idea", or "the content of ideas of Y work is poor" etc., which means that in our mind, there is a close connection between the ideas underlying a work and its value. And yet, in [17] It was not until 1940 that the wonder medicine was obtained. In the experiment at that time, 50 mice were infested with deadly streptococci. Half of them were treated with penicillin and survived. The others died of septicemia.

[18] See Mihai Eminescu case.

[19] Pierre Recht said that "revolutionary legislation has only plagiarized the form and substance of Louis d'Hericourt memoirs' and the Parisian librarians' lawyers of 1778" (apod C. Colombet, op. Cit., P4). And A. Bertrand in Droit d 'auteur, troisième édition, Dalloz, 2010, p.8, “denounces” another rapporteur (Lakanal) to the reproductive right law adopted in 1793 to have been stolen from a certain Baudin.

copyright, the work is protected independently of its value[20]. It is not the same with the scientific and technical creations, in which the innovation contribution, which is objectively appreciated, is a condition of protection of creation, namely, the condition of release of the title. No less true is that valuable ideas generate valuable intellectual creations and, in the case of scientific works, the content of ideas is very important.

French theologian and writer (in English language), Ernest Dimnet, in a work written in 1928, "The Art of Thinking," the best-seller in his time, but almost forgotten today, said that "ideas are the roots of creation[21]. Why did not the theologian-writer go forward with his idea? It may not have Socrates's knowledge of "midwifing" an idea at the end, or perhaps because he was a theologian, he was not as free of mind as the one who had the daemon in it. Because if we were to continue Dimnet's idea, then we could compare the result of creation to a tree, whose roots do not reveal to our sight at all, although they are the ones that support it and give it the sap of which it rises and they are one and the same. Except that beyond the roots of the tree there is the soil, the minerals, the water, the sun, without which the seeds would not fructify, could not feed. In other words, and continuing with Dimnet's idea, we believe that it can be said and argued that at the origins of any creation the idea is only a part (very important), because to it adds culture, reading, experience, grace, gift, power to be creative, the inspiration, the hand of God placed above us and giving us all or... nothing. And all these (and also others) might be arguments to ask with more humbleness the recognition of a right, its content, its extent and its duration when we do. Whatever the state we ask of.

Since ideas are things of the spirit as well as works, since ideas are the origin of intellectual creation and give substance to them, because they are introduced into work, ideas are part of it and are their very essence, how we identify the idea and how do we distinguish between idea and work that incorporates it, the work on which is based on? Because the demarcation line is thin, sometimes even very difficult to spot. Ideas in themselves do not imply a transformation of what previously existed. Creation activity, starting from an idea or from several ideas, involves such a transformation, it is supposed to do something that did not exist before. It assumes a form of personal, original expression, different from any other before the same idea.

Ideas act differently in the various forms of intellectual creations performance, depending on the mode of processing, the way they are perceived, the capacity of the person who processes it or wants to transmit it, but this it is already a problem of expression, putting ideas into work. For example, in a certain way - original - the idea will be expressed by a composer or by a dramatic author, whose creations will be protected by copyright and, in a different way the same idea will be expressed by performer or singing performers whose performances of the work will be protected by copyright-related rights, which in principle can not infringe copyright. There is a difference between specific ideas of scientific works, also among those there are different ideas depending on the domain to which they belong to, and the ideas in artistic works.

In the case of literary works - and here we include the scientific works - the creation process involves several steps, without which it cannot exist: the idea (the essence, what is transmitted through the work, the profound meaning of the work), the composition (the concretisation of idea or ideas, chaining the ideas of the work, internal organization structure, the subject, the intrigue, the action, the narrative, the characters) and the external form (the way the author expresses his ideas, presents them to his audience). In the case of scientific works, the content of ideas is important, the way of organizing and explaining ideas.

In the case of plastic art, the idea takes the form of the image (the artist translates his ideas into images), while in the case of musical works, the idea takes the form of sounds.

For Constantin Brâncuși, for example, the idea behind the opera is vital: "All those who regard my sculptures as abstract are madmen. What they believe is abstract is all that can be more realistic, because the real does not mean the outer form of things, but the idea and essence of the phenomena. "

And he added: "I am neither surrealist nor baroque, nor cubist nor anything of this kind; I, with my new, come from something that is ancient ... ", suggesting, quite transparently, we believe, that ideas are not necessarily in him, that they do not belong to him, that they pre-exist and that he only gave them life in a personal form in his sculptures. The same Brâncuși another time said, telling how a bird entered his workshop and did not find the exit, hitting the window: "I do not create birds but flights" and in the same register, another famous sculptor, Henri Moore, said about him that "Brâncuşi was the one who gave our era the consciousness of pure form"[22].

We do not know if Brâncuşi read Socrates and Plato, but what he says it does look too similar with what the great Socratics said about the sensible world and the intelligible world, of what we see with our eyes and what we see with the eyes of the mind, about the essence of things.

[20] We do not agree entirely with the solution of Romanian legislator. How can there be "work" of no value?! In German law, for example, a minimum value is required. We even believe that the condition of a minimal value is implied, since we are talking about works that are, by definition, valuable.

[21] Ernest Dimnet (1866-1954), writer and French priest, established in the USA after the First World War, is the author of "The Art of Tinking", published in 1928 in the US and in 1930 in French ("L'Art de Penser"). However we must mention the author of the idea every time we say the same thing?! Quote is available on www.citation-celebre.com.

And if we think that Brâncuşi has freed the sculpture of the mechanical imitation of nature (the mimesis manifested in the plastic arts which was one of the reasons why Socrates and Plato were not at all friendly with the artists, considered by them as imitators), following the expression of the essence of things and the unity between the sensitive and the spiritual, his vision of the world of ideas resembles quite a lot with that of the Socratics. But if Brancusi did not study the parents of philosophy, it means that is true that the great spirits are still meeting somewhere sometime. We try to imagine a Brâncuşi in dialogue with Socrates[23] and Plato together! And we can now understand Valeriu Butulescu, who in the play "The Golden Bird" puts an interesting but not quite Orthodox line in Brancusi's mouth: "I make ideas from the matter, hitting the chisel! My ideas have a lot of weight. They have gender. Breathe". However, I remind that narrow-minded spirits (which, moreover, were also creators, intellectuals and Romanian academics) refused to accept the testament by which C. Brâncuşi left the Romanian State his workshop in Paris and 200 of his works (his sculptures having one of the highest market shares).

The idea of dressing bridges, trees, buildings or "decorating" hills with yellow umbrellas is simple and obviously does not involve creative effort. But putting it into work in a personal, original form is protected. A French artist of Bulgarian origin, Christo Javacheff, however more known in the US than in Europe, had the idea of wrapping in canvas a bridge in Paris (Pont Neuf).

Preparatory work lasted from 1976 until 1985 and cost 19 million French francs. The bridge (the oldest in Paris) as it was wrapped by him and which was presented to the public on September 22, 1985 (for 14 days) was an ephemeral artwork that transformed an architectural work into a work of art and is protected by copyright. It could not be photographed or filmed without his consent. One cannot decorate another bridge the same way without its consent. But his idea cannot be protected: anyone who wants to pack another bridge in a different way can do it without Christo's consent. Anyone who wants to decorate a bridge can do it without Christo's consent. He also packed the Reichstag building in Berlin, a field with yellow umbrellas, etc. A plastic artist of Tunisian origin, El Seed, after the Paris City Hall decided to cut off all the "locks of love" hanging on the Arts Bridge drawing the wrath of the Parisians, painted the bridge in graffiti, writing on its parapets in Arabic, stylized in pink colour, a quote from Balzac's Pere Goriot: "Paris is actually an ocean; You can measure it, but you will never know its depths."

No one can claim monopoly on any idea. Plastic artists will always be able to paint the blooming sunflower, even if Van Gogh wrote to a friend that "sunflower belongs to me in some way", they can paint iris, poppy fields, landscapes that have been painted before, models etc. without breaching anyone's rights. However, they cannot reproduce the paintings made by those before them! As anyone can write about love, about trying to get through guilty love, treason, war, without breaching the rights of Octav Dessila, Stendhal or Ernst Hemingway, etc.

Anyone can write a law paper in any field without violating the rights of those who have written on the same subject. Obviously, in all cases, the condition required to become a copyrighted work is the personal approach of the theme, the content of ideas that cannot be substantially different from that of the pre-existing works.

Free by definition, the idea becomes a protectable creation when the author puts it in its own way in its own words that represents it, in its lines and colours, in its own harmony of musical sounds, in the way of using the lights, in its personal form of expression which confers to creation what we call originality or, where appropriate, when the idea materializes in a new technical creation, susceptible to being put into practice, to be industrially reproduced with the same result (invention, drawing, model). This means that the originality conferred by the personal touch in the case of aesthetic creations, of expression and transformation of the idea into a new and useful creation in the industry for new and useful creations that makes the difference between the raw and unprotected idea and what outcomes from the idea processed in a new, personal, original or new and useful form: protectable creation! And even if the attachment of a work on a support is not a copyright protection condition, in the case of technical creations this attachment on the support is a condition for granting the protection title (patent or registration certificate). However, in both cases ideas are present and constitute the starting point for the achievement of any creation, whatever its genre.

The idea remains, however, outside of any protection, the rule being provided by the law of copyright by a rule from which its imperative nature is deduced. Thus, according to art. 9 of Law no. 8/1996, "The following can not benefit from the legal protection of copyright: a) ideas, theories, concepts, discoveries and inventions contained in a work, whatever the way of taking over, writing, explaining or expressing was(...) ". And if that express provision was missing, then we would deduce it from the rule formulated in art. 7 and 8 from the Law that indicate the form of expression and intellectual creative work as those that give the creations originality, a condition without which there can be no protectable work.

3. Reason of excluding idea from protection

The theory that ideas are free and cannot belong exclusively to anyone, so they can not be protected by [23] It is blind who sees only with the mind's eyes, Socrates said. My sculptures are even for the blind, Brâncuşi said.

intellectual property rights was formulated in the 19th century, at the end of the 18th century there were, as we have previously shown, confusions in the distinction between ideas and works. But even after 100 years since the intellectual property laws were adopted in France (in 1791-1793), even for the father of moral copyrights, the theory formulated by him in 1872, the distinction was missing. Thus, Andre Morillot has indeed argued to justify the theory of the personalist nature of copyright, and not with reference to the exclusion of ideas from protection, but the argument remains valid here also, that "being the owner of an idea means being a person and good, subject and object of the same right, the holder of a legal relationship whose two terms will be the same person, in a word, be your own owner, which is legally impossible. "

In the second half of the last century, this theory was developed by Professor Henri Desbois, his argument that "les idees sont de libre parcours" is considered a principle of copyright, in our laws the exclusion of ideas from protection is a settled legislative solution (Article 9 of Law No 8/1996). However, on Desbois' arguments, other authors have added over time their arguments in support of the same thesis, the exclusion of ideas from protection, and of course, others can be added. And we note that while the basic idea is that of excluding ideas from protection, the arguments and form of expression of this idea cannot be very different in all opinions formulated to support the thesis of exclusion from protection, the argument of society's interest being the most used.

Exclusion from the protection of ideas is a traditional principle in the law of intellectual property and in accordance with the interest of society.

1. Exclusion from the protection of ideas is a traditional principle in the law of intellectual property and in accordance with the interest of society. Henri Desbois[24] shows that ideas, even when touched by genius, are by their very nature and by their purpose free, and their protection would be contrary to their tradition and nature. Indeed, to recognize an exclusive right, a monopoly on an idea would be excessive, because such protection would lead to the recognition of an exclusive right over the creation fund protected by copyright. The monopoly on one or some ideas would paralyze the creative work, because it would mean that no one can process the idea in another form of expression, no one could do another work on the same subject, with the same message, for That it would be counterfeit. However, an idea can be exploited in different forms of expression, and freedom of expression can not be limited, because it would even mean limiting the freedom of creation. Therefore, the exclusion of ideas from protection was and is pursuant with the interest of society.

I remind that in the Constitution of Romania, in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (Article 27), freedom of expression and freedom of creation of any kind are fundamental freedoms (Article 30), as well as the right to work (Article 40), and the kind of work is the right of free choice by everyone. Limiting creative work by monopoly on ideas would even limit the right to work and the right to choose the type of work.

2. Ideas are not original, and originality is a condition for the protection of works by copyright. We have detailed above the issue of idea-work binomial and the moment when the idea becomes work and we have shown that ideas are not works and are not protectable because they lack originality. We add to the arguments detailed the one's of Professor Andre Lucas that state "in the case of ideas, intellectual effort does not justify protection for them (...) and this because the law recognizes privative rights, but subordinates this recognition to the fulfilment of certain conditions: for example, novelty, inventive activity and industrial applicability in the field of patents, originality in the field of literary and artistic property. Creations that do not meet these legal requirements are reputed to belong to public domain"[25]. Later, Professor Lucas added to his arguments, pointing out that even since 1928 the French courts have stated that "in the field of thought, ideas must remain eternally free, and they cannot be the subject of a private right" and "it has become a fundamental principle for copyright"[26]. Ștefan Cazimir[27] says that for him coming up with an idea is an inexplicable phenomenon, most often indebted to hazard, and the distinguished philologist with a mind full of ideas, although he was also into politics, did not invoke any right on his political ideas. We remind, in context, that our politicians still accuse one another of theft of political ideas and that it was a time when accusations of political ideas theft were fashionable. But such allegations also meet elsewhere. For example, in France, a French presidential candidate in the 2012 elections, Nicolas Dupont Aignan, stated that he should receive money from other competitors because they took over his ideas on which he has copyright. He requested to Jerome Sujkowski, a young French attorney-at-law specialized in intellectual property law to comment on Aignan's statement in an article on protecting ideas in which he said, among other things, that "he cannot imagine that N.D. Aignan would be "Null" in copyright, so he will start from the premise that he only tried to amuse his audience"[28].

3. Exclusion from the protection of ideas is a solution stemming also from the principle of freedom of industry and trade. It is a fundamental and general principle of today's world, and according to it, the individual is allowed anything that is not expressly forbidden by law (as opposed to the authority which is permitted only what the law expressly states). It is part of the broader and more general principle of freedom, which is the most important foundation of the legal order of modern states. Freedom exists in all human activities - thinking, movement, expression - and in all areas of law: public, penal, labour, economic. In the economic life, the principle of liberty takes the form of trade and industry freedom, by virtue of which every person has the right undertake, to participate in the life of another, to participate in business life and to compete with others.

The origins of this freedom are, in fact, much older and much deeper. They are found in the right to life of every human being, right emanating from an obligation, from the divine obligation of every human being to preserve their life and that can be assured by and through the freedom to undertake and to trade and to compete with others. This right to life implies also freedom of competition and freedom of competition implies the freedom to offer products and services identical to those available on the market, which means that these products and services can be freely copied, however such thing cannot be valid but for the perfect competition. The exclusive right of creators on their creations is, in fact, the opposite of competition (the perfect one, of course), but the extension of protection to ideas would have adverse effects, compromising the very idea of competition.

4. Exclusion of ideas from protection is justified by the application of proportionality principle. This principle has become the new star in law, being consecrated as such both by the European Court of Human Rights and by the Court of Justice of the European Union, which have consistently held within their jurisprudence that there must be proportionality between the aims pursued by legislators and the means used to achieve them.

In our country, the principle of proportionality has constitutional value, in art. 53 paragraph (2), is provided that the restriction of exercising of certain rights or freedoms may be ordered only if necessary and proportionate to the situation which determined it. However, applications of this principle are found in other matters, even in the Constitution. For example, the statutory system of taxation must ensure the correct setting of tax burdens (Article 56); The exercise of rights and freedoms cannot infringe the rights and freedoms of others (Article 57); Expropriation can only be done with just and prior compensation (Article 44), etc.

To recognize a monopoly over an idea or ideas would not only be contrary to the principles on which copyright is based (the form of expression, original, conscious and creative activity, having the purpose to change what exists and to achieve something new, which did not exist before), but also contrary to the general interest, and this interest justifies the solution of non-protection of ideas by intellectual property rights, sacrifice being necessary for the protection of a superior interest. And if the right to work and the choice of work, if the freedom to create and to express yourself is the rule, the limitation of these rights and freedoms can exceptionally take place in order to achieve a legitimate objective in a democratic society in a precise manner and proportionate to the objective pursued. In our case, legitimate limitation is achieved by excluding ideas from protection, from recognition of any privative right over ideas. The protection of ideas (purely abstract elements) would allow the holder monopoly over an idea preventing anyone from using this idea, thinking, creating, expressing, working, earning a living through intellectual work. Therefore, recognition of a monopoly over an idea or concept would not allow the principle of proportionality to be observed: limiting access to ideas that would emanate from the acknowledged / awarded monopoly would not be proportional with the objective pursued, that of raising collective good through innovation, through creative activity.

5. It is unknown and it cannot be known to whom the idea "belongs" to, in order to award the exclusive right. The impossibility of establishing the person who had the first idea seems to us to pertain to evidence based field. As with the evidence based field, it seems to us that a person can formulate the same idea without knowing that someone else has done it before. One and the same idea can be formulated by an infinite number of people. One and the same idea can be reached by an indefinite number of people by different means. To admit that one of them may have a privative right on the idea means denying the right to study, to research, to experiment, to reach the same conclusions, or, starting from the same idea, to reach different conclusions and different modalities to practically harness the idea.

We also believe that the recognition of an exclusive right over (certain) ideas would be contrary to the interests of the one who claims it too. It would limit the possibilities of that very person to have access to other ideas himself blocking his creative work also. To admit the acknowledgement of privative rights upon ideas it would mean to block the creative work of all, to generate chaos in the world of creators, a world on which overall development depends.

4. Criticism upon refusal to protect ideas by intellectual property rights

With reservations justified by the idea we support, that ideas are not protectable by copyright, we must mention, for the sake of truth, that the refusal to protect ideas by intellectual property rights is not considered a solution protected against criticism, and that there are many critics, bringing arguments that can put into question the fairness of the solution adopted by special laws.

The first criticism[29] upon the resolution that refuses to copyright[30] the ideas is that it is difficult to say when we are in the presence of an idea or a work, and even if the distinction can be made, then we must admit it is paradoxical to exclude valuable ideas from the field of copyright, while copyright protects even worthless creations (but we note that in the case of new and useful creations, industrial applicability virtually excludes protection upon worthless inventions, respectively without useful effects, invaluable for the economic activity).

A second argument is that denying the protection of ideas by copyright equates to the refusal to examine the originality of many creations of form. Here we must say that in the case of scientific works the concern for the form of expression is low (although the plagiarism charges are not few, they are related to take-overs in general, without distinguish between the unprotected and unprotected ideas and the form of expression). In scientific papers, language is otherwise standardized and is even more standardized and more constrained as the level of technicality is higher. On the other hand, scientific papers must communicate content, information, ideas. However, we believe that standardized language makes it difficult for the author and that, limiting the protection to the form of expression, the content of ideas cannot however be monopolized, anyone having the right to write papers on topics that have been previously dealt with. And if we compare scientific papers to what is happening in other areas of intellectual property, we can mention that in the case of weaker trademarks, protection is even weaker.

Finally, as soon as the idea has been formalized, as soon as the idea has acquired a form of personal expression that represents the true author, copyright must no longer be of interest but for the creation of form which resulted, thus, is also inappropriate to use the term "idea" anymore. Such a conception, we must admit, is not contradicted by art. 7 of the Law no. 8/1996, which protects all works, whatever their form of expression, so too in the case the work is summary. And it is to be noticed that according to art. 1 (2) of the Law no. 8/1996, the work is protected even unfinished, meaning somewhere between the stage of idea and the stage of work.

5. Exclusion from protection and protection of ideas by special law in Romania

We have not identified another system of law in which ideas are, at the same time, explicitly excluded from intellectual property rights (as the case in all legal systems) and protected by a special law, outside of Romania. We are (also) from this point of view, a special case, we are overly original, to speak in our matter's terms, because, contrary to the resolution with principial value, to exclude from the protection ideas through intellectual property rights, by a Law (No. 206/2004), whose object of regulation, according to its title, is "good conduct in the scientific research, technological development and innovation activity", that the ideas are recognized as having appropriation vocation and legal protection, since their mere exposure into a written work or oral communication without indicating the author is considered plagiarism. However, this is a protection which the special laws of intellectual property expressly refuse, and the exclusion of ideas from protection is in line with the provisions of the international conventions to which Romania is a party and with the legislative solutions of other countries.

We are the only country in the world that has two categories of ideas, with a regime defined by special laws: some excluded from copyright protection, subject matter of which is the scientific work, others protected by a special law dedicated to ethics in the activity of Scientific research, a law that made plagiarism, which has no legal existence anywhere in the world, to have such an existence in Romania.

Following the model consecrated by international conventions in the field of intellectual property rights, our laws exclude ideas from protection in any areas of knowledge and / or creation. Thus:

According to art. 9 of the Law no. 8/1996 on copyright and related rights, cannot benefit from the legal protection of copyright (…): ideas, theories, concepts, scientific discoveries, processes, methods of operation or mathematical concepts (…), whatever the modality of taking over was, writing, explaining or expressing.

According to art. 7 of the Law no. 64/1991, on invention patents are not considered inventions, especially: a) discoveries, scientific theories and mathematical methods; (...); c) plans, principles and methods of exercising mental activities, gaming or economic activities (...) and (d) presenting information. These provisions "shall not exclude the patentability of the objects or activities referred to in

[29] For details, see Christophe Caron, p. 72.

[30] In the case of creations useful to industry, the idea becomes invention, topography, design, model, brand and will be protected by the title of protection released, but it is protected as a materialized idea and in the form in which it has been materialized, and can be exploited by other creators as well.

this paragraph except to the extent that the patent application or the patent relates to such objects or activities considered per se". We note from the cited text that the exclusion of ideas is missing from listing. But any invention is an idea or a succession of finalized ideas, thus the exclusion of ideas is implicit. In formal terms, rendering an invention patent requires the formulation of the request, description, drawings and claims of the invention, or this means that it is understood that the simple idea (which precedes the invention) cannot be protected.

Likewise, in the case of utility models (minor inventions or to use one of our older terms, innovations), things are similar, by art. 1 of the Law no. 350/2007 being excluded from protection the same categories as in Art. 7 of the Law no. 64/1991. As with proprietary and patent-protectable inventions and inventions protectable by utility model (small inventions), it must be disclosed clearly enough and completely for a person specialised in the field to be able to achieve it, which means that the level of idea has also been surpassed and that the idea is not protectable.

Law no. 129/1992, with regard to models and designs, by art. 9, excludes from protection only designs and models contrary to public order or good morals, but the exclusion of ideas from the protection is implicit since for the registration of a design or model it is required that these should be described and represented graphically, which obviously requires surpassing the stage of a simple idea.

Law no. 16/1995 on the protection of topographies of semiconductor products also implies a rule of exclusion from protection of ideas in this field when, by art. 13 stipulates that for the registration of the topography it is necessary to establish the regular deposit, which is made up, among others, of the application containing the date of the first codification of the topography, the date of its first commercial exploitation (if applicable), as well as a technical documentation, graphs and texts containing sufficient information to enable the identification of the topography and to highlight the electronic function of the semiconductor product incorporating the topography and two copies of the semiconductor product if it has been produced and commercially exploited. However, this binding documentation for the valid constitution of the deposit also implies that the state of simple idea has been overcome.

And in the case of work secrets (know-how or savoire faire), things are about to be clarified, because on 8 June 2016, Directive (EU) No. 943/2016 on the protection of know-how and business confidential information (commercial secrets) against unauthorized acquisition, use and illegal disclosure, Member States are required to adopt the Acts binding as laws and necessary administrative acts to implement the Directive by June 9, 2018.

The Directive does not bring anything new in terms of definitions in relation to those formulated in the previous doctrine, but the Directive formulated will put an end to the disputes that still existed. According to art. 2 of the Directive, "commercial secret" means information that meets all the following requirements:

a) are secrets in the sense that they are not, as a whole, or as presented or articulated, elements of those, generally known or easily accessible to persons in circles normally dealing with the type of information in question;
b) have commercial value due to the fact that they are secrets;
c) have been the subject of certain reasonable measures, in the given circumstances, taken by the person that has legal control upon that information in order to be kept secret.

The only reference to ideas in the Directive is made in reason (3) and it refers to innovation as a catalyst for new ideas and to the fact that innovation allows ideas to appear on the market, thus confirming again the important role of ideas for creative work, and the fact that they must remain free.

Agreement on trade-related aspects of intellectual property rights (TRIPS[31] or ADPIC[32]), it also refuses the idea of protecting ideas. The agreement[33] is, as it is well known, the vivid proof of the commercialization of intellectual property rights, and if the ideas would have found a place of protection in any international convention, then this agreement would have been the right place. But the Agreement not only did not become the act of birth for the protection of ideas, but, on the contrary, it also represents the unequivocal manifestation of the international community to protect ideas through copyright. Thus, in art. 9.2. of the Agreement provides that "copyright protection will extend to expressions, not to ideas, procedures, methods of operation, or mathematical concepts as such."

The same meaning is found in the provisions of art. 2 ("The extent of Copyright Protection") of the World Intellectual Property Organization Treaty on copyright, concluded in 1966[34] that provides "copyright protection extends to expressions, not to ideas, processes, methods of functioning or mathematical concepts as such. "

Law no. 206/2004 on good conduct in scientific research, technological development and innovation

[31] *TRIP 'S i*s the acronym of English title of the agreement, respectively, Trade Related Aspects of Intellectual Property. It has 177 member states.
[32] ADPIC is the acronym of French title of the agreement, respectively, Accord sur les aspects des droits de propriété intellectuelle qui touchent au commerce.
[33] Approved on behalf of the European Community by Council Decision of 22 December 1994 concerning the conclusion, on behalf of the European Community, within its sphere of competence, of the agreements obtained at Multilateral Trade Negotiations in Runda Uruguay (1986 to 1994) (Decision No 94/800 /CE).
[34] Ratified by Romania through Law no. 205/2006.

(amended by Government Ordinance No. 28/2011 and GO 2/2016) deviates from the solutions established by international conventions and intellectual property laws of modern legal systems, this law declaring ideas to be protectable[35] and that the act of acquiring ideas is the deviation or, as the case may be, the plagiarism offense.[36]

In reasoning this law, it is shown that its adoption was necessary for several reasons:

1. Romania ratified by UGO no. 26/2002, Memorandum of Understanding between Romania and European Communities on the Association of Romania to the Framework Programs of the European Communities for research, technological development and demonstrative activities and the creation of Research and Development Innovation Area in the EU, agreed programs for the period 2002-2006.
2. Funding for research that contravenes ethical principles must be prevented, given that "all that is scientifically and technologically possible is not necessarily desirable or admissible";
3. It is necessary to regulate issues of ethics, integrity, professionalism and honesty, by excluding dishonest actions, and for this purpose a National Ethics Council has to be set up, elaborate the Code of professional ethics and deontology for research-development personnel and establish the procedure in case of reporting deviations from good behaviour;
4. It is necessary to align with international regulations or those adopted in other countries, including the UNESCO Universal Declaration on Human Genome and Human Rights, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and the Dignity of Human Beings, Directives 2001 / 20, 83/5/70, 86/609, 98/44, 90/219 /, French Law no. 94-654 on the donation and use of elements of the human body (...) and other normative acts from other countries on the same subject.

It is not of interest in the present work except for those provisions of Law no. 206/2004 regarding plagiarism, self-plagiarism and protection of ideas, demonstrations, data, hypotheses, theories or scientific methods that Law no. 8/1996 expressly excludes from protection. What was the reason for the legislator to render contradictory rules in this matter (protection of ideas and plagiarism)?[37].

First of all, we must note that the references in the Memorandum of reasons for Law no. 206/2004 to international, European and countries in Europe normative acts is correct only to the extent that it concerns research having as object human beings and animals, none of the acts mentioned in the memorandum of reasons is not related to plagiarism, self-plagiarism or protection of ideas, data, methods, theories. And what we need to discuss is not the need to regulate good conduct in the research activity, that seems to us to be obvious, but the solutions adopted by the legislator in one and the same matter and which is, in Law no. 206/2004, contrary to a traditional resolution in law and in all legal systems and contrary to the solutions established by at least two international conventions to which Romania is a party.

Secondly, the regulation of plagiarism, self-plagiarism and protection of ideas through Law no. 206/2004 is contrary to Law no. 24/2000 regarding the normative technical norms, art. 14 and art. 17 of this Law, which stipulate that regulations having the same object usually are comprise in a single normative act, that a normative act may contain regulations from other matters only in the extent they are indispensable to the achievement of the purpose pursued by it, and that contradictory normative acts are abrogated. The two laws cannot coexist in the part where they contradict and become inapplicable or at least are generating arbitrary solutions.

Third, if it were considered that Law no. 206/2004 is a derogatory law from Law no. 8/1996 (which sanctions the plagiarism of works in Article 141, without using this name for the incriminated act[38]), this should have resulted expressly from the regulation with a wording such as: "By way of exception to the provisions of Art. 9 of the Law no. 8/1996, in scientific research, ideas, data, theories, methods ... are protected, and their appropriation constitutes plagiarism."

It can be considered that Law no. 206/2004 is a special law? The answer is no, Law no. 206/2004 has as a matter of general regulation that is not subject to other regulation (Article 15 of Law 206/2004), being "special" only with reference to the contrary resolution to Law no. 8/1996, of excluding ideas from protection. And if the regulation contained in Law no. 206/2004 on the protection of ideas and their plagiarism would be considered special, then this regulation is contrary to certain international conventions to which Romania is a party (the TRIPS Agreement and the Treaty of Rome on Copyright, indicated above) and it cannot be applied, pursuant to art. 20 par. 2 of the Constitution (the priority application of international treaties). Because if a privative right is acknowledged upon ideas, by Law no. 206/2004, then they will have the same regime as copyrighted works, the right upon them being considered to belong to the category of fundamental rights referred to in art. 22 par. 2 of the Constitution. Our legislator's resolution is also contradicted by art. 30 (freedom of expression) in the Romanian Constitution, but this worth a separate discussion.

[38] Specialized papers and jurisprudence, even the Constitutional Court (see Directive No. 624/2016) use the term, but nowhere in Law no. 8/1996 (not even in French Intellectual Property Code) the word is not used, although Art. 141 of the Romanian Copyright Law incriminates it as an offence, that is what even in commune language we understand by plagiarism.

We must, of course, make a point: that the scope of Law no. 206/2004 is limited to personnel carrying out research and development activities, provided by Law no. 319/2003 regarding the status of research development personnel, as well as by other categories of personnel, from public or private environment, benefiting public funding for research-development[39]. Obviously not, being discriminatory and cannot be said to be a positive and acceptable discrimination, since on the basis of independent scientific work, a person can access positions requiring relevant knowledge, experience and relevant outcome. This is not the issue that we have come to discuss here, but we do think that it cannot be ignored by the legislator who must intervene to eliminate the contradictions, being bound to this intervention by art. 15 of the Law no. 24/2000 regarding the rules of legislative technique.

We believe, of course, that the good conduct in the scientific research activity requires to respect the work of predecessors, the results of their work, the priorities in the formulation of ideas, theories, concepts, methods, etc. That is inexcusable even the mere silence of the names of those who, before us, have researched, wrote, enriched the knowledge we have today and from which we intellectually feed ourselves to understand and carry on our work further. That it is unacceptable to forge the results and promote on criteria other than fair competition. But we believe that regulating excessively and regulating in contradiction, regulating with disregard the traditional resolutions from other legal systems, resolutions adopted by international conventions, these are wrong measures, however moral / ethical the intended purpose is, and that the Romanian solution is exotic. If ideas are, forever and ever, a territory of everyone and of no one, if ideas are and must be free, if ideas are in the public domain, then they cannot be legally protected. We also believe that priorities must be recognized and that this attitude of recognition of predecessors' merits is a matter of good conduct, morality, and morality is far more than law[40].

6. And yet, ideas ... and unfair competition

On the idea that ideas (we could avoid repetition, but we would lose ... the idea!) cannot be protected by copyright we must give priority to Henri Desbois[41], in the specialized works being considered an adage (traditional principle) the statement made by him in the 70s of the last century: "les idées par essence et par destination sont de libre parcours". But in a work published in 1996, another great personality of intellectual property law in France, Professor Andre Françon[42], pointed out that the resolution excluding ideas from protection was not unanimously accepted in French case-law, awards admitting the protection being rendered by commercial tribunals since years 60s-70s of the last century. Before the Court of Cassation of France, First Advocate General Raymond Lindon[43], referring to that case-law, requested, in the name of equity, the acknowledgment of a protection for ideas. Professor Françon has shown that this issue is of practical importance especially in the case of advertising ideas and advertising creations, because they are the subject of lucrative activities performed by individuals or by specialized companies that are prosperous, and specialists are not confined to providing ideas, but also to mentally prepare campaigns, posters, radio and television broadcasts, etc., or the refusal to give them an indemnity for their ideas put into work is unfair. But, Professor Françon said, although there are arguments of fairness in favour of recognizing rights in favour of those who provide ideas to others, the protection of ideas by copyright is not possible because copyright laws protect the form of expression, which means that the exclusive right it is not attached to the idea, but to the form under which it is exposed.

Is there, however, a solution that satisfies the principle of equity and allows those who provide ideas to obtain a reward or be compensated for the use of their ideas without their consent? Life is always ahead of the law, and sometimes the distance is very great.

Walt Disney, for example, bought ideas for his animated films (a common thing in cinematography), and even created a method (working technique?) (which cannot be protected by any intellectual property right) in which the first step was "midwifing" ideas (finding/ discovery/ identification) by a first category of his collaborators ("the dreamers"), the second step of [41] Henri Desbois (1902-1985) was a professor at Pantheon-Assas University of Law, Economics and Social Sciences. The prestige enjoyed in France and in the world by this author and his works is immense. An intellectual property research institute, integrated in the Paris University II, bears its name. The third edition of his work "Droit d'auteur en France" was published in 1978, at a time when in this field, it was very little written about, and in this country. The originality condition was researched in jurisprudence by Henri Desbois in the 1950s, and the paternity of the theory is attributed to him, although studies later demonstrated that the notion of originality has been used in jurisprudence since the nineteenth century.

After World War II, he was a prosecutor accused of lawsuits against French collaborators during the German occupation. developing them, putting ideas into work by other collaborators ("developers") and the third step was critique of ideas and form which were put into work by Disney himself. A method of work that he put into practice in a successful business with intellectual creations that delight the world. But at that time cinematography was already an industry with huge profits behind which, as for now, a huge number of ideas materialized in creations of all kinds: scenarios, specially created music, decors, costumes, lighting systems, fastening brackets for images and sounds, image and sound fixtures, imaging and sound processing techniques, computer software, artistic and technical countless creations.

On the Internet, there are today "business ideas" sites (and if they are "free" then they are most likely educational programs for which someone pays), others with business proposals (made by people who have ideas, but have no money, or do not want to risk their money). And it should be remembered that Disney himself knocked to the door of 301 banks before finding the bank willing to finance the greatest idea that the creative genius had, that of the Amusement Park opened on July 17, 1955 in California under the name Disneyland.

We paid little attention to the idea-work binomial so far, in earlier works, indicating only the possible discussion on author quality when the idea belongs to a person and the work is done by another person and we believe that the correct answer to this question is the one provided by Professor Françon, previously exposed: copyright protects the form of expression, not the idea, so the provider of the idea cannot be the co-author. But the question still remains: is it fair to do that? It is fair that the person who provided an idea that was put into work or whose idea was usurped should not benefit from his ideas, when they are of course valuable. Because, saying that ideas cannot be protected by a special right, such as intellectual property law, does not mean that valuable ideas cannot, however, be protected by the application of common law rules, action in civil liability (contractual or, as the case may be, tort) or the action in unfair competition.

If we admit that ideas are the engine of progress (Forbes has said and succeeded in life!), then there must be solutions to protect the providers of ideas, and life gives us such examples. It is true, the ideas we are talking about here are valuable ideas, ideas that can bring benefits to entrepreneurs (business models, distribution optimization, workspace design, or new distribution models - eMag, for example), but even those ideas that can be a raw material for intellectual creation, some of which can be valuable, but not valorised because time has not yet come for them[44], or the entrepreneur or creator who will put them to work is not there yet.

However, talking about valuable ideas, it is implied that we have other type of ideas also (invaluable, still ideas) and that seeking solutions only for the valuable ones presupposes that we already operate with a criterion which is discriminatory, or copyright does not even admit such a criterion for the creations it protects. In addition, it is possible that the value of an idea may be revealed later, or find the recipient willing to put it into practice so late that the one who "midwifed" the idea may not even be alive. But the law has never offered solutions to all problems, and the legislators have always taken care to let judges find the right solutions for unregulated assumptions (see Articles 3 and 4 of the 1864 Civil Code and Article 1 (2) Of the new Civil Code).

We do not see an impediment in concluding a contract between the seller / supplier of an idea and the one who has been given the idea, the principle of contractual freedom provided by art. 1169 of the new Civil Code, giving the parties the freedom to conclude any contracts and to determine their content within the limits imposed by law, public order and good morals. Maybe art. 12 of the new Civil Code, which provides that anyone can dispose of his goods and art. 1657 of the new Civil Code, which provides that any good may be sold freely if sale is not prohibited or limited by law, convention or testament, could be considered impediments, since the doctrine and case law are unanimous in the appreciation that ideas are to all and to none at the same time, and that they cannot form the object of a privative right recognized by law. However, we do not believe that by concluding a contract whose object is the supply / delivery of an idea, a rule of public order would be breached, since art. Art. 1169 The Civil Code leaves the parties the possibility to determine the content of the contract, and art. 1225-1226 of the Civil Code, concerning the subject matter of the contract and the object of the obligation, also are not imperative, as the parties can freely set the object of the obligation to which the debtor is engaged. And if we admit that a contract having as object providing / delivery of an idea can be concluded, we must admit that it is admissible also the action for contractual liability.

As regards the possibility of an extra-contractual (tort) civil action, based on the provisions of Art. 1349 and 1359 of the Civil Code, following the "appropriation" of another's idea, a principial value observation must be made. That a civil liability action for the “theft” of an idea implies the recognition of a privative right for idea on the basis of the law, or this is not possible because it cannot be recognized on the basis of common law what the special law expressly refuses to do. If it is accepted that the idea is in the public domain, then it is available to all and its use is free, it cannot be sanctioned if it is used by someone other than the one who claims to have a right over it. However, it cannot be disputed that the "owner" of the idea may have the interest to harness it, either personally or through third parties, and that interest is legitimate and serious, and by the way in which it manifests it, creates the appearance of a subjective right (art.1359 New Civil Code). This seems to us the most delicate issue for engaging the liability of the usurper.

[44] You can resist the invasion of an army, but not an idea that has come its time, said Victor Hugo.

As to the proof of the priority on the idea, it could be evidence for the Claimant "envelope with ideas" filed with OSIM (see Article 66 letter f) of Law no. 64/1991 on Patents for Invention and Order no. 63/2008 of the General Manager of OSIM approving the instructions regarding the establishment of the "Envelope with Ideas" service), bringing to knowledge of the idea (ideas) by publishing in specialized papers or conferences, correspondence with the usurper for jointly carrying out a work on the idea that is the subject of the complaint, etc., although with the exception of the correspondence with the usurper of the idea and the negotiations with him for the joint performance of a work, based on a given idea, the others cannot prove the "theft" of the idea, but only of the possible priority.

It is an effective remedy for punishing the theft of ideas, action for unfair competition, action at the hands of competitors on the same market, and sanctioning not a violation of a victim's privative right, but the wrong, unethical behaviour of the Respondent with respect to its competitor, an action whose resources and possibilities of sanctioning incorrect behaviours are infinite. In this case, the Claimant shall have to prove that the conditions of tort liability are fulfilled in the condition requested by common law (the action for unfair competition being a species of the latter) and even if the evidence of the unfair act is not simple, it does not seem impossible to us. Of course, the action in unfair competition implies that the parties are competitors on the market, but the notion of competitor is interpreted in the case-law of the CJEU extensively, and the quality may also extend to individuals.

It is, however, paradoxical that intellectual property law (including industrial property here) to be so severe with ideas, and common law to be so generous with ideas. But we must not forget that the reason of intellectual rights is protection of creative activity in all its forms of manifestation and that creating means doing something that has not previously existed.

The paradox appears to be even greater if we consider that ideas find refuge and protection solutions in competition law, which is opposite to intellectual property rights, because intellectual rights generally give a monopoly of exploitation[45], and competition, by definition, fights monopoly. But there is also an answer here: Intellectual property rights are governed by special laws, applicable with priority to the matters they regulate. And by special laws, ideas are excluded from protection.

Altruism, disinterested action in favour of others is a virtue, but the businessman's peculiar is fierce competition, not the practice of virtues. Entrepreneurs seek profit-making, not providing knowledge or success recipes, unless they bring a benefit. But creators and researchers are also competitors, and for researchers, competition involves value, valuable ideas, valuable results. In the case of creators, although creations are protected independently of their value, whether they like it or not, the benefit is proportional to the value of creation. A value that is given by the idea behind it and which is not protected by the originality of creation.

THE HYSTORICAL, PHILOSOPHICAL AND LEGAL FUNDAMENTALS OF COMBATING UNFAIR COMPETITION

Viorel ROȘ*
Andreea LIVĂDARIU

Abstract

Unfair competition is abuse. It is abuse against freedom of competition. Abuse against freedom of initiative and freedom of commerce. Who shall obey the laws of honour and probity? Who has the obligation to do it? Fair businessmen! Who says unfair, means contrary to the objective behaviour of honest man in business. Of man for whom the freedom of the other cannot be violated by the exercise of his liberties, because he understands his own freedom as a necessity. Business morality is a particular form, a species of universal morality, the sum of legal constraints and honest commercial practices sanctioned by law. But the world of businessmen is not populated by angels.

Keywords: unfair competition, freedom of competition, monopoly, freedom of commerce and industry, abuse of freedom.

Competition is rivalry in a field of activity, it is a competition between people who act on the same market in order to monopolize it and to get the most profits. There is competition when the consumer has alternatives in choosing products or services, competition being related to the freedom of choice. By pursuing its goals (promoting innovation, efficient resource allocation, limiting economic power, fair distribution of income), competition is an efficient means to organize markets, economies. The purpose of prohibiting acts of unfair competition is to ensure respect for fair market behaviour. Observing the freedom of others.

Freedom of competition derives from the freedom of trade and the freedom of industry being acknowledged constitutionally [(Article 135 (1) and (2).] Competition is the active form of freedom of initiative and freedom of trade. An essential feature of market economy and a must for economic progress. But if economic freedom (to undertake and to trade) is outside any constraints and has solid support provided by the basic rule of private law according to which the individual is allowed everything is not expressly forbidden by the law (for example, individuals cannot carry out economic activities upon which the state has reserved monopoly), competition is only acceptable if it is fair, namely if respects "honest practices and the general principle of good faith, in the interests of those involved, including respect for consumers' interests".

2. Freedom, an understood necessity?

According to Blessed Augustine[1], if no one asks what freedom is, we know, but if anyone asks us what it is, we do not know it anymore. Still, Augustine de Hipona wrote a lot about freedom and its limits, concluding that man does not have a complete power of choice, meaning that not everything that man does depends on free choice. Supporter of the principle of divine grace, he does not give up the principle of man's freedom of will, making a synthesis between affirmation of divine grace and assertion of liberty. Man has the power to choose between good or bad, but there is no perfect balance between freedom of choice and divine grace, which only Adam had it and which he destroyed by the original sin. However, will never decides without reason, without being attracted to a good that it perceives. But this perception does not lie in the absolute power of man; God is the one that determines either the external causes of perception or the inner light that acts upon the soul.

Augustine de Hipona examined the individual's freedom in relation to divinity. Philosophers, trying to discuss it in layman's terms, of relationships between people and between people and states, define it negatively: freedom is a lack of any constraint. In other words, freedom means not being impeded to do what you want and to say what you want, to be in charge of what you do and what you do not do by your own will. Freedom requires self-determination without any external intervention and independent choice of behaviour. Jean-Jacques Rousseau also defines it as negative by saying that "freedom does not consist in the fact that people can do everything they want, but in the fact that they must not do what they do not want to".

Are we really free, or are we ever free in the sense of these definitions? We believe that for people, pure and simple freedom is an illusion, a chimera. According to Constantin Noica, freedom is the opening that closes, although he speaks of the "closure that opens"[2]. Freedom is the openness that offers the possibility of choosing between several alternatives and closure in the choice made. If freedom implies a choice (which is not just between yes and no) then the process of choosing is already a form of constraint and then the choice makes us prisoners. We are determined in our actions by the reasons for which we make a certain choice and in which reason has a decisive role. We are determined by necessity. The necessity understood by and through reason.

The first to notice the contradiction between freedom and necessity was the Stoics[3], but it was a long time before freedom was defined also as an understood necessity.

For Baruch Spinoza[4], truly free is only God. Only He, having total independence, can attain the ultimate freedom. Does Spinoza contradicts when he says that freedom cannot be denied not even to man guided by reason, since he also says that everything (therefore reason too) is determined by the necessity of the divine nature, and free is God alone? We think so; it is a contradiction in what Spinoza says.

But does man, who is driven by reason and pursues the good, does he do it for himself or for others? For Spinoza, the man who is guided by reason is free only with others. Man is freer in collectivity, in a state where he lives by law, than in loneliness where he obeys only himself. But in collectivity, freedom cannot be dissociated from the laws that are necessary in order for the common good, collective good, to be asserted. Spinoza does not oppose freedom to necessity but to constraint, because only in the case when action is the result of constraint, it is not a manifestation of freedom.

The idea of freedom as necessity (constraint), still shyly formulated by Spinoza, is developed by Kant[5], but the latter considers that divine freedom and human freedom are equally important, and that the divine origin of reason[6] and good is worthless if is not also put into practice. But for this there is a need for reason, knowledge, experience, because he emphasizes on the knowledgeable, discerning subject. Kant's man is subject to causality and, implicitly, to necessity. He has to act in all circumstances according to the "categorical imperative", that is why the freedom of the individual implies rational action, action which is decided by the compliance of his own will with the duty to act for the good, presupposes a conformation based on his own convictions, on education, altruism, subordination of individual interests to those of the group. Man is free because he conforms to good will.

For Hegel, reason as freedom cannot be limited to the individual regarded autonomously, as his predecessors see it. For Hegel, freedom of each is conditioned by its acknowledgement by others because we are free only together or we are not at all, hermits cannot be counted not even as an exception to this rule, because their hermitage has another goal, that of Communion with God, not with people. Isolated freedom does not even exist for Robinson Crusoe[7], because he was compelled to live on his island, not by his own desire.

Mutual recognition of freedom, the recognition of other's freedom, can only take place in communities organized as states, which is the only form of political organization of people that makes it possible to unite individual wills in a collective will. In such an organization, man acts in accordance with his needs pursuant to collective needs, the necessity not being a denial of liberty, because they are not mutually exclusive. Moreover, the individual wills joining as a collective will, it is in everyone's interest that the state and its institutions act well, this being the very guarantor of individuals freedom and that is why everyone must get involved in public life. In the absence of involvement, states can evolve only towards dissolution or dictatorship. But in this case we come to the conclusion (already formulated by Montesquieu) that "philosophical freedom consists in the exercise of our will, or (at least, if we take into account all systems), having the conviction that we are exercising our will"[8].

[3] The philosophical current, the initiator of which is Zenon of Kition, appeared in the year 300 BC. The name comes from the stoa polikie, which was the porch painted at the entrance of Zenon's school in Athens. It was the most important philosophical movement until the adoption of Christianity as a state religion in Europe. Among the Stoics' ideas, we mention: there is nothing immaterial; the world is only one, the matter-spirit dualism not being permitted; fire is the sole element and is represented by God; knowledge is based on senses and perceptions; the universe is governed by absolute laws; the essence of human nature is reason; man must live in harmony with nature; virtue encompasses wisdom, courage, justice, and temperance.

It was only his release that would have made Friday his equal, which was also a condition for Robinson's freedom. The man who restricts the freedom of other or others is not free, even when they survive only by the memory of their will. The affirmation belongs to Carol Voytila, who became Pope John Paul II, to whom the saviour of a Jewish child, whose parents were killed in the camps, presented him in order to be Christianized. The future Pope refused to do so saying that his parents would have wanted him to grow up like any Jew in his religion.

3. Freedom in law

The two great philosophers wrote before, during, and after the French Revolution (many others have written, but we must limit ourselves to them due to lack of space), but for neither of them we cannot possibly acknowledge the right of priority for enouncing the idea of freedom-necessity, because these ideas are known to us and present at least since Sophists, meaning that they have an age of over 23 centuries. And we do not know whether philosophers have influenced revolutionaries or revolutionaries influenced philosophers in formulating the idea of freedom as a necessity. I would rather say that at the end of the eighteenth century, these ideas become current again, they were floating in the air, their time was here, and philosophers and revolutionaries put them into work and expressed them differently and originally.

We cannot, however, not notice that in the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, the definitions of freedom are rather philosophical than legal. Thus, in the first article of the Declaration, it is stated that "people are born and remain free and equal in rights", art. 4) states that "freedom is to be able to do everything that does not harm the other." The exercise of the natural rights of every person knows no limits other than those that are needed by other members of society to enjoy the same rights. These limits can only be determined by law ", and by art. 5) it is ordered that "the law has the right to prohibit only dangerous actions for society. Everything that is not prohibited by law cannot be prevented, and no one can be compelled to do what the law does not order".

Not even Abraham Lincoln is too far from philosophers, nor does he approach too much of jurists when he says that "in collectivity, freedom is not the right to do what we want, but the right to do what is right".

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted on December 10, 1948, when human rights were, in many parts of the world, only words that didn't fit in Courts anymore, and in libraries were carefully hidden, takes parts of the Declaration of French Revolutionaries and thickens something where the need was felt to do so to reaffirm the principle of freedom as an understood necessity.

Is the fundamental right and freedom one and the same thing? If you ask some, yes, if you ask others, no. We shall not analyse this controversy, because another is the subject of our endeavour. We will confine ourselves to mention that Professors Ion Muraru and Simina Tănăsescu[9] say that between freedom and law there is no trenchant opposition[10], that the fundamental right is a freedom, and that freedom is a fundamental right, that the use of both concepts are based on a historical tradition, but also that the expressivity and the beauty of legal language and we believe that for the sake of expressiveness (to science being quite difficult to be beautiful in language), it is worthwhile to do, sometimes, and carefully, the concession of putting a sign of approximate equality between the two terms and that we can, with their help, shade and / or potentiate arguments, demonstrations or theories.

We believe that man cannot have absolute freedom, being limited by necessity, by laws (natural and social). In law, freedom is bordered by social laws, Montesquieu defining it as "the possibility of doing what law allows; If a citizen could do what they forbid, he would no longer have freedom, because the others could do the same"[11].

The individual has a greater degree of freedom when his actions concern him exclusively, in which case state intervention is almost excluded, and a lesser degree of freedom when his acts or his conduct concern others, in which case, for defence of the rights and freedoms of others or of general interests, the state must intervene. In other words, freedom relates not only to the individual, taken separately, but to others also. Or especially to others. But freedom is not limited only by social laws, and it is not fair to speak of "freedom (only) within the law", if we admit that from the point of view of the science of law freedom is to be able to do what does not harm others. But there is a fallacy between the philosophical concept of freedom and freedom in the science of law, because in the philosophical sense freedom consists in understanding necessity, and this also comes from knowing objective laws, the laws of nature, the mastery of the forces of nature, and not just social laws.

Freedom does not imply positive obligations from other individuals, taken separately. But it implies an obligation on the part of the state (the community) to ensure the conditions for unhindered exercise of individual freedoms, including by means of legislation. The rest are held only by the imperative of abstaining, by the negative obligation not to do something that prevents the exercise of the other's freedom. That is why it is right to say that freedom preceded the law, the latter being nothing more than a limitation of freedom. Or the means of limiting freedom. And yet, the law itself declares the following as being absolute: freedom of thought, freedom of conscience, freedom of opinion.

4. Freedom of commerce and industry and free competition

Perhaps nothing can explain the binomial freedom better - the necessity and the way in which the freedom of everyone is limited by the freedoms of the other than the analysis of the relationship between freedom of commerce and industry and freedom of competition. Competition is the active form of free initiative. Or the abuse of freedom of initiative, violates the freedom of the other.

As it is well known, by successive measures adopted, the French Revolution abolished the privileges, monopolies, taxes (because they were not being consented by the people), and the devious prisons of the debtors, abolished professional associations, but these measures didn't have positive effects only, on short term they had the effect of creating chaos and wild competition, with adverse consequences on economic activities.

The Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, adopted on August 26, 1789, facing the evidence that taxes are the "soul of the state", reintroduced tax obligations abolished shortly before, carefully declaring them as "a necessity freely accepted" by every citizen (the 1793 unapproved Constitution, speaks of a "honourable obligation" to contribute to the state's general expenses through taxes and duties and about the "consent" of taxpayers' to pay them, but try not to pay them and you will see how free and freely consented this obligation is!).

The law of March 2-17, 1791 (known in French and Belgian law as the Decree d'Allende, as its initiator[12]) abolished corporations (considered to be contrary to the right to work), proclaimed freedom of initiative, commerce and freedom of competition[13]. And if the first two freedoms do not have a different content then the one thought-out by French revolutionaries, the freedom of competition has diversified and enriches its content even today. Since then, these freedoms are part of the legal and economic life of modern states. According to art. 7 of this law, "any person is free to do any trade or exercise any profession, art or occupation that it considers to be good for it; However, it will be obliged to obtain a patent beforehand, to pay for it the levy established by law and to comply with the regulations established or that may be established for them. "

The doctrine considers that the d`Allarde Decree formulated two principles:

- The freedom of initiative, namely the freedom to conduct an economic activity (by which we understand the freedom to undertake and freedom of trade) and the freedom to practice a profession (which we believe can be included in the broader concept of freedom of initiative);
- Free competition, consisting in the fact that the economic factors must observe the ethics in order not to falsify in any way the competition. However, this ethics in the D'Allarde decree seemed to be limited to a principle of economic neutrality of the state, which, in order to be able to respect competition, could not carry out industrial or commercial activities in a way that would break the balance between competitors. However, to persons of public law there was acknowledged the right to pursue economic activities if they are justified by the general interest. It is, however, difficult to say if D'Allarde had the complete representation of consequences of his act, if he considered a principle of perfect competition (we can assume, however, that he thought so, since he addressed the issue of state neutrality, the perfect - hypothetical competition - being one where no consumer has the power to influence prices), making it harder to believe (but not entirely excluded) that he made the law with which remained in the history of law as one who is considering "illicit competition". In no case, however, I do not think it is right to suspect him of demagogy, as it is claimed by some political actors to argue for legal solutions when he proclaimed these freedoms.

By d'Allarde Decree, freedom of initiative and commerce and free competition gains legislative legacy and also, little by little, the status of basic market economy principles that have been adopted as such in more and more countries and competition law becomes, after passing through the New Continent an important branch of law, making it interesting for the economy, but also for intellectual property. By this normative act, the freedom of commerce and industry, which they consecrated, "allowed the valorisation of human activity, and the abuse of these freedoms is considered unfair competition"[14] and allowed it to be sanctioned by the judges. Only that it had to pass half a century from adopting the principle of free initiative and competition for judges to qualify the abuse on freedom to act as unfair competition and nearly 100 years until competition laws became part of the legal life, and competition law, a branch of law.

We can assume that for both French revolutionaries, the two freedoms, respectively the freedom of initiative[15] (to undertake or to carry out economic activities) and the freedom of trade (to sell the products) originated in the natural right of man to acquire the means of existence: food, clothing, housing, personal comfort. However, descending more in the quest for origins we find that these freedoms have in fact, a correspondent in an obligation, in the divine responsibility of every human being to preserve his life. To take care of his or her life and those to whom he or she is indebted by blood or marriage links to do so. But also to be solidary with others and to help them in need. Obligation whereon the Constitution of Romania treats as right to life (Article 22).

[13] It is argued - especially in political environment - that the French Revolution "has demagogically proclaimed freedom of trade and industry - as if selection is nothing more than the manifestation of freedom of competition." See Cătălin Predoiu, "The New Civil Code will disturb the status quo, not only doctrinal but also institutional, in legal environments", available on Juridce.ro on October 18, 2011. But the Decree d'Allende is considered the act of birth for competition law. See in this respect Bernard Remiche, Vincent Cassiers, Droit des Brevets d 'Invention et du savoir-faire, Larcier, 2010, p. 670 and 672 and Andrée Puttemans, Droits intellectuelles et concurrence déloyale, Bruylant, Bruxelles, 2000, p. 103.

[15] Our Constitution speaks in Art. 135 (1) about freedom of initiative and competition and in art. 135(2) about State's obligation to ensure freedom of trade and protection of fair competition.

Nevertheless, what is the connection between free competition, freedom to create and intellectual property? The answer seems simple: where there are competitors, where free initiative is active, there is also abuse of freedom. And it seems that this happened and was noticed faster in the field of technical creations and distinctive signs, where competitors are intelligent, inventive, good observers, interested and connoisseurs on markets, people who see easily the opportunities and advantages that can be gained by means of unfair methods. And in the entrepreneur world, not all cultivate all the virtues, and perhaps the rarest of those cultivated is honesty, otherwise there would not have been a need for such a broad regulation on competition issues. And it cannot be a coincidence that freedom of initiative and abuse of this freedom that manifests itself in the form of dishonest competition has become part of our lives since the beginning of industrial revolution. Wherever economic activities flourish, we shall also face abuses of freedom and we shall encounter unfair competition phenomena.

Let us remember, therefore, that when the Viennese organizers of the sixth international exhibitions in 1873 invited the US to attend the event, the invitation was received with reservations, the American industrialists being unwilling to publicly expose their achievements due to the high risk of theft, possible risk due to low level of protection of inventions abroad (they had a patent law since 1812 and a patent office since 1815). That is why the United States conditioned their participation to the exhibition by the adoption by Austria of a patent law, which was adopted in the same year by the organizing country. But Austro-Hungary spilled its humiliation from this incident over Romania, which was forced in 1879 to adopt a trademark law in order to comply with an obligation assumed by a trade convention concluded with the same country in 1875. But we must admit that not even for the Austrian the forcibly adopted law of inventions was not that bad, nor did the adoption of trademark law for us, after we had promised the Austrians four years before we would do so, Romania becoming part of the small group of countries that had a trademark law.

But how can be unfair competition be punished in the absence of a special regulation?

In France, respecting the tradition, the judges took one step further in front of the law. Or maybe, by doing so, they have only complied with the obligation to judge also in absence of laws, as provided by art. 4 of their Civil Code and now: "the judge who will refuse to judge under the pretext of silence, obscurity, or inadequacy of the law, may be prosecuted as guilty of denial of justice". A text that existed also in the previous Romanian Civil Code (in article 3).

In the absence of a special law, the French jurisprudence has sought and attached to the principle of civil liability for punishing the abuse of freedom of initiative, on the basis of art. 1382 of the Civil Code (following the amendments adopted in 2016, Article 1240 and with correspondent in the old Romanian Civil Code in Article 998, and in the new Civil Code, in Article 1349) considered to be the most effective legal basis of the action for damages-interests in the case of abuse of free competition. Thus, grounded on the action on civil liability, the action on unfair competition still did not permit to the offended trader but the reimbursement of the damage incurred on the basis of a lengthy and costly procedure[16], which did not confer the benefit of the obligation to terminate the actions or the possibility of ordering the provisional suspension of non-honest competition by the judge. That is why, in practice, the victims of such acts preferred to refrain from taking legal action.

As during the nineteenth century, the economic confrontation was more and more fierce, ruthless and increasingly unethical (remember, it was the period of the industrial revolution, the beginning of the international exhibitions, the war between the partisans and the opponents of the patents), the judges were, however, forced to put competition (increasingly wild) within the limits of reasonable conduct, even in the absence of special regulations. The first decision to punish acts of unfair competition was pronounced in France in 1833, which was based more on moral arguments than on legal considerations, the most used argument being that no indulgence is justified to the one who acts in bad faith (malitiis non est indulgendum - there is no indulgence for malice). The appeal to this Latin legal adage means that the action on competition was considered admissible only if the bad faith of the Respondent could be established.

In the mid-nineteenth century, and in any case before the adoption of 1883 Paris Convention on the Protection of Industrial Property, France used the expression "acts of unlawful competition" to designate abuse of freedom of initiative, the same expression being used in 1850 by a court in Brussels. In the second half of the nineteenth century, the French and Belgian courts began to use the expression "unfair competition" for unethical conduct in business. Those acts were in particular related to the misuse of distinctive signs, trademarks and factory brands belonging to another, and that is why the 1883 Convention also referred to unfair competition, to which, as revised in the year 1900 dedicates an entire article (10 bis). In year 1858, the name of "unfair competition" was also used in doctrine[17] in a work by Edouard Calmels, and in 1875 in a treaty by Eugene Pouillet[18]. But in 1895, James Vallotton[19] published in Lausanne, a work entitled "La concurrence déloyale et la concurrence illicite: étude de jurisprudence".

French jurisprudence has priority also for progressive formulation of a planner for unethical behaviours and for which the moral fundamentals are predominant, even if the establishment of bad faith maintains its status as a necessary condition for finding the act of unlawful competition and to grant damages. France was, however, deprived of legal grounds to take legal action in civil liability, of the possibility to order measures in order to terminate unlawful competition acts, and the solution could only be that of compensating the victim for the damage incurred.

In Germany also, after the principles of freedom of initiative and the free competition were legislatively acknowledged by the Code of Industrial, Trade and Craft Professions adopted in 1869, abuses were starting to emerge, but the judges did not react as the ones in France, by sanctioning the abuse of freedom of initiative on the basis of non-contractual liability, but it must also be said that the legal, political, economic and social context was different in Germany from the one in France, and the disputes between the two countries were not such as to encourage the exchange information on jurisprudence.

It seems appropriate to mention here that the birth of unified Germany was signed in a famous place, the Mirror Hall of the Palace of Versailles, where other important historical documents were signed but which bear the seal of one of the great acts of unfair competition (not few), and which is related to industrial property (of course, if we relate to the present times and not to those of the 17th century when the act occurred, the acts)[20].

It is right to speak of Germany[21], of course, only after signing the act of unification, of peace with France (whose emperor, Napoleon III, defeated in 1870 at Sedan, at the date of the peace treaty was signed, was still the hostage of Germans) and the proclamation of Wilhelm I of Germany as Emperor of Germany, all these acts being signed so that the humiliation of France would be complete on January 18, 1871, in the Mirror Hall of Versailles. A hall decorated with mirrors made by the French 200 years before, following an act of unfair competition whose victims were the Venetian craftsmen, because the mirror manufacturing process was made known to them and the mirrors could be made in Paris (Since 1665) only after four Venetians were "bought" by the French. In Venice, whose wealth was due to mirrors they made, the process was kept secret under the death penalty for those who had disclosed it, and the inveiglement of craftsmen would undoubtedly qualify today as an act of dishonest competition.

Even before the unification in 1871, the German states had numerous competition problems, especially since in 1815 Prussia (the most powerful German state before unification) adopted a law of inventions that impeded imports between German states for products based on patented inventions, the problems being resolved only after the unification in 1871 and the adoption in 1877 of a federal invention law[22]. Competition acts continued to be aggressive also in unified Germany, but German courts did not follow the French model and refused to apply civil liability rules in the field of unfair competition. This determined the legislator of unified Germany to adopt laws between 1894-1896 which additionally regulated also some competition issues (e.g. the trademark law of 1896), so that in 1909 Germany would adopt a General Law against unfair competition.

This final law outlined in a general manner the prohibition of unfair competition, targeting all acts contrary to good morals committed by anyone in business for competition purposes. The law also regulated an action for termination of acts, allowing for a rapid provisional prohibition of unfair competition acts, which was an important development compared to the situation in France where judges could not order measures for termination of competition acts under the civil liability actions regulated at that time by art. 1382 of their Civil Code.

In the US, a law in 1890 (Sherman Act) introduced rules of competition, with regulations needed due to the increasing number of agreements in vital fields of economy, such as railways, oil industry, banking system, that endangered the stability of economic system. Another law, adopted in 1914, complements the first one, inter alia, by prohibiting mergers that could affect competition, by prohibiting a person to occupy director positions in two or more companies, prohibiting sales conditional on the failure to conclude transactions with competitors of the seller. In this way, the acts considered to be unethical behaviours are starting to be acknowledged in law.

[22] The law was adopted after, as in the US, in the German Constitution of 1871, the adoption of a federal law on inventions was provided.

and has contributed a lot to the theoretical and practical development of unfair competition combat system. The Belgian doctrine states that "if the history of action in unfair competition is very singular, and if this branch of law has experienced unrivalled development and unmatched clarification in Belgium, it has probably happened because Belgian jurists have fed from German experience as much as from the French one, not excluding anything and retaining the best of each of the two systems in order to create a third perhaps more complete and undoubtedly more effective. International Union Law has also played a major role in the elaboration of Belgian law"[23].

The expression "unfair competition" is used in Belgium for the first time in a sentence of Liege Tribunal in 1853, rendered also in connection with misuse of distinctive signs, and in 1865, in a court ruling In Brussels, which sanctioned the behaviour of an employee who left the company where he held the director position, along with several people, and then set up an enterprise with the same object of activity as the one he had left, ruining his former employer. The action against him was admitted on the same grounds as in France, respectively Art. 1382 of the Civil Code, its manoeuvres being classified as unfair competition with the consequence of obliging the Respondent to pay damages to the Claimant.

Belgium also played a significant role in introducing within the text of 1883 Paris Convention special provisions regarding the obligation of states to ensure the citizens of the Union of Paris an effective protection against unfair competition. Extensively prepared, the convention main concern was patents protection and trademark protection. In the adopted version, the Convention contains a general reference to unfair competition (the expression gaining since then international acknowledgement) in art. 1 paragraph 2), which shows what is the subject-matter of the protection of industrial property: *"patents, utility models, drawings or industrial designs, trademarks or factory brands, service marks, commercial names and indications of origin or names of origin, and also the suppression of unfair competition".

As it is well known, the Convention has been revised several times[24], the first of these reviews took place in Brussels on 14th of December 1900. On this occasion, art. 10 bis. was introduced, which limited in assimilating asylum seekers to nationals on protection offered against unfair competition. On 2nd of June 1911, during the Review Conference held in Washington, art. 10 bis has been amended to oblige Member States of Paris Union to provide Union citizens with effective protection against unfair competition. On this occasion, the British delegation proposed amending Art. 10 bis, by stating the concept of unfair competition, but for procedural reasons, the proposal could not be included in the text.

The First World War reiterated the need for more effective combat against unfair competition on international scale, which is why at the Review Conference held at The Hague in 1925, was formulated and introduced in the text of the Convention by art. 10 bis par. 2) and 3) a definition of unfair competition and the main dishonest acts specifically prohibited.

Thus, according to art. 10 bis par. 2) "constitutes an act of unfair competition any act of competition contrary to honest practices in industrial or commercial matters". Article 10 bis. par.3) states that they will have to be forbidden especially:

1. any facts which are likely to create by any means confusion between the competitor's undertaking, products, industrial or commercial activity of a competitor;
2. false allegations in the course of trade which are likely to discredit the competitor's undertaking, products, industrial or commercial activity;
3. indications or statements the use of which in the course of trade is likely to mislead the public as to the nature, mode of manufacture, characteristics, suitability for use or quantity of the goods.

Is the definition of unfair competition given by the Paris Convention satisfactory, since it defines the competition tautologically, stating that unfair is what dishonest is? Perhaps not.

However, the definition has the merit of making it possible to exit from the repairs register as a consequence of a culprit (as it was before) to operate with a positive rule of conduct, a rule of deontology. This, because the acts and / or deeds mentioned in art. 10 bis par. 2) of the Convention are prohibited, in the presence of any of them not being necessary to examine whether the Respondent acted intentionally or was in bad faith.

At Lisbon Review Conference (31st of October 1958), Art. 10 was introduced requiring the Union countries to provide citizens of the other countries of the Union with appropriate legal means to effectively suppress all the offences referred to in Articles 9, 10 and 10 bis and to provide measures to allow trade unions and associations representing industrialists, producers or interested traders and whose existence is not contrary to the laws of their respective countries, to bring to justice or before the administrative authorities in order to suppress the offences referred to in Articles 9, 10 and 10bis, to the extent that the law of the country in which protection is sought allows this for trade unions and associations in that country.

[23] Andrée Puttemans, op.cit. , p. 107.

[24] The Convention was revised, in turn, in Brussels on 14 December 1900, in Washington on 2 June 1911, in The Hague on 6 November 1925, in Lisbon on 31 October 1958, and in Stockholm on 14 July 1967. Romania acceded to the Paris Convention for the protection of industrial property on October 6, 1920, and the revised form in Stockholm in 1967 was ratified by Decree no. 1177/1968.

5. Conclusions

As it is easy to see, 75 years have been necessary for unfair competition to be defined in international law, to establish the facts and acts considered unacceptable in business, to impose an obligation on the Member States of the Union to provide effective means of sanctioning these facts. But if the beginnings of regulations to combat unfair competition are related to industrial property over time the competition field has gone beyond this sphere. And in the European Union, competition issues occupy a central place, a place we will talk about in other articles.

TRANSPARENCY OF COLLECTIVE MANAGEMENT ORGANIZATIONS (COLLECTING SOCIETIES)

Mariana SAVU*

Abstract

According to art. 133, paragraph (7) of Law no. 8/1996 on Copyright and Related Rights: „the collective management organization (collecting society), which is the sole collector, is required to issue the authorization through a non-exclusive license, in writing, on behalf of all recipient collective management organizations and to ensure both transparency of collection activities and the related costs in relations to the recipient collective management organizations. They have an obligation to support the collection activity." This special rule applies only to sole collectors and it cannot be transposed to the collectors appointed in various collection fields by ORDA, even if they are subject to mandatory collective management.
Otherwise, in accordance with art. 130, paragraph (1), letter (i) of Law no. 8/1996, the obligation to ensure transparency in the collection activity operates also regarding the collectors from areas other than „private copying", according to which „the collective management organizations are required as follows: i) to ensure transparency of collective management activities in their relations with the public authorities which have the right to control and, through them, with the users;". Under these circumstances, such obligation to ensure transparency exists and it is also applied by CREDIDAM, and the latter has entirely complied with it over time by submitting to ORDA on annual basis all the documents as required by law, as well as any other document required by it during inspections. We shall further show that CREDIDAM has also provided all the information, as enlisted in art. 2 point A of the draft decision, including to the recipient organizations.

1. Introduction

ORDA[1] has requested the collective management organizations to communicate their opinion on the transparency obligations of collective management organizations designated as collectors. The collective management organization which manages performers' rights, i.e. CREDIDAM, introduced the distinction between the concept of sole collector and the one of collector on source/collection field, as well as the transparency obligation contents incumbent on the collective management organizations from both categories.

After receiving the opinions from all the colective management organizations, ORDA communicated them a draft decision on transparency.

We emphasize that the original draft text drawn for discussion by the collective management organizations is distinct from the one in ORDA's Decision no. 114/2016[2], regarding the burdens imposed on the collective management organizations which are appointed as collectors by ORDA, based on the principle of representativeness criteria. In our opinion, there is no legal basis for regulating the transaprency requirement beyond the provisions of the Law no. 8/1996 on Copyright and Related Rights (hereinafter referred to as „Law no. 8/1996"), as well as the fact that collective management organizations already are bound to transparency according to current legal provisions. Moreover, most of the information provided through the administrative document issued by ORDA was communicated by the collecting body to the recipient collective management organizations, and the not provided one, i.e. the information communicated by the users showing the actual use of the repertoire managed by the recipient collective management organizations, namely that set out in paragraph B of the initial draft, due to its confidential nature, is the prerogative of recipient organizations to arrange to get it by their own.

ORDA has communicated the opinion of collective management organizations regarding the advisability of issuing the decision on transparency obligation of the organisations designated as collectors. Following such correspondence, ORDA announced the collective management organizations that a decision on the transparency obligations shall not be issued regarding the rights subject to mandatory collective management. As grounds for its conclusion, ORDA considered that this decision, as it would be drawn up in accordance with the current legal framework, cannot be applied.

Surprisingly, without having a prior dialog with the collective management organizations on the amendment of the original draft decision text and without us being communicated the reasons for the reconsideration of ORDA's initial position, the latter issued the Decision no. 114/2016 on transparency obligations of the collective management organizations designated as collector /sole collector for the rights subject to mandatory collective management, published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no. 889 dated November 7th, 2016.

In our opinion, the text of ORDA's Decision no. 114/2016 is unclear and we requested clarifications from ORDA for the provisions considered unclear, in order for it to be understood correctly and consequently implemented by the collecting collective management organizations. Except for the material error correction contained in art. 2 point A letter e) of the administrative document, ORDA's clarifications were added to the text of the decision regarding its key provisions, by comparison to the version published in the Official Gazette, a fact which lead to a different construing, conclusion supported even by the recipient collective management organizations.

2. Content

In order to analyze which are the transparency obligations of the collective management organizations designated as collector/sole collector we previously have to check if there is any difference between the collective management organization designated as collector for a certain category of right-holders and the collective management organization designated as collector for all the categories of right-holders, the so-called sole collector.

2.1. ON THE CONCEPT OF SOLE COLLECTOR

About the concept of sole collector, ORDA's opinion is that art. 133 should be correlated with art 107^1 of the Law no 8/1996, so that both concepts exercise the same basic rights and obligations for the collective management organizations which fulfill these functions.

As far as we are concerned, we believe that the procedure for appointing the sole collector for the „private copy" field is different from the procedure by which ORDA appoints the collector of remuneration payable to the same category of holders, so that neither of the two concepts overlap, because they do not give rise to the same rights and obligations as tasks of the organizations which fulfill this function.

More specifically, as ORDA states, according to art. 107^1 of Law no. 8/1996, „The compensatory remuneration for private copy will be collected by a collective management organization as sole collector for the works reproduced after sound and audiovisual recordings and by another collective management organization as sole collector for works reproduced from paper, in the conditions of art. 133 paragraphs 6) - 8). The two collective management organizations, with tasks of sole collector, are appointed in order to obtain the vote of the majority of beneficiary collective management organizations, upon the first summons, or by obtaining the highest number of votes upon the second summons, irrespective of the number of persons present. The collective management organizations appointed by vote will submit to the Romanian Copyright Office, the minutes based on which they were appointed. Within 5 working days since the date of submission, the Romanian Copyright Office shall appoint the sole collector based on the decision of the General Manager, which will be published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I."

As such, according to art. 107^1 of Law no. 8/1996:

1. For the private copy field, there shall be a sole collector for works reproduced from paper and a sole collector for the works reproduced after sound and audiovisual recordings;
2. The sole collector for the works reproduced after sound and audiovisual recordings shall collect for several categories of copyright and related rights holders, respectively for: authors (of music, film directors, visual arts, etc.), performers and producers (of music, of audiovisual and cinema works);
3. The sole collector shall be appointed by the recipient collective management organizations, and ORDA shall issue a decision to be published in the Official Gazette and by which it appoints the collector, as agreed by the organizations involved;
4. ORDA's powers and obligations in appointing the collector are limited; it can only take note of the agreement between the organizations and issue the decision, without examining the criteria and conditions contemplated by the parties;

However, according to art. 133 of Law no. 8/1996, „(1) Collection of the amounts payable by users or by other payers shall be made by the collective management organization which repertoire is used.

(2) If there are several collective management organizations for the same creative field, and the rights managed are from the category of these referred to in art. 123^2, the recipient organizations establish through a Protocol to be submitted to the Romanian Copyright Office in order for the following to be published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, at their expense:

a) the criteria for distribution of remuneration between organizations;
b) the collective management organization which is to be appointed among them as collector in the fild of said right-holders, by the decision of the General Manager of the Romanian Copyright Office;
c) the manner of recording and justifying the expenditure on actual coverage of the collection costs of the collecting society (collective management organization).

(3) As referred to in paragraph (2), if the recipient collective management organizations fail to submit the above mentioned Protocol to the Romanian Copyright Office within 30 days from the date of entry into force of the Methodologies, the Romanian Copyright Office appoints among them a collector in the field of said right-holders, based on representativeness, by decision of the General Manager.

(4) For the circumstance provided in paragraph (3), the sole collector appointed by the Romanian Copyright Office cannot allocate the collected amounts either between the recipient organization, or to their own members, unless after submitting a Protocol to the Romanian Copyright Office concluded between the recipient organizations and by which they set up the criteria regarding the distribution of collected amounts. Collection costs, in this case, shall be separately registered and must be justified by documents concerning the actual cover of the collection costs of the collective management organization that is collecting in the field of said right-holders.

(5) Upon the expiry of the 30 day period as provided in paragraph (3), any of the collective management organizations may request the Romanian Copyright Office to initiate the arbitration proceedings conducted by arbitrators, in order to set up the criteria regarding the distribution of collected amounts between the categories of recipients. The arbitration proceedings, as well as the subsequent stages are referred to in art. 131[2] paragraphs (3)-(9).”

As such, according to art. 133 of Law no. 8/1996:

1. For the rights that are subject to mandatory collective management, the criterion required by law in order to determine the remuneration payable to right-holders is the actual use of the repertoire;
2. ORDA practice was to appoint a collector among the collective management organizations operating for a certain category of right-holders, this collector subsequently collecting from users the amounts payable to right-holders and to distribute between them such amounts;
3. For the rights which are subject to optional collective management, if there are several collective management organizations that represent the same category of right-holders, according to art. 133, paragraph (2) of Law no. 8/1996, they should conclude a Protocol in order to establish the criteria, the collecting organization and ways to recognize the amounts;
4. In the absence of a Protocol, ORDA shall appoint by decision, based on the criterion of representativeness of the collecting organization, and will subsequently establish the criteria based on protocol or by arbitration within ORDA, whether the conclusion of the protocol is not possible;
5. Thus, if the organizations fail to agree upon the conditions for concluding a Protocol, ORDA shall intervene with extensive powers over the proceedings referred to in art. 107[1] of Law no. 8/1996 and appoints the representative organization.

2.2. REGARDING THE LEGAL STATUS OF COLLECTIVE MANAGEMENT ORGANIZATIONS

Based on the fact that ORDA places the sign of equivalence between the sole collector in the field of “private copy” and the collector appointed for the other fields of collection, it rules that the provisions of art. 133, paragraphs (6-8) of Law no. 8/1996 also applies upon the collectors appointed for the other collection fields.

However, we cannot ignore the provisions of art. 107[1] according to which „*The compensatory remuneration for private copy will be collected by a collective management organization as sole collector for the works reproduced after sound and audiovisual recordings and by another collective management organization as sole collector for works reproduced from paper, in the conditions of art. 133 paragraphs (6) – (8)”.

As such, the provisions of art. 133, paragraphs (6) – (8) which refer to the sole collector are applied to the equitable remuneration on the “private copy”, and their application cannot be extended to other field, by analogy, when Law no. 8/1996 sought to create an exceptional procedure for the field of private copy. Or, in hour opinion, contrary to the facts shown by ORDA, the sole collector applicable rules may not apply also for the other fields.

In this respect, the provisions of art. 133, paragraph (7) according to which „the collective management organization, which is the sole collector, is required to issue the authorization through a non-exclusive license, in writing, on behalf of all recipient collective management organizations, and to ensure both transparency of collection activities, and the related costs in relations to the recipient collective management organizations. They have an obligation to support the collection activity.”

Or, this special rule applies only to sole collectors and it cannot be transposed to the collectors appointed in various collection fields by ORDA.

The collector assigned on various collection fields fits with the collection costs within the percentage set by the Arbitration Awards or by Civil Judgments of the Courts, and for the sole collector, the costs are determined by the Protocol signed by the recipient parties.

Otherwise, in accordance with art. 130, paragraph (1), letter (i) of Law no. 8/1996, the obligation to ensure transparency in the collection activity operates also regarding the collectors from areas other than „private copying”, according to which „the collective management organizations are required as follows: i) to ensure transparency of collective management activities in their relations with the public authorities which have the right to control and, through them, with the users;”

Under these circumstances, such obligation to ensure transparency (before ORDA, the sole control authority, before the members and to the general public) exists and it is expressly provided by law and also applied by CREDIDAM, and the latter has entirely complied with it over time by submitting to ORDA on annual basis all the documents as required by law.

The Law no. 8/1996 concerns the obligation of all collective management organizations (so not only of the collective management organizations designated as collectors/sole collectors) to have transparency before:

1. public;
2. members;
3. ORDA.

Consequently, the law does not require the collecting collective management organizations to report, for the sources of mandatory collective management, their entire activity to the collective management for which they collect, organizations which are competing in the market, in the opinion of the Competition Council, and also of Bucharest Court of Appeal – Administrative and Fiscal Disputes Section.

Thus, these transparency obligations are:

1) Transparency obligations towards the public

CREDIDAM communicated to the public through its website www.credidam.ro, the mass-media and its magazine, "Info CREDIDAM", the following data, according to art. 125[1] of Law no. 8/1996:"

a) the categories of right-holders it represents;

b) the economic rights they manage;

c) the category of users and the categories of natural and legal persons who/which have payment liabilities for compensatory remuneration for private copy to the right-holders;

d) the laws under which the operate and collect the remunerations payable to right-holders;

e) the collection methods and the persons responsible for this activity, both locally and centrally;

f) the working schedule".

2) Transparency obligations towards members:

Likewise, every year, all the updated information has been posted on CREDIDAM website, according to art. 134[1] paragraph 1 of Law nr. 8/1996, with subsequent amendments and supplements:

"a) the Statute;

b) the list with the members of central and local governing bodies, the members of the internal commissions and the list of local liable persons;

c) the annual statement on the balance of undistributed amounts, the collected amounts on categories of users and other payers, amounts withheld, the management costs and the amounts distributed on categories of right-holders;

d) the annual report;

e) the information regarding the General Assembly, such as: the date and place of convening the agenda, the draft resolutions and decisions adopted;

f) other information necessary to inform the members".

3) Transparency obligations towards ORDA

The Law no 8/1996 on Copyright and Related Rights, with subsequent amendments and supplements, clearly states the documents that collective management organizations must submit to ORDA in order to comply with transparency principles. Thus, according to art. 135 paragraphs 1 and 2 of Law no. 8/1996, CREDIDAM submitted to ORDA the following documents, in the first quarter of each year, after its General Assembly:

"a) the annual report, approved by the General Assembly;

b) the annual report of the Audit Committee, presented to the General Assembly;

c) the Decisions of the Courts regarding the registration of changes to the Statute, approved by the Romanian Copyright Office;

d) the updated repertoire;

e) the representation contracts with similar foreign organizations.

(2) the documents referred to in paragraph 1 letters a) and d) shall be submitted to the Romanian Copyright Office, in a form established by the decision of the General Manager of this Office."

In conclusion, transparency obligations incumbent on the collective management organizations are expressly and exhaustively provided by law.

On the other hand, there is no legal basis for the undersigned to be required to submit to the other collective management organizations the same documents which the law requires to be disclosed to ORDA, and art. 133 paragraph (7) cannot be applied by analogy, as there is no basis in this regard, the more that this rule expressly states that it applies to the single collector.

Although we share the opinion expressed by ORDA regarding competitive activities in the field, we have shown that, on several occasions, the collective management organizations have been treated (by the courts, the Competition Council) as undertakings who are subject to the Competition Law no. 21/1996, so in this case we are in a situation of competing undertakings, given that both CREDIDAM and two other collective management organizations are operating in the field of performers. Or, under these circumstances, until clear regulations in this regard, ORDA cannot require collective management organizations to offer information and violate the confidential nature of business secrets.

2.3. ON THE ISSUES POINTED OUT BY ORDA AND POSSIBLE REMEDIES

ORDA has identified a series of problems that come from a number of errors of Law no. 8/1996. Regarding the errors pointed out here, we specify that, in practice, a number of inconsistencies arose in the text of Law no. 8/1996, but we consider that such errors can only be overcome when amending the law and not by a decision issued by ORDA.

The reason is that any amendment to Law no. 8/1996 can be done only by another normative act with a force greater than or equal to it, namely by meeting the principle of hierarchy of normative acts, according to Law no. 24/2000 on Legislative Technique for Law Drafting. As such, ORDA, in virtue of its regulatory powers, in cannot intervene in changing a law (stricto sensu) by its decision (which represents a unilateral administrative act) in favor of the collective management organizations representing 2% of the repertoire used on the Romanian territory and to the detriment of the collective management organizations that manage 98% of the repertoire used on the Romanian territory.

Despite all stated arguments, in the sense that a regulation decision for the transparency obligation is not necessary, ORDA's Decision no.114/2016[3] was issued, an administrative act that shall be analyzed below.

The transparency obligation of collective management organizations assigned as collector in the field is already regulated, expressly and exhaustively, by the provisions of Law no. 8/1996 on Copyright and Related Rights. The provisions of art. 133, paragraphs (6) – (8) refer to the single collector, and they apply to equitable remuneration in the field of „private copy". Their application cannot be extended by analogy to the other fields, given that Law no. 8/1996 sought to create an exceptional procedure for the field of private copying.

According to art. 133, paragraph (7) of Law no. 8/1996, as quoted above, it applies only to sole collectors and it cannot be transposed to the collectors designated by ORDA for various fields of collection, even if they are subject to the mandatory collective management.

Besides, even for collector in other fields than the „private copying" the obligation to ensure transparency operates in the collection activity, in accordance with art. 130, paragraph (1), letter i) of Law no. 8/1996, which states that „the collective management organizations have the following obligations: i) to ensure the transparency of the collective management organizations in relations with public authorities which have the right to control and, through them, with the users;"

We appreciate that the transparency in the collection activity of the collecting organization can be assessed only in relation to the relevant information for the activity of the recipient collective management organizations. In other words, the gross amount collected for members other than belonging to each recipient collective management organization, cannot be regarded as constituting a legitimate interest for these collective management organizations. We do not know the relevance and, moreover, we have not been communicated any reasons why a recipient organization should know the amount collected by CREDIDAM for its members, for direct or indirect foreign members. Also, one should also note the arbitrary and oscillating context in which the decision was issued. We recall that ORDA firstly concluded that it is unnecessary to issue such a decision, and then, only a few months later, it issued the Decision no. 114/2016, on the basis of some undisclosed letter from other competing collective management organizations.

ORDA places in charge of the collective management organization designated as collector, the obligation to communicate to the recipient organizations that are competing entities on the market, documents received from third parties, i.e. users, documents having the character of "trade secret". According to art. 130 paragraph 1 letter h) of Law no. 8/1996 it is the task of the collective management organization to request them, and where these users refuse to communicate them, these organizations can invoke the legal provisions.

The transparency obligation is already regulated at national and European level, without the need to legislate through an administrative act, beyond the legal provisions in force.

ORDA has regulated the transparency obligations of the collective management organizations designated as collectors/sole collectors for the rights subject to mandatory collective management.

Even the issuing authority considered that the title of the initial draft decision contravenes the provisions of Law no. 8/1996, being changed upon publication in the Official Gazette of the final version of the text.

We have introduced the difference between the concept of „collective management organization designated as sole collector" and „collective management organization designated as collector in a field", by showing for each of them the incumbent legal obligations. However, without acknowledging the thoroughness of this distinction provided by the legislature, when issuing the Decision no. 114/2016, ORDA appreciated that it is necessary to refer to both categories of subject matters. For better illustrating the above, we show below a comparison between the titles given to the initial draft and, subsequently, the final text of the decision, as pbulished in the Official Gazette:

THE TITLE OF THE DRAFT SUBMITTED BY ORDA	THE CURRENT TITLE OF ORDA'S DECISION NO. 114/2016
The draft decision on the transparency obligation of collective management organizations designated as collector	Decision no. 114/2016 on the transparency obligation of collective management organizations designated as for the rights subject to mandatory collective management	collector/sole collector for the rights subject to mandatory collective management

[3] Decision no. 114/2016 on Transparency Obligations of collective maangement organizations appointed as collector/sole collector for the rights subject to mandatory collective management.

Compared to the above, the title of the draft was changed in order to be applied to CREDIDAM, which is a collective management organization that cannot be considered as sole collector for the purposes of Law no. 8/1996, but a collector on source/field of collection. The transparency obligations provided for each of the two collective management organizations above, are referred to differently in Law no. 8/1996. The art. 133 paragraphs 6–8 refer to the sole collector, and this applies to equitable remuneration in the field of „private copying"[4] and only for the sole collectors (UPFR and OPERĂSCRISĂ.RO) and cannot be transposed upon the collectors appointed by ORDA in various collection fields, even if they are subject to mandatory collective management, such as CREDIDAM.

Beyond the terminology used by the legislature in Law no. 8/1996 and the obligations incumbent upon each collective management organization, be it a sole collector, or a collector in certain field/source (e.g. public communication), it is essential to note that the national legislation regulates the transparency obligation incumbent upon the two organizations. Therefore, a regulation beyond the legal provisions already provided, by ORDA's Decision no. 114/2016 respectively, supplements the legal framework without any grounds or reasons. The Law no. 8/1996 already provides for the transparency obligations of CREDIDAM, namely: art. 125[1] – towards the general public; art. 130 paragraph 1 letter f – towards the members and art. 135 paragraph 1 – towards ORDA. They were also detailed on the www.orda.ro website. As one can see, the legislature did not provide for the transparency obligations incumbent upon one collective management organization by comparison to another collective management organizations competing in the market.

Moreover, at Community level, the Directive 2014/26/EU of February 26th, 2014 in Chapter 5 speaks about the transparency of the collective management organization towards the other collective management organizations for which it manages rights under a representation agreement. Beyond the fact that this condition is not fulfilled when it comes of the relationship between the collective management organization appointed as collector for the rights subject to mandatory collective management and the recipient collective management organizations, you shall see that ORDA's Decision no. 114/2016 exceeds including such legal provisions. In other words, by an individual administrative act the transparency obligations of the undersigned are unduly extensive, such obligations which are not provided for even at European level. We mention that, Law no. 8/1996 has implemented, since 2004, all the transparency obligations incumbent upon the collective management organizations, which are provided for by the above directive.

Therefore, we consider that ORDA's Decision no. 114/2016, extends the content of transparency obligation as much as possible, beyond any national and European legal provision.

By ORDA's letter no. RGII/INT/8266/ 11.11.2016 - RGII/IES/No.8266/17.11.2016[5] the provisions of ORDA's Decision no. 114/2016 are changed, thus leading to other obligations imposed to the collective management organizations concerned.

The text of ORDA's Decision no. 114/2016 lacks in precision, which is why CREDIDAM was forced to seek further clarifications from the issuing body in order to apply it. Thus, even if ORDA's decision is a unilateral administrative act, it must be clear, precise, and unambiguous regarding its enforcement by the subject of law which it is intended for. Writing a confusing, unclear text, even for the person who is subject to that regulation, it lacks predictability and can cause serious damages to the subject of law.

Specifically, by corroboration of the title of art. 2 with point A letter a), it results clearly that only the gross amount collected for the recipient organizations toward which there is a transparency obligation, must be communicated to them. But, by ORDA's letter no. RGII/INT/NR.8266/11.11.2016-RGII/IES/NR.8266/17.11.2016, the same provisions have been construed to refer to the total amounts collected by CREDIDAM for all the performers, for whom and whose repertoire it grants non-exclusive licenses to users.

Thus, we find ourselves in a situation where the text of ORDA's Decision no. 114/2016 expressly provides an obligation incumbent upon CREDIDAM, and then, by ORDA's clarification, to be substantially amended. An indisputable proof in this respect are the opinions of other recipient collective management organizations: „In this context, the clarifications brought by ORDA, while having no regulatory power, their mere exposure in some letters does not ensure and guarantee the practical application thereof, and from this perspective we are convinced that ORDA knows ...[6]" In other words, although the text of the decision concerns the disclosure of the gross collected/distributed amount payable only to recipient

[4] According to art. 133, paragraph (7) of Law no. 8/1996 on Copyright and Related Rights: „the collective management organization, which is the sole collector, is required to issue the authorization through a non-exclusive license, in writing, on behalf of all recipient collective management organizations and to ensure both transparency of collection activities and the related costs in relations to the recipient collective management organizations.".

[6] UNART letter no. 2495/21.11.2016; first page, last paragraph; not published.

There unquestionably follows, firstly that the text of ORDA's Decision no. 114/2016 is neither clear, nor predictable and, secondly, that the same was amended by extending the limits of the obligation initially set. Or, the legal standard, even if in this case it is an individual administrative act, it is binding and „it must be clear, comprehensible, as the addressees should not only be informed in advance of the consequences of their acts and deeds, but to understand the legal consequences thereof. Otherwise, the principle ignore nemo censetur legem could no longer be applied, which would have serious consequences for the security of social relations, for the existence of society in general[7]".

Beyond the issues above, if the collected gross amount indicated in letter a) refers to the total amount collected by CREDIDAM on collection sources for all the performers, then the letter d) cannot be implemented, because d) is never equal to a) – h). ORDA wrongly claimed that at letter d) does not indicate a calculation formula, as the text of ORDA's Decision no. 114/2016 is clear on this aspect, and the texts of the law shall be construed to the effect and not in a sense that produces no effect. Considering that the formula indicated in letter d) should not apply, as stated, it would mean that the second sentence of the text of the decision would not produce any effect, in which case this mention is not justified. Including the wording of the text and after correlating with the other provisions, it is very clear that the collected gross amount indicated in letter a) refers to the gross amounts collected for the members of recipient organizations, in which case the letter d) can be implemented based on the calculation formula specified in the decision at letter d), namely d) = a) – h).

Moreover, by ORDA's letter no. RGII / INT / NR.8266 / 11.11.2016 – RGII / IES / NR.8266 / 17.11.2016, the point B) of art. 2 in ORDA's Decision no. 114/2016 was also changed. Thus, if the initial construing of the decision text as published, referred to the communication of the list of works used by indicating the holders (Playlists), through the clarifications brought, ORDA has extended this obligation to all the information required by art. 130 paragraph 1 letter h) of Law no. 8/1996.

Likewise, also the assertion of ORDA's letter no. RGII/INT/NR.8266/11.11.2016-RGII/IES/NR.8266/17.11.2016, namely that: „ ... in ORDA's Decision no. 114/2016 neither playlists are specified (either raw or processed) nor established a form in which the collective management organizations should communicate the information provided by users on the use of the repertoire managed by the recipient organization, in order to determine the remuneration distributed to the latter.", shows that the decision text lacks in clarity.

The legality of the administrative act represents one of the most important validity conditions of administrative acts and refers to the obligation of its compliance with the constitutional provisions, with the laws adopted by the legislative power, including with all normative acts that have a higher legal force. This feature shall be assessed, both in relation to the relevant provisions at national level, and also at international level. Thus, the illegality hypothesis of ORDA's Decision no. 114/2016 provisions, must be assessed in relation to other national and European legal provisions in force governing the transparency obligation.

Neither the provisions of art. 2 point B) of ORDA's Decision no. 114/2016 as published, nor the exhaustive construction given by the letter of clarification are to be found in the existing national or European legislation at this moment.

The provisions of art. 2 point B) set as a task of the collective management organization appointed as collectors to communicate certain information which is not related to collection but to the distribution that each collective management organization must do for its members. CREDIDAM is not in the legal position to intervene in the distribution activity of other collective management organizations, and such interference was not prescribed by the legislature in the provisions of Law no. 8/1996 and, consequently, it is neither the prerogative of ORDA.

The information provided at art. 130 paragraph 1 letter h) of Law no. 8/1996, is covered by the confidentiality clauses that CREDIDAM must comply with. These are trade secrets having economic value as a result of the business model implied by the information they contain regarding the duration of advertising during TV shows, the income earned by users, retransmitted programs etc. Disclosure of such confidential information without the consent of the users from which they emanate, makes the collective management organization responsible for the damages caused by these facts.

Under art. 1 letter d) of Law no. 11/1991 on Fight against Unfair Competition: *„trade secret – any information which, in whole or in part, is not generally known or is not easily accessible to people who usually deal with this kind of information and acquires commercial value by the fact that it is secret, for which the legitimate holder took the reasonable steps under the circumstances in on order to be kept under secrecy; trade secret protection operates as long as the conditions set out above are cumulatively fulfilled;". During time, CREDIDAM has taken active measures in order to protect the trade secret represented by works used list indicating the holders, notified to users, meaning it established including a procedure, since 2012, to classify them as confidential information.

[7] The principle of legal security as legal foundation of the rule of law, case law markers, Ion Predescu - Judge of the Constitutional Court, Marieta SAFTA – Assistant Chief Magistrate – „In a rich case law, the European Court of Human Rightsstressed the importance of ensuring accessibility and foreseeability of law, instituting a series of markers which the legislature must consider in order to ensure these requirements. Thus, in cases like Sunday Times vs. the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, 1979, Rekvényi vs. Hungary, 1999, Rotaru vs. Romania, 2000, Damman vs. Switzerland, 2005, European Court of Human Rights stressed that "there can be regarded as "law" only a rule formulated with sufficient precision to enable the individual to regulate his/her conduct".

Likewise, ORDA's interpretation that the above information may not represent trade secrets is based on the wrong legal reasoning, in our opinion. Asserting that: „the recipient organizations do not have the capacity as third parties in relation with the users but with the organization appointed as collector" cannot be accepted, as the only one that can say to whom/which third party allows access to such secret information is the holder of the trade secret itself. ORDA cannot subrogate the holder of this right, and neither CREDIDAM nor the recipient collective management organizations. The users are the only ones that, as subjects of law that can invoke the protection of confidential information against any third party, authorize for them to be disclosed or not to other subjects of law than CREDIDAM. Although obtaining such information is achieved by fulfilling a legal obligation of users, namely the provisions of art. 130 paragraph 1 letter h) of Law no. 8/1996, this is not enough to conclude that, after obtaining it, the same can be disclosed to other third parties.

More specifically, the undersigned cannot invoke any legal provision to exempt itself from liability that may be drawn for disclosing certain secret information to other people. It is wrong to assume that the legal effects of the legal basis that allows obtaining this information can be extended „ope legis" through CREDIDAM to the competing collective management organizations. CREDIDAM showed through its opinions communicated to ORDA that the recipient collective management organizations could have effectively invoked the provisions of art. 130 paragraph 1 letter h) of Law no. 8/1996[8]. We think that this proposal is a fair and legal solution by which the recipient collective management organizations could legally get the above information. These legal provisions apply uniformity to all collective management organizations, providing the same rights and obligations for them. Law no. 8/1996 provides an OBLIGATION for all the collective management organizations to ask directly from users all the information needed for distribution, this being one of the objects of activity for which they were established.

Since art. 134[4], paragraph (4) of Law no. 8/1996 expressly regulates as incumbent upon the collective management organizations the confidentiality obligation regarding the information received from users during the access procedure to data of their members, the more this obligation subsists in the relations with the other collective management organizations on the market.

Regarding legislation at EU level, none of the articles 18, 19, 20 and 21 of Directive governing the transparency obligation both to users, right-holders and between other collective management organizations with which they concluded representation agreements, do not provide for the communication of information referred to in art. 2 point B) of ORDA's Decision no. 114/2016. Likewise, art. 18 paragraph 1 letter d of the Directive speaks about making available certain information „(...) except that the collecting society cannot provide this information for objective reasons related to reports made by users." It is noted that the Community legislature has taking into account the possibility that some information cannot be disclosed due to confidentiality.

We have not identified any legal basis for issuing this decision, unless the provisions referring to the prerogative of issuing authority to issue administrative acts that must be in accordance with Law no. 8/1996.

Stating the grounds for administrative acts represents an additional guarantee of legality and effective protection of citizens' rights and freedoms. Verifying this condition can diminish the risk that the issuing authorities might issue arbitrary, unfair decisions. Doctrine is unanimous in assessing that, to the extent that the law imposes the obligation to state the grounds, the administrative act issued in breach of this obligation is null and void.[9] Indicating some letters and of the legal basis which empowers the administrative authority does not represent the rightful grounds for issuing this decision. Accordingly, the subject of law is damaged, being unable to properly exercise its rights of defense as provided by art. 1 paragraph (3) in conjunction with art. 31 paragraph 2 of the Constitution of Romania. These legal provisions require, as a prerequisite to the rule of law, the obligation of public authorities to provide accurate information to citizens on matters of their personal interest, a condition which cannot be seen as fulfilled as far as no legal basis is indicated.

Likewise, we refer to the case law of Bucharest Court of Appeal – 8th Section – Administrative and Fiscal Disputes which ruled by the Decision no. 2973 on September 10th, 2012 issued on appeal that: „stating the grounds for an administrative decision cannot be limited to considerations of issuer's competence or the legal grounds thereof, but it also contain elements in fact which allow, on the one hand, the recipients to know and assess the justification for the decision, and on the other hand, to make it possible the exercise of judicial reviews." In this case, besides the jurisdiction, [8] Art. 130 alin. 1 lit. h – „to ask for users or for their intermediaries to communicate information and send the documents needed in order to determine the remuneration amounts they collect, as well as information regarding the used works, indicating the right-holders, in order to distribute them; both users and their intermediaries are required to provide, in writing and electronic format, within 10 days of request, the requested information and docuements, signed by the legal representative and stamped;".

[9] A. Trăilescu. Administrative Law – Elementary Treaty, Ed. All- BecK 2002, pg. 193.

there is no other legal basis. The High Court of Cassation and Justice, by the decision no. 1153/2008 has noted: „stating the grounds is decisive to make the delimitation between the adopted administrative act at the discretion conferred by the law to the public authorities and the one adopted by abuse of power, as that concept is defined in article 2 paragraph 1) letter n) of Law no. 554/2004".

Through the Civil Judgment no. 6185 dated October 29th, 2013 delivered by Arad Court of Justice in the case file no. 7108/108/2013, was established that: „In fact, even in the Community case law is held that the explanatory statement should be appropriate for the issued document and it must provide in a clear and unequivocal manner the algorithm followed by the institution that adopted the contested measure, so as to allow the persons concerned to prepare the explanatory statement for such measures and also to allow the competent Community Courts to review the document (case C - 367/1995) and, as decided by the European Court of Justice, the dimension and details of the explanatory statement depend on the nature of the adopted document and the requirements which the reasoning must meet depend on the circumstances of each case, an insufficient or erroneous reasoning is considered to be equivalent to a lack of grounds for the acts and, moreover, the insufficient reasoning or lack of reasoning entail nullity or invalidity of Community documents (case C - 41/1969) and specifying in detail the reasons is necessary even when the issuing institution has a wide assessing discretion, because the explanatory statement gives transparency to the document, in this manner giving individuals the possibility to check if the document is properly grounded and, at the same time, allowing the Court to exercise the jurisdictional review (causa C - 509/1993)".

At European level, according to art. 41 paragraph 2 letter c of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union the right to a good administration refers, among other things, also to the fact that administration obligation is to give reasons for the issued decisions[10]. Also the European case law has held the same conclusion, namely the nullity of the administrative act for the lack of its reasoning in considering the principle of „equality of arms". It requires that „each party to such a trial should receive a reasonable opportunity to present their case to the Court under conditions that do not disadvantage them significantly in relation to the opposing party "(European Court of Human Rights, Dombo Beheer BV vs. the Netherlands, Judgment of October 27th, 1993, series A no. 274, p. 19; European Commission of Human Rights, Judgment of July 16th, 1968, Complaint no. 2804/66 Annuaire de la Convention, vol. XI, p. 381; European Court of Human Rights, Georgiadis vs. Greece, Judgment of May 29th, 1997).

Likewise, the High Court of Cassation and Justice, Administrative and Fiscal Disputes Section, by the Judgment no. 1580/2008, delivered in the case file no. 70703/42/2006, during the public session of April 11th, 2008, noted: „Therefore, the High Court held that any decision likely to have an effect on the rights and fundamental freedoms must be justified not only in terms of competence to issue that administrative act, but also in terms of the possibility of the person and society to assess the legality and merits of the measure or the compliance boundaries between discretion and arbitrariness. To accept the argument that the employer does not have to give reasons for decisions, is tantamount to rendering innocuous the essence of democracy, the rule of law based on the principle of legality".

ORDA's interpretation that implementing the provisions of the Decision no. 114/2016 does not imply additional costs for the collecting collective management organizations is contradicted by the provisions of the arbitration award that set a maximum fee for covering the collection costs of 3% for the cable retransmission sourse or 9% for the public communication source (i.e. the information at point A) and fail to provide a management fee for covering the costs for processing the information required for distribution of the amounts payable to other collective management organizations, i.e. the information at point B). Thus, there will be additional costs for human resources that will be responsible for the preparation and communication of the information to the competing collective management organizations, costs that will be incurred by the members and non-members represented by CREDIDAM, whom are withheld an unlawfully higher fee than in previous years.

Referring to the ability to collect and distribute to its members of the collecting collective management organizations, does not justify for the supervisory body to decide that they have the financial resources to also achieve the task of the recipient collective management organizations. This situation causes damages to the collecting collective management organization which is bound by the Decision no. 114/2016 to incur additional costs that were not provided even by the Arbitrators or Courts.

3. Conclusions

There are a number of differences between the two procedures and the main cause is that for the "private copy" field the sole collector represents and collects for several categories of right-holders (authors, performers and producers of phonograms), a fact which also determines a special regime for the two procedures.

[10] Article 41 The right to good management (1) Every person has the right for its/his/her problems to be handled impartially, fairly and within a reasonable time by the institutions, bodies, offices and agencies of the Union. 26.10.2012 the Official Journal of the European Union C 326/403 RO (2) This right mainly includes: (a) the right of every person to be heard before any individual measure which could prejudice it/him/her; (b) the right of every person to access its/his/her file, while meeting the legitimate interests of confidentiality and of professional and business secrecy; (c) the obligation of the management to give reasons for the decision*.; (...).*

There is no legal basis to regulate beyond the provisions of Law no. 8/1996 on Copyright and Related Rights the contents of the transparency obligation incumbent upon the collective management organizations other than those designated for the private copying source.

PROPERTY AND FREE INITIATIVE IN ECONOMY

Viorel CORNESCU[*]
Cristina CHIRIAC[]

Abstract

The property is a subject that has been and it is studied by specialists from the economics, philosophy, law, history fields etc. It is natural to be a subject of attraction since the property is an essential precondition of the human economic activity, activity that provides the basis of his existence and creates the foundation for the other human activities. As between economics and law – how everybody knows – exists a close interdependence, it is necessary to explain this interdependence from the property perspective, as well as the relationship between property - economic liberty - free initiative. A clarification of ideas about these things and theoretical aspects, from economic and legal point of view, we believe that will have a benefic effect for the economical, legal and political practice etc.

Keywords: property, economic liberty, types of property, free initiative, private property.

1. Introduction

The property issue is one of the most important issues of the economical theory and practice, we can say not only economical but also political, legal, moral, etc. The human existence is linked to the property, the goods approximation by humans in order to meet their needs, initially in a pure form, dirrectly, and then through conventions and social norms, is determined by their interests, on one hand and of insufficient resources in relation to their needs, on the other hand.

In other words, it is a constant and a characteristic of a human and of the human society, a natural reality, acknowledged by the human, we can appreciate that it is both a social relationship and also a natural law. As we can not breathe without oxygen, in the same way we can not exist without the approximation and consumption of goods, processes which have as a prerequisite the property. It accompanies us all the time, from the appearance of human, at all stages of their development. They have acknowledged the property, since ancient times, as something you can not miss, as something that can not be denied. The property exists, is on the natural course of life to relate to her, and account for it. Paraphrasing the author Marin Preda, who said at one point in the „Morometii" novel, that „there is nothing if there isn't love", we can say also that „there is nothing if there isn't property". This is why from the earliest times it has been trying to explain what the property is, how it may be seen, both in terms of individual, as well as from the society point of view.

Ideas about property can be found in religious writings, such as „Old Testament", where ownership appears as being acknowledge by the human as a natural reality, in the writings of the thinkers from antiquity to our days, philosophers, historians, economists, lawyers, sociologists et. al. Plato, Aristotle and other antiquity philosophers made a lot of references about property in general and its role in society, on the property natural character, as well as on the justification of a type of property or another. Plato looked with critical eyes private property, while Aristotle claimed private property, seen as an instrument of existence considering that it refers at the goods approximation necessary to the existence. He further said, that everything beyond the first need mean wealth and not property, even if wealth led to a multiplicity of instruments[1].

Religious and philosophical ideas regarding ownership intertwined with the economical and legal ideas. Property approach from an economic perspective is, in our view, an objective necessity. Human must live, must satisfy their needs with goods from the nature, or with goods (services) created by him. This implies economic activity. Not accidentally the property is viewed in the economic sense, as the totality of relationships between people in connection with the acquisition of goods, as a historically defined form of ownership. It is natural then that economical ideas to be generated by the goods and property interests. If we look at the course of the economical ideas across the time, the way of the shape, of economic doctrines set up and development, we find that in the center of the preocupation is located the property, both as an theoretical reflection of natural and social reality and human position to goods, and also as a goods approximation, possession and use. Mercantilists were speaking about wealth and reflection (embodiment) of it through its precious metal, of enrichment through commerce, industry and especially currency. Physiocrats, focusing on agriculture, looked at the property as a natural law, claiming property guarantee and, on this basis, of the economical freedom. On this idea went and go the liberalism representatives which considers that the individual is the only reality, according to natural law, as he is his own master, master of his own will and his own body, thus being the owner. Hence the idea that the property is natural, any individual owning a property, those self. In this context, the property is justified by the idea of work, human acting on the nature, inherently it has the right (natural) on the products of his labor. So, not only property exists naturally, but is also necessary.

The liberalism as a economical doctrine, known over time shades, some of them being outlined in the current independent thinking. For example, the neoclassical current which it flows from the classical thinkers from Adam Smith, David Ricardo, John Stuart Mill and others, it was divided into three schools of thought: English marginal school, Austrian school and Lausanne Swiss School. The view differences does not refer to the property, but to the interpretation manner of the economical concepts and facts and from here of the action directions. Ideological base is the same, no one denied and does not deny the property in the economical sense, not even K. Marx, which defines the property as „Appropriation of nature by an individual within and by means of a determined social forms."[2].

Although Marx criticizes capitalism and its foundations, the idea of ownership remains as prerequisite for production and social development. It is criticized capitalist private property and the way of creating, acquiring and developing them, given the fact that the real creators of the property, according to Marx, in the sense of wealth, are those who work (working class), who are exploited by those who own the means of production and, on this basis, economic strength.

The development of economic thought in the twentieth century and early twenty-first century by relevant thinking trends such as Keynesianism, monetarism, institutionalism, behaviorism, etc. is based - on our opinion - on the idea of the property which underlies the real economy and structuring economical behavior of people, communities and society as a whole.

In reality every economy is a mixed economy, and its working mechanism is the market mechanism, a mechanism which creates and distributes wealth (the subject of property). In conclusion, understanding wealth as a materialization of the property, all economic doctrines have focused, or on the creation of wealth (Adam Smith), or on the distribution of its (David Ricardo), or on the wealth increase (John Maynard Keynes) or on the explaining the human economical behavior.

2. Property at the intersection between economic and legal

As highlighted from the above, human existence is linked to the property. Between this and the economic interests of the people there is a biunique relationship. The property is manifested in society, mainly, in the form of economic interests, and these, in turn, drives the society members towards the development property (wealth).

An economic interest is always determined by the satisfaction of human needs. Just as the human needs know an evolving, the same thing happend with economic interests. They are constantly evolving, from primary phase imposed by the direct contact of human with the nature, at more complex and advanced forms like those of today.

Economic interest is causing the act of human awareness about its needs and therefore, his action for their satisfaction. People acquisition of conscience interests, transform these into action motivations, purposes and momentum of human activity. Human being involve, seeks to transform nature, to acquire goods from nature to produce more and to create wealth, from the awareness of the property existence, which gives a reason to the goods approximation to meet their needs. It is reported to goods, at the wealth, not only based on its needs, but also from the relationship between him and other members of the community in which he lives. Hence, it follows that in our consciousness, the property is represented on one hand, as a social relation between people in connection with obtaining and acquiring goods, on the other hand, as a material wealth, a quantity of goods that we are approaching and dispose of them whenever we like, according with our interests. This prompts us to point out that there is a separation between ownership seen from a theoretical point of view, as a stand-alone concept (social relation) and property object, goods of various kinds (wealth itself).

From economical point of view property – as I said – it is a social relationship, the property subject is recognized only within this relationship. So, the property outside human society does not exist, it does not make sense and content. The appearance of the human, of the human communities, has generated property recognition as a relationship and as a object. The members of the human communities to make a living, became aware that the proximity of goods for their own use can not be achieved if other members do not agree, do not recognize this right. In other words, appears objectively the idea of property for the purely purposes, untouched by any interpretation, respectively the power exercised by someone on his property, on his riches, shall be recognized by other members of the community, the property being essentially a way of achieving human powers over wealth.

The rules of coexistence of human societies includes also the one regarding ownership in the form of customs, rules, regulations etc., which gradually, with the advent of state and law were transformed into legal norms, meaning a right distinct – right property. „There has not been and there can not be human society without the presence of property rules and therefore property rights, expressed or implied, of organizing the relationship between people in order to use things and goods. In this view, the thing that differentiates companies, which opposes is not the presence or absence of property rights, but how those legal rights enshrined combines and conjugates with each other."[3] In other words, property in the economic sense is metamorphosed in the ownership in a legal sense, namely in property right. So, the property besides de economical valence, embrace also a juridical valence, meaning that the goods proximity, acquisition and appropriation become a right, reinforced and sanctioned by the coercive power of the state.

Hegel said that the individual and property are inseparably linked. The property is a condition of life and human development; it is generated by the human nature and must be appreciated as an absolute and primitive law, which is not resulting from any outside act, as occupation, job or contract. Property right came from human nature itself. It is sufficient to prove that you are human to enjoy also from the right property[4].

Between the economical property approach and juridical approach, there is a clear interdependence. We consider that we can not talk about property only from the economical point of view, or only from the juridical point of view. The property is a unitary concept reflected both in its natural character, and also in his subjective character, given by its natural reglementation in society, respectively by its right property.

„Property rights are as fundamental as the rarity and rationality of resource allocation"[5].

In essence, property right is „that subjective law that gives expression to the approach of a thing, allowing to his owner to exercise the possession, to use and dispose of that thing, under its own power and self-interest, and in compliance with the legal provisions"[6].

„The guarantee and protection of the right property is a major attribute of the state, ensuring consistency and stability of economic actions, directing economic agents movements by creating the incentives, through economic agents empowerment for the results obtained and to partners by sanitizing economic life in general to ensure the normal operation of the market mechanism"[7].

So, we can appreciate that property right is a fundamental right, a fact accepted by the constitutions of democratic countries and international treaties. J.J. Rousseau said that „the right property, through the guarantees stipulated, will confer the natural status of development to all human communities and each of their members."[8].

Defining and defending the property rights is an increasingly important part of the rules that govern economic life, causing what economic movements must be made by creating the incentives, by empowering economic agents towards results and to partners, but also for general economical life cleaning in order to formulate and achieve a correct supply and demand based on the competition.

According to Professor Belli, property rights, as a whole mechanism of economic growth, rests on the following pillars of strength[9]:

a) access to the natural and human resources;
b) technological investments;
c) people's preferences;
d) development institutions.

„There are at least three major circumstances that circumscribe the content of property rights. First, there is the fact that these human rights gives social permission to access the resources of its existence. But he realizes this access, usually, not as a parasite, but as a creator of goods and services from the acquired resources. Property rights looks therefore before all the facts at the material production. Secondly, the same rights are a prerequisite of the goods exchange. The sale and purchase act, daily repeated a million times over, can not take place, if those engaged in this process do not owe (or authorized by him) the goods exchanged. Through the exchanges, however, property rights include not only production, but also material goods and services distribution. Third, property rights permit the appropriation of goods, not only as a result of production and distribution, but also of the redistribution process, as taxes on profit or wealth, inheritances, donations, etc."[10].

Romanian legal doctrine in interpreting 480 article from the old Civil Code, consider that the attributes which form the content of property right are: the right to use the asset (jus utendi), the right to collect the fruits (jus Fruend) and the right to dispose the good (jus abutendi). The new Civil code establishes (555 article) as property attributes: possession, use and disposal. Possession (jus possidendi) enables the owner to exercise actual dominion of the work in its materiality, directly and immediately, through its own power, its own interest or to consent that the possession should be exercised in the name and on behalf of, by another person[11].

From a legal perspective, the property characters, as set out in the new Civil code (555 article) are: exclusive character, absolute character and perpetuity character. The exclusive character put in mind that the owner of the property is the only one entitled to exercise his right attributes, being the only one who can oppose of any disturbance whether they are caused by individuals or by the state. Perpetuity character highlights the fact that property right doesn't have a limited time, can not be lost through disuse by the holder. In other words, the right to private property is inalienable[12]. The absolute character is explained by some authors as a character which targets property rights of erga omnes, which means that all other law subjects are forced by law to respect the owner rights. Related to this character, E. Chelaru highlights the fact that its existence does not depend on any rights that would serve as the basis of the constitution. In other words, property right is defined by itself and not in relation to other rights. Property right is the only right that allows the holder to exercise all the prerogatives conferred on them, in the power and own interest.

Throughout the time, the property understood as a social relation clad two types:

A. common property, in a common sense (to all), the state being the holder, through central government (the public domain - the national interest) and/or administrative-territorial units (public domain of local interest: town, city, county), The attribute of all, in reality means that, nationwide, of the citizens of that country, at a local level, of the population who owes and live particular territorial area; B. Private property, seen as private-particular property and also as a private property of the State (state private domain) and of the administrative-territorial units (private domain of the administratively-territorial units). In the case of private-particular property, the property holders are individuals (private individual) and/or groups of individuals associated based on certain interests, with a common purpose (private property associations). When the property owner is a single person or entity, private property is exclusive, and if there is more than one person, it is common private property, in condominium or co-ownership. Private state domain and private domain of the administrative-territorial units have a distinct status from private property (particular), of individuals and groups associate. First, the owner is the state, on the one hand and administrative-territorial units, on the other hand, secondly, its management is performed centrally by the state or at a local level, in the interest of citizens. The difference between public and private domain of the state and of the administrative-territorial units, is not significant for the economic sense of public property, but how does it fit into the civil circuit. From a legal perspective, both sectors (public and private) have as a holder the state autorities (central or local), so the property is seen in the unity of the public, on one hand and the private sector, on the other hand.

It is appropriate to make a statement. In the above classification of the property, we took into account the current legislation stipulations from Romania. Text of the law - in our opinion - does not always reflect accurately the social and economic reality. Is possible that some legal concepts to be nuanced, more or less, towards economic concepts. For example, the existing Constitution, as such as other laws, do not use the term state property, but public property, showing that its holders, as state through the central organs of administration and administratively-territorial units by local autorities administration. At the same time, in reality there are private domain of the state and administrative-territorial units, which as a type of property is private property, whose holder is the state, on one hand, through administrative central and administrative-territorial units, on the other hand, by the local administration.

From the economists perspective and not only, it is normal to use an integrating concept, the state property, as a unity between the two major areas (public and private domain of the state and public and private administrative-territorial units). This term of state property, we consider that defines property distinct which enter under the state umbrella (central and local government autorities), ensuring a net shootout by the private-particular property.

Based on these considerations and taking as a criterion the property holder, is apparent clear the existence in the society, in the current circumstances, from an economic perspective, of two major types of property, state property (public and private domain of the the state and administrative-territorial units) which reflects the content of public property (common) of all citizens at national and/or local level and the private - particular property, which reflects the content of private property (individual and associative), either as a exclusive form, or as a common private property (in condominium and co-ownership) - fig. no. 1. According to Romanian legislation, holders property rights are constituted on types and, within them, by forms of property.

Considering that a market economy and a democratic society can not be constitute and developed only under the conditions in which have the basis on private-particular property, the constituent legislator enshrined, in several articles of the Constitution, the prominent character of this kind of private property. According to this principle, within the property system, private-particular property is the rule, and state property is the exception.

In order not to misinterpret the private property term, considering that the state holds the private sector, we will use in the following, private-particular property term, for what it represent the real meaning of private property across its owners.

If we refer to both types of property, we find the following general characteristics:

a) common property (common) manifests itself differently depending on the stage of society development, for example, in primitive societies it take the form of common property, today, the form of state property, which includes the private property of the state;
b) public property is broadly seen as the state property equivalent;
c) private property appears, on one hand as a private property of the state, on the other hand, as a private – particular property;
d) public domain can be of national interest, case in which, the property holder is the state, or other entity of local interest, so the property holder is the local authority, at commune level, city or county;
e) the double quality of the state and of the administrative-territorial units, by any legal person of public law and by any legal person of private law, gives them the right to be the property owner of the national public domain goods, or for interests or locally as appropriate, as well as of the private property goods;
f) goods which make up the private domain of the state and administrative-territorial units are not limited, the limited character is specific to the public domain;
g) all the movable or immovable assets under the civil circuit, can be the subject of the private property rights;

Private property (particular), occupies a central place in the property system from market economy countries. What defines the private property in a market economy, is not its presence in the manifesting forms, but the dominance of three essential legal principles:

a) any property right can only be an attribute of the persons, defined by individual and personal rights;
b) any law relating to the possession, resources use or transfer can not be the subject of several simultaneous and competing properties;
c) any legally established right of an individual constitutes a „private good", which can be freely assigned or transferred for the benefit of the others.

Private–particular property, from its appearance, has been particularly visible in the exclusive private property form, holder being a single person or entity and under the common private property form, which acts as a condominium ownership and/or co-ownership. In the case of individual property, in which the one who owes the production factors and uses them directly, by using their own labor (craft individual property, of the peasant, of the merchant, of the various services provider etc.). It manifests itself when an individual who owns the production factors, its uses in the goods or services production and marketing, by hiring factory non-owners salaried workers, but the owners of their own workforce. Exclusivist private property is put in value through the association process of several individuals in various forms. Private–particular property is also manifested through consumers broad category, who enteres into the possession of the consumer goods exercise their rights to use them. The fact is that, for the natural and upward course of the economy, very important is the private–associative property, organized or in the form of capital companies or individuals, where the owners uses non-owner employees, either in the form of cooperatives. An important role in the economic development it is also the individual property of those who initiates and organizes various businesses on their own (eg. Small entrepreneurs).

State property (public and private domain), present in different proportions, in all countries, is characterized by the fact that the goods, those from investments particularly, is owned by the state organizations, as property subject. The object use and management of this property is the task of the various public administrations, central or local.

When talking about the state public property form we refer at the infrastructure constraints sectors such as energy, rail transportation, communications, "I assume normal social conditions and requires major capital investments; in the case of military-strategic businesses; in the social sector; in the social services delivery; in the fundamental scientific research realization. However, its proportions spread diminish the workers interest and initiative, which leads to the production efficiency decrease, causing a social indifference and thus lead to the real chance to live on the account of others."[13]

The Civil Code covering both property forms, and also the acquisition manner. According to it (Civil Code, 555 article), all the using goods or private interests belonging to individuals, legal persons of private law or public law, including the assets which make up the state private domain and territorial units, forms the private property. State assets (Civil Code, 554 article) and of the administrative-territorial units which, by its nature or by the law statement, are of use or public interest and forms the public property object, but only if they were legally acquired by them.

Private property, in other words, is the holder right to possess, use and dispose of property exclusively, absolute and perpetual, within the limits set by the law. It, through its components (individual private property and associative property) is presented as the only legitimate form of attaining wealth, established through native approach, production and exchange. In contrast, public property (comprised of both state public domain and also the public domain of administrative units), the so-called public sector, is established through coercive expropriation, public interest investment, through taxation and fiscality. The last one, often constituted to the detriment of private – particular property, acquires, under certain conditions, a parasitic character, which inhibits wealth creation. We can say that the private property form has a primary advantage that contributes to the development of personal initiative, and also of its entrepreneurial skills. Moreover it is the basis of the economic freedom and of the prosperity growth, as it ensures the production development according to social needs. Regarding the disadvantages of this form we can mention the risk of starting a business, and also the high pressure on the owner.

In the society, we meet, in the current period also the mixed property, the resultant of the public–privat property, benefit from a economical perspective, as the state efforts, in this context, is correlated with the efforts of private companies, for making investments that benefit all citizens and private organizations which are participating in the partnership. Mixed property consists of shapes combining and property different proportions whose owner is the state and/or administrative-territorial units and of property private–particular where the holder is a private investor, emphasizing that the general interest defies over the strict division of property.

Nowadays, as we noticed, coexist three forms of property: private- articular, of state and mixed. Private-particular property, occupies the central place in the property system from the market economy countries. Among these property forms exists, in the conditions of market economy, a permanent compatibility. Meaning that, in economic terms, they are subordinated, equally, to the universal economic principle of rationality and efficiency. Meanwhile, individual property - proven from work - liquidates the premises of the alienated property, regardless of the forms and of the historical conditions of alienation.14

In conclusion, the property, should be seen as a evident natural reality in which, in the unraveling process of its essence, of the society manifestation mode, of the types and forms that takes, of the role it plays etc. it can be given different interpretations. The most important are the economic and legal nature, along with religious philosophical interpretations, moral, etc. Between these two interpretations which we dealt in this article, economic and legal, there are no differences, do not oppose each other, but rather there is a close interdependence, we can say a unit of two sides of the same realities that complement one another (fig. no. 2).

Therefore the economic content of the property highlights the growth wealth sources and mechanism; the distribution principles of the material assets and income; the causes of differentiation in the wealth distribution process among the population, while, through legal characteristics we reflect the movement, patrimony "movement"; patrimony rights distribution and redistribution (for example, drafting legal purchase - sale acts of the apartment, car, etc.)"[15].

3. Private property and free initiative manifestation

The property provides the economic freedom manifestation premise of the human, materialized in the decisions and actions of the production, proximity and goods consumption. Individual free initiative, as a way of expression of economic freedom is present only in certain conditions, namely when the property, better said its existing forms in the society, will permit this thing.

The first type of property known by the humanity was the common property, as common property, in primitive societies the lowest level of the technique and technology development led to a common work, as the only way of human survival. The individuals economic interests were the same, they started from the goods shortage, from the need for survival and of the individual and community. The economic freedom and, respectively free initiative, it could not occur under these conditions at the individual level, had no real basis, since all the members of society possessed in common material goods and production conditions. The economic freedom is manifested only at community level, which appears in the position of the property owner, on which can make economic decisions of initiation, organization, production development for a equal distribution of the obtained goods, for their consumption. It is noted with a great clarity, that the economic action, economic initiative, is closely linked to the property and it does not exist independently of it.

Exceeding the primitive stage, society beginner and thus of economic activity, due to the technical and technological progress, has generated a restriction of this type of property moving gradually to the private property. This fact meant the recognition by the society of the individuals right, to take possession and use and dispose of diverse nature goods, to satisfy their own personal interests. Private property, therefore, reflects the natural relations between society members (individuals) regarding their position on certain parts of social wealth, acquiring them individually, to meet their personal consumption needs.

Regardless the forms that existed over the time and exists today, private–particular property ensures the economic freedom of the individual, standing at the base of its free initiative. Thus, people, goods owners can manifest themselves as economic agents, by consuming how they consider to be more favorable, their goods. They may decide to maintain, collapse or develop their economic actions, can freely participate in sale and purchase acts, to all kinds of associations in order to produce and sale goods, to enter into agreements and contracts etc., all of which are generated by their personal economic interests. Of course, this freedom must be seen in the context of some economic objective laws and on the existence in the society of proper legal regulations.

So, in the society is created a supportive framework for private property expression and objective mechanisme for regulating the economic relations between individuals, through which ensures not only the self-interest promotion but also of the public interest (general).

The fact is that the economic interests of individuals are closely linked with thousands of wires of private–particular property, no matter of the concrete form of the manifestation. All economic operators follow through their actions a certain personal gain, think about all their past, present and future actions through the prism of maintaining and developing private property. Triggering free initiative, private–particular property put in work the people minds in order to find ways to increase efficiency, in order to respect the rationality principle from the economy, to use resources carefully. It stimulates scientific research, maintain its flame, forcing creativity triggering, introducing a new perspective, in drawing up viable solutions, even spectacular, of optimizing the economic life of society.

Ignoring private–particular property, taking measures of restriction or even constrictions, organizing and structuring economic life on other criteria and coordinated and also free initiative restriction, led and lead to lack of interest from individuals, apathy, temperance initiative of any kind, the manifestation of bureaucratic trends, not only in leadership but also in the actual pursuit of economic activity. The failure of socialist economies, as is known, was primarily due to the annihilation of private–particular property and to the socialist property establishment and "development", so-called property of all the people. This led, among other things, to the limitation up to liquidation of free economic initiative, to the abolition of free market economy and its mechanisms, to the establishment of the command economy.

By abolishing private property, people look at it from economic point of view, became simple automatism. The only economic agent, was the State, led by the Communist Party, which decide what's right and what's wrong, which are the laws that should govern economic life, how economic mechanism should look like and operate. Thereby acting, contrary to the natural course of the economy based on private property and free market mechanisms, have resulted serious errors in economic decisions, in all bearings economy. So, the economic failures of the communist government, were due, largely, to the destruction of private property and thereby, of the economic freedom and initiative freedom restriction.

Free initiative – founded on private–particular property – it is considered a natural human state from all times. Normally, it was required and requires no matter how it is reflected in the economical, political, legal doctrines etc.

It is objectively required, underpinning at the economic regulatory mechanisms, at the basis of the social economical progress. Private property provides not only the human expression freedom as an economic agent, but the possibility of this manifestation, generated, primarily, by the economic support provided to the individual – his property and, secondly, by the awareness of this position that he has in society and the role they must fulfill. All of this impel him at action, because the purpose of the action is recognized and supported by society.

4. Conclusions

Economy society, is not only an important component of it, we can say that is the fundament which ensures the existence and operation of others society components, but it also presents a fascinating field, very often surprising us by the manner in which it manifests itself.

The humans has always endeavored to understand, to explain its mechanisms, to take action as much as possible, according to them, to correct his errors or ignoring the signals that it receives, to understand them, to shape their actions and behavior so that his interests can be met. Sometimes it succeeds to harmonize with the economic laws, with the economic mechanisms requirements and specifics, with its dynamism, sometimes not. The results are evident in one case to another.

Of course, in order to smooth the integration process of the human into the requirements and into the functional mechanism of economic life, it carefully observes, investigates and studies the real economy, in order to shape their actions and be able to action in line with the objective reality. This is why, any extra knowledge of one side or another, of one aspect or another, of economic life it is beneficial. This is reflected by the course of the economic ideas over the time, which provides the theoretical foundation of practical human actions. In this context, we consider that is very important and those some considerations that we have made in this article, regarding the property, at the interdependence between economic and legal for its explanation and its manifestation, at the relationship between economic freedom and property.

Certain the property is seen as a natural reality of humans, is beneath all its actions which aim to satisfy his needs, which allows the perpetuation of species and society as a whole. The human in order to exist first he has to secure their basic needs, and then has to be able to conduct other activities that define it as a superior human being. For this he must understand the property essence, its economic and legal perspective, which underlies and support economic freedom and his free initiative. In this article, we wanted to bring in the attention of those interested in the understanding and studying of the economic life and its mechanism, exactly these aspects which we mentioned above.

ACCOUNTING HARMONIZATION AND HISTORICAL COST ACCOUNTING

Valentin Gabriel CRISTEA[*]

Abstract

There is a huge interest in accounting harmonization and historical costs accounting, in what they offer us. In this article, different valuation models are discussed. Although one notices the movement from historical cost accounting to fair value accounting, each one has its advantages.

Keywords: Accounting harmonization, accounting regulation, historical cost accounting, revaluation model, IFRS, fair value accounting.

1. Introduction

Major factor that affects a system of accounting regulation is legal system. Continental Europe is based on Rome Civil Law, where one can see a direct regulation of accounting throughout acts, decrees and various accounting standards. This direct regulation makes to exist a connection between accounting and taxes [1]-[6]. Accounting regulation is in such a case unified and cannot bring some additional effects for specific financial statement users. Anglo-Saxon manner is directed on common law.

Regulation is principle based on the requirements that are defined by professional institution in the shape of accounting standards. State plays the crucial role in direct system of accounting regulation. Above mentioned manner is intense for the training and education of professional accountants. This manner is constructive to accounting practices [7], [8].

Researchers and practitioners have discussed and have stated about measuring of balance sheet items. There are very important inadequacy and inconsistencies in presented information at the application of various measuring bases.

Accounting theory and practice has established quite a wide range of possible manners to the measuring in accounting. Accounting data must be based on reliability, clarity, and comparability manners to measuring in accounting a significant part of the regulation of accounting both at the national level and within international accounting harmonization. When it standardizes the output of accounting, which is characteristic for Anglo-Saxon area, or when it standardizes current accounting practices and the related regulation of financial reporting used in continental Europe, there are always specific rules set, adjusting the measuring used or accounting of transactions during the reporting period as well as the measuring for the preparation of financial statements[1] [10].

Accounting rules are theoretically based on the choice of setting a single measuring basis, which would be usualy used in measurings in all situations, or may use mixed measuring manners[2] [11].

Accounting practices used by International Financial Reporting Standards (IFRS) are characteristic the use of mixed measuring manners. Recently, there is an effort of the International Accounting Standard Board (IASB) to enhance a single measuring manner.

According to Dean[3] [12] there exists much concern about the current mixed measuring model, which uses fair value and cost within financial statements[4] that is not the most preferred or perhaps reliable basis of accounting. Choosing an suitable solution shows up difficult[5].

2.1. Measuring Manners

The starting point can be established for the purpose of measuring that (according to the standard setters) best satisfies the norms of the financial accounting and reporting measuring. These estimation bases are the following: historical cost, replacement cost, value in use or fair value.

The objective must measure the selected measuring basis, other bases being allowed only as proxies where direct measuring was impossible[6] [13].

The consistency of the estimation, comparability and meaningful assemblage of the accounting data are the advantages of this manner. The adoption of single measuring method is predicated on the belief that such a measuring will be always the most relevant and will be reliably estimation.

Researchers are searching on perfect measuring basis. Macve[7] [16] thinks that it is impossible to prove that any individual measuring manner is Pareto superior to others for external users ideally they require a range of alternative estimates in order to triangulate the information they obtain from various sources. IASB tests to get and protect such a base in its projects dealing with measurings[8] [17]. According to the IASB's projects the fair value measuring should be such a base, however, in our opinion in many cases not even fair value meets the norms, which a measuring in financial accounting should meet.

As mensionated above, virtually all systems of accounting regulation (without exception of IFRS) do not currently use a single measuring manner, required and preferred in all cases, but the mix of measuring manners. The convenience of this manner is that it is not necessary to use a single measuring manner for all situations, which, regarding the information demands of users, but also for example the reliability of establishing such measuring might not be suitable in a particular situation.

Different scales for different reasons is adequate for financial accounting [18]-[20]. Cost measures may provide useful margins on turnover for predicting operating cash flows in a going concern business, whereas fair value may be a more direct and reliable means of valuing a portfolio of marketable investments.

However, drawbacks of using mix measuring manners are obvious – it leads to assemblage of the data measured by different manners, the explanatory power of such assemblage is weak, plus the use of different measuring manners entails various risks. To report the items which are measured by different measuring manners separately is therefore a minimum requirement, which should be held. Separate reporting of items bound to various estimating risks enables the users of financial information their independent analysis and assessment.

Measuring manners are in practice differentiated according to both the moment at which the measuring is performed (e.g. initial recognition of the particular item or subsequent measuring) and according to nature of the subject of the measuring (e.g. long-term assets in terms of meeting the prerequisites of going concern, inventories and derivatives or securities held for trading are measured differently.)

By accepting this manner the measuring problem has been limited to the search of an suitable measuring base for the measuring of particular items in a particular situation. Only one method of measuring would be associated with a particular item, different item would, or could, be measured using different methods, if those methods best represented the economic properties of the particular item [13].

The norms for the choice of the measuring manner are determined by standard setters. The starting point should always be the information demands of the users of financial information. However, there are different groups of the accounting information users that have different benefits and different demands. The final selection of the norms is always dependent on the decision of the standard setters, who may and in fact must give priority to the benefits of certain groups of the accounting information users[9] [20].

If the accounting regulator is the state – a state institution (what is common in continental Europe) and if there is a close relation between accounting and taxation in the country given, the norms for the selection of the measuring manner may be strongly affected by the fiscal benefits of the state (accounting is then adjunct to the tax aspects) and other demands of the state administration (a crucial source of demand for accounting information is the state), and the benefits of other users of accounting information may not be adequately taken into account. This method of accounting regulation is often characterized by the usually not explicitly formulated basic objectives of financial reporting or conceptual framework.

Continental Europe is also characterized by the strong influence of the prudence principle in choosing the suitable measuring manner (manners). It was this principle together with the possibility to partly ignore the benefits of the users of accounting information (investors, etc.) which is given by the fact that accounting rules are set by a government organization, which significantly affected the norms for selecting measuring bases and blocked or hindered the penetration of the measuring in fair value to accounting (as an example we can mention accounting in Germany or France). Another situation arises in case that setting the accounting rules is carried out by a professional organization (typical of the Anglo-Saxon area). This organization begins from the benefits of different groups of users (who in fact create a demand for accounting information) and tries to meet them suitably when creating accounting policies (including the definitions of measuring manners). The standard setters are, however even in this case before the difficult task of deciding which demands and benefits of users of accounting information it is necessary to prefer and how they are optimally met.

The representative of the regulation (harmonization) of accounting, which is not adjunct to the state power, is IASB (as well as the Financial Accounting Standards Board - FASB, UK Accounting Standards Board). The conceptual framework of the IFRS, based on the fact that the financial statements are intended primarily to external users, analyzes the information demands of different groups and states:

While not all of the information demands of users can be met by financial statements, there are demands that are common to all users. As investors are providers of risk capital to the entity, the provision of financial statements that meet their demands will also meet most of the demands of other users that financial statements can satisfy[10] [21]. The measuring must be also adjunct to these goals.

In summary, the primary norms for evaluating possible measuring bases, derived from the conceptual frameworks, are:

1. Decision usefulness;
2. Qualitative characteristics of useful information;
   - Understandability;
   - Relevance — predictive value, feedback value, timeliness;
   - Reliability — representational faithfulness, neutrality, verifiability;
   - Comparability;
3. Concepts of assets and liabilities;
   - How the expected cash-equivalent flow attribute of assets and liabilities is measured;
4. Cost/benefit considerations.

2.2. Application

Within this application part we would try to analyze the implication of various measuring models: historical cost accounting, fair value accounting and revaluation model used for revaluation on selected financial ratios, concretely:

1. profitability ratios: ROA, ROE, ROS
2. liquidity ratios: current ratio
3. assets turnover ratios: assets turnover
4. debt ratios: debt ratio, Equity/Debts ratio, average, leverage, interest coverage, Assets/Debts ratio
5. capital markets ratio: EPS

A. Historical Costs Accounting

The most popular model in Western Europe is historical costs accounting. When applying this model, we have to satisfy the prudence principle perceptions and that's why we are unable to revaluate assets on higher values. When revaluating on lower values there is applied the computation of impairment.

Historical cost accounting provides us information about the effect of using historical cost model on profitability ratios, liquidity ratios and assets turnover ratio.

Historical costs accounting linearly behaves profitability and liquidity ratios. The inverse tendency is seen could be seen (however marginal) for assets turnover ratio.

Historical costs accounting, proportional tendency is visible within EPS analysis. All other ratios (with the exemption of debt ratio and financial leverage) show identical tendency, but less proportional. The inverse tendency of debt ratio and financial leverage could be explained by the fact that higher the value of these ratios, higher the debt exposure of the company.

B. Fair Value Accounting

Fair value accounting is currently used mainly for revaluation of selected financial instruments, investment properties and biological assets. Fair value accounting provides us information about profitability ratios, liquidity ratios and assets turnover ratio.

Fair value accounting behaves all profitability ratios in line with revaluation. Fair value model has marginal impact also on liquidity ratios and assets turnover, but these ratios show us inverse tendency.

Fair value accounting provides us information about the debt ratios and earnings per year.

Fair value accounting are the most sensitive ratios: EPS and interest coverage. Marginal influence of the revaluation is visible for Assets/Debts ratio and Equity/Debts ratio.

Debt ratio and financial leverage comport similarly and prove the inverse tendency against other financial measures. This inverse tendency is explicated by the fact that higher the value of these ratios, higher the debt exposure of the company.

C. Revaluation Model

Revaluation model is utilized for realizable financial instruments. When applying this model we also have to revaluate assets at fair value, however the revaluation does not have any impact on company's profit or loss, but onto other comprehensive income (being a part of equity).

Revaluation model provides us information about the profitability ratios, liquidity ratios and assets turnover ratio.

Revaluation model has any impact on ROS and current ratio. Revaluation model behaves ROE as well as other ratios (with less significant tendency) in inverse tendency.

Revaluation model provides us information about the debt ratios and earnings per year.

Revaluation model has any impact on ratios EPS and interest coverage. The linear tendency is visible for debt ratio and Equity/Debts ratios, however inverse tendency is visible for debt ratio and financial leverage. The inverse tendency is explicated by the fact that higher the value of these ratios, higher the debt exposure of the company.

3. Conclusions

There is more visible the tendency of fair value accounting round-out-the world because of the increasing impact of harmonized accounting legislature (IFRS, US GAAP), but the historical cost accounting is very popular within continental European accounting systems. This tendency is explicated as a positive one, as one of the major premises for applying fair value or revaluation model is transparent active market. This cannot be claimed about emerging economies (e.g. in Central and Eastern Europe). Analysis of the impact of various models use for revaluation of assets on selected financial ratios proves us that these ratios are not very sensitive on revaluation model application, but on contrary, they are very sensitive on fair value accounting application.

VALUATION FOR BIOLOGICAL ASSETS WITH HISTORICAL COST ACCOUNTING OR FAIR VALUE ACCOUNTING ?

Valentin Gabriel CRISTEA[*]

Abstract

The valuation for biological assets is regulated by IAS 41. Interesting debate is what valuation models it is better to use: historical cost accounting or fair value accounting? I will discuss advantages and disadvantages in this case.

Keywords: Historical cost, fair value, biological assets, predictive earnings, valuation.

1. Introduction

The reformation of the accounting standards regarding fair value accounting has generated an intense discussion in recent years. Many accounting groups and institutions around the world, such as The International Accounting Standards Board (IASB), the U.S.A. Financial Accounting Standards Board (FASB), and the Accounting Regulatory Committee and the European Financial Reporting Advisory Group in the European Union (EU) have enabled the convergence of international accounting regarding standards based on market prices. The FASB released many standards requesting appreciation or exposure of fair values estimates for assets and liabilities, mainly for financial instruments.

For example, affirmations of Financial Accounting Standards number 87 in 1985 on employer's accounting for pensions, number 105 in 1990 on exposure of information about financial instruments, number 107 in 1991 on exposures about financial instruments.

The International Accounting Standards Committee released International Accounting Standard (IAS) requesting measuring at fair value and value changes to be recognised in profit or loss. The very important document has been the IAS 32 on exposure and presentation of financial instruments and the IAS 41 on Agriculture, released in 2000. The EU admited the whole existing IAS in the form of Commission Regulation (EC) 1725/2003, with the exception of IAS 32 and 39, that were admited in 2004 under Commission Regulations (EC) 2086/2004 and (EC) 2237/2004.

Fair value is defined as the amount for which an asset could be exchanged, or a liability settled, between knowledgeable, willing parties in an arm's length transaction (e.g. IAS 39, IAS 41, SFAS 107). In 2006 the SFAS 157 redefined fair value as the price that would be received to sell the asset or paid to transfer a liability in an orderly transaction between market participants at the measuring date.

Notwithstanding this persistent trend regarding fair value, the reformation has induced controversy among practitioners, especially over financial instruments (Day, 2000; Economist, 2007).

There are sceptics (e.g. Joint Working Group of Banking Associations on Financial Instruments, 1999) and with enthusiastic supporters of fair valuation (e.g. Chartered Financial Analyst Institute, 2007). The European Central Bank (2004) summarizes the potential drawbacks and advantages of a fair value accounting framework from the point of view of financial institutions. André et al. (2009)[1] argued that, as long as the market has been growing, no one was shocked by fair value accounting. Then, it started to reflect the market downturn in banks' balance sheets and it began to be stigmatized.

Most tests performed reflect lower predictive earnings power for farms using historical cost with respect to those using fair value.

Our research question is: What valuation is useful for biological assets: historical cost accounting or fair value accounting?

2. Valuation for Biological Assets with Historical Cost or Fair Value

The main purpose of this article is to deliver empirical proof on the existing academic debate about the predictive capacity of historical cost versus fair value based accounting information. We execute an empirical research of the significance of fair value and historical cost of biological assets for forcasting future gains and cash flows.

The evolution regarding fair value considers the demands of users of financial accounting and the efforts of accounting standard-setting bodies to reverse the pattern of declining relevance of financial information (Barlev and Haddad, 2003). Relating the fair value of assets and liabilities in the balance sheet draws the attention of shareholders to the value of their equity and to periodic changes in this value, as is considered by the market mechanism. Fair value describes changes in assets values that will be realized in subsequent operations. In this respect, Aboody et al. (1999) got that upward revaluations of fixed assets by UK firms are positively associated with future performance, share prices, and changes. Given the growing process of globalization and economic integration, as well as the growing importance of financial markets, shareholders and stakeholders must a better assessment of the true performance and management of the firm, than allowed through historical cost. Two primary criteria requested by accounting standards are relevance and reliability. Relevance of accounting information is given and estimated in accounting research as its degree of association with share prices or share changes. Equity market value is realized as the valuation benchmark to assess the utility of accounting information for shareholders and financial users. According to Barth et al (2001) and Landsman (2007), the existing research proves an overall conclusion that fair value based information is more relevant than historical cost based information.

Academic discussion is usually interested in financial instruments and framed within the agency theory, assuming information asymmetry between market participants and the existence of perfect versus imperfect market conditions. Barth and Landsman (1995) established that in perfect and complete markets a fair value accounting based balance sheet reflects all value-relevant information. But, in more realistic market settings management discretion applied to fair valuation reduce from balance sheet and income statement relevance. Watts (2003) states that fair valuation is subject to more manipulation and, accordingly, is a poorer measurement of worth and feat than historical cost. He states that any attempt to ban accounting conservatism is sure to fail and that accounting can not overrun with the market in valuing the firm (Watts, 2006). Ball (2006) proves that fair valuation does not necessarily make investors better off, and that its utility has not been showed. Rayman (2007) sets that fair value accounting is liable to produce nonsenses and baffling information, if it is based on expectations that turn out to be false. Ronen (2008) demonstrates that endures from a lack of reliability and can be subject to manipulation. In the same vein, Liang and Wen (2007) are critical of the beneficial repercurssions of moving to fair value because it follows more managerial manipulation and induces less competent investment decisions than cost valuations.

Plantin and Sapra (2008) deduct that, when there are imperfections in the market, there is the danger of the appearance of an additional source of volatility as a result of fair valuation, and thus a rapid shift to full mark-to-market regime may be detrimental to financial intermediation and therefore to economic growth. Bleck and Liu (2007) prove that accounting makes it easier to prevent bad investment projects, hindering their liquidation hence adding volatility to hit the market at a later date and producing a crash in the asset price, growing overall volatility and decreasing performance (i.e. reducing profitability). It is an important decision that it can get.Gigler et al. (2006) concluded that even in the case of a mixed attribute report (i.e., some items are valued at market while others are carried at), fair value performs better: it demonstrates stronger signals of financial distress. Finally, Choy (2006) proves that for fair value to be relevant, necessary and sufficient conditions must be satisfied.

Almost all existing empirical studies on fair value test is relevant when implemented to financial instruments, analyzing associations between accounting numbers and share prices. They prove conflicting findings; while Nelson (1996) does not find fair value relevance, Barth (1994), Barth et al. (1996) and Bernard et al. (1995) do. Ahmed and Takeda (1995), Carrol et al. (2003), Eccher et al. (1996) and Barth and Clinch (1998) do get relevance, but under certain conditions. A recent study of Hann et al. (2007) gets fair value pension accounting does not improve the informativeness of the financial assertions and even impairs it.

Laswad and Baskerville (2007) get no association between cash flow and unrealized earnings from revaluation of assets to fair value. Ahmed et al (2006) get that addmission of derivative financial instruments at fair value is relevant, while revelation is not. Danbolt and Rees (2008) get that fair value is consistently more significant value than historical cost, although this significant value can be expressed via asset values and need not be incorporated into income computations. They get proof consistent with gains manipulation under fair value.

The IAS 41 brings the discussion into the agricultural accounting domain. Most authors are critical with the claim of fair valuation for biological assets and value changes to be admited in the profit and loss statement. Penttinen et al. (2004) require that fair valuation would inflict unrealistic fluctuations in the net profits of forest enterprises. Herbohn and Herbohn (2006) and Dowling and Godfrey (2001) request the increased volatility, manipulation and subjectivity of reported earnings under this standard. Both studies are accomplished in the context of the Australian Accounting Standards Board 1037 (similar to IAS 41) and give empirical evidence of Australian entities preference for cost valuation or delaying the adoption of fair value. Specifically, Herbohn and Herbohn (2006) compute coefficients of variation of profits, and of gains and losses from timber assets, of eight public companies and five state and territory government departments. The authors state the volatility caused by the fair value measuring. Elad (2004) makes complaint that the IAS 41 is a major departure from historic cost accounting; this could signal the decease of the French Plan Comptable Général Agricole (PGCA) model, involve the admission of unrealized gains and increase profit volatility. Argilés and Slof (2001) greet fair value measuring for biological assets because it avoids the complexity of computing their costs. The majority of small family farms in in the EU has no resources and skills to perform accounting procedures and valuations. The nature of farming makes historical cost valuation of biological assets inherently difficult because they are affected by procreation, growth and death, as well as joint-cost situations. Allocation of indirect costs is another source of complexity for cost calculation in farms. This is an especially acute problem for small family households. The American Institute of Certified Public Accountants (1996) and the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants (1986) advise historical cost, considering the possibility of realizable value as an alternative. The 1986 French PGCA accedes to the historical cost principle. Kroll (1987) states that the complexity in asset valuation and accounts is an significant barrier to its use in the French PGCA. Elad (2004) explains that where there is not an active market for a biological asset, simplicity is not a merit of fair value.

Argilés and Slof (2001) state that the IAS 41 conceptual framework has already been widely and successfully implemented in the EU through the Farm Accountancy Data Network (FADN). The latter has been satisfying the role of a quasi-standard-setting body in the absence of previous statements on agricultural standards from other authorities (Poppe and Beers, 1996).

Hence, an evaluation of the convenience of fair value for agriculture should balance its benefits and drawbacks. Simpleness is the main benefit of using for biological assets with respect to historical cost. But there is no unanimous accord in previous literature with regard to if volatility in return and gains, relevance, return smoothing and profitability are improved or worsened with fair value. This article concurs to this discussion giving empirical evidence in valuation of biological assets in agriculture. The predictive power of fair value versus historical cost valuation with respect to return and cash flow comparing two samples of firms each one using different valuation criteria. Comparing data from two samples of farms based on historical cost and the other fair value for biological assets, we get no significant differences in future cash flow predictive power.

In-depth interviews maintained with agricultural accountants assist to explicate these results, as generalized flawed accounting practices are got. The real setting in which agricultural accounting is produced, precise and certain cost computations cannot be looked for.

Choy (2006) states that the predictive power of fair value has never been tested, in spite of the fact that both the Statement of Financial Accounting Concepts (SFAC) No. 2 and the current project of the IASB (2006b) stress the demand for predictive value of financial information. FASB Concepts Statement No. 1 also states that one of the three objectives of financial reporting is to help users to assess future cash flows. SFAC No. 5 emphasizes that to be significant information must have predictive value.

Forseeable gains and cash flows may help managers to anticipate financial problems, adjust lists, negotiate funding, adjust resources, exercise judgement in financial reporting, growing or decrease production. Improved accuracy may also lessen agency problems, because managers are considered to be more accountable. Empirical research has established that firms with lower forecast errors have lower implied costs of capital (Gebhardt et al., 2001) and assessments in the stock market (Lang et al., 2003).

Financial affirmations are utilized as a basis for measuring future performance and assessing future cash flows prospects (SFAC No. 5). Firm managers, as well as any other user of accounting information, may benefit from more predictable accounting information.

The comparative predictive power of fair value and historical cost accounting valuation methods has not been previously analyzed. To our knowledge, only Chen et al. (2006) analyze the predictive power of fair value, obtaining that it reduces the capacity to forecast future cash flows.

They studied this relation indirectly, comparing the association between accounting numbers and future cash flows over time, assuming that accounting has been developing to fair value. Kim and Kross (2005) obtain a growing relationship between gains and one-year-ahead operating cash flows over time, but they attribute it to the growing conservatism in accounting rather than to the influence of fair valuation.

Slightly related to these issues, Beaver et al. (2005) get a small decline in the ability of financial ratios to forecast bankruptcy from 1962 to 2002, and an incremental explanatory power of market-related variables over this period. They explicate the deterioration in predictive ability of financial ratios in terms of an inadequate amelioration of FASB standards.

For this purpose we use two samples of farms, one using fair value and the other applying historical cost. As we found no conclusive theoretical support with respect to this issue in the studied research, we do not formulate a defined hypothesis on the higher/lower predictive power of historical cost with respect to fair value.

Watts (2006) states that fair value is irrelevant because it lacks verifiability, but relevant historical cost accounting request precise and certain cost computations.

Different estimation methods have been used by Carnes et al. (2003), Kim and Kross (2005), Dechow et al. (1998) and Chen et al. (2006) to assess predicting gains.

3. Conclusions

We conclude that the discussion is moving from historical cost to the fair value principle. There is a lack of accord about the benefits and drawbacks of this movement.

We conclude as Watts (2006) that fair value is irrelevant because it lacks verifiability, but relevant historical cost accounting request precise and certain cost computations.

A request against the requirement of IAS 41 of fair valuation for biological assets exceeds in the existing literature. Most authors argue that it is a major departure from the convenient valuation method required and will entail serious drawbacks for the agricultural sector.

Analyzes showed in this disclose that farm cash flows are not less predictable with fair valuation than with historical cost.

LOCAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT (LED) PLANNING IN THE FACE OF GLOBALISATION

Constantin BRĂGARU*

Abstract

Local economic development and workforce initiative are continually evolving. There are no hard and fast rules or long-proven experiences upon which to draw. The job of the economic development planner and the work of the community in achieving sustainable economic development have become much harder because of the national and global crisis.

Keywords: local economic development, sustainability, globalization, LED, private public partnership, natural environment.

Introduction

In the last years local development has undeniably became one of the dominant elements for productivity growth strategy employment, human welfare, entrepreneurship promotion, obtaining human capital and income increase. Assuring sustainable development for a specific region is a complex process in the measure in which this process is subjected to some factors which cannot be controlee by a local, regional, or national administration. The entire post-revolution and post-accession experience, cumulate with good policy making transferred by Romania to European Union, proves that private public partnership is a viable solution for successfully solving some commentary problems, public interests starting with social services and complex social-economic development projects including infrastructure projects. The experience of some different governments and international organizations cumulated in more than 20 years demonstrates that PPP are a solution in solving social economic problems. Current policies cannot anymore focus mainly on their short - term impact but they have also to be more forward looking as well as more consistent between each others. Economical development is a must in the terms of a powerful and accelerated process of globalization which has surrounded the entire world. Therefore local authorities must find good strategies in order to improve the production of goods and services. In the process of sustainable development management effectiveness of protected areas is an important indicator of how well protected areas are conserving biodiversity. This is critical as most nations use protected areas as a cornerstone of biodiversity conservation.

1. All around the world, local governments, the private sector and civil society are demanding better ways to achieve local economic development, a cornerstone of sustainable development. This is due to the fact that local governments face increased democratic reforms and greater decentralization at the same time as massive transformations are taking place in the global economy resulting from trade liberalization, privatization, and enhanced telecommunications. The significance of these changes is that citizens and local governments now face formidable challenges, greater opportunity, and growing responsibility to work together to address the economic health of municipalities and the livelihood of their local citizens, many of whom may be under- or unemployed and living in poverty.

The long term impact of globalization, associated with demographic growth and the advanced aging of population, technology evolution and climate changing have enlarged the action of local economy in condition of a registered success in regional, national or multinational structure level. Although it has became more and more clear that the only national politics which haven't been confronted with major difficulties in repairing economic disparities between regions and towns are part of EOCD (Economic Organization from Cooperation and Development) states for which sustainable development is vital. The difficulty in the local development process consists in identification of the solutions in order to attract and involve in the "game" all necessary factors, a balanced utilization of resources so that these can be improved in the next 30-50 years. The knowledge economy has gained new valences and has more importance ahead industrial economy. This type of investment is definitely profitable but a great number of towns don't have the necessary financial resources. Local communities must fulfill necessary competences in order to stipulate the occasion to realize a new investment, share the risks and costs through realizing public private partnerships. The investments are in fact a fuel of local development that's why local communities are trying more and more to attract this type of action with the purpose of increasing entrepreneurship, innovation, human capital, exchange of good politics, creating new workplaces. Public and private branches lose their efficiency if used separately, because they are two interdependent realities deriving one from another and permanently sustaining each other.

In the actual economic context, the fact that project management for local community's development is based on European financing like a sure financial source for sustaining the process of implementation of sustainable development strategies formulated at national, regional, county level. The results for finalized projects or those of projects in implementation will positively affect the life quality of county communities contributing to developing some areas set as proprietary: truism, transport, infrastructures, water, waste managing, and social assistance. The implementation of project using pre-adoration funds have been a point of departure in the process of economic and social development and in managing projects financed from unsalable funds. Thereby public authorities involved directly like beneficiaries of financing, or through partnerships have gamed necessary expertise in domain with a real advantage in accessing European structural and cohesion funds through Operational Programs. The private sector must be nearby local authorities in scanning this road of challenges of economic and social developments of a region to European standards. It's not necessary for towns and villages to have perform an infrastructure if there are no people to valuing them, initiate and maintain business creating new work places, turning advantage from local peculiar and building a proper space for economic and social development. The local development strategies have been sensitively modified in the last two decades. Nowadays the economic development of cities and regions is less oriented towards roads, bridges and factories and more towards communication, industrial reconversion, and spaces assigned to high class concerns, mutual actions of promoting and local development. It stands for these elements to attract tangibles contractual partners and production taxes for reinvested capital. Local powers must be reorganized for attracting investments. Because at this time beside budget regions imposed public administrations must face globalization that is why the solution cannot came only from public financing because local development has been successfully "crowned" and has proved itself viable on long term therefore private sector must bring contribution. This last one has often manifested the interest for local development, but in order to attract them and use them efficiently local administration must have the necessary financial resources. Local development has chances of succeeding if it's the fruit of a private public partnership in collaboration with international financial institution. Within this partnership two major roles are hold by public sector: assuring the improvement of public services, mostly in what regards education, development projects, infrastructure and favorisation of collaboration between public and private actors with the purpose of realize development projects in a professional manner. A great number of local economic strategies are never taken to a good end because those who have concaved it haven't identified at first the necessary resources for the feedback investments and haven't regarded the involving of private sector as a rule. The progress key in financing local economy development consists in reorganization of relations with the private sector. This last one supports collectivizes in obtaining financial resources. There are several devices which allow to public and private sectors to share risks and costs related to local development projects because PPP, credits and private financing mechanisms are sustaining local efforts made by public sector. Important changing's exposed in financing local development financing. The perspectives offered by globalization to cities and other towns have launched a dynamic development through new financial investments. All these evolutions are more and more indurate by realizing the fact that facilitation of local and regional investments doesn't depend only by the volume of absorbed funds. Local sustainable development depends entirely of the investment quality, a good management and the efficiency that can be offered by local and private paymasters. Therefore the key principles that must be followed in elaboration of a financing strategy for local community's development are:

1. Smart financing for towns and regions through improvement of budgetary relations with superior administration levels.
2. Encouraging private sector by involving it in financing investments al local level.
3. Financing with the purpose of metropolitan area development through sharing costs and advantages.
4. The exploitation of economic growth advantages at local level.
5. Forming PPP.
6. The approach of a new vision in what implies public gestation at local level with the purpose of finance fluidization.
7. Encouraging entrepreneurship in private and public sectors at local level.
8. Encouraging private sector towards market investments which lead to long term results.
9. Laying emphasis on the quality of local investments projects and not financing offers.
10. Skilled officials in local and superior administration.

However PPP is not a wonder solution for solving the problem of necessity of great investments. In Romania the most often problem in public and private area is dedicatory legislation who doesn't officially sustain the fundamentation of PPP. Another fundamental proposal in what regards local development aims the establishment of an interior relent at local level. In the organization and function of all Institution that leads to good preparation activity and local development implementation projects. Most of the times projects are blocked in their way of organizing as financing application leading to limit situation like: a heavy analysis of documentation to send for note, transmitting in useful time some essential information. In conclusion we can synthesize two directions for development local communities. The first one is writing financing European and national projects and the second is creating necessary important elements like: local development strategies well elaborated structurated and prioritized, qualified staff for writing project implementation and elaborating development strategies.

For Romania, as European Union member, sustainable development is not one of the possible options but the only rational perspective of national becoming having as a result the establishment of a new development paradigm through the fusion of economic, social and environmental parameters. Sustainable development is a very complex concept which started from preoccupation of conserving protected areas. Over the year's economical and social dimension were added to this first concept of sustainable development. The concept of sustainable development involves an amount of shapes and methods for social and economic development, having as instance foundation assuring a balance between this two mentioned dimensions and the elements of natural capital. The most known definition of sustainable development is undoubted the one that was given by the World Committee for Environment and Development (WCED) in "Our common future" report, also known as the Brunt land report: "sustainable development pursues the satisfaction of present needs". Starting with 1997 when it was included in the Maastricht treaty the term of sustainable development became a European Committee objective and assigned an increase of environment respect measures. This decision was included in "Towards sustainability" document.

In this manner European Union is reaffirming the objective of succeeding a life quality environment and welfare of present and future generations. This would lead to sustainable communities capable of putting good use and exploited their own resources with the purpose of social cohesion and environment protection. There are four serried principles for local administration that should support al international systems efforts, as well as states and local authorities in their efforts to eradicate poverty and building a fair, long lasting society: the primordial principle of "sustainable development" is involving economic, social, cultural, environmental dimensions. An effective democratic decentralization includes all key competences and proper financial resources. The principle of a good policy-making involves an effective leadership, transparence, responsibility, a good management, the improvement of public services and equal access to it, forming partnerships and straightening institutional capacity. The fourth principle of cooperation and solidarity implies forming partnerships in exchange of good-making policy and mutual support. These four principles must be promoted through drawing near international community, national governments and civil society in order to increase capacities and skills. Applying a model of sustainable development is a must for international communities. It has been introduced the principle of total administration of resources that aims environmental protection, life standard improvement, social cohesion, economic fluency. A policy based on the four objectives of sustainable development is a challenge for cities which are trying to find a balance between the processes of urban development and preserving green spaces, rural areas and natural resources. In this case local authorities are promoters of urban and social diversity. For Romania, as European Union member, sustainable development is not one of the possible options but the only rational perspective of national becoming having as a result the establishment of a new development paradigm through the fusion of economic, social and environmental parameters. The resigned reaction concerning some global issues like global warming or poverty is in most cases resumed by the stereotype line: "What can I do?" Every one of us must understand that sustainability does not involve only the global and local levels but most of all the individual level. Without the participation of every citizen nothing can be changed, a sustainable development cannot be accomplished. The principle of sustainable development resumes the mixture of three dimensions – ecology, economy and social dimension. Combined with consumer's behavior the ecological dimension of sustainability becomes the most important. On long term sustainable economy and social welfare are possible only in a well managed framework regarding nature as a vital element. Otherwise economic and social aspects mark their role in the attempt of making ecology "profitable": production and ecology consumption can be used only if the consumer affords it and of the consumption and production are realized under acceptable social terms. A sustainable living means a good, healthy, tolerant partnership appreciating the resources. It also means valuating quality of life without become a "fashion victim". To consummate in a sustainable manner means to be aware that "better" is the enemy of good, not "cheaper"; it means to remember that community and individualism are parts of a whole the same as partnership and autonomy. Living in a sustainable manner is the art of having the Wright behavior in a wrong structure. That's why we need both top politics and our base actions. Only from our correlated actions we can made sustainable economic structures. Sustainability or sustainable development it's a central target of European Union politics and Romania as a member has automatically adopted the objective. But the quality of member does not bring with it an "automatic pilot" for sustainable development. The government mission for sustainable development can be supported only by using adequate tools adapted to reality. After a far more thoroughgoing study we can underline the fact that sustainable development is a basic objective in all operational programs, through which Romania sets its own priority investments in fields like: regional development, environmental transport, human resources, administrative capacity, economic competitively. If we want to obtain European funds from operational programs we must have strong arguments that our project, either is "hard" and "soft", fulfills the objective of sustainable development. The affiliation to European Union energetic community politics is extremely important for Romania. Our country must set priorities according to European Union politics and objectives. These are: energetic security, sustainable level, competitively. Relying on national politics and some regional energetic strategies modernization of cogeneration systems and urban warming will be promoted through high efficiency technologies. This strategy will ensure important energy savings, reduce carbon dioxide emissions and make payment of energetic bills more suitable. Pauper communities will receive assistance in managing local natural resources. These poor communities have less subsistence resources and a limited capacity in facing natural disasters. In Romania were identified potential negative causes caused by climate change. Recommendation and adaptation measures were taken after a primal evaluation, without seminary studies and actions like law and politics changing, budget reevaluation and adapting national programs in order to assure local level implementation measures. Important decisions which influences directly or indirectly the adaptation to climate changing's taken at local administrative level. Society and communities changing behavior depend in a large measure from the knowledge problem degree. Studies have proved that sustainable development involves working together institutions of state, companies, nongovernmental organizations and after all every actor of modern society. We are interacting with environment, consummating resources and we are part of different organizations. All initiatives made by local authorities contribute to community's welfare and sustainable development through economic and social dimension. In time these actions will spread at national level and why not at entire European Community level. Welfare is a concept which can extract its defamatory qualities from the concept of sustainable development. We actually can say that these two concepts complete each other.

Global poverty and the challenges of sustainable development Overall Objective of the EU SDS: To promote sustainable development globally, and to insure the coordination of the internal and foreign policies of the European Union with the principles of sustainable development and its related engagements.

Horizon 2013. National Objective: To implement the required legislative and institutional instruments pertaining to Romania's status as a donor of development aid according to its obligations as an EU Member State; to establish the priorities and means of action and to allocate for this purpose approximately 0.25% of the gross national income (GNI) by 2013 and 0.33% by 2015, with the intermediary target of 0.17% of GNI by 2010.

Horizon 2020. National Objective: To define the specific areas in which the expertise and resources available in Romania can serve the aims of development assistance, and to allocate for this purpose around 0.5% of gross national income.

Horizon 2030. National Objective: To fully align Romania with the policies of the European Union in the sphere of development cooperation also in terms of budget allocations as a percentage of gross national income.

2. Socioeconomic development. Overall, most trends were positive starting with the year 2000 in the socioeconomic development theme. However, the picture is mixed and some areas showed slow, or even no, progress. Economic growth continued throughout the period, while regional disparities grew and households were saving less. Most of the employment indicators progressed in line with the Lisbon targets, but the overall employment rate was lacking in impetus. Labor productivity increased and energy intensity decreased in line with EU objectives. More spending on research and development is needed if the target is to be reached. If it were possible to take the recent economic and financial crisis into account, however, the picture would be radically different. Starting with 2008 and forecasts for the coming years indicate a sharp decline of economic growth. Regional disparities of economic prosperity remain a challenge for the EU and are still rising in most Member States. Within-country dispersion of regional GDP (gross domestic product) is highest in eastern European countries, where the rapid transition into market economies has led to high income inequality.. Differences across Member States remain significant. Improving socioeconomic conditions has been one of the fundamental drivers for the vision of a united Europe and is, therefore, non-surprisingly a vital component of a number of high-level Community policies. Two of those important policies are the Lisbon Strategy for growth and jobs and the European Union's Sustainable Development Strategy. Both aim at achieving a more sustainable socioeconomic development and thus outline important strategic development trajectories. Overarching objectives of socioeconomic development aim for the creation of a knowledgebase economy, technology transfer, promotion of employment and enhancement of human and social capital as well as reducing social exclusion. Those objectives depict the most important aspects of socioeconomic development, and are measured in terms of economic growth and competitiveness, technology and innovation potential, creation of jobs and social wellbeing as well as environmental sustainability. Considering those objectives, the renewed Community Lisbon Programmed has created a direct connection to the EU SDS (European Union's Sustainable Development Strategy) and the socioeconomic indicators outlined in this report. Considering the challenges of the current economic crisis and the need for cushioning the European Union from more and longer lasting negative effects on socioeconomic development, the Council adopted the European Economic Recovery Plan. Moreover, confidence in the ability of the EU to tackle the financial and economic crisis was expressed during the European Council. In fact, the current crisis shows how deeply social and economic issues are interconnected. An important challenge for socioeconomic development arises from the ageing of the population, reflected in a growing old-age-dependency ratio. This means that a continuously shrinking proportion of the population of working age needs to generate the economic resources for society as a whole. Accordingly, the employment rate, labor productivity or average annual working time need to be increased in order to maintain a constant level of economic prosperity.

The analysis presented in the previous chapters has emphasized Romania stage of development at regional and local level, the local government implemented projects and the future development directions. The sustainable development of the local communities is a present and future option of the national policy that seeks economic growth and quality of life's improvement. As a member state of the European Union, Romania must cope with new challenges and objectives. One of these objectives is the sustainable development of our local communities. This objective can be achieved by local governments because they represent powerful actors in their local economies. They must build and maintain infrastructure that is essential for economic activity. They must set standards, regulations, taxes, and fees that determine the parameters for economic development. In essence, one can say that the use of European Union Funds is an opportunity for economic development in Romania, in the context in which their use can generate sustainable economic and social development.

Conclusions

Ideally, the development of a Local Economic Development (LED) strategy will be an integral part of a broader strategic planning process for a sub national region, city, town or rural area. Effective strategic planning ensures that priority issues are addressed and limited resources are well targeted. The five-step planning process shown below should be tailored to complement, and correspond with, other local planning processes. The process is not prescriptive and should be adapted to meet the needs of the individual community. Current developments are in many aspects not sustainable because limits on the carrying capacity of the earth are being exceeded and social and economic capital is under pressure. Although it has been stated repeatedly that change is necessary, results are limited. The recent progress regarding climate policy shows that states are capable of converting the necessary political will into rigorous policy interventions, which combine leadership, vision and concrete measures. The Sustainable development strategy should contribute to further change to avoid irreparable damage and to create a future of prosperity, equity and well-being.

The Sustainable Development Strategy deals in an integrated way with economic, environmental and social issues and lists the following seven key challenges:

- Climate change and clean energy
- Sustainable transport
- Sustainable consumption and production
- Conservation and management of natural resources
- Public health
- Social inclusion, demography and migration
- Global poverty

Local authorities must elaborate overarching strategy in order to set out how we can meet the needs of present generations without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their needs. The next programming step should be to develop a strategy, to examine the country context, various stakeholders and their interests, and, among other factors, the nature of potential interventions. To help ensure that resources dedicated to the program achieve the missions stated objectives. Defining a strategy involves developing an approach that can maximize impact on democratic development. The Sustainable Development Strategy constitutes a long-term vision and an overarching policy framework providing guidance for all members of EU policies and including a global dimension, with a time frame of up to 2050. By tackling long-term trends it serves as an early warning instrument and a policy driver to bring about necessary reform and short-term policy action. There should make full use of balanced Impact Assessments in policy making at national level. The four focus areas relating to long-term goals in some crucial areas like: shift to a low-carbon and low-input economy; protection of biodiversity, air, water and other natural resources; strengthening the social dimension; and the international responsibility dimension of the SDS are broadly welcomed.

The local authority must give higher priority to tackling current unsustainable trends in the use of natural resources and the loss of biodiversity. Better integration of biodiversity considerations into other policy areas such as climate change, transport, agriculture and fishery is crucial, as well as considering better the value of ecosystem services. Also, climate financing is central to combating climate change, and a significant increase in additional public and financial flows is needed in order to assist developing process.

The social dimension should be better highlighted through improving labor market policies, social and education systems. The economic crisis has exacerbated inequalities and risks. With current and expected job losses, unemployment is clearly one of the biggest concerns. The hardest hits are young people, low-skilled workers and those who have been unemployed for a long time. A balanced approach to combining flexibility and security together with comprehensive active inclusion strategies and integration activities is not only crucial to support all those affected by the crisis, including the most vulnerable, but also to limit losses in human capital and to preserve future growth potential. It is vital to carry on improving the labor market policies, to review social system and further develop the education system to meet the challenges in all regions. Job creation efforts should strengthen the ability of workers to adapt to changing market conditions and prepare workers to benefit from new investments in the areas of green technology and green jobs.

Sustainable development should be seen in a global context. Many of the challenges can only be solved in international cooperation. The people of the developing world are hardest hit by the effects of climate change and land degradation. The loss of biodiversity will affect both the developing and developed world, the poorest being the most severely affected. Sustainably managing ecosystems and strengthening biodiversity policies is a basis for food security and an integral part of the fight against poverty and hunger. The global demand for natural resources is increasing, and this affects the developing countries even more than the developed world.

The strategy of local communities for sustainable development could focus on the European Union's long-term goals in the following areas in coordination with other cross-cutting strategies:

- contributing to a rapid shift to a safe and sustainable low-carbon and low-input economy. Based on energy and resource-efficient technologies and shifts towards sustainable consumption behavior, including sustainable food patterns, and fostering energy security and adaptation to climate change.
- Intensifying efforts for the protection of biodiversity, air, water and other natural resources and food security, and more focus on integration of biodiversity concerns into policy areas.
- With potential negative impact on biodiversity such as parts of the common agricultural policy, the common fisheries policy and transport policy.
- promoting social inclusion and integration, including demographic and migration aspects, and improving protection against health threats.
- Strengthening the international dimension and intensifying efforts to combat global poverty, including through fair and green growth, and addressing population growth and its impact in terms of increased pressure on natural resources.

ANALYSIS OF INDUSTRY BASED ON RESOURCES AND INSTITUTIONS. NATIONAL DESAZOLVES CASE

José G. VARGAS-HERNÁNDEZ[*]
Gabriela Sarahí GONZÁLEZ-GONZÁLEZ[]

Abstract

This work aims to identify the elements necessary for the operation of enterprises engaged in waste management, especially in the company called Desazolves Nacionales; as well as the importance of formal institutions to arrive to conduct their activities legally without polluting the environment. an analysis of the industry and the resources with which account, in order to take advantage of the best way to strengthen the company looking to create jobs always looking for social responsibility is made.

Keywords: Strategy, institutions, industry, SMEs, resources.

1. Introduction

The aim of the research is to determine how resources, industry and institutions affect the operation of the National Desazolves Company, located in the State of Jalisco. First, we talk about the background it has about pollution, the importance of MSMEs and what companies defined sector of waste management. After the problem is delimited on the question how do institutions affect industry and resources for company operation within the State of Jalisco? A review of the theoretical and empirical literature on the theories studied is made. It is contextualized about where the company was born, the services performed are mentioned; the methodology to be used, the analysis of the results, and finally, are given the conclusions and recommendations on the research.

2. Background of the problem

Companies are defined as an economic unit of production and decisions by organizing and coordinating a series of productive factors, such as labor and capital, aims to make a profit either producing and selling products or providing services in market (Andersen, 1999). The importance of small and medium (MSMEs) economics units in the global economic context is a well proven fact, not only because they represent 95% of all enterprises in most countries of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), but also because they generate a high volume of employment, which exceeds more than half of private sector employment (OECD, 2000).

Latin American countries generally rank companies according to various parameters such as employees, investment in fixed assets and / or sales. In Mexico, these businesses contribute about 64% of the total gross production, but employ only 2 out of 10 jobs, according to the National Institute of Statistics and Geography (INEGI, 2015); the growing importance of MSMEs especially in developing countries is due to their contribution to the employment and economic welfare; integrated into the enterprise, as part of the value chain, contribute to the diversification of the economy (Agyapong, 2010).

In Mexico, major obstacles and problems related to starting a business, among them are liquidity, the delegation of power, leadership of managers, finance and business continuity which can potentially cause failure of MSMEs during the first years of life (Castro, 2006). Companies dedicated to waste management and remediation services are those economic units that are dedicated to the collection, treatment and disposal of waste material both hazardous and non-hazardous waste; the operation of facilities for recovery of material; remediation and rehabilitation of contaminated sites; rental of portable toilets, and cleaning septic tanks (INEGI, 2015).

The importance of these companies is that according to the World Health Organization (WHO, 2014) reported that in 2012 about 7 million people died as a result of exposure to pollution because it is the health environmental risk the world's most important. If it is taken into account that has a rapid urbanization, cities face a growing demand for water and sanitation services for both households and industries.

The United Nations (ONU, 2010) mentions that they have the necessary knowledge, experience and technology to combat pollution and waste management, but it is essential to include these issues on national, regional and international agendas requiring coordination between sectors and between different local authorities and governance changes that lead to a more sustainable and equitable use of urban water resources.

3. Defining the problem and research question

In 2015 the INEGI reported that the habits of consumption of natural resources and environmental degradation came close to generating 5.7% environmental costs of gross domestic product (GDP). Mention that the amount of public sector expenditures for environmental protection was about 149 billion pesos which represented about 1.0% of GDP. In contrast, total costs consist of depletion and environmental degradation they approached the 910 billion pesos, which gave an environmental deficit of 761 billion pesos.

Companies dedicated to service waste management and waste and remediation services are vital, both in Mexico and in the State of Jalisco, as they help to fight pollution seeking to balance the effects that have in the process of industrial, agricultural and domestic activities. So, this research attempts to answer how do institutions affect industry and company resources for operation within the State of Jalisco?

4. Review of the theoretical and empirical literature

A. Theory of resources

Wernerfelt (1984) defines resources as the assets, both tangible and intangible, that are linked to the company semi-permanently as brands, own technological knowledge, the use of personal skills, business contacts, efficient procedures, the capital, etc. Business enterprise is defined as an administrative organization and a collection of productive resources. The overall purpose of the business enterprise is to organize the use of their "own" resources, along with other resources acquired from outside the company for the production and sale of goods and services at a profit (Mahoney, 2012); Penrose also argues that own resources are never entering the production process, but only the services that the resource can perform.

The resources lie in a set of potential services defined regardless of use, while services cannot be so defined, the service involves a function or activity; It is largely in this distinction that can be found the source of the uniqueness of each individual company. The company can be seen as a collection of productive resources where the choice of the different uses of these resources over time is determined by administrative decision. Physical resources of a company consist of material things as facilities, equipment, land and natural resources, raw materials, intermediate products, waste products and byproducts, and even stocks of finished unsold products. There are also intangible resources available in a company like unskilled and skilled, clerical, administrative, financial, legal, technical and management personnel work.

B. Industry-based theory

The industry-based theory can be defined as a group of firms producing similar goods or services together (Peng, 2012). A popular and effective in reviewing the performance of the industrial environment, the model is based on Porter's five forces (Daft, 2010) strategy.

1) The threat of new competitors

In a sector can create pressure for the establishment of organizations, which might need to hold down prices or increase their level of investment, the entry of new competitors. Also it depends largely on the amount and extent of possible obstacles, as is the cost (Daft, 2010).

2) The bargaining power of suppliers

It refers to the ability they have to raise prices and / or reduce the amount of goods and services; if the supplier industry is dominated by a few firms they may have the advantage when negotiating (Peng, 2012).

3) The bargaining power of buyers

It can influence when having a small number of buyers leading to a strong bargaining power. They can force down prices, demand better quality or service, and increase costs for provider organization (Daft, 2010).

4) The rivalry between competitors

It refers to the intensity that has the competence. To study this area must be known if it has many competitors or are balanced, slow growth of the industry, which are storage costs and fixed costs, which is the differentiation or cost to change, the bet to the strategy and barriers to exit (Peng, 2012).

5) The threat of substitute products

It is known as the power of alternative or substitute for the services or products of the company that may be affected in costs, new technology, social trends that they affect the customer loyalty as well as other changes environmental (Daft, 2010).

Porter added in 1990 to related industries and support as affecting the competitiveness of the industry, some call them complementary defined as that firm which sells products that add value to products of the industry focal (Peng, 2012).

C. Theory of institutions

Institutions can be defined as humanly planned constraints that structure human interaction; the institutional framework is made of both formal and informal organizations that seek to govern individual behavior and of the firm. Formal institutions are those that include laws, regulations and rules, as the regulatory and coercive pillar of governments. Informal institutions include norms, culture and ethics; It gives support with training pillar referred as values, beliefs and actions of other relevant players that have influence on the behavior of individuals or focal firms; They are also supported by the cognitive pillar referring to the values and inner beliefs that assume and which also guide the behavior of individuals and firms (Peng, 2012).

The interactions between institutions and companies that reduce transaction costs are those that give way to economic activity, as institutions are not static so they are adapting and changing as will be necessary for this purpose require transitions institutions defined by Peng (2012) as those great and fundamental changes that are introduced to both formal and informal rules of the game that affect organizations as players spread around the world, but especially in emerging economies.

5. Contextual framework

The state of Jalisco has an area of 80.137 square kilometers, is located in western Mexico which borders the states of Nayarit, Zacatecas, Aguascalientes, Guanajuato, San Luis Potosi, Michoacán and Colima. In addition, a considerable portion of its territory is bordering the Pacific Ocean. Jalisco´s capital is Guadalajara, but today is a great metropolis, together with the municipalities of Zapopan, San Pedro Tlaquepaque, Tonalá, Tlajomulco de Zuniga, El Salto, Ixtlahuacán de los Membrillos and Juanacatlán which integrate a large conglomerate that makes Guadalajara Metropolitan Area is the most important in Mexico.

The company called National Desazolves is a micro company that has 5 years of life. It is located in the city of Zapopan, Jalisco primarily serving the metropolitan area of the state and nearby municipalities. This company has a wide range of services offered by builders and land developers, maquiladoras and food industries, shopping malls, city halls and state secretaries, as well as dwellings; between commercial activities carried out they can be listed as follows:

a) Silt removal of septic tanks, sumps absorption wells, storm drains.
b) Suction heavy mud.
c) Uncover commercial and industrial drains.
d) Preventive survey pipes.
e) Video robotized inspection.
f) Income vactor trucks and vacuum to industries and fractionators.
g) Rent of portable toilets.
h) Service hookah

6. Research methods

For this work a descriptive research on how institutions come to influence the operation of these businesses is used in the study of the case of National Desazolves for how both formal and informal institutions and industry influence the operation of these companies in the State of Jalisco, in addition to the resources that accounts.

7. Analysis of results

The company has financial resources; human, organizational, physical and technological capital reputation and innovation (see Table. 1).

Table 1. Physical and intangible resources

Type of resources	Resources with which accounts
Financial	Has a good financial situation with bank accounts. Uses bank loans for investment in technological equipment.
Human capital	Director and operational staff are considered intangible resources because of the knowledge they have to perform activities. The operating staff is demonstrating good execution on tasks. They do not hire employees without experience in the field to avoid training time.
Organizational architecture	The main partnership with suppliers is the shop that repairs and checks the computer constantly to not incur on higher expenses in addition to make repairs quickly.
Organizational	There is no formal organizational structure; however, operators know who to report the results of services, and technical problems.
Physical	The geographical area where is located help and support making faster tasks, the proximity of offices and the pension with Treatment Plant White River Río Blanco allows the company to discharge early without investing too much time.
Technology	Its vehicle fleet is broad for the various services it offers, besides its own. Plans to renovate the team are giving according to the needs that are on the market.
Innovation	Innovation of tangible resources is not currently performed due to the degree of investment involved. On the side of intangible resources, the application is very low because the technical knowledge gained through some training invested in the search for troubleshooting technical-operational nature.

Reputation	The company has a good reputation in the market that works through human capital that has; It is working on positioning a brand image and status in the market because it is a newly established company.

Source: Own elaboration.

Most of the resources are physical and human capital; innovation in technology is almost nil because the equipment needed to perform the services is imported from the United States, as manufacturers are located in that country and try to imitate manufacturing equipment investment of both money is needed as strong capital for a company like this micro or small size is difficult to achieve, so the bargaining power of technology providers is high.

Formal institutions have broad power over these businesses, first, recourse to the Constitution of the United Mexican States, in Article 4 is established as an individual guarantee and fundamental right of everyone, enjoying an environment suitable for development and welfare thus determining the State's obligation and the powers that make it, to create the mechanisms and legal instruments that lead to the guarantee. For National Desazolves can operate needs to comply with the Regulations of the Law on Waste Management of the State of Jalisco, where the requirements that must be met before the Ministry of Roads and Transport, Ministry of Environment and Territorial Development mentioned, Intermunicipal Water system and Sewerage (see Table. 2).

Table 2. Institutions

Institution	Granting permit	Time it takes
Secretary of Roads and Transport Jalisco State (Secretaria de Vialidad y Transporte del Estado de Jalisco)	Permit to allow circulation of transporting waste collection services special driving.	The resolution of the permit is 15 business days.

Intermunicipal Water System and Sewerage (SIAPA) (Sistema Intermunicipal de Agua Potable y Alcantarillado (SIAPA))	Permission to download non-hazardous waste treatment plant.	The resolution of the permit is 3 months.

Informal institutions that are present in the company are the values of teamwork, respect, care and protection of the environment; it is committed to do the job that customers want in a timely manner agreed. It should always speak the truth to consumers when they cannot perform the activity to lie and not be able to maintain the customer loyalty. Actions are being implemented to create a culture of accountability and timeliness employees. Diamond analysis of Porter manages to define what the importance of the industry is and as what happens around them influences the decisions to be taken (See table 3, below).

8. Conclusions and recommendations

After analyzing the results, it can be concluded that it is necessary to have the equipment and qualified personnel. This is decisive for the company to operate efficiently and effectively, so if it is missed one of them, is missing the services provided would be deficient. The lack of experience of the operators may lead them to incur expenses for repair of equipment if it is damaged. The investment needed to a company of this type is about 1.5 million pesos and approximately 6 months that takes for granted the permits.

Table 3. Porter´s Diamond analysis

Being a service that cannot be considered as a valuable, rare or difficult to imitate resource, companies seek to excel in competition based on giving a lower price and better quality service. National Desazolves intends to position itself as a separate company on quality, best performing services each time they are performed so that continuous improvement works to correct errors that have. Must work in positioning the brand to achieve to have a large market and become a larger, benefiting the community with better jobs and especially helping to fight pollution that occurs in the region on water resources.

IMPACT OF GLOBALIZATION ON RETAILING IN CROATIA

Sandra Mrvica MAĐARAC[*]
Višnja BARTOLOVIĆ[]
Matej GALIĆ[]

Abstract

Trade is one of the leading sectors of the Croatian economy, which has undergone significant changes under the influence of globalization over the last decade. According to Central Bureau of Statistics in Croatia about 16 % of all employees work in trade business, and more than a quarter of business entities are registered in this sector. Therefore the trade has a significant share in Croatian GDP creation.

Globalization is considered an important factor of economic development around the world. Through development of communication technology the world has become integrated into the "global village" and a business contact itself can be accomplished in a matter of minutes. The effects of globalization on retailing in Croatia are mostly reflected in the introduction of new retailing forms, development of e-commerce, consumer protection, the introduction of space management, changes in consumer habits and the arrival of multinational trading companies on the market of Croatia. In this way, the Croatian market has become a part of a single system. Globalization has a negative effect on trade in the Republic of Croatia too, because the domestic production and retail sales of small neighborhood stores are threatened in this way.

Retailing in Croatia should make an attempt to adapt to the global trends in the world and to new changes taking into account the domestic production by the principle of comparative advantage.

Keywords: globalization, retailing, Republic of Croatia, e-commerce, new retailing forms

1. Introduction

With the development of information and communications technology, the world has become a single system, and the connection between two subjects in different parts of the world can be achieved in minutes. There is a cause and effect relation between the creation of economic and political integration and the process of globalization, where globalization can be seen as one of the stages of the development of civilization.

A large increase in trade as an element of globalization has resulted in a rapid reduction of transport costs and transport acceleration. In recent decades, there have been some revolutionary changes in the trade business, which were the result of a rapid development of consumption and production. The requirements of consumers have become more diverse and less predictable. With the emergence of new brands, new retail forms and legislations, a visible and noticeable impact of globalization can be seen in the retail sales in Croatia.

In the Republic of Croatia, trade is one of the most important industries that employs about 22% of the total number of employees, and in the trade domain operates approximately 28% of all companies.

In this paper is provided with a theoretical approach to the concept of globalization and also includes positive and negative effects of globalization, the trade analysis in the Republic of Croatia as an economy branch. The effects of globalization on the emergence of the new forms of retail in the Republic of Croatia are also cited; we analyzed the e - commerce in the Republic of Croatia as one of the consequences of globalization, and herewith list the consumer's rights pursuant to the Consumer Protection Act.

This study may have significant importance, because it exposes the changes in retail in the Republic of Croatia and their causes, as the reflection of the hidden consequences of globalization. For these changes entrepreneurs can take advantage when initiating an entrepreneurial venture, or for the already existing entrepreneurs for the purpose of their work improvement.

By analyzing the data that have been referred to the trade in the Republic of Croatia there is a link with the impact of globalization. Other papers with regard on this subject have analyzed globalization, but the correlation of globalization and the trade in the Republic of Croatia have not been so far related. The works of other authors have been written on the topic of globalization and philosophy, the relationship of globalization and Christianity, and the relationship of globalization and national sovereignty.

2. The concept of globalization

"The term globalization is derived from the word "global", meaning totality, while globalism is a way of looking at events in general. Thus, globalization would imply a social process that strives to universality and unity of the world"[1].

The conventional definition of globalization signifies the process of opening and liberalization of national financial markets and their entry into the global capital market. However, today this term more often implies the "international integration" of goods, technology, labor and capital, therefore we can talk about globalization in a broad sense[2].

GATT (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) had a major impact on the emergence of globalization. GATT was founded in 1947 and was based on the clause of the greatest benefits from which the three fundamental principles arise: the principle of reciprocity, the principle of liberalization and the principle of non-discrimination. On December 8th 1994 GATT was renamed WTO (World Trade Organization), which is financed by contributions from the signatories according to their share in the trade among the member states. WTO comprises 161 member states.

There are many aspects of globalization. The three most important are: the economic aspect, the political and legal aspects and the cultural aspect of globalization.

Among many economic factors that drive globalization the role of transnational corporations is of great importance. These are corporations that produce goods or services in more than one country. Some of the largest transnational companies known all over the world are: Coca Cola, General Motors, Colgate, Palmolive, Kodak and many others. In the late 1980s and 1990s, transnational companies have widely spread, establishing three strong markets: European, Asian-Pacific and North American[3].

Most social scientists agree that today there are three characteristic processes that affect the formation of life in modern society and its perspective. These are: individualization (of life), fragmentation (of society) and globalization (of the world). The first implies strengthening of the role of the individual, his personality, political and other rights and freedoms. The second is about an increase in dividing the rich and the poor, so that there is a growing number of the poor on one side and a decreasing number of the rich on the other side. Finally, the third implies a discordant and contradictory process of creating the new world order and a world society based on a new system of values that is built on the ruins of the old, especially the nation and the state and all other traditional values and identities[4].

Various disciplines of social science emphasize different elements of globalization. For economists, globalization is primarily seen as openness to other countries - there are no limits when it comes to investments, financial transactions, trade and labour, and foreign investments are less regulated. Silbert and Klodt have defined globalization as the process of converting separate national economies into an integrated world economy. This change is primarily carried out through international trade, international movement of factors of production (capital and labour) and the international spread of technology[5].

Thanks to globalization, relations between people and countries are becoming more intense, and people are starting to think globally and to understand the world differently. Globalization has certain requirements: continuous investment in knowledge, technology, research and development. One who begins to fall behind in the globalization process or does not join the contemporary processes in time is severely lagging behind. Today, the world is continuosly opening and closing. Hence, a well-known saying was created, describing the world as a "global village"[6].

Unfortunately, the number of global, regional and local dangers have been growing to the same extent, thus being the very reason why the modern man and his society cannot be tranquil and enjoy the fruits of the all around progress. In fact, warnings of intellectual potential are coming from all sides about the undesirable direction the contemporary society is taking. Therefore, the concern with current threats is widespread and real, because, over the long term, they could become even greater[7].

One of the criticisms of globalization is its identification with the term "Americanisation". Greg Dyke (former Director-General of the BBC) gave a speech in 2000, where he said: "We were told that the world is globalizing. This is not true: it is Americanizing. "

3. Trade as an economic sector in Croatia

Commerce is one of the most important economic sectors in Croatia. According to the criterion of the total number of registered legal entities, 28% of business entities operate in trade[8].

In Croatia, more than a quarter of business entities are registered in trade, thus constantly making it as one of the leading sectors of the Croatian economy. In recent years, this sector is burdened with the problems of payment, problems of insolvency, bankruptcies... In the last few years, its share in GDP, which was 11%, has decreased by two percentage points. At EU level, the trade's average share in GDP is 10%.

The data from 2012 for the 19 countries of the EU show that Croatia had 20 200 stores in the retail sector. In Croatia, the average number of inhabitants per shop is 211. Commerce is the mirror image of macroeconomic trends, which is seen in shifts in trade, since it is in direct contact with consumers, and detects all changes in relation to their buying habits. Under the influence of the global crisis of 2008, a stabilization of consumption followed, and these trends have continued throughout these past few years as well, with the exception of 2001, when the turnover in the retail business was growing at an annual level of 1%. After a mild recovery, it has come to a stabilization of consummption and a drop in turnover at an annual level of -4.2% in 2012, that is, -0.6% in 2013. Due to the slight recovery during 2014, there was a 0.4% increase in revenue at an annual level in 2013[9].

4. Impact of globalization on the incidence of new retail forms

Next time you go to a supermarket, pay attention to various products you can on the shelves. If your shopping starts in the produce department, it is very likely that you will find pineapple from Hawaii, grapefruit from Israel, apples from South Africa and avocados from Spain. On the next shelf you might find a variety of curry sauces and spices for Indian food, a fine selection of ingredients for Arabian meals like couscous or falafel, as well as canned coconut milk for preparing Thai dishes. As you continue your shopping, you notice coffee from Kenya, Indonesia and Colombia, lamb from New Zealand and wine from Argentina and Chile[10].

M. Horeni has vividly described this in the Internation Herald Tribune: "whether you are in the downtown area of Rio de Janeiro, Bruxelles, London or Mexico City, the best locations in the city are always held by the same companies." The impact of globalization in Croatia is reflected in the emergence of new brands and global corporations. Every major Croatian city, just like other European cities, has shops of brands such as Zara, C&A, Tom Tailor, Benetton, Diesel, Mustang, Camel.

The development of retail led by major international retailers in the transition countries of Central and Southeastern Europe can contribute to consumption growth in these countries, but may slow down their overall economic development due to excessive import. On the other hand, the development of retail forms, based on new technologies, extends the possibilities of supplying the consumers, and, as such, contributes to the improvement of the overall economic process[11].

In recent years, there has been an increase in the number of shopping centers and hypermarkets in Croatia with a tendecy of growth. With their business plans, major retailers have shown great interest in investing in the Croatian market due to geographic, demographic and legal advantages it offers. Foreign firms have access to cheap sources of financing, lower purchase prices, high bargaining power with the suppliers, as well as modern and refined business technology, which facilitates their entry into foreign markets. With numerous shopping hypermarkets entering the Croatian market, along with the announced arrival of others, both the Croatian trade and the buying habits of consumers have changed.

The key issues and unknowns when entering a foreign market are:

- regulation of products and services,
- the importance and the potential size of the selected foreign market,
- the importance of political and socio-cultural environment of the state,
- the importance of potential competitors and market entry strategies,
- the expected sales potential on the selected market,
- requirements of international logistics,
- the compatibility of the selected markets with the expected goals of the company and its competitors.

Before the 1990s Croatian retail was dominated by smaller shops located in city centers and Neighborhood shops with mostly food products. The first shopping center in Croatia, opened in 1994 in Zagreb, was Importanne Centar. The first shopping center on the city outskirts was Italian Mercatone, opened in 1999 in Zagreb. The first shopping centers were opened in the United States, the first in Baltimore in 1907, followed by the one in Kansas City in 1923. Intensive construction continued after the Second World War, and in the 1960s it underwent a major expansion. Outside of America, the construction of shopping malls began much later. In Europe and Australia, they began opening in the 1960s, mostly in Germany, France and the UK.

A shopping center is a planned commercial center built on a larger area, intended for retail trade and other services with a large parking lot for personal vehicles[12]. Today, malls are postmodern places of consumption in which trade and entertainment are closely intertwined[13].

With the appearance of shopping centers, the urban space of Croatian cities has changed. Shopping malls are mainly located on the outskirts, which has an impact on the road infrastructure. Every time a shopping center is being opened to the public, there is a traffic jam, which is one of the reasons why they are built close to entrances to the city.

Besides the fact that their main function is to make shopping easier, shopping malls have become public gathering places, thus changing not only our buying habits, but the way we spend our free time as well. Most of them are intended for family purchases. There are, of course, economic, technological, social, national geographical and many other features that have been taken into account when planning the center. Hence, the opening of shopping centers changes both the image and the spatial plan of the city, that is, cities. Customers go to various shopping malls due to the difference in prices, offers, availability and so on, while they visit newly opened centers out of curiosity and thanks to sales promotions. The goal of each shopping center is to be different and special, whether by content or appearance, since they are becoming an attraction - a brand. Precisely due to an increasing number of people visiting malls and the variety of products shopping centers offer, stores from the centers of major Croatian cities have moved to shopping centers, thus creating changes in our lifestyle and buying habits, as well as in the image of the city. Today, malls are not only places where we do our shopping; they have become public gathering places, "cities within a city".

According to Eurostat data, Croatia is slightly above the EU average when it comes to the number of stores in the retail industry. For example, Croatia has more stores than Germany, Denmark and the United Kingdom, which all have a much higher standard of living than Croatia.

5. E-commerce in Croatia

E-commerce, heavily influenced by globalization, has developed in Croatia as well. Electronic commerce is becoming more and more common as a way of doing business using information technology, since it is simple to use and costs less when compared to conventional retail. With today's fast-paced lifestyle, online shopping is much more comfortable, it is not time-consuming, and can be accessed at any time of day or night.

"Electronic commerce is the process of purchase, sale or exchange of products, services or information through publicly accessible computer network, the Internet, and offers a great reduction in cost and time of transactions"[14]. The online retailer is an intermediary between the original manufacturer and the end customer, therefore its place is somewhere in the middle of the value chain which is usually formed by the retailer himself[15].

The concept of e-commerce can be defined from four perspectives[16]:

1. communication perspective; electronic commerce enables the delivery of information, products/services or means of payment through public telephone networks, publicly accessible computer networks or some other electronic means of communication,
2. perspective of business processes; electronic commerce represents the application of new technologies towards automation of business transactions and improvement of business operations,
3. perspective of service delivery; electronic commerce is the means by which the company, customers and management are trying to reduce the cost of service delivery while increasing the level of quality of goods and the speed of the delivery,
4. virtual perspective; electronic commerce offers the possibility of buying and selling of products, services and information via the Internet and their services.

E-commerce can be divided into two main areas[17] (Ružić et al., 262):

- Trade between businesses entities - Business-to-business (B2B);
- Trade-oriented towards the market of end consumers of daily consumption - Business-to-Consumer (B2C).

Electronic commerce offers many opportunities to save. One way is the already mentioned increased amount of information that reduces the amount of stock, thus reducing the maintenance costs of storage and the handling of goods. With the establishment of online stores, a store that works 24/7 was created, and the best thing about it is that the extended working hours do not bring additional costs. The advantages for consumers are that they are better informed, have a larger choice of products, and it is flexible and convenient. Many companies have benefited from the consumer's ignorance, but with the appearance of electronic commerce, consumers have become more informed. On the Internet, there are no local monopolies; the competition is on a global scale. The consumer is able to choose from thousands of sellers and an even greater number of products. Each customer can personalize the e-shop according to their own wishes, they can determine which products, information and news they want. Customers do not have to leave their house or office in order to have access to thousands of products, since online stores exist. At this stage of development of electronic commerce, merchants are willing to lower the prices, because they have figured that the most important thing here is growth[18] The course of the business process of e-commerce is almost identical to the conventional course of the sales process, and is divided into phases: initiative, operational performance, the conclusion of the sales transaction, payment and the delivery of goods.

With the Croatian accession to the EU, the market has expanded and new business opportunities have appeared where e-commerce and e-sales have great potential. Statistics, which follows the growing trend of e-commerce, shows that Croatian consumers have adopted this way of trade and realized all benefits of e-commerce.

The data show that e-commerce in Croatia is on the rise; in 2012, 16% of shoppers bought online, in 2013 19% and in 2014 22%. An important trend is that online trading is growing as well. Online stores have potential and could be a great opportunity, especially for small and medium-sized enterprises. On the other hand, it should be noted that in 2013 only 63% of Croatian citizens regularly used the Internet, which was below the EU average (72%)[19].

According to the data from the Ministry of Economy of the Republic of Croatia, 27% of enterprises buy online, while 25% of enterprises sell online, and 72% of companies have their own Internet site. Wholesale and retail take up 26% of online trade. An average consumption of six months per online customer is 227 euros.

Due to all this, it is illusory to expect that an increase in retail capacity would immediately lead to higher employment, because by technological modernization greater productivity is achieved as well. On the other hand, since the goods from domestic sources are too expensive, domestic retailers have started to import more[20].

6. The Consumer Protection Act in the Republic of Croatia

The development of trade, the increasingly demanding needs of customers and consumers, and the emergence of a large number of various products on the market led to the need for legal regulation of consumer protection.

It was not until late 1997 that the first Croatian Association for Consumer Protection was established. In early 2000 Potrošač (Consumer - Society for Consumer Protection of Croatia) was founded as well. The Consumer Protection Act of the Republic of Croatian was adopted on 29 May 2003. The Act regulates the protection of basic rights of consumers when buying products and services, as well as in other forms of acquisition of goods and services, and oversees marketing communications and the protection of children. The National Consumer Protection Programme determines the foundations of the consumer protection policy in a given period. In February 2005, the Croatian Parliament has adopted the first Croatian National Consumer Protection Programme for 2005 and 2006.

The Consumer Protection Act of the Republic of Croatian was adopted on 29 May 2003. The Act regulates the protection of basic rights of consumers when buying products and services, as well as in other forms of acquisition of goods and services, and oversees marketing communications and the protection of children. All protections are based on the consumers' fundamental rights[21]:

- the right to protect the economic interests of consumers
- the right to protection against risks to life, health and property
- the right to legal protection of consumer
- the right to information and education of consumers
- the right of association of consumers to protect their interests
- the right to consumer representation and participation of consumers in the work of bodies that deal with issues of their interest

Some of the areas of law are covered in details by the statute:

- sale of products and services provision. Most of the text is devoted to retail sales: the terms of sale and service delivery; the way of displaying prices when advertising and the payment of financial obligations of consumers, the obligations of the dealer when issuing bills; means of selling defective products; packaging regulations and the like.

- the labeling and sale of products. The law clearly states what the label should contain. For the first time, it is explicitly required that genetically modified products be labelled. This is a partial concession to consumers, since they wanted a total ban on imports of genetically modified products, which had not passed in the Parliament due to great power of foreign lobbies.
- public Services. In the area of public services, the principles of the directives of the European Union are partially applied. They require that all regulations be non-discriminatory, as well as the full transparency of prices and delivery methods. According to the law, in other monopolistic public services (water, gas, and electricity) only what is ordered and delivered is paid.
- advance payment, contracts concluded at a distance and outside of the business premises of the traders. With more expensive products (furniture, car, real estate), traders are asking for a down payment. This Act defines the relationship (interest rate, method of returning etc.) and the time during which the down payment is valid. Distance selling is specially regulated as it is becoming more and more common as a form of sales. The law regulates the return period, as well as the return merchandise authorization and refunds. Distance selling is not permitted for medicine, veterinary products and explosives.
- advertising of products and services. Defining the forms of advertising, along with their usage, are valuable regulations of this part of the Act. A significant novelty is the ban on misleading or false advertising. Specific parts of the law protect children from the false advertising or advertising maladjusted to children.
- holders of consumer protection. In addition to laws that protect consumers to a great extent, the National programme made a significant contribution as well. The programme was adopted by the Croatian Parliament at the government's proposal, for a period of two years. The law contains points on financing associations, the system of permanent supervision by the National Consumer Protection Council, and the informing of consumers.

The main goal of the society Potrošač (Consumer) is the protection of the rights of individual consumers and their families, to transform the passive consumer into an active one, conscious of their rights, guaranteed by the laws, to the high quality of goods and services, to a polite and decent relationship between the manufacturer and the service provider, and to the law-based protection from bribery, corruption, bureaucratic and monopolistic self-will[22].

Consumer complaints on a daily basis indicate a high level of violations of "good business practices", thus distorting the legal framework that is governing the protection of consumers in the Republic of Croatia. The fact that only about 20% of citizens-consumers are sufficiently aware of their legal rights, and the situation is similar with the retailers, service providers and manufacturers as well, is one of the reasons for frequent violations of basic consumer rights and laws, which regulate the consumer protection in Croatia.

7. Conclusion

One of the answers to the meaning of globalization in Croatia is provided by dr.sc. Petar Vučić: "politically, it is a process of Croatian integration into the EU; militarily, it is a process of Croatian integration into the NATO. Economically, it does not have to be explained, because Croatia does not have its autonomous and independent national-oriented economic policy. This is done by IMF and the World Bank, by foreign banks, located abroad and in Croatia, and other business entities that have completely destroyed the economic sovereignty."

Globalization is a process that has started and cannot be stopped. It is supported by the growing interaction between the participants of international trade, the global networking of financial markets and the growing power of multinational corporations. We are witnessing the permanent information and communication development as well, the development of a global culture and polycentric world politics. The supporters of globalization emphasize the fact that it has promoted the exchange of information, connected different cultures, enabled the growth of democracy, and the trade development through globalization has led to greater consumption and increased the standards of living. Criticism of globalization refers to the advantage and superiority of developed countries in relation to the underdeveloped, the vulnerability of national cultures and identities, and the great power of multinational companies.

Effective consumer protection and regulation of trade is necessary to ensure the proper functioning of the market economy, and this protection will depend on the development of the administrative infrastructure in order to secure market surveillance and law enforcement in this area. To this end, and in their common interest, the parties will encourage and ensure the harmonization of law and adjustment of consumer protection in Croatia to that in force in the European Union.

For the small traders in the Republic of Croatia to withstand some of the negative effects of globalization, such as a decrease in the sales of domestic products, and to increase their sales, they should specialize, and follow the trends in connecting and mutual appearance. In addition, it is necessary to further arouse the awareness of consumers in Croatia for the purchase of domestic products in order to increase the domestic production and the number of jobs in Croatia.

Croatian trade is turning towards today's dynamic society and the increasingly demanding requirements of consumers who, apart from the very products, are looking for experience as well.

ASPECTS REGARDING THE ROLE AND FUNCTIONS OF THE STATE, IN ECONOMY*

Florina POPA

Abstract

Public Sector Economics - branch of economic science – has, as main object of study, the state policies, the role and importance of its actions in the economic and social life.
State involvement in the economic life is relevant through its activities, whereby are occured legal regulations concerning the development of social and economic life, interventions in the market mechanisms, with measures designed to increase economic performance.
The implications of the public sector in economy are exhibited in the context of links that they provide between the production and consumption sphere , in the development of flows among economic agents.
The actions of the state, respectively of government, both as an economic agent and as regulator of economy, relevant to the role of the public sector, have as main objective, the optimum of resource allocation, so that to obtain a better fulfillment of citizen needs.
The study highlights issues referring to the public sector role and implications in economy, market failure and state functions, through which it aims to promote economic and social wellbeing.

Keywords: state, the role of public sector, market failure, functions, public goods

1. Introduction

Public sector economy is a branch of economics the main object of study of which is the policies of the state, the role and importance of its actions in economic and social life.

Human existence is indestructibly linked to the presence of the state, as the area of manifestation of the activities developed by it comprises multiple levels of economic and social life, the political decisions taken by the state causing a system of rules by which society operates, namely, the political, economic, legal institutions, determinant for the life and actions of individuals.

State's interventions, as an economic actor, take the form of benefits provided for community in areas that cannot be covered by the private sector; concerned, first of all, to satisfy the needs of citizens, the public sector has a monopoly in the provision of public goods and services provided to them, the manner of resource allocation being subordinated to this goal. Meanwhile, private sector involvement in providing public goods and services causes the occurrence of competition and thus of performance in public administration, an improved public sector, through the instrument of public administration, constituting a support for strengthening democracy and good governance.

Performance in the public sector requires a set of conditions on competence, organization, accountability, government transparency, citizen participation in decision-making in certain common issues of public interest, efficient allocation of public resources, democratic governance.

2. The role and importance of public sector

The role of the public sector in economy is relevant by means of the state's actions, respectively, of the government, both as an economic actor and as well as regulator of the economy so that, through an optimal management of resources, to achieve the objective of meeting the needs of citizens.

The implications of the public sector are manifested in the context of the links it provides between the production and consumption and the carrying out of economic flows between operators.

Thus, the public sector:

- Provides its resources through the channel of fees and taxes levied from the economic producers and consumers;
- Participates in capital market transactions, entering into relationship with other economic participants, which is another source of income;
- It is a direct participant in the exchange on the market, using the financial resources it has, as producer - stance in which it acquires the resources (production factors) from the production factors (inputs) market - and as beneficiary – a situation in which it purchases goods and services from private operators;

- It is a provider of goods and services on which it has an exclusivity (defense, justice etc.) and of other goods and services that can be delivered by means of both the public sector and the private sector (health, education etc.).

These forms of participation of the public sector in economic activities can be represented schematically in the figure below (Fig. no. 1):

By means of the flows created between the public sector and private operators, the State influences and regulates the economic activity, affecting resource allocation as a result of its interventions through the level of taxation applied, or of the decisions of price and production, when they act as producers.

Also:

- On the products market: the demand of consumer goods meets the supply of producers;
- On the market of production factors: demand for production factors (resources) of producers, meets the holders' area.

3. Market failure

The State is a public organization, the system of government being the one which sets the basic rules according to which economic activity takes place; the institutions of the economic system are linked to the form of manifestation of political power, the political government authority being the one holding monopoly in exercising power in the society.

In the context of modern economies, the public sector operates alongside the private one in the form of mixed economy.

The market and price balance is achieved based on the supply-demand relation, in competition conditions, the efficiency being contingent upon the orientation of markets towards a pure and perfect competition. Failure to comply with these criteria can cause imbalances in market mechanisms and in ensuring an optimal allocation within the meaning of the Pareto criterion, situations considered market failures.

They identified a number of causes that prevent the efficient allocation of resources and lead to the need for the State intervention in order to remedy and maximize social utility.

The most significant of these relate to the particularities of public goods and externalities, to which, the failure of competition, the costs of transfer can be added.

➢ Particularities of public goods

Public goods are those categories of goods that cannot be achieved by the market or the production of which is not covering, which causes government intervention, by ensuring resources for their production through compulsory taxation system.

It is identified by means of two characteristics:

- Are not excluded - a public good produced is affordable for any potential consumer;
- Not rival - for a public good produced when adding any new consumer to the original, no new costs are added, utilities are not diminished; each person can benefit from the amount available to another person.

These two properties provide to the public goods the quality of pure public goods; in case of pure private goods these two traits do not manifest.

In the market system, private producers are not interested in supplying these types of goods, the allocation of resources to this end, being done by the public sector, the result of a political decision. Government can contract the achievement of these goods with private companies, the funding being made from public resources.

The following data show the characteristics of public goods versus those of private goods (Table no. 1):

Table no. 1 Comparative elements between public goods and private goods

Features	Pure public goods	Pure private goods
Exclusion	Are not excluded	Are excluded
Rivalry	Non-rival	Rival
Exclusion costs	Great	Insignificant

Producer	Public organizations or private actors on the basis of the contract with government.	Private actors
Allocation	Through public budget	Through market
Resources of financing	Public budget charged by taxation	Incomes from capitalization on market

Source: adaptation from Dorel Ailenei, Tudor Grosu, "Economia sectorului public", http://www.biblioteca-digitala.ase.ro/biblioteca/carte2.asp?id=389&idb

The above shows that the particularities of the two categories of goods are in opposition, being relevant for the involvement in resource allocation.

As such, they have an impact on the market mechanism generating failures:

particularities of public goods: the reverse of non-exclusivity is the disinterest of private companies in achieving public goods because those who do not pay consumption cannot be eliminated; non-rivalry – it does not lead to profit maximization (zero marginal cost on the emergence of a new consumer), so that the goods are not supplied.

Not covering the market at the level of demand means inefficiency in the sense of Pareto.

Along with the two categories of pure public and pure private goods, there is the category of mixed private-public goods, which there are in every contemporary economy.

Externalities. This category includes certain activities of production or consumption of goods, which can affect positively or negatively, the activity of other agents than those which have generated it; benefits or costs, in addition, resulted from these processes are not reflected in market prices (are external).

In the case of water or air pollution by a producing unit, the price of those products does not include an additional cost.

Externalities can be:

- Positive - the private advantages (of the manufacturer) are lower than the social benefit achieved also by other community members;
- Negative - social costs (borne by other subjects external to those from the producing units) are higher than those of private establishments;
- Externalities generate costs or benefits that are not reflected in market prices - these do not reflect appropriately the allocation of resources used.

The government measures consist of economic policies able to stimulate activities that generate positive externalities (through subsidies), respectively, to compensate those who suffer the consequences of negative externalities.

- Competition failure occurs when the subjects that provide or those who consume have a monopoly on the demand or supply. The consequence is manifested in prices higher than trade balance or unsatisfactory supply.
- The costs involved in transferring the use of goods make the exchanges and the development of market processes difficult, with negative effects on the efficiency of resource allocation.

4. The functions of the state

In direct relation and consequence of market failure, the State functions carry out, categories through which the State seeks to promote economic and social wellbeing.

Richard Musgrave identified the areas that require government intervention in economy, by exercising three functions[1]:

- function of resource allocation;
- function of distribution;
- organizing (stabilization) function"

- The function of resource allocation occurs when there are obstacles in the efficient allocation of resources as a result of weak competition, externalities, particularities of public goods, causing disruptions in market mechanisms.

Public intervention is exercised by the production activity of the State for the achievement of certain categories of goods (which cannot be achieved through the market system) in areas such as national security and defense, justice, public utilities, infrastructure, education, health, which implies the existence of appropriate resources.

- The function of distribution of wealth consists of a process of redistribution of income and wealth among members of society, by transferring from owners to persons who do not have such resources, based on considerations of social justice, which obliges one to find suitable methods leading to a fair distribution.

In exercising this function, the State applied a income tax, the State, thus, obtaining financial resources needed for the supply of public goods and services. Thus, the function of redistribution is related to the public production activity which uses the resources resulted from taxation to finance the assets.

- Organizing function (macroeconomic stabilization) The imbalances that manifest as a result of the spontaneous market game aim at issues of growth, inflation, unemployment, a situation which causes the need for public intervention.

[1] Jaques Genereux (2003) quotes Richard Musgrave (1959), "The theory of Public Finance: a study in public economy" ed. Mc. Grow Hill, New York, 1959, in the article "Les trois fonctions de l'Etat, selon Richard Musgrave", 01/11/2003, Alternatives Economiques, N 219, 2003, http://www.alternatives-economiques.fr/trois-fonctions-de-letat-selon-richard-musgrave/00027793.

The exercise of the stabilization function is consistent with the state's objectives in the economic field regarding the full use of production factors. The state develops policies to stimulate economic growth, control of inflation, increase employment with effect in reducing unemployment, social protection actions.

In the state intervention may occur activity risks relating to the effectiveness of public actions and correction of market errors considered as failures of government, such as:

- Difficulty of control of the economic policy instruments implementation systems, of certain negotiations that may fail;
- High costs posed by a bureaucratic apparatus, significant as size, required by government intervention, difficulties that may arise in the operation thereof.

As such, attention should be paid to the delimitation of government actions, to ensure the most advantageous alternative to the degree of public sector intervention in the market economy.

5. Conclusions

The State is a public organization, the system of government being the one which sets the basic rules according to which economic activity takes place; institutions of the economic system are linked to the manifestation form of political power, political government authority being the one holding the monopoly of exercising power in the society.

The role of the public sector is relevant through the actions of the state or government, both as an economic actor as well as regulator of the economy so that, through optimal management of resources in can achieve the objective of serving citizens' needs.

The implications of the public sector in the economy are manifested in the context of the links it provides between the production and consumption areas and of carrying out of economic flows between economic operators.

By means of the flow created between the public sector and private economic operators, the state influences and regulates the economic activity affecting resource allocation as a result of its interventions through the level of taxation applied, or of the price and production decisions, when they have the capacity of producers.

In the context of modern economies, the public sector operates alongside the private one in the form of mixed economy, the market balance and prices being achieved based on the supply-demand relation under competition conditions.

The existence of market failures leads to the need for state intervention manifested through the exercise of its functions - categories by means of which it aims at remedying and maximizing social utility.

Production of goods by the public sector, their destination are related to income redistribution, which makes the government considering the resources available, based on the tax system, and as well as the nature of the goods to be produced.

If the efficiency and effectiveness is the cornerstone of good governance, the public sector has the responsibility to find the best ways to use the resources (human, material, financial, etc.) in order to ensure in the best conditions, the coverage of the needs of the population.

The increase of the public sector efficiency must comply with the increasingly larger and more diverse demands of citizens, as an essential purpose of public administration's actions; for this purpose, the evaluation of the efficiency of the public sector in various fields can provide an opportunity for guidance in formulating some public funds management strategies appropriate to achieve the objectives.

AUDIT OF MUNICIPALITIES AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT UNITS - THE CASE STUDY OF THE CZECH REPUBLIC

Richard POSPISIL*

Abstract

Public economics examines the influence of the state on economic equality and efficiency, and on conduction of business entities in connection with the various tax systems and individual behavior in private consumption. To manage the public economy is thorough knowledge of the real decision-making and allocation mechanisms. From a budgetary perspective, the public economy in the Czech Republic is characterized mainly by the state budget, 6,249 municipal budgets and 14 budgets of local government units. These all units are together subject to annual statutory audit, which mainly represents the analysis of the system of the Audit informative and monitoring indicators (ASIMI). The paper analyzes the outcome of the audit with the use of absolute and relative indicators and suggests possible changes and consolidation of municipal and local government budgets in the Czech Republic.

Keywords: municipality, local government unit, public budget, debt, GDP

1. Introduction

The public sector is part of the national economy, whose main area of interest is to carry out a public service, who are funded from public funds as well as are managed and administered in public administration. Decisions within public sector are made on public option and are subject to public control[1]. From a material standpoint, the issue of control of public administration is more difficult than controlling the business sector of the national economy, and moreover, is subject to the principles of publicity, the principles associated with the obligation to give public entities the requesting information[2]. Public sector represents one of the hallmarks of public administration and its name is derived from the fact that it is implemented in the public interest[3].

By the end of 2016 there is a total of 6,249 municipalities and 14 Local Government Units (LGU) in the Czech Republic. The task of each municipality is to allocate sufficient funds to finance the activities that the municipality has in its scope and activities, as well as those which are transmitted by the state[4]. Municipalities and LGU seek comprehensive development of its territory and ensure the needs of its citizens through public goods and services.

On July 1st 2004 came into effect law No. 420/2004 Call., on the Act on the audit of municipalities and LGU, where articles 1-9 of § 4 oblige the rule to provide (till 30th June of current year) the audit management for the past year. The audit shall be conducted in accordance with law No. 93/2009 Coll., on Auditors and the International Auditing Standards and related application clauses of the Czech Chamber of Auditors.

2. Objectives and methods

For the preparation and fair presentation of financial statements in accordance with accounting standards of the entity, there are data sources obtained from the Czech Statistical Institute and the Czech Ministry of Finance. These data were analyzed using both the absolute and relative methods of managerial accounting. Based on these data and analysis the main objective of the paper is to evaluate the main results of audit of municipalities and LGU in the Czech Republic and determine possible directions of its future reform. Part of this responsibility is designing, implementing and maintaining internal control relevant to the preparation and fair presentation of financial statements that are free from material misstatement, whether due to fraud or error, selecting and applying appropriate accounting policies and making reasonable accounting estimates[5].

3. Principles of budget survey

An audit involves performing procedures to obtain audit evidence about the amounts and disclosures in the financial statements. The procedures selected depend on the auditor's judgment, including the assessment of the risks that the financial statements contain material misstatements due to fraud or error[6].

When assessing these risks, the auditor considers internal control relevant to the preparation and fair presentation of the financial statements. The aim of the assessment of internal controls is to propose appropriate auditing procedures, not to comment on the effectiveness of internal controls. An audit also includes evaluating the appropriateness of accounting policies used and the reasonableness of accounting estimates made by management as well as evaluating the overall financial statement presentation.

The auditor shall, in accordance with these regulations, to comply with ethical requirements and plan and perform the audit to obtain reasonable assurance about whether the financial statements are free of material misstatement[7].

The role of the auditor is to issue the audit opinion on the financial statements.

Data review on the annual management of municipalities and LGU, which forms part of the final account are based on law No. 420/2004 Call, § 2, article 1-2:

a) the income and expenditure of the budget, including cash transactions relating to budget funds,
b) financial transactions related to the creation and use of monetary funds,
c) the costs and benefits of business,
d) cash transactions related to pooled funds expended under an agreement between two or more municipalities or LGU or under contract with other legal entities or individuals,
e) financial transactions related to foreign sources within the meaning of the legislation on accounting,
f) management and disposal of funds provided from the National Fund and other funds from abroad provided under international treaties,
g) the billing and settlement of financial transactions to the state budget, the municipality and LGU budgets other budgets, state funds and of other persons.

The further audit and examination include:

a) the trading and management of property owned by territorial unit,
b) the trading and management of state assets under the management of a territorial unit,
c) placing and execution of public contracts,
d) the status of obligations and claims and their trading,
e) liability for the obligations of individuals and legal entities,
f) pledging of movable and immovable assets in favor of third parties,
g) the establishment of easements on the property of a territorial unit,
h) accounting of municipalities and LGU.

Subject of the review referred to in § 2 are audited in terms of:

a) the compliance with obligations under special regulations, especially regulations on financial management of municipalities and LGU on the management of their assets, accounting and on remuneration,
b) the compliance of the management of funds in comparison with the budget,
c) the compliance with the purpose of a received grant or a refundable financial assistance and the conditions of their use,
d) substantive and formal correctness of documents examined transactions.

Financial management in the context of this paper is characterized by basic financial indicators and the relationships between them as the following (including the types of financial documents where the indicators can be found). Table 1 shows the list of used and analyzed indicators of municipal and LGU budgets in the Czech Republic at present.

For analyzing the financial management of municipalities, auditors use basic financial analysis ratios, such as the following balance sheet indicators:

Fixed assets / Total assets;
Current assets / Total assets;
Own sources / Total liabilities;
External sources / Total liabilities;

4. Results

The Ministry of Finance of the Czech Republic calculates the debt service ratio for each municipality and in case the ratio overruns 30 % than the minister of finance sends a letter to the municipality. The debt service ratio was first calculated in April 2004 from the 2003 data. Table 2 shows current indebtedness of municipalities in the Czech Republic in 2015 divided in different size group.

The municipality is required to explain within three months the reasons for this overrun and suggest measures to improve the situation[8]. At the same time the municipality submits the audit report and the multi-annual budget outlook. Then the ministry evaluates these documents together with the total debt, debt per capita, tax revenues per capita, debt in the past years, size of the municipality and its overall financial situation[9]. In case of overrun of the debt service ratio in the next year the Ministry of Finance will put the municipality on a list, which will be passed on to the grant providers (ministries or state funds). The grant providers should consider this list when providing new grants. There is no absolute prohibition of grant provision to these municipalities, but it may be a factor of grant rejection.

The described procedure is effective only for a short time, however several problems arose[10]. The debt service ratio does not say much about the total indebtedness and about the ability to pay off the debt[11]. The ministry did not inform the municipalities sufficiently about the whole procedure and its goals. In our understanding the procedure should have alert both the Ministry of Finance and the particular municipality, that the debt is too high and that some measures should by applied. However many municipalities, which regularly pay off their debt, felt unfairly accused. At the same time the "debt service ratio" is not very concrete and is therefore often confused with "indebtedness".

Audit system of informative and monitoring indicators (ASIMI)

The Ministry of Finance of the Czech Republic, on the basis of Government Resolution dated November 12, 2008 no. 1395 on audit of the management of municipalities and repealing Government Resolution of 14 April 2004 no. 346 on the regulation of indebtedness of municipalities and counties through the debt service, annually performs Audit system of informative and monitoring indicators (ASIMI) for all municipalities and contributory organizations established by them and evaluate the results of the calculation, building always on data 31.12. relevant year (after final enrollment). ASIMI indicators are divided into two separated parts and are audited and evaluated all together:

Informative indicators:

a) population of the municipality,
b) total income (after consolidation),
c) interest,
d) payment of installments for bond and borrowed funds,
e) total debt service,
f) debt service indicator (%),
g) total assets,
h) liabilities,
i) balance at bank accounts in total,
j) loans and municipal bonds,
k) received repayable financial assistance and other debts,
l) total debt,
m) the debt to foreign sources (%),
n) 8-year balance,
o) current assets,
p) current liabilities.

Monitoring indicators:

a) share of foreign sources to total assets (%),
b) total current liquidity,
c) 5-year development if indebtedness,
d) annual change of indebtedness.

The Ministry of Finance of the Czech Republic performs annually - from the submitted financial and accounting statements - calculation of ASIMI for all municipalities and evaluates the results of the calculation. Municipalities whose indicator of overall liquidity will be by 31.12. of the current year in interval <0; 1>, while the share of foreign sources to total assets will be greater than 25 %, will receive a letter from the Minister of Finance and asked for an explanation of this state and the opinion of the council of the municipality. The Ministry of Finance will, upon receipt of the municipalities concerned, inform the government of the Czech Republic on results of monitoring of municipal finances for the current year.

The Ministry of Finance also evaluates the operations of other municipalities (including their subordinate governmental organizations), with the indicator of the overall liquidity in the interval <0; 1> using the above indicators, paying attention especially to municipalities that are in this interval occurred repeatedly. Municipalities who were identified with serious problems with their solvency, will be offered assistance focused on analyzing problems arising with the draft recommendations on possible solutions. Auditing of municipal management does not require additional administrative or financial demands on budgets and run municipalities. Municipalities are required to currently send to the Ministry of Finance of the Czech Republic completed ASIMI table.

Timetable of ASIMI audit:

a) calculation of Audit system of informative and monitoring indicators (March),
b) distribution of letters of Ministry of Finance of the Czech Republic (April),
c) justification unsatisfactory status (June),
d) information for members of the government (3rd. Quarter).

In 2016 Audit of ASIMI included all 6,249 municipalities and 14 LGU. By the 31. 12. 2015 there were 176 municipalities with the indicator of the overall liquidity in the interval <0; 1> and also 226 municipalities with the share of foreign sources to total assets higher than 25%. These two indicators all together exceeded the 28 municipalities. It is an annual fall of 2 municipalities, while 12 municipalities had exceeded those values in some previous years. The resulting values of the indicators are only indicative of the potential risk of economic problems, but it does not necessarily mean that the municipality is in a difficult financial situation. This can be assessed only after a thorough audit of the financial and accounting reports, and especially the additional documents provided by the municipalities themselves.

Based on the provided analysis, it is possible to state that:

- from the point of terms of solvency the most vulnerable municipalities are those, which were mandated contribution for breach of budgetary discipline and municipalities and those, that have made the wrong investment decisions[12],
- the greatest risks to the economic situation of municipalities is seen in non-compliance with the conditions of grant projects supported by EU funds and also from national programs. These risks arise both from errors in the preparatory and implementation phases,
- most municipalities with exceeding the given values of ASIMI, should not get into serious trouble with their solvency, because these identified risk proved only temporary,
- high insolvency risk was identified just in 2 municipalities of 6,249 total: Prameny and Turovice.

Municipalities (including their subordinate governmental organizations) reported at the end of 2015 the total debt of EUR 3,10 billion. Compared to the previous year with a decrease of 2.3 %, in absolute terms, the debt declined by EUR 71,4 million. The total volume of municipal debt includes bank loans from financial institutions, issued municipal bonds, repayable financial assistance received and other debts, incl. loans from state funds. Table 3 shows summary data on indebtedness of municipalities in the Czech Republic in 2010-2015.

In the structure of the debt of municipalities have the greatest weight the long term loans, whose share during 2015 decreased by 0,1 percentage points to 76,1 %, the share of municipal bonds issued decreased by 1,0 percentage points to 12,3 % and the remaining part of the debt of municipalities (11,6 %) were consisted of repayable financial assistance and other debts. Total debt of municipalities in 2015 contributed 4 largest city of the Czech Republic by 50,4 %, the value of their debt amounted to EUR 1,55 billion.

Loans that municipalities have adopted from financial institutions, similarly to previous years, chiefly aimed at reconstruction and construction of technical infrastructure for pre-investment projects co-financed from EU funds and the regeneration and construction of housing[13]. Municipalities also used these funds for reconstruction, insulation and expansion of educational facilities, sports arenas and other public facilities[14]. These loans are characterized by relatively low interest rate and very long maturities.

Debt itself cannot be evaluated negatively[15]. Without a loan or credit, many municipalities cannot fund its development (gasification, local roads, sewers, water mains, sewage, preschool and school facilities, etc.). So it depends on what municipalities can borrow, whether the loans are repaid seamlessly and how well the project is ready.

Indebtedness in 2015 was showed in 3,255 municipalities out of a total of 6,249 municipalities (52,1%). Number of municipalities that have shown indebtedness in recent years remains broadly stabilized, although in the last year there has been a slight increase (by 20 municipalities).

According to the applicable laws governing budgetary responsibility meets the 92 % of municipalities the rule on budgetary responsibility for municipalities and LGU (ie. debt to average income in last 4 years shall not exceed 60 %). According to the monitoring of municipal management for the year 2015 - which among other things monitors the level of debt and liquidity municipalities - operate with a higher degree of risk only 28 municipalities.

LGU (counties) including contributory organizations established by them, reported at the end of 2015 total debt EUR 0,943 billion. From 2014 to 2015 the value of debt fell by EUR 42 million (4,4 %). On the line of credit was recorded decrease debt by EUR 20 million. The share of loans in total debt reached up to 92,0 %. LGU did not issued any bonds in 2015. Table 4 shows summary data on indebtedness of LGU in the Czech Republic in 2010-2015.

Some LGU continued drawdown of loans granted by the European Investment Bank, which pre-finance and co-finance massive investments in regional infrastructure. These loans are generally disbursed in several tranches with different maturities, typically in excess of 10 years. Other LGUs have taken loans mainly from the biggest Czech banks like Czech Savings Bank, Inc., which belongs to Erste Group, or Commercial Bank, Inc., which belongs to Societe Generale Group for the purpose of pre-investment of projects for the repair of roads or flood damage.

5. Conclusion

Municipal and LGU regional budgets in aggregate by the end of 2015 showed indebtedness of EUR 4,043 billion, which is by 3,0 % (EUR 122 million) more than in the previous year. The total volume of loans taken by the territorial budgets was increasing in 2015 as well (non governmental organizations) amounted to EUR 3,228 billion.(increase of 1,9 % over the previous year).

In the institutional area of public finance, the Czech Republic has been criticized for a weak budgetary framework for several years although it has always met its obligations in terms of general government sector performance over the last years. Since the termination of the excessive deficit procedure with the Czech Republic in June 2014, the medium-term budgetary objective has been met every year. A set of proposals for regulations on budgetary responsibility (a draft constitutional law on fiscal responsibility, a draft law on rules for fiscal responsibility and a draft law amending certain laws in connection with adoption of fiscal responsibility regulations) was approved by the Czech government already in February 2015, and after then it was under consideration in the Chamber of Deputies of the Parliament of the Czech Republic until October 2016.

THE IMPORTANCE OF PERFORMANCE INDICATORS IN ANALYZING BUSINESS ENVIRONMENT AND BUSINESS EVOLUTION

Andreea - Mihaela STROE*

Abstract

The analysis of economic environment brings into attention of the ones interest important trends and important evolutions that can bring into surface new strategies and new ways of obtaining profit. This is to say that staying in connection with all the changes and analyzing the trends in business performance, analyzing performance indicators helps managers to know not only their firm but the environment, the opponents, stakeholders and the opportunities that can be optimized and used as advantages in a turbulent economic area. In general, performance is associated with two key processes: performance management and its measurement. Performance management is a holistic process which embodies the subject of performance and reflects the connection between the economic entity and performance, including processes such as definition of strategy, implementation of strategy and training and performance measurement. Performance measurement appears as a low performance management that focuses mainly on the identification, tracking and communicating performance that results through the use of performance. Key performance indicators help quantify the formation of a result, providing visibility in relation to the performance of individuals, teams, departments and organizations, allowing decision makers to take action in order to achieve the objectives desired. These indicators can be appreciated based upon the trends in the company or benchmarking - comparisons with standard industry values or reference companies.

Keywords: indicators, financial analysis, business, economics, profit

1. Introduction

The first step in analyzing financial performance is the overall analysis of financial performance in which we highlight the progress of the performance at different levels of activity and then we follow the evolution and mutations that were produced based on categories of incomes, expenditures and results that were based upon the financial situations. The augmentation of an analysis of this value recquires investigating the financial situation of severel years. In this sense the analysis faces four levels:

- Level of exploitation;
- Financial level;
- The current level;
- Extraordinary level;
- Global level.

In the one that follows, we will see which are the indicators that are used for every level and how are they structured in order to give a clear idea upon the financial situation of the firm and the main performance levels. But until then let see which are the main indicators that can be used and how are they related with the business environment.

Strategy indicators provides information for the management of a company: profits from invested capital, risk versus opportunity, return on assets employed, turnover, market share, stock price, employee satisfaction and the customer's. Managerial indicators provide information like management - resource availability, versus planning effort, cost income versus budget, operational indicators provide information on individual performance – related to processes, activities, products, specifications, procedures, efficiency. Among the most used and recommended performance indicators for companies, depending on the strategy and strategic goals are:

− Marginal net profit recommended indicator for benchmarking industry level.

− Delivery on time and in accordance with customer expectations, as stipulated in the contract of service / delivery is an index of operational performance.

This indicator is suitable for both companies producing or selling goods, and in case of service offerings.

− -Profitable customers-can provide essential prerequisites for making strategic decisions in relation to the portfolio and customer segments.

− Projects on schedule, within budget and according to specifications.

− The commitment of staff in relation to work activities and responsibilities, defined by the enthusiasm, dedication and personal effort. In order to choose relevant performance indicators, a company must take into account many factors:

- strategic objectives (turnover, profit, cost - intensive or extensive development)
- timing activity (long-term orientation or immediate profit)
- company profile (services, manufacturing, distribution)
- the current situation on the company's development curve (growth, maturity, decline), including the style of management.

According to a study made by James Henderson, professor of Strategic Management at IMD Laussane, " firms that are in development follow the key performance indicators that are trelated with turnover, the penetration degree on new markets, the number of active clients, the development of distribution channels and human resources development. The companies that are in the process of development will orientate the main performance indicators in the area of profit obtained on invested capital, of operational and marginal profit, of economic added value. But the organization that are already mature will concentrate upon the indicators linked with the cash-flow, capacity of payment, investemnts versus non-investments and the degree of organic growth."

From another point of view indicators can and should be set on the following levels:

company: turnover, market share, profitability, stock price, employee satisfaction, etc .;

- function / department: sales quota, the fluctuation of personnel, budget implementation, etc .;
- process: for example, generic – development of a product related with time and new product launch; marketing & sales - percentage accepted deals on promotions to increase sales, customer profitability, customer retention, customer satisfaction; stocks and acquisitions - stock rotation, percentage of orders delivered on time provider, the average response time to urgent orders; Recruitment - duration and costs etc;

- Individual: net sales per salesperson number of interruptions of the IT system, average number of items processed per day, percentage of savings in expenditure, supported training hours per year, etc. The performance indicators have impact upon the business environment and, on the other side, the business environment plays a crucial role in the development of the company. That is why the interconnection between the micro and macro environment should be of great interest among managers. There are several factors that influence the business environment.

2. Content

The operating level- in this performance review is outlined the volume of the main activity, that is, the activity indicators operation used a specific calculation based on profit or loss account.

Indicators calculated based upon profit and loss account

- Net turnover demonstrates the breadth of business portfolio made by a company in connection with various partners. As an indicator volume, net turnover reflects both the commercial side of a company producing (by sold production) and the volume of work done by a firm focused on sales By sales mărfuri- VM) and operating subsidies related to net turnover (SE).

$$CAN = VM + Qv + SE\text{-}V$$

- VM is the volume of goods sold is taken from turnover creditor707 account; Qv is the production sold, the indicator will be calculated in those follows;
- SE is operating subsidies which are taken from the creditor turnover 7411 account.

Net turnover related to sales can be increased either by an increased volume of goods sold, either by increasing prices, or both.

Entity's ability to change one or both of these factors will depend on the demand for entity's products, the company's position in the competition and the economic conditions offered to the entrepreneur.

Production of the year (QE) demonstrates the breadth of business activity production companies both in relation to third parties (customers) by variation of the production and production sold stored (Qs), on the one hand, and in relation to the production of the property itself (Qi), on the other hand.

$$QE + QS + Qi = QV$$

- Sold production is calculated from turnover creditor group accounts 70 least 707 account
- Variation stored output (Qs) comprises as change in stock finished product (SPF) and the variation of the production in progress (SPCE) from end and beginning of the year under review.

$$QS = \Delta\, SPCE + \Delta\, SPF$$

Production is once stored account balance 711, if it has a credit balance it is summed up, if in debit and it is lowed;

- Production of property includes all costs incurred for obtaining tangible and intangible assets necessary for investments. Immobilized production is calculated from account credit turnover 711.

In terms of analysis, the "production year" is heterogeneous due to different measurement bases used. Since the production sold is evaluated in selling prices and production and production assets stored in production costs. Therefore factors that modify the state of these components are grouped into:

- physical volume;
- structure of production and sales;
- sale price;
- cost of production

Trading margin (CM) is the new value created in trade of specialized companies and the companies that operate trade through its own stores. The indicator is calculated as the difference between the proceeds from sale of goods (SG) and expenditure on goods (GE):

$$MC = SG - GE$$

Industrial margin (MI) is the new value created in production activity held by a company over a period of time that is the financial year. Industrial margin is calculated as the difference between production year

(QE) on the one hand, and the costs of raw materials, equipment, energy (CM) and the work and the third parties (Lt) on the other hand, as follows:

$$MI = QE - [\, CM + Lt \,]$$

- expenditure on raw materials and consumables is calculated from debiting the accounts of group 60, less 607 account;

- work and services performed by third parties is calculated from the debtor turnovers of the groups 61 and 62 accounts.

The added value (VA) represents the value of a company newly created by a company over a period of time, usually during the financial exercise. The added value is determined by summing the commercial margin and the industrial margin:

$$VA = MC + MI$$

The added value is the resulting synthetic indicator expressing the amount a business activity and unlike other indicators of volume forth above has the advantage of reflecting only the volume of what has actually occurred in the entity, apart from inputs from outside. The importance of the added value resulting from analysis the following considerations:

a) added value is the main source of self-financing of the operating result and the net result for the year;
b) the added value is the main source of financing the activity of operators;
c) added value expresses the degree of economic integration of a commercial company;
d) the added value of the is the source compensation of personnel;
e) added value is the source of financing of budgetary obligations;
f) value added is the source of increasing company reserves;
g) the value added measure the firm's contribution to obtain the internal gross income of a country.

The added value obtained by an entity are generally divided between the five participating parties as follows:

a) staff person who is remunerated by wages and social protection related (including payroll taxes)
b) state that charge taxes (including income tax)
c) lenders who charge interest
d) owners and managers of the entity entitled to a hoped remuneration (dividends, profit-sharing)
e) eligible sources of self-financing (retained earnings and amortization).

Analyzing the way of repartization of the value added is important in order to outline the participation degree of every category in creating the added value, and also to appreciate the level of retribution regarding the the effort made. For appreciating the way the added value is distributed several raports can be used:

Personal	Personal expenditures/ VA
Stat	Taxes/ VA
Group and associates	Dividends and distributions/ VA
Lenders	Interest expenditures/ VA
Entity	Self financing/ VA

The operating result (RE) differs from gross result of exploitation that takes into account depreciation and provisions policy promoted by the entity so it a net of depreciation and provisions.

RE = RBE + Other operating income + operating income of depreciation and provisions – Other operating expenses - Operating expenses of depreciation and provisions

The financial level illustrates through indicators like "gross financial result"and "outcome financial result", the financial cah-flows of a commercial society.

The gross financial result (GF) is the intermediate result obtained bya company which is not influenced influence the financial provisions and amortization:

$$GF = FVB - FEB$$

GFB- financial venues

FEB- financial expeditures

Financial result (RF) is determined as the difference between financial income (FI) and financial charges (FF). If the financial result (RF) is a profit situation can be:

Favorable because available funds were placed effectively in financial activities obtaining income exceeding costs.

Unfavorable when the positive result is due for lack of credit operations thus losing various investment opportunities.

If the financial result represents a loss, situation can be:

Favorable when negative financial result is compensated by the effects that lending has caused to the operation activity.

Unfavorable when return on investment is purchased through credit below the costs incurred in lending. In other words it is obtained a negative leverage effect lending prejudicing the operating results.

The extraordinary level puts into light through its indicators the financial flows of the extraordinary operations. This type of operation has a random character, it cannot be considered to assess the future performance of an enterprise, because of the lack of regularity in appearance and because of a very alternating direction (Profit / loss).

Exceptional activity, although characterize random operations such as: disposal of assets, fines and donations received or offered these activities were closely related to the operating activities of the entity reason why new regulations include them in the extraordinary activity.

2. The extraordinary activity includes income and costs related to extraordinary events like the extraordinary disasters or other events.

Gross outstanding indicator is a partial indicator showing volume results from extraordinary activity influenced by depreciation and specific provisions of these financial flows.

The extraordinary result is calculated as the difference between exceptional revenues and exceptional expenses. The extraordinary result is an indicator that shows profitability of the companies in extraordinary flows.

The global level of activity highlights using a system of indicators the preliminary results and the final results of the economic activity. In this are distinguished:

- current result;
- total gross result;
- gross profit before deducting interest and income taxes;
- net result for the year;
- self-financing capacity;
- net cash flow capacity.

Example:

Indicators Society A	N-1	N
Turnover	114.520	142.700
Gross margin	25.080	22.550
Total assets	111.417	114.921
Personal capital	744.350	868.201
Total revenue	821.007	1.178.202
Net profit	59.749	113.278
Sold production	10000	20000
Production of the exercise	42000	43000
Selling price	100	100
Variable costs	6000	5300
Fix costs	400	400
Maximum production	45000	45000
Financial venues	120.000	123.000
Financial expenditures	56.000	73.000
Taxes	12.300	11.200
Personal	120	105

As it can be seen the turnover rises from N-1 to N with 28.180 u.m which represents a favorable situation, that is reflected also by the total revenue which rises as well. This is registered having in consideration that the number of working people is falling down but this means that the technological capacity of the society is rising and the productivity is not affected. So, the productivity can be calculated as Turnover/Number of personal so in N-1 we obtain the value 954,3 u.m., respectively 1359,04 u.m.

The added value that represents a performance indicator can be calculated as Total production of the exercise- Third-parties costs, so having into consideration our indicators we can reffer as third parties costs, registered taxes so the results will be for VA N-1= 29.700 and VA N= 31.800, so in the current year the value added registered greater values, so the performance is growing referring to the operating level. The VA Index is 107% and the Total Exercise production is 102%, so IVA > IPE so in which concerns the commercialization and production activity the society has a favorable situation, this is to say that grows working productivity, grows the level of valorification of the material resources and diminishes the third parties costs.

To analyse the way of repartization is important see how repartization of added value is made by the firm, in this situation we choose to report VA to state and entity so: Taxes/ VA N-1 = 0.41, Taxes/ VA N= 0.35,

Referring to the entity the repartization of added value is calculated: Self financing/ VA N-1= 25.06 and Self financing/ VA N= 27.3.

The gross margin, another indicator of the operating level shows a depreciation of 2530 u.m., maybe because of stagnation of the selling price in connection with the changes of the market (market request or inflation) or another reasons.

In which concerns the level of reaching productivity or as it is said the break even point it can be calculated as: $\frac{\mathrm{CF}}{1-\frac{CV}{FV}}$, so in N-1= 421.05 u.m. and in N= 416.6 u.m. This is the point from which the society begins to register profit.

At the exceptional level, it can not be made a concrete analysis having into consideration the lack of information but the trend of the society is good reflected by an increasing net profit from 59.749 to 113.278, so the conclusion that at the extraordinary level the society has a positive position it can be drawn.

The global analysis can be done using indicators as: current result, total gross result, net result for the year, self-financing capacity. So, in this case the turnover is positive, the net profit grows from N-1 to N with 53.529 u.m and the total revenue from 821.007 to 1.178.202, this is to say an augmentation of 357.195 u.m. The financial rate can be calculated by reporting the net profit/ personal capital*100, in N-1 the financial rate is 8.03% and in N is 13.05 %, this representing an important increase. This is to say that the rotation speed of assets increases calculated as TA/ TV, in N-1 is 13.57 % and in N is 9.75 %.

The financial leverage can be calculated as TA/ Kp, in N-1= 14,96% and in N= 13,24. And, at last the Net return on revenue as NP/TR N-1= 7.27% and NP/TR= 9,61%.

3. Conclusions

Performance indicators can show you can help you understand if your company is on the right track for success—and if it's not, where to focus your attention.

The business environment is in a continous change and it is important for a society to be flexible and to have power of adaptation so its financial results shall not be affected.

The environment in which business organizations operate is a complex, multi-focus dynamic and has a far reaching effect on such organization. The environment tends, shape the outlook, and goal of the organization by placing constraints on them. These constraints in the environment of organizations goal could be in the form of competition, this sets a limit on the goals specify by the organization.

Organizations survival and success depend on the appropriate adoptions to a complex and over changing environment. It is pertinent for top management of organization to identify opportunities and threats in the external environment. Internal environment, it should focus on strengths and weakness, potential and existing ones.In this paper, the attention was focused upon the financial opportunities and analysis, so the weak points of an economic society can be viewed through a financial telescop. The other parts concerning the performance of a business environment such as human resources, competition, stakeholders, resources can represent the basis of another research.

But with the amount of data that today's businesses and organizations generate, it is important to choose the right metrics and indicators.

Indicators give executives the chance to communicate the mission and focus of the organization to investors, team members, and other stakeholders. As performance indicators filter through the organization, they must grab employees' attention to make sure that everyone is moving together in the right direction and delivering value to the business.

In addition, performance indicators can create a type of benchmarking within one's business. A person can see the present quality of their business and with the use of these indicators, they can envision the business they want to become; they help companies become what they deem the epitome of success through the process of managing, monitoring and analysis.

In the case of the analysis of financial performance the information is provided for the most part by

The Profit and Loss Account using the techniques and tools whose procedure is based upon the fact that the result and other components of the Profit and Loss Account are comparable in time and space.

By using methods specific to the financial analysis it can be put into light the way in which the conditioning factors and the financial performances from different levels influenced the value of that financial performance.

Key performance indicators lead to performance management.

Performance management is about increasing performance. As you know, we have been steadily improving our performance management system lately but there is more to be done. Successful use of our performance management system will enable us to improve our program delivery, increase our employee engagement and productivity, and make us better stewards of the taxpayer's money.

A good performance management system works towards the improvement of the overall organizational performance by managing the performances of teams and individuals for ensuring the achievement of the overall organizational ambitions and goals.

FOREIGN CURRENCY RISK HEDGING

Mihaela SUDACEVSCHI*

Abstract

This paper presents the traditional types of exchange rate risk faced by firms and some of principal methods of exchange risk management that a company which make foreign currency operations can use. Foreign currency risk management involves both assessing the risk faced by the companies and adopting measures for the risk hedging or reduce the damage it may cause. The damages result from the company's unfavorable difference between the exchange rates of the currencies in which the transactions are made.

Keywords: currency, exchange rate, derivative contracts, currency risk, risk hedging

1. Introduction

Currency risk is defined like the probability to register loss in economic and financial transactions as a result of unfavorable movements of the contract currency, in the period of time between the date when was sign the contract and the maturity date. The exchange rate is the rate at which the foreign exchange market converts one currency into another. One of the functions of foreign exchange market is to provide some insurance against foreign exchange risk, which could be translate into adverse consequence of unpredictable changes in exchange rates[1].

The currency risk of a company is the result of foreign currency transactions or foreign currency borrowed funds in case of the exchange rate of these currencies relative to the national currency fluctuates (to the detriment of the company). Exchange rate risk management is an integral part in every firm's decision about foreign currency exposure[2].

The main methods of measuring exposure to currency risk are:

- currency risk assessment through transactions
- by converting balance sheet items denominated in foreign currency into national currency
- measuring the current value of the company according to the unanticipated exchange rate fluctuation

The currency risk approach can be done from two perspectives:

- Passive method - which supposes only accepting and bearing currency risk
- The active method - which involves the management of foreign exchange risk, either by operations on the spot market or by transactions on the futures market, through which the manager's purpose is to obtain some gains from currency exchange differences or interest rate differences for the currencies in which the transactions are made.

Thus, the management of foreign exchange risk involves operations made in the domestic currency or foreign currencies, depending on the fluctuations of currencies exchange rates, in which the transactions are made Foreign exchange risk management can be achieved through international diversification of investments and fundings, which refers to actions on the gap between receivables and payments in foreign currencies.This actions will generate some profit for the companies, provided by the exchange rate developments, or will help the companies to hedge the currency exchange risk. But, the debtor's request must meet the creditor's offer, because the influence of lending activity is directly proportional to the degree of the risk involved[3].

2. Classification of foreign exchange risk

Foreign currency risk may result from various transactions and operations made by companies or from the manner in which the financial results of the company are expressed as a result of exchange rate fluctuation. Thus, foreign exchange risk can be classified into four categories: sovereign risk, currency risk, translation risk and transaction risk[4].

The risk of sovereignty results from political changes in a country. These changes may affect the country's economic activity, as well as the results of companies from other countries if they record their operations in the currency of that country.

Currency risk may result from the setting of exchange rate fixes (fixed, free floating, managed free floating) and from existing currency restrictions on the currency market on which transactions are conducted.

Translation Exposure[5] is the risk that foreign exchange rate fluctuations will adversely affect the translation of the subsidiary's assets and liabilities – denominated in foreign currency – into the home currency of the parent company when consolidating financial statements

Transaction risk is the probability of recording losses in a foreign currency transaction that has unfavorably evolved. As a result, such a loss can result from both receivables and payment obligations, depending on the evolution of the currency in which the operations are denominated.

It also results from this classification that the currency risk can occur at any time in the activity of a company which performs foreign currency operations. Even an activity considered to be profitable may generate losses if:

- the exchange rate recorded unfavorable developments and impacts on the company's performance;
- the company has foreign subsidiaries in a country whose currency weakens;
- the company make international trade and the exchange rate moves unfavorable.

Foreign exchange risk management involves protection, risk measurement and proper management. Protecting, limiting or covering foreign exchange risk involves both diversifying the portfolio of foreign currency assets and liabilities and using risk mitigation techniques[6].

3. The main financial techniques for foreign exchange risk management

Measuring and managing exchange rate risk exposure is important for reducing a firm's vulnerabilities from major exchange rate movements, which could adversely affect profit margins and the value of assets[7].

A method by which could be avoid the undesirable effects of foreign exchange risk is to enclose a currency clause or a price review clause in the contract[8]. Applying different non-contractual measures can relieve exporters and importers of negative effects. These measures consist of contracting parallel loans, recourse to futures operations, foreign exchange hedging and derivative operations on hedging market.

The main financial techniques for currency risk management are:

1. Hedging operations - that are conducted on the interbank market or on the foreign currency futures market. The interbank market is a market for direct negotiation between parties, where the transactions are not standardized. Instead, futures markets are organized markets where contracts are standardized.
2. Foreign currency options (FX Options) - on the interbank market or on an organized market
3. Currency swaps - traded on the banking market.

Financial instruments used to hedge currency risk have been developed since the 80s and consist, especially in derivative contracts having as underlying assets a currency. Such contracts may be concluded by direct agreement between two trading partners or may be negotiated freely in an organized market. Derivatives are financial instruments used by investors as speculative, and also for risk reduction on financial markets. Currency speculation is happening on foreign exchange markets and involves the short-term movement of funds from one currency to another, for the profit from shifts in exchange rates.

Currency risk management involves three steps:

1. identifying and quantifying the risk to be managed
2. identifying the instruments that can be used to cover foreign exchange risk; Thus, the type of financial instrument (call option, put option, forward contract, etc.) and the meaning of the transaction (purchase or sale) must be identified.
3. valuation of the amount, expressed in the currency of the contract and the maturity of the cover.

Hedging is a way for a company to minimize or eliminate foreign exchange risk. The transaction with forward contract for currency risk hedging means that, the buyer make the commitment to pay a foreign currency amount at a certain time, and on the other hand, he borrows the same amount in the same currency at the same repayment term. Thus, the buyer of the foreign currency is covering from the risk of currency weakens, because at the future term, the potential loss from the currency purchase will be covered by the equal gain generated by the loan[9].

The exchange risk hedging involve the use of derivatives, like: forward contracts, currency futures, options and currency swaps[10].

a) Forward contracts

The companies can use forward contracts to sell or purchase foreign currency amounts at a future time and a given exchange rate. The settlement takes place at the time and the exchange rate mentioned in the contract, regardless of any fluctuations of the exchange rate on the foreign exchange market.

This kind of derivatives contracts offers some benefits, like:

- It mitigates the risk of exchange rate fluctuations
- It increases the management's control over the company's cash-flows and profitability
- The exchange rate used in budgeting is fixed ex ante

This product is suitable for companies which make businesses in foreign currencies, if:

- Their incomings are denominated in one currency and their payments are denominated in another currency
- The companies register a time gap between incomings and the corresponding payments
- The companies use a certain level of the exchange rate when they pricing their products

b) Flexible forward transactions

A flexible forward transaction has the same characteristics as a forward transaction with only one specific difference, which is that the settlement of the transaction can take place at any time until the maturity of the contract. The client may choose to make partial settlements for his transaction at any time until the maturity of the contract, having the only obligation to exchange the entire notional amount until maturity.

This product can help the company in the event of future collection or future payments in foreign currencies, if it wishes to protect itself from potential unfavorable fluctuations of the exchange rate. In the same time, a forward contract offers:

- Flexible tenor for the foreign exchange transactions as the settlement may take place at any time until the maturity date, at the same pre-established exchange rate
- Better liquidity management
- Better coordination between incomings and payments

This product is suitable for the companies which make businesses in foreign currencies and have incomings denominated in one currency and their payments are denominated in another currency. In the same time, a flexible forward transaction is the right financial instrument for the companies which have a time gap between incomings and the corresponding payments and they can anticipate the total volume of their payments but they cannot be certain in what regards the exact moment of the currency incomings.

c) Currency Futures contracts

Futures contracts[11] are advance orders to buy or sell a currency. An investor expecting to receive cash flows denominated in a foreign currency on some future date can lock in the current exchange rate by entering into an offsetting currency futures position.

The standardization of the Futures contract means that the currency that is the underlying asset of the contract always has the same volume (eg 1000 euro / contract) and delivery will be made at predetermined maturities (eg, quarterly).

In the currency markets, speculators buy and sell foreign exchange futures to take advantage of changes in exchange rates. Investors can take long or short positions in their currency of choice, depending on how they believe that currency will perform.

The buyer of Futures contracts will win if the price of the contracts he has bought will increase and he will lose if the price drops. On the other hand, the seller of Futures contracts will win when prices fall and will lose when prices rise.

Currency Futures contracts are mainly used for speculation and foreign currency risk hedging. Compared to other financial instruments, these contracts have several disadvantages: they are standardized in terms of settlement value and liquidation month, and investors have to accept conditions imposed by stock exchange regulations. But these contracts also have advantages. The advantages of Currency Futures contracts are the speed of sign and close the contract and the low guarantee (reserve deposit) from the investor.

The Foreign Currency hedging using foreign currency Futures contracts involves the existence of an open foreign currency position in a currency that has been acquired outside the Futures market. To eliminate or minimize the currency risk involved by this position, the currency hedging, in its classical form, requires that the operator to initiate an opposite and equal position on the Futures contracts, that have as underlying asset the same currency of the open position outside Futures market ,and the second currency - the national currency of the operator. Thus, the hedger transfers the risk to the Futures market.

d) Option contract

Options give companies the right, but not the obligation, to sell or buy a specific amount of a currency at a pre-agreed exchange rate for a specified time period. In order to have this right, the client pays a premium.

An option contract has the same functionality as an insurance contract. The client pays a premium, (which could be quite costly), in order to be able to take advantage of its right in case a certain event occurs. Options protect companies from unfavorable currency movements. To mitigate the cost of purchased options, companies can utilize options strategies that combine purchased and written options. As a result of the volatile foreign currency environment, more companies are turning to options for their increased flexibility.

The benefits offered by option contracts are:

- Complete foreign exchange risk hedging
- Better cash-flow and profit management

[11] http://www.investopedia.com/articles/forex/08/invest-forex.asp.

- Establishing a level for the exchange rate that will be used for constituting the budget of the company
- The possibility to benefit of a favorable exchange rate movement

This kind of derivative contract is suitable for companies which:

- Have Incomings, which are denominated in one currency and the payments are denominated in another currency
- Have a time gap between incomings and the corresponding payments
- Use a certain level of the exchange rate when pricing their products
- Want to be able to drop the contract and take advantage of a favorable exchange rate movement if this happens.

The buyer of an option contract has a Long position and the option contract's seller acquires a Short position. The transaction is made with two types of contracts: Foreign currency options - CALL and Foreign currency options – PUT.

The CALL option gives its buyer the right, but not the obligation, to buy a specific amount of currency at a pre-established rate in exchange of a premium paid (the cost of the option).

The PUT option gives its buyer the right and not the obligation to sell a specific amount of currency at a pre-established rate in exchange of a premium paid (the cost of the option).

A large series of complex products can be obtained on the basis of these two types of vanilla options in order to build-up a product that is most suitable for the company's foreign exchange risk hedging needs.

e) Currency Swaps

Swaps are a financial instrument that allows the buyer to exchange one set of each flows for another, making periodic payments based upon some financial price and in return receiving periodic payments based upon some other financial price[12]. Swaps could be transacted between companies with international business and their banks or between banks, for transforming a currency into another for a limited period without incurring foreign exchange risk.

A currency swap transaction represent an agreement to exchange one currency for another at an agreed upon exchange rate. There are two simultaneous transactions, one of buying and one of selling the same amount at two different value dates (usually SPOT and FORWARD) and at exchange rates (SPOT and FORWARD) that are pre-agreed at the moment when the transaction is closed.

In a currency swap, the holder of an unwanted currency exchanges that currency for an equivalent amount of another currency. Thus, the client exchanges his interest and currency rate exposures from one currency to another or benefits of bank financing at a lower rate.

Thus, a currency swap helps the company[13] to have a better management of financial resources, while also protecting it from potential unfavorable trends in the market.

Conclusions

In managing currency risk, multinational firms utilize different hedging strategies depending on the specific type of currency risk.

Foreign currency risk is provided by transaction, economic and translation risk and could affect especially the companies with foreign subsidiaries. In a country whose currency is weakens, the subsidiary's assets will be less valuable and this situation will affect the company's cash-flow and the profit. In the same time, the transaction risk will affect the companies which make import and export activities.

In conclusion, the foreign currency hedging is important for companies, such time as eliminate risk over the long time and protect the investors against a large currency's declines. The foreign currency hedging could be done using the money market instruments or the financial market, in wich instruments like treasury bills and commercial papers are traded.

CONCEPTUAL AND REGULATORY DELIMITATIONS OF THE PROFESSIONAL JUDGMENT WITHIN AN ECONOMIC ENVIRONMENT

Viorica Mirela ŞTEFAN-DUICU[*]

Abstract

The professional judgment is a base concept "sine-qua-non" within a company because it displays the intrinsic attribute for performing the activity.
In our accepting, bringing together the determinant factors of the professional judgment and also the universality of the component parts and the influences oriented on the professional judgment we obtain an ample professional characterial result for which we propose the title of "spectral value of the professional judgment". Through this paper we aim to describe the classical component of the professional judgment and also the secondary elements that we have built at a conceptual and original level starting from the base notions presented.

Keywords: professional judgment, the spectral value of the professional judgment, determining factors of the professional judgment, eufunction, professionalism.

1. Introduction

The axiological defragmentation of the content of the professional judgment imposes the conditioning to thoroughly explain the determining factors, the composing elements and also the modulatory purpose in issuing and forming the decisions.

This ample action integrates the core of the research of descriptive phenomena and starts a mechanism of conceptual fission that results in a process of examination, identification and a study over the elements within the exposed concept.

2. The conceptual development of the expression "professional judgment"

The spectral value of the professional judgment is to convergence point of the directions given by the factual delimitations of the historical rationalist values with the flexible and multi-shaped directions of the approaches extended under the form of fluxes of ideas that came from the positivist, rationalist, empiric, constructivist etc ideologies and also, to ensure the character of non-deniability and continuity in the progressive development of the professional judgment. The flows of ideas are substantiated on the meanings of the professional processes that are determined by „judgment" as a notion that transcends all the ideological frameworks stated earlier, the judgment meaning „the ability to think"[1].

In the history of the human reasoning a number of philosophers were interested in producing knowledge, among we mention a few step up: René Descartes, Immanuel Kant, Baruch Spinoza, Georg Hegel, etc.

The judgment marked by the Cartesian side is presenting René Descartes in the kaleidoscopic activating posture of the judgment. The informational load of the ideas transmitted by him has removed the patterns of the current judgment by substantiating a new method of thinking that excludes the knowledge marked by the impact of the affective unfiltered influences through the spectral judgment and has introduced the initiative of an analytical thinking through a clear decompose of phases and parts of the judgment.

René Descartes states that he does not know „higher appropriation than those that serve to the spiritual fulfillment! The ration or faculty to judge appropriately, because it is the only one that heightens and differentiate us from animal, it thing is whole within each of us"[2].

The philosopher therefore projects the judgment to the state of true absolutions enhancing the personal demarche that guides the judgment through the knowledge brought together in spiritual biographies meant to lead to the perfection of the spirit and according to the concept used by him: „la perfection de l`esprit".

Immanuel Kant places in his work of reference the postulates regarding the construction of a solid judgment by claiming that „the human judgment has in some kind of knowledge its particular faith because it is overwhelmed by questions that cannot be avoided because its imposed by the nature of judgment itself, to which it cannot respond because it exceeds the whole capacity of the human judgment"[3].

Kant integrates into his philosophy Descartes's conceptions over the judgment and develops a classification of judgments into analytical judgments (the truth results from the analysis of concepts excluding the need of experimental testing and sensorial perfections) and synthetic judgments (gained by experience).

Appling the meanings of „integronic theories" on an adaptive verticality we observe that in Kant's case there is a quantification of pure judgment through the prism of practical judgment by „the consideration of judgment a distinct faculty of thinking and then of reason, as a faculty of judgment" [4].

The correlation between the notions Kant presented show us that „pure judgment must be solely practical for itself, meaning that it must determine the will by the simple form of practical ruling"[5].

Baruch Spinoza brings an addition to the informational load of today's notion of the judgment stating that „all efforts that we make after reason, do not tend towards anything but knowledge, and the soul, using the reason, does not consider anything more useful than what provides judgment."

The philosopher points the unshattered preveilance of the substantial truth emanating by the fact that „reason truly understands all thing, meaning as they are, by other meaning it considers them necessary but not randomly."[6].

The judgment, through Hegel's projections has as vector the reasoning that „tries to find an order in the chaos of singular subjectivities" [7]

„Within „The phenomenology of the spirit" reasoning represents the unity of conscience and of self conscience (or the unity of self-interpretations and understanding of the world), meaning that it is a spiritual attitude that, at least in principle, is bases on this unity"[8].

Reasoning will always represent and infallible edru of the universal dimensions but also a state of michurinism for humanity. The ability to reason has crossed stages loaded with ideologies reshaped by existing currents.

Consisting of linked judgments based on reasoning, the judgment is that concept that finds itself also at a particular level, constrained by conceptual components fixed upon domains but also at an extended level through professional deviation by fitting in multiparty sections of the social reality and through the association with „economies - universe" [9], reflections of the human collectivity.

The professional judgment is not „a simple matter of applying general rules by particular cases and not the least a simple matter based only on intuition but more likely a process that gives a note of coherence to the conflictual values within the general rules and treats with sensibility the actions and circumstances that are extremely contextualized"[10].

3. The determining factors of the professional judgment.

The problematic of the professional judgments draws trajectories of potential figuring on all existing domains and keeps its direct corollary status within the decision making process.

Through the demarches carried within our research it is aimed at explaining the professional judgment and the formative elements in the ideological exposing framework. The determining factors of the professional judgment standardizes the characteristics that lead through their existence to the induced causality by the association of logical processes over the defining concept found under the form of the professional judgment.

3.1. Professional training

A potential determinism transferred in the factorial system of the professional judgment is provided by the professional training. The accumulation of experience is considered a premise of a good use of the professional judgment.

By gaining a factual culture from carrying out specific activities, the employee develops its capacity to use the professional judgment in optimal conditions, with the effects aimed at.

The professional training is provided a temporarily classifications that highlights, on one side a general professional training, and on the other side a specialized training.

The general professional training brings into discussion the stages of the intellectual formation of the employee. From this category we name: profile high school studies, professional certificates, the international experience, scholarships, practice and internships in big companies, university studies etc.

The professional training based on carrying and passing national and international studies brings detailed construction optics of the informational system formalized by the accumulation of knowledge needed in the use of the professional judgment.

The specialty training is referring to the knowledge accumulated by working on a certain job within the company, by fulfilling all the obligations stated in the job description, by overcoming all obstacles and recession or decline periods and also by setting the rich knowledge into the growth of the company.

The accumulation of knowledge leads to an optical use of the judgment and the caption of a highly wanted „know-how". Within this category, the employee seeks an experience formalized on the working place through advance courses in the field and solved circumstantial instances and through the deep understanding of the causing elements generated by the particularized interactions on the company. Within the specialized training we also find master studies that have as purpose the enhancement of knowledge and specialization on the aimed field, optimized studies on the desired job etc.

The professional judgment under its two aspects, general and specialized represent a qualification factor in the determination of the professional judgment and it is found in all the important stages of its development.

3.2. Deontological factors

Fitting a judgment in an organizational environment brings by itself written and unwritten rules of the professional circuit.

Referring to the written rules through a deontological vision of the professional judgment we name the existence of a set of documents that guide the decisional mechanism and implicitly the professional judgment. Within these we name some ethical codes of conduct, work procedures, standards, regulations, instructions, internal policies, manuals etc.

The professional judgment has a complex guiding mechanism on both the flexible side that is related to the behavior and on the fixed side of the whole process – current documentation.

4. The purpose and the valences of the professional judgment

The separation between the professional judgment and the actual activity of the company is impossible. The professional judgment is a background sub-horizon of the professional judgment and is always linked to a poli-temathical compulsion with a continuity character.

The role of the professional judgment transcends the axiomatic importance provided by the decisional process and represents in fact a eufunction[11] at a company level that enhances both the decisional process and the remaining of related processes that lead to a progressive organizational mechanins of the macro-environment.

The purpose of the professional judgment is to provide a rigurous delimited placement of the activities performance in the organizational environment and to aid a polyvalent professional reasoning system. The lack of professional judgment can be named as a high-lighting of its importance within a pro-economical society.

Within a company professionals are required to get involved in activities that do not always have predictible trajectories. The specificity of their work imposes taking responsbilities provided in the job description and also responsibilities that are forming as the situations gain a particular note. In this point, the professionals are being required to act with professional judgment that is rigorously formulated by and invariable quality: professionalism.

Professionalism (the professional consciousness) is complex, discretionary, requires theoretical and practical knowledge, qualification and also the acceptation that humans without experience cannot understand and pass through whole and evaluate a high level of the carried work[12].

The professional practice, without a strong judgment that can substantiate it cannot be cataloged more than a technical work[13].

Professionals use the professional judgment as a fundamental logical form consisting of a correlated stream of arguments.

The judgment, as stated by prof. Herb Miller appears because the interaction between education and experience[14].

According to prof. David Tripp the professional judgment takes 4 shapes[15]:

- Practical (formulated almost instantly);
- Diagnostics (generalized within professional judgment);
- Reflective (the evolutionary and justificative nature judgment that reflects deeply on its own actions and effects by weighting all the alternative strategies) for example „to describe how accountants can promote their activity and, in the same time, to respect the ethical rules"[16].
- Critical (accumulates both a critical and reflexive stance and also the diagnostics process of professional practices).

Prof. Della Fish and prof. Colin Coles are proposing the following classification the professional judgment[17]:

- intuitive
  - appears in situations that need an immediate reaction and imposes a quick establishment of working instruments and needed abilities in order to solve the issue. It does not imply a pre-existent judgment, this type of reasoning being labeled more as technical or „instrumental"[18].
- strategical
  - has an imperative character that implies a wide range of possibilities[19]. It is based on practices highlighted in well-defined procedures. For example „the harmonization of stakeholder's interest has become in the past years the base objective of the company[20], being necessary to have a common strategic professional judgment.
- reflective
  - refers to the situations that appear in practice along with a high level of uncertainty. This category implies in the solving process a deep thinking, a cumulus of personal thinking filter, of own abilities.
- deliberative
  - is characterized by the moral character of decisions and focuses both the personal and company's interests. The professionals see these practices as being morally competitive that can generate conflicts and hard solving dilemmas[21].

3. Conclusions

As a result of the theoretical research carried we have obtained alot of information and visions that helped us to formulate more acceptations of the concept of "professional judgment".

Therefore, in our opinion, the professional judgment can be defined in four ways:

- as a set of logical linked thinking that has as purpose to obtain some conclusive results for the activity carried taking into consideration certain circumstances, knowledge, evidence, methods, criteria and proper regulation;
- as a process that intervenes when the regulation in place does not cover all the cases found in practice;
- as a mechanism to form an opinion and take decisions taking into consideration the interaction between the experience gained in the field, accumulated knowledge and circumstances;
- as a cognitive process that takes account of ethical codes, knowledge, circumstances but also the behavioral structures of the employee.

ANALYSIS OF THE EFFICIENCY OF APPLYING THE QUALITY MANAGEMENT SYSTEM IN INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS

Andrei DIAMANDESCU*

Abstract

In this article we propose to illustrate the methodology of measuring and assessing the impact of quality systems on the performance of industrial businesses. If in terms of the total quality management system – TQM, the impact may be measured by comparing the business performance with a reference standard (for instance ISO 9001), which records the difference compared to the performance prior to implementing the TQM, or, on rarer occasions, by optimizing the costs of quality with the help of econometric models, for the integrated quality improvement system, comprising of the TQM system based on the ISO standards and the Kaizen management system, which we propose and assess within this article, the efficiency/performance will be measured through a methodology based on analyzing the evolution of financial indicators for business performance. This approach was implemented as a result of findings from the businesses where we have been provided with documentation, and where the calculation and assessment of quality system operation efficiency by optimizing costs using the classic or improved econometric models is not approved by the management.

Keywords: quality management, quality system, efficiency, improvement, method

1. Introduction

In addressing the topic of this article, we began from the finding according to which only the businesses which provide the market with products and services executed in a manner corresponding with the beneficiary requirements in terms of quality, materialized in a significant increment of competitiveness regarding the competitor supply, can survive in the current economy, under the influence of evolutions such as the globalization of markets, the customization of demand, the adaptation of Romanian economy to EU requirements, the increase in competitiveness between businesses and in the interest for protecting the natural environment.

The concerns regarding quality assurance have also increased in the Romanian economy along with our country's EU integration. This is due to the fact that the quality approach on a pan-European scale is based on the objective of creating a single market and the free movement of goods, which is only possible through the presence of two common features thereof, to ensure interconnectivity and to facilitate real competition. The quality management system adopted by all countries in the European economic space fills this role, with the quality promotion policy representing the underlying component of the European industry development policy.

In the same train of thought, one may observe that quality has currently become a strategic instrument for the EU economic policy, and the quality requirements have increased significantly; one believes that satisfying the client is no longer enough, his expectations must be exceeded by promoting the "Beyond Customer Satisfaction" concept, according to which the product provided must exceed client expectations, must thrill. As a result, the Romanian businesses, as participants in the European and world transfer of assets, have also begun to implement major changes in the development strategy and policies, in order to provide highly competitive products and services, which would facilitate an advantageous market position compared to the competition). In this regard, one may observe that numerous companies on the Romanian market undergo an accelerated process of organizational and management transformations, in order to redefine their place and role on the market and to improve the supply. The implementation of quality management systems plays an essential role within this process. Therefore, at the end of 2013, 24,231 companies were certified according to the ISO 9001 standard for all activity sectors. However, there are still many companies which conduct predominantly stereotypical activities, without implementing an aggressive strategy that would allow them to obtain a high profit in order to reinvest in modernization, restructuring and quality improvement projects, so as to ensure a better position on the market. A comparative analysis conducted in this regard shows that the number of certifications in the quality management system in our country is low compared to most EU countries (Table 1).

The main cause for this situation is a lack of trust for many economic agents in the efficiency of applying the quality systems. The discussions held with the managers of some of the businesses documented led to the conclusions that such managers believe the implementation of quality systems as an expense not covered by the results, and the increase in quality as an action which determines the reduction of work productivity and an unjustified increase of expenses. This misconception may be explained by the practice of economic agents where reservations regarding the calculation of quality system efficiency occurs, justified by the fact that they are unable to keep correct tabs on quality costs and the effects thereof. The highlighting of quality costs in the documents (accounting documents), as observed in the practice of companies documented, indeed poses special problems generated by the fact that the accountancy of most business does not feature any accounts for the distinct registering of the two information categories (quality system costs and effects). Difficulties occurred when trying to precisely establish the quality costs are determined both by the methods used by companies for the calculation, planning and tracing of costs, as well as by a series of factors independent from accountancy systems, such as: certain quality costs cannot be quantified or their estimation is subjective: there is a discrepancy between the time of occurrence and the time of identifying deficiencies, as well as between the time of preventive measures and the time of obtaining the effects of such measures; the lack of management involvement; the high necessity of resources for implementing the system, etc. Furthermore, one of the issues posed by the highlighting (registering) of quality costs in the current economic practice, and one which we deem essential, is determined by the impossibility of precisely establishing the indirect expenses for quality assurance, expenses representing the largest percentage of quality costs. On example in this regard is represented by the investment projects for the technical modernization of the business. It is obvious, for example, that by purchasing certain installations, modern technologies the level of product execution precision, and implicitly, the quality of such products is increased. However, the amount of investment associated with this effect cannot be precisely determined. Another aspect we must consider in highlighting and determining quality costs is to take into account and quantify all the cost categories, including the so called "external costs", respectively the expenses for environmental protection and those incurred by the company for obtaining and providing a certain level of quality. Therefore, a holistic approach is needed to define and select quality costs.

As a result, the calculation of quality system efficiency, which implies determining the ratio between costs and effects, cannot be performed. In order to solve this issue, a solution underlying the evolution of the process of quality system implementation within companies, we set out to showcase a methodology with which to measure the efficiency of implementation and operation of quality systems within industrial businesses, without the necessity of an extremely precise determination of quality costs, a methodology tested in a case study within this article.

2. Presentation of the Methodology for Calculating and Analyzing the Efficiency of Quality Systems Based on the Evolution of the Financial Indicators of the Business

2.1. Characterization of the Study Method

The research for finalizing the methodology was aimed at the impact of the integrated system (TQM) comprising of the ISO 9001:2008, ISO 14001:2005 and ISO 50000:2011 standards, combined with several methods from the Kaizen system, on the financial performance of S.C. ARCTIC S.A. The study also benefited from our documentation conducted for other business in the manufacturing industry (ASSA ABLOY, Cris-Tim, Pirelli din Slatina, Eldon România, Star Transmission Cugir etc.), a fact which led us to believe that its results may be generalized for the entire manufacturing industry.

The study is based on a comprehensive research which combines questionnaire-based research, in order to identify and select a sample of companies who have implemented the quality system, with an empirical analysis of financial data collected from such businesses and the direct examination of the financial data publically disclosed by the same. The basic concept used in this research adapts the study methodology to the insider model, so as to separate the impact of the quality system from those of other measures applied by the company. Furthermore, we also considered a feature common to all researched businesses – that according to which both the studied event, as well as the time of its occurrence may be precisely defined without impediment (for example, obtaining a quality certificate). I have made this statement because there are numerous cases when establishing the exact trigger of a researched event is extremely difficult when the reliability of the business is poor and you cannot trust the public statements made by its representatives. In this regard, the concrete economic situation shows that several organizations claim to have implemented the quality system, measure confirmed by ownership of the quality certificate, when, in fact, they have made no essential changes leading to results that can be attributed to the quality system. Obviously, the use of such unreal information made publicly available by the company that has implemented the quality system will lead, in the study, to results lacking any practical use. In order to avoid such a situation, the methodology used by us was completed by interviews with quality managers within the companies documented. We believe that the use of such interviews to gather information sought from the company has been the difference between our study and the typical questionnaire-based studies.

2.2. Choosing the Indicators for Measuring the Economic Efficiency of Quality Systems Implemented within Romanian Businesses

The main objective of implementing a quality management system is to increase the company's performance. In general, performance is associated with two key processes – management and measuring of performance. Performance measuring occurs as a sub-process of performance management, which mainly focuses on identifying, tracing and communicating performance results by using performance indicators. More precisely, after establishing the objectives desired by applying the decision intended to increase performance (in our case – implementing the chosen quality system), we require indicators which can measure progress separately. In this regard, the use of key performance indicators – KPI is recommended, indicators which can help quantify the achievements of the quality system, respectively the level of objective fulfillment. As a result, such an indicator-based system may be used as a sole instrument for consolidating the managerial decisions to implement quality systems.

The quality of results in applying the system is associated with the selection of performance indicators. The most frequently used performance indicators are financial and they vary depending on the activity carried out and on the company function (production, human resources, commercial, financial, etc.). Moreover, it is necessary that the indicators selected be anchored in the dynamics and typology of the respective company, so that they may faithfully illustrate company objectives up to the last level.

Economic efficiency, determined with the help of financial performance indicators illustrates, in the context of features of the insider model, the very result of implementing the quality system, highlighted through the continuous improvement of products, processes, activities and the adequate involvement of employees motivated depending on the level of objective fulfillment, as well as satisfying a corresponding number of clients with the business' capacities and meeting environmental protection objectives.

For a useful analysis, suggestive in expressing the objectives followed in the case study, presented herein, we have provided a careful selection of key performance indicators, by choosing those which provide the competitive advantages generated by the quality system, are directly connected to performance, are measurable and ensure compatibility with various references. Thus, in order to distinctly highlight the contribution of implementing and operating the quality management system in improving the economic and financial results of the company assessed, the following indicators were used: Turnover (CA), Variable expenses, Margin over variable expenses (MCV), Fixed expenses, Operational profit, Break-even (PR), Return on investment (T), Economic rate of return on investment (RRE), Discounted net revenue (VNA), and Economic performance (R).

3. Applying the Proposed Method for Assessing the Efficiency of the Quality Management System within S.C. ARCTIC S.A.

The ARCTIC S.A. trade company manufactures electronic and household products with a high technical level, used for household needs (refrigerators, washing machine, vacuums, etc.). It has 2500 employees and a turnover, for 2014, of 384 mil. EUR. Arctic is present on the Romanian market through the Arctic and Beko brands, with a market share of approximately 35% and is a major exporter. Currently, 90% of the refrigerator appliances is exported to 59 countries throughout Europe, Africa and Asia. In July 2015, Arctic celebrated the production of the 25th million refrigerator since its establishment. In order to ensure a growing outlet demand, the company decided to make a 24 million EUR investment. Thanks to this project, the company will record a rapid increase of its turnover.

The company has implemented an integrated management system in two stages: in 2005 it has implemented an integrated system comprising of ISO 9001 and ISO 14001, while starting with January 2012, it has also implemented the ISO 50001:2011 standard, being a large electricity consumer.

By implementing the three standards in an integrated quality system, the company complied with the requirements imposed by the beneficiaries and by the companies with which it collaborates, the aim of the objective being to reduce the possibility of error occurrence to a minimum and to achieve the zero faults principle. Along with this integrated quality system, the company also implemented in 2013 methods corresponding to the continuous quality improvement management system – Kaizen. Therefore, the 6 Sigma, Total Productive Maintenance and Just in Time methods were integrated. As demonstrated below, the implementation of the quality management system had a considerable impact on the increase in company efficiency. Moreover, its consequences were obvious even during the crisis between 2009 and 2010 when the company did not suffer.

In order to demonstrate the efficiency of implementing and operating quality systems within industrial organizations, we must first assess the impact of implementing the total quality integrated system (TQM), comprising of the three aforementioned standards, during the 2005 – 2010 period, and of the impact generated by the combined action of the integrated system (TQM) and of the methods associated with the Kaizen management system during the 2010 – 2014 period.

For 2005, the simplified situation of the profit and loss account is showcased in Table no. 2.

Table no. 2 – The Balance Sheet of S.C. ARCTIC S.A. upon 31.12.2005

Indicator	Amount		Percentage from CA (%)
	Thousand EUR	Thousand lei
Turnover	190000	836000	100
Variable expenses	114750	504900	60,0
Margin over variable expenses (MCV)	75250	331100	40,0
Fixed expenses	66500	300168	36,0
Operational profit	7030	567789	3,7

With the help of these values, the break-even may be determined according to the relation:

$$PR = \frac{CF}{MCV}\ x\ 100$$

Where: PR – break-even; CF – fixed expenses; CV – variable expenses; MCV – margin over variable expenses.

Thus determined, the break-even illustrates the minimum percentage of activity in relation to production capacity, for which profit is nil. Results show that the break-even for the ARCTIC SA trade company amounts to 88.3 %, while in absolute values, it amounts to 166,250 thousand EUR, respectively 731,500 thousand lei.

$$PR = \frac{66500}{75250}\ x100 = 88.3\ \%\ of\ production\ capacity.$$

If we were to use the margin over variable expenses, determined as a percentage of turnover, we would obtain the break-even of values, respectively the minimum value of turnover for which the profit is nil. The calculation formula is:

$$PR = \frac{CF}{MCV\%}$$

$$PR = \frac{66500}{40\%} = 166{,}250\ thousand\ EUR,\ respectively\ 731{,}500\ thousand\ lei.$$

In the same, year the total costs of non-quality, represented by the cost of internal and external faults, rising to 28,000 thousand EUR, the equivalent of 15% of the turnover, were quantified. This means that the effective variable costs only actually amount to 75,250 × (100 – 15) = 63,963 thousand EUR, while the difference, amounting to 11,287 thousand EUR, represents non-quality costs.

The successful introduction of the quality management system represented a considerable improvement of indicators, fact noticeable by analyzing the simplified form of the profit and loss account for 2010 (Table 3).

As can be observed, the turnover reached the amount of 253 mil. The stabilization of the manufacturing process has determined a decrease in fault costs, which translated into a profit increase of 85% compared to 2005.

Table no. 3 – The Balance Sheet of S.C. ARCTIC S.A. upon 31.12.2010

Indicator	Amount		Percentage from CA (%)
	Thousand EUR	Thousand lei
Turnover	253000	1113200	100%
Variable expenses	153000	673200	60,5
Margin over variable expenses (MCV)	100000	440000	39,5%
Fixed expenses	90330	397452	35,7%
Operational profit	12905	56782	5,1%

Results show that for the ARCTIC S.A. trade company, the break-even for 2010 amounts to 90.3 %, while in absolute values, it amounts to 225,825 thousand EUR, respectively 993,634 thousand lei.

$$PR = \frac{90330}{100000}\ x\ 100 = 90{,}3\ \%\ of\ production\ capacity.$$

The fact that the PR is greater than in 2005 is explained by the rapid increase of turnover. Moreover, this situation also resulted from the decision to invest in order to increase the production capacity for which, as shown, investments of 24 million EUR were allocated.

The result of the absolute value is:

$$PR = \frac{90330}{39,5\%} = 228,683.5\ €, \text{ respectively } 1,006,207.4 \text{ thousand lei.}$$

In the same, year the total costs of non-quality, represented by the cost of internal and external faults, amounting to 23,276 thousand EUR, the equivalent of 9.2% of the turnover, were quantified. This means that the effective variable costs only actually amount to 100,000 × (100 – 9.2) = 90,800 thousand EUR, while the difference, amounting to 9,200 thousand EUR, represents non-quality costs.

With regards to the inclusion in the time frame associated with the analysis, of the 2009 and 2010, the years of the financial and economic crisis, we must state that such has not influenced the results of the study, as the company suffered no significant consequences, and the financial indicators were on the rise during such period. Therefore, CA increased by 133%, while profit increased by 183%.

The successful introduction of the TQM quality management system and of the continuous quality improvement system – Kaizen, practically meant a step closer to achieving the zero faults objective, as can be seen in Table 4, where the simplified situation of the profit and loss account for 2014 is showcased.

As shown in the table, the turnover reached the value of 384,000 thousand EUR, representing an increase of 152%. The stabilization of the manufacturing process determined a decrease of defect costs, translated into a profit increase 1.5 times greater than in 2010. This means that a decrease of 9.2% for fault costs has determined a profit increase by approximately 50%.

For 2014, the simplified situation of the profit and loss account is showcased in Table 4.

Table no. 4 – The Balance Sheet of S.C. ARCTIC S.A. upon 31.12.2014

Indicator	Amount		Percentage from CA (%)
	Thousand EUR	Thousand lei
Turnover	384000	1689600	100%
Variable expenses	230400	1013760	60%
Margin over variable expenses (MCV)	153600	675840	40%
Fixed expenses	134400	591360	35%
Operational profit	19200	84480	5%

Results show that for the ARCTIC S.A. trade company, the break-even amounts to 87.5 %, while in absolute values, it amounts to 336,000 thousand EUR, respectively 1,478,400 thousand lei.

$$PR = \frac{134400}{153600} x100 = 87,5\ \% \text{ of production capacity.}$$

The result for the amounts in lei for the break-even is:

$$PR = \frac{134400}{40\%} = 336,000 \text{ thousand } €, \text{ respectively } 1,478,400 \text{ thousand lei.}$$

In the same, year the total costs of non-quality, represented by the cost of internal and external faults, amounting to 7,680 thousand EUR (i.e. 3 times lower than in 2010), the equivalent of 2.0% of the turnover. As a result, the variable effective costs only amount to 153,600 × (100 – 2.0) = 150,528 thousand EUR, while the difference, amounting to 3,072 thousand EUR, represents non-quality costs.

This result shows that the successful introduction of the TQM quality management system, combined with the methods of the continuous quality improvement system – Kaizen, meant a very close step to achieving the zero faults objective (in this assessment of the result, one must consider that the Kaizen system methods were only present for three years from the total five-year period analyzed).

As shown in the table, the turnover recorded an increase of 152%. The stabilization of the manufacturing process determined a decrease of defect costs, translated into a profit increase 1.5 times greater than in 2010. This means that a decrease of 9.2% for fault costs has determined a profit increase by approximately 50%.

In addition to these calculations, in order to obtain a clearer perspective of the impact of efficiently implementing and operating the TQM system, completed by methods from the Kaizen system, we deemed it useful to calculate the amount by which the turnover would increase, in absence of an implemented total quality management system (2005 - 2010), and of the system completed with Kaizen methods (2010 - 2014) for the profit to reach the level achieved by using this system..

The calculation formula is:

$$CA_1 = \frac{CF+(1+x)P0}{MCV\ (\%)}, \text{ where}$$

CA_1 – turnover which, given the conditions at hand, allows the increase of profit by X percent;

P_0 – profit for the initial situation.

In the situation prior to implementing the quality management system, the 184 profit increase would have required an additional turnover of:

This means that, in order to obtain the same profit by incurring non-quality costs, the sale volume should have increased during the 2005 – 2010 period by 41.81%, and by 30.34% during the 2010-2014 period, when Kaizen methods were also implemented. Therefore, we believe the introduction of quality systems may provide a significant economic impact for the company, and also for the entire national economy, through a more efficient resource management, thus insuring an increase in welfare.

4. Conclusions

The case study performed represents a factual, objective and factual assessment, from a statistical standpoint, of the impact of effectively implementing a quality management system on the financial performance and economic efficiency in general. Moreover, the feasibility of the methodology for calculating the efficiency of the quality system was demonstrated.

The results provided aim to confirm the secial economic capacity of businesses that have implemented the system and to reassure the management of such organization that have implemented the system of the validity of the decision made in this regard. Obviously, there are certain companies which, after obtaining the quality certificate, failed to record continuous improvement progress and fail to provide full satisfaction to their clients. If for such organizations, the advantages of certification were do not fully meet their expectations, the causes do not reside in the limitations of the quality system, but in the manner in which it was commissioned. After certification, one needs to follow the observance of referential requirements, especially of the "Continuous Quality Improvement" principle, through efforts of continuous development of all processes. Yet, by the very introduction of certain quality improvement methods (in our examples, methods belonging to the Kaizen system), the businesses documented recorded a substantial increase in efficiency compared to the situation prior to introducing the quality system.

As a result, we believe that in the near future, all industrial businesses will resort to a quality system similar to the one assessed herein – the TQM-Kaizen integrated quality improvement management system.

THE INTERDEPENDENCE ANALYSIS OF ENTREPRENEURSHIP- ECONOMIC COMPETITIVENESS LEVEL BASED ON THE LOTKA-VOLTERRA MODEL

Elena Mihaela ILIESCU[*]

Abstract

The entrepreneurship role in ensuring competitiveness and hence in in the national economies development is well known and generally accepted. The inverted influence, respectively the measure in which the competitiveness level of national economies represents a determining factor in terms of economic agents entrepreneurial behavior is however a subject less debated, especially from the empirical analysis.

Under these circumstances, the purpose of this study is to analyze using the Lotka-Volterra, based on data published between 2008-2015 in two of the most popular annual reports (The Global Entrepreneurship Monitor and the Global Competitiveness Report), the degree in which the global competitiveness index and the total entrepreneurial rate influence each other. Thus, applying the model will allow us to identify the type of interaction between the two variables (prey-predator relationship, competition and cooperation), and to estimate the value of the Total Entrepreneurial Rate and of the Global Competitiveness Index for 2016.

Keywords: Global Competitiveness Index, Entrepreneurial Rate, Interdependency, rhythm, Lotka-Volterra.

1. Introduction

Both the theory and the practical experience confirm the reciprocal influence between the entrepreneurship evolution and the level of global competitiveness, the latter, according to the Porter model, determinant variable of the national economic development, together with GDP/capita.

The retrospective analysis of the data published in two of the world's most well-known annual reports, The Global Entrepreneurship Monitor and The Global Competitiveness Report, regarding the evolution of the total entrepreneurial rate[1] and of the global competitiveness index[2] between 2008 and 2015, for 31 countries, doesn't reflect a linear correlation between the two variables, but a polynomial (cyclic) one.

The period under analysis is 2008-2015 since the analysis on levels of development, according to the Porter method has been introduced for the first time, within reports, in 2008. Also, the analysis was considered for analysis only 30 countries because the GEM reports do not comprise the same countries each year, and only the countries for which data are available for each year of the target range are included in the survey.

Considering all this aspects, the limited amount of data and the fact that within the entrepreneurship-economic competitiveness analysis intervenes the time variable led to the conclusion that the relationship between the two indicators cannot be analyzed using the linear regression method, which requires reconsidering the interaction of the two variables from a different perspective.

Consequently, to deepen the analysis of the interaction between the two indicators we have chosen the Lotka-Volterra model because:

- it does not require long series of data;
- allows the analysis of interdependency between two or more variables at time "t";
- describes the cyclic fluctuations of the variables pertaining to a non-linear series of data.

2. Succinct presentation of the Lotka-Volterra Model

The Lotka-Volterra model was named after the name of those that created and introduced it in literature, the American chemist and ecologist Alfred Lotka (1880-1940) and the Italian mathematician Vito Volterra (1860-1940). Thus, if originally, in 1920 the model has been created for biostatistics, to explain using the first order differential equations, the reason for the increase in the number of predatory fish, simultaneously with the reduction in the number of predatory fish in the Adriatic Sea, during the WWI, currently it is applicable in various areas, including in economy. The model was applied for the first time in the economic field in1967, when Richard Goodwin, American mathematician and economist used the model specific equations to describe the correlation between the real wages evolution and the employment rates.

Generally, we can state that the model pursues the correlative evolution of the two indicators X and Y, interdependent indicators, the influence between the two being a special one, prey-predator type.

[*] Lecturer PhD, Faculty of Economic Sciences, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (email:mag_mihaela@yahoo.com).

[1] In order to synthesize entrepreneurship evolution, it is analyzed from the total entrepreneurial rate perspective, computed as a sum between the early entrepreneurship and the rate of consecrated entrepreneurship.

[2] It is also expressed as a percentage, as a share of the index for each analyzed country, in the total of the maximum rank.

Thus, the Y indicators, also considered as the "predator" is conditioned by the existence of X, which means that in the absence of X, Y cannot exist, and the X indicator considered "the prey" although autonomous, with its own dynamic, is conditioned also by Y's level.

The authors of the model considered that such interdependency can be modeled using the following system of differential equations:

In this context, the constants a, b, c, d express the extent to which they participate to the change of rhythm, thus[3]:

- a, d are growth coefficients of the variables under analysis, in the absence of other influences;
- b, c are called interaction coefficients and express the effect the variance of a variable has on the increase rate of the other variable.

Thus, if the value of the growth coefficients a and d are positive, the rhythm evolution is positively correlated to the evolution of the analyzed variable, while for negative values, the evolution of the rhythm is negatively correlated to the evolution of the analyzed variable.

Also, if the conditions where the interaction coefficients are non-zero (b, c 0), the relationship between the two variables can take one of the following four forms[4]:

- If b>0 and c>0 it means a cooperation relationship, mutualism;
- If b<0 and c<0 means that it is a competition relationship;
- If b<0 and c>0 it means there is a prey-predator relationship, the Y variable being the predator, and the X variable, the prey;
- If b>0 and c<0 between the two variables there is also a prey-predator relationship but, the variable X is the predator and the variable Y is the prey.

Considering the fact that these coefficients contribute together to a variance in the rhythm of the analyzed variables, the conditions a+b=1 and c+d=1 must be met.

At the same time, extreme situations must be taken into account, where one of the factors under analysis are missing. Thus, we have $\begin{cases} \frac{dX}{dt} = X \cdot (a - b \cdot Y) \quad (1) \\ \frac{dY}{dt} = Y \cdot (c \cdot X - d) \quad (2) \end{cases}$,

$a, b, c, d > 0$:

- b = 0 , meaning the Y factor is missing , equation (1) becomes,

$$\frac{dX}{dt} = X \cdot a$$ where $X = k \cdot EXP(a \cdot t)$, which means that the factor X would increase exponentially;

- c = 0, which means that factor X is missing, equation (2) becomes,

$$\frac{dY}{dt} = -d \cdot Y$$

where $Y = h \cdot EXP(-d \cdot t)$, which means that the Y factor would become extinct.

The stationary states of the system are given by:

state S1: x = 0; y = 0 state S2: x = d / c; y = a / b a simplified version of the model is given by the equation system:

$$\begin{cases} \frac{dX}{dt} = a - b \cdot Y \quad (1') \\ \frac{dY}{dt} = c \cdot X - d \quad (2') \end{cases}$$

3. Determining the rate of change of indicators

The following study makes the transition between the theoretical analysis to the empiric analysis, by applying the Lotka-Volterra model on the empirical data regarding the evolution of the total entrepreneurial rate and of the global competitiveness index, in order to determine the relationship between the two variables and also their changing rhythm. Determining the interaction coefficients will allow estimating the value of the total entrepreneurial rate and of the global competitiveness index for 2016.

For this purpose, will be used centralized values based on data published between 2008 and 2015 in The Global Entrepreneurship Monitor and The Global Competitiveness Report regarding the total entrepreneurial rate and the global competitiveness index in national economies, for 31 countries (based on innovation and on efficiency).

In accordance with the presented model, we shall analyze the following system of equations:

$$\begin{cases} \frac{x_{n+1} - x_n}{x_n} = a - b \cdot y_n \\ \frac{y_{n+1} - y_n}{y_n} = c \cdot x_{n\cdot} - d \end{cases}$$ with the proviso that X, the prey variable, represents the entrepreneurial rate, and the Y, the predator variable, represents the global competitiveness index.

The solution for the equation system led to determining the constants a, b, c and d whose values are summarized in table no.1 and table no.2.

Source: personal computations based on data obtained using the Lotka-Volterra model

The results obtained by applying the Lotka-Volterra model confirm the idea outlined thruought the paper – the interdependency relation between entrepreneurship and competitiveness. The positive values of the two constants of interaction (b and c) for all the analyzed countries reveal the symbiosis relationship, of sustenance between the two variables, not being the case of a prey-predator relationship, which confirms the conclusions outlined in previous analyses- entrepreneurship and competitiveness are two interdependent variables. However the low values of these constants, show that the evolution of the entrepreneurial rate and of the competitiveness level is mutually supported in small measure, the growth rates having a strong independent character.

Thus, we find that the competitiveness level of the national economies influence the entrepreneurial rate but, to a very small extent- between 1% and 2%, regardless of the states' development level (efficiency or innovation-based economies).

This, once again, demonstrates the subjective and conjunctural character of the decisions in the investment process, and also that, although competitiveness must represent a desideratum of all national economies, in building a the strategies for encouraging the entrepreneurial activities must be applied also other stimulation leverages, adapting this type of behavior – developing the entrepreneurial spirit through the educational process, publicizing and promoting successful cases, ensuring a stable and predictable economic, politic and legislative context, also customizing the tools to national specificities (history, traditions, customs, culture).

Also, applying the Lotka-Volterra model confirms the validity of the reverse analysis-indeed, as all the specialty studies emphasize, entrepreneurship leaves its mark to a higher extent on the competitiveness level of the national economies, entrepreneurship contribution to increasing the competitiveness of national economies raging between 3% and 12% (on average, entrepreneurship leaves its mark on the competitiveness level of innovation-based economies of 7% and 6% for the efficiency-based economies)

Using the a, b, c and d constants enables anticipating the value of the entrepreneurial rate, and of the global competitiveness index for 2016, within the analyzed economies, the results being summarized in table no.3 and no.4.

Moreover, as it can be seen in table no.1 and 2, the probability that the foreseen values for 2016 being reached is higher for the total entrepreneurial rate rather than for the Global Competitiveness Index.

This aspect reflects the fact that entrepreneurship evolution has a more pronounced predictable character than the evolution of the global competitiveness index.

Applying the Lotka-Volterra model provides thus the possibility to anticipate the entrepreneurial activities evolution, which, especially in the case of anticipating an unfavorable situation, enables specific economic-financial levers' adaptation, so that, from an entrepreneurial point of view it shall follow an ascending trend.

The main inconvenient in using this method with the forecasting purpose of the total entrepreneurial rate and of the global competitiveness index, is represented by the short term forecast period- only for n+1, considering that the consequences of stimulation measures aren't felt immediately, moreover, for the case where the reduction of the total entrepreneurial rate is associated to an increasing trend of the national economies competitiveness. This is because, in this last scenario, reduction of the total entrepreneurial rate is recorded considering an increasing competitiveness, which means that during the evolution of the entrepreneurial process operate aspects related to entrepreneurs' behavior/culture (potential, beginners or consecrated) and the behavioral changes, even after a long educational strategy clearly defined and applied, are felt on the long run.

4. Conclusions

The fact that the graphical representation of the correlation between the entrepreneurship rate and the Global Competitiveness Index on level of development of the national economies reflects a polynomial relationship, limited volume of data and the fact that when analyzing this interdependence the time variable must be taken into account, led to the conclusion that the relationship between the two indicators cannot be analyzed using the linear regression method, which led to reconsidering the interaction between the two from a different perspective.

Considering this conditions, the Lotka –Volterra model enabled determining the coefficients of interaction between the two variables and estimating the value of the total entrepreneurial rate and of the global competitiveness index for 2016.

Thus, the level of competitiveness of national economies influence the entrepreneurial rate, but to a small extent- between 1% and 2%, regardless of the states' development level, and the entrepreneurial contribution to the national economies competitiveness growth, is between 3% and 12%.

The analysis and interpretation of empirical data confirms thus, the theoretical approaches, which present entrepreneurship as an important vector for the national economies' development but, it also complements them, revealing a less researched and disseminated aspect - competitiveness influence on economic agents' interest for the entrepreneurial activities.

WORLD MERCHANDISE TRADE

Serghei MĂRGULESCU[*]
Elena MĂRGULESCU[]

Abstract

This article is mainly based on the most recent statistical data of the World Trade Organization and some aspects related to the evolution of world merchandise trade, in terms of volume and value, in 2015. The volume of world merchandise trade continued to grow slowly in 2015 while the dollar value of it declined sharply as exports fell 14 per cent to US$ 16 trillion, down from US$ 19 trillion in the previous year. It presents also the contribution of the volume change and of the change in unit values (which account for fluctuations in prices and exchange rates) to the value trade growth (in current dollar terms). The discrepancy between trade growth in 2015 in terms of volume and value was mostly attributable to swings in commodity prices and exchange rates The course of economic globalization is also shortly looked on based on some data and considerations of Credit Suisse analysts. Three different scenarios were taken into account in this respect. First one in which globalization continues in the form we know it over the past thirty years, second one in which a multipolar world is a better representation of the state of affairs and third, a scenario in which globalization ends due to the rise of anti-globalization political movements. The second scenario seems to provide a better reflection of reality today, despite the fact that a certain slowdown is observable when taking into account the diminishing growth rate of physical trade, the slower penetration of foreign assets of the developed market companies and signs of reshoring of some business back home. Globalization remains intact in terms of consumption and marketing patterns, while companies seem more reluctant to invest abroad.

Keywords: world merchandise trade, economic globalization

1. The volume of world merchandise trade

The volume of world trade continued to grow slowly in 2015 recording a growth of 2.7 per cent, measured by the average of exports and imports (the volume of exports grew by 3%, while the volume of imports grew by 2,4%, , as illustrated by Chart 2.). Slow global trade growth was accompanied by a modest increase in world GDP, which grew 2.4 per cent in real terms at market exchange rates in the same period.

Several factors contributed to the lackluster performance, including economic slowdown in China, recessions in other large developing economies including Brazil, falling prices for oil and other primary commodities, strong fluctuations in exchange rates, and financial volatility driven by divergent monetary policies in developed countries. Faster economic growth and rising import demand in developed countries (in Europe and North America) partly made up for weaker demand elsewhere, leaving trade growth and output growth nearly unchanged compared with the previous year (2.8 per cent and 2.5 per cent, respectively, in 2014). Meanwhile, output slowed in China and contracted in Japan. China's economy slowed further in the first quarter of 2016. Growth also eased in the United States in the first quarter of 2016 but accelerated in the euro area. Japan's GDP continued to alternate between positive and negative growth.

2015 marked the fourth consecutive year with trade volume growth below 3 per cent, and the fourth year in a row with world trade growing at nearly the same rate as world GDP. Growth rates for trade and GDP in 2015 remained below their respective averages since 1990 of 5 per cent and 2.7 per cent. The recent slow in trade growth is unusual but not unprecedented, as for example the world trade growth was weaker between 1980 and 1985, when five out of six years saw trade growth below 3 per cent, including two years of outright contraction.

As for the contributions to world trade volume growth by regions, Asia contributed more than any other region to the recovery of world trade after the financial crisis of 2008-09. However, the region's impact on global import demand declined in 2015 as China and other Asian economies cooled. in 2015 the region contributed just 0.6 percentage points to the global increase of 2.4 per cent, or 25 per cent of world import growth.

In contrast to Asia, Europe mostly weighed down world trade growth since the financial crisis, making a negative contribution to global import growth in 2012 and 2013. However, by 2015 Europe's contribution was again largely positive, accounting for 1.5 percentage points of the 2.4 per cent increase in world import volume for the year, or 64 per cent of global trade growth.

North America made a positive contribution to world import growth in 2015 (1.1 per cent), while negative contributions were recorded in 2015 for South and Central America (-0.2 per cent) and other regions including Africa, the Middle East and the Commonwealth of Independent States (-0.6 per cent).

On the supply side, "factory Asia" did more than any other region to lift merchandise export volume growth between 2011 and 2014, but its contribution fell below that of Europe in 2015. Asia was responsible for 1 percentage point of the 3.0 per cent rise in world merchandise exports (35 per cent of export growth).

Europe's 1.3 percentage point contribution accounted for 44 per cent of the rise, thanks in part to a reactivation of trade within the European Union. North America's contribution to export growth in volume terms was close to zero in 2015 as demand for US goods slowed in Canada, Asia and South and Central America

A product breakdown of world trade in dollar value (as in volume terms is not available), shows us that fuels and mining products were responsible for more than half of the plunge in trade values in 2015, but that slowing trade in manufactured goods and agricultural products also contributed significantly to the overall decline. Among manufactured goods, the products where trade values notably declined in 2015 were office and telecom equipment, chemicals and other machinery, while clothing and textiles only made small positive contributions to trade growth.

2. The contribution of the volume change and of the change in unit values (which account for fluctuations in prices and exchange rates) to the value trade growth (in current dollar terms).

During the 2000–2010 period, growth in trade value resulted from a balanced contribution of price and quantities: on average, a 9.7 per cent increase in value terms was due to a 4.3 per cent contribution of volume change and a 4.8 per cent change in prices. 2013 and 2015 saw a different contribution to value growth: volume growth stabilized at 2.7 per cent in a context of falling commodity prices. This resulted in a large decrease in value growth , as illustrated by Chart 2.

Chart 2. Average trade growth by volume, value and unit value (per cent)

3. The value of world merchandise trade

Unlike merchandise trade in volume terms, which recorded a modest increase, the dollar value of world merchandise trade declined sharply in 2015 as exports fell 14 per cent to US$ 16 trillion, down from US$ 19 trillion in the previous year.

The discrepancy between trade growth in 2015 in terms of volume and value was mostly attributable to large swings in commodity prices and exchange rates.

Fuels registered the largest price decline of any commodity group (down 63 per cent between June 2014 and December 2015), as a result of new sources of supply such as shale oil and an easing of world energy demand as economic growth slowed in Asia. The decline in metals prices (down 35 per cent over the same period) was smaller than the decline in fuels due to the fact that there was no increase in the supply of metals comparable to the development of shale oil in the United States. Prices of food and agricultural raw materials also fell, by around 22 per cent each between June 2014 and December 2015.

The appreciation of the US dollar contributed to falling commodity. The dollar appreciated 13 per cent on average against the currencies of US trading partners in 2015. The Chinese yuan appreciated along with the dollar, rising 10 per. The appreciation of the yuan may have contributed to the economic slowdown in China to the extent that it made Chinese exports more expensive in foreign markets. Meanwhile, major natural resource exporters such as Brazil and the Russian Federation saw their currencies drop sharply in value in 2014.

The top ten merchandise traders accounted for 52% of the world's total trade in 2015.

Developing economies had a 42% share in world merchandise trade in 2015.

However, the value of merchandise trade and trade in commercial services in 2015 is nearly twice as high as in 2005.

Asia, Europe and North America have accounted for 88% in total merchandise trade of WTO members over the past ten years. The share of developing economies in merchandise exports increased from 33% in 2005 to 42% in 2015. Merchandise trade between developing economies has increased from 41% to 52% of their global trade in the last ten years.

A negative implication in respect to the globalization process has the ratio of merchandise trade to GDP. It fell sharply in 2009 following the economic crisis, bounced back quickly in 2010-2011, declined gradually in 2012-2014, but fell significantly in 2015 to 23%.

4. The course of economic globalization

„The current wave of globalization is the second the world has seen, the first one occurring between the years 1870 to 1913, built on the fruits of the industrial revolution and the rise of the American economy. 'The current period effectively dates from the early 1990s, where events like the fall of communism, rounds of trade liberalism and the growing momentum of the Chinese economy accelerated globalization. This was then driven by US multi-nationals, the advent of the euro, the growth of financial markets and the development of many emerging economies.

However, in recent years the path that globalization is taking has become obstacle strewn and much less clear. The global financial crisis has slowed economic growth, left large amounts of indebtedness in its path and checked the rise of the financial services industry. The Eurozone appears to many to be in a state of perpetual crisis while the structural rise of China's economy has caused some to fear the role it will play geopolitically. Its cyclical slowdown is also promoting concern." This is a short description of the present state of affairs given about two years ago in a study by Credit Suisse that was trying to establish the direction that globalization is taking recently. Three different scenarios were taken into account.

Scenario 1: Globalization continues: The first of these is that globalization continues in the form we know it over the past thirty years. In substance western multinationals dominate the global business landscape, trade grows with few interruptions from protectionism and the internet economy grows, across borders.

Scenario 2: A multipolar world: This second scenario is based on the rise of Asia and a stabilization of the Euro-zone so that the world economy rests, broadly speaking, on three pillars—the Americas, Europe and Asia (led by China). At the corporate level, the significant change would be the rise of regional corporate champions, which in many cases would supplant global multinationals.

Scenario 3: The end of globalization: a slowing trend in economic growth and trade with the added possibility of a macro shock (from indebtedness, inequality, immigration), a rise in protectionism, currency wars, the rise of anti-globalization political movements and a backlash against global corporations.

Earlier, in 2014, Credit Suisse has calculated the so called CS Globalization Index based on economic, social and technological factors. Economic globalization within this index is estimated by trade openness (% of GDP), FDI (% of GDP) and FPI (% of GDP).

Trade openness has risen from around 32% in 1990 to over 54% in 2013 (based on Credit Suisse data), but has fallen in 2015 to 32% (based on World Trade Organization data). This is consistent with the decline of the value of world merchandise trade by almost 3 billion dollars in 2015.

On the other hand, taking corporates as one of the main channels through which globalization flows, Credit Suisse investigated the course of globalization by looking at the trends in the foreign sales and asset shares of major, listed corporations over the last decade.

Foreign sales accounted for 39% of total global corporate sales in 2014, well above the 2004 level when they accounted for 31%.

The trend for foreign assets, however, was different. The penetration of foreign assets is typically lower than that of foreign sales, as they accounted for just 19% of total assets in 2014 on average. In contrast to sales, the upward trend in foreign assets was brought to an end during the global financial crisis. Foreign assets accounted for 21% of the total in 2003, peaked at 26% in 2008, and then dropped to 18% in 2012. This pattern is similar across most sectors and regions.

If we consider the difference between developed and emerging markets companies, there does seem to be more of a retrenchment in the foreign asset exposure of developed world companies versus those in emerging markets, which seem to have expanded their overseas revenues vigorously while their overseas investment has not slowed to the same extent as developed markets.

Among sectors, technology companies are strongly associated with globalization. The sector enjoys a very high share of foreign sales relative to other sectors, but at the same time has the lowest share of foreign assets.

The financial sector, despite the financial crisis, has managed to keep foreign revenues relatively stable, but the share of foreign assets has contracted from the peak of 2007 by some 5%. Industrial and consumer goods companies have exhibited similar trends. The share of foreign assets of developed market companies is around 5% off its 2007 level.

As for emerging market companies, we see a rise in terms of both sales and investments abroad.

Overall, the results of the study of corporate investment and revenue growth show that globalization remains intact in terms of consumption and marketing patterns, while companies seem more reluctant to invest abroad. All is pointing towards a more multipolar world as in the second scenario of the Credit Suisse. The world is most multipolar in terms of trade patterns and economic activity. Trade is becoming more regional though there are signs of the erection of barriers to trade.

Conclusions

The volume of world merchandise trade continued to grow slowly in 2015 while the dollar value of it declined sharply as exports fell 14 per cent to US$ 16 trillion, down from US$ 19 trillion in the previous year. The discrepancy between trade growth in 2015 in terms of volume and value was mostly attributable to swings in commodity prices (large price declines) and exchange rates (the dollar appreciated 13 per cent on average against the currencies of US trading partners).

As for the trend of economic globalization, a certain slowdown is observable when taking into account the diminishing growth rate of physical trade, the slower penetration of foreign assets of the developed market companies and signs of reshoring of some business back home. Globalization remains intact in terms of consumption and marketing patterns, while companies seem more reluctant to invest abroad.

As the analysts from Credit Suisse say "Our sense is that the world is currently in a benign transition from full globalization to a multipolar state, though this is not complete. Specifically, the world is most multipolar in terms of trade patterns and economic activity; but financially the world, although highly globalized, is much less multipolar with the USA still dominating markets. Companies continue to try to sell their goods across borders but are less willing to invest internationally".

USE OF THE INSTRUMENTS OF SALES IMPROVEMENT IN THE NEIGHBOURHOOD STORES

Abstract

The retail market in the Republic of Croatia has considerably changed during several last years by entering of large European hypermarkets and by opening a great number of shopping centres. This particularly affected the business of small independent retailers that are due to price uncompetitiveness difficult to cope with competition from hypermarkets.
Sales success depends itself on the success of marketing program of a company. Improving sales brings a whole range of benefits to both producers and consumers and consists of a set of different incentives that are mainly short-term, designed to encourage faster and greater purchasing of certain products or services.
Through well thought entrepreneurial approach and the use of methods for improving sales, neighbourhood stores could contribute through their business strategy to their competitiveness. Gaining customer loyalty, creating a personal relationship with customers, rewarding of loyal customers, promoting new products, helping the buyer in purchasing are some of the ways of improving neighbourhood store sales.
The paper presents research results to which extent neighborhood stores in Osijek-Baranya County use instruments of sales improvement in order to enhance their sales and relationship with customers.

Keywords: neighborhood stores, entrepreneurial approach, the instruments of sales improvement, business strategy

1. Introduction

The emergence of large retail formats in the Croatian market in the past few years has led to a change in the consumers' habits. Today, consumers do their weekly and monthly grocery shopping in hypermarkets and go to neighbourhood grocery stores to buy only the most essential goods. The reason behind this is the variety of products that can be found in hypermarkets, as well as their large price competitiveness in relation to neighbourhood grocery stores.

This paper focuses on the theoretical approach to improvement sales, instruments of sales improvement, the role of neighbourhood grocery stores as selling places, the possibilities of achieving customer loyalty in these stores, and the results of the research on the use of instruments of sales improvement in neighbourhood stores.

The research could be of importance to both owners and employees of neighbourhood stores: it could help them realize the possibilities and benefits of using instruments of sales improvement, which would in turn lead to customers getting the most out of their money, but also to stores achieving customer loyalty. The questions that this survey deals with are whether neighbourhood stores use any instruments of sales improvement, and, if they do, which ones. Other papers on this subject have also approached the issues of sales improvement and its instruments from a theoretical point of view, but have not conducted any similar studies where neighbourhood stores were the object of the study.

So far, promotional activities have proved themselves successful in making an impact on customers' attitudes and the sales volume. The instruments of sales improvement can win new customers, but also affect the loyalty of regular customers to a certain selling place.

The use of one of the instruments of sales improvement, along with a more personal approach to customers, could lead to an increase in sales for the neighbourhood grocery stores.

2. Neighbourhood stores as selling places

In Croatia, trade is one of the most important economic sectors. Out of the total number of registered legal entities in trade, 28% of them are business entities. Given the importance of trade, as a sector that is supposed to be of interest to the overall Croatian economy, a legal basis has been established: its function is to take care of the employees and customers in terms of supplying them with goods in remote and isolated areas, as well as with goods that bear relation to cultural and family traditions and the needs of the tourists. During the process of establishing the legal basis in Croatia, the functioning of the entire community is taken into account[1].

The data for the 19 countries of the EU for 2012, show that Croatia had 20 200 stores in retail trade. The average number of inhabitants per shop is 211. Since it is in direct contact with consumers and detects all changes in relation to their consumer habits, trade can be seen as an indicator of economic trends, and the changes it has gone through can attest to that claim. Since 2008, under the influence of the global crisis, there has been a stabilization of consumption, and these trends have continued throughout recent years, with the exception of 2010, when the turnover of retail trade grew at an annual level of 1%. After the recovery in 2011, there has been a stabilization of consumption and a decline in turnover on an annual basis in 2012 of - 4.2% and in 2013 of - 0.6%. The year 2014 recorded turnover growth of 0.4% compared to the same period in 2013[2].

Changes in the Croatian trade in the last decade reflect the changes in retail formats. With numerous hypermarkets entering the Croatian market, as well as the announced arrival of other hypermarkets, the entire Croatian trade has changed, and it has brought about changes even in the consumers' habits. Prior to 1990s, the Croatian retail trade was dominated by smaller stores located in city centres and neighbourhood grocery stores that mostly sold food products.

"Neighbourhood store is a selling place in which the trading activity of selling is carried out, and the goods sold there are mostly food products. In surface, they range from 15 to 200 square meters, which is why they are also called small stores. Neighbourhood stores are located in neighbourhoods or parts of town. Their existence is essential because they provide service to a smaller number of customers and they are in close proximity to their homes, so that customers can easily buy household goods, and especially the much-needed food products. Elements needed for running a successful neighbourhood store: location and position of the sales object, size of retail space, visibility, sign and a clean facade, a range of products, an arrangement of products and a tidy retail space, fresh and safe food products, service and professionalism"[3].

The modern retail market, as opposed to the once fragmented retail market ruled by traditional small independent retailers to a greater or lesser extent, is marked by the processes of concentration, domination and expansion of large-format stores and the result of all this, which is marginalization of small independent retailers[4].

Today, it is difficult to predict customer loyalty to one retail format. However, personal contact with customers and sales promotion methods can coax the customer into shopping in neighbourhood grocery stores.

Table 1. Key segments for small independent retailers

Area	Description
Consumer behaviour	- One available store - Random or emergency purchases - Purchase of products that are not available elsewhere
Employment	- A way to encourage entrepreneurship due to small entry barriers
Local people	- Contribution to the structure of the local community - Providing a sense of identity
The variety of choices	- Competitive advantage via differentiation strategy
Dynamism	- The introduction of new products and retail innovation - a better understanding of the local market and consumer needs as a potential source of competitive advantage

The rule goes as following: the closer the store is to the consumer, the greater the likelihood of the consumer making a purchase there. A greater distance from the consumer allows for a number of factors to influence and lower the probability of going to a certain store[5].

3. The term of sales improvement

"American Marketing Association (AMA) defines sales improvement as those marketing activities that do not fall within the range of personal sale, propaganda and publicity, and that stimulate the customers to purchase, as well as the efficiency of the mediator in presentations, demonstrations and other non-typical sales activities. Sales improvement is a form that is complementary to other forms and stimulates all forms of saving money when purchasing"[6].

The impact of promotional activities on the attitudes of consumers can be seen in two main processes[7]:

1. in the process of formation of positive consumer attitudes
2. in the process of changing the intensity (strength) of positive or negative consumer attitudes, and the process of changing the direction of attitudes (negative to positive attitudes).

Sales improvement consists of short-term incentives to encourage the purchase or sale of products or services along with basic benefits offered with the product or service. Sales improvement provides reasons that lead to immediate sales. The idea is to motivate consumers to immediately buy a particular product. Sales improvement includes a wide range of promotional tools that stimulate a faster or stronger reaction in the market. Sales improvement should help build a long-term relationship with the customer, as well as help ensure the product a position in the market, instead of creating a momentary sale or a temporary choice of a particular brand. Sales improvement has certain limitations as well. Traders have to be aware of the fact that new buyers, who are the target of their promotion, can be consumers of a certain type of product, customers loyal to some other brand and consumers who often change brands. Sales improvement often attracts customers who often change brands because, those who do not use that product or use another brand, look for cheaper or more cost-effective products. Thus, sales improvement encourages customers to try new products, rather than constantly using one and the same, and also informs the consumer of prices, as they like to buy products at special prices[8].

"The tasks of sales improvement are: to speed up the transfer of products between the producer and the consumer, to raise the level of cultural and professional services for end users, to improve the image of the economic entity, to create a favourable pre-purchase ambient situations at selling places, to increase consumer awareness, to reduce seasonal fluctuations of products, to attract new customers, as well as potential customers to the retail facilities, and to increase the number of loyal customers"[9].

A number of instruments can be used in order to achieve the objectives of sales improvement. The plan for sales promotion should take into account the type of market, the objectives of sales improvement, competitiveness and cost-effectiveness of each instrument separately. The main promotional tools intended for consumers are[10]:

- samples - small quantities of products offered to consumers for testing
- coupons - documents that guarantee discounts for consumers when purchasing a product
- offers of refund (rebates) - a partial refund that the consumer receives after sending the manufacturer a "proof of purchase"
- packing at a better price - reduced price which is highlighted by the producer on the label or packaging
- premiums (gifts) - products that are offered either for free or at a lower price as an incentive to purchase goods
- special promotional material - useful items that carry a company logo and are given to consumers as gifts
- reward for loyalty - money or other rewards given for regular use of the products or services of a certain company
- promotion at the point of purchase (POP - Point of purchase) – point-of-sale display and product presentations in stores
- contests, raffles, lotteries and games - a type of promotion that offers consumers the possibility to, by playing games of chance or putting an effort of some other kind, win something, such as money, a trip or a product.

ales improvement has most often a direct impact on consumer attitudes. Instruments of sales improvement can be reflected in the attitudes of consumers in the following ways:

- with consumers or nonconsumers who have formed a positive attitude about a certain product: instruments of sales improvement will generally heighten the intensity of those positive attitudes, and the consumer's interest in buying that product (a higher degree of commitment)

- with potential consumers with negative attitudes towards the product: inducing these potential consumers to try out the product creates primarily good starting points to weaken the negative attitudes in their intensity; this way, the very process of creating positive attitudes among potential consumers is more easily influenced
- with consumer or nonconsumers who have not formed attitudes towards the product: the goal of the instruments of sales improvement is to induce consumers to test the product and help create a positive experience which would lead to positive attitudes[11].

Issues needed to be solved by sales improvement plan for instruments[12]:

1. coupons
   - What saving will customer have while buying product with a coupon?
   - Which segment of the market coupons will seize?
   - Which appeals will be used on customers for using coupons?
   - How coupons will be distributed (time, place, method)?
   - Which method will follow effectiveness of this sales promotion model?
2. special price packing
   - What saving will customer have while buying special prize packings?
   - Which segment (segments) of the market this sales promotion model will seize?
   - Which appeals will be used on customers for this sales promotion model?
   - How this model will be distributed (time, place, method)?
   - Which method will follow effectiveness of this sales promotion model?
3. customer rewards
   - Which products will serve as rewards for customers?
   - Which segments of the market (customers) will be rewarded? Why?
   - Will there be rewards given in the form of free products or special prize products?
   - Which appeals will be used on customers for this sales promotion model?
   - How customer rewards will be distributed (time, place, method)?
   - Which method will follow effectiveness of this sales promotion model?
4. product demonstration
   - When, on which method and where the product is will be demonstrated?
   - Had the merchandisers acquired the knowledge, skills and abilities for product denostration?
   - Which target segment of customers will be subject of demonstration?
   - Which method will be used to stimulate customers on attending product demonstration?
   - Which method will follow effectiveness of this sales promotion model?
5. free samples
   - Which customers will get free samples?
   - What is the intention of free samples distribution?
   - How the samples will be distributed?
   - Who will distribute samples?
   - Which appeals will be used on sample distribution?
   - Which method will follow effectiveness of this sales promotion model?
6. low price offer
   - Which customers (segment) will be granted for discount on featured price?
   - Will it be time and place-limited activity?
   - What is the intention of this sales promotion plan? What is the achievement?
   - Who will guide and organize activities?
   - Which appeals will be used on discount for customers?
   - Which method will follow effectiveness of this sales promotion model?
   - 7. Which customers (segment) will be granted for discount on featured price?
   - Will it be time and place-limited activity?
   - What is the intention of this sales promotion plan? What is the achievement?
   - Who will guide and organize activities?
   - Which appeals will be used on discount for customers?
   - Which method will follow effectiveness of this sales promotion model?
7. money refund
   - How the money refund model will be monitored andcontroled?
   - What amount of purchased bill will be refunded? What percentage?
   - Will there be same percentage on every bill or rates will be differentiated by size, structure and meaning of bill and place of purchase?
   - Will refund be applied on individual bills or/and on accumulated purchases during specific period?
   - What is the intention of this sales promotion plan? What is the achievement?
   - Who will guide and organize activities?
   - Which appeals will be used on money refund for customers?
   - Which method will follow effectiveness of this sales promotion model?
8. trading stamps
   - On which selling places and market segments trading marks will be distributed?
   - How long will this sales promotion model last?
   - Which customer and consumer motives are incounted for implementation of this model?
   - What rules will be applied on this model implementation?
   - Who will guide and organize whole activity?

- Which appeals are going to be refered to customers?
- Which method will follow effectiveness of this sales promotion model?

9. exhibits on selling place
   - What sales exhibits are will be used?
   - On what selling places it is going to be used?
   - How to create a successful apeal to customers?
   - How long will this sales promotion model last?
   - Who will guide and organize whole activity?
   - Which appeals are going to be refered to customers?
   - Which method will follow effectiveness of this promotion model?

The influence of sales improvement instruments on consumer attitudes is showing in Table 3.

4. How to achieve customer loyalty in neighbourhood stores?

The study of consumer habits in retail (GfK, 2010) shows that the main reasons for going to a certain store are their range of products, proximity to one's place of residence and price acceptability. On the other hand, consumers' preferences when deciding where they will go shopping for food products indicate that consumers most frequently decide on supermarkets (47%), small shops (23%) and hypermarkets (15%). There are two elements that should be noted regarding that. The first one is the advantage of the location of neighbourhood grocery stores that are in proximity to the consumers' place of residence and the customers' habit to shop there for basic, everyday products. The second element refers to a smaller sales area which, on the one hand, limits the range of products offered to customers, but at the same time allows for faster shopping. The emphasis should be placed on the differentiation of those elements of independent retailers' business to which customers are committed. When it comes to the development of such an approach, independent retailers have a certain advantage, since they are flexible and their stores are in proximity to customers' homes. Such position can facilitate their approach to customers and the development of strategies that could be a determining factor of their future survival[13].

In considering the application of sales promotion, a business entity needs to[14]:

- define objectives: in terms of consumers, objectives include encouraging greater use and purchase; in terms of retailers, objectives include encouraging retailers to accept new products and higher stocks; in terms of sales force, objectives include support for a new product
- choose the means: for achieving these goals, there are many instruments of sales promotion at their disposal (samples, coupons, special packaging, product demonstrations, award games)
- test the program: the program should be tested to determine its effectiveness
- create a program for the application and control of sales promotion (e.g. how were sales before, during and after sales promotion).

A well thought-out sales strategy and the use of appropriate methods of sales improvement can increase sales in neighbourhood grocery stores. The business of neighbourhood grocery stores can be explained through Pareto principle, which reflects the typical economic thinking and cost-effective procedures - the store's turnover (around 80%) depends on a small percentage of customers (about 20%). This is why those customers must be offered bigger rewards, since they make up for them in the store's turnover during their lifetime of loyalty (rewarding regular customers)[15].

The advantages of applying customer relationship management (CRM) approach are[16] (Goldstein, 1; 272):

- better customer retention and customer loyalty because it can adequately meet their needs
- an increase of market share by applying cross-selling and up-selling strategies
- the possibilities of providing services that are better adapted to customers
- greater efficiency, since this approach helps with time management
- greater competitive advantage because of good access to the customer.

One of the instruments of sales improvement that could be used in neighbourhood grocery stores are discounts, which represent a reduction on the regular price of the product. The usual discounts range from 10% to 25% of the nominal price. This form of sales improvement is used in the following cases: as a reward for existing customers, as an incentive for consumers to purchase larger quantities, as an incentive to repurchase, to help promotional investments reach consumers, to ensure a place in the shop windows and other areas of presentation, to assist sellers and obtain the support from intermediaries[17].

The best methods of sales improvement in neighbourhood stores are: discounts for the amount of purchased goods, tokens of appreciation (e.g. a birthday card), written thank you notes for frequent shopping, hospitality, friendly relationship with customers, award games, free samples, gifts to customers, delayed payment, promotion of new products, a joint discount for a certain type of product (e.g. all types of cleaners) and so on.

Some of the more innovative idea for sales promotion are: a week of attention dedicated to the customer, discount for blood donors, discounts for those whose birthday is on the day of the purchase, best mask contest, pancake days, late-night shopping, competition in decorating Easter eggs, encouraging a good atmosphere in the stores on some special days, "guess the number" prize games e.g. how many apple are there in the basket etc[18].

In order for neighbourhood stores to retain the loyalty of existing customers and increase the number of new customers, they should maintain a personal approach to them, expand their product range and increase their supply of fresh (organic) fruits and vegetables that most such stores are missing. In Zagreb, in the past few years, the popularity of neighbourhood stores has been on the rise again. They offer products from organic production and delicatessen whose origin is verified (jams, juices, venison salami and sausages, pastries, cheeses, homemade teas, pasta ...) from different family farms, thus generating "a small market". This has attracted the segment of pensioners as customers due to the proximity of these stores to their homes, as well as mothers who are concerned with a healthy diet. Some stores have improved their sales by personally delivering products or selling their products through e-commerce.

5. Research on the use of instruments of sales improvement in neighbourhood stores

For the purposes of this paper, the research was carried out in 10 neighbourhood stores in Osijek-Baranja County in Croatia. Osijek-Baranja County is located in the east of Croatia and has 305,032 inhabitants. Its centre is Osijek with a population of 108,048 inhabitants. This county serves as an example of an area where there has been a change in the structure of retailing. In fact, prior to the opening of shopping malls, neighbourhood stores and retail stores located in the centre of cities were extremely popular. With the opening of shopping malls (such as Portanova and Avenue Mall), which have become a place of hypermarkets, but also entertainment where people spend their free time, there are now only a few neighbourhood stores left that offer mostly food products. Since consumer habits have changed, the question is: how can small neighbourhood stores survive in a competitive market?

The aim of the paper is to explore how often and what instruments of sales improvement do neighborhood stores use in Osijek-Baranja County. The three set criteria for the formation of the sample are:

1. the criterion of business: retail trade
2. the criterion of size: small neighborhood stores
3. the criterion of geographical affiliation: shops located in Osijek-Baranja County.

Sample size: n = 10.

Time of research: October 2016.

Stores from the sample were selected randomly.

Based on the obtained answers, instruments of sales improvement were ranked accordingly, as is shown in Table 5.

Table 5 shows that packaging at a lower price is the dominant instrument of sales improvement used in neighbourhood grocery stores. Other commonly used instruments are product samples and point-of-sale displays and product presentations. None of the stores from the survey use offers of refund, and only one uses coupons for purchase. The study indicates that neighbourhood stores do not use instruments of sales improvement as much as they should in order to increase their sales and become more competitive in the market.

6. Conclusions

Sam Walton, the founder of Wal - Mart, once said: "There is only one boss. The customer. And he can fire everybody in the company from the chairman on down, simply by spending his money somewhere else." This statement has proven to be correct when it comes to the business of neighbourhood stores as well. The changes in the retail market in the last ten years in Croatia indicate significant changes in the trading business and customer behaviour. With the appearance of shopping malls and large hypermarkets, customers do their weekly and monthly grocery shopping in hypermarkets, and rarely in small neighbourhood stores. The reason behind this is the wide range of shopping malls, which, in addition to a wide range of products, offer a place where people can spend their free time in a number of ways: by going to different events, the cinema, restaurants.

In order for neighbourhood stores to survive in the retail market, they must improve their business and entrepreneurial approach to retain the existing customers. In this study, a sample of 10 neighbourhood stores has shown that packaging at a lower price and product samples are instruments that are most often used in sales improvement. The survey also suggests that neighbourhood stores do not use instruments of sales improvement, as an important promotional factor, as much as they should. This study has proven that neighbourhood stores still have room to improve their business through various promotional activities.

The subject of the following studies could deal with the same issue, but take another geographical area, e.g. Zagreb, due to differences in prices and in purchasing power. Also, a survey could be conducted among customers on the effect of sales improvement instruments on their attitudes.

With the use of some of the measures and instruments of sales promotion, imaginative entrepreneurial approach, friendly approach towards the customer, as well as by expanding the range of healthy food products they offer, small neighbourhood stores could increase their sales and gain customer loyalty.

THE EVOLUTION OF E-COMMERCE IN ROMANIA

Otilia-Elena PLATON[*]

Abstract

The evolution of e-commerce in Romania in the past few years was significant and in 2016 the total amount of money spent on online shopping exceeded 1.8 billion Euros. Since it is believed that e-commerce will be the future trend in global commerce, this topic has an increased importance in the specialized literature. The purpose of this paper is to present the evolution of the e-commerce market in Romania, mainly in the past two years, and to outline the trends that are expected to occur this year and in the near future. The paper presents a short literature review regarding the concept of e-commerce and a secondary data analysis regarding the characteristics of the e-commerce market in Romania.

1. Introduction

In commerce the pace of change is rapid and one of the most prominent transformations was created through the strong development and expansion of electronic commerce. E-commerce generated a paradigm shift for sales and "has changed the way business is conducted in many industries" (Schneider, 2015), becoming an efficient way to lower costs and increase profits from sales. In this field, both the demand and the supply are going through significantly changes that "pose big challenges for retailers, and also represent unprecedented opportunities to innovate on behalf of customers" (World Economic Forum, 2017). E-commerce managed to form a "global marketplace" (Chan, 2004, p. 284) and created sales opportunities for sellers and many purchasing opportunities for buyers (Schneider, 2015).

E-commerce is believed to be the future trend in global commerce and online sales are expected to grow from around 10% today to 40% or even 50% in some sectors in 2027 (World Economic Forum, 2017). The future of shopping will be therefore mainly electronic.

In Romania, consumers' orientation towards electronic commerce became more and more significant in the past few years. Factors such as a higher rate of Internet penetration and usage, wage increase, VAT decrease and price decrease, contributed to the growth of online sales in Romania in the recent years (GPeC, 2017). According to the official Romanian e-commerce market report, published by GPeC (2017), in 2016 the total value of the e-commerce market in Romania exceeded 1.8 billion Euros, more with 0.4 billion Euros than the value recorded in 2015.

Given the importance of e-commerce, numerous papers and studies are dedicated to this topic in the existent specialized literature. The role of this article is to outline the current characteristics of the e-commerce market in Romania and to identify, through a secondary data analysis, some trends regarding its future development.

2. The concept of e-commerce

According to Chan (2004, p. 292), "e-commerce concerns the sale and purchase of goods and services by electronic mechanisms, in general, and on the Internet, in particular". Taking into consideration only the last aspect of e-commerce, Carey (2001, p. 5) considers that "e-commerce (or electronic commerce) is the term used to denote a commercial (usually contractual) transaction that takes place between two or more people using the communications infrastructure known as the Internet". Schneider (2015), emphasizes that the term electronic commerce means not only shopping on the Internet, but it also includes different types of business activities that use Internet technologies. Thus, several categories of electronic commerce can be defined, depending on "the types of entities participating in the transactions or business processes" (Schneider, 2015, p. 6).

Since e-commerce can relate to both consumer-oriented and business-oriented aspects (Chan, 2004), e-commerce can be easily separated in these two main categories. As it can be seen in Figure 1, the consumer-oriented e-commerce can be divided furthermore into three types: B2C (business-to-consumer), C2C (consumer-to-consumer) and C2B (consumer-to-business). The business-oriented e-commerce (B2B) deals with commercial transactions carried out between business partners or collaborators.

Beside these two main categories, e-commerce also involves business processes that suport selling and purchasing activities. Figure 2 shows the relative size of e-commerce elements in terms of money volume and number of transactions. According to it, the business processes that suport selling and purchasing activities are the largest element of e-commerce, followed by the business-to-business (B2B) e-commerce and the business-to-consumer (B2C) e-commerce (Schneider, 2015).

For this paper only the business-to-consumer e-commerce shows interest. The B2C e-commerce, also known as consumer shopping on the Web (Schneider, 2015), involves the selling of tangible or intangible goods from an electronic retailer (e-retailer or e-tailer) to individual consumers and it resembles to some extent the traditional retail business (Chan, 2004). The retail business can be represented by a hybrid retailer, who sells goods both in the physical and in the digital environment, or it can be represented by an electronic retailer, who sells goods only in the digital environment. The types of goods that can be sold include: physical goods, perishable goods, digital goods and intangible goods (services) (Chan, 2004).

The mechanism of B2C e-commerce is based on a series of key elements, such as: a virtual shop, a search engine to facilitate finding products on the virtual shop, an e-catalog for presenting product information, a virtual shopping cart, communication and customer support, payment functions and physical or digital product delivery services (Chan, 2004). In order to ensure a greater success of sales, "companies must be able to transfer their merchandising skills to the Web" (Schneider, 2015, p. 20) and convince customers to buy through marketing, advertising and promotions.

According to Schneider (2015) there were 3 stages in the evolution of e-commerce. The first stage of development lasted from 1995 until 2003, the second stage lasted from 2004 until 2009, and the third stage started in 2010 and it is still under development. The third stage in the development of e-commerce was determined by a number of factors such as (Schneider, 2015):

- an increasing number of mobile devices users and the proliferation of high-speed mobile phone newtorks that enabled more connections between consumers and retailers.
- an increasing interest towards social networking platforms from both the users and the companies; the companies engaged social networks in commerce and started to use them for advertising, promotion and sales.
- an increasing number of small businesses started to sell online.
- an increasing number of tracking technologies were integrated into e-commerce.

Along with the development of smartphones and tablets, the e-commerce activity diversified. Mobile devices became more powerful and popular and started being used in different application areas, including retail. The mobile telephone-based commerce, known as mobile commerce or m-commerce, offers new opportunities for online businesses and it is one of the main future trends in e-commerce.

Referring to the opportunities that e-commerce offers, is should be mentioned that the main advantage of B2C e-commerce is that it simplifies the consumer buying process. On the Internet, the consumers can easily obtain more information and they can compare and evaluate products and prices. These aspects enable them to take better decisions and to have a greater control over the buying process. "E-commerce provides buyers with a wider range of choices than traditional commerce" (Schneider, 2015, p. 22). On the Internet, consumers can analyze different products or services, sold by different sellers, thus improving their decision, saving time and money.

3. The e-commerce market in Romania

According to the official Romanian e-commerce market report published by GPeC (2017), in 2016 the total value of the e-commerce market in Romania exceeded 1.8 billion Euros. This figure took into consideration only the value of the e-tail market (tangible goods sold online, disregarding their nature), excluding services such as: bill payments, utilities paid online, event tickets, plane tickets, hotel or holiday reservations etc. Compared to 2015, the Romanian e-commerce market grew by approximately 30%, from 1.4 billion Euros to over 1.8 billion Euros. Between 2014 and 2015 the total value of the e-commerce market grew from 1.1 billion Euros to over 1.4 billion Euros. Therefore in the last years, the e-commerce market has experienced a continuous growth, of about 30% per year. "The e-commerce industry is one of the few Romanian industries growing constantly every year" (GPeC, 2017). If the growth trend will continue, next year the Romanian e-commerce market (on the e-tail segment) will exceed the threshold of 2 billion Euros.

The e-commerce share in total retail was of approximately 4% in 2016, similar to 2015 when the share varied between 4% and 5%.

In 2016 in Romania were registered approximately 11.2 million Internet users, more with 0.2 million than in 2015, meaning an Internet penetration rate of 58%. Regarding the number of consumers, in 2015 there were registered 6.7 million online shoppers. In terms of the supply, on the Romanian market, in 2016 there were approximately 5000 online shops active and over 20000 websites that have shopping flow and add-to-cart active buttons.

A selection of the main aspects regarding the evolution of the e-commerce market in Romania between 2015 and 2016 is presented in table 1.

Table 1. The evolution of e-commerce in Romania between 2015-2016

E-commerce aspects	2015	2016
Romania's population	19.8 mil.	19.4 mil.
Internet users	11 mil.	11.2 mil.
Internet penetration rate	56%	58%
Smartphone penetration rate	50%	70%
Online orders placed from mobile devices	25-30%	35-40%
Online shopping value (e-tail)	1.4 bil. €	1.8 bil. €
Average value of online shopping/day	3.8 mil.€	4.9 mil. €
Average number of purchases/year	8.2	8.4
Black Friday sales	100 mil.€	130 mil. €
Online card payment	514 mil.€	745 mil. €

Source: GPeC, 2016&2017.

According to GPeC (2017), in 2016 the average number of purchases made by a Romanian online buyer was 8.4, increasing from 8.2 purchases in 2015, 8.1 purchases in 2014 and 7.9 purchases in 2013. Also in 2016, the average value of online shopping per day was 4.9 million Euros, increasing from 3.8 million Euros in 2015.

The weekdays on which most of the Romanians purchase products online are Wednesdays and Thursdays.

During Black Friday 2016, the Romanians bought products online of 130 million Euros, increasing from 100 million Euros spent during Black Friday 2015. During Black Friday 2014 the total value of sales was around 75 million Euros. "According to top online shops in Romania, Romanian people's appetite for discounts was the reason why online shops started having more and more frequent Black Friday campaigns (sometimes named differently)" (GPeC, 2017), each of these campaigns generating an approximately 30% growth in online sales.

The main product categories that were sold online in 2016 are similar to those sold in 2015. The top four product categories were: Electro-IT&C (e.g. PC and computer parts, notebooks, tablets, mobile phones, electronics and home appliances), Fashion & Beauty (e.g. clothes, shoes, accessories, cosmetics, products, watches etc.), Home & Deco (home design products, furniture etc) and Baby, Kids and Toys (e.g. toys, strollers, baby clothes, diapers etc.). "Comparing to 2015, the transaction average order value decreased for all the above categories with the sole exception of Home & Deco where the average order value doubled" (GPeC, 2017). In 2015, for Electro-IT&C, the Romanian buyers spent 680 RON, a higher average order value than in 2016, when they spent 669 RON per transaction. For Fashion & Beauty the average order value decreased from 180 RON in 2015 to 161 RON in 2016. For Home & Deco, the average order value doubled from 220 RON in 2015 to 474 RON in 2016. For Baby, Kids & Toys, the average value order decreased from 210 RON in 2015 to 203 RON in 2016.

During the last two years, the smartphone penetration rate grew significantly in Romania, increasing from 50% in 2015 to 70% in 2016. Romanian buyers started to use smartphones for shopping online and browsing online shop content. "Therefore, the top Romanian online shops reported significant increase in mobile device traffic: over 50% of online shops visits come from mobile devices" (GPeC, 2017). The number of online shopping orders placed from mobile devices has grown as well, from 25-30% of total orders in 2015 to 35-40% in 2016.

Regarding online card payments, in 2016 the total value grew significantly, reaching approximately 745 million Euros, increasing by 44.9% from the value registered in 2015, when the total value was 514 million Euros. In 2014 the value of online card payments was 337 million Euros. Out of the total value, in 2016 RomCard processed 575 million Euros in 3D Secure and registered a significant growth comparing to 2015, when the company processed 394 million Euros. Netopia mobilPay processed 170 million Euros in 2016, more than in 2015, when the company processed 120 million Euros.

Romanians preferred online card payments especially when they paid for services and less when they paid for e-tail. Out of the total payment methods used in the e-tail segment, the online card payment percentage was approximately 6-7%, both in 2015 and 2016. The preferred payment method (approximately 90% of orders) was cash on delivery. Other payment methods such as online banking, micropayments by SMS etc. were used only for 2% or 3% of all the payments. The top three product categories for online card payments included: bills payment, e-tail payments and telecom services payments.

In 2016, 64% of Visa card online payments were directed to international online merchants. The purchases included mainly plane tickets, but also travel and hotel reservations, as well as online adult websites and gambling & casino websites. The average order value on Visa cards increased from 40 Euros in 2015 to 50 Euros in 2016. The figures show that in 2015 Romanian buyers "spend more money in foreign online shops than in Romanian online shops, the average order value being 58 Euros for foreign shops and 40 Euros for Romanian online shops" (GPeC, 2016).

4. Future trends of e-commerce in Romania

Although most of the Romanian online buyers prefer to purchase from desktop devices instead of mobile devices, mobile commerce has grown considerably since 2015 (GPeC, 2016). According to the official Romanian e-commerce market report published by GPeC (2016), in 2015 "1.4 million Romanian online shoppers used a mobile device to complete a purchase, and approximately 850.000 used a mobile shopping app to complete a purchase". Mobile commerce was "the trend of 2016 and will continue to be the main focus for 2017, as Romanian online shops have understood that the mobile is no longer the future but the present" (GPeC, 2017). Given the fact that m-commerce is having a fast development, the main aspects that need to be optimised are improving the online shop mobile user experience and the websites loading time (GPeC, 2017). Also, the e-tailers must adapt the website content and communication to this new trend.

Nowadays consumers expect "to order something on their mobile devices, have it delivered or pick it up in store – often on the same day, in a few hours, or even in a few minutes. It's up to retailers to adapt to these changes – and in some areas even lead the way – or they'll fall behind and disappear" (World Economic Forum, 2017). Consumers want everything to happen fast. The Romanian consumers are looking for the online shops to offer them several advantages, such as: free delivery, discounts and promotional campaigns, free returns, and fast delivery (GPeC, 2016). Online shops and delivery companies must be able to complete these demands. The e-commerce market must become a more proactive and less reactive market (GPeC (3), 2017). The e-tailers should try to innovate in order to keep up with the changing consumer demands and behaviour.

Besides mobile, other important keywords regarding the future development of e-commerce in Romania include: video content, automation, personalization and omnichanel experience (GPeC (2), 2017).

Given the fact that by 2020 Google estimates that 80% of online content will be video content, the e-tailers have the opportunity and obligation, at the same time, to create and deliver quality video content (including live streaming, vlogging, virtual reality etc.), in order to improve communication and promotion, to increase consumers` trust and to stimulate their sales (GPeC (2), 2017).

The companies should also adopt marketing automation in order to measure their results and to establish patterns regarding their consumers` buying behaviour. Marketing automation will help companies to be present and communicate online with their consumers at the right moments and in the right context.

Personalization is another important aspect. The most successful companies will be those who will communicate and customise their content according to their customers` profile and interests.

The omnichanel or multichanel experience will be a source of competitive advantage. A pleasant consumers` experience should be created by retailers at all points of contact, both online and offline, and both before and after the purchase.

5. Conclusions

The Romanian e-commerce market had a continuos growth during the last years, of about 30% per year, and it will continue to develop based on the trends that were presented in this paper. Taking into consideration that the e-commerce market is a global market, it should be mentioned that the future development of electronic commerce in Romania will follow the international trends. The long-term developing trends will involve 3 main directions (World Economic Forum, 2017):

5.1. An increasing power and influence of consumers

Given the fact that on the Internet, consumers have a greater control over their shopping experience, and that their satisfaction is very important for retailers, in the future consumers "will be more empowered than ever to drive the change they want" (World Economic Forum, 2017). The development of technology, artificial intelligence, augmented reality and virtual reality will help consumers to fulfill their needs in a simpler way. Since they will have less time to buy from physical stores, they will prefer to choose mainly products sold online. Consumers will choose to shop with retailers who are able to sell different types of products and who will provide transparency around product information, pricing and the supply chain, so that they can be satisfied about the purchase.

An important shift on the market is represented by the fact that "until recently the price was the important factor influencing the buying decision, but now the smaller price is not the only factor – Romanian people start paying attention to the quality of service and post-acquisition services, time of delivery and time of response and the price is no longer the main factor.

The quality of service becomes the most important differentiator in Romanian e-commerce" (GPeC, 2016).

5.2. Global access to a wider range of goods

E-commerce offers a wider range of choices for consumers than traditional commerce and on the Internet, consumers can analyze different products or services, sold by different sellers from all around the world. The retailers that will offer the most qualitative services will have the chance to be elected and to sell more.

5.3. Shared value

According to World Economic Forum (2017), "retailers will only survive if their business creates shared value that benefits shareholders and society". Social and environmental sustainability will appeal more to customers in the future.

Based on all the information presented in this paper, retailers should improve their online sales activity and align to the international trends. Also, further research in this domain should be carried out since it is an evolving domain and its pace of change is extremely rapid.

MARKETING PROGRAMME FOR TOURISM POTENTIAL VALORIZATION THROUGH AGRITOURISM

Mirela-Cristina VOICU[*]

Abstract

Mehedinti is the county that "excels" in most areas. On the one hand, it is a county with exceptional tourist potential and, on the other hand, is one of the most economically underdeveloped counties. In these circumstances, agritourism appears as one of the best solutions to capitalize the area's tourism potential without substantial investment. This is encouraged by the current concern of the European Union reflected in the approval of the EU Strategy for the Danube Region (EUSDR) by the EU Council, which has created great opportunities for funding and action in the Danube region.

In this context, through the following paper we seek to emphasize the importance of agritourism as a solution for developing tourism in the Mehedinti county, developing in this regard a marketing programme that aims to valorize this region's tourism potential.

Keywords: agritourism, tourism marketing, marketing programme, tourism potential, tourism resources

1. Introduction

Mehedinti county is part of an area that has become a priority for the European Union. Thus, considering the initiative launched by Romania and Austria in 2008, the European Council (June 8 to 19, 2009) requested from the European Commission to make all the efforts for the adoption of an EU Strategy for the Danube Region by the end of 2010. The EU Strategy for the Danube Region (EUSDR) was adopted in June 2011 as a macro-regional strategy of the European Union, aiming at developing the economic potential and improving the environmental conditions of the region, encouraging for this purpose long-term cooperation both between local and regional authorities, and between authorities, the private sector and NGOs, by generating projects for the region's development.

Capitalizing the exceptional tourism potential and geopolitical position of the romanian part of the Danube region in the European context, harmonized with an appropriate legal and institutional framework will entail a full integration of Romania into the regional and european structures.

On the other hand, given that the Danube Region is characterized by vulnerability accentuated by any kind of local anthropic intervention, a reassessment of the activities impacting these areas is required, including tourism, and finding a compromise solution, that of the optimal environmental pollution. Regarding tourism, this solution can be represented by agritourism. Through the additional revenue that it could provide, agritourism can help improve the economic stability of rural communities and farms given that agricultural products have low prices, and agricultural production costs and the suburban areas development are growing. Also, agritourism allows the diversification of households and farm activities and represents a buffer against the fluctuations of their income.

In order to emphasize agritourism as a solution for capitalizing the tourism potential in the area of Mehedinti county the features and importance of this type of tourism for the area subjected to analysis, and the actions undertaken so far by the authorities to capitalize the tourism potential through agritourism will be presented, a SWOT analysis on the area of interest will be conducted and, finally, we will propose a series of solutions that consider the superior capitalization of the of area's tourism potential through agritourism.

2. Considerations regarding the importance of agritourism in the Mehedinti county area

Agritourism is the activity that transforms rural households in tourist destinations for recreation and education purposes.

In the specialty literature agritourism is defined as: "the activity of reception and hospitality performed by individual or associations of agricultural entrepreneurs and their families using their own enterprise (household, farm) or a rented one such that the performed activity is complementary to the activities related to the land cultivation, forestry and livestock, which must be further considered as main activities" .

Specialists in the field consider agritourism as a segment of rural tourism represented by tourism products that have a direct link with the environment, products or stays of agrarian nature. As a distinct segment within rural tourism, agritourism involves: accommodation in peasant household, consumption of agricultural products from the household and a greater or lesser participation in specific agricultural activities . Agritourism products are offered by agricultural entrepreneurs and their families that are connected and complementary to agricultural activities .

In addition, there are authors that are integrating walks on farms organized for families and schoolchildren, harvesting for own consumption, carts of hay or sleigh rides and overnight stays in peasant households into the agritourism category.

On the other hand, there are specialists who disagree with the idea that agritourism is an extension of rural tourism supporting instead the idea that this is "a freestranding form of tourism because despite of the fact that capitalizes the same rural areas agritourism brings something new namely is introducing the tourist in the peasant activity, allows him to participate, and become an integral part of the household not just a spectator" .

Agritourism is a solution for peasant households that may earn additional revenue in this way. Agritourism contributes to the diversification of households' activities and to the placement of their agricultural products constituting a safety net against the risks existing in the agricultural market. Agritourism appears as an appropriate diversification strategy given that this activity does not require excessive investment in the households' infrastructure. Households pursuing to achieve the diversification of their activities through tourism focus with preference on those activities that can use existing resources to the detriment of those activities which would require additional investment, agritourism being used as a method to obtain additional revenues and to deal with the risks of increasing costs of agricultural equipment and other required inputs . Thus, in Mehedinti county peasant households can practice agritourism by offering those activities already practiced by them at the farm, which will not greatly alter their agricultural production.

What would determine a tourist to choose an agritourism product to the detriment of a "classic" one? The reasons may include the need for a return to nature, the need to remove the effects of stress caused by the anonymity and uniformity of urban congestion by integration in the village community and the wellbeing that this integration provides, the desire to know the cultural and traditional art heritage of an area, the desire to know the farmers simple life and the tranquility of such a life, the desire to consume food prepared using traditional methods and to practice specific peasant occupations .

Failure to implement the agritourism solution in rural households can be avoided by implementing a careful and well-founded planning including the one regarding the involved marketing activity.

Mehedinti County has an adequate framework for carrying out agritourism, archaic activities and folkloric traditions being well preserved, giving it a unique character for tourists coming from urban areas. The rural world can become in this case the main object of tourist attraction. Agritourism can thus contribute to solving specific problems regarding spatial planning policy and the desired balance between town-village.

3. The stage of tourism potential valorization through agritourism in the Mehedinti county area

In addition to the legislative regulatory rules regarding specific tourism activities functionality a number of strategies and programs like Romania National Tourism Master Plan 2007-2026 or the annual tourism marketing and promotion programs were founded in order to stimulate, between other things, the development of agritourism in the Mehedinti county area. Added to these are added the strategies, programs and projects for regional agritourism development such as: Regional Development Strategy 2014-2020; Mehedinti county, Drobeta Turnu-Severin municipality and Orşova development strategies.

So far, in Mehedinti county the following projects were funded in the Regional Operational Programme 2007-2013 and 2014-2020, Priority axis 5 - Sustainable development and promotion of tourism :

- "Theodor Costescu" Cultural Palace and Severin Fortress Rehabilitation;
- Iron Gates Region Museum Complex rehabilitation and valorization as a tourism product;
- Orsova touristic seafront landscaping – Phase II;
- Ponoarele village tourism potential promotion through specific marketing activities and cultural heritage, manmade sights and tradition valorization;
- Svinita village cultural, natural and historic heritage promotion through tourism marketing and strengthening local, regional and national tourism industry. Highlighting the village unique objectives and increasing the number of visitors on short and medium term;
- Drobeta Turnu Severin tourism potential, natural, historical and civilization resources promotion through specific marketing and communication methods aimed at increasing the number of visitors and strengthen local and national tourism with a focus on the Severin Medieval Fortress;
- Danube Gorge - Eşelniţa, objectives with touristic potential unexplored to the true value. Unique European landmarks promotion by means of specific marketing and tourism promotion aimed at increasing with 25% the number of visitors and local and regional tourism development;
- History, genesis and culture in Orşova city;
- Simian island landscape and historical heritage, etc.

Nevertheless, the development of tourism, in general, and agritourism, in particular, is below the level of potential with which Mehedinti county is endowed.

4. SWOT analysis

The strengths are the advantages that the area of Mehedinti county holds in relation to other tourist areas, being represented by the following:

- The concerned area represents a strategic region located on the Serbian border and with access to the Danube River, important communication channel with EU Danube countries thus having a high potential for tourism development;
- The area is characterized by cultural diversity conferred by the presence of communities of Serbs, Czechs etc., and by a rich cultural heritage. Thus, the county population structure in terms of ethnicity is characterized by a rate of 4.11% Roma followed by Serbs (0.4%) and Czechs (0.2%)[1];
- Mehedinti county has important natural resources for tourism development:
  - Mehedinti County's tourism potential is constituted by the impressive landscape formed by the Danube River and its gorge, the landscape diversity of the highlands area, the existence of particular elements of flora and fauna, many of which are recorded in scientific reserves, plus the impressive testimonials of a past millennia, expressed by a number of historical, architecture and art monuments, some unique, by their value and their novelty. Comissioning of the Rhine - Main - Danube Canal has put the county seat, Drobeta Turnu Severin, in direct contact with all the coastal cities from the Black Sea to the North Sea.
  - Drobeta Turnu Severin, through its position at the exit of the Danube River in the defile, but also because of its numerous socio-historical and cultural objectives could be a polarizing center of the Mehedinti tourism industry. Severin`s main tourist attractions are:
    - Trajan's Bridge ruins (built during the Dacian wars fought by Emperor Trajan against Decebal);
    - Castra of Drobeta-Turnu Severin (made in the same period as Trajan's Bridge);
    - The ruins of the medieval church located near the Roman castra;
    - South of the municipality, on the Danube shore, lies the monumental building of the Iron Gate Museum, with sections of history, archeology, ethnography, natural sciences and a great aquarium.
  - County's main tourist areas, outside Drobeta Turnu Severin, are:
    - The Iron Gates I area with the Danube defile, clisura with the Large and Small Boilers, the reservoirs, hydropower and navigation systems, numerous viaducts raised above wild valleys;
    - Orsova Municipality unfolded as an amphitheater on the Cerna bay shore. The city is the gateway to the Danube Clisura defile ("Iron Gates" Natural Park). It has natural beaches on the Danube shore. Together with the Danube Clisura (Boilers, in particular) and Baile Herculane (including the adjacent area) forms a traditional tourism triangle;
    - Simian island - is located downstream of Drobeta Turnu Severin, where the former fortress from Ada-Kaleh island (now under the reservoire waters) was moved;
    - The northern part of the county, characterized by the beauty of the landscape. Here the Baia de Arama city can be found where the Sfintii Voievozi Church can be visited. The church was built in Byzantine style and painted in 17th century. About 4 km northwest of Baia de Arama the Ponoare carsta complex and Topolnita cave (the second largest in the country with an explored length of 10.330 m) can be found;
    - Not far from Baia de Arama is Bala balneoclimateric resort with thermo-mineral waters. Bala's mineral waters are as good as those from Herculane and in some respects even better and powerful, but unfortunately underused;
    - Strehaia area, located about 40 km from Drobeta Turnu Severin, with Strehaia Monastery fortress, built around 1500, the linden forest, and eastward, Gura Motrului Monastery.
    - Natural reservations have a special place in the county. Among these are: Cracul Găioara Botanic Reservation (The Iron Gates Colilia is growing on Cracul Găioara, the only place in the world where it was found), Valea Oglănicului Botanic Reservation, Cracul Crucii Botanic Reservation, Gura Văii – Vârciorova Botanic Reservation, Faţa Virului Botanic Reservation, Dealul Dohomnei Botanic Reservation, Bahna Paleontological Reservation (the karst limestone preserves a 16 million years old fossil fauna), Large and Small Boilers Reservation, Sviniţa Paleontological Reservation.
- The area's rich cultural heritage: churches, monasteries, museums. In this area there are many religious (churches and monasteries dating from different centuries), ethnographic and ethno-folkloric (there are numerous celebrations which are still kept, traditional houses; in Balta there are two ethnographic sites in Prejna and Costești; there is an ethnographic center in Baia Baia de Aramă), and cultural objectives (memorial houses and monuments). There are many villages that are still keep alive the traditions, culture and popular holidays (ethnographic site in the villages of Balta, Prejna, Dâlbocița, assembly watermills from Ponoarele etc.). Also in the Mehedinti Plateau there are many tourism and agritourism guesthouses where tourists can enjoy organic products, benefit from accommodation in traditional houses and can take part, if they want, in household activities (Ponoarele, Isverna, Ilovita, Baloteşti Godeanu). To these are added a number of increasingly popular traditional festivals that take place annually attracting more tourists every year (Nadanova Lilac Festival, Baia de Aramă ,,Munte, munte, brad frumos" Festival, Titerleşti ,,Pe fir de baladă" Folklore and Folk Crafts National Festival, Bala ,,Plaiul Cloşani" Festival, Ponoare Lilac Celebration).

- Special events in the county's rural areas such as: Pojejena - sheep measurement – May 6, Mărțișor Ball (Ilovița, February 28), Drawers Ball (Ilovița, January 31), Village Sons (Ilovița, last Sunday in July) Figs Festival (Svinița), Danube Villages Festival (Svinița, May 1-2) etc.;
- Low industrial pollution of the environment in the scenic beauties area;
- The existence of therapeutic resources;
- Orşova is one of the points through which one of the European Greenways trails passes - Euro Velo Routes, an aspect that contributes to linking the county to other Danube regions, representing an asset in attracting foreign tourists;
- A significant percentage of the Mehedinti county population is employed in agriculture;
- The existence of excess living space in rural households usable for agritourism.
- Mehedinti County weaknesses are the following:
- Natural and human potential is very poorly exploited although it is suitable for the development of tourism products from which border counties can benefit, including those on the Serbian side of the Danube;
- Lack of information centers and tourist maps;
- The tourism infrastructure is underdeveloped as it can be seen from the latest situation provided by the County Statistics Office – Mehedinți:

On the other hand, the net use index of accommodation places in 2015 was 25.1%, 6.2 pp more compared to the same period in 2014[2]. Also in 2015, the arrivals in the establishments of tourist reception increased by 56.3% compared to those recorded in 2014, Romanian tourist arrivals representing 86.0% of total arrivals[3].

- The poor state of the transportation infrastructure. Within the Mehedinti county public roads are measuring 1856 km in length, 374 km of which are represented by national and European roads and 1482 km by county and village roads. The modernization of these roads is low considering that only 38% of them are upgraded.
- Tourist offer is underdeveloped;
- Poor development of the SME sector;
- Low state of preservation of some of the anthropic sights and progressive degradation of cultural heritage;
- Degradation of some of the natural sights due to high human pressure4;
- Lack of a refuse disposal system and use of river basins as the village landfill;
- Mehedinti is Romania's only county with no village connected to a natural gas network;
- Poor promotion of tourism potential, both natural and anthropic;
- High unemployment rate. With an unemployment rate of 10.65%, Mehedinti County occupies the first places among the highest national rates, along with Vaslui and Teleorman.
- The demographic context of the region is characterized by demographic decline, migration from rural to urban areas and an average life expectancy below the national level.
- Mehedinti County is among the areas with the lowest number of inhabitants. The regions's demographic context is the result of several trends that have accelerated over the past two decades - the region's general demographic decline, migration from rural to urban areas, the average life expectancy below the national level. It can be observed not only a constant rate of negative natural increase (each year more deaths were recorded than births) but also a continuous decrease of the birth rate5.

- Lack of skilled labor in tourism and staff fluctuation due to a continuous search for better jobs;
- Limited number of institutions with experience in developing and implementing projects.

Opportunities refer to those elements that can positively influence the valorization of the area's tourism potential. The most important opportunities are:

- The existence of structural and cohesion funds;
- The local government's interest to develop economic relations between Romania and Serbia;
- The local government's interest for tourism development in the area of interest;
- The rural population percentage in the Mehedinti county's total population was 51.21% after the latest census, in favor of rural tourism development;
- The possibility of a relatively simple implementation of hiking trails in the touristic circuit;
- New types of tourism are in the process of development;
- The development of tourism industry capacities and tourism products.

The strongest threats for Mehedinti county area are:

- The risk of not attracting foreign investment due to poor accessibility, lack of utilities, high costs, in favor of external locations;
- Lack of coordination between projects in the area;
- Environmental protection measures at the expense of tourism activity;
- Poor environmental quality in some areas of interest;
- Touristic products' lack of competitiveness;
- The competition of tourist areas in the region, or other regions or countries, with similar tourist offer;
- Insufficient funds allocated for transport infrastructure rehabilitation (especially road infrastructure);
- Inefficient use of funds for local tourism development.

5. Marketing programme for the Mehedinti county tourism potential valorization through agritourism

The marketing programme's main objective is Mehedinti county's tourism potential valorization through agritourism, an objective that can be achieved through strategies that depend on a unitary coordination of efforts and investments for environmental policies implementation and sustainable management in the Danube region. Only in this way, Danube communities can develop through tourism.

Mehedinti county's agritourism development is motivated by the presence of traditional rural settlements, country houses and farms, traditional architecture, folk art, agricultural occupations and folk events in an area characterized by high ethnic diversity with various traditions and habits (Romanian, Serbian, Czechs, Swabians, Roma, Hungarians).

Thus, the main activities to be undertaken within the marketing programme regarding Mehedinti county's tourism potential valorization through agritourism will be represented by:

- national and international market research and database development to which all the organizations involved will have access;
- creating integrated agritourism products/programs for areas with agritourism potential aiming at improving the tourists experience and a slower consumption of resources;
- development of a distribution system for the Romanian agritourism product, in order to facilitate its access to target markets.

Also, short and medium-term measures for Mehedinti county's agritourism development should be:

- organizing meetings for consultation and exchange of ideas, organizing information/presentation seminars and networking and socializing events aimed at establishing a social and economic connection between the local authorities from the area of interest in order to achieve a common project to support agritourism;
- creating a framework for permanent collaboration with the most important travel agencies in the county;
- developing strategies and a program for agritourism development through which the local community will be able to use all types of capital (natural, human, economic, cultural);
- developing a brand for the tourism identification of the area;
- assessment and inventory of all premises and land destined for investment and creating a database with accessible and useful background information for potential investors which may lead to reducing the time spent in the process of land searching for an eventual business;
- establishment of tourist information centers in the Mehedinti county rural and urban areas with tourist vocation;
- setting up consultancy centers and training technical assistance teams to assist tourists, owners of guesthouses and travel agencies;
- organizing fairs, ethno folk and special events that highlight the area's cultural potential;

[5] Report on the socio-economic status of the Mehedinti county in 2015, 2016, the official website of Mehedinți Prefecture, pp. 21, http://www.prefecturamehedinti.ro/uploads/files/COMISII/Raport%20starea%20economico%20sociala%20a%20judetului%20Mehedinti2016.pdf.

- creating magazines, brochures, flyers, tourist maps and illustrated guides with informations about the timing and schedule of events organized in the area and distributing them in info-kiosks, on the internet, tourism fairs and tourist offices;
- valorization of natural and anthropic tourism objectives by attracting investments for new access roads and improving the existing ones;
- tourism promotion with a focus on: the return to nature, knowledge and temporary adherence to membership groups specific of rural areas, active recreation, fresh air and fruits diet, consumption of fresh food from the household host, sports, fishing, hiking;
- investment in infrastructure, restoration, conservation;
- marking access roads for cyclists that lead to recreational areas in the county;
- restoring of existing monuments and introducing them in the touristic circuit;
- development of alternative tourism activities in the rural area, led by the local population and based on local natural and human potential: tourists` accommodation in local farms and active participation in local community life, identifying themselves with it during the stay;
- development and distribution of promotional material for the media (articles, broadcasts), web pages, various brochures, booklets, catalogs, leaflets, posters about the tourist offer;
- participation in specialized domestic and international fairs (as is the International Fair of Rural and Agricultural Tourism, Kielce, Poland or Agri & Slow Travel Expo, Bergamo, Italy), based on a concrete planning;
- promoting specific tourism products which include:

− Agro-entertainment (fruit harvesting, animal care);

− Agro-recreation (camping trips, hiking, cycling tourism, fishing, plant identification and collection, tractor or horse-drawn carts rides);

− Agro-education (enriching tourists' knowledge regarding agricultural and fruit-growing production, from planting a fruit tree to ways to capitalize their products, knowledge about the country life, traditions and celebrations, recipes and ways of preparing them etc.);

− Agro-commerce.

- active use of dedicated web platforms: Portal of EU Strategy for the Danube Region (http://www.danube-region.eu/), Portal of the Mehedinti County (http://www.sejmh.ro/), Mehedinti County Directorate for Culture and National Heritage (http://www.mehedinti.djc.ro/Index.aspx), ANTREC (http://www.antrec.ro), "Danube Boilers" Tourism and Leisure Association (http://www.cazaneledunarii.com.ro), Iron Gates Natural Park Administration (http://www.pnportiledefier.ro/index.html, http://www.facebook.com/pages/Parcul-Natural-Portile-de-Fier/126629447364212?sk=wall), "Camena" Ecological Tourism Association (http://www.camena.ro/, http://www.muntiimehedinti.ro/home.html), Romanian Community in Serbia (http://www.comunitatea-romanilor.org.rs), of social networks and all forms of mutual human contact;
- Affiliation and membership to national and european structures and meetings aiming at attracting relevant stakeholders, sponsors, consortium partners, resource persons (clubs, training sessions, forums): European Greenways Association, European Council for the Village and Small Towns, Naturefriends International, The Association for Tourism and Leisure Education (ATLAS), Danube Competence Center - the Danube region tourism cooperation platform, ACTE – The Association for Culture and Tourism Exchange, ICPDR – International Commission for the Protection of the Danube River, Danube Tourist Commission, ELARD - European LEADER association for Rural Development, VOLUM Federation (The Federation of Organizations Supporting the Development of Volunteerism in Romania).

In this respect, it is necessary to conduct a consultation and advocacy process that include the following activities:

− Organizing meetings for consultation and exchange of ideas with representatives of the County Council, Municipal Council, town halls, Mehedinti county local councils and with County Directorate for Cultural Heritage and Cults;

− Organizing meetings for consultation and exchange of ideas with representatives of the National Association of Rural, Ecological and Cultural Tourism (ANTREC), Eco-Urbi Drobeta focused on the development of ecology and ecological tourism, Mehedinti Association for Tourism Promotion, Pro Mehedinti Association, "Danube Boilers" Tourism and Leisure Association, Iron Gates Natural Park Administration, Environmental Protection Agency - Mehedinti, "Camena" Ecological Tourism Association, representatives of key businesses in the area etc.

− Organization of information and presentation seminars dedicated to all stakeholders;

− Itinerant photographic exhibition with a tourism theme organized in education institutions in the county and outside the county and in public spaces with intense traffic;

− Organizing networking and social events;

− Creating a platform dedicated to an active online promotion of the Mehedinti tourism development project.

6. Conclusions

The marketing programme proposed in this paper represents one of the ways of solving the Mehedinti county economic imbalance through tourism potential valorization.

The marketing programme has as prerequisite complying and promotion of sustainable development encouraged by the current EU concern reflected in the EU Council approval of the EU Strategy for the Danube Region (EUSDR), which created great opportunities for funding and action in the Danube region.

THE PROFILE OF THE ROMANIAN ACCOUNTANT

Cristina Elena BIGIOI[*]

Abstract

Tax and accounting rules are required by law for each company. The accountant has an important role in the life of an enterprise, contributing greatly to the business success. The study aims to identify the benefits, requirements and features specified to apply for a job as accountant. The methodological approach is empirical one. The study take into account the job offers mentioned in December 2016 under one of the most popular Romanian jobs sites.

Keywords: accountant, job, profile, role, Romanian

1. Introduction

Businesses have known for long time continuous development in various fields. The accounting profession has had to cope with this development. Accounting is "the language of business", the accountant providing information related to financial accounting, managerial accounting, tax, payroll, estimating income and expenses.

In terms of professional training, the accountants are forced to refine and adapt their knowledge, especially to legislative changes. In terms of requirements, employers increasingly require well trained people who quickly assimilate knowledge and adapt them to work. On the other hand the labor market in the accounting field is characterized by an imbalance, demand exceeded supply jobs. Thus, the remuneration of the professional accountant experienced some changes, too.

The report from 2016 of International Accounting Bulletin highlighted the decreasing revenues from fees to accounting firms outside the group BIG 4. The analysis of this information by executives and directors from accounting associations concluded that the evolution of technology change the accountants' role. An accountant evolves from a compliance officer to a strategic adviser[1].

Choosing an accountant is particularly important because he is someone who will be with you in your journey to success[2]. An accountant became a partner who cares about the success of clients' business and provides essential support[3]. A study undertaken in 2013 by the accounting software giant Sage highlighted the increasing confidence in the advice business accounting. The relationship with the accountant becomes a partnership not a purely transactional relationship[4].

The Association of Chartered Certified Accountant identified a strong recognition of the valuable contribution of accountants to the running of business and of the key role in helping companies act ethically toward stakeholders[5].

Starting from the ideas mentioned above, this study aims to analyze the requirements for jobs in the accounting field, in order to shape the profile of the accountant in Romania. The recruitment site with the highest number of visitors in the country was chosen as the database for data collection.

The study aims to identify: wage, type of job, the gender diversity, which areas of the country are looking for accountants, if are required foreign languages, if knowledge is tested, which are the accounting software required.

The assumptions of the approach are:

H1: An accountant needs economic studies

H2: There are more chances of employment in the capital of the country.

H3: English is the most requested foreign language.

H4: An accountant is more than a Bookkeeper

H5: It is necessary to have IT skills

2. The journey to become an accountant

Juridical persons in Romania have a legal obligation to organize and manage accounts, according to Accounting Law No 82/1991. Accounting assist in recording transactions for an entity, processing and publishing information related to the financial position and performance of the entity, information with importance for the decision-making process of various types of internal and external users[6].

Accounting can be organized and managed within the entity (through separate department) or outside (with service contract)[7]. In both cases, higher economic studies are required for the person concerned. In addition, in case of outsourcing of accounting, legal or natural person must be authorized, a member of C.E.C.C.A.R (Body of Expert and Licensed Accountants of Romania).

The economic director or chief accountant or authorized person is responsible for the improper application of accounting regulations[8].

To become a chartered accountant member of CECCAR someone must have high economic studies and must go through three stages: maintaining an entrance exam, a probation period of 3 years, supporting an aptitude test on completion of their training[9].

This confirms the hypothesis 1 formulated at the beginning of the approach: H1: An accountant needs economic studies.

For an accounting the liability is high, there must exist economic training and additional training (in case of outsourcing of accounting). Moreover, the legislative changes (with a frequency high enough in Romania) require periodic updating of knowledge.

Human capital is the only component of a company that may undermine its future development from within[10]. It is said that an accountant you climb or you descend the ladder of success.

For a smaller business, an accountant collects data and generates report, but for a larger sized company, an accountant can help as an adviser and financial interpreter[11].

Assisting with corporate strategy, providing advice and helping to reduce costs, improving their top line and mitigating risks, a competent professional accountant is an invaluable asset to the company[12].

Given the changing role of the accountant, the education should incorporate broader managerial capabilities and skills[13].

3. The competencies of an accountant

The accountant can be divided into two categories: bookkeeper and accountant. A bookkeeper is just someone who presents some results after introduce some data in an accounting software. His role is passive. An accountant is much more than it.

A good accountant needs to have a lot of competencies, as follows:

- Accuracy
- Solving tasks before deadlines for help others to respect their own deadline
- Be a good manager of time
- Keeping their managers informed, especially during month-end and year-end closes[14]
- Communication skills to make accounting understandable language
- Professional integrity, accompanied by trust; an accountant without integrity is like a sailor without a compass[15].
- Continuous personal improvement
- Pay attention to details
- IT skills: work is more easier by using a computer, especially using an accounting software and Excel
- Flexibility, especially to legislative changes
- Overview of business
- Proactive attitude by offering efficient solutions as soon as an opportunity arises or a deficiency is found
- Legislative support, differentiated according to business needs[16].

In Romania is hard not to find a bookkeeper. The challenge for an entrepreneur is to find an accountant, and not a bookkeeper[17], someone who is involved in obtaining business success, who identifies potential problems and provides solutions.

Gemius Romania placed this website on the first place in the top depending on the number of visitors[18].

Like reference range, it was selected the period 01 – 31 December 2016. Collecting information for the study was conducted for the jobs referred to "accountant" or "acccounting". The period taken into account can be considered poor in terms of interest in the search for a job given that December is a month of religious holidays and days off. Yet, considering that there is a period of time since the launch of the recruitment advertisement until the final candidate election, placing curriculum vitae in this period takes effect at the beginning of the next year.

The research work involved searching the archive of the recruitment site. From the database were extracted 210 advertisements for jobs in the field under review.

a) Job location:

3 jobs were external application, 10 jobs advertisements (representing 4.76% of all) provided several cities and the rest provide one of others 34 cities in the country.

Given the distribution of jobs by cities, most jobs (95, representing 45.23%) were offered for the capital of the country. This was expected, considering that Bucharest is a great city that offers most opportunities for career development. This confirms the hypothesis 2 formulated at the beginning of the approach: H2: There are more chances of employment in the capital of the country.

In the ranking are situated other major cities of the country. In second place is situated Iasi, with 13 advertisements (6.19%) followed by Cluj, with 12 advertisements (representing 5.71%), Timisoara with 9 advertisements and Brasov with 8 advertisements.

For 14 cities there is one single advertisement. For all other 15 cities there are between 2 and 4 advertisements.

The distribution of the advertisements by county is represented in Chart 1.

b) Types of job:

The types of jobs mentioned in the advertisements are centralized in Table 1.

Table 1. Types of jobs

Title of job	Number of jobs
Accountant	115
Junior Accountant	24
Primary Accountant	20
Chief Accountant	20
Senior Accountant	15
Expert Accountant	6
Accounting Assistant	4
Financial Accountant	3
Accountant Manager	3

c) The used Language

33 advertisements, representing 15.71% of all, are formulated in English, the rest are formulated in Romanian (Chart 2). 9 advertisements formulated in English are mentioned in locations outside Bucharest.

d) Job type

Full-time jobs are the most numerous (197 advertisement, representing 93.80% of all), 4 jobs are part-time, 8 jobs allows full time or part time and just one mention full-time or practice (Chart 3).

Two advertisements were for a job for a determined period.

e) Career level

Most advertisements require a middle level for experience (86). Just once does not require experience. For 7 advertisements the career level is undefined (Table 2).

f) The foreign languages

136 advertisements, which represent 64.76% of all, mention the necessity of knowing a foreign language. As expected, the most requested foreign language is English. This confirms the hypothesis 3 formulated at the beginning of the approach: H3: English is the most requested foreign language.

Other foreign languages often requested are: French, German, and Italian (Table 3).

Table 3. Foreign languages required

g) The salary

No one advertisement mentions the salary, but it was expected. The wage is confidential. For 14 advertisements the salary was framed in one of the preset ranges. Surprisingly, the two advertisements with the salary framed in the best ranges were not for Bucharest (Table 4).

Table 4. The ranges of salary

h) Soft skills

An accountant must know to operate with accounting software. In 84 advertisements the software required are as follows:

Table 5. Software Required

Software	Number of Jobs
ERP (SAP; ORACLE)	36
WINMENTOR	19
SAGA	18
NAV	2
NAVISION	2

NEXUS	2
SUN	2

MICROS	1
WIZCOUNT	1

Source: Author's projections

There are 36 requirements for business-management software (Enterprise resource planning ERP). The most required accounting software are WINMENTOR and SAGA.

These results confirm the hypothesis 5 formulated at the beginning of the approach: H5: It is necessary to have IT skills.

i) Other requirements

For 19 advertisements, category B driving license was required.

Just two advertisements mention that the candidate's knowledge will be tasted through written tests. One of them was a job in a state company, for a management level of experience.

In none of advertisements is not referred to the gender of the candidate.

A study undertaken in 2016 by AFECA[19] has revealed that women are well represented in Romanian profession (77%), along with countries like Poland and Hungary, in contradistinction to France, Dutch and Swiss (15-25%)[20]. These large differences seen on the same continent are closely related to the political and cultural history of Europe. Central and Eastern European countries guarantee legal equality for women[21].

An advertisement requires that the CV contain a photo of the candidate.

The candidate must be a member of C.E.C.C.A.R this means a chartered accountant (required in 8 advertisements).

Master's Degree in accounting is a requirement for 4 advertisements.

Knowledge of International Financial Reporting Standards (IFRS) is a mandatory requirement for 8 advertisements.

One advertisement has the mention about the age of the candidate (between 30 and 40 years).

j) Most requested characteristics

Analyzing the requirements of employers expressed in employment ads analyzed, Romanian accountant must have the following characteristics:

- Higher economic education (142 requirements)
- Communication skills (90 requirements)
- Good knowledge of accounting and fiscal legislation (53 requirements)
- Attention to details (51 requirements)
- Responsibility (50 requirements)
- Analytical skills (43 requirements)
- Respecting deadlines (32 requirements)
- Seriousness (26 requirements)
- Stress resistance (18 requirements)
- Flexibility (16 requirements)
- Results oriented (14 requirements)
- Honesty (14 requirements)
- Team player (10 requirements)
- Rigor (10 requirements)
- Working under pressure (8 requirements)
- Organizational skills (8 requirements)
- Positive attitude (8 requirements)

These characteristics confirm the hypothesis 4 formulated at the beginning of the approach: H4: An accountant is more than a Bookkeeper.

5. Conclusions

The role of an accountant was changed over time, today is not enough just entering data into a computer, but rather providing a support for the management of the company. The accountant becomes a strategic adviser who has the ability to leas the business to success together with the manager. To achieve this goal, are necessary economic knowledge and a continuous improvement of knowledge, especially because in Romania legislation is modified with a great frequency.

According to the requirements mentioned in the job advertisements, the Romanian accountant must know English and have higher education. It's easier to find a job if the experience is middle level. The knowledge of business management software is important. It is possible to earn a good salary, not necessarily in the capital of the country, although the chances are low.

Features based on the analysis of requirements mentioned in employment advertisements show that an accountant should be a trustworthy person. This person must be able to work under pressure, to resist stress and respect all the deadlines.

Moreover, the accountant should have positive attitude and find the best solutions for business. Accountant must manage their time well, since you have to identify potential business problems, to find solutions for them and also update their knowledge all the time. A good accountant is an invaluable asset to the company, but it is a stressful job. It could not be

ANALYSIS OF THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN ECONOMIC VALUE ADDED AND MARKET VALUE ADDED

Kristína Jančovičová BOGNÁROVÁ*

Abstract

Economic Value Added (EVA) is one of the most important modern performance measures. The main difference between EVA and traditional measures is that EVA incorporates both financing costs of debt and equity capital. In addition, EVA includes adjustments that minimize some accounting distortions. EVA and Market Value Added (MVA) provide a more accurate evaluation of the firm's financial performance. This paper involves a case study that analysis the use of EVA in selected Slovak companies. It examines the incremental information of a set of performance measures in the time period of 2010 - 2015, using regression models. Furthermore, we analyse the MVA performance and the relationship between EVA and MVA.

Keywords: Economic Value Added, Market Value Added, financial performance, traditional measures, modern measures

1. Introduction

Copeland et al. define Value Based Management (VBM) as the process of continuously maximising the value of a firm. According to them shareholder value creation is the main objective when applying VBM techniques. VBM is based on discounted cash flow (DCF) concepts. The value of the firm is determined by the present value of its future cash flows. Investing in projects where the return exceeds the cost of capital results in value creation, while investing in projects with returns below the cost of capital destroys value.

Developing performance measures that could be applied to evaluate financial performance and shareholder value creation is of great importance.

Traditional financial performance measures are often criticised for excluding a firm's cost of capital, and are therefore considered inappropriate to be used when evaluating value creation. Furthermore, these measures are based almost exclusively on information obtained from financial statements, and so are exposed to accounting distortions. Despite these limitations analysts and investors still widely apply the traditional measures. On the other hand, as a result of the perceived limitations of traditional measures, value based financial performance measures were developed. The major difference between the traditional and value based measures is that the value based measures include a firm's cost of capital in their calculation. They also attempt to remove some of the accounting distortions.

Proponents of the value based measures present these measures as a major improvement over the traditional financial performance measures and report high levels of correlation between the measures and share returns. In those cases where these measures yield positive values, economic profits are generated, and consequently shareholder value is expected to increase. Negative values indicate the destruction of shareholder value.

A number of different value based financial performance measures have been developed. These include, amongst others, Economic Value Added (EVA), Cash Value Added (CVA), and Cash Flow Return on Investment (CFROI) and other. While proponents of these measures report high correlations between the measures and the creation of shareholder value, a large number of studies have yielded far weaker relationships.

In the first part of the paper two value based measures are identified and discussed. The focus is placed on their theoretical foundations, calculation and interpretation. An overview of existing studies reporting on the relationship between these measures and shareholder value creation is also provided.

The second part of the paper involves the empirical analysis of the measures. It is devoted to the application of the O´Byrne model in order to identify, compare and evaluate the relationship between selected performance measures (earnings, earnings per share and economic value added) and market value added of a company. The analysis was carried out on a sample of selected Slovak companies.

2. EVA and MVA

According to Stewart EVA is an estimate of the economic profit generated by a firm. The difference between an economic and an accounting profit is a capital charge that is levied on the capital provided to the firm. In the case of an accounting profit only the cost of debt capital is included. EVA, however, considers the costs of all its forms of capital (debt, as well as equity)and compensates all its capital providers accordingly.

* Ing. Mgr. Kristína Jančovičová Bognárová, PhD., Faculty of National Economy, University of Economics in Bratislava (email: kristina.jancovicova.bognarova@gmail.com).The paper is a result of the research work within the project VEGA No. V-13-007-00.

EVA is determined by calculating the difference between the cost of a firm's capital and the return earned on capital invested, and multiplying it with the amount of capital invested in the firm.

$$EVA_t = (r - WACC) * IC_{t-1}$$

r = the return on the capital invested

WACC = the firm's after-tax cost of capital

IC_{t-1} = the invested capital at the beginning of period t

EVA quantifies the surplus return earned by the firm. In those cases where a firm is able to earn a return that is higher than its cost of capital a positive value for EVA is calculated. A negative EVA value is calculated when the cost of capital exceeds the return on the invested capital.

Alternatively, the measure can be calculated by comparing the net operating profit after tax with the total cost of capital invested.

$$EVA_t = NOPAT_t - Total\ cost\ of\ IC = \\ = NOPAT_t - (WACC * IC_{t-1})$$

where:

$NOPAT_t$ = Net operating profit after taxes

If a firm is able to earn NOPAT values in excess of its total cost of capital invested it generates a positive EVA figure. However, should NOPAT be insufficient to cover the firm's total cost of capital, a negative value for EVA is calculated.

A company's total market value (MV) is equal to the sum of the market value of its equity and the market value of its debt. In theory, this amount is what can be "taken out" of the company (i.e. when all shares are sold and debt is repaid) at any given time. The MVA is the difference between the total market value of the company and the economic capital. The economic capital, also called invested capital (IC), is the amount that is "put into" the company and is basically the fixed assets plus the net working capital.

$$MVA = MV\ of\ company - IC$$

From an investor's point of view, MVA is the best final measure of a company's performance.

MVA is calculated at a given moment, but in order to assess performance over time, the difference or change in MVA from one date to the next can be determined to see whether value has been created or destroyed. EVA is an internal measure of performance that drives MVA.

The return on IC minus the WACC is also called the "return spread". If the return spread is positive, it means that the company is generating surplus returns above its cost of capital, and this translates into higher MVA.

The link between MVA and EVA is that theoretically, MVA is equal to the present value of all future EVA to be generated by the company.

$$EVA\,MVA = \\ present\ value\ of\ all\ future\ EVA$$

3. Empirical Analysis and Conclusions

Before presenting our own research, the results of the most relevant previous studies are going to be presented.

The relevance of accounting information has already been tested in multiple studies; two studies for the German stock market are Booth et al. and Harris et al. In the USA the question of the valuation relevance of accounting based performance measures has established itself as a major field of research. In the last years EVA has been researched in depths, because EVA supposedly is an innovative approach with a broad following in the business community. Currently the general opinion on the pros and cons of EVA is not unanimous.

Easton, P. Harris, T. and Ohlson, J. observed that EVA is an increasingly popular corporate performance measure one that is often used by companies not only for evaluating performance, but also as a basis for determining incentive pay. Like other performance measures, EVA attempts to cope with the basic tension that exists between the need to come up with a performance measure that is highly corelated with shareholders wealth, but at the same time somewhat less subject to the random fluctuations in stock prices. This is a difficult tension to resolve and it explains the relatively low correlation of all accounting based performance measures with stock returns at least on a year to year basis.

Stewart (III), and Bennett, G. observed that "EVA is a powerful new management tool that has gained growing international acceptance as the standard of corporate governance. It serves as the centerpiece of a completely integrated frame-work of financial management and incentive compensation." In essence, EVA is a way both to legitimize and to institutionalize the running of a business in accordance with basic microeconomics and corporate finance principles. The experience of a long list of adopting companies throughout the world strongly supports the notion that an EVA system, by providing such an integrated decision making framework, can refocus energies and redirect resources to create sustainable value for companies customers, employees, shareholders and for management.

Thenmozhi, M. carried out a study in order to have an understanding of how the traditional performance measures are comparable to EVA, data of three financial years between 1996 and 1999 were chosen from 28 companies. Only 6 out of the 28 companies have positive EVA while the others have negative. The EVA as a percentage of Capital Employed (EVA/CE) has been found to indicate the true return on capital employed. Comparing EVA with other traditional performance measures the study indicates that all the companies depict a rosy picture in terms of EPS, RONA and ROCE for all the three years. The study shows that the traditional measures do not reflect the real value of shareholders and EVA has to be measured to have an idea about the shareholders value.

Ray, Russ observed that the missing link between EVA and improved financials is actually productivity. EVA can be a powerful tool. When properly applied, it allows a firm to ascertain where it's creating value and where it's not. More specifically it allows a firm to identify where the return on its capital is outstripping the cost of that capital. For those areas of the firm where the former is indeed greater than the latter EVA analysis then allows the firm to concentrate on the firm's productivity in order to maximize the value created of the firm. Finally, as investors buy more shares in the firm in order to have more claims on its increased value, they automatically bid up and eventually maximize the firms share price. And as any good capitalist knows, maximizing share price is the name of the game in a free market economy. Thereafter marginal increases in value added can be attained by either decreasing the firms cost of capital or by increasing its productivity.

Harris et al. investigate the relation between market values, stock returns and accounting measures for both Germany and the US. They come to the following results: Increasing the time from one year to three or more years increases the relevancy of earnings. EVA is superior in explaining both absolute market values and market value changes.

Biddle et al. investigate a sample of 773 US companies. They look at the information content of four accounting measures: Net Income, Operating Cash Flow, Residual Income and EVA for both the absolute levels of market values as well as the change of market values over time. Furthermore, they try to assess which part of the EVA calculations has a major impact on the value relevance. According to their results EVA has always a lower explanatory power than Net Income, EVA offers little additional information, as the biggest adjustment, the capital charge is comparatively stable over time.

Authors Bao, B.H., Bao, D.H., Riahi-Belkaoui, A., Fekrat, M.A., and Picur, R.D. are, based on their research findings, of the opinion that the superiority of EVA in relation to traditional financial performance measures is justified.

On the other hand, other studies bring evidence that EVA is not a better indicator of the financial performance of the company than the traditional measures based on accounting profit (eg. Biddle, G.C., Bowen, G.S., Wallace, J.S., Chen, S., Dodd, J.L.).

Concluding, the major result of all above studies is that it remains unclear which performance metric offers superior information, measured by its relevance for explaining stock returns.

The studies carried out by the above mentioned authors examined mostly the relationship of financial performance measures to share price respectively return on share. By contrast, in the next section of this paper, we focus on the MVA and apply the selected model approach to assess the linkage of selected performance measures to MVA.

In order to perform our study, data of 50 selected Slovak companies had to be selected from the following sources: published company accounts, capital market data, and data on ownership structure. The time horizon of this study includes the six years starting from 2010 and ending in 2015.

We applied the O´Byrne model in order to examine the relationship between selected performance measures on the one hand and market value resp. MVA of the sample of companies on the other hand. The selected performance measures were earnings, earnings per share and EVA.

O´Byrne differentiates between positive and negative values of EVA, includes a dummy variable for industries, and includes a correction factor for firm size (logarithm of capital employed). The reasoning is that the capital market values positive and negative results of performance measures differently by and that there are empirically significant firm size effects, which can lead to distortions.

$$MVi,t/Ci,(t-1) = a0 + a1*(X+i,t/ci,t)/Ci,(t-1) +$$
$$+ a2*(X-i,t/ci,t)/Ci,(t-1) +$$ $$+ a3*(ln(Ci,(t-1)) + aj\sum(Ij) + e$$ with

$MV_{i,t}$ market value of company i in year t

$Ci_{,(t-1)}$ capital employed by company i at the beginning of year t

$X_{i,t}$ performance measure per share in year t

$c_{i,(t-1)}$ cost of capital for company i in year t

I_j dummy variable for industry

The results are presented in table 1:

		Earnings	EPS	EVA

	F stat.	54,01 0,00	66,11 0,00	54,28 0,00
	Significance F	0,00	0,00	0,00

In the case of Slovak companies the traditional measure EPS has the biggest explanatory power with R^2 of 40.6%, while the modern measure EVA explained only 35.9% of market value changes of the companies.

Now, we modify the above applied model in the sense that instead of market value, we will examine the relationship of MVA and the financial performance measures, in order to evaluate the value orientation of monitored indicators of financial performance. MVA, in fact, measures the difference between the market value of the company and the value of invested capital (debt and equity). The higher the value of this ratio, the better, because high levels of MVA suggest that the company creates real value for shareholders. Negative MVA value means that the company does lower the shareholder value. It should be stressed that the aim is to maximize MVA and not the market value of the company, because it can be also done by increasing the amount of invested capital. The increase in the value of MVA will only happen, if the capital invested is more profitable than the cost of capital.

$$MVA_{i,t}/C_{i,(t-1)} = a_0 + a_1*(X^{+}_{i,t}/c_{i,t})/C_{i,(t-1)} + +a_2*(X^{-}_{i,t}/c_{i,t})/C_{i,(t-1)} + +a_3*(ln(C_{i,(t-1)}+a_j\sum(I_j) + e$$

$MVA_{i,t}$ market Value Added of company i in year t

When we replaced the market value with MVA, EVA´s explanatory power has increased (from 35.6% to 40.2%) and thus in this model came first in explaining changes in MVA. Earnings´ and EPS´ results have also changed. In the case of EPS it decreased from 40.6% to 24.9%, the decrease in the earnings is less (from 35.7% to 32.8%).

According to the results of the models we came to the conclusion, that in case of selected companies in the analysed time period we can confirm the dominance of a modern performance measure EVA above the two other traditional performance measures in explaining the changes in MVA.

THE ACCOUNTING INFORMATIONAL SYSTEM, ESTABLISHED WITHIN THE STATE TREASURY, AN ESSENTIAL ELEMENT IN SUBSTANTIATING DECISIONS

Claudia Nicoleta GUNI[*]

Abstract

The exercise of the management functions and relationships at the level of the organizations is achieved through the leadership system (or management). The management system of the group represents the assembly of elements of a decision making nature, organizational, informational, motivational, etc. through which it is ensured a greater effectiveness and a maximum efficiency. In the design and implementation of the management system there must be taken into account the specific elements of each entity, particularly the profile, size and structure of the human resources, material and financial, the position of the entity in the national and international economic context, etc.

Keywords*: accounting informational system, decision-making system, management system, informational procedures*

Introduction

The emergence and development of the informational society present in all the areas of economic and social life, therefore including the public sector, marked strongly the informational systems. Thus, the public administration, in the context of our country's accession to the European Union, had to adopt certain functioning measures, especially underthe conditions required by the informational society. The automated part of the informational system is represented by the computer system, whose introduction into the treasury's activity requires and allows the use of modern management methods relieving the specific responsibilities of each component in the territorial unit of the treasury.

Thus, one can define the informational system as a set of methods, procedures, techniques for collecting, transmitting, processing, storing data and information, their analysis basing the decisions to be taken, in our case referring to the State Treasury. Regardless of the characteristics of the entity, the management system comprises several components, namely: the organizational system, the informational system, the decision making system, the management methods and techniques system, other elements of management. The management system can be considered a set of elements of methodological, operational, decisional and informational character joined by causality, but which may also act independently to meet the management process and the management relationship inside an economic entity, considered a system. Component of the managemerial system, the informational system operating within the State Treasury is a useful tool for both the internal management of the institution and for the communication of the financial information to the external users interested.

The Accounting Informational System - Conceptual Approaches

The accounting informational system of an economic entity, defined as the set of human resources and capital in an organization that deals with the preparation of accounting information and also the information obtained by gathering and processing economic transactions, will become increasingly computerized, relying on a continuously increasing computer system.

Thus, the component elements of any informational system, which depend on each other and are constantly working together, are:

- the information entering the system;
- the circuit and the informational flow
- informational procedures;
- the means for handling the information.

Through its content, the information has effects on the ongoing process, effects that can be assessed and compared. Thus, the information can be assigned two types of values:

- of content (by volume) by the multitude of data, texts, documents, graphics requested and provided.
- by utility, associated with the expectancy or the actual gain, calculated as the difference between the outcome of the ongoing process, with and without the information in question. The value of the information is associated immediately with its destination for the control of the ongoing process, for its coordination and decision making.

The general framework IASB highlights the limit generated by the relevant and reliable information, the opportunity. The need for opportunity is manifested in two aspects:

[*] Assistant Lecturer, PhD Faculty of Accounting and Financial Management, "Spiru Haret" University, Constanța (email:borsanclaudia@yahoo.com).

- It is possible that the reporting of information on a transaction to be achieved before all its aspects are known, which would affect its credibility;
- Postponing the reporting of information until all aspects of the transaction are known, has a relevant effect, because the beneficiaries have been meanwhile forced to take decisions.

In this context there is the possibility to transform the opportunity from a limit, in two additional attributes of information:

- the actuality: the ability to present a recent event;
- the precision: the degree of accuracy of information.

The informational circuit represents the path followed by the information between the transmitter and the receiver.

The informational flow is the amount of information conveyed between the transmitter and the receiver on the circuit of information, characterized by certain peculiarities: length, displacement, reliability, cost, etc.

The informational procedures fall into a classic scheme comprising: gathering, processing, storage and dissemination of information. Through the informational procedures there are established: first, the supports of information used; subsequently there is established the sequence of handling information, the operations they support, the models and calculation formulas used.

Reconsidering the role of the accounting informational system in the modern society, determined by the fact that the information is seen increasingly more as the most important resource of social wealth and economic development, determine significant changes in the organizational management.

The Role Of The Accounting Informational System In The Process Of Substantiating Decisions

In the current conditions, the existence of the accounting informational system, which represents the dynamic side of the financial accounting system, connects the leading and the led systems of public institutions, but also connects this and the environment. The computer system, as part of an accounting informational system, plays a central role in facilitating the interaction between the activities of an institution through disclosure of information / data. Without accurate information and reporting systems, organizations can not have appropriate resources for proper management, the government has the responsibility to ensure that the accounting systems, at the level of administrative territorial units, correspond to a unitary framework designed to meet the organization's needs.

The informational system is created based on the data provided by the public accounting within the State Treasury units that must provide data and information in order to allow the construction of a minimal dashboard for the State Treasury management units, at all levels, based on which it can establish measures and actions meant to result in efficiently addressing the problems that they have to solve.

The past and present accounting information which supply the dashboard of each Treasury should allow, above all, the construction of relevant forecasts that are closer to reality at any time of the year, regarding payment needs, on one hand and the possibilities for their coverage with resources, on the other hand.

The processing function of the available data, in order to obtain the information necessary for making and substantiating decisions related to the accounting informational system, represents the starting point in defining the overall structure of the accounting informational system.

The functionality of a performant accounting informational system applies more to the computerized system, presented as a system of inputs and outputs, processed during piloting, being able to affirm that this is the result of the interaction between the three subsystems: operational system, management system and informational system. Accounting must enable the calculation of precise coordinates as to the amount of payments and that of receipts, based on which there have to be drafted the measures for arranging public loans, attribute that, in our opinion, is the cornerstone of the purpose and mission of the accounting information within the Treasury.

The development of the discounted loans is reviewed during this time of year; the picture of economy financing still secures new elements of decor or plays the monetary policy of the previous year.

The information to allow the construction of forecasts in leadership can only be achieved based on methods that take into account: individual approaches, economic outlook, regulatory developments, processed appropriately in order to develop coherent data.

Also, the decisions made in establishing these forecasts vital for "maintaining great balance" must take into account the macrofinancial environment, not to disrupt its normal operation.

The second major objective of the accounting information from the Treasury must be to ensure the integrity and proper administration of public funds that it has in administration. In this regard, the accounting of Public Treasury has to be organized in such a way, as to be able to submit at any time the situation of assets and liabilities of the institution as well as the overall results on the establishment of public resources and their use throughout the financial year on budget components, and within, on beneficiary public institutions

The Informational Flows Created In The State Treasury Units And Their Significance

The accounting and operational informational flows within the State Treasury are organized and operate on three levels, namely:

- horizontally within each unit of the Treasury (Central, county, operational);

- Under the Treasuries within a county, where it forms a small informational pyramid;
- vertically, between the operative Treasuries, on one hand, and the Central Treasury, on the other hand, where it forms an accounting information pyramidal system.

The most dense informational and accounting flows occur in the operational units of the State Treasury, where there are actually performed the basic operations on the establishment and use of public resources.

The informational-operative and accounting flows that are established within an operative Treasury and of a county public accounting office, during the activity that it carries therein, as well as in its relations with the subordinated operative treasuries and the general Treasury. A certain organization and specific tasks towards the existing situation in the districts concerning the State Treasury units are met at the State Treasury units in the Municipality of Bucharest, in the sense that the treasuries of each sector have a degree of independence in many respects towards the Treasury activity and accounting of Bucharest, realizing informational - accounting flows directly with the central Treasury, compared to the existing situation in the relation between the operational treasuries in the counties (municipalities, cities, utilities), on one hand, and the treasury activities and public accounting of the county, on the other hand.

Thus, the treasuries of the sectors of Bucharest have the same relationship of competences and subordination to the central treasury as the Treasury Activity and public accounting of the Bucharest Municipality.

Therefore, within the attributions and functions of the treasuries of Bucharest sectors and the Treasury activities and public accounting of Bucharest Municipality there are twinned together all the duties and functions that the operative municipal, town, village treasuries have in the counties, on one hand, and the treasury and public accounting activities of the county, on the other hand.

Accounting Information System Structures And Their Characteristics

Since by the treasuries within the operational directorates and administrations of public finances run the main financial flows leading to the creation and use of public funds into the economy, it is necessary that the information related to these flows to be significant and to arrive operatively to the major decision makers in the state leadership.

Thus, through the organizational pyramidal system created in the State Treasury, namely the General Directorate of Public Accounting and Management Unit of the State Treasury, on one hand, and the offices of the Treasury and Public Accounting of Bucharest county, of the Bucharest Municipality sectors and the operative treasuries in cities, towns and villages, on the other hand, it is created a complex accounting informational system of indicators that must comply with the requirements of the important decision makers in the economy and society.

In this regard, the State Treasury is created and operates an informational and accounting system of indicators daily, monthly, quarterly and annually.

The daily informational-accounting system consists of:

a) The operative execution of the Treasury Account;
b) The execution account of the state budget in economic profile.

From the daily operative execution results, therefore, complex information and data regarding the structure of the financial resources of the State Treasury, more detailed information being that concerning the state budget (herein the revenues are highlighted on all major taxes and fees) and some less extensive related to the local budget or the cash execution of the budget of the State Treasury.

a) the situation of deposits in the account of the State Treasury;
b) the cash execution of the state budget;
c) the cash execution of the local budget;
d) the implementation of the State Social Insurance Budget;
e) the cash execution of the revenues and expenditures budget of the State Treasury;
f) the situation of the public institutions liquidities;
g) the execution account of the state budget expenditures in economic profile;
h) the cash execution of the local budget expenditures in economic profile;
i) the execution account of the State Treasury budget expenditures, detailed on chapters, articles and paragraphs.

It follows from the above that the monthly accounting information is more numerous than the daily operative one, comprising a larger and more significant number of indicators.

What is also relevant is the fact that, depending on the requirements and needs of the central decision makers, the implementation of the components of the general consolidated budget is more analytical in some forms, on the revenue side, and in others, more analytical on the spending side.

Despite all these distinctions between the "daily operations" of information on the indicators resulting from the accounting of the State Treasury and the "monthly operations" of the accounting information, there should be noted that the indicators from the daily operations are designed such that they can always enable the decision makers to take the appropriate measures to positively influence the process of formation and use of public funds.

Quarterly, the State Treasury units communicate to the General Treasury, through the informational system created, an additional number of indicators and data, from those transmitted through the daily and monthly operations. Thus, quarterly, the territorial treasuries also communicate:

a) The balance sheet of the Treasury;
b) The statement on the implementation of the budgetary expenditures incurred by the state budget;
c) The statement on the implementation of the budgetary expenditures incurred by the State Treasury budget;

Through the annual informational system implemented on indicators that need to be transmitted to the central Treasury concerning the financial flows conducted through the territorial treasuries, there are comprised, in addition to the quarterly indicators described in the previous chapter, also:

a) The situation of liquidities of local institutions;

b) The situation of liquidities of autonomous institutions fully financed from extra-budgetary means through which it is presented more detailed the situation of the liquidities of public institutions, broken down on central, local and autonomous government institutions;

Following all submitted so far, it results that the informational system organized within the State Treasury, first the one daily operated, completed with the monthly one, ensures a complex indicator system, allowing the governing bodies within the General Treasury to establish in advance the necessary measures for shortfalls of public funds, determined by the temporary cash gaps, and of the budget deficit financing.

The quarterly indicators, especially the annual ones, do nothing but record the actually existing situations at some point in the process of formation and use of the public financial resources. If, due to informative quarterly circumstances, from the first, second and third quarters, there can also be taken measures accordingly, the financial-accounting annual information does not allow this anymore, they may possibly constitute important signals, for measures taken accordingly for future periods.

Conclusions

Since the organization of the first units of the State Treasury in 1993, the accounting information on the progress of the financial flows regarding the establishment and use of public funds experienced a continuous improvement, both when we are referring to their content and structure, and also to their degree of efficiency. The content and structure of the accounting information of the State Treasury depend largely on the period to which they refer to, more synthetic in the case of daily, semi decade, monthly reporting and more complex and rich in information if the reports are quarterly and annual.

We remember that the future goals of the Treasury accounting must be primarily those of building up information and indicators able to render as synthetic, truthfully and faithfully possible, the situation of the financial circuits of the Treasury, the decision makers and to a lesser extent that of control and rectification. We consider that the responsibility, especially in terms of resource outflows through cash payments, that the authorizing officers order, to remain to a larger extent their task.

It is unlikely that an official of the Treasury to have a more complex degree of understanding of things, than a director or chief accountant of a public institution, in order to decide which expenditure is legal, appropriate or economical and which is not.

Based on the data provided by accounting regularly and mandatory monthly, quarterly and annually, for their own needs and for the Central Treasury, the operative treasuries and the County Department, draw execution statements regarding the financial flows developed for the component budgets of the general consolidated budget.

The accounting of the State Treasury is the main database for the whole informational system of the Treasury, therefore, by the way it is organized and managed, largely depends the veracity and, ultimately the effectiveness of the data reported through the informational system of the State Treasury.

In the current conditions, the existence of an accounting informational system, which represents the dynamic side of the financial accounting system, makes the connection between the leading and the led systems within the public institution, but also between this and the environment. The computerized system, as part of an accounting informational system, plays a central role in facilitating the interaction between an institution's activities, by sending information / data. Without information and accurate reporting systems, the organizations can not have the appropriate resources for proper management.

1. Introduction

The recent history of Romanian accounting is characterized by instability in seeking the best solutions to align to European and / or international accounting system. This research focuses on presenting that situation wich are in the areea of disconnection between accounting and taxation about fixed assets.

In the early 1990s, accountancy was dependent upon taxing, which was exerting a significant influence on accounting and on the approach to the recognition and measurement. Accounting rule was poor, so it was almost exclusively consisting in recording mode of economic and financial operations. "The lack of formal solutions to solve specific accounting problems were an area of freedom available for accountants, space in which to exercise their professional judgment. In this way was tested the creativity, is checked perseverance in the study of other rules and adapting to their needs"[1].

In a research study on normative type concerning changes that occurred in the accounting regulations in Romania[2] in the last ten years, the authors concluded that "at present, in Romania, accounting and taxation is disconnected, only barrier left to overcome in custom accounting practitioner to think in terms of economic transactions tax ".

Although formally accepted, disconnecting between accounting and taxation, in the implementation process continues to face many difficulties. It can see great progress, sometimes unexpected, followed by recovery and reinterpretations, as noted G. Popescu3.

But there remains an artificial dependency between taxation and accounting, maintained by the practice. And we refer to situations in which, although there are accounting rules, it choose the taxation rule to the detriment of accounting one, for several reasons: convenience, saving time and administrative costs. An example of this is the depreciation: accounting rules may differ significantly from fiscal rules, which has the effect of keeping the two records amortization: accounting (in the accounting records) and tax records (in a special register for this purpose).

Taxation has also passed through many changes in the last twenty years. Some of the changes were dictated by state fiscal policy, by the political interests of various parties in power, and some of integrating, in 2007 the European Union. All changes related to harmonized taxation had a direct impact on each category of taxpayers, individuals and businesses, and from an accounting viewpoint changes confirms that all plans must be made for the image correlation both fiscal and accounting statements financial statements to reflect reality and to be comparable at both micro and macro level.

[3] Gheorghe Popescu, Adriana Popescu, Cristina Raluca Popescu - Imaginea fidelă versus fiscalitate în contabilitatea românească a anului 2006- editura Gestiunea, Bucureşti, 2006.

regarding their true image, M. Ristea[4] underlines the fact that the conformities with the provisions from accounting regulations do not exclude the presence of some liberties.

The presence of several options in the accounting referential, namely wide varieties of accounting policies, as well as a variety of assessment techniques, can sometimes lead to serious consequences on the decision-making process. The option of the company management for one of the many treatments and accounting policies creates implicitly the possibility to deliberately choose the treatment or policy that meets the interests of the entity, which does not always converge to the accurate image but rather to a conventional one. Thus, V. Munteanu and M. Zuca[5] believe that it is possible that a distortion of the quality of financial information to result from this, generating uncertainties in relation to the consistency and comparability of the information intended for users.

The utility of accounting policies[6] „results from practical reasons, from the need to establish the development conditions of certain transactions that have an impact in accountancy and finally from the fact that accounting information is the basis of decisions taken by administrators and shareholders".

Although considered from the start like a worthless busywork, the usefulness of presenting accounting policies like a manual has been demonstrated in time. It has been shown to have a practical role to contribute to the economy of time especialy when accounting personnel is changed, for example, in addition to the stated purpose of contributing to presenting a true and fair view of the financial position and earnings.

As emerges from the above, the accounting policies affect the level of the outcome and there should be a guarantee that the entity has not turned to accounting manipulations in order to increase profits. Such a state of things is improved for companies that are required to audit their annual financial statements.

2.2 The fiscal policies

Fiscal policies represent a set of decisions, choices and actions at company level with the objective to achieve an optimal fiscal cost that matches the company's aspirations.

At company level, fiscal policies represent the concrete manner in which specific instruments and techniques are used to achieve the objectives of fiscal management. If, for accounting purposes, the entities are subject to accounting rules in order to present an accurate image of the financial position, the outcome as well as the modification of the financial position, from the fiscal point of view, they are subject to fiscal rules existent in the moment of calculating income taxes and taxes.

Fiscality acknowledges some of the principles, methods and rules stipulated by the accounting regulations. Without covering the subject, we are referring to the principle of the permanence of methods, the principle of matching expenditures with revenues, stock assessment methods when leaving the inventory, etc. But there are situations where it is developing its own applicable methods and rules for the calculation of income tax, such as recognition and depreciation of tangible assets, the recognition of revenue and expenditure, providing stimulants or tax incentives, etc. Throughout this paper we shall largely refer to these differences between fiscal and accounting rules and methods.

2.3. Accounting rules on tangible assets

Basic problems framed in engaged relations between accounting and taxation regarding fixed assets refers to: recognition, initial measurement, subsequent measurement and amortization.

Fixed assets, also known as tangible assets or property, plant, and equipment (PP&E), is a term used in accounting for assets and property that cannot easily be converted into cash. The fixed assets represent single or the complex of objects utilized independent in business entity in the production of goods or services, for rental to others or for administrative purposes. Is expected to use for more than one accounting period.

In order for an asset to be recognized in the financial statements, it must follow the definition: Asset is a resource controlled by the entity as a result of past events and from which future economic benefits are expected to flow to the entity.

Before a fixed asset is recognized in the financial statements, the following recognition criteria ought to be met:

- The inflow of economic benefits to entity is probable.
- The cost/value can be measured reliably.

Initial evaluation of the tangible assets fall in the general rules for evaluation. The exception is where it is necessary setting up provisions for decommissioning of fixed assets. They are included in the value of the goods that require substantial costs from disassembly and ecologising of the site as these costs should be covered by economic entity during the economic benefits are obtained from the exploitation of those goods.

Subsequent evaluation refers to the subsequent expenditure and evaluation to reflect in the financial statements at cost or revalued amount.

Subsequent expenditure that can be made regarding fixed assets can be grouped into two categories:

− Costs incurred in order to maintain the performance of the asset, namely expenses for repairs and maintenance asset. This do not add to its carrying amount, they will be treated as period costs;

− Costs incurred in order to increase the performance of asset by improving or its performance, or by reduce costs. They are termed modernization expenses and are recognized as a component that increases the carrying amount of the asset.

In practice there is a certain difficulty to make difference between the maintenance and improvement expensis for a fixed assets.

The decision on how to recognize such subsequent costs have effect on the financial position or on the performance of an economic entity and may constitute an economic strategy with effects on the result.

Revaluation is an alternative for presentation of a tangible asset in the balance sheet at choice with the presentation at cost. In a previous study we presented revaluation rules and a case study whose purpose is the revaluation.

Amortization

Amortization is the allocation of the depreciable amount of a fixed asset over the estimated life.

An overview of accounting depreciation is shown in the table below[7]:

Accounting depreciation of fixed assets
Tangible assets are assets that: - Are held by an entity for use in the production of goods or services to be leased to third parties or used for administrative purposes and - Are used for a period longer than one year.
The assessment base is: - acquisition cost for bought goods; - production cost for goods produced in the entity; - contribution value determined by an expert assessor for property obtained as a contribution to capital; - market value or fair value for assets received free of charge or plus to the inventory found;
The assessment base can change with: - including in depreciation of value of the costs after putting into service of an asset when they improve operational status of the asset in comparation with the initially estimated performance of that asset; - amortizable value may be decreased if the utility of an asset or group of assets is permanently altered as a result of moral damage or wear; - revalued value, in case of application for revaluation treatment.
Useful life is determined by economic life.
Useful life can change: - After revaluation; - May be reviewed
Not amortized: land
It amortized and: - Investments for arrangement of lakes, ponds, land and other similar works.
It amortized: - Investments to tangible assets leased, on the lease duration. On expiry of the contract value of the made investment and the corresponding depreciation gives to the property's owner
Depreciation method: - The linear method; - Degressive method; - Accelerated method; - Method per unit of product.
It is necessary to use the same method of depreciation for all assets of the same nature and to have identical terms of use.
It is also amortized - Development costs are amortized over the contract period or duration of use - Costs of setting up are amortized over a maximum period of five years, if the entity chooses not to recognize them in period's costs. - Goodwill is amortized, usually within a period not exceeding five years. - Patents, licenses, trademarks, rights and other similar assets are amortized over their expected use by the entity holding them.

2.4. Taxation rules of tangible assets

The declared purpose of this paper is to put together bought tax and accounting provisions and, in particular, to highlight which are the necessary and compulsory tax documents for fixed assets.

In taxation, the principle "guilty until proven innocent" is applyng. That means that responsibility to know the Fiscal Code is an obligation "sine qua non" for taxpayers.

Thus, there is in low the principle that "no one can excuse invoking ignorance of the law" ("Nemo censetur ignore legem").

Based on these considerations, we found it necessary to make a summary of the fiscal obligations that have economic entities on tangible. This synthesis can provide to a company a basis for strong arguments in discussions with tax authorities that can prevent an aggressive approach of them.

2.4.1. Amortization.

In the acceptation of the Fiscal Code, the concept of asset is used to define any property, which is held for use in the production or supply of goods or services, to be leased to third parties or for administrative purposes, if it has a normal duration more than one year and a value greater than the limit established by Government decision.

In fiscal terms, we can define amortization as a recovery by deductions of acquisition, production, construction assembly or improvement assets costs from the result. Fixed assets are differentiated in amortizable fixed assets and unamortized fixed assets.

At the entrance in the entity of a fixed asset it will be drawn up a sheet of the fixed asset in order to record tax depreciation. In the context of disconnection between accounting and taxation, a company can choose different depreciation methods and economic life for accounting purposes, over those chosen for tax purposes. In this situation, the resulting differences will be highlighted through the "Register of tax recording".

Fiscal depreciation of fixed assets
Depreciable fixed assets are represented by any tangible which meets the following conditions: - Are owned and used in the production, supply of goods or services to be leased to third parties or for administrative purposes; - Have a fiscal value higher than the limit established by Government decision; - Have a duration of use more than one year.
By exception, if an item of tangible asset has a fiscal value less than the limit established by Government decision; the taxpayer may choose to deduct costs or to recover these costs by depreciation deductions.
The assessment base is fiscal value represented by: - acquisition cost, - production cost, - market value of assets gained free of charge or provided as contribution, the entry in the property taxpayer Fiscal value includes accounting revaluations.
The assessment base can change with: - the later costs will be included in asset cost, if this leading to higher economic benefits - Replacing the initial fiscal value with revalued value, only if it is not lower than the entry value.
The normal operating period – from Catalog
The normal operating period can not be reviewed (change).
Not amortized: - Land, including forests; - Paintings and works of art; - Goodwill; - Lakes, ponds and lakes that are not the result of an investment; - Public goods financed from the budget; - Any asset that does not lose value over time due to use, according to the rules; - Own holiday homes, housing protocol, vessels, aircraft, cruise ships, other than those used for his income.
It amortized and: Land arrangements, linear over a period of 10 years
It amortized: - Costs of investments to fixed assets leased, rented or leased by the management who made the investment, during the contract or during normal use, as appropriate.
Depreciation method: - In case of construction applies linear depreciation method; - In case of technological equipment, machinery, tools and plants, as well as computers and peripherals thereof, may opt for linear depreciation method, degressive or accelerated; - In case of any depreciable asset, can opt for linear or degressive depreciation method. - Per unit of product for exploitation of mineral substances useful; - Vehicles can be amortized and depending on the number of kilometers or number of operating hours provided in the manuals.
It is necessary to use the same method of depreciation for all assets of the same nature and having identical terms of use.
It is also amortized * using linear method during the contract period or useful life of: - Costs related to the acquisition of patents, copyrights, licenses, trade marks or factory - Other intangible assets recognized for accounting purposes, - Development costs which are recognized as intangible assets from accounting point of view • linear, over a period of three years - Cost of acquisition or production software. • Degressive or accelerated depreciation method. - For invention patents
Not amortized: - Costs of setting; - Goodwill,

As we can be see from the table, between accounting and fiscal treatment there are asymmetries at all levels: elements that are subject to depreciation, depreciation methods, the possibility of revision, revaluation. Perhaps for this reason, the accounting rules and fiscal rules come to meet the need of specialists with very clear specifications about depreciation.

2.4.2. Adjusting of capital goods' VAT

The adjustment is required for capital goods because one must take into account that these goods are, by definition, used by the taxable person for a number of years and that the VAT tax deductment for these goods is allowed only on the condition that they are used for operations which give a deduction right.

Capital goods include all fixed capital goods, as well as transformation and improvements of fixed assets/ parts of fixed assets, should they exceed 20% of the value, excluding maintenance and repairs. Fixed assets are considered capital goods regardless of whether they are recorded as inventory or fixed assets.

The VAT adjustment represents the correction of the tax deduction right, either by the annulment of the right exercised at the moment of acquisition/construction/improvement of goods, or by exercising this right after the acquisition/construction/improvement of goods, if it was not exercised initially.

The person has to maintain a record of the capital goods which are the object of the VAT adjustment, which would allow for a control of the deductible value and any adjustments made. This record needs to be kept for a period starting from the moment when the tax on the acquisition of the capital good becomes demandable and it ends after 5, or respectively 20 years after the end of the period during which the deduction adjustment can be solicited.

Adjustment periods are differentiated depending on the type of capital goods, thus:

- 5 years for capital goods, other than fixed assets;
- 20 years for fixed assets, including transformation or improvement of fixed assets, should the costs exceed 20% of the value.

When to conduct a VAT adjustment?

a) The deduction adjustment is performed for capital goods when they are used, by the taxable person, for:

- Either partially or entirely for purposes other than their economic activity;
- Operations which do not give a tax deduction right;
- Operations for which the tax deduction is different than the initial deduction.

b) In situations when elements included in the calculation for the tax deduction are changed;

c) In situations when the deduction right for a capital good was limited, partially or in totality, and is used in an operation which allows for a deduction. For deliveries of goods, the additional value of the tax deduction is limited to the value received for the delivery.

The adjustment is done only once or once per time period:

A. The adjustment is performed only once for the entire remaining adjustment period, including the year during which the destination of the good is changed, when:

a) The destination of the capital good i is changed;

b) A capital good, whose deduction right was limited, partially or in totality, is the object of a delivery which allows for a tax deduction;

c) The capital good no longer exists, unless:

- It can be proved that the capital good was the object of a delivery which allows for a tax deduction, or
- The capital good has been destroyed.

From a fiscal perspective, the VAT adjustment will be declared by using the VAT expense account form, code 300, with a minus sign at row 31, called "Pro rata adjustments/Adjustments for capital goods". Furthermore, it will be recorded in the capital goods register, which must be kept for a period starting from the moment when the tax, for the acquisition of the capital good, is eligible and ending 5 years after the end of the period during which a deduction adjustment right could be exercised. This is to permit the control of VAT deductible and adjustments. Any other records, documents and journals concerning the capital goods must be kept as well, for the same period.

B. When the pro rata changes, the adjustment is performed for more than one financial period. The steps for this are the following:

a) The initial tax deductible is divided by 5 or 20;

b) The result from pt. 1 is multiplied with the definitive pro rata for each one of the subsequent 4 or 19 years;

c) The tax deducted initially, according to the definitive pro rata, is divided by 5 or 20.

The results from pts. b and c are compared. Any difference between them represents the adjustments which need to be made and which will be recorded in the regularization of the tax expense account of the last period of the fiscal year.

2.4.3. The file of transfer prices

Transfer prices are the prices for which goods or services are transacted between affiliated companies, part of the same group.

These prices, according to the law, must be set at market value, as the transaction would be made between companies with no connection between them.

But in practice this never happens, in the sense that the prices are often designed to favor the tax interests of the group (as few taxes to be paid).

The solution found by the legislature in order to counteract this disadvantaged situation for the budget consisted in request of compiling a dossier of the transfer prices to show how it obtained the amount of that transaction's prices and demonstrating observance of market price.

The file of the transfer pricing is an important instrument of tax administration for the control of profits movement in other more favorable jurisdictions, it is necessary to demonstrate that prices are at the level of the maket.

A thorough process for preparing a file of the transfer pricing will bring value to the company.

The positive aspects arising from a much better understanding of the business in Romania and also of the transactions / processes from the Group, of the market in which the company operates, the manner where it acts the competition and, most importantly, the preparation of a file transfer pricing may lead to the identification of tax optimization solutions.

The obligation to prepare annual the transfer pricing file belongs to entities of large taxpayers if they carry on transactions with affiliates with a total annual value, calculated by adding the value of transactions with all affiliated persons excluding VAT, higher or equal to any of the tresholds of significance below:

- 200,000 euros for interest earned / paid for financial services;
- 250,000 euros for transactions or services received / rendered;
- - 350,000 euros in case of the transactions on purchase / sales of tangible or intangible assets.

The ceilings are calculated according to the BNR exchange rate for the last day of the fiscal year and are associated with the transactions performed with affiliated persons carried out since 2016.

The transfer pricing file will NOT be requested and is not made:

- From the entity that owns an advance price agreement, for transactions and periods covered by advance pricing agreement issued by ANAF; or
- From the transactions for which it was issued a decision of adjusting / estimating the income or expense of any affiliated person.

A person is affiliated if her relationship with another person is defined by at least one of the following cases:

a) a natural person is affiliated with another natural person if these are husband / wife or relatives up to the third degree inclusive;
b) a natural person is affiliated with a legal person if the natural person owns, directly or indirectly, including holdings of affiliated persons less than 25% of the value / number of shares or voting rights of a juridical person or if effectively controls legal person;
c) a juridical person is affiliated with another juridical person if at least it holds, directly or indirectly, including holdings of affiliated persons less than 25% of the value / number of shares or voting rights in other juridical person or if controls in fact that juridical person;
d) a juridical person is affiliated with another juridical person if a third person owns, directly or indirectly, including holdings of its affiliated persons, less than 25% of the value / number of shares or voting rights in both the first juridical person, as well as the twice, or if effectively controls those businesses.

It is considered that a person effectively controls a juridical person if it is established that both, factually and legally, by using information and / or documents, the administrator / management staff has the ability to decide on the business of the juridical person concerned, by signing transactions with other juridical persons wich are controlled by the same manager / senior staff or that the directors of the juridical person is shareholder or administrator in the juridical person.

The deadline for preparation of the transfer prices folder is the legal term for submission of Statement 101 regarding profit tax, namely:

- 25 February for taxpayers who earn mainly income from cultivating cereals, industrial crops and potatoes, horticulture and viticulture (or 25 of the second months from the end of the adjusted fiscal year);
- 25 March for other entities (or 25 of the third month since the closure of the changed fiscal year).

These entities have the obligation to present by demand of the tax authorities, during the course of a tax inspection, transfer pricing documentation. Moreover, transfer pricing file can be requested by the tax authorities outside a tax inspection actions.

The deadline for making available the transfer pricing file shall not exceed 10 calendar days from the request, but not earlier than 10 days from closing date for the preparation.

3. Conclusions

As shown in the study of accounting and fiscal policies, as well as the relation between accounting and fiscality, the elements that can generate differences between these two areas are the following: acknowledgement and measurement, depreciation and implicitly the taxation of profit.

Any difference between the accounting policies adopted by the company and the fiscal policies must be amended accounting-free. We must not let the fiscal policies influence us when choosing the accounting policies even though this would mean less work.

Robert Bricker has remarked in an article (R. Bricker, Toward understanding academic research. Accounting, CPA Journal, American Accounting Association, February 1993) the too narrow horizon of accounting practitioners, the removal of the theory by practice. Our opinion on this subject is that this removal is "encouraged" by the fact that an approach of the accounting theory in terms of fiscal rules is easier, requires less time, effort and resources. This inevitably leads to a limitation of satisfying the users' needs of financial and accounting information. Therefore, accounting and tax research must be combining the information obtained as a result of theoretical research with information from economic reality.

But there are many problems that an accountant is forced to face and largely state they are caused by excessive bureaucracy, the greater the number of laws that come into amending the Tax Code and accountants who make trouble.

As a general conclusion we can consider without reserves that significant progress was made in Romania regarding accounting and taxation as well as regarding the disconnection of taxation from accounting. This process of perfection of the accounting and fiscal system needs a special attention in the future because on an international and European plan, the mentioned fields are very dynamic, fact that also influence the national environment in the conditions in which business doesn't know boundaries and its effects, favourable or not, spread very quickly.

THE INFLUENCE OF MONETARY POLICY ON INVESTMENT DECISION IN THE EURO ZONE

Valentin Mihai LEOVEANU[*]
Anca BRATU[]

Abstract

The paper aims to highlight and analyze the main theoretical and practical aspects regarding the relationship between investment and monetary policy, as monetary policy decisions had a greater or lesser relevance on investment decisions. First, the authors make a short review into the theoretical analysis of interconnections between money and investments, and then they try to reveal how the monetary policy influences the investment decisions through the transmission mechanism channels. The effect of monetary policy measures on investment decision is followed by the authors on three levels of analysis: the selection of investment projects, the choice of sources of financing and the measurement of risk.

Keywords: Monetary policy transmission mechanism, capital budgeting, cost of capital, investment decision.

1. Interconnection between monetary policy and investments

In the economic sense, investments can be defined as total expenses for the accumulation of capital goods by creation, modernization or replacement of fixed assets in order to obtain future cash flows. This definition highlights the feature of certainty of the investment expense made today against the character of uncertainty in obtaining future cash flows.

In this regard, there should be made delimitation between investments in real assets and investments in financial assets. While the first helps to increase investor wealth, others express how it finances first and reflect the contribution of capital providers (shareholders or creditors) to their creation. This paper refers only to investments in real assets.

From a macroeconomic perspective, the investments are a component of GDP in aggregate demand, so they have a direct and immediate impact on it, in that an increase in investment increases GDP, other things being the same (ceteris paribus). Moreover, since income (GDP) is an important determinant of consumption, revenue growth will be followed by an increase in consumption, so that there is a positive feedback between consumption and income through investments.

Due to this mechanism, imports will increase and, as a result, will grow also investments based on equipment, machinery and foreign technology. Thus this will conduct to an increase in real interest rates which in turn depends on the deliberate choice of the central bank to increase or nominal money supply. Therefore, increasing the real interest rate is an inflection point leading to compression of investment, which in turn hampers GDP growth.

Through their short and violent fluctuations, investments are particularly an important economic variable of the business cycle. During economic expansion, investments grow at a much faster pace than consumption or GDP, regardless of interest rate movements. In contrast, on inflexion points of the economic situation, the influence of interest rates on investment is significant. During peak growth, the significant increase in interest rates would multiply disadvantageous the cost of credit for investment, reducing their dynamics. Investments often reach climax sooner than GDP, triggering a negative multiplier of consumer income and thereby stimulating the economy to go through a downturn.

In times of depression, the emergence of low interest rates on the credit market is a welcome thing for companies, which in combination with any positive expectations regarding the economy going, can cause an increase in the low level of investment during the recession. On the other hand, investments in machinery and equipment may know, in contrast, a decline as economic recovery leads to the use of existing capital, not fully untapped.

In analyzing the interconnections between money and investments, it is necessary to define monetary policy. Component of the mix of stabilization policies, monetary policy is an economic policy by which the monetary authority of a country controls the supply of money in the economy and which is used to promote certain endpoints such as price stability, growth and employment. Although most economists consider that monetary policy has a major impact on macroeconomic performance, there are significant differences in terms of decisions and actions to be taken that reflect a number of disagreements on economic policies, expressed through three macroeconomic models. The models chosen to represent economic structures that constrain monetary authority in choosing its policy focus on inflation, unemployment, income distribution and growth, whereas, potentially, monetary policy affects all (Palley, 2007).

The Neoclassical economic model (Palley, 2007) dominated thinking about macroeconomics and monetary policy to the financial crisis in 2007. This model considers that monetary policy controls inflation through nominal interest rate, which determines the nominal rate demand growth. In this context, monetary policy may have an unanticipated short-term impact on inflation, unemployment, income distribution and economic growth. Anticipated monetary policy affects inflation in the long term. Unlike unanticipated monetary policy, anticipated monetary policy is characterized by that monetary authorities should pursue an objective of stabilizing the price level and a rule of steady growth in money supply.

The model considers inflation as a negative factor, as "bad" and therefore monetary policy aimed price stability (zero inflation) to avoid uncontrollable inflation developments that can entice employees and companies in making inefficient decisions on labor and investment. Where deflation becomes a problem due to low nominal interest rates and there is also uncertainty about the impact of monetary policy on aggregate demand, then monetary policy will choose a target of positive inflation to protect the economy from the emergence of deflation (Palley, 2006). This seems to be the current thinking of central banks both in the US and in Europe, where two percent inflation target for monetary policy has become the norm.

The Neokeynesian model was dominated economics and economic policy decisions from early 50s to late 70s and it is now a theoretical framework for the study of inflation and the business cycle of most central banks in the field of modeling. The implications are that monetary policy can impact both on the short and on the long term the unemployment, the real wages, the income distribution and the capital-labor ratio. Their long-term value depends on the size of the portfolio substitution between money and capital goods, in response to inflation. However, monetary policy can not influence the rate of long-term growth and its impact in the short term on real wages is negative, so that optimal monetary policy depends critically on the preferences of policy makers on inflation and unemployment.

The Postkeynesian model analyses the microeconomic fundamentals differently from Neokeynesian model (Palley, 2007), although it reaches some similar conclusions. In this model, the monetary policy not only influences inflation, but it affects, too, unemployment, real wages and profit rate and growth rate. This is why monetary policy is considered to be so important. At high rates of unemployment, the only cost of expansionary monetary policy is higher inflation. However, when the unemployment rate drops there may be a compromise between higher wages and lower unemployment than higher inflation and lower growth, a potentially unfavorable situation. The shapes of the profit rate and the growth rate functions are important, and these in turn depend largely on the wage curve shape. It seems the curve wages, the profit rate function and the growth rate function are relatively flat, which indicates the likelihood compromise between unemployment and growth (Palley, 2007).

2. Transmission mechanism of ECB monetary policy

As an EU institution, the European Central Bank (ECB) is the monetary authority of the single currency zone in Europe (Euro zone). ECB is the heart of the Eurosystem - the central banking system of the euro area that includes also the national central banks (ECB, 2016a).

Unlike the Federal Reserve (formed by twelve regional central banks of U.S.A.) and Bank of England (the central bank of the United Kingdom) who have more statutory objectives than one, the main objective of ECB is to maintain price stability as essential pillar for economic growth and job creation – two of the European Union's objectives (Article 127 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union).

The ECB has also specific tasks in banking supervision, banknotes emission, statistics collecting and processing, macroprudential policy and financial stability as well as international and European cooperation (ECB, 2016a).

The ECB main body of decision taking is the Governing Council having as objective keeping inflation below, but close to, 2% over the medium term. In order to achieve its primary objective, the Governing Council bases its decisions on a two-pillar monetary policy strategy and implements them using its operational framework (ECB, 2016a).

The ECB's monetary policy strategy is inflation targeting and based on the definition of price stability as a year-on-year increase in the Harmonised Index of Consumer Prices (HICP) for the euro area of below 2%. The implementation of ECB inflation targeting strategy is made by a set of monetary policy instruments explained in the General documentation on Eurosystem monetary policy instruments and procedures (ECB, 2016b).

The process through which monetary policy decisions affect the economy in general and the price level in particular is named the transmission mechanism (ECB, 2016c).

Considering a functional perspective, there are two stages of monetary transmission. In the first stage, monetary policy measures have an impact on various segments of financial markets, which is reflected in the adjustment of market rates and asset prices, in exchange rates and other financial conditions (e.g. maturity structure). In the second stage, these changes alter the propensity to consume of the economic agents and thus they affect the value of assets and incomes. In the latter segment there is an important way in which monetary policy affect the investment behavior of firms. Private investment is a highly volatile component of aggregate demand, having an important role in economic growth and employment.

Monetary policy is essentially related to the real economy by the interest rate channel affecting all asset prices, the net value of balance sheet items, as well as banks' lending behavior. An important feature of the traditional interest rate channel is the primary focus on real interest rates rather than nominal rates and the role of long-term interest rates.

Short-term interest rates are considered the determining factor in this process. In fact, these interest rates perform three distinct functions: 1. affects the present value of net benefits over time through the discount rate applied in investment selection; 2. determines the cost of financing by bank loans and the rate of return demanded by shareholders, and 3. strongly influences the economic climate, both as regards financial markets and real goods and services markets.

Besides the interest rate on short-term influencing decision-making firms, household and governments, there is a range of interest rates on different maturities that are configured according to the monetary policy interest rate affecting debt management decisions. As aggregate demand is determined by long-term evolution of real interest rates, the term structure of interest rates becomes an important role in making monetary policy effective starting from the monetary policy interest rate. Indirect influence of the central bank on long-term interest rates stems from the fact that these rates are set by market participants as a weighted sum of the expected short-term interest rates, over which the monetary authority acts directly. Bond yields are determined by the offset component of inflation demanded by investors for holding these long-term instruments. Thus it is performed the structuring of term interest rates from those on long-term to those on short-term. In this way, the yield curve, although it relates only to fixed income instruments but with high share in the financial market, is significant for the entire loan market.

The influence of the interest rate channel on the economy can be revealed as follows. A reduction of monetary policy interest rate lowers interest rates on short-term market, so it is expected to increase investment. Whereas cumulative investments increase the capital stock and open the way to improve production conditions. Production capacity, productivity potential, cost efficiency and quality of production will rise to the extent that the investments were targeted and implemented. As a result, export competitiveness will increase, and, thus, employment will increase.

Regarding another component of the monetary policy transmission, namely the credit channel, it includes mechanisms by which imperfect financial markets amplify the effects of conventional interest rate.

The bank is a financial intermediary that collects money from economic agents with liquidity surplus and transfers them according to their analysis and decisions to businesses with liquidity deficit, thus making transformation of maturities, interest rates and risks. Therefore, the lending decision is the prerogative of banks.

Considering imperfect financial markets, the cost of external funding is greater than the risk free interest rate, given the existence of information asymmetry through its forms called adverse selection and moral hazard. The risk-free rate of return is the theoretical rate of return of investment with zero risk – as the government bonds.

Information asymmetry reflects the fact that the creditor does not know if the debtor is in good faith or not (adverse selection), or the debtor has chosen to invest in a riskier project than for which it received funding (moral hazard). In this case, the borrower will have to pay an additional premium to cover expected costs of the creditor, such as the risk of opportunistic behavior occurred as a result of the debtor and the costs of monitoring, assessment and collection of payment of the remaining debt.

An increase in the monetary policy rate will have a direct impact on all companies that rely on bank loans or loans of any kind as to interest rates in the money market. An increase of interest bank loans leads to lower businesses margin and increases the return expected by investors from new investment projects, which makes them less likely to engage in such projects. Interest expenses also affects inventory management costs that are usually funded by bank loans.

The credit channel implies that a segment of companies must rely on bank loan financing. If monetary policy measures end up by restricting banks' ability to give loans, the financial costs of these borrowers will tend to increase, while demand for capital will decrease (Leoveanu, 2015). In practice, a central bank influence on the real costs of financing is quite limited. In the long term, trying to push real interest rates on the capital market under their equilibrium rate - the characteristic applying an expansionary monetary policy measures - will only lead to an increase in inflation.

Unlike bank lending channel, the balance sheet channel means that the debtor's financial situation has an impact on external finance premium. Bank lending to companies, especially smaller ones like SME, are often backed assets, so a decline in asset prices may lead to difficulties in accessing loans because low prices of assets reduces net assets of the company. This effect is called the "financial accelerator". Also, the financing of listed companies is easier to achieve when interest rates are low and asset prices are high, so that the financial statements are favorable.

There are some specific issues regarding the transmission mechanism of monetary policy in Euro zone after international financial crisis that are largely debated by economists. Peter Praet, member of the Executive Board of ECB, has shown (Praet, 2016) that in the financial crisis aftermath - characterized in Europe by banking and soverign debt crisis, deleveraging process and slow economic recovery, desinflationary shocks and challenges on the effective lower bound on the interest rate - the ECB had to require "unconventional measures with unprecedented intensity" in order to address frictions in the transmission process. Kapounek highlights that „the most important problem of monetary policy implementation efficiency is transmission mechanism heterogeneity in the Eurozone. The heterogeneity consists in different economic growth and inflation rates in individual member states" (Kapounek, 2011).

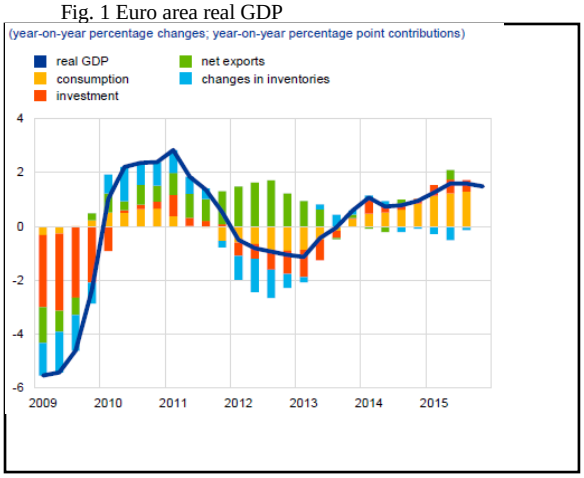
Roman (2015) shows that his research "finds a high efficiency loss in all monetary transmission channels related to fractional reserve banking, excessive EU indebtedness, or legal frameworks".

3. ECB monetary policy and investments performance in the euro area

The international financial crisis put his mark on euro zone economies also by depressing investments as a result of "uncertainty, corporate and banks'deleveraging needs and foreign direct investment abroad"(Palenzuela et al., 2016). IMF researchers finds that „despite lower nominal interest rates during the crisis, the overall decline in inflation and the zero lower bound for the nominal interest rate held up the implied real interest rates, particularly in some countries, which also may have weighed on business investment" (IMF, 2014). Since 2013 there was an economic recovery in euro zone despite a weaker global growth outlook, as shown in Figure 1.

Fig. 1 Euro area real GDP



Source: ECB Annual Report 2015, p. 22

The investment recovery was based on "a combination of improving demand, profit expectations and financing conditions, as well as declining uncertainty" despite the high corporate debts and restrictive bank regulations (ECB, 2016d).

The Figures 2 and 3 present the evolution of real and business investment in euro area: the big falls of total investment in the aftermath of the crisis and also in 2011-2012 were followed by a general increase of total fixed capital formation since early 2013.

The expansionary monetary policy measures of ECB influenced financial costs for non-financial companies in euro zone since the crisis, but there still remain a lot of credit constraints imposed by banks in spite of their declining (Fig. 4)

The linkage between monetary supply (M3) and loans to private sector is presented in Figure 5. Money growth remained robust. Credit growth recovered gradually, but remained weak (ECB, 2016e).

The future prospectives for growing development of investment in euro zone, especially business investment, rely on favorable factors like „recovering demand, accommodative monetary policy and improving financing conditions" but also "and the need to replace capital after years of subdued fixed capital formation" despite negative constraints like "deleveraging needs and a still unfriendly business environment in some countries, as well as subdued potential growth prospects" (ECB, 2016d).

4. The effect of ECB monetary policy on investment decision

Monetary policy is expected to influence investment decision by modifying the rate of return on capital, remodelling the availability of bank loans to the economy, and affecting expectations and confidence on macroeconomic fundamentals.

First, the ECB monetary policy measures have an impact on financial conditions in the euro area, which in turn is coupled with the country-specific economic conditions. The effects of monetary policy are seen primarily at macroeconomic level as an ECB commitment to fulfill its primary objective of maintaining price stability and supporting the economies of the euro zone countries, what is the basis on which they form investors' expectations. In this respect, the information provided by the ECB and the transparency in communication with the public determine the credibility of the central bank and is one of the most powerful and effective monetary policy tool.

International financial rating agencies (i.e. Standard & Poor's, Moody's, Fitch) take also into account the ECB policy decisions in order to classify the countries' economies, companies and financial institutions in the euro area by risk degree. This kind of classification gives investors information on how much confidence to have about their financial performance, fulfillment on their financial obligations, as well as their more difficult or easier access to financing on international markets. Therefore, before taking an investment decision, investors will look at the rating given by international rating agencies to their economic partners in the euro zone, rating influenced by the monetary policy of the ECB.

Secondly, investment decisions are based on capital budgeting process through which the evaluation of investment projects is based on specific selection criteria, among which highlights the Net Present Value (NPV) and Internal Rate of Return (IRR).

A capital investment project is a set of fixed assets which are contingent upon each other and which are counted together. Thus, the company assets at a certain time are the amount of capital investment decisions taken over time by the company.

The investment process involves annual investment costs during construction period and annual benefits during the operation period of a capital investment. Analysis of different investment project alternatives will consider time value of money and will compare the costs as related to efforts and benefits as related to expected effects at a given moment in time. This is the method of discounting cash flows.

Future cash flows are discounted at a rate which is an assessment of the investors' uncertainty on the expected amounts and on the time of their achievement. To estimate the risk from these cash flows requires a sensitivity analysis of the income and expenses from changes in economic conditions.

The risk of an investment project is reflected in this discount rate. From the investors point of view the discount rate is the minimum rate of required return to compensate them for the risk involved. From the company point of view the discount rate is the weighted average cost of capital, i.e. the opportunity cost of capital invested in the firm. In other words, it shows how much cost the company to bring additional funding of a monetary unit of new capital. As a result of both assertions, WACC represents both the cost of capital and the minimum rate of required return for an investment project.

Thus, thirdly, the influence of ECB monetary policy is manifested on WACC components: the cost of debt and cost of equity. WACC calculation is done by adding the cost of each component of capital multiplied by the weight of the component in total funding.

$$WACC = \frac{E}{V} \times Re + \frac{D}{V} \times Rd \times (1 - T)$$

where: Re = cost of equity; Rd = cost of debt; E = market value of the firm's equity; D = market value of the firm's debt; V = E + D; E/V = percentage of financing that is equity; D/V = percentage of financing that is debt; T = corporate tax rate (Investopedia, 2016).

The cost of each component of the invested capital is calculated as below.

A. The cost of debt

Cost of debt is calculated for each credit instrument used by the company in its funding and consider the marginal rate of corporation tax:

$$Rd \times (1 - T)$$

Formula is the interest rate debt minus the marginal corporate tax as a fact that interest expense is tax deductible.

B. The cost of equity

The theoretical approach to consider cost of equity as a cost of reinvested capital is expressed by using Capital Asset Pricing Model (CAPM):

$$Re = RFR + \beta_i \times (Rm - RFR)$$

where: RFR = risk free rate; β_i = beta coefficient that measures the volatility of company's security volatility compared to the market as a whole; Rm - RFR = market risk premium, and Rm is market return.

The model shows difficulties and even limitations in estimating risk-free rate, market return or beta coefficient.

The effects of ECB monetary policy is manifested partly in determining the appropriate risk-free rate of return, due to the relative influences of monetary policy rate on yield curves. Thus, a benchmark for RFR could be the Yield-to-maturity of bonds with the lowest risk in the euro zone, for example the YTM of German bonds issued for a period of 10 years.

Among selection criteria of an investment project, there are Net Present Value (NPV) and internal rate of return (IRR) as the most important ones.

Net present value is the overall return of an investment, calculated by summing the present value of all future cash flows (positive - meaning benefits or negative - representing investment costs or losses) arising from the implementation of the project.

$$VAN = \frac{CF_0}{(1+i)^0} + \frac{CF_1}{(1+i)^1} + \frac{CF_2}{(1+i)^2} + ... + \frac{CF_n}{(1+i)^n} = \sum_{t=1}^{n} \frac{CF_t}{(1+i)^t}$$

where:

CF_t = estimated cash flows in the period t;

$CF_t = VT_t - CT_t$, where VT_t = total revenues in the period t

CT_t = total expenses in the period t including investment costs (I_t) and operating costs (C_t) ; i = discount rate; n = project lifetime.

If the project generates cash flows greater than necessary to compensate investors for the risk of the project, it will bring a higher gain than the cost of capital, increasing the company value, which reflects the positive value of net present value obtained from the project (NPV> 0). Conversely, if the project cash flows are less than needed to cover the cost of capital that will decrease the company value, as it is highlighted by the negative net present value obtained from the project (NPV <0).

NPV value depends on the discount rate value used in the calculations, which requires special attention in choosing it. Thus, if the discount rate is lower, the NPV is higher and vice versa, which has a significant impact on capital budgeting (Leoveanu, 2008).

IRR is the discount rate that makes the present value of expected cash inflows equal to the present value of estimated future cash outflows for the investment project in question. To calculate this indicator, the NPV must be equal to zero for a discount rate i = IRR, and therefore:

$$\sum_{t=0}^{n} \frac{CF_t}{(1+RIR)^t} = 0$$

When IRR is used as a criterion in the investment projects evaluation they shall consider the followings:

a) IRR must always be greater than zero (> 0), otherwise investment costs can not be recovered from benefits and the project is not accepted;
b) they accept projects with calculated IRR > demanded IRR by the investors;
c) in relation to the cost of capital, the IRR should be considered as the maximum rate to pay off the capital providers (shareholders and creditors), without the project to produce any benefit or any loss. Thus, they will accept projects with IRR > cost of capital and will reject those with IRR < cost of capital (Leoveanu, 2008).

The investment decision is reached by comparing the values of indicators calculated on different variants of investment project in contrast to the current situation without the investment project (Leoveanu, 2015)

Example

In the current international economic conditions, companies are concerned about the feasibility of investment projects developing production/services for export or replace import of such goods/services. In this respect it appears necessary to analyze several aspects: the value of currency earned / saved by the investment compared to the currency market; the extent to which this value (cost) of currency is acceptable for the investor; at what cost of domestic currency is export or import quitting advantageous by making that investment in that country. The main criterion that the investor will take into account in this case is the Michael Bruno test ratio. This indicator enables investment decisions by avoiding investments with a higher cost of foreign currency.

For computing, the necessary information are: annual inflows in foreign currency on projected export sales, respectively annual inflows in foreign currency on projected savings by reducing import; annual outflows in foreign currency on investment and operating costs; annual outflows in local currency related to the investment and operating costs.

A German investor wants to make a capital investment in Germany to manufacture products that will be fully exported to the United States. To establish the feasibility of the investment, the investor will calculate the Michael Bruno test ratio, knowing, on the one hand, the investment and operating costs in Euro and, on the other hand, the investment and operating costs, and also the operating revenues in Dollars (see tables below). Construction time is 2 years, and operating period is 6 years.

The discount rate calculation is based on the weighted average cost of capital. In this regard, it is known that the investor finances the investment in proportion of 55% by reinvesting capital, in proportion of 20% through a bank loan term at a German bank and in proportion of 25% by a suppliers' credit for equipment.

The interest rate on the bank loan for investment = 4.5%, the interest rate on the suppliers' credit = 5%, RFR = 0.31% (German Bond 10 T), beta coefficient = 1.5 and the risk premium market (Rm - RFR) = 7.8 %.

The corporate tax rate T = 18%.For the one year (16.12.2015-17.12.2016) the average euro/dollar currency rate of the ECB was 1.1084 euro/$.

Solution:

1. Cost of capital computation

Cost of bank loan:

$$Rd \times (1 - T) = 4.5\% \times 18\% = 0.0081 = 0.81\%$$

Cost of suppliers' credit:

$$Rd \times (1 - T) = 5\% \times 18\% = 0.009 = 0.9\%$$

Cost of reinvested capital:

$$Re = RFR + \beta_i \times (Rm - RFR) = 0.31\% + 1.5 \times 7.8\% = 0.1201 = 12.00\%$$

Weight Average Cost of Capital:

$$WACC = 0.55 \times 12\% + 0.2 \times 0.81\% + 0.2 \times 0.9\% = 0.07 = 7\%$$

This value of WACC represents the minimum rate of return required by investors and also the discount rate at which capital budgeting calculations are made (WACC = i).

2. Capital Budgeting

$$\text{Michael Bruno Test Ratio} = \frac{\text{PV of Total costs (euro)}}{\text{NPV (dollars)}}$$

Computation of Present Value of Total Costs (mil. euro)

Year (t)	Investments Costs (I_t)	Operating Costs (C_t)	Discount Factor $\frac{1}{(1+i)^t}$	Present Value of Total Costs $(I_t + C_t) \times \frac{1}{(1+i)^t}$
1	12	-	0.934	11.21
2	18	-	0.873	15.71
3	-	9	0.816	7.34
4	-	9	0.762	6.86
5	-	7	0.712	4.98
6	-	7	0.666	4.66
7	-	7	0.622	4.35
8	-	5	0.582	2.91
				58.03

Computation of NPV (mil. $)

Year (t)	Investments Costs (I_t)	Oparating Costs (C_t)	Operating Revenues (V_t)	Cash Flow (CF_t)	Discount Factor $\frac{1}{(1+i)^t}$	Discounted Cash Flow $CF_t \times \frac{1}{(1+i)^t}$
1	25	0	0	-25	0.934	-23,35
2	35	0	0	-35	0.873	-30,56
3	0	15	30	15	0.816	12.24
4	0	10	40	30	0.762	22.86
5	0	11	40	29	0.712	20.65
6	0	10	45	35	0.666	23.31
7	0	10	45	35	0.622	21.77
8	0	10	45	35	0.582	20.37
						NPV = 67.29

$$\textit{Michael Bruno Test Ratio} = \frac{58.03 \text{ mil euro}}{67.29 \text{ mil $}} = 0.8624 \text{ euro/$}$$

This result will be compared with the ECB exchange rate to see if the investment project can be accepted for the gain brought by exporting. For an average ECB exchange rate of 1.1084 euro/$ the investment project is cost-effective because it brings the dollar into the country at a much lower cost (0.8624 euro/$).

3. Conclusions

The present paper had the intention to present some important features concerning investment in real assets and the implication of monetary policy measures in investment decision in euro area based on the theoretical framework regarding capital budgeting.

As essential issues for this subject, the authors highlighted the folowing:

- the importance of the three models representing economic structures that constrain monetary authority in choosing its policy and their differencies of approach.
- the characteristics and distinctions between the interconnection monetary policy – investment in time of economic grow or recession and depression.
- the importance of ECB as main institution of the Eurosystem for euro zone economies considering its objective and its monetary policy strategy.
- the main stages of monetary policy transmission mechanism and the way ECB monetary policy could influence economic development in euro area;
- the particularities of interest rate channel, credit channel and balance sheet channel and their importance for investment trend in euro zone.
- the favorable and adverse factors that have influenced and influence investment developments in euro area.

- what are the influences of the ECB monetary policy on the feasibility of a particular investment project in an euro zone economy?

MANAGING THE USE OF DERIVATIVE INSTRUMENTS FOR PORTFOLIO RISK PURPOSES

Mădălina Antoaneta RĂDOI[*]
Alexandru OLTEANU[]

Abstract

The priority in portfolio management is a good risk assessment and management. Of great importance is the margin that an asset portfolio guarantor must use with specific expertise in certain areas of market temporal inefficiency in order to improve its management performance.
The relevant validity of the financial market and the emphasis laid on risk management carried along the development of financial instruments tailored to risk management. New derivative financial instruments have revolutionized the methods of portfolio management, of corporate treasury management, of banking management and, more generally, all financial strategies.

Introduction

Major developments in financial theory after the 1980s and the positive evolution of the study and research activities of the financial market have profound implications on the financial theory in general, dealing with the corporate financial management or the financial and banking economy, and particularly with the portfolio management. It was thus developed the concept of the capital markets efficiency, exposing the most important empirical results, obtained both on the European and the American markets, and aiming at demonstrating the independence of securities rate and their behaviour analysis in relation to the occasional financial events.

Within the framework of the modern theory of capital markets it emerged the theory of new financial instruments for hedging the market risks: short-term futures contracts, options, swaps, caps, forward etc. These tools enable financial risk management depending on the particular previsions. Financial leverage brought through these tools, the flexibility in their use, association to very feasible transaction expenditure allow for a very precise risk management[1].

It aimed at putting forward the principles and new models for the valuation of derivative financial instruments, and uses of the new financial instruments, with concrete examples, which prove to be very useful as instruments of control, and especially of insurance against risks[2].

Literature review

1. Derivatives and risk control[3]

A debate on the use of derivatives for the portfolio risk management, by giving examples of methods of risk control and alternation of portfolios, is aimed to discard the beliefs according to which the derivatives are particularly risky and dangerous instruments.

The derivative structures, especially the exchange-traded options, may offer some key benefits for institutional investors and investment managers in Romania[4], such as those related to:

- Change of assets: The exact identification of the market evolutionary changes and monetary liquidity in such critical moments is impossible to quantify. The immediate question is: What can a manager do to avoid such a situation, or at least mitigate its negative effects that could redound upon the portfolio. It appeals to derivative products which provide a continuous cash flow, even in times of market uncertainty, at a cost significantly lower than the one associated to limited non-cash.

- Risk covering (hedging): Options can be effectively used in a long-term hedging strategy to counter adverse market movements, with the benefit that the volatility of the structure costs is relatively small when hedging operations are initiated at the precise moment when a risk is perceived.
- Low costs: Losses arising as results of a fall in the cost of certain shares could be covered by the sale of CALL options. A manager who calculates the absolute profit generated by the portfolio may order the sale of options whose profits exceed that level.
- Speculation: The call for options can be done by participating on the moving market, without making use of a significant amount of capital, participation which may generate substantial profits if derivative instruments are used, but after understanding the mechanisms of operation and combination of effects.

Therefore, large volumes of derivative products that were globally traded on the alternative financial markets lastly are a proof of the appreciation thereof and increasingly large use in the financial community. On the one hand, 2006 - the most significant year before the crisis, has undoubtedly been a year of uncertainty, of small gains and corporate-level scandals. European stock markets closed the reporting period with losses ranging between 25% and 50%. On the other hand, it was a year characterized by growth in hedge operations and the increasing volume of derivative instruments markets.

Interestingly, the increase in the volume of traded derivatives was recorded only in the case of Stock Exchanges. The Report of the Bank for International Settlements has shown an increase in the value of derivatives, reaching the figure of over USD 700 billion. The explanation lies in the fact that the exchange-traded options have some advantages over packets (such as OTCs, securities traded outside the stock exchange via a brokerage agency or direct contract between the purchaser and the seller), making the same extremely attractive to managers.

Given the downgrade in confidence in some large financial institutions, following the triggering of the financial crisis in 2008, not surprisingly, traders prefer to avoid entering into contracts with individual parties. The exchange-traded options make possible the commitment of a central counterparty – the Clearing House. Moreover, the transparency of operations allows continuous monitoring of prices and the known number of participants generates a more competitive environment than in the case of OTC products.

The biggest drawback of the options, put forward in the past, has been the inability to absorb large volumes of issues, non-existent aspect in the case of OTCs. Although this statement could be true, it is no longer a current problem. The increased volume of the value of exchange-traded contracts and the special interest thereto prove the ability to place large volumes of issues.

2. Incorrect use of derivatives - a trap of ignorance

Derivatives are not inherently dangerous, as many commentators might believe. They are definitely not "financial weapons of mass destruction". On the contrary, for many institutional investors, the derivatives were the instruments that kept them afloat. This does not mean that derivative instruments (like many other financial products) mechanisms of operation and their role in risk management. Flexibility and the nature of options strategies require continuous monitoring of changing markets conditions, the risk and the value of the option and require a regular revaluation of financial assets. Once these conditions are met, the benefits of using derivative products, such as options (insurance against future risks), outweigh the costs.

3. Hedging strategies used in transactions with derivative instruments[5]

There are several methods whereby options can be incorporated into the portfolio. Thus, options can be used to develop hedging strategies, because it offers multiple possibilities of risk management to economic agents[6]. In this respect, in return for payment of a premium, options contracts account for a substantial protection against adverse movements in the underlying asset price, while offering opportunities to obtain some returns, this time as result of favourable changes in prices. Among the derivatives trading strategies, indicated to be used, are listed by way of example the following:

A. Covering risk hedging: example - the spread strategy[7]

A spread strategy involves taking a position on two or more options of the same type (two or more CALL options or two or more PUT options).

It is considered one of the most widely used spread strategies, namely bull spreads, which involves buying a CALL option on a futures contract with a certain strike price and selling a CALL option on the same type of contract, but with a higher strike price. Both options have the same expiration date. The investor hopes that the price of the security goes up.

Suppose, at a certain moment, a low volatility on the futures market of the USD BRM contract. A fund manager at an import-export company, analysing the commercial evolution of the last quarter of the year, reaches the conclusion that the evolution of the RON/USD ratio will suffer considerable variations, which could seriously affect the value of the portfolio. In this respect, the administrator shall order its broker on the BRM options market to purchase CALL options on futures contracts, worth USD 100,000, paying a premium of 700 u.m/USD, at a strike price of 26,000 u. m/USD and sell CALL options on futures worth USD 100,000, the premium of 200 u. m/USD, at a strike price of 28,000 u.m/USD.

The first scenario assumes an increase in futures price (S_T) up to the value of 27,000 u.m. Fully confident in his forecast, the manager expects the maturity date of the USD BRM futures contract in December. Upon the maturity date of the USD BRM futures contract in December, the settlement price is 27,200 u.m. This means a gain of 1,200 u.m/USD, out of which is deducted the premium, resulting in a final profit of 500 u. m/USD, amount covering part of the devaluation incurred by the Romanian RON.

Another possibility would have been that, on the maturity date, the manager would opt for the execution of the contract through physical delivery and thus take possession of USD 100,000 at a price of USD 26,000, once the market rate reaches the level of 27,200 u.m/USD.

The second scenario would have been the increase of the futures price up to 28,300 u. m, in which case the manager earns 1,800 u.m/USD, the final profit being 1,600 u.m/USD, profit which would maintain this level unchanged, no matter how much the futures price may increase. Such a strategy results in that, while the CALL price goes down as the strike price goes up, the value of the sold option is always less than the value of the option purchased. The volatility was thus significantly reduced, and the costs were relatively small.

B. Participation in the moving markets with the view to earn profits: example – buying a PUT option[8]

The use of such derivative trading strategy can be explained by way of an example. Thus, after analysing the futures market trend at EURO BRM contract, it is estimated a price decrease. Because the customer is not firmly convinced that this trend will manifest, he decides not to open a futures position and decides to buy a EURO BRM August 2012 PUT option at a strike price of 29,100 u.m. If the current futures price tends to rise, the premium paid for this option is small, managing to buy a PUT option against a premium of 300 u.m./EURO. For those who are in a similar position in terms of market analysis results, it is recommended buying "in the money" options or even "out of the money" options because it may be cheaper. When the futures settlement price falls below the strike price, the intrinsic value relevant for these options begins to go up and, therefore, the premium thereof to rise. At this point, the customer can proceed to obtain funds to cover the futures margin and wait for the time of exercising the option. Upon exercise, the customer will have the PUT option position cancelled and the futures selling position initiated.

Buying a PUT option is less risky than selling a futures contract, because an increase in futures quotation does not entail mark-to-market losses, the maximum loss being related to the premium paid.

Profit occurs when the futures settlement price falls below 29,000 u.m., when exercising this option causes the customer to have a futures selling position initiated at a price of 29,100 u.m. If the settlement price is 29,050 u.m., the customer earns 50 u.m. from the mark-to-market, and if the settlement price is 29,090 u.m., the same earns 90 u.m. As the futures settlement prices go down, the profit goes up.

The loss is limited to the premium paid upon registration of the transaction. If the futures settlement prices range above the value of 29,100 u.m., the buyer does not exercise his option, remaining with the loss of 300 u.m. Note that the premium paid of 300 u.m./contract must be recovered in order to record a net profit. The mark-to-market gain, resulting following the exercise of the option, must be higher than the premium paid and is registered at futures settlement prices below 29,070 u.m.

4. Selecting the use of models for the valuation of derivative financial instruments, in particular of options[9] [10]

All models for the valuation of financial instruments are derived from arbitrage reasoning between derivative instruments and the underlying securities-asset. For example, for a stock option, the arbitrage reasoning used for the capitalization of a stock and option contract is as follows: all investors can establish, by combining the purchasing of shares and options, a perfectly covered portfolio, risk-less, in other words the value is independent of the evolution of the course of stock. In such a case, the portfolio may not be reported to the risk-free interest rate during the period of ownership. Therefore, it is recommended to be used as models for the valuation of derivative financial instruments the One-Period or Multiple-Period Binomial Model, and the Black and Sholes Model[11].

4.1. The Binominal Model

This model has the advantage of a large simplicity. It involves checking the classic assumptions of capital market perfection and responds to the principle according to which no risk-free arbitrage may exist in such a market. The Binomial Model leads to the continuous-time model of Black and Sholes.

4.2. Capitalization of a buying option under the Black and Sholes arbitrage model[12]

For the formalization and reasoning of the arbitrage within the model proposed a certain number of assumptions are required:

- The risk-free interest rate must be continuous and constant at the period rate;
- The security price follows progress at random, with a variation of its fluctuations in direct proportion with the square of its security rate. Also, the distribution of the different possible prices of the security at the end of a certain period follows a normal logarithmic law. The variation in the rate of return is constant during this period.
- The security shall not entitle to any dividend or interest distribution;
- The option to be "European" and cannot be exercised on each due date;
- There should not be trading costs related to the security's or option's buying or selling;
- It is possible to make a loan to the daily interest rate, the security's rate faction being unimportant.

The assumptions are indispensable to the demonstration. R. Merton[13] argued, in 1973, that the original model of Black and Sholes is very robust and conditions are sufficient and much less numerous than MEDAF (the market model of H.M.Markowitz). The analyses carried out show that the model does not require any particular securities market balance. Investors may not have a homogeneous anticipation, especially in terms of the rate of return.

However, an investor can establish a portfolio of securities containing a basic security (e.g. stock) and for which the funding is provided by the sale of "n" purchase options. In this case, the value of the "V" relevant for such a portfolio is calculated as follows:

$$V = x - nw$$

Where:

V – value of the portfolio

X – value of the security

W – premium of the negotiable option (call or

It is worth mentioning that, during a small period of time "dt", the rate varies at a volume "dx", the premium of "dw"" volume and a "dv" volume portfolio calculated as follows:

$$dV = dx - ndw$$

Under the assumptions hereabove, the premium "w" is not based on the "x" rate and the due date upon the maturity of the "t" option contract, as follows:

$$W = w\,(x,t)$$

Where:

t – time;

x – represents a diffusion process that can be written as a variation of .... and depends on the variation of the basic security rate and time:

$$dw = w_1 dx + w_2 dt + \frac{1}{2} w_3 \delta^2 x^2 dt$$

where:

w_1 – w first derivative with respect to x;

w_2 - w first derivative with respect to t;

w_3 - w second derivative with respect to x.

Entering the value of "dw" shown in the equation (4), in the expression "dV" indicated in the equation (1), we get:

$$dV = dx - nw_1 dx - n\,(w_2 dt + + \frac{1}{2} w_3 \delta^2 x^2 dt)$$

where:

dx – is the only random variable of this expression.

To the extent that "n"" was selected, such as ($1-nw_1$) is equal to zero, the variation of the portfolio value becomes certain and the portfolio is risk-free. For this it is enough to get "n" equal to $\frac{1}{w}$; the portfolio will be constantly revised since w_1 varies in time:

$$dV = \frac{1}{w1}\,(w_2 dt + + \frac{1}{2} w_3 \delta^2 x^2 dt)$$

Under the penalty of arbitrage, a risk-free portfolio cannot be reported at the risk-free investment rate of the financial market, and hence the equation:

$$dV = rVdt$$

respectively:

$$dV = r\,(x - \frac{1}{w1}\,w)\,dt$$

By equalling the two equations, we get:

$$r\,(x - \frac{1}{w1}\,w)\,dt = \frac{1}{w1}\,(w_2 dt + + \frac{1}{2} w_3 \delta^2 x^2 dt)$$ and hence:

$$w_2 = w_r - w_1 rx - \frac{1}{2} w_3 \delta^2 x^2$$

We agree to translate this differential equation with the boundary conditions specific to the option considered. Hence, the following equations:

$$W\,(s, o) = s - k \text{ if } s \geq k$$

$$W\,(s, o) = 0 \text{ if } s < k$$

Thus, the value of a CALL C is resolved by this differential equation. Solving this problem is well known in mechanics. This result is given in the equation (2).

For a PUT- P the boundary conditions are:

$W(s, o) = 0$ if $s > k$

$W(s, o) = k - s$ if $s \leq k$

The solution is given in the equation:

$$dw = w_1 dx + w_2 dt + \frac{1}{2} w_3 \delta^2 x^2 dt$$

The value of other European options types can be equally determined in part by this equation, adapted to the boundary conditions. However, some options lead us to differential equations, for which analytical solutions are not required.

It is worth mentioning that an American option, which is allowed to exercise at any given time, has boundary conditions at any time, and, by way of consequence, the differential equation will be solved by numerical methods.

Conclusions

The analysis showed that there are many advantages for institutional investors and financial managers of romanian companies as a result of the use of derivative instruments for hedging and profit generation, a fact attested by the growing number of participants in the market that use these products currently and growing volumes of transactions concluded through their. Properly understood and used for risk management, derivative instruments are significantly less "dangerous" than other financial products.

In the last two decades has registered an increase in the importance of portfolio strategies and especially to use derivative financial instruments for the supervision and management of financial risks. The choice of a specific portfolio strategies, the use of financial instruments and appropriate valuation models are based on the needs and desires of customers. Successful portfolio management and adequate financial instruments involve more than just coordination of some technical information. Such information is useful only to the extent that help in generating high profitableness.

Global financial crisis triggered alternative markets derivatives has led to multiple debates related to the use of these financial instruments. These debates of financial and banking analysts have different opinions on the causes and forms of manifestation of the so-called crisis of confidence".

Some analysts have put the crisis on behalf of the „interventionist role on mortgage market", which has led to a failure of markets („market failure"). Finally, the most plausible relates to the use of „toxic" financial products, in the form of CDOS and CDS (collateralized debt obligations, credit default swaps), synthetic non-regulated products respectively, and put in circulation by the major banks via the process of „originating and distributing ". Also, banks have turned to securitisation operations of bonds considering it a profitable business, to the extent that apparently eliminates the risk. They were selling securities (bonds) for some investors. But what seemed a convenient dissemination of individual risks in the entire financial and economic system resulted in a high risk amplification system.

The bottom line is that no new financial product complexity is responsible mainly for the financial crisis, but the pattern of financial innovation and financial products features that undermined what is essential for the proper functioning of markets: transparency and confidence.

Regarding the mechanisms of options contracts recently developed models and the equilibrium model of financial assets, allow endorsers of portfolios perform a rigorous manner the price of such contracts and the risks that must be covered. Tradable options market had experienced a successful culmination because it allows portfolio strategies based on speculation, arbitration or insurances, that increase profitability-risk benefit.

TAX EVASION BETWEEN FRAUD AND OPTIMIZATION

Emilia Cornelia STOICA*

Abstract

Tax optimization, often called legal tax evasion is the use of methods and techniques that are within the law, in order to reduce or even cancel the tax liability. To achieve such an approach, the taxpayer or his advisers must know in depth the tax law - and by extension, the financial and administrative law - and, moreover, must be functional tax jurisdictions which allow the use of appropriate assemblies.

The recent leasks, as WikiLeaks, LuxLeaks, SwissLeaks, Panama Papers etc. on financial flows to tax havens highlight the far-reaching unprecedented evasion and tax fraud, both in the amounts involved - trillions of dollars - and sophisticated assemblies used primarily by multinational companies to the detriment of the public finances of Member territory headquarters and branches which are located and, therefore, detrimental economic and social life of those countries.

Tax evasion is based on legal mechanisms which, combined together in the montages of increasingly complex, allowing operators, mostly multinational legal entities to circumvent national tax law and not pay the taxes due.

The border between tax optimization, tax evasion and fraud is very thin, optimization using various legal methods to reduce the tax owed, whereas tax evasion using illegal means, which covered crime.

Tax evasion reveals either optimize or fraud. There is a significant international dimension of tax evasion because it is favored by multinational corporations operating conditions.

Keywords: tax evasion, fraud, optimization, leaks, multinationals.

1. Introduction.

Definitions of fiscal optimization, evasion and fraud

The concepts of optimization and tax fraud can be defined without interfering with each other. Thus, tax optimization are accomplished by using legal means - deductions, tax reductions, exemptions, derogatory regimes, tax niches like tax credit etc. - whose legitimacy and effectiveness can be challenged by one of the stakeholders, ie public authorities, but which nevertheless remain within the law.

Tax fraud can be identified by the two cumulative elements:

- doubtful operations identifying the tax base and determining the amount of tax liability within national involved jurisdictions;
- bad faith of the taxpayer who violated the law in order to reduce the amounts to be paid as tax.

The term "tax evasion" is vague and leaves room for interpretation, especially since generally distinguish between legal avoidance and illegal evasion, the latter being, in fact, tax evasion.

According to OECD, the international organization that develops and disseminates economic studies most often consulted, tax evasion can be defined by three features:

- taxpayer does not comply with the legislator's intention, or taking advantage of loopholes in the text of the law, whether the provisions contained therein for purposes other than those provided;
- actions taken by the taxpayer have real justification or there are justification other than the display;
- taxpayer tries not to show the procedures they used, which sometimes is even provided in the sales contract, as it is suggested by a tax adviser.

2. Optimization and tax evasion mechanisms

2.1. General characteristics of tax optimization schemes

Net revenue optimization methods that use the companies, mainly multinationals, fall into several categories:

- procedure of assignment to a category of businesses, "check the box", through which companies can choose to classify a category of companies which have the right to repatriate profits;
- transfer pricing mechanisms applied in goods trade, services, financing product between entities of the same group, used as the main form of tax optimization, but is, in most cases, a form of legal evasion;
- companies nicknamed «hybrid», functioning only as a "mailbox" for multinationals, who transfer their profits in tax havens, mostly thanks to tax conventions concluded between countries. Thus, the company resident in Ireland, with the Board in Bermuda is subject to Bermuda tax laws;
- choosing a "state tunnel", ie a state that allows the benefit of a resident company is not taxed at source and,

* Associate Professor, PhD, Faculty of Economics, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest, (email: liastoica@gmail.com).

thus, can be transferred in a tax haven. For example, in the European Union, a company resident in France owned by American multinational Über[1] using a tunnel Dutch firm to bill services, which would require it to pay tax in the Netherlands. Dutch company pays right to use, very high, patents Über subsidiary in Bermuda, where, however, those payments are not taxable. In this scheme, the Dutch company is only an intermediary, a "firm tunnel" to escape multinational Über the incumbent tax liability by receiving royalties from the patent.

2.2. Aggressive tax planning - a form of tax evasion

In many cases, mainly in multinational companies, tax optimization is achieved through aggressive tax planning, using abusive leaks from preferential tax law and conventions. Some examples of such techniques of tax evasion are set out below [MFP 2014]

- transfer pricing abuse. Intellectual property rights of a parent company are transferred to a subsidiary resident in a country where proceeds from these are little or no taxation. Another subsidiary, using those patents pays an overstated amount of the first branche, the whole multinational company tax on income from intellectual property rights are very low or zero;;
- the use of agreements between subsidiaries, such an understanding of price for goods or services exchanged. Thus, the acquiring company recognizes the amount to be paid as a debt, interest is deductible from the taxable base and seller company consider same amount as a financial asset that brings dividends, which are generally taxed less or not at all;
- locate a branch in a country with a permissive tax regime for certain categories of products / activities with the aim of using that subsidiary in a process of international tax optimization;
- location of the sale of assets in a country with low tax rates. Assets are bought and then sold by a subsidiary resident in a low tax country, where there are no taxes levied on capital gains from the sale of assets.

Transnational companies are able to obtain from the tax authorities in different countries capabilities that allow them to significantly reduce tax obligations they have towards those jurisdictions. These countries accept taxing some branch located on the territory of multinationals less than in accordance with the general provisions of taxation in order to attract big companies to invest directly in those countries, and therefore bring significant amounts as capital injection in their economies.

A conclusive example is Ireland[2], which granted multinational companies - such as the American IT: Google, Apple, Microsoft, etc. – the right to create resident companies in Ireland and who have, in their turn, branches in other jurisdictions (so-called mechanism "double Irish") between them can be made transfers of revenues provided from activities. Thus, profits made by an Irish resident company belonging to a multinational can be routed to its subsidiaries in a tax haven where the tax rate is about 0%. Note that Ireland does not have legal provisions related to transfer pricing, which allows international tax evasion like the one above.

For example, tax evasion scheme applied by Google in Ireland was: Google Ireland Limited company pays royalties to Google Ireland Holdings, which is the holder of patent law Google. On the other hand, Google Ireland Holdings has located its Board in Bermuda - a tax haven heavily used by multinational companies - and transferred their benefits there, where they are not taxed.

2.3. General aspects on transfer pricing

In general, in the the integrated companies composed of several entities there are indispensable exchange of goods, services and financial products. The prices of those goods and services that are traded are called transfer pricing or internal assignment. These prices occupies a place of primary importance in the financial management of companies belonging to the group, and for the entire multinational financial performance, the main causes being:

- transfer pricing is a performance management tool for companies because through them can achieve financial evaluation of the various entities in the group;
- transfer pricing allow transfer of benefits between the entities, which, when those entities are located in different national tax jurisdictions, highlights their managers skills to optimize taxation for whole society, without a close relationship with economic and / or comercial performance of their specific activity.

In the relationship between the two entities, either subsidiaries of a group or independent firms under trade relations, the transfer prices used between them determine the profit that each one obtained by sale of products or services they produce and/or sell. It follows logically that the manipulation of transfer pricing allows groups, especially multinational companies to consider increasing the margin and decide accordingly, the geographical location of its component entities in jurisdictions where the tax environment is most favorable.

Also in the international economic environment, which requires competitive relationship increasingly freer, transfer prices are of paramount importance, because using them as a tool to optimize financial management, managers society multinational can determine economic and financial performance of each entity component. In addition, analyzing the fiscal environment in which they are resident, multinational company management can achieve optimal tax planning, so that fiscal pressing from tax of the whole group to be minimal.

[1] Über American society offers its customers an application that can call taxis using a tablet or an iPhone.

The correct determination of transfer prices are also a major concern for direct and portfolio investments, because the image of a business they present can reflect economic and financial reality or induce an completely false impression, stimulating or or vice versa discouraging investment.

For example, a company can buy components from its subsidiary located in another country, with a transfer price below the market price. These subsidiaries will account for less income, so a profit tax base smaller, consequently the amount of tax payment as corporate tax will be lower, which negatively affects tax public revenues in that country. Public authority in the country where is located the purchasing company - which can be even parent company - is not interested in correcting prices, because if that company issues its consumption products within its jurisdiction, the tax payable will be bigger.

The phenomenon of reducing the tax base can be, however, repeated in the case of the mother company. Multinational company creates a business intermediary enterprise between manufacturer and distributor, which locates in a state with a very small tax - so-called tax haven - or having concluded special tax arrangements. In these jurisdictions, multinationals can afford to recognize sales prices very high and very low purchase prices, resulting in a high nominal profit margin, but which will be little or no taxed.

In such a situation, it is injured including parent company tax jurisdiction, public finances being threatened by the reduction of income sources. Thus, by examining the structure of tax revenues in most states with economy based on competitive relationships It can be noted that the share of tax corporate is important - reaching over 12% of total governments revenues[3] - which makes risks observed reduction in the tax base of this tax to be perceived as real and very damaging to public sector financing in those countries.

In this context, the regulation of transfer pricing has become a necessity for all countries, especially since the process of economic and financial globalization accelerated, many countries, particularly the developing countries, are not prepared to bear the shocks the liberalization of foreign trade.

Although no recent[4], the concerns of limiting multinational companies to practice transfer prices between their component entities as they wish prompted worldwide tax authorities to adopt regulations on transfer pricing and implicitly to calculate the tax base for profit tax.

Regulation of transfer pricing between subsidiaries of multinationals must meet several basic requirements, some of which being considered essential for countries where these companies are located:

- transfer pricing must ensure the international effectiveness, manifested by facilitating foreign direct investment by multinational companies in third countries, mainly through the adoption of agreements to avoid international double taxation between the States concerned;
- transfer pricing should promote equity between countries where subsidiaries participating in the exchange of goods, services, financial products are located, so the tax base in each country to show real added value and in this way it could avoid tax evasion.

The need to regulate transfer pricing is even more acute, as the developments in recent years, very fast, have increased significantly the volume of trade and financial exchanges, in the context of expanding globalization. In addition, the polarization of the population in terms of disposable income, and thus of the quality of life, in many countries of the world, under the pressure from increasing demands on public authorities, because they produce and / or distribute more numerous and better quality social services. This, however, requires a considerable increase in the budgetary allocations for the social sector and therefore require public revenues, primarily tax increased.

The settlement and acceptance process of these regulations on transfer pricing comes out not only developed countries, that were making up after only two decades more than 80% of the international trade, but also in many other developing countries their share in trade between all contries came to exceed at the moment 40%[5].

In this context, the work of the World Forum in order to regulate transfer pricing have resulted since 2013 in a program known as "Base Erosion and Profit Shifting" (BEPS), program supported by the states participating in debates and to be finalized and implemented in the coming years[6].

OECD countries, which have joined and other non-OECD, agreed on the basic principles on these prices, primarily in the exchange of information between tax administrations, as documentation outlining the structure and specificity productive, trade and financial activities of the resident firms and methods for determining transfer pricing of component entities groups when these groups are multinational.

[4] Since 1917, US law "War Revenue Act" provide US tax authorities the right to carry out adjustment corporate tax base.

[5] A good example are the states of the group BRICS (Brazil, Russia, India, China and South African Republic) whose importance in the global market is growing, both due to the increase of the GDP per capita and increasingly extensive penetration of international markets.

[6] Considering that tax base erosion and transfer benefits to jurisdictions applying lower taxation is a major risk facing the public finances of any country, the OECD and the G20 adopted in 2013 a plan containing 15 actions to restrict the possibilities of evasion tax.

Project BEPS aims to ensure public budgets volume of tax revenues in line with the economic development and the value newly created by a package of measures to combat the business, particularly holdings and multinationals, tax optimization through the use of any leaks the law or agreements with foreign tax administrations.

Source: www.oecd.org/fr/fiscalite/beps.htm

BEPS is built taking into account the principles for transfer pricing, those principles have been defined in OECD Guidelines since 1995. The most important of these principles is respect by any multinational company, the full competition determining transfer prices in transactions between its subsidiaries, or the use of prices that are comparable to those charged between independent enterprises with the same activity under similar conditions. In many cases, however, products, services or intangible assets exchanged have no equivalent on the market and therefore, transfer pricing can not be determined by comparison. To overcome this difficulty, OECD has proposed several methods that can be established and / or controlled transfer prices in compliance with the arm's length principle.

Methods for determining transfer prices proposed by the OECD Guidelines [Pellefigue J., 2016] can be divided into two categories:

- methods that calculate trading prices between subsidiaries of the same multinational company, starting estimate the share of each subsidiary involved incumbent in total profit. Share of profit or benefits can be achieved in several ways:
  - directly share net margin (TNMM Transactionnal Net Margin Method), which determines the net margin / profit per branch compared with net margin made by independent similar enterprises. This method is most often applied in calculating transfer prices because the necessary information is available from accounting reports;
  - directly share in overall profits (PSM Profit Split Method) between different branches involved, depending on the proportion participating in the product /service. The method is less used because of the complexity and the absence of specific procedures;
- flat allocation profit according to a distribution formulas (Formulary Aportionment). The most commonly used formula is known as "formula Massachusetts", which determines index distribution of profits made across multinational companies by a subsidiary "i", as a weighted average tangible AC, turnover CA and as the wages fund FS

$$i = \alpha * \frac{ACi}{\sum_{J=1}^{n} AC_j} + \beta * \frac{CA_i}{\sum_{j=1}^{n} CA_j} + \gamma * \frac{FS_i}{\sum_{j=1}^{n} FS_j}$$

Where:

i = branch concerned

n = total number of branch / subsidiary of the multinational society

$$\alpha + \beta + \gamma = 1$$

Although at the level of the OECD is considered that the method is cumbersome, the European Union is being developed proposing a Directive ACCIS[7] proposing sharing profits between subsidiaries of multinational society, according to a formula similar to the formula Massachusetts;

- methods aimed comparability of prices and / or margins achieved by independent firms to market. Among these methods are found:
- methods using the market prices of (CUP Comparable Uncontroled Price) compared with transfer pricing proposed, which are a method rarely used because it is difficult to identify products / services completely similar;
- increased purchase price method (CPM Cost Plus Method), using mainly an accepted price of the supplier to delivery or production, plus a profit margin;
- resale price method (RPM Resale Price Method), which takes into account the price that the company producing the goods / services invoiced by a selling company belonging to the same multinational, who resells the product to an independent company. The final price minus profit margin approximated the average level that it applies independent company.

The last two methods are little used because informations on profit margins practiced by the firms are difficult to measure correctly and businesses are not legally obliged to disclose such information.

3. Conclusions

Tax optimization is a goal of every company, because thereby increase financial profitability. Often, the mechanisms by which it can carry out a fiscal optimization seek to exploit leaks of national law and, in this case, talking about legal tax evasion.

Among other methods are also tax arrangements which privileged multinationals derive from host countries to their foreign subsidiaries. These practices, however, are regarded by the public authorities and / or the population of those countries as immoral because, on the one hand reduce government revenues which primarily finances social policies and, on the other hand, seriously affect competition.

Press disclosures in recent years - including the largest response was WikiLeaks, LuxLeaks, SwissLeaks and Panama Papers - they showed the huge size of the tax worldwide evasion. It is mainly evasion which goes beyond legislation, but exploiting its weaknesses, both nationally and in the international conventions.

The consequences of tax evasion are high in all countries, but the worst records in emerging economies that have a greater need for public funds to develop and, in addition, benefit little from theit own resources due to the actions of the multinational companies in their territory, usually in agreement with public authorities in host countries.

The international tax regulations need

[7] European Commission proposal for a Directive on common consolidated tax tax (ACCIS) submitted for debate and adoption by the Council of the European Union in 2016.

Tax rules on corporate tax is a constant concern and very timely for both multinational and national tax authorities where the component entities are resident. Note that if in terms of tax rates, according to international treaties[8], each national jurisdiction is fiscal sovereign, sizing trim corporate tax can be influenced by the decisions of multinational companies through transfer pricing, in compliance with the relevant legal framework

[8] The tax system acts to collect public revenues from taxes and, in addition, guide economic growth and contribute significantly to achieving macroeconomic balance. Accordingly, in any national tax system, resident status is crucial because any resident entity is the main contributor. However, if they work in several countries or tax jurisdictions, it is difficult to identify tax residency and thus the tax burden on the entity.

To avoid double taxation of the international organizations - first OECD, and the UN - have proposed models of bilateral tax conventions to which the concerned States establish methods for calculating the tax liability for taxpayers resident in one state but which earn revenues in other State. Tax conventions play a key role in regard to taxation in the current major expansion context of globalization. Thanks to these agreements may encourage foreign investment and, consequently, can stimulate national and global economic growth. On the other hand, thanks to bilateral tax conventions the tax administrations of the concerned States can act against tax evasion and tax fraud even international.

ESTIMATION OF REGRESSION EQUATIONS BETWEEN SOME FORMAL EDUCATION INDICATORS AND GDP, IN ROMANIA

Sandra TEODORESCU[*]

Motto: "Education is the most powerful weapon which you can use to change the world."

Abstract

The present paper is a part of a post-PhD research entitled Assessment on the impact of education on the macroeconomic development in Romania, as compared to other EU member states. The survey starts with a short overview on the history of education and macroeconomic development in Romania, starting from the 19th century. The paper presents contextual data, indicators as well as the outcome of the research, conducted in order to identify and analyze the impact of education on the macroeconomic development in Romania. The study is based on linear regression models and, respectively, on double log regression models. The purpose is to analyze the relationship between a set of educational indicators as predictors and Gross Domestic Product as a dependent variable.

Keywords: formal education, macroeconomic development, statistical analysis, regression models

1. Introduction

Formal education occurs in a structured, systematic and controlled environment where students are learning together with a trained, certified (preschool, primary, secondary or tertiary) teacher, professor or lecturer of the subject.

Etymologically, the word "formal" is derived from the Latin formalis which means "official", "organized", therefore, formal education is official education. Philip H. Coombs[1] defined formal education as the hierarchically structured, chronologically graded education system, running from primary school through the university and including, in addition to general academic studies, a variety of specialized programs and institutions for full-time technical and professional training. Formal, official education includes social managing and evaluation, centered on the development of self-assessment capabilities learned within the formal education.

Formal education is extremely important because it provides access to cultural, scientific and artistic values, to literature and scientific knowledge as well as to social and human experience, having a critical role in shaping the students' personality, according to society and individual needs. Investing in human resources, i.e. in education, training and healthcare systems, is aimed at improving the professional and scientific abilities of trainees as well as at increasing their adaptability to cope with structural economic changes and the technological progress as well as efficiency.

Below, I intend to show that formal education plays a key role in improving living standards, leading to prosperity.

2. DEFINING CONTEXTUAL INDICATORS AND MODELS APPLIED

To analyze the impact of education on Romania's economic growth, statistical data provided by EUROSTAT and World Bank are processed in order to understand specific indicators. The three models applied are the following: simple linear regression and log-log regression.

Using available data, we obtain the general linear model presented below:

$$y_j = b_0 + bx_j + \varepsilon_i, j = \overline{1,T}$$

where T is time in years.

The model is used (i) to analyze the relationship between two variables, i.e. a dependent variable - Education and, respectively, an independent one – Economy, as well as (ii) to assess the relationship between the two variables during a given period of time (2001-2015).

For the analysis of panel data to be further developed, we get the following general linear model:

$$y_{ij} = b_0 + bx_{ij} + \varepsilon_{ij}, \quad i = \overline{1,N}, \qquad j = \overline{1,T}$$ where N shows the correlation between countries and T is time in years.

To interpret correctly the parameters, namely the impact of education on economic development, we use logs for variables, i.e. semi-log or log-log regression model

$$y_j = b_0 + blnx_j + \varepsilon_j, j = \overline{1,T}$$

and, respectively

$$lny_j = b_0 + blnx_j + \varepsilon_j, j = \overline{1,T}$$

Using natural logs and the real value of the dependent variable, and, respectively, natural logs for both variables x_j and y_j.

If linear regression uses variables we want to predict, i.e. dependent variables, logistic regression enables you to calculate predicted probabilities using a factor variable (i.e., categorical variable), which should be included in the model as a series of indicator variables regression. The logistic regression algorithm is developed to determine what class a new input should fall into. One of the nice properties of logistic regression is that the sigmoid function outputs the conditional probabilities of the prediction. A sigmoid function is a mathematical function having an "S" shaped curve, and is bounded differentiable real function that is defined for all real input values and has a positive derivative at each point. The logistic function has this further, important property, that its derivative can be expressed by the function itself. The advantage of this model is that we are not really restricted to dichotomous dependent variables and that it can be developed into one unified model.

Using the same data, we could obtain the following linear multiple regression model:

$$y = b_0 + b_1x_1 + b_2x_2 \ldots + b_px_p + \varepsilon$$ where p represents the number of predictors used to explain or predict the other variable y.

Description of the Contextual and Specific Indicators Used

The specific, educational indicators we analyzed are the predictors, i.e.[2]:

1. School life expectancy is the total number of years of schooling (primary to tertiary) that a child can expect to receive, assuming that the probability of his or her being enrolled in school at any particular future age is equal to the current enrollment ratio at that age. School life expectancy shows the overall level of development of an educational system taking into account the years of schooling.
2. Total public expenditure on education refers to combined public, private and international expenditure on education, i.e. funding by the government or education expenditure by educational institutions, as well as private expenditure.
3. At least upper secondary educational attainment, age group 20-24 years - % (ISCED 3) the indicator is defined as the percentage of people aged 20-24 who have successfully completed at least upper secondary education. This educational attainment refers to ISCED 3. The indicator aims to measure the share of the population that is likely to have the minimum necessary qualifications to actively participate in social and economic life. It should be noted that completion of upper secondary education can be achieved in European countries after varying lengths of study, according to different national educational systems. It reveals the efficiency of national strategies and policies in the field.
4. Tertiary educational attainment, age group 30-34 years, % - the indicator is defined as the percentage of the population aged 30-34 who have successfully completed tertiary studies (e.g. university, higher technical institution, etc.). This educational attainment refers to ISCED 5-6 and reveals the distribution of the respective share of population. The indicator helps us draw conclusions on the quality of human resources, being a part of the Education and Training 2020 (ET 2020) framework for cooperation. It shows the share of 30-34 year olds with tertiary educational attainment, with a view to achieving the strategic objectives under the ET 2020.
5. Employment rates of recent graduates - % presents the employment rates of persons aged 20 to 34 fulfilling the following conditions: first, being employed according to the ILO definition, second, having attained at least upper secondary education (ISCED 3) as the highest level of education, third, not having received any education or training in the four weeks preceding the survey and four, having successfully completed their highest educational attainment 1, 2 or 3 years before the survey. The indicator is calculated based on data from the EU Labor Force Survey.
6. Employment by educational attainment level, annual data, age class-15-64 years, tertiary education per thousands shows the percentage of a population aged between 15-64 that has reached a higher level of education and holds a qualification at that level, being employed. It reveals the efficiency of labor policies and is used at international level.
7. Population by educational attainment level, sex and age -% highlights the share of the population having completed at least upper secondary education, age class 15-64 years.
8. Enrolment rate % is expressed as net enrolment, which is calculated by dividing the number of students of a particular age group enrolled in all levels of education by the size of the population of that age group[3]. It is widely used to show the general level of participation in and capacity of education.

9. The broadest indicator of economic output and growth is the Gross Domestic Product or GDP[4], expressed in million of Euros, which represents the dependent variable.

To illustrate the impact of education on the medium and long term, the relationship between variables was considered as asynchronous (for example, there is a 12 year gap between GDP and the Enrolment rate).

3.1. ANALYSIS OF CORRELATIONS BETWEEN EDUCATIONAL AND MACROECONOMIC INDICATORS

The analysis of the sample correlation presented below clearly illustrates the moderate relationship ($r_{GDP;Public_exp} = 0.62$), and, respectively, the strong relationship between GDP and the rest of indicators, except for the Employment rates of recent graduates, which is the best example for an inverse correlation ($r_{GDP;Employment_level} = -0.42$).

Table 1. Correlations. The highlighted correlations are strong for p < .05000 N=8

3.2. ESTIMATION OF REGRESSION EQUATION

Based on statistical data for 2001-2015, linear regression equations, and, respectively, log-log equations showing the relationship between GDP and each predictor were developed, illustrating strong correlations, along with the analysis and the regression model .

3.2.1. The impact of School life expectancy on GDP

According to Europe 2020 guidelines included in the most important strategic document drafted and promoted by the European Commission for the next 10 years, which defines education as one the top priorities and the factors that could lead to economic growth within the EU, Romania should reduce school drop-out rate (PTS), age class 18-24 years, down to 11.3% until 2020, and, respectively, increase tertiary education attainment rate, age class 30-34 years, up to 26.7%. The goal is difficult to achieve due to high school drop-out rates, age class 18-24, i.e. one child in 5 leaves primary school (17%) and 50% of students leave secondary school and fail to pass the final exam. Although reforms were implemented to improve access to education and ensure quality education, further measures should be applied and major investments should be made in this sector, to cope with the challenges faced by these vulnerable categories.

Based on the regression model, the following linear regression equation illustrating the relationship between the dependent variable GDP and the independent variable School life expectancy was developed:

$$GDP = 102259 * School_exp - 1427211$$
$$(83816) \quad (1368881)$$
$$R^2 = 0{,}14$$

after normalization (standardized independent variable value – 0 and dispersion value – 1) we obtain:

$$GDP = 0{,}376719 * School_exp$$

The coefficient of determination denoted $R^2(\%) = 14\%$, indicates that School life expectancy influence on GDP values is of 14%.

[4] Source: EUROSTAT - for variables 1)-7) and GDP.

At the same time, we obtain the following log-log equation:

$$lnGDP = 4{,}71454 * lnSchool_exp - 1{,}18165$$

(2.512)(7.00)

$$R^2 = 0{,}28$$

In comparison with other EU member states, Romania's School life expectancy was 16.9% in 2012, according to EUROSTAT, above the UK – 16.6%, but below Sweden – 19.9%, Denmark – 19.3%, and Germany – 18.2%.

The log-log regression equation (9) shows that a 1% increase in School life expectancy leads to a 4.71% GDP growth during the analyzed period. In the future, we can predict a 17% increase in School life expectancy, above Denmark (19.3%) and almost equal to Sweden (19.9%), leading at the same time to a 109.63% increase in GDP.

3.2.2. The impact of Total public expenditure on education on GDP

According to EUROSTAT, Romania's GDP was 27% of the average EU GDP per capita (EU-28) in 2015, being the second poorest EU member state, above Bulgaria (22.8%). Romania's Total public expenditure on education accounts for 4.1% of the country's GDP, as compared to an average of 4.7% in Eastern Europe and, respectively, 5.4% in EU.

Since 2005, secondary and tertiary education has received more money than preschool or primary education. The education sector is strongly interconnected with public expenditure, since private funding accounted for 0.12% of the country's GDP in 2010, as compared to 0.82% in EU.

According to the UNICEF survey[1], currently, approximately two thirds of public spending on education targets two fifths of rich people (65.8%), and only 9.9% - poor people. At the same time, 61.2% of public expenditure on education targets urban educational facilities, despite efforts to reduce the gap between urban and rural areas. The two examples presented above show that there are major equality issues and that significant investments should be made to eliminate this gap between rich and poor people (for e.g., inclusive education policies).

In other words, if Romania were to progressively increase its investment in education between 2015 and 2025, i.e. from 4.1% to 6% of the GDP, economic growth would increase from 2% to 2.7% - 2.95%. On the other hand, boosting our average PISA scores would also lead to economic growth (the impact of quality education on economic development).

$$GDP = 7{,}86 * Public_exp + 75075{,}27$$

(2.93) (20884.59)

$$R^2 = 0{,}5$$

and, respectively,

$$lnGDP = 0{,}484558 * lnPublic_exp + 7{,}493406$$

(0.156) (1.375)

$$R^2 = 0{,}51$$

Thus, the equation (10) shows that Total public expenditure on education influence on GDP values is of 59%. A 1% increase in Total public expenditure on education would lead to a 0.48% increase in economic growth, while a 20% increase in Total public expenditure on education would trigger a 9.23% increase in GDP.

3.3.3. The impact of At least upper secondary educational attainment on GDP

This indicator aims to measure the share of the population that is likely to have the minimum necessary qualifications to actively participate in social and economic life. In 2015, it reached 82% at EU level, i.e. Croatia – the highest rate - 95.7%, followed by Ciprus – 94.3%, and Ireland – 92.7%. In Romania, it is 79.7%, which is close to the EU average.

$$GDP = 91901 * At_least_secondary - 6987316$$

(84242) (6623873)

$$R^2 = 0{,}11678823$$

and, respectively,

$$lnGDP = 21{,}5066 * lnAt_least_secondary - 81{,}9073$$

(12.30)(53.66)

$$R^2 = 0{,}25$$

Regression analysis indicates that At least upper secondary educational attainment influence on GDP values is of 11%. A 2.3% increase in the number of students graduating from secondary schools to reach EU average would lead to an 84.3% increase in GDP.

3.2.4. The impact of Tertiary educational attainment on GDP

This indicator aims to measure the share of the population aged 30-34 who have successfully completed tertiary studies. It hit 38% in 2015, at EU level, as compared to Lithuania, which held the leading position, i.e. 57.6%, followed by Cyprus - 54%, and Luxemburg - 52%. In Romania, this area experiences an upward trend, i.e. 25.6%.

$$GDP = 19449 * Tertiary - 123466$$

(23733.8) (454719.5)

$$R^2 = 0{,}069$$

and, respectively,

[1] Cost of Non-Investment in Education in Romania, UNICEF and MEN study.

$$lnGDP = 1{,}187959 * lnTertiary + 8{,}526990$$

(0.79) (2.29)

$$R^2 = 0{,}20$$

According to the regression equations developed based on EUROSTAT data for 2004-2015, Tertiary educational attainment influence on GDP values is of 6.9%. A potential 12% increase in Tertiary educational attainment to reach EU average would probably lead to a 60% increase in GDP.

3.2.5. The impact of Employment rates of recent graduates (economically active population) on GDP

According to EUROSTAT, in 2015, the percentage of economically active population[2], age class 20-64 years, in Romania, was lower (66%) than EU average (70%). The government target is to reach 70% until 2020[3]. As for the economically active population, age class 30-34 years, the percentage (78%) is higher than EU average, i.e. 77.7%, for the age class 25-29 years – above EU average (72.1% as compared to 72%), while for the age class 15-19 and 20-24, the percentage is below EU average.

$$PIB = 532 * Grd_ocupare - 519003$$

(906) (1321651)

$$R^2 = 0{,}41$$

and, respectively,

$$lnPIB = 2{,}44745 * lnGrd_ocupare - 5{,}78455$$

(2.49) (18.12)

$$R^2 = 0{,}10$$

The equations show that Employment rates of recent graduates influence on GDP values is of 41%. A 1% increase in the economically active population would lead to a 2.44% increase in GDP, while a 10% increase would probably trigger a 26.27% increase in GDP.

3.2.6. The impact of Population by educational attainment level on GDP

According to the OECD survey[4], the public returns to tertiary education are substantially large, i.e. thousands of dollars (on average across OECD countries, the net public return on an investment in tertiary education was, in 2011, 91,036 dollars for a man), not to mention the new jobs created, and the economic development fueled by innovation. Moreover, European Commission's Europe 2020 strategy[5] shows that almost 16 million new jobs will be created until 2020 for young graduates, while unqualified jobs will decrease by almost 12 millions. As a result, the need to invest in higher education is obvious, since the modern society relies on education as a source of economic growth. In addition, life satisfaction level is strongly influenced by education, the survey showing that the gap between graduates and non graduates is 18%.

In addition to these benefits, higher education helps students learn to think more critically, being focused on developing students as individual thinkers in search for the best solution, establishing thus the basis for more social and economic growth. Inclusive education is very important because it supports coherent and sustainable development at social and economic levels, solving the issues faced by all social categories with the help of qualified people.

$$GDP = 53674 * Population - 405081$$

(68743) (852371.8)

$$R^2 = 0{,}07$$

and, respectively,

$$lnGDP = 1{,}804858 * lnPopulation + 7{,}518492$$

(1.55) (3.88)

$$R^2 = 0{,}14$$

The regression equation (17) shows that Population by educational attainment level influence on GDP values is of 7%.

The log-log regression equation (19) illustrates that a 1% increase in the number of graduates would lead to a 1.8% increase in GDP, during the analyzed period. A potential 20% increase in the number of graduates would probably lead to a 39% increase in GDP.

3.2.7. The impact of Enrolment rate on GDP

As for the benefits of investing in education, the same survey[6] shows that one additional year of schooling increases earnings by 8-9%, reduces the probability of being unemployed by 8% and the probability of bad or very bad health or suffering from a chronic long-standing disease by 8.2%. Secondary school graduates earn more than primary or college graduates, i.e. by 25%-31%. Tertiary level graduates earn more than secondary school graduates, i.e. by 67%. The increase in the number of tertiary level graduates from 13.6% to 19%, in 2025 would lead to an approximately 3.6% increase in GDP. Even a slight increase in the number of secondary school graduates, i.e. from 58% to 59.7%, in 2025 would generate a 0.52% increase in GDP.

According to the same survey, at macroeconomic level, one additional year of schooling leads to an average 12.1% increase in GDP.

$$GDP = 18480 * Enrolment_rate - 996358$$

(27487) (1839069)

$$R^2 = 0{,}47$$

and, respectively, the log-log equation:

$$lnGDP = 4{,}54648 * lnEnrolment_rate - 7{,}13556$$

(3.50) (14.7)

$$R^2 = 0{,}15$$

The 0.47% coefficient of determination shows that Enrolment rate influence on GDP values is of 47%.

The log-log equation (21) can be interpreted as follows: a 1% increase in the enrolment rate would lead to a 4.54% increase in GDP, during the analyzed period. An alleged 10% increase in the enrolment rate would lead to a 54% increase in GDP.

4. Conclusions

To analyze the impact of education on Romania's GDP, research using statistical methods to determine specific economic and education indicators was conducted, i.e. based on EUROSTAT data. The analysis presented in this paper clearly illustrates the important role of skilled workforce on economic growth, i.e. the influence of specific educational indicators on GDP values. Thus, increasing levels of educations reduce the probability of being unemployed and increase earnings, which could lead to economic growth.

In conclusion, I believe that, in a constantly changing world, the achievement of the key goals concerning education, included in Europe 2020 strategy as well as in national policies, such as encouraging learning, reducing school drop-out rates, and improving skills, could make our dream that Romania would achieve smart, sustainable and inclusive growth come true.

THE FUTURE OF GLOBALIZATION

Adrian-Gabriel DINESCU[*]

Abstract

Once humanity had made the necessary technological leaps for promoting fast and easy travel, the acceleration of human endeavors was inevitable. This acceleration has made possible the integration and globalization of national economies, a global economy emerging. Globalization has become a force impossibile to resist and impossible to deny. Globalization has both advantages and disadvantages. The issue that humanity must understand is it cannot be reversed, just its disadvantages reduced or made bearable.

Keywords: globalization, isolationism, immigration, economic growth.

1. The birth, past and present of globalization

Globalization has been seen in the last few decades as a real driving force towards social and economic integration creating prospects for the general wellbeing of human kind.

Globalization has been viewed as a force which brings people together primarily through economic prosperity, as it has been considered that economic growth naturally results in a higher standard of living which in turn would end social turmoil and bring forth a new world filled with people being able to really enjoy their lives[1].

However, this utopian viewpoint has been contested by a multitude of reputable authors and also, generally, by a wide range of people which has begun to view globalization as a force of evil.

They highlighted that globalization is not a positive force, because it does not enrich the life of the average individual, but it does only enhance the wealth of multinational and transnational companies which feed upon the needs of underdeveloped countries, depleting them of resources and then moving on, leaving them in a barren state.

Also critics of globalization have claimed that it is the main reason why humanity will lose its direction by propagating global greed and by destroying most of its subcultures, languages and traditions.

An increasing number of scientists, but also regular citizens, consider globalization as the driving force responsible for the destruction of national identity, a force which will destroy the national culture of a country, eliminating everything that differentiates them for the other peoples of the world. Indeed globalization is named by some as "Americanization" simply because many corporations, which are considered to be the first "force" of globalization, are American based. In this "globalized" world, "the strong" shall have much more influence over "the weak" simply because the latter will become more dependent on the stronger culture's products but also ideals which the stronger culture will impose on the less dominant one.

However, after the end of the oil crisis of the 60's and the revival of the neo-liberal doctrine through-out the 80's, 90's and the first decade of the current century, generally, those who supported free-trade and liberal economics were those who had the power both nationally and internationally.

In the 80's, particularly, through the Reagan administration in the US and the through the Thatcher governance in the United Kingdom, the free market became the ruling force in global economics and politics.

This tendency of the free-trade countries to rejoice once again before the spoils of unbridled capitalism, coupled with the tremendous technological discoveries in IT&C at the end of the 80's and the beginning of the 90's spurred the acceleration of global integration and rejection of all trade tariffs and other barriers put forth at the beginning and middle of the 20th century.

The world seemed to be on the horizon of a new age, embodied by a certain economic and social union: the European Union.

Though made up of diverse peoples and cultures, though having a troubled history, primarily, because of economic interest, all these countries came together under the umbrella of a Union which promised not just economic freedom, but also individual rights and freedoms: the freedom to travel without restrictions, to find work in a free manner in any country of the Union, to be able to change residence without restrictions.

Although many would like to view this Union as a result of the enlightened nature of its citizens, the truth is that a few enlightened minds realized that only by joining forces Europe can stand on its own two feet in the globalized market in which giants like the United States, China, India and in a lesser degree, the Russian Federation fought for control.

Europe had to come together to avoid being assimilated by other powerful economies and become nothing more than consumer countries, which, on the long term, would lead to major economic problems.

Brilliant and visionary politicians had, thus, prevailed in stifling the isolationist and reactionary movements which tried to prevent European integration. In the last decades these politicians have managed, through no small feats, to persuade the general public, traditionally conservative, that the future of Europe lies in a general European federations.

These politicians have mastered the art of keeping under control the reactionary tendencies of humans and continued on the long road of trying to bring humans together and making them realize that the only way forward is through freedom of trade, open borders for all people and capitals.

2. Globalization : a positive force

Globalization implies that the entire world is one market, an opportunity for all countries to trade in those areas in which they are more efficient than others.

With all the national markets opened, the prices of many commodities will drop significantly and the entrepreneurs will be encouraged to raise efficiency, to create more for a smaller cost. Thus the consumers will benefit to a high extent from the liberalization of the markets. Looking for examples in the past one cannot ignore the growth of China which has opened its borders to outside investment only a few decades ago and which has resulted in a sky-rocketing economy.

Besides the obvious advantages which would result from opening of the national markets to exterior investors, globalization would effectively erase the immense cultural and financial differences between the western world and the majority of the population of the globe which live on only a fraction of the income of European or North-American citizens, most people of the globe currently living on extremely small wages and in very poor conditions.

Globalization generally brings technological development accompanied by sustainable economical growth that would greatly help the poor countries struggling to enter the informational era. Also by expanding alliances between nations and creating structures with more authority that a single state, law, order and peace will regain their rightful position in countries which hace seen terrible afflictions and war for decades in the absence of international intervention and corrupt governments or governments unable to impose law upon its citizens because of the lack of legislative tools. For example the African states (Somalia, Zimbabwe) would benefit a great deal from outside support to impose their laws, having great difficulties struggling with factions hoping to destabilize their countries. Making the country part of a greater structure will significantly increase the "force" of the state, as Francis Fukuyama[2] calls it.

Globalization is seen by many as an unstoppable force. Once set in motion at the half of the 20th century all countries will be forced to take measures to become integrated in the global economy, under pains of being left behind for good.

Lately, a lot of leaders have sought to express their regret and disbelief towards globalizations, but few of them dared to challenge its supremacy.

Most leaders who support liberal economic thought encourage the expansion of globalization because of it's the many advantages it brings forth for a nation.

Firstly, globalization creates the premise of intercultural relations, the freedom to express and share ideas. While most of the world languishes in general turmoil (most of the world still is firmly underdeveloped in relation to the west) an infusion of new ideas and approaches would be the only solution towards moving the planet along and creating an environment in which problems can be solved.

Also, getting to know other cultures encourages members of a certain society to get to know its own problems and mistakes, what sets it apart from other cultures, what it should preserve and what it should change.

Thus globalization leads to a rise in awareness of global issues which require global solutions.

Secondly, globalization promotes IT&C, facilitating the entire communication process between peoples and individuals, promoting, most of all, basic human rights.

People want to communicate with each other, they want to know other cultures. The internet, the globalization of the means of communication and the significant reduction in cost has permitted people to travel with unprecedented ease. All these advantages stem from globalization, and, at the same time, they enhance and accelerate it.

2.1. Globalization feeds itself and is unstoppable.

Thirdly, globalization has massively improved international exchange promoting the free flow of capital towards areas which most need it.

For example, after they were released from the colonial yoke the African countries found themselves with important natural resources, but devoid of money and knowledge to exploit these resources. Thus they chose either to privatize these resources or to loan the necessary funds from global financial institutions (IMF[3] etc.).

Furthermore, without the presence of international corporations which were interested in the rich pickings and cheap labor in those countries, the money lent by the international institutions could not the properly used as these countries almost always lacked the know-how to efficiently exploit the resources.

Fourthly, globalization has permitted and encouraged the "brain trade"[4] and internationalized the workforce.

The presence of an international global workforce has encouraged efficiency and collaboration between experts in all fields thus raising the standard of living of these people involved in international trade, but also improving the possibility of students to get to know important technological and economic advances[5].

Freedom of travel for the workforce is a crucial theme in globalization. Most workers come from the developing world and flow towards the developed world, but lately it seems that this trend has reversed and more workers flow towards developing nation which have attracted more and more capital[6].

Most people view this international migration as a positive force, as it allows people from all over the world to gather in extremely efficient think tanks discovering new ways to improve human lives, which, in turn, improves the lives of people left home in the mother-country which in turn gives rise to more and more scientifically astute individuals and thus increasing more and more the development of humanity.

Lastly, globalization has been a powerful force towards the democratization of governments.

Because most people prefer to live a comfortable and developed life, intellectually and economically, as globalizations brings many advantages, the ideas of democracy have entered the consciousness of many nations who don't have a democratic tradition. As capitalism seems to work best with liberal-democracy, and people seek to gain the most out of every endeavor, so more and more voices in oppressed countries have spoken against dictatorial regimes and have tried to empower democratically elected governments to implement liberty and democracy.

Thus, by indulging their egotistical desires, globalization and capitalism have led to the overthrow of authoritarian governments by peoples who sought to enter the global market by creating working competitive economies.

This has, in turn, lead to a significant rise in assuring human rights and promoting individual liberties[7].

Globalization means freedom of movement for all humanity.

Throughout the history of the world, humans tend to migrate, change place, as opportunity arises, seek the best land on which to settle min search of freedom, liberty and happiness.

The richest countries and regions in the world have been those who embraced diversity, the freedom of the individual to exchange ideas, goods and services.

This is a truth we consider to be self-evident. Humanity can only expand if people can come and go according to the interest of society or for their own individual interest.

As societies which ensure freedom of movement will see a greater technological and economic growth than those who stay closed, the latter ones, in time, will suffer economic recession as their technology will become obsolete and will not serve the needs of individuals.

Globalization cannot be reversed as the means of travel have evolved immensely after the industrial revolution. The invention of the steam engine, the internal combustion engine and the latest computer technology make travelling something pleasant, to be enjoyed, rather than something dangerous like it has been since time immemorial.

Since traveling has become such an easy and pleasant affair, many more people become involved in visiting other cultures, learning about them and discussing ideas with people across the world.

This change of ideas outweighs tendencies in the majority of people to seek isolation as these ideas make people realize that they are more alike than they thought and that they have a lot more to gain by being allies than by being enemies.

2.2. Globalization brings peace.

In such a moment of technological, economical and ideological progress, war will become not just undesired, but it will become obsolete, as its consequences will become so dire for individuals (in an increasingly individualistic world) that no one will want to fight wars and sacrifice their lives or their economic achievements.

Also, since more people will come together to discuss ideas, their differences will seem less and less important, and so the likelihood of conflict will reduce.

3. Reactionary movements against globalization[8] and the negative side of globalization

Unfortunately, egotistical tendencies in all humans have dark sides when they are unleashed: extreme nationalism, isolationism, xenophobia.

These tendencies coupled with certain forces: the capitalistic forces of the big companies which, indirectly, have lead people to not trust conservative politicians who tried to force higher goals than just general mindless consumerism, by indulging their primordial needs of pure consumption and through the massive use of pop-culture that encourages a life lived for personal, instantaneous pleasure. Also another significant force has been represented by extremist politicians who gained a significant foothold as a result of people who have an extremely limited view of economic and social sciences, but, as it should be stated, are entitled to be upset because are situated at the painful end of capitalism.

These people feel they have suffered because of immigration, because of open borders which they feel have taken away, on the short term, their livelihood, through the forces of productivity. Also the intense speed of modern and post-modern life, accelerated cultural changes and other similar factors that have pushed people into trying to put an end to all this change.

People saw the ultra-nationalistic movements, the extremist anti-immigrant movements as solutions to complicated problems. These people can't see an end to their self-imposed or even imagined suffering and thus they romanticize the past and try to recreate simpler times.

Unfortunately, globalization, arguably, does have some unavoidable negative aspects. While some countries are able to implement policies to protect themselves again these issues, most cannot and are destined to live with significant burdens in exchange of development.

Firstly, critics of globalization claim that it increases inequality between individuals as it promotes a capitalistic-greed based system - the "get rich fast" mentality.

Countries must ensure the rule of law within their borders and must maintain a healthy judicial system.

If a state is weak then it will attract less foreign capital because entrepreneurs prefer a stable and predictable system in which to invest. A stable and predictable system curtails not only the rule of law, but also low levels of corruption.

This foreshadows a difficult area. Globalization tends, sometimes, to increase corruption in underdeveloped states.

Foreign capital, while it can be extremely beneficial towards the progress of a certain region, can bring devastation to the environment and the inhabitants of that area, when the regulatory body of that country cannot impose efficient constrains on the respective investor.

Entrepreneurs will rightfully try to maximize their investment irrespective of the environment and the locals.

Protecting the lives of people and the environment is not the job of the investor, the capitalist, the corporation which sets up shop in a new area. In the neo-liberal mindset that is the role of the state, the arbiter, to set up rules that everyone must follow under penalty of law.

If there are no rules or these rules are not followed then the capitalist has no obligation to protect either people or environment.

Since most underdeveloped countries lack the judicial system to counter the wealthy multinational companies than it is easy to see why globalization has brought destruction and misery in significant parts of the world.

For example, Nigeria, a developing country situated in the West of Africa has important oil reserves which have produced over the last few decades hundreds of billions of dollars in revenue. But, like a certain study suggests, only a tiny part of these revenues have gone into state coffers, approximately one billion dollars, the rest going to investors and corrupt government officials.

Also Nigeria, being a country full of natural resources, has seen its environment destroyed by greedy entrepreneurs who chose to profit from corruption, bypassing stringent environment regulations.

Thus, for weak states, globalization can actually accentuate poverty, greed and corruption.

Secondly, some claim that globalization represents a trap for numerous undeveloped countries. Trying to find sources of foreign investment to become competitive, these countries fall prey either to greedy investors who, taking advantage of corrupt civil servants, acquire important resources for an insignificant amount of capital, either to international creditors, like the International Monetary Fund which put forth stringent criteria for loans, as well as instating huge penalties when in breach of contract.

Some even claimed that several African countries have been bankrupted exactly by the conduct of the IMF, lending money and imposing severe economic measures which more often cause severe damage for the economy.

Thirdly, in the globalized economy the markets rule and indirectly impose their will on people through the products they promote.

If states involved in the global trade would be equal, have similar levels of development, have advanced judicial systems and state power, have peoples of similar values, then the system would be entirely functional.

[8] R Boyer, D Drache, "States gainst markets: the limits of globalization", 2005, Google Books.

But since states involved in the global trade are extremely different, ranging from small underdeveloped countries with failed economic systems to big capitalist, powerful democratic states, it is evitable that the latter will impose their will and their products.

These big states which have known unprecedented growth throughout the early 20th century now have an advanced lead against the developing world which is forced to accept its cheap products.

Also, these advanced states impose their political will against developing nations and force them to adopt standards, especially concerning environmental protection, that are almost impossible to follow by countries which are barely ”getting on their feet”. Basically, the developed countries impose strict regulations on developing states which prevent them from catching up.

These undeveloped countries are caught in a vicious circle which the developed states prevent them from breaking : they do not have the productivity to compete on the global market with their own products and need foreign investments, but these foreign investments come with a big cost as they stem from the developed countries and also, they cannot catch up as the developed world does not allow them to use high-pollution but cheap technologies which they themselves used at the beginning of the 20th century.

But more or less these voices were initially situated at the fringes of modern society, in an area where usually extremist factions used to sit.

Lately, a huge rise in these tendencies has been recorded, reaching its pinnacle in 2017, after the election by the nation with the highest GDP in the world of a leader who stated he will massively limit immigration, try to impose trade tariffs and barriers meant to “protect” national industries. In a nutshell, a return to the isolationist movement of the early 20th century, which hardly has any chance of improving people’s lives nowadays as it has coincided with an era of economic acceleration and world integration.

As this paper is being written the United Kingdom has declared that it is has initiated procedures in preparation of the withdrawal from the European Union. As the United Kingdom is composed of several states, Scotland, in which most citizens prefer to remain in the European Union, has announced that it will once again try to separate from the United Kingdom in order to remain in the European Union[9].

4. Mistrust of globalization

Thus the present confronts us? Will the European project fail as more and more countries secede? Will the United States of America become an isolationist, anti-immigrant, protectionist country, imposing harsh barriers on the world economy? Will these two major events form a barrier that will hamper world economical growth and bring forth a new form of economic stagnation that will hamper growth for decades to come?

Will globalization fail because of increasing isolationism and xenophobia?

In answering these questions I do believe that globalization is a force that cannot be stopped as humanity has never reverted back to previous states, even though it has had major ups and downs in its development.

I remain essentially an optimist, confident that humanity will always realize that it’s not walls and isolation that facilitated its accelerated growth throughout thousands of years of evolutions, but the collaboration between individuals, peoples, nations, states and federations of states.

Humanity has had its moments which seemed to herald total destruction, moments which apparently would bring the end of civilizations. For example, the fall of Rome seemed for the casual observer as the fall of civilization and it seemed that humanity would never see again the heights of development. Yet, after a long period indeed, humanity, stabilized its self and it began to create works of art even greater than before, to involve itself in technological pursuits with more passion than ever before.

Even in modern times, after the Second World War, humanity seemed on the verge of collapse. Europe lay in ruins, two atomic bombs had been dropped on Japan and bolshevism seemed to be unstoppable. Yet, after only 50 years, most major dictatorships have been overturned, Europe and Japan have reached new heights of technological development, the global GDP has seen a steady increase and humanity now enjoys a long period of peace and stability.

Without a doubt, in my opinion, this tendency of humanity to react with vigor and determination after every “wrong choice” it made is irrefutable.

In spite of the current trends I believe that globalization cannot be stopped, but it can be hampered and its negative aspects can be made to seem extraordinary.

Globalization promotes fast movement of capital around the world. It is very useful for countries who need capital to develop industries, but it is very problematic for states who have reached a certain middle ground – they are not the source of the capital investments, but they are not so underdeveloped that capital flows towards them. In other words it is the paradox of capitalism and globalization that, after the capital has been infused, once a certain level of development has been reached, and the price of the work-force has risen due to economic growth and the extraction costs of resources have become greater due to the free flow of capital, money will tend to leave the respective country and move to another one in which labor is cheaper and resources plentiful, leaving the population of that respective country, more often than not, in a recession or a stagnation, increasing frustration, forgetting that, at one time, that country was the beneficiary of capital.

[9] For a detalied study on the departure of the United Kingdom from the European Union also see : BBC, Brexit: „All you need to know about the UK leaving the EU” http://www.bbc.com/news/uk-politics-32810887.

But, since economic growth is exponential, the movement of capital cannot be stopped and has accelerated rapidly in the latter decades of the 20th century as more and more countries open their borders seeking the riches that capitalism promises.

Since capital has made several countries extremely rich and thus has permitted unprecedented technological development, other countries which are poorer and less technologically advanced, will not be able to refuse the entry of capital as this would mean accepting technological backwardness.

Thus, the free movement of capital cannot be prevented if a certain country desires to maintain its technological development in relation to other countries.

5. Conclusion

In spite of the latest development, in my view, fears that humanity will spiral into some backward state of isolation and war are unwarranted because globalization is an unavoidable result of the permanent human desire to become part of a bigger, greater structure, as it began millennia ago with the first community and reaching the point of a "global village".

We are simply traversing a period of heightened tension become of many concurring factors: the speed of change, the complexity of change, unprecedented technological development.

Also, the perils of climate changes must not be overlooked as humanity is being presented with a unique challenge, as the consequences of actions of present generations will be felt in 100 – 200 years, a situation for which modern or post-modern man is not really prepared.

Moreover, the capitalistic based system of consumption which we created for ourselves, which must not be mistaken for globalization, cannot sustain such a huge global population, under current conditions, and thus people must impose upon themselves certain limitations. Most people will not suffer these limitations as they consider it their essential right to consume and to enjoy their lives whichever way they want.

But, the fact that humanity will have to learn to limit its desires does not and cannot equal a halting of progress, as the latter can be achieved through sustainable methods which preserve the Earth for future generations as well as satisfy the needs of the many.

This period of heightened tension – a real step backwards – unfortunately, will last 10-20 years in which humanity will try to find its equilibrium and to try to shake these isolationist tendencies as it shook its tendencies towards a communist-socialist type state, very tempting in theory, but horrible in practice.

Unfortunately, humanity does not seem to learn from its mistakes so this period will have to wear its self out. People will have to feel the consequences of their choices, but I do maintain my optimism. The European Union will not secede and the European project will continue towards political integration and the formation, in a generation or two, of the United States of Europe[10].

Also, the United States of America will realize that electing to power politicians who breed mistrust, hate, xenophobia, isolationism and protectionism will not lead to an improvement in the lives of its citizens, but the contrary. After a short experiment in "politics of hate" the American people will undoubtedly wake and realize that future will be in cooperation and globalization.

Of course, this period will cost us dearly: spoiled economic growth, lost technological opportunities and not the least, wasted human lives.

But humanity has always suffered before it realized the error of its ways and this situation will be no different.

The future will reside in a globalized economy, in a globalized humanity.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND POLITICAL FACTS AND PERSPECTIVES OF 2017

Liviu RADU[*]
Carmen RADU[]

Abstract

Following the turbulent year of 2016, with deep geopolitical changes, the new year of 2017 promises to be full of challenges in what concerns the economic, social, political and geostrategic area. The key events of the last year (the Brexit, the elections in the USA, the events in Turkey, the force demonstrations of Russia, the situation of the migration wave etc.) shall have an impact on the global economic development and on the repositioning of its main actors. This paperwork intends to analyze the main consequences of the recent events on the short term progress in what concerns the economic, social, political and geostrategic area.

We hereby intend to review the facts and the main potential progress on the economic status of this year which was so complicated, both for the European Union and for every member of it.

Keywords: geopolitical changes, geostrategy, Brexit, economic status, crisis.

1. Introduction

The past year represented a troubled period, full of unexpected transformations and developments. The events of 2016 determine any medium and log term assessment to become hazardous and uncertain both from the economic point of view and from the social, political and geostrategic perspective. The economic unions, governments and military alliances which seemed to be unshakable are nowadays on quicksand, making every prediction to be not only uncertain, but even risky.

The basis of good governance is represented by several defining elements, such as[1]:

- The participation of the citizens and the increase of their involvement within the decision-making system;
- The equity and fairness should be the degree by which the laws apply equally to everyone regardless of the social status.
- The decency, the scope being that the rules are established and managed without certain categories/groups of persons being damaged;
- The responsibility, the scope being that the institutional and political actors are seen as being held liable for their decisions and actions by the persons who are affected by such actions and decisions;
- The transparency, the scope being that the decisions which are made and implemented are made available to the citizens. The information has to be clear and accessible to everyone.
- The effectiveness and efficiency, meaning the carefulness applied for the use of human and financial resources.

The functional categories which can be found in every political system and the consequences of which we find reflected in good governance are the following: civil society, political society, government, bureaucracy, economic society and judiciary system. James Madison said (Federalist Paper nr.51) „If men were angels, no government would be necessary". Since we agree that humans are far from the angelic behavior, we agree that we need something or someone to lead us or at least to coordinate the activities (but we must not forget that the main reason for existence of that governance is to serve the man and the community he lives in). „For the first time in our history, in an increasingly multipolar external world, so many are becoming openly anti -European, or Eurosceptic at best", as Donald Tusk wrote in the letter addressed to the 27 leaders of the countries which will remain EU members, after Great Britain will have left the European Union. The president of the European Council proposed the subject of the „internal threat which is connected with the rise in anti-EU, nationalist increasingly xenophobic sentiment". „National egoism is also becoming an attractive alternative to integration", in addition centrifugal tendencies and „the decline of faith of the pro-European elites in political integration, as well as the doubts in the fundamental values of liberal democracy" are other subject proposed by Donald Tusk.

We live in such a society where, in the spirit of the fair political thinking, to admire someone or someone's creation is a blasphemy, because this means that the inequality among people is acknowledged. The idea of awarding prizes for certain merits is also convicted because the rewarding would mean to „insult" and to „under-privilege" other persons[2]. In his book, „A Study Of Our Decline", philosopher Philip Atkinson (n. 1947)[3] stated the following: By using the excuse of not upsetting anyone, "the political correctness" is demanding that people behave like a fool who would please everyone[4]. That everyone must become such a fool! All must accept the notions of the "Political correctness" as a truth. Woe to those who fail to do so! This is the same mentality that inspired the Inquisition and forced Galileo Galilei to recant. The same mentality that inspired the Nazis and lead to the Holocaust. Once the freedom of speech gets placed in the straitjacket of the official truth, then the madness that occurs in all totalitarian states is obtained. Life, both private and public, becomes a meaningless charade where delusion thrives and terror rules.

British writer Phyllis Dorothy James (n. 1920) stated the following: „I believe that political correctness can be a form of linguistic fascism, and it sends shivers down the spine of my generation who went to war against fascism" The USA President, George Bush, stated that: The notion of „political correctness" declares certain topics off-limits, certain expression off-limits, even certain gestures off-limits. What began as a crusade for civility has soured into a cause of conflict and censorship. In a speech hold on May 2011, Camilla, Duchess of Cornwall declared: „political correctness is as severe a form of censorship as any"[5].

In the spirit of those already announced, we will however venture to analyze events that have already occurred, trying to take a look in the not to distant future starting from the paradigm: we are alone and maybe against all (Great Britain) or we are together in the EU (France) and then we accept. And if we accept, what is the trend and what are we heading to?

2. 2016 was a year marked by major changes

2.1. The European Union had, at least apparently, consistent and flexible public policies, which were adapted to the current situation and which were intended to enable the member states to have periods of social and economic development.

The crisis of sovereign debts and especially the financial crisis of Greece, the crisis of the migration from the Middle East to Europe, especially generated by the civil war of Syria, highlighted rigid European institutional structures, unable to make consistent and fast decisions. The response time and the bureaucracy of Brussels proved to be out of touch with political, economic and social realities, managing to widen the gap between the European citizens and governing institutions. Under these terms, the wave of scepticism towards the European constitution reached a level that has never been encountered in the 60 years since the creation of the Union.

In countries such as France, Italy, Great Britain, Poland, Hungary, Netherlands and others, the feeling of uncertainty, called Euroscepticism, towards the protection granted by the structures of the European Union reached emergency levels. The first country which, by means of its representatives, called the citizens to decide on the staying in or leaving the European Union was Great Britain. At that time, there were few analysts who predicted correctly the outcome of British referendum of June 23rd, 2016. By the time of the brexit, very few insiders were aware of the existence of article 50[6] of the Treaty on the European Union, which provides the possibility of a Member State to leave voluntarily the Union.

The waves of migration, the specter of escalation of terrorism, the economic developments, the demonstrations and protests, the vanity of the great European powers on the background of an aggressive policy of Russia[7], all made possible the well known outcome. For the first time in its history, the European Union reduces the number of members by activating article 50 of the Treaty of Lisbon, which is expected to occur by the end of March 2017 (the meeting of Rome of March 25th, 2017 for the 60th anniversary of the Rome treaties establishing the European Community).

After the Second World War, despite the eternal rivalry between France and Germany (France-Russia alliance versus triple alliance Germany, Italy and Austria-Hungary), the German people managed slightly better than the French people to integrate the refugees of Algeria and the Polish people forced to leave Ukraine. If at the beginning of the last century we talked about the concept of the "White man's burden" to civilize the societies considered primitive, nowadays Germany and France are trying together to integrate the massive wave of Arab migrants. If after the war the migrants came from countries with customs, religions or cultures which were somehow similar, nowadays we are facing a completely different situation. In Germany,

(1)Any Member State can decide, according to its constitutional requirements, to withdraw from the Union.
(2) A Member State which decides to withdraw shall notify the European Council of its intention. In the light of the guidelines provided by the European Council, the Union shall negotiate and conclude an agreement with that State, setting out the arrangements for its withdrawal, taking account of the framework for its future relationship with the Union. That agreement shall be negotiated in accordance with Article 218(3) of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union. It shall be concluded on behalf of the Union by the Council, acting by a qualified majority, after obtaining the consent of the European Parliament.

after 20108, 5.8% of the population is represented by the Muslims, in France 7.5% of the population and in Russia 10% and the percentages have increased a lot (at least in Germany) after the wave of migrants in 2015.

What was the cause of this phenomenon? What happened with the changing of the alliances pattern or with the old rivalries? As shown in the previous CKS articles, most migrants come from countries in military conflicts. But why did a part of the Europeans hurry to receive them?

The literature[9]gives contradictory examples on the effects of the migration on the economic and social status of the host country or home country. The positive effect for the host countries would consist in the reviving of the physically and morally worn workforce. Europeans in particular, and maybe all developed countries, are facing population aging phenomenon, both an aging in terms of the average age and also an aging of customs, traditions and lifestyle. But the negative effects of the migration for the host country would be linked to the changes in what concerns the volume and the structure of the employees and to the lowering of the minimum wage.

Another positive aspect, this time for the home countries (according to Global News Intelligence of February 3rd, 2017) would be the transfers of emigrants (of money and goods) to the home countries. Money transfers are a reliable source of external financing generating a steady income in the home countries of the migrants. Constant revenue encourages the domestic consumption and reduces poverty and increases the standard of leaving. At the same time, skilled workforce migration to more developed regions causes a significant loss of income, a slowing of the development and of the economic growth, the decrease of the productivity and the decrease of the foreign investments in the home country. Furthermore, the emigration of a large part of the workforce from a country results in the increase of the financial obligations (taxes, charges) of the workers who remain in the country, in their capacity of budget revenue supporters.

Furthermore, in conclusion, we can state that an advantage of the host country becomes a disadvantage of the home country of the emigrants, and vice versa, the advantages of leaving the home country in a state of conflict may lead to serious problems, especially security problems for the host country.

2.2. Turkey was, until the summer of 2016, the most solid Western ally in the Middle East and the most modern and developed country of the Muslim area. The proof is the 18th position among the powerful countries of the world by the size of the GDP. Furthermore, Turkey was and is still considered a democratic, secular, unitary, constitutional republic, with an old cultural and historical heritage. Given its strategic location, the developed economy and modernized army, Turkey is classified as a regional power by the politicians and economists worldwide. Turkey has become increasingly integrated by means of the western membership in organizations such as the European Council, NATO, OECD, OSCE and major economies G-20. Turkey began complete negotiations with the EU in 2005, has been an associate member of the European Economic Community since 1963 and reached the customs union agreement in 1995. Furthermore, Turkey promoted the cultural, political, economic and industrial relationships with the East, in particular with the Middle East and the Turkish states of Central Asia, by means of the membership to organizations such as Islamic Conference and Economic Cooperation Organization.

By maintaining its pro-Western orientation, the relationships with Europe have always been a central part of Turkish foreign policy. Another defining aspect of the external relations of Turkey was represented by its relations with the USA. Based on the common threats posed by the Soviet Union, Turkey joined NATO in 1952, by ensuring close bilateral relations with the United States during Cold War.

On July 15th, 2016 a failed coup d'etat organized by the Council of Peace, a group of soldiers of the Armed Forces of Turkey occurred in Turkey. The coup was confirmed both by the prime minister and by the president who called the people to street protests. There were certain doubts on the authenticity of the coup attempt: the coup starts in the evening and it is limited to major cities such as Ankara and Istanbul, no member of the government or of the parliament was taken hostage, and the media was not prohibited to broadcast the events. The way the Turkish President benefited from the coup attempt is noteworthy: his popularity increased and he received support in order for his function to be converted in an executive presidency. The consequences of the coup consisted of long lists of arrested persons, including over 2,000 judges, hundreds of thousands of dismissals and generally the removal of undesirable persons or persons disliked by the government.

As shown, the strategic location, the developed economy and modernized army make Turkey a great regional power which managed to stand as a safeguard against the huge wage of migrants coming to Europe. Notwithstanding, the events triggered by the coup d'etat brought forward all the relationships that Turkey hardly established with the European Union. Therefore, the accession process will be particularly difficult and will probably take decades due to the fact that cultural, religious and even attitude disagreements between Turkish citizens and European Union citizens still exist.

2.3. The election year of 2016 of the United States of America was initially expected to be a gallop for the health of democratic candidate Hillary Clinton. The most optimistic republican analysts estimated in early 2016 a close race between the democratic and the republican candidate but with a foreseeable victory for former Secretary of State Clinton. Throughout the preliminary elections and the direct campaign between the two final candidates, Hillary Clinton and Donald Trump, most of the polling houses believed that Mrs. Clinton could not lose the race for the White House. With few exceptions, the American media and a great part of the opinion leaders campaigned pro Clinton without anticipating the final outcome. The proof of the unexpected outcome was represented by the street protests of young Americans[10] and the shock wave that hit the planet, the immediate fall of the US dollar by 2% and the losses of Asian stock exchange. Trump drew attention on domestic policy issues, such as illegal immigration, offshoring, on the issue of the American jobs abroad, on the national debt of the United States and Islamic terrorism; all these were important subjects during his election campaign. He launched his campaign slogan "Make America Great Again". Furthermore, throughout his election campaign, Trump said that he contemned political correctness[11] trying to return America to its citizens.

Republican representative Donald Trump won the race for White House following the elections of 2016 although he lost the national popular vote with a difference of almost 3 million votes, namely 2.1% of the total votes. After taking over his position, on January 2017, Donald Trump becomes the oldest American president and the first president who did not benefit from a prior government or military experience. Although he is considered arrogant, conceited, populist and sometimes sexist, after a blind test conducted by a group of evaluators, Trump achieved the highest score of all Republican competitors. All those who listened to recordings of texts and speeches unanimously recognized that the use of first person pronoun, the grandness, richness, dynamics and tone, but especially informal type communication were in favor of Donald Trump. Anyway, the election of the 45th US president in the person of Donald Trump means a major change of paradigm after decades of continuity of US policy.

2.4. 2016 revealed, besides many other inconsistencies, the increase of the number of states the governments of which show real pro-Russian sympathies although they are members of the European Union and partners of NATO (Hungary, Slovakia, Czech Republic, Greece and Turkey). Therefore, by means of the presidential elections which occurred last year, Bulgaria and Republic of Moldova also entered the pro-Russian sympathies area. Therefore, the Republic of Moldova risks to move away from the pro-European and pro-Atlantic ideal. Therefore, the cohesion within the European Union and NATO are seriously questioned.

3. 2017 - a year of certainties?

3.1. As of the beginning of 2017 (January) the glooms of the analysts found their resonance in the first measures taken by Trump administration. Therefore, a series of measures were proposed for the protection of American workers and for the restoration of the security and of the rule of law: the renegotiation of the North American Free Trade Agreement, the immediate withdrawal of the United States from transpacific partnership, the claiming of China as "currency manipulator country" at the World Trade Organization (WTO), the annulment of "millions of dollars allocated for the UN " in the program on climate change control and the withdrawal of the United States from the [11] this policy recommends avoiding forms of expression which marginalize or insult socially disadvantaged persons, disabled persons or those who were discriminated on grounds of gender, race, ethnicity, etc.

"Treaty of Paris"[12]. Furthermore, the limitation of the number of mandates of the officials elected in the American Congress is proposed, as well as the repeal of health insurance program "Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act" or popularly called Obamacare[13] introduced in 2010, program in which millions of Americans signed in order to get access to medical services. In fact, the program meant the existence of a redistributive system whereby young, healthy, good financial persons, who benefited from health insurance paid by the employer were bound[14] to subsidize the elderly, poor health, low income or low paid jobs persons. Furthermore, Trump administration wants the annulment of all Obama decrees. In what concerns the migrants, the new leader of the White House proposes the expulsion of the "two millions of undocumented criminals" and the annulment of the visas for the countries which refuse to take them back. Furthermore, the suspension of visas for "regions affected by terrorism", building a boundary wall on the border with Mexico, financed in full by the Mexicans and the modification of visa regulations. Other proposals provide tax cuts, introduction of customs fees in order to sanction the societies which delocalize their production, consolidation of the army etc.

The new American administration orientations can radically change the trend of liberalization of the international trade of the last 20 years with major repercussions on the upward trend of the economy of the last two, three years.

3.2. Unfortunately, the situation of France before the wave of migrants, which unhappily overlaps a growing and little integrated Muslim population, represented a rebirth of the feelings against Islamist migration, which were somehow dormant over the past 40 years. The terrorist attacks of France and Belgium made the very heart of Europe bleed. Brussels is broken in two and makes the capital of Europe itself to be an extremely unsafe city.

The French presidential elections will be held most likely in two rounds, on April 23rd and May 7th, the legislative elections for the National Assembly will take place on June 11th-18th and for the Senate on September 23rd. According to the polls Marine Le Pen has the best chance to win[15] the presidency of France. The inconsistency comes from the fact that Mrs. Le Pen is known as the leader of far-right party National Front. Mrs. Le Pen believes that the political divisions in Europe are not far-right or far-left but they are classified as "populist and globalist" and she is on the globalist side as the most occidental leaders of the Western world. Notwithstanding, the government program of Mrs. Le Pen provides the waiver of the single European currency and the organization of a referendum on leaving the European Union. The slogan used by Donald Trump which still seems to be of great interest is rephrased by Marine Le Pen: "Give France freedom back and give the people a voice" seems detached from an instruction manual for winning presidential elections.

All these problems encountered by French society which overlap Hollande government which is considered to be the weakest government in the history of the Republic, the proof of this being the data on the significant decrease of the GDP between 2014 and 2015, public deficits in 2017 (-4.7%) and in 2018 (-4.5%), appear to go in favor of Mrs. Le Pen. Another way for France could be the winning of the elections by liberal François Fillon, former French prime minister, who proposes the most drastic austerity program[16]. The former prime minister of Nicolas Sarkozy undertook that, if he is elected president in May 2017, he will implement a saving program of 110 billion Euros in public finances. A third of the expenditure reduction would be on the account of the state budget, 20% from the local collectivities, and the rest from the social security budget (by retirement at the age of 65, the reduction of health costs). In order to achieve these savings, François Fillon promises to abolish 500,000 budget jobs, to raise the retirement age at 65 in 2022, to harmonize the retirement regime, to impose a work program of 39 hours in the budgetary system. For economy recovery, Fillon promises the injection of 40 billion Euros in order to reduce tax burden on the companies and to decrease the taxes for the companies to 25%, all this being financed by an increase of two points of the VAT. The question is if the French accept at least 5 years of austerity, on the one hand, and on the other hand, the simple presence at Elysee palace of a representative of Euroscepticism and of an opponent of the European currency would generate distrust on the international financial markets. Even a potential failure of the referendum which would question the membership of France with the European Community would cause major changes on the community policies.

Regardless of the alternative chosen by the French, on the short term, a solution to the threat of terror (France is under siege as of November 2015 and the siege will be extended until July 2017) and to the risk of economic downturn deepening must be found.

3.3. As of the establishment (1993 after the Maastricht Treaty when the European Economic Community became EU) and until present, EU did not face more controversial parliamentary or presidential election than those occurring this year. Therefore, will the federal parliamentary elections of September 24th of Germany, bring again to the forefront the concept of "political correctness"[17]? Or will the Germans look around and ask for "a Germany only of Germans"? Germany is the economic engine of Europe's development despite all the problems it has faced in the recent years. It is the first and most powerful European country in terms of the development of macroeconomic indicators (USD 3,355,772 billion in 2015, third place after the United States of America, Japan and China), and the main promoter of migration policy.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel is considered by the German and European public opinion as the politician who opened the gates of Europe for the wave of migration and for its related hazards. The opening of the borders performed by Merkel raised major security issues both in Germany, and across Europe, problems which have not represented such a great danger even since the Second World War. Public opinion saw in these pro-migration measures a lack of analysis and predictability which is difficult to accept in case of an administration with so much experience like the administration of Mrs. Merkel. The almost total overlooking of the danger of increasing terrorist risk, the overlooking of the French experience of over 40 years on the difficulty of integrating Muslim societies in the society of Western values could not be without visible consequences in the polls of popularity of the German cabinet. The premise of Berlin cabinet on the settlement of young labor force shortage by means of Syrian refugees is fundamentally wrong. The model of German society (usually Western) and the Muslim society are and shall be in complete antithesis and their harmonization cannot fit in a reasonable timeframe and without undesirable repercussions. It is hard to believe that a Western, traditional society will easily accept to change its lifestyle and social, moral and cultural values in order to facilitate the integration of the newcomers, with more rigid concepts. It is believed that more than a half of German voters would vote for democratic social chancellor Martin Schulz (twice president of the European Parliament between 2012-2017), compared to 34 percentages for Christian Democratic Merkel. A potential defeat of Mrs. Merkel in September elections would be a clear signal given by the German society on the fact that it does not accept, even for the sake of the economic growth, to abandon its principles and values.

In this context, in full agreement with the Eurosceptics, the economic and political analysts, including the governor of the National Bank of Romania, Mugur Isărescu believe that we are facing great changes of position of the countries before the international trade treaties, which will lead to great economic, political and geostrategic disturbances. The US elections, the British vote for leaving the European Union and the elections which will occur in France and Germany marks the end of globalization, as perceived by now, or at least its orientation to new position, a significant process of the last quarter of century.

Conclusions

A careful historical analysis reveals that as of the French Revolution (1789-1799) and until present, our evolution met in every century an average of three inflection periods which strongly influenced the mankind, changing its horizon of expectation. French Revolution was followed by the decline of the Napoleonic area of 1815, the European revolutions of 1848 and the Franco-Prussian War of 1870, which marked the 19th century. The beginning of the 20th century brings to the fore the First World War (1914-1918), considered a mistake[18], with global repercussions, due to poor decisions made in crucial moments. American author John Stoessinger, global diplomacy professor, considers that the outbreak of the First World War was the direct result of bad decisions made by influential people in key positions at that point in time[19]. People in important areas lacking of empathy and trapped by self-deception made unreal decisions, according to the same author. Later, the Second World War (1939-1945) was marked by the growing of nationalism, racism, German Nazism, Italian fascism and Japanese militarism. The expansionist policy of Germany and Italy, the revisionism of states such as Germany, Soviet Union, Hungary or collective security system promoted by the League of Nations represented elements of instability across Europe. The reconfiguration of the global map (Tripartite Pact, Axis 1936), the decline of Western democracies led to the breaking in two of the Eastern Europe by signing the non-aggression treaty between Germany and USSR of 1939. The next are the revolutions of 1989 which changed the world, by the transfer of power in Eastern Germany (the fall of Berlin wall), Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria and Albania. The violent transfer of power in Romania, the collapse of the Soviet Union, the war in Yugoslavia and the bloody repression of the demonstrations in China meant a return of the people to primitive times, by fault of the world great powers.

The events meant powerful transformations with devastating impact on the economic, political and social life. If we think about the changing of the communist totalitarian regime in the Eastern Europe and the modification of all state structures caused by the establishment of the democracy, privatization of state owned enterprises, private property establishment, the emergence of small business, the change of the commercial partnerships and the attempts to establish a state of law, all these meant several years of failed attempts for a number of states. All these events which are clearly cyclical make us believe that the history keeps repeating and that we are caught in the whirl of events heading towards something. Furthermore, a recent Freedom hause*20* report points out that in the recent years the European and global democracy has been in real danger due to the accession to power of populist and nationalist groups in countries such as Poland, Hungary, Slovakia, Czech Republic or Serbia. The report stresses potential adverse evolutions, throughout 2017 in Czech Republic, Denmark and USA.

The economic and social environment cannot develop without a strong rule of law, which has no political, social and legislative stability. Domestic investors, and especially foreign investors, expect seriousness and predictability from the decision making bodies of the areas where they want to invest. Militant populism and nationalism can offer neither stability, nor predictability, but unfulfilled promises, major budget deficit and uncertainty. In conclusion, the biggest certainty of 2017 is the uncertainty.

[20] Freedom in the World 2017.

AMOR FATI: LOVE THYSELF BY BECOMING WHAT YOU ARE! NIETZSCHE ON THE FREEDOM OF THE WILL

Mihai NOVAC[*]

Motto: "There is no reality except the one contained within us. That is why so many people live such an unreal life. They take the images outside them for reality and never allow the world within to assert itself. You can be happy that way. But once you know the other interpretation you no longer have the choice of following the crowd."[]

Abstract

Nietzsche's distinction between the master and the slave moralities is certainly one of his most notoriously famous moral and political notions. To claim that there are two main perspectives on the world, one belonging to the accomplished, the other to the unaccomplished side of humanity and, moreover, that the last two millennia of European alleged cultural progress constitute, in fact, nothing more than the history of the progressive permeation of our entire Weltanschauung, of our very values, thoughts and feelings by the so called slave morality, while all the more finding the virtue of this process in a future self-demise of this entire decadent cultural and human strain, is something that has shocked and enraged most of the ideological philosophers ever since. As such, at a certain moment, despite their substantial doctrinaire differences, almost everybody in the ideologized philosophical world, would agree on hating Nietzsche: he was hated by the Christians, for claiming that "God is dead", by the socialists for treating their view as herd or slave mentality and denying the alleged progressively rational structure of the world, by the liberals much on the same accounts, by the 'right wingers' for his explicit anti-nationalism, by the anarchists for his ontological anti-individualism (i.e. dividualism), by the collectivists for his mockery of any gregarious existence, by the capitalists for his contempt for money and the mercantile worldview, by the positivists for his late mistrust in science and explicit illusionism (i.e. the notion that illusions are a necessary fact of life). However, being equally resented by all sides of the political, moral, theological and epistemic spectra might indicate that one is, if not right, or unbiased, at least originally and personally biased. Any view that coherently achieves such form of specific equal contestation, especially one that has so robustly continued to do so for more than a century, deserves some consideration.

Keywords: Nietzsche, ideology, Will, power, individualism

Tellingly Nietzsche did not write systematically or, if he did, not in the manner long established by the rationalist-empiricist tradition. As Heidegger would later on put it, there is as much to be considered about what Nietzsche did not write, but can be read between the lines, as it is about what he did write[1]. Nietzsche leaves many of his tracks of thought partially unspoken, thereby allowing his reader to complete and fulfill them for him-/herself. I take it to be some sort of show of respect on his part in allowing his reader to partake in the making of the thought-trail, i.e. becoming an author him-/herself. To each his own! and as there are no facts, only interpretations, there are only definite, but no definitive, stone carved writings.

Nietzsche writes aphoristically and, many times, all the more, in riddles. I think this is a good starting point, given that the way he writes, that is exposes himself to his reader, offers a most concrete and intimate glimpse into the meaning of what he has to say about things such as the Self, the will, freedom, character, fate, responsibility.

Why didn't Nietzsche write systematically, that is within a fixed, explicit, closed, coherent and, supposedly, all-encompassing logic-argumentative structure? Basically because he thought that much of what comes to one's mind is determined by how one feels. In other words, how one views things, the matter and its points, so to say, depends on a set of circumstances which, for the most part, are beyond the reach and control of consciousness, but that, on the other hand, greatly reflect upon what is being thought and, ultimately, expressed. I am talking here not only of our so called inner, deep unconscious thoughts, feelings, or bodily states, but also about outer stuff such as the room in which we happen to be in, the weather and, ultimately, the immediate state of the world into which, again, we (or rather I) happen to be in. In nuce, what takes part in my every thought? - everything which affects and affected me in one form or another, at one time or another, that is everything that I am! Quite obviously, our ability of taking into account everything that determines us when doing the thinking and, all the more, consciously and explicitly integrating it into what is being thought and expressed is greatly limited, to say the least. We cannot think and speak the Whole, as Hegel would want it, at least not according to Nietzsche.

"With regard to the superstitions of logicians, I shall never tire of emphasizing a small, terse fact, which is unwillingly recognized by these credulous minds – namely, that a thought comes when 'it' wishes, and not when 'I' wish; so that it is a perversion of the facts of case to say that the subject 'I' is the condition of the predicate 'think'. One thinks; but that this 'one' is precisely the famous old 'ego', is, to put it mildly, only a supposition, an assertion, and assuredly not an 'immediate certainty'. After all, one has even gone too far with this 'one thinks' – even the 'one' contains an interpretation of the process, and does not belong to the process itself. One infers here according to the usual grammatical formula – 'To think is an activity; every activity requires an agency that is active; 'consequently…'[2].

Psychological considerations

As such, consciousness is, along with its every thought, a product of its circumstances and, as long as it cannot wholly calculate and determine them, it cannot honestly claim to think and express itself beyond such circumstances, much less beyond and above any circumstances whatsoever, as traditional rationalist-empiricist systematic philosophy would have it. Acknowledgedly, everything is, according to Nietzsche, a matter of perspective:

"In prison – My eye, whether it be keen or weak, can only see a certain distance, and it is within this space that I live and move: this horizon is my immediate fate, greater or lesser, from which I cannot escape. Thus, a concentric circle is drawn around every being, which has a centre and is peculiar to himself. In the same way our ear encloses us in a small space, and so likewise does our touch. We measure the world by these horizons within which our senses confine each of us within prison walls. We say this is near and that is far distant, that this is large and that is small, that one thing is hard and another soft; amid this appreciation of things we call sensation – but it is all an error per se! According to the number of events and emotions which it is on an average possible for us to experience in a given space of time, we measure our lives; we call them short or long, rich or poor, full or empty; and according to the average of human life we estimate that of other beings, - and all this is an error per se!

If we had eyes a hundred times more piercing to examine the things that surround us, men would seem us to be enormously tall; we can even imagine organs by means of which men would appear to us to be of immeasurable stature. On the other hand, certain organs could be so formed as to permit us to view entire solar systems as if they were contracted and brought close together like a single cell: and to beings of an inverse order a single cell of the human body could be made to appear in its construction, movement and harmony as if it were a solar system in itself. The habits our senses have wrapped us up in a tissue of lying sensations which in their turn lie at the base of all our judgments and our 'knowledge' – there are no means of exit or escape to the real world! We are like spiders in our own webs, and, whatever we may catch in them, it will only be something that our web is capable of catching"[3].

On the other hand, to say that we lack complete control over the determinant circumstances of our thought process is not to say that we completely lack control over them. We can, to some extent, choose the way we react to our circumstances. To what extent? To the extent we have one or several perspectives thereon. In other words, given that each new set of circumstances provides a new perspective, the more diverse the circumstances we go through, the more diverse the perspectives and therefore the wider the scope of our potential reactions - the more diversified the circumstances, the broader our perspectives and ways of reacting to them.

Moreover, if it is the habits of our senses that have wrapped us in a tissue of lying sensations which in turn lie at the base of all our judgments and knowledge, coming to know those habits and their eventual change can lead us to a more self-aware perspective on things. I think we can understand Nietzsche's notion of character precisely in this sense, i.e. as a set of habitual perspectival proclivities derived from one's recurring biographic, ontogenetic, genealogic and ultimately phylogenetic circumstances. I furthermore hold that this is also his understanding of the ancient notions of Moira (gr.) or fatum (lat.), i.e. fate - characterial quasi-predetermination of one's perspectives on things, but with an auto-recursive twist: the eternal recurrence. But let us not get ahead of ourselves.

One of the many passages which could support such an interpretation is the following:

"Feelings and their descent from judgments – 'Trust your feelings!' But feelings comprise nothing final, original; feelings are based upon the judgments and valuations which are transmitted to us in the shape of feelings (inclinations, dislikes). The inspiration which springs from a feeling is the grandchild of a judgment – often an erroneous judgment ! – and certainly not one's own judgment! Trusting in our feelings simply means obeying our grandfather and grandmother more than the gods within ourselves: our reason and experience."[4].

So, basically, according to Nietzsche, circumstances determine our perspectives, i.e. thought process, both directly, through their in situ influence on the thinking subject's body and psyche and indirectly through his/her innate or inured perspectival proclivities (character). More specifically, according to my reading of Nietzsche, we mostly react to the in situ circumstances on the basis of the characterial circumstances (which generate a more or less specific perspective). The former are mostly undeterminable or, at best, underdeterminable with respect to consciousness, i.e. they evolve behind its' back, that is without its' being able to notice or control them, the latter, either inherited or inured, are again quasi-uncontrollable with respect to consciousness, given that they are the ones actually making it up and consequently pulling the strings from behind the scene. What room remains there for consciousness and its' so called personal freedom? Well, in my opinion, not much, but some very important some, which is definitive of the quality of each of our individual destinies.

More to the point, according to my reading of Nietzsche, though inherited, our character is not a fixed, immutable structure of concomitant actual psychological patterns, but a semi-structured bundle of inchoate personal potentialities, each coming to the forefront, i.e. becoming actual depending on the in situ circumstances. I shall call the former pseudo-personalities and the latter situations: therefore, each particular (type of) situation evokes a particular pseudo-personality. Each interaction between such situations and pseudo-personalities generates a certain perspective which feeds back into the loop. Consequently the more diverse the circumstances, the richer the array of pseudo-personalities revealed and the broader the perspectives of our Self on itself. That is why, in fact, I have preferred the apparently odd writing (in)dividual when referring to Nietzsche's notion of selfhood, stressing the fact that, to him, each so called individual is by no means an undividable unity but rather a motley bundle of semi-structured, power driven impulses, inclinations and urges greatly dependent on contingent circumstances.

As such, according to my reading of Nietzsche, our freedom would lie in (i) acknowledging this fact (avoiding self-delusion), (ii) mindfully taking hold of oneself along this process, i.e. knowing one's character in its' specificity, (iii) letting it happen, i.e. accepting one's character in its specificity and (iv) potentiating it, i.e. allowing for new, or even fringe circumstances to take place in order to evoke new pseudo-personalities and consequently new, broadened perspectives. In so doing, one eventually edifies one's character in both meanings of the word, i.e. illuminates and, at the same time, builds it. Apparently, for Nietzsche, just as for Robert Frost, freedom lies in being bold: the boldness in exposing oneself to the waves of contingency and, in the midst of such turmoil, taking hold of and affirming oneself in one's uncanny peculiarity. When all this becomes second nature, a fifth, very special aspect of freedom may supervene i.e. that of choosing, to a relatively limited extent, one's circumstances and incumbent perspectives. In fact, I understand Nietzsche's notion of Overman [Übermensch] precisely as such a being (and way to be) in the case of which the possibility of choosing both circumstances and perspectives is maximally developed. However, the emergence of this fifth aspect of freedom is something by no means certain, only probable, at best, that moreover, once attained, can always be lost and which, in fact, at some point or another, usually is. By no means, according to Nietzsche, can freedom be viewed as some innate (and therefore inalienable) feature of individuals – correspondingly, it is not something that can be protected, or guaranteed by a law, much less by one based on generic equality, as the liberals would have it. More on this later on.

I think Aphorism 119 in The Dawn of Day is especially revealing in this respect:

"EXPERIENCE AND INVENTION. – To however high a degree a man can attain to knowledge of himself, nothing can be more incomplete than the conception which he forms of the instincts constituting his individuality. He can scarcely name the more common instincts: their number and force, their flux and reflux, their action and counteraction, and, above all, the laws of their nutrition, remain absolutely unknown to him. This nutrition, therefore, becomes a work of chance: the daily experiences of our lives throw their prey now to this instinct and now to that, and the instincts gradually seize upon it; but the ebb and flow of these experiences does not stand in any rational relationship to the nutritive needs of the total numbers of the instincts. Two things then, must always happen: some cravings will be neglected and starved to death, while others will be overfed. Every moment in the life of man causes some polypous arms of his being to grow and others to wither away, in accordance with the nutriment which that moment may or may not bring with it. Our experiences, as I have already said, are all in this sense means of nutriment, but scattered about with a careless hand and without discrimination between the hungry and the overfed. As a consequence of this accidental nutrition of each particular part, the polypus in its complete development will be something just as fortuitous as its growth.

To put this more clearly: let us suppose that an instinct or craving has reached that point when it demands gratification, - either the exercise of its power or the discharge of it, or the filling up of a vacuum (all this is metaphorical language), - then it will examine every event that occurs in the course of the day to ascertain how it can be utilized with the object of fulfilling its aim: whether the man runs or rests, or is angry, or reads or speaks or fights or rejoices, the unsatiated instinct watches, as it were, every condition into which the man enters, and, as a rule, if it finds nothing for itself it must wait, still unsatisfied. After a little while it becomes feeble, and at the end of a few days or a few months, if it has not been satisfied, it will wither away like a plant which has not been watered. This cruelty of chance would perhaps be more conspicuous if all the cravings were as vehement in their demands as hunger, which refuse to be satisfied with imaginary dishes; but the great majority of our instincts, especially those which are called moral, are thus easily satisfied, - if it be permitted to suppose that our dreams serve as compensation to a certain extent for the accidental absence of 'nutriment' during the day. Why was last night's dream full of tenderness and tears, that of the night before amusing and gay, and the previous one adventurous and engaged in some continual obscure search? How does it come about that in this dream I enjoy indescribable beauties of music, and in that one I soar and fly upwards with the delight of an eagle to the most distant heights?

These inventions in which our instincts of tenderness, merriment, or adventurousness, or our desire for music and mountains, can have free play and scope – and every one can recall striking instances – are interpretations of our nervous irritations during sleep, very free and arbitrary interpretations of the movements of our blood and intestines, and the pressure of our arm and the bed coverings, or the sound of a church bell, the weathercocks, the moths, and so on. That this text, which on the whole is very much the same for one night as another, is so differently commented upon, that our creative reason imagines such different causes for the nervous irritations of one day as compared with another, may be explained by the fact that the prompter of this reason was different to-day from yesterday – another instinct or craving wished to be satisfied, to show itself, to exercise itself and be refreshed and discharged: this particular one being at its height to-day and another one being at its height last night. Real life has not the freedom of interpretation possessed by dream life; it is less poetic and less unrestrained – but is it necessary for me to show that our instincts, when we are awake, likewise merely interpret our nervous irritations and determine their 'causes' in accordance with their requirements? That there is no really essential difference between waking and dreaming, that even in comparing different degrees of culture, the freedom of the conscious interpretation of the one is not in any way inferior to the freedom in dreams of the other ! that our moral judgments and valuations are only images and fantasies concerning physiological processes unknown to us, a kind of habitual language to describe certain nervous irritations? That all our so-called consciousness is a more or less fantastic commentary of an unknown text, one which is perhaps unknowable but yet felt?

Consider some insignificant occurrence. Let us suppose that some day as we pass along a public street we see someone laughing at us. In accordance with whatever craving has reached its culminating point within us at that moment, this incident will have this or that signification for us; and it will be a very different occurrence in accordance with the class of men to which we belong. One man will take it like a drop of rain, another will shake it off like a fly, a third person will try to pick a quarrel on account of it, a fourth will examine his garments to see if there is anything about them likely to cause laughter, and a fifth will in consequence think about what is ridiculous per se, a sixth will be pleased at having involuntarily contributed to add a ray of sunshine and mirth to the world, - in all these cases some craving is gratified, whether anger, combativeness, meditation, or benevolence. This instinct, whatever it may be, has seized upon that incident as its prey: why that particular one? Because, hungry and thirsty, it was lying in ambush.

Not long ago at 11o'clock in the morning a man suddenly collapsed and fell down in front of me as if struck by lightning. All the women who were near at once gave utterance to cries of horror, while I set the man on his feet again and waited until he recovered his speech. During this time no muscle of my face moved and I experienced no sensation of fear or pity; I simply did what was most urgent and reasonable and calmly proceeded on my way. Supposing someone had told me on the previous evening that at 11 o'clock on the following day a man would fall down in front of me like this, I should have suffered all kinds of agonies in the interval, lying awake all night, and at the decisive moment should also perhaps have fallen down like the man instead of helping him; for in the meantime all the imaginable cravings within would have had leisure to conceive and to comment upon this incident. What are our experiences, then ? Much more what we attribute to them than what they really are. Or should we perhaps say that nothing is contained in them? That experiences in themselves are merely works of fancy?"[5].

Generally speaking, there are two main attitudes one can have with respect to such a state of affairs: one can either acknowledge and work with(in) it, or one can deny, or rather cover it up.

As previously mentioned, working with(in) it requires one to mindfully acknowledge the supervenience of one's consciousness on circumstances (be it in situ or characterial): i.e. to (i) accept it, (ii) to come to know oneself along it, (iii) to potentiate it and to (iv) shape oneself accordingly. The aim of such self-education is arête (gr. excellence), that meaning, in Nietzsche's interpretation, becoming the best version of one's own specific nature (i.e. character) beyond common acceptances. In other words, we cannot create our character, but we can shape, or at least polish it. But in order to do so we must know and accept ourselves, and it is to this process of self-discovery and -assertion to which we should dedicate our efforts (and not to the artificial complacency in various general public models). Why? Because trying to live up to some general, borrowed standards of how one should be without knowing how someone actually is, is first, imitative, i.e. unoriginal, second, self-denying, i.e. fake and third, futile as one cannot really be(come) that which one is not. Not accidentally, one can draw a parallel between such process of self-realization and Nietzsche's esthetic ideal of Apollonian sublimation of the Dionysian: one has to become the best version of oneself just as a painter in front of the canvass, or, maybe better put, a sculptor working with his wood or stone: an experienced sculptor does not try to make anything out of anything, but, au contraire, suits his envisioned figure to the material at hand by carefully studying the specific underlying configuration of webs and crevices before bringing it to light - accordingly an accomplished self-seeker tries to know his/her own fabric before shaping it. Michelangelo famously held that he did not create his David, in the sense of out of nowhere bringing into existence something which hadn't been there, but only disclosed and laid bare that which the block of marble had contained in its depths all along - the same goes for Nietzsche's self-edification of the Self. As Robert C. Solomon[6] puts it, with Nietzsche it is always the aesthetic perspective which takes the lead: in human Self-edification, just as in art, being unoriginal, fake and impersonal is the worst.

Moral considerations

This is what Nietzsche's project of self-edification of the Self would amount to. Esthetically I have characterized it as an Apollonian sublimation of the Dionysian. On moral terms, this would amount to an, again, sublimated, that is metaphorically transposed version of the master morality. I think the correspondences are quite obvious:

"There is master morality and slave morality; - I would at once add, however, that in all higher and mixed civilizations, there are also attempts at the reconciliation of the two moralities; but one finds still oftener the confusion and mutual misunderstanding of them, indeed, sometimes their close juxtaposition – even in the same man, within one soul. (…) The noble type of man regards himself as a determiner of values; he does not require to be approved of; he passes the judgment: 'What is injurious to me is injurious in itself'; he knows that it is he himself only who confers honor on things; he is a creator of values. He honors whatever he recognizes in himself: such morality is self-glorification. In the foreground there is the feeling of plenitude, of power, which seeks to overflow, the happiness of high tension, the consciousness of wealth which would fain give and bestow: - the noble man also helps the unfortunate, but not – or scarcely – out of pity, but rather from an impulse generated by the superabundance of power. The noble man honors in himself the powerful one, him also who has power over himself, who knows how to speak and how to keep silence, who takes pleasure in subjecting himself to severity and hardness, and has reverence for all that is severe and hard. (…)"[7].

Quite obviously, there is an important connection between Nietzsche's master morality and his notion of Overman. I think the link between them is his aesthetic ideal – in fact, I hold that Nietzsche's Oveman is the Apollinically sublimated version of his Dionysian master, i.e. one that by knowing, accepting and potentiating one's character achieves the freedom of choosing different perspectives on the world and their corresponding circumstances. Of course that, concretely speaking, this is an insurmountable task, but in this, as in very few cases, the struggle is its own reward as it illuminates and builds one's character, while at the same time expressing it in forms which are ever more delicately robust, that is essentalized. Just as a work of art, each Overman is unique and perpetually unfinished.

There is however, according to Nietzsche, another form of morality and corresponding psychology: the slave morality and its incumbent tschandala[8] character. Being born out of a congenital lack of individual life resources, it is:

1. self-denying, i.e. derived from lack of self-respect;
2. resentful, i.e. stingily spiteful and envious;
3. self-dissimulative i.e. it purports, both to others and itself, to be something other than it is: objective morality instead of will to power (as it resents master morality for being);
4. gregarious, i.e. undiscerningly favoring the common over the specific with respect to both human beings and culture;
5. exocentrically comparative i.e. the point of reference of its comparisons (and judgments) is the others, while master morality being endocentrically comparative i.e. having as comparative and judicative point of reference the Self – in short, according to my reading of Nietzsche, while the master is preoccupied what he/she thinks of him-/herself, the slave's main concern is what the others think of him/her. Correspondingly, slave morality has a collective and impersonal notion of alterity, while master morality an individual and personal one – in other words, while the master tends to regard the Other as an other, as a specific individual, the slave tends to relate to the Other as an others, that is as a collective and anonymous entity.

In what follows, two (of the many) relevant paragraphs in this respect: the first from Nietzsche's Will to Power regarding the psychological distinction behind the master and the slave moralities (i.e. the strong and the weak will), the second from Beyond Good and Evil, an essentialized analysis of the slave morality (counterpart to the previously quoted passage on the master morality):

"46. Weakness of the will: that is a metaphor that can prove misleading. For there is no will, and consequently neither a strong nor a weak will. The multitude and disgregation of impulses and the lack of any systematic order among them result in a 'weak will'; their coordination under a single predominant impulse results in a 'strong will': in the first case it is the oscillation and the lack of gravity; in the latter, the precision and clarity of the direction."[9].

"260. (…) Supposing that the abused, the oppressed, the suffering, the unemancipated, the weary and those uncertain of themselves, should moralise, what would be the common element in their moral estimates? Probably a pessimistic suspicion with regard to the entire situation of man will find expression, perhaps a condemnation of man, together with his situation. The slave has an unfavourable eye for the virtues of the powerful; he has a skepticism and distrust, a refinement of distrust of everything 'good' that is there honoured – he would fain persuade himself that the very happiness there is not genuine. On the other hand, those qualities which serve to alleviate the existence of sufferers are brought into proeminence and flooded with light; it is here that sympathy, the kind, helping hand, the warm heart, patience, diligence, humility, and friendliness attain to honour; for here these are the most useful qualities, and almost the only means of supporting the burden of existence. Slave-morality is essentially the morality of utility. Here is the seat of the origin of the famous antithesis 'good' and 'evil': - the power and dangerousness are assumed to reside in the evil, a certain dreadfulness, subtlety, and strength, which do not admit to being despised. According to slave-morality, therefore, the 'evil' man arouses fear; according to master-morality, it is precisely the 'good' man who arouses fear and seeks to arouse it, while the bad man is regarded as the despicable being. The contrast attains its maximum when, in accordance with the logical consequences of slave morality, a shade of depreciation – it might be slight and well-intentioned – at last attaches itself even to the 'good' man of this morality; because, according to the servile mode of thought, the good man must in any case be the safe man : he is good-natured, easily deceived. Perhaps a little stupid, un bonhomme. Everywhere that slave-morality gains the ascendency, language shows a tendency to approximate the significations of the words 'good' and 'stupid' – A last fundamental difference: the desire for freedom, the instinct for happiness and the refinements of the feeling of liberty belong as necessarily to slave-morals and morality, as artifice and enthusiasm in reverence and devotion are the regular symptoms of an aristocratic mode of thinking and estimating. (…)"[10].

In other words, according to Nietzsche, the fact that the tschandala lacks individual resources does not derogate from the finality of his/her will as will to power – but he/she will try to make up for this precariousness by adopting a gregarious and dissimulative strategy in this respect: the tschandala develop together an average model of humanity, a common notion of what it means to be human thereby covering any (in)dividual specificity and preoccupation therewith: Human nature is such and such and it must be chosen and willed upon anything calling itself human!. Obviously, this brings about a process of progressive homogenization of (in)dividuality – basically, the history of this process is, according to Nietzsche, the entire post-Platonic European history: each human being, irrespective of any preoccupation with its own specificity, must live up to a certain borrowed set of standards of humanity. This is what I have somewhere else called the personalist or Apollinist model, basically amounting to the post-Cartesian understanding of humanity according to which each of us is provided a priori with the same generic structure: we have a consciousness that is both essentially unitary and immutable which observes and records outside things and states of facts (its own body and sensations, events of the world etc.) through its cognitive apparatus. Once making up its mind about such things and facts this consciousness has the ability to choose some or other of their potentialities and will them into existence by determining its attached body to act in certain ways. In other words, our (common) consciousness determines the world on three levels: bodily, personal and social. Fact of the matter is: history is a product of conscious choice or, if it is not, should become so by eliminating and subjecting everything unknown, indeterminate or pre-given to the rational will of consciousness (which, again, is essentially the same for any human)[11]. All the more, history was also reinterpreted as if it had always been a product of human choice or, more extremely, as inherently and immutably directed towards this goal (as with Hegel). As said, there is no room for anything unknown, mysterious or (in)dividually specific in such a world, no self-search or –discovery – all humans must do is comply to specific, commonly prefabricated standards of how one should be. And the trickiest part is that all this is done under the pretense of the so called ontological aprioricity of human freedom as choice:

"Error of Free Will.—We no longer have any sympathy nowadays for the concept 'free will': (…) I shall give here simply the psychology behind every kind of making people responsible.—Wherever responsibilities are sought, it is usually the instinct for wanting to punish and judge that is doing the searching. Becoming is stripped of its innocence once any state of affairs is traced back to a will, to intentions, to responsible acts: the doctrine of the will was fabricated essentially for the purpose of punishment, i.e. of wanting to find guilty. The old psychology as a whole, the psychology of the will, presupposes the fact that its originators, the priests at the head of ancient communities, wanted to give themselves the right to impose punishments—or give God the right to do so ... People were thought of as 'free' so that they could be judged and punished—so that they could become guilty consequently every action had to be thought of as willed, the origin of every action as located in consciousness (—thus the most fundamental piece of counterfeiting in psychologies became the principle of psychology itself)"[12].

[11] Approximately along similar lines with what Heidegger would later on call Ge-stell (Enframing) i.e. the calculatory preemptive progressive securization of the world (which he would, though partly, still unjustly, at least in my opinion, impute precisely to Nietzsche).

In other words, with the rise of the tschandala, freedom was taken for granted as an inborn feature of any human being, with consciousness as its' a priori source. As such, any humanly conceivable action and deed was taken as freely chosen, therefore intentional, therefore responsibilizable i.e. as potential ground and rationale for moral reprehension and punishment. Of course that it wasn't necessarily used so with every given occasion, but only with respect to such (in)dividuals which, for one reason or another, did not comply with the standard model of humanity at the time. In nuce, the freedom of the will as a doctrine, constituted a castigative pretext rather than an actual expression of the alleged inherent liberty of any human (in)dividual.

Political considerations

Therefrom Nietzsche's critique of all political ideologies supervenient on the doctrine of the freedom of the Will: institutionalized Christianity, liberalism and socialism. In short, his argument points out the fact that all these apparently alternative, but actually collateral, ideological views, along with their correlative political arrangements are equivalent expressions of the so called herd mentality typical to the tschandala psychology we have previously discussed. The most obvious symptom thereof is that in all their discussions, arguments and debates, individual freedom is made dependent on equality, and that is universal equality, which is just another word for ubiquitous the-same-ness or, otherwise put, individual identity. Contemporary democratic society has no room for self-search, -edification and specificity; through its stress on equality reduces any (in)dividuality to the identikit of the institutionalized individual.

In brief, the nodal points of his argument are the following:

1. The atomistic generic notion of individual self, understood as individual identity (i.e. personality) is by no means a metaphysical truth, but a mere cultural artifact historically generated in specific and contingent socio-political circumstances in order to (unconsciously) dissimulate, manifest and legitimate the power interests of a certain group within humanity, i.e. the tschandala.
2. All of our so called individual features and faculties are the byproduct of a long civilizational (pre)history: in particular, the doctrinaire pair individual freedom – individual responsibility is actually the product of the secular disciplination of the (in)dividual through (slave) moral coercion.
3. One's actual being a person (especially the capacity for more or less autonomous reflection and action) is, according to Nietzsche not something a priorily given, but quite the contrary, involving, as we have seen, constant self-scrutiny, - search, - discovery, - acceptance and – exercise. If one does not go through this, he/she cannot become an (actual) person and, if not constantly continuing to do so, he/she can always lose his/her personhood. As you probably remember, earlier on I have called this Self-edification. Such Self-edification depends, among other contingencies, on social practices: the latter can either impair, or potentiate it. They can potentiate it by promoting the preoccupation with and respect for authenticity (including its conflictual aspects, at least to some degree): self-curiosity, - awareness, - honesty, courage and resoluteness. They can impair it, obviously, by instituting the cult of the common i.e. conformism and the best way to do so is by convincing everybody of the generic aprioricity of their personhood i.e. first that they are necessarily born as persons and they do not have to do anything about it, second that the structure of their personhood is the same as all the others' and, consequently, that precisely such common aspects are worth keeping and cultivating.

Which of the two alternative types of social practices characterize contemporary society is quite obvious. Imitative mass education and culture are obvious both symptoms and causes thereof. Besides them, another social feature that is greatly efficient in instituting conformism is the utilitarian cult of money and property, or, in other words, the mercantile worldview which gained ever more ground with the ascent of modern bourgeoisie:

"Danger in wealth. -Only someone who has spirit should possess property: otherwise property is dangerous to the common good. The proprietor, that is, who does not understand how to make any use of the free time that his property could provide for him, will continue forever to strive for more property: this effort becomes his entertainment, his stratagem in the battle with boredom. Thus in the end real wealth is produced from a moderate property that would satisfy someone with spirit: and, to be sure, as the glistening result of spiritual dependence and poverty. But now he appears to be completely different from what his impoverished lineage led us to expect, because he can adopt the mask of cultivation and art: he can buy masks. He thereby awakens envy among those who are poorer and less cultivated -who basically always envy cultivation and do not see the mask in the mask-and gradually prepares the way for a social revolution: for gilded coarseness and histrionic selfinflation in the supposed 'enjoyment of culture' gives them the idea that 'it is simply a matter of money' -whereas it is somewhat a matter of money, of course, but much more a matter of spirit"[13].

[13] Nietzsche Fr. Human All too Human II CW4, pp. 119-120/Aph. 310.

Money is quantitative and therefore excessive preoccupation therewith quantitatively homogenizes any form of qualitative (in)dividual specificity: freedom, exclusively understood as acquisitional liberty does neither reflect, nor promote (in)dividual authenticity (given that as money, everything and everyone is the same). Furthermore, by instituting the cult of the ontological freedom of human will and consequently denying, or rather covering up, any form of predetermination, be it destinal (Moira) or just characterial, modern European culture and civilization, in all its political alternatives, (i) precludes any preoccupation with and discovery of actual (in)dividual specificity and, at the same time, (ii) annuls from the very start any eventual (in)dividual confrontation with and potential liberation from such predetermination.

As such, I do not think Nietzsche is necessarily a fatalist – as you have seen, the adequate attitude provided, freedom is, to some extent, possible (including as choice). However, this is something that is (in)dividually gained at the end of much turmoil and not something to be commonly and gratuitously found at the beginning of each existence. As such reducing it to the status of a homogenous inborn feature of humans, along with an eventual correlative political right that is supposed to guarantee and protect it, is about the surest way to lose it:

"My Idea of Freedom.—The value of a thing sometimes depends not on what we manage to do with it, but on what we pay for it—what it costs us. Let me give an example. Liberal institutions stop being liberal as soon as they have been set up: afterwards there is no one more inveterate or thorough in damaging freedom than liberal institutions. Now we know what they achieve: they undermine the will to power, they are the levelling of mountain and valley elevated to the status of morality, they make things petty, cowardly, and hedonistic— with them the herd animal triumphs every time. Liberalism: in plain words herd-animalization... While these same institutions are still being fought for, they produce quite different effects: then they are actually powerful promoters of freedom. On closer inspection, it is war that produces these effects, war waged for liberal institutions, which as war allows the illiberal instincts to persist.

And war is an education in freedom. For what is freedom! Having the will to be responsible to oneself. (…) The free man is a warrior.—How is freedom measured, in individuals as well as nations? By the resistance which must be overcome, the effort it costs to stay on top. The highest type of free men would need to be sought in the place where the greatest resistance is constantly being overcome: a short step away from tyranny, right on the threshold of the danger of servitude. This is psychologically true, if one understands here by 'tyrants' pitiless and terrible instincts which require the maximum of authority and discipline to deal with them—finest type Julius Caesar—and it is also politically true, if one simply takes a walk through history. The nations which were worth something, became worth something, never did so under liberal institutions: it was great danger that turned them into something worthy of respect, the kind of danger without which we would not know our instruments, our virtues, our defences and weapons, our spirit—which forces us to be strong... First principle: you must need to be strong, or else you will never become it.—Those great hothouses for strong, for the strongest kind of people there has yet been—the aristocratic communities such as Rome and Venice—understood freedom in exactly the same sense as I understand the word freedom: as something which one can have and not have, which one can want, which one can conquer..."[14].

I agree with Robert C. Solomon's[15] warning that we shouldn't succumb to the temptation of taking Nietzsche's belligerent language too seriously and include him in the typical warmonger mentality[16]. To do so would be to miss the entire point: Nietzsche's is an inner, not an outer war – it is a war between the various inchoate power driven pseudo-personalities within human Self and for the sake of (in)dividual Self-edification. It is greatly different, or even opposed to, actual army war. And I ask those who would disagree to consider the following point: Nietzsche's war is a quest for (in)dividual specificity and there is no mass army or mass army war based upon individual specificity, but quite the contrary (the individual dissolves itself in the homogenous mass of the unit – corp – country). Nietzsche prefers such language, I think, in order to evoke the tension and turmoil of this inner conflict that demands, ultimately, the same kind of contradictory characterial virtues as outer war does: courage, resoluteness, honesty, acceptance, empathy.

Now, aside from that, where does Nietzsche stand politically? Well, first of all, I think it is very ironical that he, being one of the fundamental political thinkers for the 20th century, was very skeptical about the capacity of politics in addressing the important issues of (in)dividual Selfhood. Now, with that being said, I think his attitude changes over time from some sort of epistemic aristocratism to sheer anarchism (though he would most certainly have resented such qualification). Aphorism 318 in Human, All too Human is relevant in the former, aristocratic, respect:

"Of the mastery of those with knowledge. -It is easy, ridiculously easy, to set up a model for electing a legislative body.

First, the honest and trustworthy people of a country, those of them who are also masters and experts in some field, would have to separate themselves out, by having a nose for and reciprocally acknowledging one another: from them, in turn, in a narrower vote, those who are the experts and knowledgeable people of the first rank in each individual area would have to select themselves, likewise by reciprocally acknowledging and guaranteeing one another. If the legislative body consists of them, then, finally, only the votes and judgments of the most specialized experts must decide each individual case, and the sense of honor of all the others must be large enough and have simply become a matter of decency, to leave the vote to the former alone: so that in the strictest sense the law would proceed from the understanding of those who understand the best.

[14] Nietzsche, Fr., Twilight of the Idols, (New York : Oxford University Press), 1998, pp. 64-65/Aph. 38.
[15] Solomon, Robert, C. & Higgins, Kathleen, M. What Nietzsche Really Said, (New York: Schocken Books), 2000.
[16] As for example Bertrand Russell does.

At present, parties vote: and for every such vote there must be hundreds of people whose consciences are ashamed-those who have been badly taught or are incapable of judgment, those who repeat others' words or follow along or are carried away by passion.

Nothing degrades the dignity of a new law as much as the blush of dishonesty that adheres to it under the pressure of every party-vote. But, as I said, it is easy, ridiculously easy, to set up something like this: no power in the world is strong enough at present to bring about anything better-unless, that is, the belief in the supreme utility of science and of those with knowledge were finally to enlighten even the most malevolent and to be preferred to the now-reigning belief in numbers. Mindful of this future, let our watchword be: 'More respect for those with knowledge! And down with all parties!' "[17].

I think the passage is explicit enough no to require any further clarification. The only point I want to make in this respect is that it is, again, ironical that despite his explicit anti-Platonism, Nietzsche's political regime, at least at that phase of his thought, resembled Plato's precisely in its most fundamental aspect: epistemic aristocratism. And if so, it is precisely Nietzsche's arguments against Plato that could be adapted against this type of political view. One of the arguments could go as follows: provided that Nietzsche is right and the last two millennia or so of European history constitute nothing more than a long process of permeation of our entire worldview by the slave morality, it would be naive to think that this wouldn't take its toll on the epistemic world as well. Consequently, the so called experts Nietzsche is talking about, the members of this epistemic aristocracy to which political participation should allegedly be limited, would be in fact none other than the most accomplished representatives of the slave mentality, i.e. those that excelled at assimilating and promoting the tschandala Weltanschauung. This would be even worse than the current state of facts.

It is maybe such considerations that led later Nietzsche to a somewhat more anarchist position:

"On the New Idol. Somewhere still there are peoples and herds, but not where we live, my brothers: here there are states. State? What is that? Well then, lend me your ears now, for I shall say my words about the death of peoples. State is the name of the coldest of all cold monsters. It even lies coldly, and this lie crawls out of its mouth: 'I, the state, am the people.'

This is a lie! The ones who created the peoples were the creators, they hung a faith and a love over them, and thus they served life. The ones who set traps for the many and call them 'state' are annihilators, they hang a sword and a hundred cravings over them. Where there are still peoples the state is not understood, and it is hated as the evil eye and the sin against customs and rights.

This sign I give you: every people speaks its own tongue of good and evil – which the neighbor does not understand. It invented its own language through customs and rights. But the state lies in all the tongues of good and evil, and whatever it may tell you, it lies – and whatever it has, it has stolen. Everything about it is false; it bites with stolen teeth, this biting dog. Even its entrails are false. Language confusion of good and evil: this sign I give you as the sign of the state. Indeed, this sign signifies the will to death! Indeed, it beckons the preachers of death!

Far too many are born: the state was invented for the superfluous! Just look at how it lures them, the far-too-many! How it gulps and chews and ruminates them!

'On earth there is nothing greater than I: the ordaining finger of God am I' – thus roars the monster. And not only the long-eared and the shortsighted sink to their knees!

Oh, even to you, you great souls, it whispers its dark lies! Unfortunately it detects the rich hearts who gladly squander themselves! Yes, it also detects you, you vanquishers of the old God! You grew weary in battle and now your weariness still serves the new idol! It wants to gather heroes and honorable men around itself, this new idol! Gladly it suns itself in the sunshine of your good consciences – the cold monster! It wants to give you everything, if you worship it, the new idol. Thus it buys the shining of your virtue and the look in your proud eyes. It wants to use you as bait for the far-too-many! Indeed, a hellish piece of work was thus invented, a death-horse clattering in the regalia of divine honors!

Indeed, a dying for the many was invented here, one that touts itself as living; truly, a hearty service to all preachers of death!

State I call it, where all are drinkers of poison, the good and the bad; state, where all lose themselves, the good and the bad; state, where the slow suicide of everyone is called – 'life.'

Just look at these superfluous! They steal for themselves the works of the inventors and the treasures of the wise: education they call their thievery – and everything turns to sickness and hardship for them! Just look at these superfluous! They are always sick, they vomit their gall and call it the newspaper. They devour one another and are not even able to digest themselves. Just look at these superfluous! They acquire riches and yet they become poorer. They want power and first of all the crowbar of power, much money – these impotent, impoverished ones! Watch them scramble, these swift monkeys! They scramble all over each other and thus drag one another down into the mud and depths. They all want to get to the throne, it is their madness – as if happiness sat on the throne! Often mud sits on the throne – and often too the throne on mud. Mad all of them seem to me, and scrambling monkeys and overly aroused. Their idol smells foul to me, the cold monster: together they all smell foul to me, these idol worshipers.

My brothers, do you want to choke in the reek of their snouts and cravings? Smash the windows instead and leap into the open! Get out of the way of the bad smell! Go away from the idol worship of the superfluous! Get out of the way of the bad smell! Get away from the steam of these human sacrifices! Even now the earth stands open for great souls. Many seats are still empty for the lonesome and twosome, fanned by the fragrance of silent seas. An open life still stands open for great souls. Indeed, whoever possesses little is possessed all the less: praised be a small poverty! There, where the state ends, only there begins the human being who is not superfluous; there begins the song of necessity, the unique and irreplaceable melody. There, where the state ends – look there, my brothers! Do you not see it, the rainbow and the bridges of the overman?"[18].

One way to reconcile the two positions would be to say that the former, aristocratic one, was for the human, while the latter, anarchist one, for the Overman. In order to clarify this point we have to filter this passage through his main thesis in the Will to Power, namely that traditional (tschandala) European culture is essentially life-denying. In being life-denying it is also bound to ultimately undermine itself. Nihilism is not so much the cause, as the symptom of such self-undermining. However hurtful, such self-undermining is a beneficial event in that it brings about the breakdown of an irrecoverably crooked and distorted mode of existence (i.e. thinking, feeling, valuing, acting) along with all its individual representatives. This is not necessarily to be understood as a physical disappearance, but more like some sort of complete depersonalization on their part, leaving behind precisely those who were, or became, independent of such Weltanschauung (or existential horizon as Nietzsche calls it). However, everybody needs a Weltanschauung, but in the latters' case they have the capacity for (in)dividually generating their own Weltanschauung, or, in other words, their perspective on existence. As you might have guessed, these are the (specifically different) representatives of what Nietzsche calls the Overman: one who can create/choose and self-induce oneself one's own existential horizon, ability gained precisely through such process of self-edification which I have discussed in the earlier part of the paper. In nuce, according to my understanding of Nietzsche, only those who already became themselves can survive (as persons) the imminent self-dissolution of the European Weltanschauung. However, given that one's such Weltanschauung is the profound expression of one's actual (in)dividuality and one's (in)dividuality is dependent on one's specific character (and way of coping with it), such (in)dividual Weltanschauungs will also be mutually exclusive. In Nietzsche's vision of the future, each Overman will be on its own, that is in its own world: mutual contacts will not be necessarily impossible, but most probably avoided[19]. As such, Nietzsche's Overman is a profoundly (in)dividualistic notion – each Overman is unique, a species in a world of its own, this making any eventual notion of an Overmen community (be it social, political or racial) a sheer abuse and misinterpretation of Nietzsche's philosophy.

As mentioned earlier, for Nietzsche Overmanhood is neither inborn, nor collectively developed, but something (in)dividually, and possibly only provisionally, gained: it is something that one earns on one's own, difficultly and loses easily. This is precisely what sets Nietzsche apart from the anarchists of his time as they, on either side of the political spectrum, share an a priori, almost Cartesian, understanding of individuality; according to them one is born an individual, i.e. an unitary island of rational self-awareness and precisely therefore one is entitled to certain inalienable rights that usually societies and states tended to neglect or infringe upon. In Nietzsche's view, this is basically the same argument we can find with both the liberals and the socialists, that postulates the aprioricity of individual identity, thereby understood as universal the-sameness of all human beings, from which it derives the essential equality of all supposed individuals: no one may be treated differently as everybody is the same – the basic principle of the herd mentality.

Nietzsche on the other hand could be called an a posteriori contingent dividualist. As we have seen, for him, (in)dividuality is, at least initially, just a contingent motley bundle of semi-structured power driven tendencies each seeking to assert itself over the others. However, depending both on the inborn resources of each of these power drives and on the general outer circumstances, in time, a relatively stable inner hierarchy of such drives crystalizes. This is what Nietzsche calls character, and consciousness, though still important, is just a tiny fraction of it. Once crystalized, character is rather difficultly changed, at least consciously – this is not to mean that character doesn't change but only that if it does, it mostly does so not by virtue of direct conscious will but rather according to a will of its own resulting either from the inner balance of power among its various drives, or from contingent outer circumstances, or, most probably, from a combination of the two. As such, consciousness can still steer the tide of these inner drives, at least to some degree, precisely by choosing, as much as possible, the aforementioned contingent outer circumstances that feed one drive or another. Basically, this is what Self-education as self-discipline amounts to for Nietzsche. However, in order to achieve it, one must first come to know and accept the making of one's own character and one cannot do so if occupying one's entire existence with the strive for complying with a prefabricated generic model of individuality. This is what Nietzsche has to impute to all the major post-Illuminist ideologies of his age: nationalism, conservatism, liberalism, socialism, (classical) anarchism.

Conclusions

Now, to sum up, our discussion revolved mainly around Nietzsche's notion of character, thereupon focusing on his correlative moral and political view. Obviously, as any conceptual reconstruction, it involved some measure of personal rearrangement of his claims, but in so doing I have attempted, and hopefully succeeded, in remaining (critically) true to his spirit.

To that end, I have devised three sets of interlocked considerations, loosely organized along three axes: psychological, moral and political.

With the psychological considerations I have attempted to provide an account of his notion of character per se. I have set about from Nietzsche's particular, i.e. aphoristic-riddlish, way of writing, claiming that we can find therein an expression of his specific understanding of selfhood: as the contingent product of two sets of circumstances – (i) genealogical and (ii) in-situ, both of which remain largely outside the direct control of self-awareness and conscious will. In nuce, I think Nietzsche understands selfhood not as an atomic unit of rational self-awareness (as in the Cartesian and post-Cartesian tradition), but as a motley bundle of loosely-interlocked, mostly discordant, power driven vital forces and impetuses that are actualized depending on contingent in-situ (i.e. outer) circumstances. For the sake of concision I have called the former pseudo-personalities and the latter situations, basically claiming that each (type of) situation evokes a corresponding pseudo-personality that generates a particular perspective – the great absenter in this game is the traditional immutable nucleus of self-awareness, or, in other words, the ego. Its lack however, does not mean the impossibility of any (in)dividual selfhood – though initially lacking, one can be created by a process of, what I have called, Self-edification, involving the long term (in)dividual discovery and cultivation of one's character. What this amounts to, in other words, is the creation of a network between the aforementioned pseudo-personalities precisely through the personal trial and error exploration of a wide variety of situations. Nonetheless, this involves, (i) the discovery, acceptance and potentiation of one's specific characterial configuration, mostly irrespective of common preconceptions, be them moral, epistemic or esthetic and (ii) their long term creative cultivation (through human interaction, literary and artistic creation and so on). With some notable exceptions, both these aspects mostly lack, and have actually always lacked, in the European paideic and cultural model, fact leading to the mass creation of impersonal individuals and the imminent breakdown of European culture. The exploration of the causes behind this takes us to the next section of the paper.

Acknowledgedly, according to Nietzsche, the most direct and hurtful expression of the aforementioned individual homogenization is the so called slave morality, having behind a particular kind of character and power psychology: the tschandala (the ancient Indian name for the lowest caste). Synthetically, the tschandala, designates those lacking individual resources, or, in more lay terms, personality. As such, despite its subsequent ideological appropriation and abuse, the term was used by Nietzsche not so much as an apriori (racial) label, but rather more harmlessly, namely as referring to the individual unpreoccupied with its own selfhood-specificity, but rather with fitting in, i.e. being commonly accepted. Based upon my reading of several (partially quoted) corresponding passages, I have determined five generic (interlocked) features, Nietzsche ascribes to slave morality (and tschandala psychology): (i) it is self-denying, i.e. derived from lack of self-respect; (ii) resentful, i.e. stingily spiteful and envious; (iii) self-dissimulative i.e. it purports, both to others and itself, to be something other than it is: objective morality instead of will to power (as it resents master morality for being); (iv) gregarious, i.e. undiscerningly favoring the common over the specific with respect to both human beings and culture; and (v) exocentrically comparative i.e. the point of reference of its comparisons (and judgments) is the others (while master morality being endocentrically comparative i.e. having as comparative and judicative point of reference the Self).

As such, according to Nietzsche, despite its lack of individual resources, the tschandala psychology is still will to power, only that, given its personal precariousness, it resorts to a (self-)dissimulative and gregarious strategy in this respect: it develops a common model of humanity, i.e. of what it means to be human, which then it imposes, or rather institutes, upon all individuals. The widest cultural expression of this project is the doctrine of the aprioricity of human personhood and the freedom of the Will, in other words, that we are all born with the same structure of personality that unmediately manifests itself as freedom in our apparent ability to choose: we are all born as persons, in the same way, and, essentially, there is nothing we have to do, no particular choices we have to make, in order be, or remain, so. Obviously, what the general acceptance of this model precludes is precisely specific Self-cultivation. According to Nietzsche, this is a subjacent dogma of all modern political ideologies (including anarchism), which takes us to the next section of the paper.

In the third section of the paper I have tried to develop a political argument for the previous claims. In other words, I have attempted to provide a Nietzschean interpretation of the major political ideologies of the modern age as alternative avatars of the same homogenization process based upon the interlocked dogmas of the (i) aprioricity of human personhood and (ii) the freedom of the Will. In so doing, I have set about from offering an account of Nietzsche's criticism of the mercantile worldview: Money is quantitative and therefore excessive preoccupation therewith quantitatively homogenizes any form of qualitative (in)dividual specificity: freedom, exclusively understood as acquisitional liberty does neither reflect, nor promote (in)dividual authenticity (given that as money, everything and everyone is the same). Moreover, the act of buying does neither motivate, nor educate or discharge the creative power of (in)dividuality. As such, aprioricizing individuality as (i) rational consciousness and (ii) ontological freedom of the will and then institutionalizing it as (iii) acquisitive option is about the surest way to lose it. And these assumptions constitute, in one way or another, the reference system of all (post-)modern political ideologies, both favorable and opposed to the mercantile worldview. The consequences are clear enough not to require any further clarification.

Nietzsche's opposed project is the Overman, which, despite its ideological appropriation and abuse, is by no means an a priori (racial) label, but a designation for the preoccupation with and achievement of (in)dividual specificity through Self-curiosity, -experimentation, - discipline and cultivation (through both cultural and direct inter-individual interaction) as opposed to homogenizing mass-institutional education and existence. This takes Nietzsche's later view close to post-modern anarchism, maybe closer than even he would have wanted to.

What about Nietzsche's mistakes? Well though there is a certain amount of truth to the accusations regarding his misogynism and anti-Semitism, I do not think they form an inextricable part of his thought, but, au contraire, they can be extricated precisely on the basis of his general principles of thought, i.e. by further Nietzscheanizing Nietzsche. Despite his radicalism, he most certainly fell prey to some of the common preconceptions of his time and place, but who doesn't? One's incapacity of thinking completely beyond one's existential horizon is, after all, one of his central themes. On the other hand, disregarding and ignoring Nietzsche on such grounds, would mean to deprive ourselves of a most profound and original thought-tool which, among other things, could proof useful precisely in training us to avoid such uncritical, commonplace truths to which he himself, though trivially, still unfortunately, succumbed. …The errors of great men are venerable because they are more fruitful than the truths of little men…[20].

CRITICAL THINKING BETWEEN THEORY AND PRACTICE

Elena NEDELCU[*]

Abstract

The paper entitled "Critical Thinking between Theory and Practice" has primarily a theoretical character for it aims at conceptually clarifying several terms whose meaning, though different, overlaps both in common language, as well as in specialized literature. Our paper clarifies the following concepts: "critical thinking", "critical spirit" and "criticism". The first chapter of the paper, besides these conceptual clarifications, also identifies individual and social benefits of critical thinking - when applied in social and political spheres. The second chapter briefly analyses several "corrupted" forms of criticism as we identified them in the Romanian public space, while also pointing out the causes that generate them. The third chapter debates upon the need and strategies to educate critical thinking in Romanian society, as well as the art to protest and to accept justified critics.

Keywords: critical thinking, criticism, aggression, protest.

Critical thinking and its benefits

Motto:

The secret of intellectual paramount is the critical spirit; it is the independence of thinking. This generates difficulties that appear impossible to get over to any form of authoritarianism. The authoritarian human being will generally select those who obey, who believe and are sensitive to his/her influence. By doing so, the authoritarian one will surely select mediocre persons because those who protest and doubt will be left over". (K.R. Popper "Societatea deschisa si dusmanii ei'' - [The Open Society and Its Enemies])

Critical thinking: a brief multidisciplinary perspective

Critical thinking has been assiduously tackled in specialized literature because it has drawn the attention of philosophers, logicians, psychologists, sociologists, specialists in philology and politics, etc. However, in social practice, critical thinking is so insignificantly present that it could almost be perceived as nonexistent.

One of the meanings of critical thinking is "the capacity to compare ideas, examine their significance, subject them to a polite skeptic analysis, to weigh them in relation to other opposite points of view, to build argumentation systems that would support and give them coherence and to adopt a position on the basis of these structures. It is a complex process of creative integration of ideas and resources, of re-conceptualization and re-framing concepts and information. It is an active process of knowledge that simultaneously runs at several levels"[1].

Critical thinking does not refer to the accumulation of information, but to the development of the capacity to process information. It is a process which implies analysis, synthesis, and evaluation on the basis of criteria and values – which are assumed by an individual and practiced with art and efficiency (Benjamin Bloom); it also is a way of dealing with and solving problems and it is based on convincing arguments that are coherent and logical, as well as rational. Its main attributes are: clarity, rationality and freedom.

The concept of "critical thinking" firstly imposed itself in the USA and it was apparently used for the first time in 1941 by Edward Glaser in his coursebook: An Experiment in the Development of Critical Thinking.

Recently, considering that the term "thinking" is too general and even a bit vague to describe the process of critical thinking, the following terms have been suggested as synonyms: critical reasoning or critical argumentation; the former attempts to offer reasons for certain convictions and for the evaluation of actions through the ordinary logical means[2] the latter could be applied as a form of critical thinking, which mainly aims at identifying and evaluating daily arguments[3]. The latter does not rely on symbolical, thorough forms of thinking, but rather on the practical aspects of logic; it is a form of logic applied to ordinary thinking, perhaps a sort of training for the argumentative aspects of daily life; it is a logic adapted to the requirements of daily reasoning, as well as to the reasoning process characteristic of certain sciences since "it is an instrument that could be efficiently used to correctly analyze human theoretical activity in any domain in which it would be applied"[4].

Critical thinking does not identify itself with logic – the science of good reasoning/good interference – but it implies logic. "However, critical thinking is more comprehensive in comparison with logic because it does not merely imply logic, but also the true or false nature of utterances, the evaluation of arguments and proof, the use of analysis and investigation, the application of several competences that help us decide to believe or to do something"[5]. Critical thinking interacts with philosophy, psychology, pedagogy, etc. It interacts with philosophy in a dual mode. "Thus, while focusing on argumentation, philosophy acquires the statute of critical thinking, while critical thinking becomes applied philosophy"[6]. "The main characteristic of philosophy, which makes it different from science, is its critical nature. It critically examines the principles applied in science and in daily life; it reveals any inconsistency that might exist in relation to these principles and it accepts it only if the critical investigation did not produce any ground to reject it"[7].

Critical thinking is the main requirement for psychological theories. The American Psychologists Association ("APA") states that arguments or interference are always used when dealing with psychological problems and they make psychologists examine the source of information within a reasoning, even if they are not uttered.

Critical thinking, called by some authors "informal logic", has actually a pedagogical dimension for it is meant to enhance reasoning abilities[8].

In our opinion, the term "critical thinking" is frequently used by specialists in pedagogy (educators) and by the theoreticians of literature. "To many educators, critical thinking means superior thinking; the word "superior" usually refers to the high position occupied in Bloom's taxonomy of cognitive abilities. (...) To the theoreticians of literature, criticism is a thorough approach of a literary text, the analysis of the ideas and especially of the sent message"[9].

Since 1989 specialists in artificial intelligence have become interested in critical thinking, which is based on the logic of argumentation, and have started to make research work, which they coined "non-monotonic logic", whereby they refer to a new operating program for the future computers[10].

Critical thinking, as it is defined in philosophy and social sciences, is clearly different from person-oriented criticism. In the former case, criticism aims at contesting ideas, theories and problem-situations, etc., whereas in the latter case, criticism aims at criticizing a person, a fact which we consider unacceptable. Most often responses given to criticism, labeling, humiliation and condescension are: interruption of communication and relationship, verbal aggression and higher tension. In a society based on the respect for human dignity, person-oriented criticism is unacceptable. We can criticize an action, an idea that another person shares, but we cannot criticize a person for all that he/she is!

Unfortunately, the way in which DEX defines "criticism" does not make this distinction, thus generating real confusion. I am going to give the DEX definition for this terms: "to criticize = "to reveal the shortcomings, errors and imperfections of a person, a work or some situations (revealing the causes and the means to repair them); to appreciate the ethical and artistic value of a work, etc.; to point out in a mean way (or in an exaggerated manner) the weaknesses of a thing or of a person; to comment in a mean way, inventing shortcomings and errors; to gossip"[11]. Since the first meaning of the verb "to criticize" is "to reveal the shortcomings, errors and imperfections of a person …", are we surprised why in informal language, in social practice, criticism seems to have nothing to do with critical thinking? Are we surprised why criticism is mistakenly regarded as a form of person-oriented criticism, defamation, verbal aggression and the humiliation of the rival, etc.?

The benefits of critical thinking

Democracy is a complex world that requires the large participation of citizens in the decision-making process. In my opinion, the development of critical thinking abilities is a sine qua non condition for an effective and efficient participation of citizens, who must be able to critically examine social and political contexts, correctly evaluate alternatives and participate in the decision-making processes as persons who are fully aware of their acts. In other words, the large number of persons who adopt a critical (free and responsible) perspective over social and political realities can decisively contribute to the consolidation of democracy through their participation and deliberation, thus leading to the actual democratization of the Romanian society.

The control of those who govern by those who govern remains formal if they lack the ability to process information or to deal with social and political problems, while using convincing, sensible, logical and coherent arguments. Deliberative democracy comes up with the best debates in order to ensure the best decisions. "The better the quality of a debate, the more legitimate and efficient the decisions are"[12].

Moreover, critical thinking discourages stereotypes, prejudice, discriminating behavior, authoritarian attitudes, while encouraging the responsible information and participation of citizens in social-political life. In other words, the development of critical and free thinking opens the path to the manifestation of the non-discriminating democratic spirit.

Critical thinking brings benefits not only in political life, but also in the economic one. Companies recognize that critical thinking and problem-solving abilities are assets that significantly enhance professional performance. That is why the large companies do not hesitate to invest important sums of money in developing active listening techniques, as well as critical and creative thinking techniques at the workplace.

Last but not least, critical thinking abilities help one understand scientific concepts and theories – no matter the domain that they represent. Besides creativity, critical thinking is crucial for innovation, research and development.

Developing critical thinking abilities is not only a social asset. It is primarily an individual one. To an individual, critical thinking is an essential quality both in private and in professional and civic life. Critical thinking helps a person select information, evaluate it, perceive it critically and creatively, reject irrelevant or false information or decide what is and what is not important, connect different ideas, theories, place in contexts new ideas and knowledge. Critical thinking helps us find solutions to different problematic situations, no matter where they emerge from. Gheorghe Clitan appreciates that "benefits which result from the exercise and development of critical thinking abilities may be identified in at least three domains: persuasion, knowledge and cooperation. Logical abilities which make us accept a belief on the basis of solid argumentation or on the basis of obvious proof may protect individuals from the collateral effects of persuasion (commercials, mass-media manipulation, political promises, etc.). Practicing logical abilities may also lead to enhancing knowledge through reasoning: by inferring new information (conclusions) from previous knowledge (premises), i.e. not by making general and vague assumptions or by producing slogans, common places and thinking stereotypes"[13].

We could state – without exaggeration – that critical thinking helps a person to remain informed while protecting oneself from the information bombing, to develop oneself as a psycho-social being and to discover the ways in which one can capitalize his/her assets in a world which is continuously and rapidly changing.

Corrupted forms of critical thinking in Romanian society

In our collective mentality, there persists a belief according to which one should be critical in his/her relationship with the others, and if one person is not critical, particularly in social and political life, he/she is perceived as being weak, coward, passive and/or naive. On the other hand, a critical attitude is associated with know-how, courage, responsibility, discernment and democratic spirit. If a critical attitude is the result of critical thinking, it is desirable to be used, apart from the situation in which criticism becomes too excessive. As we have already mentioned, unfortunately, in our society there are a lot of persons, i.e. the majority, who associate criticism with critical thinking. Actually, they do not know what critical thinking means, and, if they do, they do not apply it either in social-political life or in their personal relationships. In social-political life, criticism appears as an enemy of critical thinking, as an aggressive way to destroy an enemy. A brief reference to the content of the articles published in the press, of TV talk-shows, street disputes etc., all creates the images of a society that is overwhelmingly full of a negative, offensive and defamatory form of criticism. This form of criticism often becomes a person-oriented attack, while taking different forms like: contesting, defamation, insult, intimidation, media lynching, cyberbullying or Internet harassment, etc.

We are going to make reference to the last two forms of criticism, which, in our opinion, have become quite concerning within the Romanian public sphere.

"Media lynching is a non-journalistic, extremely aggressive, complex and long-lasting action, which is promoted by one or more media institutions that could act separately or not and that act with intention or with vengeance against an individual who is usually a public figure in order to compromise his/her position, to destroy his/her credibility and reputation. The purpose and motivation of a media lynching is the elimination from the public sphere (or simply from a certain position, structure, etc.) of a person who blocks or hinders the satisfaction of a certain interest, be it a private or a group interest; the lynched person may have become a public enemy out of different reasons or interests or simply accidentally"[14].

Media lynching is a media technique that dominates public communication in our country and it is radically different from civilized and respectful dialogue; media lynching is born out of a defamation culture, it is characterized by disrespect for man and truth and for the diabolic promotion of personal and group interests.

"Authors of defamation acts, social agents and actors (famous persons, conscience directors, opinion leaders, journalists, etc.), are a particular category that resort to degrading techniques, whereas the victims of defamation are those who refuse to resort to such ignominious acts while remaining the favorite targets of the former ones"[15].

A society in which the authors of media lynching (famous persons, opinion leaders, journalists) continue to "preserve their statute within public life is a society without any direction, in which moral values, reputation and public image are not actually considered civic values"[16].

As to cyberbullying authors (Internet harassing persons) and the above-mentioned media technique, we appreciate that its presence in Romania is really worrying.

Cyberbullying or abuse and harassment via Internet may be found in different forms: verbal aggression, defamation, personal data theft; this is the latest and most serious form of person-oriented attack. Its consequences are devastating, leading to suicide cases, as it happened with some teenagers[17].

Studies have revealed that in Romania the Internet harassment instances amount at one of the highest levels in Europe. Thus, the European average for Internet harassment (cyberbullying) is 19% for children, while in Romania it has reached 41%, i.e. very close to the highest level (which has been recorded in Estonia:43%)[18].

Person-oriented attacks, from contesting a person to media lynching and cyberbullying have in common verbal aggression and/or image distruction.

Verbal aggression is not harmless at all. Psychologists warn about its negative effect, which may amount at the seriousness of a physical or sexual abuse, leaving inner stigmata for good. "Victims of verbal aggression may have a low level of self-esteem, may suffer from anxiety and depression or may have the tendency to harm themselves (…), have attachment issues, feel that nobody understands them, doubt their intelligence, psychical health or even the ability to communicate, may become addicted to alcohol or drugs (…) find it difficult to make decisions, etc."[19]

Specialized literature brings into evidence not only the large range of "malign", "far-fetched" forms of criticism, but also the premises (causes) of criticism, which generate these forms. Without having the intention of exhaustively presenting the causes of these malign forms of criticism, I would like to enumerate the most visible of them.

a) Self-sufficiency criticism. One feels that he/she is all-knowing and that he/she is in possession of the supreme truth, a fact which gives him/her the right to judge everything and everyone. Actually, this is a "malformation of the critical spirit, which results from its manifestation as a form of intelligence. The one who feels smart hits hard!"[20].
b) Criticism results from one's ideological belonging to a certain group or from sharing a certain view: thus, one criticizes anything that those who do not agree with his/her political orientation do or say. In this case, one's only concern is to monitor his/her opponent's presence in public, to exploit their vulnerable points, to put them in an unfavorable situation by misinterpreting their discourses, to destroy their public image and to manipulate public opinion to one's own advantage.
c) Criticism generated by hatred, envy and vanity. A concluding example is offered by the literary critic Alex Stefanescu. In an interview, he refers to the violent reaction and the "devastating" hatred that some of his colleagues manifested after he published "The History of Romanian Contemporary Literature". The discontent of some of these critics – the author says – "was caused by the fact that he did not write about them or that he wrote little about some of them or that he did not praise enough their books. Others were discontent because although he praised their books he also praised writers who were their enemies"[21].

The conceited considers that the system is wrong and must be modified if he is not sufficiently appreciated or if the system does not bring him at the top of the hierarchy.

d) Citicism – an expression of incompetence, ignorance.

Quite often the most ignorant ones happen to be more critical and exigent, intolerant, noisy and self-confident. The noisy incompetent criticizes the others because he is afraid to be criticized. He is the one who starts criticizing. By attacking the first he wants to avoid being criticized. He tries to annihilate the critical spirit of his competitors, letting them dis-incriminate themselves, find proof of his innocence. Unfortunately, the noisy ignorant happens to control the situation, according to the principle: "The one who cries louder is right.". You cannot fail to wonder why competence fails when dealing with incompetence and ignorance. "The well-known effect Dunning-Kruger functions in this situation: the ignorant suffers from an illusory superiority, he has no dilemma, while the competent one tends to doubt himself and believe that what he does can be simply done by another person, too"[22]. When the competent one "thinks, doubts and tries to find solutions", the noisy and self-confident ignorant, who has no dilemmas, succeeds in being the first.

A different type of competition (illegitimate, of course) has come up: the one who criticizes the first, no matter if he has arguments or not, no matter if they are grounded or not, appears to be right. Sometimes mass-media plays this game, too.

e) Snobbish criticism. The "Dada spirit" is obsolete, it is cool to criticize, destroy, be against something or someone. These persons, "who appear to be innocent, are <<against>> something or someone because it seems to them that it is <<funny>>: we play a game, we avoid being quiet in the bourgeoisie spirit and we avoid being enlisted. These are the malign forms of the critical spirit''[23].

These reactions are, according to Andrei Plesu, "omnipresent in public life". Finally, agreeing, saying yes to what others say/do is not fun! Not even when what they do or say proves to be of value, especially then. When you are not able to produce, to build something, what else is left to you than criticize what the others have done? How can such a person distinguish himself/herself if not denying the ones that create? They praise themselves by denying the others!

f) Criticism generated by frustration and personal discontent that is oriented against the others. It is more comfortable to criticize the others or to find someone who is "guilty" than to recognize your own failures (wrong choices, insufficient involvement, wrong management of resources, etc.), thus protecting the image you have created about yourself.

g) Criticism – as an expression of intolerance: if you are not like me, if you are different, you are not good, you are "wrong".

h) "The critical spirit is often manipulated as an expression of freedom (…). We have won the right to self-sufficiency and to the arbitrary, we have won the right to care about no rules. I can judge all the others because there is nothing to win or to lose. There are no limits to the language and attitude that I can adopt, so I can capitalize my aggression and nerve"[24].

The right to freedom is seen here from an invalid perspective: it lacks responsibility, respect, virtue and politeness.

Without pretending or intending to deal with this presentation exhaustively, I close here the list of the so-called corrupted manifestations of criticism, as well as of the causes that generate them.

Conclusions:

At the opposite pole: "the art to criticize''and the rules of civilized polemic

In conclusion, we find that, in Romanian society, the dialogue on critical thinking has not yet become common practice. Most often, criticism is manifested as personal attacks, offensive, defamation, harassment so that the enemy of critical thought. This represents a serious obstacle in the way of communication, organizatioale affiliation, problem solving, strengthening participatory democracy. . For this situation to change, it is necessary that the education system to put in the center of its objectives, critical thinking and creative development of children.

Children need to learn early ,, art " to protest, to formulate critically reproofs and the rules of civilisd polemics. If they do not know this ,,art'', even if their criticism is objective and entitled it can generate conflicts, tensions, breaking relationships. Or, if honest criticism, it aims to reduce tensions and not amplification.

The art to criticize – according to Jeanne Signard – means to respect the following rules of behavior: talk to the person you criticize directly and not to another person; talk privately first and only then in public; avoid making comparisons because they may generate, as the case may be, indiference or irritation; protest verbally and not by using mimic, because the latter may be wrongly understood; avoid ironies – sources of annoyance and aggression; be prompt, do not let mistakes accumulate in order not to aggravate a situation; do not mention complaints without solutions repeatedly; do not say you are sorry: when you make a complaint you are not guilty; servilism is not a virtue in our epoch; do not use emphatic words like "always" or "never" because by criticizing you hope to make things right; be straightforward and precise; shape your critics and limit them to what can be changed; describe facts in a concrete manner, without interpreting or trying to identify hidden intentions; describe the negative effects of unsolved complaints; this description does not have to be false or threatening; refer to the system of values that your colocutor has; potential solutions have to show up as positive values to the person whose actions are criticized; bring into evidence the positive aspects of the situation, as well; do not ask the criticized person to make things that are impossible to him/her and identify an acceptable solution without creating the impression that it is the only one or the best one.

To support our argumentation we also recommend the book Rules of Civilised Polemics, published at the Oxford University Press in 1890.

"In any scientific, social and politic polemics, the discussion should confine to the change of ideas and only to those ideas which have affinity with that issue. The parties in polemics use as arguments either scientific theories or concrete facts, relevant in respect of the problem discussed.

The parties do not have the right to bring into discussion the opponent's character, temperament or past, as those neither confirm, nor invalidate the validity of the ideas they assert. The parties do not have the right to discuss the reasons which determine the opponent's ideatic attitude, as he diverts the discussion from the issue itself.

Labeling the opponent by mentioning the thinking school, professional organization or political party he belongs to constitutes a violation of the polemics rules and proves the lack of arguments and weakness.

In a civilized polemics it matters only the arguments brought by the opponent as a person and not as member of a school or organization. You are not right because you are a materialist thinker, an owner or a worker, but only if your arguments are convincing or not."

We have quoted this text with the hope that at least a part of the concepts it presents are going to be considered in the polemics that the Romanian public sphere will witness in the future. We are positive that this will happen thanks to the introduction in the Romanian school of a key objective: the development of critical and creative thinking. As to this objective, we intend to approach it in a future article.

INNOVATIVE APPROACHES OF PHYSICAL EDUCATION AND SPORT IN CONTEMPORARY SOCIETY

Maria LULESCU[*]

Abstract

In the current era, physical education and sport know similarities, as well as differences to the previous historical periods, but also new, substantial elements, mainly in technology, information and culture. The theoretical background we start to discuss innovative approaches in physical education and sport carried out in educational institutions starts from the outline of essential functions of physical education and sport (Petecel 1980; Carstea 1999; Dragnea 2002).
What are the current aspects and the direction of actions in the coming years? Can we find innovative methods in the pedagogy of physical education, which could turn into basic approaches in schools and universities? This paper examines a series of opportunities of action, taking into account the social and informational changes in contemporary society, covering innovative approaches focused on higher interaction, complementarity and physical education for life.
In conclusion, it is only with the support of new, interdisciplinary pedagogy that we can sustain the modernization and implementation of physical education and sport programmes in the current academic system

Keywords: physical education and sport, nonformal education, motivation, social interaction, complementarity.

1. Introduction

People have considered, from immemorial times, that physical education supports a healthy life style. Along many centuries, physical education was necessary to man in his accomplishment of economic or domestic works, as well as cultural ones. Starting with the Industrial Revolution, the case gradually changed, many of the physical works performed in various professions being replaced by increasingly complex machines, tools and devices.

Education represents learning facts, information and getting certain skills; being a complex process, it implies assimilating and understanding elements which the society thinks necessary for the existence in a certain culture and community, both to carry out different occupations and professions, as well as for preserving people's health in general. The culture of this society confirms the values one learns or rejects those which contradict the basic principles of the community each individual lives in. The result is a certain pressure to initiate young member, members of the society, in the element which provide a selective environment, of a clear educational benefit, during their whole life, but not necessarily covering all information which they will continue to get.

Sport knew in the last couple of decades an unprecedented development for the earlier period, after WWII, many of its functions remained constant during this time, even if they were influenced by the historic and social changes brought by modernity. Despite this, we can notice that sport and physical activity new a modernization of its core values, functions or roles it plays in our society.

The current paper tries to find the answers to the following reflection points for an education aiming to have impact upon one's whole life: what are the current specific elements and the directions of actions for the coming period? Can we find innovating directions which turn into fundamental approaches in schools and universities?

Our analysis starts from the main aspects of pedagogy in this area, to which we will explore a few lines of action needed in finding innovative working means. The theoretical background of the paper is based on key contributions provided by researchers such as Stela Petecel who presents elements of tradition coming from the Greek and Roman antiquity (1980), and Adrian Dragnea who details physical education and looks at the role of sport addressing all individuals (2002). The literature to be used in order to bring forward proposals for interactive methods includes, but does not limit to, contributions brought by specialists such as Dan Banciu (2005), Ion Ștefan (2005), Gheorghe Cârstea (1999), Virgil Tudor (2005), Adina Glava (2009) and Monica Stănescu (2013).

2. Key functions in Education and Physical Education

Physical education and sport are part of a long system of traditions and activities which place man in the area of harmony between mind and body, in order to build, educate and shape it for performance, for also in the perspective of lifelong learning, conservation of energy and biologic potential, of techniques specific to individual sports and the ability to cooperate in a team. Through such activities, the individuals preoccupied by sport on a regular basis (speed, resilience, strength, spring, mobility and fitness) manage to build a profile during their professional and personal life, to develop cognition skills (perceptions, representations and thinking), as well as volitional ones (courage, initiative, decision, perseverance and patience), coupled with affective ones (feelings and emotions). All of those build one's personality and temperament, shape the psychic and develop needed competencies for a demanding life styles, increasingly stressful for today's man.

[*] Lecturer, PhD Faculty of International Relations and Administration, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (email: marialulescu@gmailcom).

Before we explore the way in which education and sport mix with a series of pedagogic perspectives, mainly innovative ones, it is vital to outline the main directions which this activity brought to mankind from the perspective of the functions it plays:

a) Physical functions, particular to this activity compared to other human subjects. Starting from Aristotle, according to whom "It is not necessary to ask whether soul and body are one, just as it is not necessary to ask whether the wax and its shape are one, nor generally whether the matter of each thing and that of which it is the matter are one. For even if one and being are spoken of in several ways, what is properly so spoken of is the actuality"[1] or the idea to take care of the body before one thinks about the soul[2].

b) or the many authors demonstrate the real effects on body and intellect. A related function is the sanitary one. Starting from the age of the Reform, various works of medicine and biology point out the benefice effects of physical education on one's health (such as stimulating growth for children, improving the blood circulation and digestion etc.) In the contemporary age, after WWII, rigorous studies undertaken by Anglo-Saxon researchers in the fifties and seventies proved that people practicing sport are less likely to get an illness and live longer compared to sedentary individuals. Also in the seventies, according to studies done by American researchers, it came out that physical activity can lead to curing certain affections such as tuberculosis, schizophrenia, and others.

c) Cultural function. Physical education and sport have a serious impact on individuals. From the perspective of sport, it makes use of the popularity of sport celebrities to influence people in society, which renders a cultural value, symbolic for this area. Secondly, sport has a demonstrated ability to support social integration and inclusion, from individuals spending their free time within a community where the person can perform physical exercises with other individuals sharing similar interests. Physical education and sport manage thus to make people become friends, or may lead to personal aversion. For the case of higher education, young people manage through the mere participation to physical education to become integrated not only in the group they are assigned to, but in other groups of activities as well, such as fun and entertainment. In addition, physical activity shapes one's body, which provides an aesthetic stimulus and serves human interest to display a harmonious body in front of their community. Modernity transformed the beauty of one's body through physical education in a prosperous economic activity of high impact in society, so that young people are more and more attracted to fitness centres, exercises building their muscles and aesthetically appealing body.

d) Economic function, which could also be named an industrial one, since physical education and sport cannot stay outside the economy of any nation. Physical tasks and sport support the economy of states and are regularly supported through governmental subsidies. This function occupies three main directions: spending, production and labour force. From the perspective of finances, there are both investments, as well as substantial profit from the production of sports items, body building cosmetics and equipment, as well as promotional materials associated to celebrities. Such activities occupy a clear range within a national economy, encouraging young people to take part in activities made popular by local and international stars from professional sports or those who work in bodybuilding, relaxation and physical welfare.

As physical education continues to develop and develop area by encouraging people to work their body, the number and range of research themes in this field significantly widened. Despite such developments, the changes in the way of thinking the teaching and practice in the classroom has not known a smooth route, without obstacles. Taking into consideration that physical education and sport coexist on the two fronts of work – kinesiology and educational research – the work of specialists exploring this area in higher education managed to impact both fields. Physical education remained closed to the pedagogy of adults. Moreover, the pedagogy of physical education and sport in European higher education currently broadens its own profile literature, influencing the class practice in state and private universities[3]. united as an educational approach under the concept of "sport for all" used by Adrian Dragnea[4], a motto essential in training students, as well as teachers and instructors of physical education.

3. Pedagogy in Adult Physical Education and Sport

Physical education and sport are at present looked upon as a constitutive component of school education, but also in training adults. From this perspective, specialists have analysed the role of formal education in building positive skills, but also the specific, increasing role of nonformal activities outside the classroom. In addition, recent studies have highlighted the characteristics of methodology and organization in physical education curricula in the Romanian education system[5]. Other researchers[6] note that physical education is integrated as a means to support accessibility and continuity, a social trend with economic and moral impact[7]. Pedagogy, in terms of etymology, comes from the Greek paidagogia, which is made of: pais = child and agoge = to lead, to guide. Pedagogy therefore holds the meaning of "leading a child, or guiding him." Pedagogy is, broadly speaking, the art to support the child towards his own training, to shape personality, according to patterns established by the society.

As a component of education, pedagogy refers to:

- The core and features of education;
- The aim and tasks of education;
- The values and its limits;
- Its content;
- Its principles;
- Its educational process.

In terms of innovation possible in the current educational systems of higher education in various European countries, there are a number of issues meant to enhance the following directions of research and practice:

1. Interaction between physical education and psychology. There are numerous researchers who claim that physical education needs the constant support of psychology, that the way in which physical activity takes place has a serious impact not only on the child, but that it will impact the future personality as we desire. The shared space of physical education and psychology places under detach the role of cognition in social sciences, the theory-research-practice approach in institutions of higher education, the role of interventions aiming to stimulate the individual and the perception of motric experience. Such a direction implies the understanding of factors which influence the psychologic and social activity of a person, his/her health development, the leading role of parents, mentors and trainers, as well as working for an objective evaluation[8]. We cannot speak about education solely, but approach the sciences of education which appear as the effect of cross-disciplinary interactions, within which the following disciplines are included: biology (neurologic and physiologic conditioning of child development), psychology (psychologic processes included and impacting learning), anthropology (cultural-historical expressions influencing a human), sociology (conditions and social impact of education), politology (relationships and functionality of educational policies at a certain moment). Thus, the above-mentioned disciplines interact with pedagogy through the set-up of disciplinary constructs. They include, but at not limited to: pedagogic psychology, sociology of education, pedagogic axiology, school hygiene, culture of physical education, international policies across national standards and curricula. They are undoubtedly reflected upon physical education and sport. Some of these connections have been observed several decades ago, but only in the last three decades researchers and practitioners focused their attention in research carried out in institutions with an educational profile, as well as on the debate, resulted from the research, of reflecting on the changes necessary and demanded by the educational environment.
2. Education and social justice. Along this direction, recent studies developed the concept of physical education as social interaction. In addition, during competitions for amateurs as well as professional athletes, experts observed that athletic activity leads to building civic skills, in the spirit of fair-play and fairness. This also applies to participants in physical education tasks in higher education institutions, willing to support each other. Those involved in physical activity are generally willing to express their opinion about the way this is designed, communicate in an open way with teachers, and are interested to promote sport among their friends. This new type of individual profile acknowledges the complex relationships operating in sport, become aware of social responsibility and get involved in active ways to spend their recreational time. It is about a number of people with an income from medium to above average who are interested to support deprived people in their community, trying to get a social role in civil society. Physical education as a phenomenon of civic support, of equality, tolerance and anti-discrimination are values fully contributing to counteract delinquency and criminality. From this point of view, specialists debated the role of criminality in contemporary society[9], and physical education is one means able to back educational programmes in secondary education and tertiary institutions in order to support a generation able to reject such phenomena.

3. Education in the modern digital world. From this perspective, physical education is placed on two main directions: play as physical activity needed to man, as well as the holistic approach. Physical education is no longer cultivated per se, isolated, but adapts to the current needs of people, takes into account stress factors, the impact of daily communication in online media, the willingness to relax, to socialize, but also to support family and extra-family relationships. Physical education in gyms placed in institutions of higher education is enhanced by communication activities and those taking place in fitness gyms and relaxation centres, combined with a healthy caloric consumption and healthy diet, the consumption of fibres and outdoor activities.

The most challenging issue of today's society is the unprecedented technological development, at an explosive rate compared to previous historical eras, in the last two decades, when the revolution of the communication means and digital applications turned into a new revolution. Considering that so much from the life of individuals takes place with the support of the mobile, of computer and software installed on such devices, the interest of people for physical activity, especially outdoor, faced a serious decline, the interest of children and youth going in the area of communication, online communication and games played online. At present, almost all educational systems acknowledge that it is difficult to face this issue, but there are teachers and researchers who look for an answer to the question: what kind of motivation factors can we find, how can we stimulate the interest of children and young people to have physical exercise? Is the national system able to change school and academic curricula, and certain aspects in the pedagogic practice to match this challenge?

The solutions for such a direction presuppose following action lines such as those proposed below:

- Higher interaction. From this point of view, a solution consists of using physical tasks that do not aim for top performance, but aim at involving rather equally all participants. The teacher or instructor is thus preoccupied to actively engage students, namely to become a mentor for some activities carried out together. Instead of simply pointing and describing the kind of tasks which students are to apply and perform, especially during examinations, the teacher turns into a guide, a mentor with the mission to open the interest and keep up the willingness to engage in sport.
- Complementarity. Physical education does not have to exclusively take place in schools and universities: the subjects of the learning process are encouraged to carry out activities outside traditional education, aspect which can be useful in the assessment of a teacher for a semester. This implies that teachers can even take into account the participation of their students in related activities performed by the students they examine, such as dance, drama, volunteer work involving physical work at a more intense pace than in labs or gyms. Moreover, complementarity also implies a constant dialogue with all those involved in the educational process: first of all students and teachers, but also students part of the same group, or teachers in the same department/institution, between students representatives and academic management, that is for various layers of the formal and nonformal communication. The goal of this dialogue is not only to inform the other(s) on one's own opinion, but to permanently explore and continue to cooperate, to find directions of action leading to benefits for physical works, feedback methods, and ways to improve methodology, and ultimately educational policies. This direction is far from easy, there are elements with a clear level of difficulty for teachers and mentors: during 10-15 years, there are changes not only on the labour market, with an increasing demand for humanities and informatics, but there are within sport competitions and in the economic area new types of physical activities. For the moment, the infrastructure and the current national training cannot but offer a limited range of physical education practice in universities, such as football, basketball or handball and athletics. However, the interest of the young generation goes to the area of newer activities, both for winter, as well as for summer (surfing, diving, rollerblades, snow rafting, snowboarding, mountain cyclism, or kangoo jumping or parcour, to name only a few).
- Physical education for life. Together, teachers and students find the means to accomplish daily physical activities, at work and at home, in what we call lifelong learning. Participants are encouraged to discuss in informal clubs, to explore and use a healthy life style, in a holistic approach. Young people are encouraged to find what kind of food and beverages contribute to stress, how they can give up or diminish smoking, what are the risks of alcohol or drugs addiction, as well as simple yet effective means to enjoy nature, to take daily walks, to have regular trips, to spend summer or winter holidays doing sport activities specific to each season.

Starting from the need of physical education as a holistic-based activity, it is necessary to ask what kind of results we might achieve if we can appeal more to creativity and inventivity in the classroom. The two types of questions we launch for reflection are: a) what directions could physical education adopt in the future?

[9] Dan Banciu, Ecaterina Balica, „Tendințe ale criminalității violente în comunitățile rurale. Evaluarea și percepție publică", în Revista Română de Sociologie, serie nouă, anul XX, nr.1-2, București, 2009, pp.154-163.

And b) how can teaching and learning about health have a higher role in the physical education curriculum to underline the vision of a body which exists as a biological, naturally given, but which remains after years spent in higher education under the influence of the society and of the culture of which the individual is a member further on?

To put in practice such ideas, a new rethinking, a renewal of the physical education practice and sport in formal and nonformal education is a must. How can we reach such a goal? It is first necessary to assess and rethink the training of teachers, who need to understand better the social and technological changes with an impact in the whole contemporary society, as well as an ongoing modernization of curricula, in line with the demands of the labour market and the European framework of projects addressing youth. Moreover, the types of activities planned for in the current practice ask for innovative approaches, for example keeping groups of girls and boys in the same type of physical activity, instead of splitting them and engage in isolated tasks, whenever this is possible. Their participation in the same group does not imply that girls will have the same performance as boys, but that interaction will be better for both groups, the interest for a shared activity can stimulate all. From this perspective, the approach to get the interest of all students is physical education as a form of movement. In addition, to put in practice any kind of new approach, it is vital to understand who the "subjects" of this process are. In this case, the subjects are not students only, but also teachers of physical education and sport, those with a decision role in writing curricula, defining activities, but also their implementation, namely other members of the academic body in each institution and stakeholders of educational policies from higher education institutions and agencies, governmental bodies coordinating public policies in education.

Such approaches do not work in isolation. The academic body in the whole educational system needs to find the kind of approaches suitable for all students, to set learning objectives and examination items in cooperation with decision-takers in each institution and preserve an attitude of cooperation and permanent learning in each school or university. In what concerns the relationship with students, teachers and mentors aim, to put in practice such approaches, certain types of activities meant to motivate, open mind and use body to new elements, encourage children and youth to adopt an active life style which is to support them for their whole personal and professional life. All the directions proposed above are aligned in an academic learning as a complex process, as defined by Adina Glava[10], listing the laws based on which this process takes place: motivation, reverse connection, repetition and transfer, debating them in the perspective of an effective education.

4. Conclusions

Analysing the topics presented in this paper, it results that physical education and sport in European higher education face substantial changes in the last couple of decades. Current theoretic frameworks place the functions of physical education in a new light, underlining elements of interest and impact in the current age. We further explored a few innovative directions which are started to be discussed, based on a cross-disciplinary vision which requires the need of correlating knowledge in this area with that in other fields: psychology, sociology, justice and information technology.

To support such approaches, the author proposes a few lines of actions as innovative approaches, using the principles of interaction, complementarity and lifelong learning. To close on an optimist note this plead for rethinking physical education and sport in the current educational system, we think that we can wrap up by using a quote provided by Jean Giradoux, a French writer, essayist and diplomat: "Sport is about delegating to the body a few of the strongest virtues of the soul: energy, audacity, and patience." (Le sport consiste à déléguer au corps quelques-unes des vertus les plus fortes de l'âme: l'énergie, l'audace, la patience.)[11].

Along this vision, physical culture needs to be looked upon in a wider cultural context as a vital section of each person's life, being about the development of the potential naturally provided and biologically inherited by each person, but also by the cultural potential from the social environment we live in, while this instils certain behaviours and main values which dominate the physical, social and moral environment, in such a way that it preserves health and welfare for each person, but also for activities performed in a group.

Any new knowledge, at the moment of learning, need to be designed from the assumption that they are valuable and benefice for the subject of learning. The teacher has thus the mission to prepare the conditions of sustainability and durability of each acquired element, of any ability practised in the educational environment. What is gained by a student at one moment is going to be used later in practice or to be correlated with other kind of knowledge, to apply them in either intellectual or material work. The durability and consistency of learning are provided by the learning ways and the nature of the teacher-student relationships, by the way in which teachers manage to influence students to use the same techniques outside a formal educational background and to preserve and generate the acquired information in the context of new experience. The interconnections of knowledge can take place based on project work or assessment moments, when recap or practising what has been learned turn into compulsory conditions, an essential opportunity to reassess the acquisitions, to have a synthesis, to get connections between various cognitive layers and practical abilities. Practice leads thus to full assimilation of knowledge in the very intellectual and biological being of any individual, supporting him/her to continue his/her life with the support of learned content. Later practice simply helps him/her to evaluate what has been learned and re-structure and validate the abilities and accumulated information at the level of school and university this person is educated in.

THE NATIONS OF EUROPE BETWEEN IMPOSED GLOBALIZATION AND THE NEED OF AUTHENTIC

Mirela Cristiana NILĂ - STRATONE* Raluca Alexandra NILĂ – STRATONE

Abstract

In the present consumer society, we are alike creators as well as addressees, of an impressive number of options. Of these, we need to choose what is relevant to their own social needs. At the same time appears the necessity to understand and of developing the concept of authenticity from the sociological point of view. This is the reason the confidence, naturalness, truth, warranty, has became in our research, tools of verification of social attitudes in the context of socio-political events, caused in their turn by global geostrategic policy.

Keywords: authenticity, trust, social choice, genuine need, consumerism

1. Introduction

The Globalization, as we already know, is basically a multicausal process. The aim of that process is achieved by the action to globalize. In turn, the action itself is a phenomenon of transforming the world into a unit, and this is manifested world-wide through specific means. This can be explained by the fact that a number of events taking place in an area of the globe have repercussions increasingly wider on people and social problems in other parts of the globe.

Generally, we can say that we are dealing among decision makers, with pro-globalists and anti-globalists. Those who are positioned in anti-globalist camp characterize globalization in relation to certain criteria[1]:

1. The Globalization is a conspiracy of large transnational corporations against small countries;
2. The Globalization united the market power in the hands of those who leading a small number of huge corporations;
3. The Evil genius of globalization is information technology;
4. The Globalization means companies uncontrolled by law;
5. The Globalization is the cause to lowers jobs;
6. The Globalization undermines cultural diversity;
7. By globalization, lowers the standard working conditions, workers being transformed gradually into a kind of slave;
8. The Globalization destroys the environment;
9. The Globalization involves the flourishing of the multinational corporations, at the expense of smaller corporations and consumers;
10. The Globalization deepens the gap between rich and poor.

It needs to mention that between the two world wars, the Europeanism, as socio-cultural paradigm, contained a high moral dimension. This was illustrated in the products of culture, generated by culture people: writers, artists, etc. Today, the generation of writers who ensure literary authentication no longer exists as a whole. She was fragmented over time, against the background of consumism which in turn, it was amplified chaotic, because of the education deficiency about selection. Also, the consumism is one of the factors who,on the one hand has attacked the authentic, and on the other hand, later in time, has triggered the need at authentic. But it all depends on education, an issue which positions us back into culture. The question is: how it looks the culture after this repositioning? This is a question which require the analytical ability and selection of the individual.

2.1. The fight for the mastery of information

The Interdependence who exists as a result of human development, represents the engine which drives the configuration of increasingly deep of human global society. Certainly, as species, the human has evolved within a society which he had created, through its actions, through his mind and soul. But this society it had distinct features along its becoming and development, referring to the territoriality, faith, culture, etc. We are talking here about nations, each with her identity.

The idea of human society organized and tidy as one global social system is not new. What is new, is materialized in the new world order, a corollary of globalization, as its ultimate supreme effect of these. That state for interdependence is manifested by the ties of socio-economic and more recently cultural category, existing between individuals. Necessarily, these ties exceed the borders of states, a secondary effect being one by mixture of the nations of point of view territorial, family, cultural and emotional.

There are voices who claim that in present all social actors, in various forms (individuals, groups, interests, corporations, etc.), are on the social scene and acting. There is also a scenario. His artists are more or less visible, some in the foreground, the others in the background. Their scenario has in center the eternal struggle for power. The tendency on seizure of the power through the takin g into possesion of territories and their resources is the manifestation framework for the magnates of these times.

The instrument used for this planetary purpose is the information. The fight for dominion of information, already has triggered conflicts between individual and group interests on the one hand and between national and cosmopolitan interests on the other hand.

For those few powerful of the world, the individual is an element that serves their to the extent that they consume anything, no matter as much as posible. The individual is not the social person, endowed with moral and creative capacity, but simply a executor.

The existence and specificity of the global market favored new forms of circulation of various forms of capital. The economic dimension has escalated in these conditions the states borders, in a form and unprecedented speed. At such movement, the forms of governmental organization have not been able to adapt in timely and this has endangered the economies of nations. The pattern under that appeared the circulation of capital, oriented to consumism, took its name of multinational corporation. In these conditions there is a certain dichotomy that targets a perverse form something which decades ago made reference only to the unit in the making: society and the individual.

From now, the society appears as an external entity, even if essentially is the result of his becoming, of the individual. We are in the situation where the quantity is in action over quality. This happens because the individual is forced to conduct actions depending on the conditions imposed by this entity. She is increasingly more hostile to the man and is called generic, society. Increasingly more, the human society call themselves in a form of consumism at global scale. That being said we may consider we have reached at the essence of globalization.

Malefic forces that govern at global scale have acted with a dexterity hard to imagine at the end of the XIX century in such a way that the whole (society) that exist and it works only trough its elements (individuals), now is to the opposite pole of existence and beingness of their. Paradoxically, but the globalization has like ultimate goal the increasing of the degree of union of the global population and not anyway, but in conditions of high standards. However, the uniformization about we are talking, annihilates the individual as well as identitary element and once with this, the power of continuous regeneration of society. In this way was created a socio-spatial gap between the individual and society: already we assist on a conflict sparked between merger and division.

The direction in which it goes the fight for the global power seems to have as the end point something no sense. This seems to be the finality of the relationship between globalization and individual identity, which undoubtedly leads to the crash the national identity of peoples. We have shown here in brief and as can be simple as possible as it appears the relationship between globalization and identity, without going into details of economic and especially political.

In political terms, the situation is much more transparent. The globals protagonists dictates without hindrance a policy of their global purpose, which he apply obligatory and unfiltered to the peoples, without to hide, almost without using the manipulation. They do this because they do not respect the people and do not hesitate to infringe on face the basic human rights. They get a reliable help in this endeavor right from the individuals who they promotes their interests and which are infiltrated into governments. They act together with the corporations and for corporations. The corporation has replaced the factory, the farm, etc.

2.2. The Group

Must nevertheless to mention that the idea of a world government has captured attention of the great public, from its beginning. Why? Because major world powers promised (and also do still so) welfare and happiness for everyone. Was put emphasis on the cooperation in all fields, on the progress of science and technology, all in the service of the individual happiness. But it turned out that the realy plan was watching just the implementation of a new world order, through coercion and satisfaction of some interests. These interests have been shown ultimately to be in favor of a small group of people who hold absolute power and immense wealth. These people have already entered in the public consciousness as the Group. Through his Ambassadors, the Group promised and asks. As promise, promise the same things for decades, as requirement, request always something else, more and more. What else? Because the group receives it all, as it asks. The population receives nothing, that's why they is promise permanently same advantages, that have remained at stage of desideratum.

In these conditions it is observed that populations, especially from the united Europe, the EU, they started to wake up from the mirage of promises. As international organization, the European Union is mostly an ambassador of the group. Natural and human resources, finance, environment, everything has gone in a few hands, with the agreement of governments, even if these riches belong to the peoples, in joint property. We believe that a government should not alienate in any way an asset that belongs to the people. Government should be the guarantor of the people who appointed him, in the relationship with foreign forces. This comes in the situation in which the government is independent of foreign interests of the nation. But the Group, through his intermediaries, took care to monopolize the independence and freedom of the governments. And this, we feel it pretty clearly here in Europe. The promises of European's Commission, of european leaders in the idea that we will live at high standards, members of the Union , were shattered.

How did it get here? How have ventured the G8 (Group) to start an avalanche of forces capable of annihilating conscience and soul of European nations? How they managed?

These are questions that involve a very careful analysis. Marshall McLuhan[2] is one of the leading experts in communication that promoted the idea of the global informational village. In the strict sense,this it was the idea of a global community without borders as regards of communication.

Of course, the dynamic element of such a purpose it was the Internet. The Internet it represented the tool that breaks any obstacle to human communication way. Nothing wrong up here. But such progress in communication, was anticipated to become used also for negative purposes. Always, great discoveries that might have been lead to the happiness of humanity were used in dual purpose: positive and negative.

Returning to the idea above, it should be mentioned that the global village has served and serves the interest at uniformity the human individual under all aspects, from all points of view. And the first step was made: the individual is in the global village, but he no more has command about the fullness of his quality of social actor. It's just one element of a whole, a component also similar the others. His consciousness has lost of its importance. It is trying to blur the past, for interrupting the contact with the ancestry. Among other things, the tradition must disappear and with it the positive social values. Everything related to authentic is introduced into a process accelerated by nihilism. For this shall be destroyed values, like: respect, friendship, love, kindness, compassion, mutual help, sharing of feelings, emotional support etc. This standardization aims uniformity. The uniformity in this situation is built on chaos. It results from the mixture of everything and all, without logic.

From this moment, disappears the social order that govern the human society. Why she disappear? Because she, the social order, was built by human throughout its evolution, through education, by establishing values, norms and social sanctions. We are talking about social control that involves all regulatory mechanisms of social order. The social control is coordinated by the free individual which respect and also impose limits. All is the result of historical life of the human individual. But the history carries with it memories. The memories means past and roots. The past is the anchor that bind us of the moment of birth, of family, and by the experience from which we, the humans, have learned and that keeps us constantly connect at authentic. In a word, we're talking here about quality in society. This is exactly what is intended to be annihilated. To a certain measure it has succeeded and look at us we are pushed in the paradigm of social quantity.

2.3. The quantitative man

The quantitative man is by excellence a free man. Free even by itself. No longer in the affective community with the others. This leads to a form of independence which has an essential feature: the falsity. In the global village, independent means solitude and addiction. Of course, the addiction manifests itself depending on what offers the Group, on which occasion he master, oppresses, uses and conditioning what was the social actor - the person. All that what it is promotes, is named convenience, luxury, easiness, equality, in sense of copy of one with the other, etc. On this path, the false independence destroys the individual's identity, his membership to tradition, people, nation, national culture. Destroy everything who belongs of social morality. It have existed boldness during this action because it has resorted to the sensitivity of frustrated individuals. They are not socialized with desirable social values, they do not have qualities who propelling them on the orbit of respect and admiration of the fellows. Therefore, they have accepted unconditionally a leadership position, from which to execute orders to whom he owes an undeserved social status. All these individuals are carriers of negative social values. They promote the social undesirables, non-value. They form the new elites, positioned in responsible functions, social statuses from serving more or less directly, the Group's interests. All these individuals are carriers of negative social values. Thus, the non-elites have been formed, bearing of non-values. By attitude and actions, these performers, killers of the authentic, have contributed and contribute to creating a rift in society about human value, at the individual's quality. This rift it was deepened and chronical such an extent that we can speak of a necrosis of values.

This is how the things stand in this moment. But, how resurrect from ashes the spark, at the same might happen in Europe. Here, the nations have a millennial history, a exceptional culture, here the peoples have benefited from a healthy education either in democratic regime, either totalitarian. The traditional family as the social core, remain steadfast.

[2] Marshall McLuhan, Galaxia Gutenberg, Ed. Nemira, București, 2015, p. 216.

2.4. The identity - an anomaly of the future

We have discovered from day to another that we miss the old man, most of us we do not wish the new man. We do not want to be the new peoples, for the purpose that the global artisans they want him. The old man carries with itself the past, he is authentic. The new man is a counterfeit item, a being who thinks he lives. However, he only exists.

That is why the peoples have started to move. In legislation the focus is on the traditional family. In Romania, a legal norm existing in the Civil Code, specifically Article 48, was elevated to constitutional rank. This article states clearly and unequivocally that in Romania, the family is founded on marriage; al.1.1 specifies that marriage can be concluded only between man and woman, these having the aged over al least 18 years. By this measure it put a limit against one of the issues that you raise total freedom. We us refer here by total sexual freedom. Suddenly, people begin to understand that the so-called open mind does not mean total acceptance, she means selection. And they began the selection calling upon of education and tradition. Gradually, we are witnessing to the rejection of some pseudo-values on which the Occident has forced us to accept them and that was sure we would not discard them.

But here is how the Christian morality, the social consciousness, the European peoples roots, have awakened from numbness and want go out of chaos. Anyway, in rural areas especially, certain liberties will not never success. This is because in rural area, the social life is conducted according to rules more strongly conserved. The tradition, faith, moral rules, are deeply anchored in the social life. The new, catches easier in big cities, there where the degree of homogeneity of the population is much lower than in the province, especially in rural areas.

3. Conclusions

The struggle for preservation and conservation of identity is unquestionably a necessity. This struggle is the essence of authenticity both at macrosocial level in terms of nations also at microsocial level in terms of human individual. The problem is looming especially at European level. The European Union is transformed in accelerated rhythm in a united Europe. Or this is desired by the Group, which is quick to establish the new world order. This united Europe would actually be one state without borders between member states, without national police and army, with a single religion, etc. Might the peoples of Europe them to be engaged in this puzzle, as a pilot project in the great opera of achieving the new world order. It may be that the artisans of the great global project they were to follow the effect of their action on the European peoples, then continue elsewhere with identical actions, or to make changes, to obtain one's object.

It seems that citizens they felt what happens to them so they started shy now, to seek, to regain and promote their origins, traditions. This is the search of the authentic, in an artificially constructed world in which man is forced to thinking into turn artificially. It only remains for us to observe the battle between the regular citizens and the global artisans, more exactly the results that will arise from the conflict between the need of authentic and desire of globalization.

A NEGOTIATION MODEL FOR COLLABORATIVE ACTIVITIES

Adina-Georgeta CREȚAN[*]

Abstract

This paper proposes a collaborativ system to model and support parallel and concurrent negotiations among organizations acting in the same industrial market. The underlying complexity is to model the dynamic environment where multi-attribute and multi-participant negotiations are racing over a set of heterogeneous resources.

Keywords: Negotiation, Collaborative Activities, Multi-agent system, Web components

1. Introduction

To be able to perform, enterprises need to exchange information, whether this exchange is internal (among departments of the enterprise), external (between the enterprise or part of it and an external party), or both. Enterprise Interoperability (EI) is thus defined as the ability of an enterprise to seamlessly exchange information in all the above cases, ensuring the understanding of the exchanged information in the same way by all the involved parties[1]. Large enterprises accomplish this by setting market standards and leading their supply chain to comply with these standards. Small and Medium Enterprises (SMEs) usually don't have the empowerment to do so, and are therefore more sensible to the oscillations of the environment that involves them, which leads them to the need to constantly change to interoperate with their surrounding ecosystem. Sustainable EI (SEI) is thus defined as the ability of maintaining and enduring interoperability along the enterprise systems and applications' life cycle. Achieving a SEI in this context requires a continuous maintenance and iterative effort to adapt to new conditions and partners, and a constant check of the status and maintaining existing interoperability[2].

Given this general context, the objective of the present paper is to develop a conceptual framework and the associated informational infrastructure that are necessary to facilitate the collaboration activities and, in particular, the negotiations among independent organizations that participate in a Network Enterprises.

The concept of "Virtual Enterprise (VE)" or "Network of Enterprises" has emerged to identify the situation when several independent companies decided to collaborate and establish a virtual organization with the goal of increasing their profits. Camarinha-Matos[3] defines the concept of VE as follows: "A Virtual Enterprise (VE) is a temporary alliance of enterprises that come together to share skills and resources in order to better respond to business opportunities and whose cooperation is supported by computer networks".

The negotiation process was exemplified by scenarios tight together by a virtual alliance of the autonomous gas stations. Typically, these are competing companies. However, to satisfy the demands that go beyond the vicinity of a single gas station and to better accommodate the market requirements, they must enter in an alliance and must cooperate to achieve common tasks. The manager of a gas station wants to have a complete decision-making power over the administration of his contracts, resources, budget and clients. At the same time, the manager attempts to cooperate with other gas stations to accomplish the global task at hand only through a minimal exchange of information. This exchange is minimal in the sense that the manager is in charge and has the ability to select the information exchanged.

In Section 2 we are describing the architecture of the collaboration system in which the interactions take place[4]. In Section 3 we define the Coordination Components that manage different negotiations which may take place simultaneously. In Sections 4 we present the negotiation approach that can be used by describing a particular case of negotiation, and, finally, Section 5 concludes this paper.

2. The Collaborative Negotiation Architecture

The main objective of this software infrastructure is to support collaborating activities in virtual

Taking into consideration, the constraints imposed by the autonomy of participants within VE, the only way to share information and resources is the negotiation process.

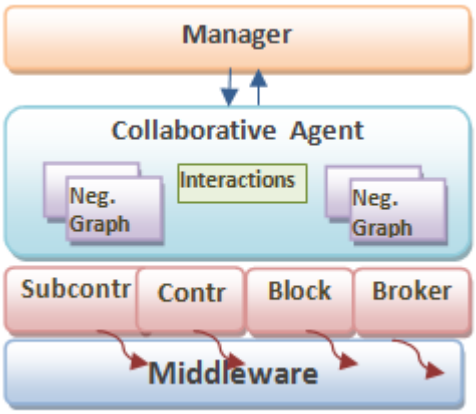

Fig. 2 The architecture of the collaborative system

This infrastructure is structured in four main layers: Manager, Collaborative Agent, Coordination Components and Middleware. A first layer is dedicated to the Manager of each organization of the alliance. A second layer is dedicated to the Collaborative Agent who assists its gas station manager at a global level (negotiations with different participants on different jobs) and at a specific level (negotiation on the same job with different participants) by coordinating itself with the Collaborative Agents of the other partners through the fourth layer, Middleware[5]. The third layer, Coordination Components, manages the coordination constraints among different negotiations which take place simultaneously.

The initialization step allows to define what has to be negotiated (Negotiation Object) and how (Negotiation Framework)[6]. A selection of negotiation participants can be made using history on passed negotiation, available locally or provided by the negotiation infrastructure (Zhang and Lesser, 2002). A Collaborative Agent aims at managing the negotiations in which its own gas station is involved (e.g. as initiator or participant) with different partners of the alliance.

Each negotiation is organized in three main steps: initialization; refinement of the job under negotiation and closing[7].

In the refinement step, participants exchange proposals on the negotiation object trying to satisfy their constraints (Barbuceanu and Wai-Kau, 2003). The manager may participate in the definition and evolution of negotiation frameworks and objects (Keeny and Raiffa, 1976). Decisions are taken by the manager, assisted by his Collaborative Agent (Bui and Kowalczyk, 2003). For each negotiation, a Collaborative Agent manages one or more negotiation objects, one framework and the negotiation status. A manager can specify some global parameters: duration; maximum number of messages to be exchanged; maximum number of candidates to be considered in the negotiation and involved in the contract; tactics; protocols for the Collaborative Agent interactions with the manager and with the other Collaborative Agents (Faratin, 2000).

3. Coordination Negotiation Components

In order to handle the complex types of negotiation scenarios, we propose different components[8]:

- Subcontracting (resp. Contracting) for subcontracting jobs by exchanging proposals among participants known from the beginning;
- Block component for assuring that a task is entirely subcontracted by the single partner;

Broker: a component automating the process of selection of possible partners to start the negotiation;

These components are able to evaluate the received proposals and, further, if these are valid, the components will be able to reply with new proposals constructed based on their particular coordination constraints[9].

From our point of view the coordination problems managing the constraints between several negotiations can be divided into two distinct classes of components:

Coordination components in closed environment: components that build their images on the negotiation in progress and manage the coordination constraints according to information extracted only from their current negotiation graph (Subcontracting, Contracting, Block);

Coordination components in opened environment: components that also build their images on the negotiation in progress but they manage the coordination constraints according to available information in data structures representing certain characteristics of other negotiations currently ongoing into the system (Broker).

Following the descriptions of these components we can state that unlike the components in closed environment (Subcontracting, Contracting, Block) that manage the coordination constraints of a single negotiation at a time, the components in opened environment (Broker) allow the coordination of constraints among several different negotiations in parallel[10].

The novelty degree of this software architecture resides in the fact that it is structured on four levels, each level approaching a particular aspect of the negotiation process. Thus, as opposed to classical architectures which achieve only a limited coordination of proposal exchanges which take place during the same negotiation, the proposed architecture allows approaching complex cases of negotiation coordination. This aspect has been accomplished through the introduction of coordination components level, which allows administrating all simultaneous negotiations in which an alliance partner can be involved.

The coordination components have two main functions such as: i) they mediate the transition between the negotiation image at the Collaboration Agent level and the image at the Middleware level; ii) they allow implementing various types of appropriate behavior in particular cases of negotiation. Thus we can say that each component corresponding to a particular negotiation type.

Following the descriptions of this infrastructure we can state that we developed a framework to describe a negotiation among the participants to a virtual enterprise. To achieve a generic coordination framework, nonselective and flexible, we found necessary to first develop the structure of the negotiation process that helps us to describe the negotiation in order to establish the general environment where the participants may negotiate. In the next sub-sections we will describe the Subcontracting and Contracting components.

3.1. Subcontracting Component

The Subcontracting component is the main component of a negotiation. The automatic negotiation process is initiated by creating an instance of this component starting from the initial negotiation object. Further, this component must build the negotiation graph by following the negotiation requirements (i.e., assessment and creation of proposals and coordination rules). The component meets these requirements by manipulating the Xplore primitives [14].

Besides these functionalities, the Subcontracting component has to interpret and check the negotiation constraints, which are set up in the following two data structures : Negotiation Object and Negotiation Framework.

The information provided by the structure of the Negotiation Object on the possible values of the attributes to be negotiated allow easily the Subcontracting component to check whether the proposals received concern the attributes negotiated in the current negotiation and if they are associated to the values of the intervals specified.

For example, assuming that the Negotiation Object requires that the price should be (cost <= 10k), the Subcontracting component can stop the continuation of the negotiation in the phases associated to the white nodes where the proposals are outside the interval.

Also, by using the partner coordination attribute, the Subcontracting component can make known to the other components the participants imposed by the Negotiation Object or whether other components instantiate this attribute. In this regard, the Subcontracting component can easily check if the associated value confirms the constraints imposed by the Manager.

At middleware level, the Subcontracting component has also the function of administrating the transactional aspect of the negotiation. This component is seen like a coordinator and has the role to conclude an agreement among the component instances participating in the same negotiation.

Another Subcontracting component functionality is to interpret and execute the tactics specified in the Negotiation Framework structure by connecting a combination of different instances of the other components.

Thus, the Subcontracting component as well as the Contracting component described below are those connecting the aspects specified at the Negotiation Agent level and their implementation at the coordination components level.

3.2. Contracting Component

The Contracting component manages the negotiation from the organization side deciding to accept a task proposed in the collaborative networked environment, with some functionalities similar to those of the Subcontracting component.

The differences come from the fact that this component does not have a complete picture on the negotiation and that, at the beginning of the negotiation, it has no information about what is negotiated or about the constraints of its Manager.

Therefore, looking to the differences, we can say at first that the image of the Contracting component on the negotiation graph is limited to the data referring only to its direct negotiation with the Subcontracting component or with another component negotiating for the organization having initiated the negotiation.

Secondly, unlike the Subcontracting component, which, from the beginning, has constraints specified by the Manager within the data structures of the Negotiation Object and the Negotiation Framework, the Contracting component has a close interaction with its own Manager on the new aspects required in the negotiation.

Thus, depending on attributes required by the negotiation initiator the Contracting component is able to progressively build the data structures describing the Manager's preferences on the negotiation object and on the negotiation process.

4. Negotiation Approach

In the proposed scenario, a conflict occurs in a network of enterprises, threatening to jeopardize the interoperability of the entire system. The first step consists in identifying the Enterprise Interoperability issue. The following steps refer to analyse the problem, evaluate possible solutions and select the optimal solution. The proposed solution for conflict resolution is reaching a mutual agreement through negotiation. The benefit of this approach is the possibility to reach a much more stable solution, unanimously accepted, in a shorter period of time.

The design and coordination of the negotiation process must take into consideration:

1. Timing (the time for the negotiation process will be pre-set);
2. The set of participants to the negotiation process (which can be involved simultaneous in one or more bilateral negotiations);
3. The set of simultaneous negotiations on the same negotiation object, which must follow a set of coordination policies/ rules;
4. The set of coordination policies established by a certain participant and focused on a series of bilateral negotiations[11];
5. Strategy/decision algorithm responsible for proposals creation;
6. The common ontology, consisting of a set of definitions of the attributes used in negotiation.

The negotiation process begins when one of the enterprises initiate a negotiation proposal towards another enterprise, on a chosen negotiation object. We name this enterprise the Initiating Enterprise (E1). This enterprise also selects the negotiation partners and sets the negotiation conditions (for example sets the timing for the negotiation) (Schumacher, 2001). The negotiation partners are represented by all enterprises on which the proposed change has an impact. We assume this information is available to E1 (if not, the first step would consist in a simple negotiation in which all enterprises are invited to participate at the negotiation of the identified solution. The enterprises which are impacted will accept the negotiation) (Kraus, 2001).

After the selection of invited enterprises (E2 … En), E1 starts bilateral negotiations with each guest enterprise by sending of a first proposal. For all these bilateral negotiations, E1 sets a series of coordination policies/rules (setting the conditions for the mechanism of creation and acceptance of proposals) and a negotiation object/framework (NO/NF), setting the limits of solutions acceptable for E1. Similarly, invited enterprises set their own series of coordination policies and a negotiation object/framework for the ongoing negotiation.

After the first offer sent by E1, each invited enterprise has the possibility to accept, reject or send a counter offer. On each offer sent, participating enterprises, from E1 to E2 ... En follow the same algorithm.

The algorithm is shown below: Pseudocode representation of the negotiation process

5. Conclusions

This paper proposes a collaborative e-platform for sustainable interoperability by modeling and managing of parallel and concurrent negotiations, which aims to open the market to broader discovery of opportunities and partnerships, to allow formalization and negotiation knowledge to be passed to future negotiations and to properly document negotiation decisions and responsibilities. The negotiation activities typically fail because they are often based on tacit knowledge and these activities are poorly described and modeled. Also as negotiations occur in a closed environment, many external potential interested parties are not aware of them and do not subscribe them. This makes negotiations reach poorer results or fail by disagreement or exhaustion. The integration of formal procedures for modeling, storing and documenting the negotiation activities allows an optimized analysis of the alternative solutions and by adding the analysis of lessons-learned on past activities leads to maximized negotiation results, stronger negotiation capabilities and relationships.

Currently, interoperability among the involved parties in a negotiation is often not reached or maintained due to failure in adapting to new requirements, parties or conditions. The use of an adaptive platform as proposed will result in a seamless, sustainable interoperability which favours its maintenance across time; the ability to reach and interoperate with more parties leads to more business opportunities and to stronger and healthier interactions.

The sequence of this research will comprise the completion of this negotiation framework with the contract management process and a possible renegotiation mechanism.

With respect to the framework middleware, future research shall include handling issues regarding the security and resilience of the stored negotiation data in the cloud, and managing privacy aspects as the negotiating parties should be able to seamlessly interoperate but still to maintain their data free from prying eyes; also several issues need to be solved from non-disclosure of participating parties to secure access to the negotiation process.

RANDOM WALK HYPOTHESIS IN FINANCIAL MARKETS

Nicolae-Marius JULA*
Nicoleta JULA

Abstract

Random walk hypothesis states that the stock market prices do not follow a predictable trajectory, but are simply random. If you are trying to predict a random set of data, one should test for randomness, because, despite the power and complexity of the used models, the results cannot be trustworthy.
There are several methods for testing these hypotheses and the use of computational power provided by the R environment makes the work of the researcher easier and with a cost-effective approach. The increasing power of computing and the continuous development of econometric tests should give the potential investors new tools in selecting commodities and investing in efficient markets.

Keywords: random walk, financial market, stock price, statistical test, R

1. Introduction

When analyzing the market, there are two historical approaches. One theory is based on the randomness of the data and the other supports the predictability of the market, thus meaning a non-random hypothesis.

The random walk is an old concept, which can be traced back to 19th century, when the French broker Jules Regnault[1] published his research in 1863. In 1900, Louis Bachelier[2] wrote his PhD. Thesis on the same theory. The first use of random walk on stock market is attributed to Maurice Kendall[3] and his paper from 1953. The history also records the test performed by the professor Burton G. Markiel[4], when he demonstrated the randomness of the stock market using a flip coin to decide the growth of the closing price of an equity.

There are also researchers that do not agree to the random walk hypothesis in predicting the market behavior. They state that the prices are somehow predictable and one could identify some trends analyzing the historical data. Many studies are presenting tests that support the predictability of the trends in the financial markets, like professors Andrew W. Lo and Archie Craig MacKinlay's book[5].

Returning to the randomness approach, one cannot analyze the market without defining the market efficiency theory. According to Eugene Fama, the "father" of modern empirical finance, in his research "Random Walks in Stock Market Prices "he stated that "in an efficient market, competition among the many intelligent participants leads to a situation where, at any point in time, actual prices of individual securities already reflect the effects of information based both on events that have already occurred and on events which as of now the market expects to take place in the future. In other words, in an efficient market at any point in time the actual price of a security will be a good estimate of its intrinsic value". The idea that you cannot have a profit on an efficient market is not supported by all economists. Some stipulates that you can profit on such a market by selecting / buying leveraged ETFs (exchange trade funds). And, like almost always in trading, big risks can bring big winnings or big loses.

Depending on how much information is taken into account when forming the current price, we can distingue weak, semi-strong and strong efficient markets. A week efficient market is the one which forms the price based on all historical prices. Semi-strong markets bring intro the formation of the price all relevant and public available information. The strong form of the efficient market takes into account not only all the relevant information, but also even insider information, usually not publicly available.

Usually, the market efficiency may be considered a by-product of market involvement of information arbitrageurs. These information arbitrageurs shall buy the assets that are supposed to be undervalued and sell the overvalued one. These agents may have some information that is scares of publicly not so accessible. By doing this, they may be considered to regulate the price of the assets on that market and the new price should include also these sets of information known by these arbitrageurs. If the markets were perfectly efficient, the existence of the arbitrageurs would be unnecessary. Also, their actions are "boosted" by the existence of the noise traders. These so-called noise traders are the agents who trade based on other motives than new information (for example, an insurance company selling some stocks for paying a large claim).

investors who expect some gain. Stuart Ride explains the difference between a complete random market and the actual one in the Figure 1 below. In this graph, the investors are rewarded (the trand is ascending). The gray line is a compounded 126 day rolling average return, a so-called equity risk premium, the red line shows the compounded excess/residual return of the market, based on the calculations made by Ride. The gray line can be seen as the signal and the red one as a noise, or a Martingale process. Stuart Ride comes with

2. Random Walk Hypothesis

The random walk hypothesis is a theory that stipulates the price of an equity should be described by a random walk, more specific a sub-martingale process. In probability theory, this martingale[6] process (the term being first used by Ville, in 1939) is used to describe a fair game, in which the past events do not influence the outcome of the current winnings and only the present events matter.

A weak efficient market can be regarded as a random model, because the historical price changes are reflected in the current price. So, this is an argument to test for randomness in the markets. Stuart Ride continues this idea and states that the market is only approximately random. If the market would be completely random, no one should invest. Investors should be somehow rewarded for their risk-taken actions of holding assets. There is the so-called market risk premium and is the reason that there are long term

4 ways of testing the random hypothesis:

1. by predicting or finding statistically significant patterns in the so-called equity risk premium
2. by predicting of or finding statistically significant patterns in the residuals
3. by predicting of or finding statistically significant patterns in the sign of the residuals or in the rank
4. by using non-parametric tests of randomness

Stuard Ride[7] sugests a different approach, meaning running all of the above tests on financial price time series. And this is only possible using dedicated software, like the R environment and the emh package.

2.1. The importance of randomness tests

Usually, when investing there are some already called classical approaches. First, MVO (mean variance portofolio optimisation) assumes that the prices are stationary random walks that can be completely determined by their first two moments.

[6] Ville, Jean (1939). Étude critique de la notion de collectif. Monographies des Probabilités (in French). 3. Paris: Gauthier-Villars. Zbl 0021.14601.

[7] http://www.turingfinance.com/testing-the-efficient-market-hypothesis-with-r/.

The next approch is based on Monte Carlo simulations. These stochastic processes suppose to effectively model these totally random prices.

On the market there are also high frequently traders or arbitrageurs who insist that the prices are far from random and patterns can be identified in the price formation in high frequencies. Also information scarcity can be used to anticipate the price trends.

The fundamental analysts argue that in low frequency trading there is not a random price forming, but a strong correlation to the fundamental information about the company issuing the asset/comodity. Also there are the macroeconomic analysts, who also insist that in low frequency trading the economic factors do influence the prices, thus making them not random. Factors such business cicles can be recorded in the prices and making them predictible.

The last, but not the least case is of the technical analysts. In this case, the prices and volumes are not random, but follow some significant patterns, more or less easy identifiable and exploitable by using deterministic indicators.

3. Random Walk tests in R

The emh package consists (in the 0.1.0 version) in 6 tests: Wald – Wolfowitz runs test, Durbin – Watson test, Ljung – Box test, Breusch - Godfrey test, Bartell Rank - Based Variance Ratio test and Lo - Mackinlay Variance Ratio test.

Test 1. The Wald – Wolfowitz runs test is one of the most used tests for randomness. It consists in indentifying the number of uninterrupted aequance of identical bits. In financial markets, we translate this series in moments of growth (1s) and moments of decrease in in price of an equity (0s).

The runs test is defined as:

H_0: the sequence was produced in a random manner

H_1: the sequence was not produced in a random manner

The statistic test is $Z=(R-\acute{R})/s_R$

where R is the observed number of runs, Ŕ is the expected number of runs, and s_R is the standard deviation of the number of runs. The values of Ŕ and s_R are computed as follows:

$$\acute{R} = \frac{2n_1n_2}{n_1+n_2} + 1$$

$$s_R^2 = \frac{2n_1n_2(2n_1n_2 - n_l - n_2)}{(n_1+n^2)^2(n_1 \quad +n_2 \quad -1)}$$ with n_1 and n_2 denoting the number of positive and negative values in the series.

Significance Level: α

Critical Region: The runs test rejects the null hypothesis if $|Z| > Z1-\alpha/2$.

Test 2. The Durbin-Watson test (Durbin J., Watson G.S., 1950, 1951) is the most commonly used procedure for identifying first-order autocorrelation of errors in linear regression models.

The test is

$$dw = \frac{\sum_{t=2}^{n}(u_t - u_{t-1})^2}{\sum_{t=1}^{n} u_t^2},$$ where u_t represent the residuals from the regression.

In order to test the hypothesis[8] H_0: $\rho = 0$ (absence of error autocorrelation), the alternative H_1: $\rho \neq 0$ (the presence of the error autocorrelation phenomenon) the bilateral Durbin-Watson test is used. From the Durbin - Watson bilateral test tables, the critical values dL and dU are selected for k - the number of explanatory variables in the model and n - the size of the sample (starting from the significance level - usually 0.05 or 0.01).

- H_0 hypothesis is accepted - no first-order autocorrelation, if $DU \leq dw \leq 4 - dU$
- Reject H_0 if $dw \leq dL$ or $dw \geq 4 - dU$.
- If $dL \leq dw \leq dU$ or $4 - dU \leq dw \leq 4 - dL$, the test is inconclusive.

Test 3. Ljung – Box test, named after Greta Ljung and George Box, finds out if there is any significant autocorrelation in a time series. We should expect the autocorrelation when the financial series has a momentum or a mean-reversion. The test stars with the Ljung – Box statistic:

$$\boldsymbol{Q = n(n+2)\sum_{k=1}^{h}\frac{\hat{\rho}_k^2}{n-k'}}\ \textit{where}$$

N is the dimension of the series, $\hat{\rho}_k^2$ is the autocorrelation of the series at k lag, h is the number of lags. Under the null hypothesis, the statistics follows a chi-squared distribution.

Test 4. Breusch - Godfrey test is based on LM model and it is used to identify the autocorrelation in the errors in an econometric regression model. It is considered more powerful than Durbin – Watson tests (doesn't have the drawbacks like identifying only AR1).

The procedure consists in obtaining the residuals from the initial regression model. These residuals are forming a new regression:

$$u_t = \alpha_0 + \alpha_1 Z_{1t} + \alpha_2 Z_{2t} + \ldots + \alpha_p Z_{pt} + \varepsilon_t$$

The determination coefficient R^2 is calculated for this new regression and the nR^2 should follow a Chi squared distribution and the null hypothesis (there is no autocorrelation of any order) is rejected for $nR^2 > \chi^2$.

Test 5. Bartell Rank - Based Variance Ratio test is a version of the 1941's John von Neumann Ration Test. This version doesn't require anymore the property of normal distribution of the series. The statistic test is calculated:

$$RVN = \frac{\sum_{i=1}^{n-1}(R_i - R_{i-1})^2}{\sum_{i=1}^{n}(R_i - (n+1)/2)^2}$$

Where R_i is the logarithmic return r_i and n is the length of the series. Bartel demonstrated that the (RVN-2)/σ follows a normal distribution, where

$$\sigma^2 = \frac{4(n-2)(5n^2 - 2n - 9)}{5n(n+1)(n-1)^2}$$

Test 6. Lo - Mackinlay Variance Ratio[9] test is used to identify the heteroskedasticity in a series. Not all financial series can be tested with this procedure. According to Reid, "the test is only valid if security price changes have finite variances".

EMH* package in R

To test the random walk hypothesis on financial data can be rather time consuming. The today's technology allows the researcher to access a plethora of tools and the R environment proves once again that it is one of the leading source of utensils when dealing with statistic and econometric data. Each of the tests presented above are already implemented and can be used freely by everyone. The EMH package developed by Stuard Reid gathers these tests.

This package can be downloaded or installed in R from GitHub:

The test of randomness can be performed easily, using the following syntax:

```
results<-emh::is_random(financial_data) emh::plot_results(results)
View(results)

4. Conclusions

As Eugene Fama stated in his iconic article (Random Walks in Stock Market Prices), "If the random-walk theory is valid and if security exchanges are "efficient" markets, then stock prices at any point in time will represent good estimates of intrinsic or fundamental values. Thus, additional fundamental analysis is of value only when the analyst has new information which was not fully considered in forming current market prices, or has new insights concerning the effects of generally available information which are not already implicit in current prices. If the analyst has neither better insights nor new information, he may as well forget about fundamental analysis and choose securities by some random selection procedure.". So, one interested in investing on a market should benefit from all the information he can get. Testing a market for random walk helps decide if it is worth the risk of investing.

The future development of this research should focus on testing the model on emerging financial markets, like the Romanian one. The increasing power of computing and the continuous development of econometric tests should give the potential investors new tools in selecting and investing.

Annex

One can perform the above tests from EMH package test by test in R.

1. For The Wald – Wolfowitz runs test the syntax suggested by Stuard Reid is:

```
test_runs <- function(rets, a = 0.99) {
```

[9] Lo, Andrew W., and A. Craig MacKinlay. "Stock market prices do not follow random walks: Evidence from a simple specification test." Review of financial studies 1.1 (1988): 41-66.

```
Check and convert the data.
.check_data(data = rets)
binrets <- as_binary(rets)
Get the numbers of bits.
k <- length(binrets)
k.ones <- count_ones(binrets)
k.zeros <- count_zeroes(binrets)
Calculate the expectations.
mean <- ((2 * k.ones * k.zeros) / k) + 1 variance <- ((mean - 1) * (mean - 2)) / (k - 1)
Calculate the number of runs.
k.runs <- test_runs_number(binrets)
Compute the z score of k.runs.
z.score <- (k.runs - mean) / sqrt(variance)
Compute the p-value of the z-score.
p.value <- pnorm(z.score)
Compute the required threshold.
thresh <- abs(qnorm((1 - a) / 2))
Return the results object.
return(c(k.runs, p.value, z.score, abs(z.score) > thresh))
}
```

2. The Durbin-Watson test syntax suggested by Stuard Reid is:

```
test_durbinwatson <- function(rets, a = 0.99) {
Check and convert the data.
.check_data(data = rets)
rets <- as.numeric(rets)
Now construct the data frame.
k <- length(rets)
y.var <- tail(rets, k - 1)
x.var <- head(rets, k - 1)
data <- data.frame(y.var, x.var)
Use lmtest to compute the p-values.
colnames(data) <- c("y", "x")
Fit the linear model.
lmfit <- lm(formula = y ~ x,
data = data)
Now compute the durbin-watson statistic.
dw <- lmtest::dwtest(formula = lmfit, alternative = "two.sided")
Get the test statistic (D) for the test.
stat <- dw$statistic
Get the p-value for the D statistic.
p.value <- dw$p.value
Determins the Z-score.
z.score <- qnorm(p.value)
Compute the required threshold.
thresh <- abs(qnorm((1 - a) / 2))
Return the results object.
return(c(stat, p.value, z.score,
}
```

3. Ljung – Box test syntax suggested by Stuard Reid is:

```
test_ljungbox <- function(rets, a = 0.99, n.lags = 15) {
Number of lags.
k <- length(rets)
rets <- as.numeric(rets)
The denominator.
```

```
den <- k - seq(1, n.lags)
Compute the lagged autocorrelations.
autocors <- c()
for (l in 1:n.lags) { rets.head <- head(rets, k - l) rets.tail <- tail(rets, k - l) correl <- cor(rets.head, rets.tail) autocors <- c(autocors, correl)
}
```

4. Breusch - Godfrey test syntax suggested by Stuard Reid is:

```
test_breuschgodfrey <- function(rets, a = 0.99) {
Check and convert the data.
.check_data(data = rets)
rets <- as.numeric(rets)
Now construct the data frame.
k <- length(rets)
y.var <- tail(rets, k - 1)
x.var <- head(rets, k - 1)
data <- data.frame(y.var, x.var)
Use lmtest to compute the p-values.
colnames(data) <- c("y", "x")
Fit the linear model.
lmfit <- lm(formula = y ~ x,
data = data)
To compute the Beusch-Godfrey statistic.
bg <- lmtest::bgtest(formula = lmfit)
Get the test statistic (D) for the test.
stat <- bg$statistic
Get the p-value for the D statistic.
p.value <- bg$p.value
Determins the Z-score.
z.score <- qnorm(p.value)
Compute the required threshold.
thresh <- abs(qnorm((1 - a) / 2))
Return the results object.
return(c(stat, p.value, z.score, abs(z.score) > thresh))
}
```

5. Bartell Rank - Based Variance Ratio syntax suggested by Stuard Reid is:

```
test_bartellrank <- function(rets, a = 0.99) {
Check and convert the data.
.check_data(data = rets)
rets <- as.numeric(rets)
Run the bartell's rank test in randtests.
br <- randtests::bartels.rank.test(rets)
Get the test statistic (D) for the test.
stat <- br$statistic
Get the p-value for the D statistic.
p.value <- br$p.value
Determins the Z-score.
z.score <- qnorm(p.value)
Compute the required threshold.
thresh <- abs(qnorm((1 - a) / 2))
Return the results object.
return(c(stat, p.value, z.score, abs(z.score) > thresh))
}
```

6. Lo - Mackinlay Variance Ratio syntax is:
- using vrtest package
#Usage
Lo.Mac(y, kvec)
#Arguments
#y a vector of time series, typically financial return
#kvec a vector of holding periods
