PLEA AGREEMENT DURING THE CRIMINAL PROSECUTION OF A CRIMINAL TRIAL

Marian ALEXANDRU*

Abstract

The Plea Agreement is one of the latest institutions and one of the special procedures introduced by the New Romanian Criminal Procedure Code.
The Romanian procedure law adopted it because the State wanted a reduced cost of the justice action; thus, the courts would have fewer trials and the procedures would be accelerated. This work wants to analyze the congruity of this procedure with the right to a fair trial.

Keywords*: agreement, recognition, guilt, prosecutor, trial.*

1. Introduction

The Romanian quick social and economical development has been constantly claiming the need for adjusting the judicial system to the contemporary reality, for a good, prompt and efficient justice action.

One of the important institutions introduced among the special procedures, regulated by Title 4, Chapter 1 of the Special Part of the New Criminal Procedure Code, is represented by the plea agreement.

It is considered special because it is regulated mainly by some norms, derogatory from the normal procedure, applicable unitarily in solving criminal cases.

The special derogatory character draws from aspects concerning the limits of the law court assignment, the object of the trial, the rules set for the trial whenever the instance is informed about such agreement.

Some states have been using this special practice for a long time now. For instance, in the United Kingdom of Great Britain, the first pieces of evidence of this procedure date since 1743, whereas in the USA from 1804.

This work wants to study the circumstances of signing this type of agreement, used only during the criminal investigating stage.

We are going to analyze the duties of both the criminal prosecutor and his hierarchically superior, and at the same time, the obligations of the accused person when accessing this procedure during the criminal investigation stage of a criminal case.

2. Authors and procedure initiation

According to art 478 paragraph (1) Criminal Procedure Code, the defendant and the prosecutor are the authors of the plea agreement.

This document can be signed either by the prosecutor who investigates the criminal case, according to art. 56 paragraph (3) Criminal Procedure Code, or the prosecutor who supervises the criminal investigation carried out by criminal investigating bodies.

Pursuant to art 82, Criminal Procedure Code, the defendant is the person against whom a criminal action has been started. As the law doesn't make the difference, the plea agreement can be signed by both a natural and legal person[1] representing the defendant.

It is worth mentioning that when a defendant is confronted with a criminal prosecution for having committed several crimes, he has got the possibility, provided the legal requirements are complied with, to reach an agreement regarding only some of these offences. The rest of criminal deeds, not included in the plea deal, are to be subjected to the regular legal procedure.

At the beginning, the underage defendant was not allowed to access this procedure, neither personally nor through a legal representative. Nowadays, such restriction is no longer in force but its validity depends on the clearly expressed agreement of the underage legal representative[2].

When there are several defendants in the case, it is possible that only some of them to express their acceptance for a plea bargain; in such case, each of them will have a separate agreement, without affecting the presumption of innocence of those who haven't consented to the deal.

The capacity to initiate the procedure is valid for both of its authors.

Article 108 paragraph (4) thesis I of the Criminal Procedure Code states that "the judicial body must inform the defendant about the possibility to reach a plea agreement during the criminal prosecution". The defendant is informed about it and his other rights and obligations in writing, under signature, before his first hearing; in case of incapacity or refusal to sign, a minutes shall be drawn up pursuant to art 199 Criminal Procedure Code.

If the procedure is initiated by the defendant, though the law doesn't mention the form, the jurisprudence accepts it either as a written demand addressed to the prosecutor or an oral request put down in a minutes by the criminal prosecuting bodies.

Nevertheless, it is necessary to underline the fact that appealing to such procedure is recognized and guaranteed as a right rather than an obligation for its authors. So, any of them have the right to choose whether to initiate it or to refuse its initiating action done by the other author, if there are reasons to believe it is not favorable, or legal provisions are not observed. When the procedure is announced by one author or is already begun, the judicial body doesn't have to notify it to the victim, the civil party or to the responsible plaintiff party.

3. The object of the plea agreement

According to article 479 Criminal Procedure Code[3] "the plea agreement represents the recognition of the offence and the charge, object of the criminal action, and also the way and the length of the punishment, together with the manner of application of the educative measure or, if it is the case, the solution to give up or postpone the punishment order."

It is important to stress the fact that compared to the procedure of guilt recognition, the plea agreement includes both recognition of the offence and the acceptance of the charge. Pursuant to art 482 letter g) Criminal Procedure Code, this recognition must be expressed as a clearly identified statement and not as a result of an interpretation of the defendant attitude as silent recognition (for instance, when the defendant understands to make use of his right to remain silent and not to cooperate with the judicial authorities).

Yet, nothing stops the defendant or his layer to ask for the change of the legal classification of the offence before the procedure begins.

The statement given by the defendant according to art 109 Criminal Procedure Code, and recorded according to art 110 Criminal Procedure Code, even when he admits his guilt and the legal classification at that particular time, but before the beginning of the plea bargain procedure, cannot be considered as guilt recognition in the spirit of art 479 Criminal Procedure Code, because it is not a proof of evidence that can be used against the defendant.

As for the punishment, in the absence of a clear distinction, both the main punishment (fine or prison) and the secondary one are to be taken into account.

About the kind of punishment, according to art 485 paragraph (1) letter a. Criminal Procedure Code, stating the solutions to be ruled by the Court, (related to the plea bargain), the parties, meaning the prosecutor and the defendant accompanied by his lawyer, can agree upon the prison punishment as liberty deprivation measure (with or without accessory punishment or complementary punishments) or upon the fine, by negotiating their length and sum, or upon the application manner for the suspension of probation.

The solution reached through agreement could be waiving the punishment or postponing its application.

Besides the observance of general terms for concluding the plea agreement, the prosecutor must verify the compliance with the provisions of art 80 Criminal Procedure Code in order to reach the solution of waving the punishment application.

When the negotiation focuses on the solution of postponing the punishment application, the prosecutor must also verify the observance of provisions of art 83 Criminal Code; after that, they will negotiate the number of days for unpaid labor for the community and the obligations stated by art 85 paragraph (2).

When negotiating the punishment suspension, it is necessary to register the fulfillment of provisions of art 91 Criminal Code, establishing a clear supervision term[4], the number of days of unpaid labor for community and which obligations, stated by art 93 paragraph(2), Criminal Code, are to be ruled.

The presence of these supplementary conditions has a direct influence on the maximum punishment length admitted in case of plea agreement[5].

We have to underline the fact that, besides the possible acceptance of the plea agreement for the underage defendants, its object can be made up by the form and manner of the applied educative measure, but it is clear that its length is not negotiated.

We can notice that safety measures are not negotiable. Yet, the Court has to rule also on them as based on art 487 letter a) Criminal Procedure Code, the sentence must contain also the mentions provided by art 404 Criminal Procedure Code, among them being the ones related the safety measures.

4. Content provisions for the plea agreement

After analyzing art 478 – 482 Criminal Procedure Code, we can see that there are some circumstances that must be collectively observed in order to reach a plea agreement.

Even from the start we have to say that such agreement is allowed only during the criminal prosecution stage. The solution seems to be justified by the reasons of its introduction and also by the fact that during the trial, the defendant can make use of the procedure of guilt recognition.

[3] Amended by art II p 119 of Governmental Decision no 18/2016.

[4] Probation time is between 2-4 years, minimum the time of the ruled punishment.

[5] Waving the punishment can be ruled only for the crimes where the law provides maximum 5 year prison time and for punishment postponement, the law provided punishment must be less than 7 years.

This circumstance is also fulfilled when the criminal prosecution is re-started pursuant to art 335 Criminal Procedure Code, art 341 paragraph (6) letter b. Criminal Procedure Code or art 341 paragraph (7) point 2 letter b) Criminal Procedure Code, but not when the criminal prosecution is restarted when the case is referred to the prosecuting body by the Judge of the Preliminary Chamber, according to art 334 Criminal Procedure Code.

The first condition, stated by art 480 paragraph (1)[6], envisages the maximum limit of the punishment provided by law, in the logic of art 187 Criminal Code: "the punishment provided by law which incriminates the committed offence, without considering the causes for its reduction or increase." This procedure can be started when the punishment provided by the law for the committed offence is maximum 15 years prison (as single punishment or alternatively with fine punishment) or a fine, without limitation of its quantity.

The law maker chose to refer to the degree of the deed abstract danger, with no consideration for committing an attempt, for the mitigatory circumstances or the special cases of punishment reduction nor the aggravating circumstances (aggravating circumstances, continuous crime and recidivism after the enforcement).

We have to point out here the difference between the mitigated types of a crime and the special cases for punishment reduction. In the first case, the reference is made to the highest level mentioned by the text incriminating the deeds, related to the type form crime.

On the other hand, the special cases for punishment reduction don't have any influence over the possibility to reach a plea agreement related to their beneficiaries.

Art 480 paragraph (2) Criminal Procedure Code, introduces the condition that all evidence should result into sufficient data for the existence of a crime considered the cause of the beginning criminal prosecuting action and for the defendant guilt.

In case the procedure is initiated by the prosecutor, the evidence charging the defendant present at the file must observe the provisions of art 309 paragraph (1) Criminal Procedure Code[7], stating that "a criminal action is begun by the prosecutor, by order, during the criminal prosecution, when he finds that there are pieces of evidence proving that a person committed a crime and none of the special cases provided by art 16 paragraph (1) can be applied here". Therefore, the plea agreement is also blocked if one of the special cases of preventing the beginning or the exercise of the criminal action is enforced.

The reason of this term is the very special feature of this procedure and it represents a supplementary warranty for the observance of the presumption of innocence and of the right to a equitable trial, a real pertinence of the in dubio pro reo principle instituted by art 4 paragraph (2) Criminal Procedure Code.

During the trial stage, in the absence of the adversarial principle, there will be no further evidence produced nor shall be analyzed the ones employed during the criminal prosecution, considered sufficient to make up the Court opinion, beyond any reasonable doubt, regarding the existence of the crime and the defendant's guilt. It is therefore understood that for benefiting from such agreement, the defendant must accept that the judgment shall be made only based on the evidence employed during the criminal prosecution.

The prosecutor is the one that has to verify the observance of such condition. If the defendant express his will to have a plea bargain, and should the prosecutor finds that the provision of art 480 paragraph (2) Criminal Procedure Code is not complied with, he shall reject the demand by means of an order, according to art 286 Criminal Procedure Code. This order can be fought against pursuant tart 339 Criminal Procedure Code, but, in this case, the hierarchically superior prosecutor shall study only the lawfulness of the reasons of the rejection, with no appreciation on the opportunity to have a plea agreement. This shall be assessed only by the prosecutor, and therefore, the hierarchically superior prosecutor shall not begin or ask his subordinated prosecutor to begin the procedure.

Another controversial[8] condition, according to art 478 paragraph (2) and paragraph (4), Criminal Procedure Code, is represented by the necessity to get the previous approval of hierarchically superior prosecutor.

By means of a first approval, the hierarchically superior prosecutor decides the limits of the negotiations or even the solutions to avoid, whereas through the approval, subsequent to the negotiations, checks the observance of conditions imposed by law and by the previous approval for the plea agreement.

Here, the hierarchically superior prosecutor has a rather guiding role, whereas the final assessment is to be made by the prosecutor in charge with the criminal prosecution, as, enjoying the best position in analyzing the evidence, he is the only person responsible for the main ruling documents in the case.

By reconsidering the benefits given to the defendant who chooses to undergo this procedure by applying the provisions of paragraph (4) of art 480 Criminal Procedure Code, nowadays, the limits should not be between the maximum and the minimum line of the punishment provided by the special part of the Criminal Code or other special laws, but between the reduced limits by a third for the prison punishment or the corrective measures with deprivation of freedom, and a quarter for the fine punishment. Given the fact that, when negotiating, the prosecutor has to comply with the limits of the previous approval, he couldn't oversee this rule either.

After the negotiations, in order to preserve the balance with the procedure of informing the Court by means of indictment, when the hierarchically superior prosecutor verifies whether this action is complying with the law, during this special procedure, as an additional guaranty of lawfulness and of limits imposed by the previous approval, it is considered highly necessary to issue a new approval, as it is now that the agreement becomes good for producing effects, representing the act of informing the Court.

If the hierarchically superior prosecutor totally agrees with the prosecutor's proposition, as responsible for the criminal prosecution (content, de jure and de facto motives), it is sufficient for him to express his approval directly on the plea agreement paper. Should the hierarchically superior prosecutor considers some amendments are necessary, due to different opinion on the agreement content, he shall draw up a reasoned order, offering de jure and de facto motives as merits of his decision. As the law doesn't provide such aspect, pursuant to provisions of art 304 paragraph (2) Criminal Procedure Code, the same way will be followed in case of rejected agreement.

If the plea agreement is rejected when being approved, either before or after the negotiations, the prosecutor shall go on with the criminal prosecution according to the usual procedure.

At the same time, the plea agreement must be the result of the negotiations carried out between the prosecutor and the defendant, who, according to art 480 paragraph (2) Thesis I Criminal Procedure Code, shall be accompanied by a lawyer, observing the provisions of art 91 paragraph 2) and art 92 paragraph 8) Criminal Procedure Code. Non compliance with this obligation leads to absolute annulment of the agreement pursuant to art 281 paragraph (1) letter f) Criminal Procedure Code, and the defendant has the right to invoke any time during the trial.

Negotiation is the key of this procedure and implies that both the prosecutor and the defendant make concessions while observing the law provisions.

As the law doesn't clearly describe the procedure, we conclude that the negotiations shall be held directly between the prosecutor and the defendant assisted by his lawyer, either through dialogue or written documents. It is certain that the direct dialogue is the clear way to obtain promptness.

Taking into account the powerful personal character of the agreement, ant that the punishment shall be enforced after the probable admissibility, It must be able to assure the prevention and correction purpose of the criminal code. Consequently, the prosecutor has to envisage the general individualizing criteria[9] stated by art 74 Criminal Code. Several aspects will be taken into consideration collectively: circumstances and the modus operandi, the means[10], danger risk for the property, type and seriousness of the result or other consequences of the crime[11], the crime motive and purpose, the crime type and repetitiveness, representing the criminal record of the defendant[12], his conduct after committing the crime and during the criminal process[13], education level, age, heath status, family and social situation[14].

The powerful personal character of the agreement is also pointed out by analysis of the subjective criteria.

On the other hand, the defendant also enjoys the possibility to draw the prosecutor's attention on the favorable criteria.

If the defendant committed several crimes, he can express his interest in reaching an agreement for all or part of them. In this case, the analysis of the above mentioned conditions shall be exercised for each crime. When agreement are made concerning several committed crimes, the resulted punishment, according to art 39 paragraph (1) Criminal Code, shall be set by reference to the negotiated punishments.

5. Legal provisions on the plea agreement form and content

When the content of the plea agreement is approved by its authors, they will write it down. It is a form condition provided by art 481 paragraph (1) Criminal Procedure Code. In case of defendants who chose to follow this procedure, the prosecutor will not make up the indictment and the Court will receive the plea agreement directly.

This agreement shall contain as provided by art. 482 Criminal Procedure Code:

1. the date and place of signature;
2. last name, first name and capacity of its authors;
3. information on the defendant person, according to art 107 paragraph (1);
4. description of the deed object of the agreement;
5. legal classification and punishment provided by law;
6. evidence and evidence means;
7. express statement of the defendant admitting his guilt and his agreement with the legal classification which started the criminal action;

[9] The analysis of the individualizing general criteria is not a judicial individualization, being the exclusive attribute of the Court.

[10] The following are to be analyzed: place and time of the crime together with the modus operandi and the means used in order to establish the danger risk of the author.

[11] It is important for the result crimes, for the study of the crime direct and indirect results.

[12] For instance, the absence of criminal record is a favorable element for the defendant whereas his perfection in a criminal field will lead to more severe punishment. Maybe, the time between the previous sentences and the moment of committing the new crime would be taken into consideration.

[13] It is important to see if there was any attempt to prevent the crime result, to restore the stolen goods, to hide the crime traces, to escape from criminal prosecution, to intimidate the witnesses etc.

[14] There will be an analysis of poor health state, family environment, entourage influence, psychological troubles (that don't impair judgment) etc.

8. the type and the time (clearly mentioned, not by reference to two limits), and also the punishment application manner or the solution of waving to the punishment or the postponement of punishment application object of the agreement between the prosecutor and the defendant;
9. signatures of the prosecutor, defendant and his lawyer.

If there are several defendants in the case and if many of them or even all of them expressed their desire to reach a plea agreement and the prosecutor finds that the legal terms are complied with, he shall sign a separate agreement with everyone of them. Practically the negotiation has to be held separately, given its powerful personal character.

The specialized literature showed the necessity to present the defendant a copy of the agreement immediately after it was signed.

6. Conclusions

As we can see from the analysis of these legal provisions, the prosecutor is the representative of the general interests of the society, in charge with defending the lawful order and the citizens' rights and freedoms. Therefore, during the procedure, his role is to watch over the balance between the general and the particular interests, in other words, the balance between the opportunity of the procedure and the compliance of the legal provisions in order to have a valid agreement.

We consider this theme important and extremely useful given the fact that the prosecutor takes into account the defendant's will to cooperate for the criminal prosecution and also his position regarding his own crime.

Nevertheless, as we have already mentioned it, we are talking about a general interest as by using this plea agreement we have a fairly and expeditiously trial with fewer costs.

JUDGE'S LIABILITY WHILE CARRYING OUT THEIR PROFESSIONAL DUTIES

Marian ALEXANDRU*

Abstract

Nowadays, the Romanian social and political context debates more and more on the patrimonial liability of judges for errors of law in cases settled by them. This work aims at presenting legal terms, based on which both the civil and criminal disciplinary liability can be generally enacted.

Keywords: judge, prosecutor, liabiliy, status, disciplinary

1. Introduction

This is a matter of general interest as it is an element which strongly supports the people's confidence in the act of justice, impartial and equal for all of them. Therefore, the state has a series of judicial instruments, in order to guarantee the lawfulness of the prosecutors and judges activity, their interest in protecting the law supremacy, in observing the people's rights and freedoms, and also in protecting their equal judicial treatment within the judicial procedures. These instruments represent the main subject of our work study.

In other words, we want to present the enforce regulations for judges' professional liability.

It is an important aspect as Romanians are not properly informed about the possibility to have judges in such position and therefore, we consider that a short description of the regulations in this matter would be very useful.

The Romanian Constitution states the patrimonial liability of the State for the errors of law. This means that the victim which suffered damages of rights caused by a public institution by means of an administrative action or by absence of solution of a demand within the legal term, has the right to get recognition of the alleged right or legitimate interest, the annulment of the act and the legal remedy.

2. The judge's liability

According to art 52, paragraph (3) of the above mentioned Romanian constitution, the State is liable for the damages caused by judicial errors produced by judges who proved mala fide or serious negligence in exercising their profession.

Article 94 of law no 303/2004[1] on the status of judges and prosecutors, classifies the liability as civil, disciplinary and criminal.

Also, the Criminal Procedure Code dedicates a whole chapter to the repair procedure of the compensation in case of error of law or illegal deprivation of freedom.

Judges liability is also regulated by: art 42 and art 44 - 50 of Law no 317/2004 on the Superior Council of Judges (CSM)[2], Internal Regulatiosn of Courts[3], Internal Regulations of Prosecutor's Offices[4] and the Order no 94 of 30.08.1999 on Romanian participation to procedures within the European Court for Human Rights and the Committee of Ministers of the European Council and the acceptance of the State after the decisions and conventions for amicably solutions[5].

2.1. Disciplinary liability

According to art 98 of Law no 303/2004, judges and prosecutors are disciplinarily liable for non compliance with the profession duties and for their actions affecting the justice prestige. Art 101 of the same law states that the disciplinary sanctions are to applied only by the departments of the Superior Council of Judges, pursuant to its organic law. Their application procedure is therefore regulated by Law no 317/2004.

Articles 12-16 on exercise of professional duties, part of the Deontological Code for judges and prosecutors, state that they:

- have the obligation to do their professional duties with competence and correctness, to comply with the administrative tasks assigned by law, regulations and orders;

- have the obligation to do anything necessary in order to carry out their duties within the legal terms, and if the law doesn't stipulate it, within the reasonable terms;
- have to protect the order and the solemn atmosphere in the court room and to adopt a dignify and civilized attitude towards the parties, lawyers, witnesses, experts, interpreters or other persons and ask them to adopt an appropriate behavior;
- have the obligation not to disclose or use the information for other purposes than those directly related to their profession activity;
- have to carry out their managing tasks by organizing the activity of the employee, to have initiative and be responsible; in making decisions they have to give priority to the interests of courts and prosecutor's offices, and to good justice act;
- as managers, don't have to make use of their prerogatives to influence the trials and decisions.

For justice reputation, an obligation provided by art 98 of Law no 303/2004 together with articles 17-20 of the same Deontological Code of Judges state that:

- judges and prosecutors have to refrain from any actions capable to compromise their dignity during the exercise of their profession and in the society;
- the relationships of the judges and prosecutors with other members of the groups they belong to, must be based on respect and bona fide, no matter the length of service and position;
- judges and prosecutors cannot express their opinion about the professional or moral probity of their colleagues;
- judges and prosecutors can express publicly their opinion by exercising their right to answer in case there are slanderous media articles or broadcasts about them;
- judges and prosecutors cannot carry out actions that, by their nature, financing or application manner, could alter the impartial, correct and legal fulfillment of their professional duties.

According to art 99 of Law 303/2004 the following represent cases for disciplinary sanctions:

- actions affecting the honorability of professional probity or the justice prestige, during the exercise, or not, of their profession duties;
- violation of legal provisions related to impairment and interdictions ruled on the names of judges and prosecutors;
- inappropriate behavior, while exercising their profession, towards colleagues, court employees and prosecutor's office personnel such as judicial inspectors, lawyers, witnesses, justice seekers or other institutions representatives;
- public political actions while being at work;
- unjustified refusal to receive the requests, conclusions, reports or other papers lodged by the trial parties;
- unjustified refusal to fulfill a professional duty;
- prosecutor's non observance of the legal written decisions ruled by the hierarchically superior prosecutor;
- repeated and unfounded non compliance of the legal provisions regarding the prompt solution of causes and repeated delay in carrying out works, out of imputable reasons;
- non compliance of the obligation to abstain when they have to, according to law, and also lodging repeated and unjustified requests to abstain in the same case, leading to the case deferral;
- non compliance with the provisions on secret about debates or works, or other information of the same nature, disclosed during the exercise of the profession, except for those of public interest, within the limits of the law;
- unjustified, repeated absence from work, directly affecting the activity of court or the prosecutor's office;
- interfering with the activity of another judge or prosecutor;
- unjustified observance of the decisions or administrative ruling pronounced according to law by the head of the court of prosecutor's office or other administrative institutions provided by law or regulations;
- usage of the position in order to get a favorable treatment from authorities or interventions to solution certain requests, claim or acceptance of personal interests;
- serious and repeated non observance of the provisions regarding the random distribution of cases;
- occlusion of the control activity of judicial inspectors, by any means;
- direct or indirect participation to pyramid type games, gambling or investment systems with no funds transparency;
- total lack of motivation of the judge's ruling or of the prosecutor's judicial actions, pursuant to the law stipulations;
- usage of inappropriate expressions while ruling the decision or while drawing up the judicial papers, affecting the justice prestige or the judge position dignity;
- non observance of the decisions of the Constitutional Court or the decisions ruled by the High Court of Justice and Cassation in solving the appeals according to law;
- mala fide or negligent position disrespect.

The disciplinary sanctions applicable to judges or prosecutors, depending on the seriousness of their non compliance, are as it follows:

- warning ;
- up to 20% reduction of the monthly gross indemnity for a period up to 6 months;
- disciplinary moving for as period of up to 1 year to another court or another prosecutor's office upon a Court of Appeal;
- suspension for up to 6 months;
- elimination from the Judges Council.

Disciplinary sanctions for judges are applied by the special committees of the Superior Council of Judges, made up of one judge and 2 judicial inspectors, whereas for prosecutors, the committee is made up of one prosecutor and 2 judicial inspectors. Each year the Superior Council of Judges through its special departments for judges and prosecutors appoints the members of these committees.

For disciplinary sanctions it is necessary to have a previous investigation which is ordered by the author of this action, being represented by the corresponding disciplinary commission of the Superior Council of Judges. The investigation is performed by inspectors of the judicial inspection department[6], one for judges and one for prosecutors. The result of this investigation is forwarded to the disciplinary commission within 60 day time from the moment the Superior Council of Judges registers the request.

If the disciplinary commission considers the investigation unjustified, they will classify it[7]. On the contrary, after receiving the result of the investigation or of supplementary confirmation, the disciplinary commission informs the corresponding department in order to take further disciplinary actions and have a conclusion issued by the Council[8].

The prescription period is 1 year from the moment of committing the crime.

According to art 45 of Law no 317/2004 of CSM, the disciplinary investigation focuses on actions and circumstances and any other important information proving the guilt. The investigated judge or prosecutor have the right to be heard, to make statements, to be present during the investigations, and when they refuse it their decision is put down in a minutes, which is not an obstacle for the investigation to go on. Also they have the right to study all the file documents and to ask for evidence in order to prepare their defense.

2.2. Criminal liability

Judges and prosecutors have to be independent and impartial, and for this, the legal system contains measures which protect them from abusive trials, vicious procedures and all kind of urges. It is important to say that the most important protection is to grant special capacity for criminal investigations and trials of crimes committed by prosecutors and judges[9].

Thus, according to art 324 paragraph (1) together with art 56 paragraph (3) letter a) and art 38 paragraph (1) letter c), the criminal prosecution must be carried out by prosecutor for crimes committed by judges of Law Courts, and by prosecutors of offices affiliated to these institutions.

The New Criminal Procedure Code considers that a criminal investigation conducted by a prosecutor is an additional guarantee of lawfulness and thoroughness in cases with high complexity degree, given the matter or the author status[10].

Article 95 paragraph (2) and (3) shows that judges, prosecutors and side judges can be searched, retain in custody or even preventively arrested only after there is approval from the departments of the Superior Council of Judges, and if it is a clear crime, they can be retained, searched and arrested pursuant to law, while the Superior Council of Judges is immediately informed about these actions.

2.3. Civil liability

People consider that judges are the only social category not being held responsible for their work. Therefore, people wanted to amend art 96 of Law no 303/2004 on the status of judges and prosecutors and several senators and deputies of Romanian Parliament forwarded a initiative concerning the situation when Romanian State is convicted by an international court, such as CEDO, and compelled, by final decision, to pay compensation. They consider it is absolutely necessary to have an action against the judge who, with mala fide or by negligence caused prejudices. Also, the project envisaged that “after the damages are remedied by the State, this one will start immediately an action for legal remedy against the judge or prosecutor who with mala fide or by negligence did the judicial error causing the losses”. “The prescription term of the right to begin action for all the cases provided by this article, is 10 years".

But, after analyzing the law project, the reasons, the approval issued by the Law Council, the decision of the Superior Council of Judges and other opinions, the project for amending art 96 of Law no 303/2004 on the status of judges and prosecutors was rejected.

Studying the circumstances where a judge has patrimonial liability, we will see that the current legal system allows the justice seeker, who suffered because of the solution ruled by the judge, to obtain legal remedy and the State to recover from this one the paid compensation through a regress action against the judge.

Romanian Constitution and Law no 303/2004 present two different institutions: State patrimonial liability for judicial errors and judges’ patrimonial liability.

Thus, art 52 of the Romanian Constitution shows that he State pays for the prejudices caused by judicial errors. It is set by law and doesn’t eliminate the liability of judges who have done their work with mala fide or negligence.

So, the victim has to prove the mala fide or the negligence of the judge which have caused the prejudice.

Article 99 of Law no 303/2004, on status of judges and prosecutors, explains both the expression mala fide and serious negligence, saying that: mala fide is when the judge or prosecutor intentionally violates the material or procedural law, seeking or accepting to cause prejudices to a person; severe negligence is when the judge or prosecutor willingly and severely violates the law.

Also, art 96 stipulates that the state liability is set by law and doesn't eliminate the liability of judges or prosecutors who did their work with mala fide or severe negligence. The Criminal Procedure Code presents the cases where the victims have the right to claim compensation for damages caused by judicial errors made in criminal trial. The person who had a part in causing the judicial error made by the judge or prosecutor, has no right to claim damages.

It is important to see that the law makes a difference between errors made during the criminal trial and other trials. For the criminal trial, the State liability is set by the Criminal Procedure Code. Art 99 paragraph (4) stipulates that the right of victims to legal remedies in case of material prejudice caused by judicial errors in trials other than the criminal ones, cannot be put into practice unless it was previously decided, by final decision, the criminal or disciplinary liability of the judge or prosecutor, for a crime committed during the trial, and whether this crime is able to result in judicial error.

In both cases, the victim can start an action only against the State, represented by the Ministry of Public Finances.

Therefore, the patrimonial liability of the judge is secondary to the one of the State in relation with the victim and at the same time, indirect towards the victim. Thus, if the victim wants to hold patrimonial liable the judge or the prosecutor, for their activity, it is necessary to ask for the damage repair upon the Ministry of Public Finances, which is the Romanian State representative.

For this, we consider very important the provisions of art 538-541 which offer explanations about the remedy circumstances procedure for material or moral damages in case of judicial error in case of illegal freedom deprivation.

Thus, the person who was sentenced by final decision, has the right to claim legal remedy from the State if after the retrial of the case, after annulment or elimination of the sentence decision for a new crime proving that a judicial error was made, ruled a acquittal solution. The same thing happens when, in a retried criminal case where the defendant had been judged in absentia, a final acquittal decision is ruled.

So, the first condition for a victim to obtain damages paid b the State is to have a final sentence[11], the source of serious material or moral prejudice. Moreover, it is necessary to have a judicial error.

Another condition is that the convicted person be acquitted by means of a final decision, after:

- the case retrial, having annulled or eliminated sentence decision for a new or recent crime proving that it was a judicial error;
- re-open the criminal case for the convicted tried in absentia.

This regulation stated by art 538 paragraph (1) of the new Criminal Procedure Code, concerning the annulment or elimination of the conviction decision, complies with the CEDO jurisprudence, which shows that art 3 of Protocol no 7 of the Convention can be enforced only after the elimination of the criminal convicting decision[12].

The person has the right to claim damages also in the case of illegal freedom deprivation.

Thus, art 539 of the New Criminal Procedure Code, called "the right to compensation in case of illegal detention, stipulates exactly this right, to compensation if during the criminal case, the person was illegally detained". Paragraph (2) states that illegal detention must be proved, according to the case, by prosecutor order, by final conclusions of the judge for freedoms and rights or the decision of the Judge of Preliminary Chamber, together with the Court final decision.

It is important to take into account the fact that if art 538 of the New Criminal Procedure Code envisages only the case where a person is acquitted as the result of a case retrial for a new or recent crime or for a case where the person was tried in absentia, art 539 focuses on any illegal detention, even if this measure was adopted for a person convicted for a crime which is not punished by criminal law. Such example is represented by the retention of a witness for several days because he/she doesn't want to make e statement[13].

In this matter, we have some CEDO decision, such as "Creangă vs Romania" and "Konolos vs Romania".

The New Criminal Procedure Code also presents the way of compensating the victim taking into account the retention period together with the consequences produced on the victim, family or the person in the situation described by art. 538.

According to paragraphs (2) - (4), the compensation represents a sum of money or a lifetime pension, or the obligation of the State to support the costs of the victim placing in a social and medical institution.

[11] According to art 551 NCPP the decision of the court of first instance becomes final the ruling date, when there is no appeal, or the date the appeal becomes invalid. Also, the decision of the court of first instance becomes final the date the appeal is withdrawn, if this was lodged after the set term, or the date of the decision ruling the rejection of the appeal.

The compensation type shall depend on the situation of victim.

Victims with the right to compensation who, before being retained as the result of a final convicting decision, had been forced to labor, will benefit from provisions of law stating that the time worked in such circumstances shall be considered as seniority together with the time spent in illegal detention.

The passive procedure quality as described by art 538 and 539 of the New Criminal Procedure Code, shows in paragraph (5) of art 540, that it is reserved only for the Romanian State, represented by the Ministry of Public Finances, and not for the judicial bodies who caused the judicial error. These bodies shall have patrimonial liability only if the State shall begin legal action against them.

Victims with the right to legal compensation are, according to art 541 paragraph (1) either the victim or the persons supported by the dead victim.

According to art 541 paragraph (2), the prescriptive period is for lodging legal remedy demands against the State is 6 months beginning with the date of the final decision of the court and the date of the order or conclusions of the judicial bodies which proved the error of law or the illegal detention.

4. Conclusions

As we have already said, the current legal system makes the clear difference between two liabilities: the State patrimonial liability in case of error of law and the patrimonial liability of the judge in relation with the first one.

According to art 52 paragraph (3) of the Constitution, the State liability is set by the law conditions and doesn't exclude the judges' liability for having done their work with mala fide and serious negligence.

Article 96 of Law no 303/2004 details the provisions. It states that the victim has the right to legal remedy caused by error of law during criminal trials in the cases regulated by the Criminal Procedure Code.

Therefore, the terms for actions against the State are provided by art 542 of the New Criminal Procedure Code, called "Legal Remedy Action".

If the legal reedy has been done according to art 541 and if the Romanian State has been convicted by an international court for one of the cases provided by art 538 and art 539, the legal remedy action for the paid sum can be lodged against the person who, with mala fide or by severe fault, caused the situation which led to serious damage, or against the insurance company for damages in case of damages caused while doing the job. The State has to prove during the legal remedy action (regress action), by prosecutor's order or criminal final decision, that the insured person according to paragraph (1) caused with mala fide or by severe professional fault the damaging error of law or the illegal detention leading.

In conclusion, the terms for exercising the regress actions are the following:

- the existence of a final decision ruled by a domestic or international court[14];
- the legal remedy paid by the State to the victim;
- proof of mala fide or the severe professional fault by means of the prosecutor's order or final criminal decision.

We can see though, the regress action of the State against the faulty judge, for the judicial error, is still an optional thing. Moreover, the Ministry of Public Finances has never lodged such action so far. Also, the same Ministry has never been notified by the Superior Council or Judges, which has the right to set the civil or disciplinary liability of judges, according to art 94 of Law 303/2004, regarding the lodging of a regress action in order to recover the prejudice caused to the State[15].

THE PROBATION MEASURES – THE REASONS FOR THE REGULATION

Andrei-Dorin BĂNCILĂ*

Abstract

For a proper understanding of the law institution, it is necessary to understand the reasons that gave rise to the its regulation. By reasons of regulations, we understand the social, economic, political, legal, moral justifications, but also of any other nature that established the legislation adoption represents a positive source of the institution in question. Trying to find reasons for the regulation is a useful step, even under stronger word, if the institution researched is relatively new in the normative context, character that can be easily subject to error, assigned to the probation measures into Romanian law. The utility of teh step is to know the circumstances that caused, encouraged or even imposed the settlement of the probation measures in our country, but also of the goals that the new institution will answer them.

Keywords: probation measures, restorative justice, the treatment of the offenders in the community, the prevention of the repeated offense, social reintegration, the compensation for the victim's damage, international and european legal on probation measures

In order to facilitate the understanding of the institution of probation measures, we believe it is useful to start by knowing the circumstances which led, encouraged or even required regulation of the measures in question, as well as social, economic, political, legal, moral justifications, but also of any other nature that established the legislation adoption represents a positive source of the institution in question.

Subsequently, we will refer to the purposes more spcific pursued by the lawmaker through the probation measures establishment and we may discover that the main purposes related thereto are reducing the risk of repeated offense, increasing the chances of rehabilitation and social reintegration, excluding extrapersonal and long-term harmful effects, specific to inprisonment, increasing the chances of compensating the prejudice caused by the offense and reducing the financial costs of administrating the criminal justice in its executing phase.

1. The context of imprisonment

As in other countries, in our country a first context that favored introducing the probation measures was the one for an overwhelming increase in the number of people sent to prison. Thus, during the communist regime, a maximum of 60,000 inmates was reached, out of which a significant proportion of serious crimes committed reduced[1]. The maximum noted was close to being reached and after the social, economic and political turmoil after the anti-communist revolution in December 1989, in 2001 the number of the detainees reached 49.840[2].

In this context one of the main reasons for enacting the probation measures was a significant reduction in the number of people who were sent to detention. Of course, reducing the number of the detainees at one time conducted the operations in the period before and after the anticommunist revolution in December 1989, with a multi-anual[3] regularity sometimes, but these reductions intervened through acts of pardon or amnesty.

Unlike the acts of pardon or amnesty, the reduction that was intended by the introduction of the probation measures could operate in parallel with the provision of minimum guarantees to ensure social reintegration of those who were not sent to prison and to preserve public order.

Thus, although in the Romanian legislation the probation measures in a similar form to the way they are outlined in the current legal sense were introduced by the Criminal Code from 1969[4], which established the educational measure of the supervised release and later, the correctional work[5] transformed in execution of the sentence in the workplace, the first institution to provide oversight of the measures in the true sense of the word was the suspended sentence of imprisonment under surveillance, introduced by Law no. 102/1992.

The institution of suspended sentence of imprisonment under surveillance began, however, to operate effectively and efficiently only after 2001 when the entire country, exceeding the experimental level the first specialized service in supervising the execution of the probation measures was set up and established by the Government Ordinance no. 92/2000 on the organization and functioning of the social reintegration of the offenders and the enforcement of non-custodial sanctions.

Upon the establishment of the first state organizations specialized in supervising the execution of the probation measures, we believe that we can talk, rightfully, of a system of probation in our country for the development of this system anywhere in the world, and it depended naturally on the development of the services designed to implement it.

The last and most important legislative step in terms of probation measures was conducted when the current Criminal Code entered into force, which introduces a number of institutions based on the probation measures such as the conditional sentence, suspended sentence under supervision, release on conditional supervision.

The importance and the substance of the penal reform made by the current Criminal Code is also underlined by the adoption and entry into force of the simultaneous laws of the criminal custodial[6] and non-custodial[7] sanctions and of a new law for the organization and functioning of the probation services[8].

We can not state, in the most definite way that reducing the number of people subject to detention is due mainly to the introduction of the probation measures in our country, but we can see that since 2001 until now, the number of the detainees registered a permanent downward trend, reaching 27.455 people in 2016, according to data from the Annual Activity Report of the National Administration of Penitentiaries in 2016[9]. Of course, the decline in the number of persons in detention is based on multiple causes, but the introduction of the probation measures and of the specialized services in monitoring their enforcement has undoubtedly a significant contribution.

2. The context of civilizing the punishment

A broader context, which also facilitated the emergence and development of the probation measures in our country was represented by the so-called current civilizing punishment[10], a special manifestation of the overall progress of human society over its existence.

This trend started in the modern era, with a gradual reduction of the application cases of capital punishment or corporal under the influence of the thoughts of Cesare Beccaria. In his well-known work Dei delitti e delle pene, the famous enlightened, criticizing the death penalty, wrote: Not the intensity of the punishment produces the greatest effect on the human soul, but its extent... The strongest brake against crimes is not the terrible, the passing show of a wicked death, but the long and arduous example of a person deprived of liberty, which turned into beast of burden, compensates with its toil that harmed her[11].

Under the influence of Beccaria, a number of enlightened leaders abolished, in fact, corporal punishment and death penalty. Among them a famous author[12] reminds the Prussian King Frederick II, who abolished torture in 1756 and whom Catherine II oppossed the barbaric punishment in 1767 and, throughout his reign, could not admit the execution of any death sentences, but also Leopold of Tuscany, who banned in 1786, torture and death penalty, and Joseph II of Austria, who issued the Criminal Code in 1787, which punished with death only certain military crimes and the Criminal Procedure Code in 1788 prohibiting torture.

It followed the generalization of the prison sentences, all laws adopted since the late eighteenth century until the late nineteenth century providing that the main method of punishment the imprisonment in various ways: forced labour, reclusion, imprisonment, solitary confinement, prison[13].

Although the process of civilization of the sentences also registered the professionalization and humanization of prisons, in the late nineteenth century the system of prison punishments has increasingly become subject to criticism, leading to the conclusion that, instead of reducing the crime and reintegrating the offenders into society, it produced an opposite effect[14].

Finally, the civilizing process of the punishments culminated in the emergence of the probation measures. Moreover, other authors[15] consider that in the trend of the civilizing punishments can be framed even the emergence of the probation and the community sanctions.

We express our opinion that the process of civilization of the punishments will continue in the era of advanced technologies, as the possibilities for remote control and supervision of the offender will be developed and accepted as useful tools in the execution of criminal sanctions. However, we can not fail to notice that technological progress, materialized by the exponential growth of the means of mass communication, can produce a negative effect in terms of analyzed, namely to induce among the population a sense of fear by publicizing exacerbated crimes.

However, we can not fail to notice that technological progress, resulted in exponential growth of the means of mass communication, can cause a negative effect in terms of analyzed perspective, namely to induce among the population a sense of fear by publicizing exacerbated crimes[16]. Paradoxically, this culture of fear can determine a stream of uncivilizing punishment[17], because globally crime is substantially declining as the economic progress raises the standard of living of the population, such as a process of tightening the sanctioning that the political factor can impose when trying to give a signal, sometimes populist, of intransigence to anti-social manifestations.

3. The legal international context

Another context which favored the development of the probation system and thus the introduction of the probation measures as an alternative to imprisonment, it was the need to adapt national legislation to the Council of Europe recommendations and normative acts of the European Union.

In the explanatory memorandum[18] that accompanied the projects and that have resulted in Law no. 253/2013 on the execution of penalties, of the educational measures and of other non-custodial measures ordered by the court during the criminal proceedings and in Law no. 252/2013 on the organization and functioning of the probation system, it shows explicitly that the drafts envisaged, inter alia, the Council of Europe's recommendations, namely Recommendation No. R(92)16 on the European rules on the community sanctions and measures; the Recommendation of the Council of Europe No. R(97)12 on staff involved in the implementation of the community sanctions and measures; the Recommendation of Council of Europe No. R(99)22 on reducinng the number of persons imprisoned and overcrowding them; Recommendation of teh Council of Europe No. R(2000)22 on improving the implementation of the European rules on community sanctions and measures; Recommendation of teh European Council No. R(2003)22 on the release on parole; Recommendation of the Council of Europe No. R(2006)2 on the European Prison Rules; Recommendation of the Council of Europe No. R(2008)11 on the European rules for juvenile offenders subject to criminal sanctions and measures, Recommendation of the Council of Europe No. R(2010)1 on the European probation rules.

Also, by drafting Law no. 200/2013 amending and supplementing Law no. 302/2004 on judicial cooperation in criminal matters, the proceeding to the adoption of EU instruments for cooperation in the enforcement matters of the probation measures, among other acts, the Framework Decision 2008/947/ JHA of 27 November 2008 on the principle of mutual recognition to judgments and probation decisions with a view to supervising probation measures and alternative sanctions, as resulted from the explanatory memorandum, was implemented[19].

4. The jurisprudence context of the European Court of Human Rights

A context, still very current, which has boosted and will continue to spur concern for identifying alternatives more and more diversified and viable for the custodial sentences and thereby to the development of the probation system, is the European Court of Human Rights, which finds a breach by the Romanian State of the article 3 of the European Convention on human rights and fundamental freedoms, as a result of placing detainees in irregular detention conditions (including overcrowding).

One of the most relevant causes[20] from the analyzed standpoint related to our country, the European Court mentions a report following its visit to Romania, drafted by the Commissioner for Human Rights, which, inter alia, urged Romanian authorities to develop a system of alternative punishments, an effective dispensation of the release on parole and one judicial policy involving the use of sparingly custodial sentences[21].

In this context, the reason for which the probation system will be developed in our country is to avoid future convictions for the conditions of detention which can be considered as inhuman or degrading treatment.

5. The purpose of reducing the risk of a repeat offense

In favor of the probation measures, among others, it pleads the argument through which it is ensured a better protection of the society and of the offender towards the risk to relapse into the criminal conduct.

Although even the custodial sentences ensure a protection of the society against a repeat offense and, throught the incapacity in itself, even of the offender, this protection is only on a short term (it lasts only as long as the offender is effectively incarcerated), and in terms of the offender, the protection is illusory.

Since the imprisonment runs in detention where, in spite of the separation criteria, the offenders freely communicate with each other, the prison contagion occurs and thus, the risk of a repeat offense increases significantly. Besides, the fact that penalty prison is running, as a rule and in the most significant part, it is in common, as a famous author noted[22] an obvious and insurmountable disadvantage of the possession by the fact that it allows the enraged and savvy criminals to exercise one bad influence on those who make first contact with the prison and who, although do not have one criminal culture, thus they acquire it and they release from prison much more prepared to conduct a criminal activity than they were following the entry into the prison.

The probation measures being performed into the community, are more protected from the risk of crime contamination because the community in which the performance takes place is an open, generally it represents the society that is fundamentally different from the closed and pernicious community prisons. We can say, in antagonism with the prison sentences that the probation measures are performed individually.

Moreover, even if serving the prison sentences is intended to be as individualized as possible[23], the execution of the probation measures allow a deeper administrative individualization, which can reach up to the level of customization for each individual[24]. It is this level of customization up to the convicted individual which is considered legal doctrine able to reduce to a significant extent the risk of recurrence[25].

6. The purpose of increasing the opportunities for rehabilitation and social reintegration

By that the probation measures leave much of the burden of re-education and re-socialization into the responsibilities of the offender, their execution increases the chances of effective reeducation and a real social reintegration.

Even if serving a prison sentence resulted in an exemplary rehabilitation of the offender who, during execution, acquired, let's say, a new job, that he could practice freely, he will carry for the rest life "the convict stigma", of the person imprisoned, who served a custodial sentence and, for that, in the collective mind, must have committed an abominable act.

This stigma is an almost insurmountable obstacle in the way of real and effective social reintegration after release, and he is not in case of executing the probation measures. The person whom were applied such measures is so much requested to work towards reintegration, knowing that he/she does not bear the stigma of convict, than the person who serving a custodial prison and knowing that it will be more difficult reaccepted by the society is not at all stimulated to act towards reintegration.

In most of the cases, after executing the probation measures, the perpetrator is not even subjected to a ban, fall or incapacity[26] or his rehabilitation will be more easy and, usually, earlier than the persons imprisoned[27], thereby having much greater chance at reintegration.

Moreover, the process of social reintegration of the persons performing the probation measures starts from the final judgment decision when the probation measures are imposed, which is another advantage over the assumption of prison punishment when the reintegration process can begin, actually, at the earliest when released from the prison.

7. The purpose of excluding extrapersonal and on long-term harmful effects, specific to the prison sentences

In addition to the strict legal orders effects and that are always borne by the individual who served a prison sentence under detention leave other traces, of different nature than the legal ones, within the family, or the relatives of the offenders. The legal doctrine referred to the fact that custodial sentences also affect the caregivers of the prisoner and that these effects extend far beyond the term of the release from prison[28]

The family and the inner circle of the persons serving a sentence in detention are required to make contact with the prison when they visit the prisoner or if providing packages, they are obliged to pay, sometimes more than significant, in order to keep in touch with the prisoner and to make his prison life bearable. After release, the impact of the acquired skills of the person that served the sentence in detention is often difficult to be resorbed by the kindred with substantial costs or even [26] This is the case, for example, of the person to whom it was given the solution of postponing the enforcement of the sentence when, according to art. 90 para. (1) Criminal Code, one is not subject to decay, prohibition or impairment that would result from such an offense if a crime committed back to the expiration of the supervision, it was decided to dismiss the delay and no cancellation policy cause has been found.

[27] This is the case, for example, of the convict whose surveillance sentence was suspended and according to art. 165 Criminal Code it is rehabilitated by law, with the only condition that no other offense be committed within three years from the expiry of surveillance.

impossible for both sides. The negative effects of the prison detention spread like the shock waves in the community (family, entourage) of origin where the prisoner returns.

All these negative aspects can not be found if the probation measures, involving lower costs for the person who serves them and that allows them during the execution, to have a family, social life, almost the same as before acquiring the statute of person subject to surveillance measures.

8. The aim to increase the chances of compensation for damage caused by crime

Lately, it has been noticed an important change of paradigm, moving from a vindictive to one restorative justice, whereby to increase the chances of compensation for damage caused by the offense.

The probation measures as an alternative to detention, have this purpose, to increase under a double aspect, the chances to compensation for damages.

Under a first aspect, the objective reality is as obvious as possible that a person incarcerated has significantly fewer opportunities to make money from covering the damage caused by the offense than the person who is subject to the probation measures and that can lawfully earn income as a person who had contact with the criminal justice system.

Under the second aspect, of the legislative reality, this part of the probation system purpose has a normative consecration, both internationally and domestically.

At international level, repairing the damage caused by the offense is among the first targets in the Council of Europe Recommendation no. R (92)16 on the European rules regarding the community sanctions and measures.

The purpose of the current national legislation in question is guaranteed by lifting the compensation for the damage to a rank of imperative condition to achieve the full effects of serving all measures of probation in case of disposing different forms of individualization of punishment without imprisonment[29]. Likewise, the new law on the organization and functioning of the probation service obliges the probation officers to carry out steps to boost the damage repair[30].

We believe that even a more conspicuous emphasis on the purpose of repairing the damage caused by the offense can be achieved through a brief analysis of the historical perspective of the name that the probation service had it for over a period of its existence. Thus, by Law no. 211/2004 on the protection of victims[31], the name „social reintegration services for offenders and supervising the execution of non-custodial sentences" under the Government Ordinance no. 92/2000 was replaced by the suggestive name of "services to protect victims and social reintegration of offenders", which it has been maintained until the entry into force of Law no. 123/2006 on the probation staff statute[32].

9. The purpose of reducing the financial costs on the administration of criminal justice during its execution

Talking about the social costs of the monitoring measures, we can not just make reference to the financial resources that the state, through its specialized organs, must allocate to enable monitoring on the persons subject to the measures in question. And because these absolutely costs considered ut singuli may not provide much relevant information, we focused on a comparative analysis between the costs of the state probation measures and of the custodial sentences.

According to data from the Annual Activity Report of the National Administration of Penitentiaries in 2016, the average monthly cost for a person imprisoned was in reporting year of 3.532,42 lei. Analyzing data from the Annual Activity Report of the National Probation in 2016 and the budget for the same year for this institution[33], it results that dividing the budget (28.744.000 lei) to the number of monitored people (57.814 people), the monthly cost of a monitored person is about 41,43 lei.

As it can be seen from statistic data which we referred above, a conclusion downright shocking can be drawn: the cost of implementing the probation measures is over 85 times lower than the cost of the execution of the custodial sentences.

However, this conclusion is somewhat distorted by the fact that the probation system in our country works to a level of the ratio of people monitored by a a probation officer that we can call inappropriate and that is likely to cause a shock so powerful: 153 people monitored by a probation counselor[34]. This ratio can not be one according to the Tokyo Rules[35], which in art. 13.5 establishes the number of cases assigned to each agent shall be maintained as far as possible at a reasonable level in order to ensure the effectiveness of the treatment programs.

[29] Pursuant to art. 88 para. (2) and art. 96 para. (2) of the current Criminal Code, the disobeyance of reparing thedamage during the term of supervision is case to revoke the penalty postpone or of the suspended sentence under supervision.

[30] Pursuant to art. 65 of Law no. 252/2013 on the organization and functioning of the probation system in order to check the compliance of the supervised person with the civil obligations established by the judgment, six months before the expiry of the supervisory probation period, the probation counselor - case manager requests information regarding the steps taken by the person to fulfill these obligations, requiring proof of completion that is attached to the probation file if the person under observation did not fulfill the civic obligations, the probation officer checking the reasons for failure and, if necessary, directing the person to perform civil obligations three months before the expiry of surveillance; according to art. 67 para. (2) of the same law, if the monitored person does not fulfill civil obligations by no later than three months before the monitoring expiry, the probation officer prepares a report assessing, recording the reasons for failure and informs the court to revoke the benefit of individualizing the penalties without imprisonment.

Of course, there are efforts to normalize the numerical ratio between the monitored probation counselors and people under surveillance by recruiting a large number of advisers[36]. Although these efforts will lead to a cost increase that the state should support it for each person monitored, we assume without fear of making mistakes, that he still remains much lower than that the one involving a person imprisoned. Moreover, this increase in the number of probation counselors will bring not only an increase in the cost but also improved quality of the monitoring activities, which is the premise of the need to leave any political development of the probation system.

Conclusion

The conditions that favored in our country the emergence and development of the probation system in general, and the probation measures as a viable alternative to imprisonment, in particular, they were various and acted, although starting in different historical stages, in collaboration, thus creating a positive pressure on those responsible for drafting the criminal policy.

Thus, the context of over-imprisonment of civilizing penalties, of the international normativity, of the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights provoked finding viable sanctioning alternatives to the custodial sentences, which in the historical period we are facing now proved not to be the most suitable to ensure the goals of rehabilitation and reintegration of the offenders, especially for those that comit crimes to a certain degree of hazard.

We believe that all those responsible for the development of the probation system, resulting in the analyzed contexts above continues to exert pressure on further development of how the probation system is structured and operates, thus working togheter to shaping a professional and efficient probation service.

Moreover, as I stated above, the need for closer monitoring and characterized of the persons performing the criminal sanctions in the community is a prerequisite for achieving the goals that the probation proposes: reducing the risk of repeat offenses, increasing the chances of rehabilitation and social reintegration, exclusion of extrapersonal and long-term adverse effect, specific to the imprisonments, increasing the chances of compensation for the damages caused by crimes and, not least, reducing the financial costs of administrating the criminal justice during its execution.

Of course, the probation can not be the universal response for the treatment criminal sanctions in case of committing any crime, its limit being represented by a certain threshold of gravity of the facts and of the perpetrators, above which the probation measures can not be assessed as effective.

However, the actual social reality showed that there are real possibilities of recovering a significant number of people who come into conflict with the criminal law, without requiring their imprisonment, while the social deviance that they manifest is of a certain severity and the possibilities for treating this deviance are more and more diversified.

In other words, if we draw a parallel with the medical community and the developments registered, we could compare the treatment of the offenders in the community with the treatment of the patients in ambulatory, the imprisonment of the offenders, similar to hospitalization of the patients and it must be a final answer, only applicable to the worst deviant.

TERMINATION OF PREVENTIVE MEASURES – COMPARATIVE LAW ISSUES

Nadia CANTEMIR – STOICA*

Abstract

Preventive measures are one of the most important institutions of the criminal procedural law, because of the fact that by taking it the freedom of the citizen is restricted - one of the most important constitutional rights.
The legislator had a difficult task when it approved the rules governing the conditions for making, revocation and termination of the preventive measures, being necessary to balance the security of criminal procedures on one hand and freedom of the investigated citizen on the other hand.
In this study we intend to analyze the institution of legal cessation of preventive measures, reviewing a comparative presentation with other states that have chosen to regulate the procedural measures.
Not lastly, we will notify the identified inconsistencies and will issue the legislative proposals so that the provision should not be criticized by its recipient.

Keywords: preventive measures, termination of the right, comparative law, prosecutor, house arrest.

1. Introduction

The preventive measures are those procedural instruments offered by the legislator to the judicial bodies, so that if there is strong evidence or indications that a person has committed an offence under the criminal law and these are essential for carrying out the criminal procedures in a good condition.

The preventing measures are part of procedural measures category that are defined in the specialized literature as being institutions of constraint which can be ordered by the criminal court to properly perform the criminal proceedings and ensures achieving the object of the action in the criminal proceedings[1].

In the Code of Criminal Procedure, we find as regulated the following institutions which are part of this procedural measures category: preventive measures, security measures of medical nature, ensuring measures, reimbursement of the things and restoring the situation previous to committing the offence.

We believe that this study is of heightened importance given the fact that it examines the institution of legal termination of preventive measures, making a comparison with the other countries that have regulated this way to stop a preventive measure and identify whether the current position is objectionable and what improvements can be made to the standard criminal procedural law.

First we will analyze national legislation, then we will highlight criminal procedural elements identified in other legislations related to the institution of termination of the preventive measures.

The approached topic is well known, and the specialized doctrine chose to write about in several occasions about how these preventive measures cannot be perpetuated in criminal proceedings. In the research I could not identify, however, a paper that comparatively addresses the institution under discussion, meaning that, our duty is to try to offer a comprehensive study on the subject.

2. Preventive measures in the Romanian criminal procedural law

Following the defeat of compliance report, after the individual choses to commit offences under the criminal law, after triggering the mechanism of criminal proceedings, the judicial body has the power to choose whether the preventive measure should be taken not to threaten the smooth conduct of criminal proceedings.

As we already know, according to the national procedural law, the preventive measures that can be taken are detention, judiciary control, judicial control on bail, remand in custody and house arrest.

The 5th title of the General Part of the Code of Criminal Procedure is devoted to analyzing preventive measures and other procedural measures, the former being regulated in article 202- 244 C.C.P.

Having a procedural nature, the preventive measures may only be taken only under the conditions prescribed by law, by certain officials, following a certain procedure and for certain periods. Also, even though it implies a constraint similar to the one resulting from the execution of the penalty of imprisonment, the custodial preventive measures differ from imprisonment because it is only taken during the criminal trial, exceptionally, in order to prevent the suspect or defendant to avoid prosecution, trial or execution of the sentence or to obstruct finding the truth[2].

Thus, we see that the legislator established a series of guarantees for people who are being investigated in criminal proceedings, such as periods which the preventive measures can take, category of judicial bodies that can appreciate the opportunity to take an action, revocation, termination of or replacing those measures.

The most important aspect is generated by the facultative character of these procedural measures so that the legislator does not list a number of crimes for which would be essential to take a preventive measure.

Once satisfied the condition of the opportunity to take preventive measures in a certain case, the judicial body imposes the obligation to motivate what was the reason for choosing a particular preventive measure out of the ones offered by the legislator in the article 202 line 4 of C.C.P., and why another one is not sufficient for the good conduct of the criminal trial. We also have to note that this obligation of the judicial bodies is to be found both in taking a preventive measure as well as at the time when questioning the extension or maintaining it.

2.1. Termination of the preventive measure of detention

A. Conditions in which the measure can be taken

According to the provisions of article 209 of C.P.P., the preventive measure of detention may be taken only in the first phase of the criminal proceedings or criminal prosecution stage, by the criminal investigation body or prosecutor towards the suspect or the defendant, if such action is necessary to ensure the conduct of good conditions of the criminal trial, of the breach of absconding the suspect or the defendant from trial or prevent committing of a crime. However, it is necessary not be a cause which prevents the initiation or exercise of criminal proceedings from the ones provided by article 16 of C.C.P and the preventive measure must be proportional to the seriousness of the accusation made to the suspect or the defendant. We hereby observe that the only preventive measure that can be ordered is, on one hand, towards the suspect and, on the other hand, towards the criminal investigation body.

The preventive measure of detention should not be confused with other forms of deprivation or temporary limitation of freedom of movement:

- Catching the perpetrator and presenting him immediately in front of the prosecution, in the case of flagrante delicto;
- Driving a person to the police station, as an administrative police measure provided under Law no. 218/2002 on the Functioning of the Romanian Police;
- Bringing subpoena and remaining at the disposal of the judicial body for no longer than 8 hours (article 265 of C.P.P.);
- Remaining in the witnesses and expert courtroom at the court of law disposal, after hearing them and until the end of the inquiry act which is carried out in that meeting (article 381 line 9 C.P.P.)[3].

The preventive measure may be imposed for any offense under the Criminal Code or special laws, after the criminal investigation body or prosecutor who hears the suspect or defendant in the presence of the chosen counsel or ex officio. The suspect or the defendant has the right to personally inform his chosen lawyer and this has the obligation to present himself in at least two hours at the judicial body premises.

The judicial bodies have an obligation to inform the detained person of the offence he is accused of, the reason of detention, the order under which this measure was taken, the right to bring a complaint against it and the maximum period for which it can be taken.

Regarding the maximum period for which this measure can be ordered, we can see that the legislator sets a 24-hour period, calculated from the initiation time of the measure by ordinance by the prosecutor or criminal investigation body. Therefore, this term will not include driving the suspect or defendant at the judicial body premises, according to law and also any period when the suspect or the accused was under the power of warrant for arrest.

Therefore, this term is a substantial one that is calculated as per the provisions of article 271 of C.P.P., thus in calculating the periods on preventive measures or any other right restrictive measures, the hour or the day when it starts and ends the period enters its duration.

B. Termination of the measure

In the theory of criminal trials it was showed that discontinuation of preventive measures happens when there is a legal obstacle in its maintenance, the authority before which the case is under disciplinary and even criminal responsibility, to immediately release the person detained or in custody, or to immediately lift the obligation not to leave the town or country or obligations imposed by judicial control[4].

With reference to 241 of C.C.P. which is the legal basis for termination as preventive measures, we note that the detention may cease in the following situations:

- When the period ends, provided by law – we are in this situation when the prosecutor ordered the detention for a period of 24 hours and at the end of this time the suspect or defendant was released or if a proposal for preventive detention was made but was not solved, the defendant will be released from the witness stand and will plead with him in liberty.

In the specialized literature, it was pointed out that according to their nature and purpose, the preventive measures are always temporal, being taken on a term precisely or relatively fixed[5].

In the article 268 line 2 of C.C.P. marginally called consequences to failure to comply with the term, the legislator regulates the fact that when a procedural measure can be taken only for a certain term, its expiry draws the termination of the measure.

- When the term set by the judiciary body expires – we are in this situation when the criminal investigation body or the prosecutor orders the preventive measure of detention on a period of less than 24 hours, meaning that, reaching this term leads to termination of the measure.

Making a practical analysis I have never identified the assumption that the judicial body would order as a preventive measure for a period less than 24 hours, but such a situation is impossible as long as the legislator intended to regulate it.

We are in the position that the defendant might be released before the expiry of the 24-hour term set by the criminal investigation body or by the prosecutor, assuming that it is formulated a proposal for preventive detention, and as per the provisions of article 227 line 1 C.C.P. the rights and freedom judge, if it considers that the conditions set by the law for the defendant's preventive detention, rejects, by a reasoned conclusion the proposal of the prosecutor, ordering the release of the detained defendant[6].

This circumstance is more a special revocation type, even though the rights and freedom judge would not order the revocation of detention, but immediately releasing the detained defendant.

2.2. .Termination of the preventive measure of judicial review and judicial control on bail

A. Conditions in which measure can be taken

Depending on the seriousness of the crime incriminating the accused, the manner in which it was committed and the person accused, the judicial body if it believes that a custodial sentence is not necessary for the purposes of criminal proceedings may take a measure restricting liberty, respectively, judicial or judicial bail.

These preventive measures that are similar can be arranged if the following conditions are met:

- There is evidence and clues which point to the reasonable suspicion that a person has committed a crime;
- The measure is necessary to ensure the smooth conduct of the criminal trial, to prevent the defendant from absconding from prosecution or trial or to prevent committing another offense;
- Defendant to be heard in the presence of the lawyer chosen or ex officio;
- The measure to be proportional to the seriousness of the charge and necessary for achieving the goal;
- Not to exist a case which prevents the exercise or initiation of criminal action between those apprehended in article 16 C.C.P.

Measure can be ordered both the prosecution stage and in the preliminary chamber and trial by the prosecutor, the rights and freedom judge, the judge of preliminary chamber or the court, a period of 60 days which can be extended to maximum 1 year[7], two years respectively[8] in the first phase of the criminal investigation and trial up to five years, calculated from the time of prosecuting.

B. Termination of the measure

The criminal procedure law has held a number of cases where preventive measures shall automatically be terminated by operation of law, excluding the possibility of appreciation in these cases from the judicial body on the appropriateness or necessity of ending the measure[9].

Although the legislator regulates what are cases where preventive measures will terminate, they still have to be found by the judicial authorities, in order to identify whether the conditions are met to operate the termination.

Therefore, the cases of termination of the measure as judicial control or judicial control on bail are:

- When the term provided by law expired;

The term set by the legislator is 60 days and will be incident this case of termination of law when the prosecutor had not ordered the extension of the preventive measure of judicial review or judicial control on bail or if the judge for preliminary chamber or the court has not checked legality or validity of the measure.

There were situations in the specialty practice when the courts have failed to question the legality of maintaining the preventive measure of the judicial control, meaning that, at the term, it was discussed the termination of preventive measure given the fact that the term provided by law initially set by the judge expired.

By concluding the hearing in the criminal case[10] no. 45092/3/2016/a1.2, the preliminary chamber judge from the Bucharest Court of Law decided based on article 348 line 2 Code of Criminal Procedure with reference to article 241 line 1 letter of Code of Criminal Procedure., article 241 line 2 Code of [6] The conclusion 270/2014 of Suceava Court of Law ordered in the criminal case no. 7655/86/2014 rejects the proposal of the Prosecution office attached to the Court of Suceava of taking preventive detention for a period of 21 days of the defendant VORNICU IONUȚ ANDREI, as unfounded. Based on art. 227 line 2 of Code of Criminal Procedure reported to article 202 line 4 letter b Code of Criminal Procedure, judicial control measure is taken against the defendant Vornicu Ionut Andrei investigated for the offense of false testimony laid in article 273 line 1 and 2 letter d Code of Criminal Procedure, with application article 35 line1 Code of Criminal Procedure orders releasing the detained defendant Vornicu Ionuț Andrei if not detained or arrested in another case. 2. Criminal Procedure, article 2151 line 2 Code of Criminal Procedure determines as being terminated, starting with Nov. 10, 2016, prior to issuing the document instituting preventive measure of judicial control, given to S. V. defendant by the ordinance no. 987/D/P/2016 of September 11, 2016 of the Prosecution Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice – D.I.I.C.O.T. – Bucharest Territorial Service. Enforceable. With the right of appeal within 48 hours from the notification. Decided in the chambers, today, January 17, 2017.

- When the terms given by the judiciary bodies expire;

As I said in the preventive measure of detention, the legislator regulates only the maximum length on which a preventive measure can be taken, meaning the judicial body, the principle of ad majori ad minus has the opportunity to dispose the preventive measure to judicial control or judicial control on bail and for a shorter period of time. As a result, if the prosecutor decides to take the measure of judicial control over a period of 50 days, it will lawfully stop, to the extent that the measure would not be extend by an ordinance.

If the procedure of preliminary chamber has been completed and the court has not checked the legality and merits of the judicial control within 60 days from the last maintain of judiciary control and lacked maintenance of judicial control, the preventive measure ceases after this term[11].

In fact, against the defendant it was decided to take judicial supervision for a period of 60 days expiring on July 22, 2016. Subsequently, the DNA representatives – ST Alba Iulia have decided through the Ordinance of July 22, 2016 "the extension" of the judicial control measure for a period of 60 days starting with July 24, 2016. In those circumstances, the defendant made the request for the termination of the preventive measure ordered against him, saying rightly that the initially taken measure expired before the so-called extension. It has been argued that taking such a new measure is possible only if the new elements that had not been known at the date on which the extension could have been applied for the initial considerations for the measure.

By Conclusion no. 6/08.08.2016, the rights and freedoms judge of the Alba Court of Appeal upheld the finding of the defendant's request for termination of the measure as judicial control. The court noted in this context that the extension of a preventive measure implies that prerequisite situation the pre-existence of such a measure, ordered as per the legal dispositions, we well as an unbroken continuity between the period of 60 days to measure judicial control established and duration for ordering the extension of this measure. Therefore, the prosecutor's decision ordering the extension of the measure, although it was given before its expiry and its fining cessation termination of the judicial control, taking place on July 22, 2016, a legal appearance, can no longer take effect when the rights and freedoms judge finds terminated the measure taken against the defendant.

By Ordinance of October 08, 2016, the prosecutor's office representatives order again the preventive measure to judicial control against the same defendant for the same reasons taken into account at the previous "extension". Following the complaint made against that ordinance, the rights and freedoms judge of the Court of Appeal Alba received and noted the conclusions of the defender to the defendant meaning that taking a new measure may be ordered only if there is new evidence to justify the need for it.

For these reasons, the conclusion of the criminal case no. 7 of August 12, 2016, the court admitted the complaint stating that the prosecutor did not find the existence of new facts or circumstances, arising after the date on which it was ordered extension of judicial review (even if regarding this it has been found that its effects have been exhausted due to the termination of the initially ordered measure) and to justify taking a new preventive measure against the defendant, ordinance from August 10, 2016 is, in reality, an extension of the preventive measures that ceased and ceased to have effect.

The rights and freedoms judge has estimated that despite the provisions of article 238 line 3 Code of Criminal Procedure refers only to preventive detention, they should be applied mutatis mutantis in any similar situation. Therefore, taking a new preventive measure (regardless of its nature) is possible only if the emergence of new elements showing the need for it[12].

- During the criminal investigation or during the trial at first hearing on reaching the maximum term provided by law;

As mentioned above, these preventive measures may be ordered for a period of 60 days and can be extended up to one year, respectively two years during the criminal investigation of 5 years during the judgment at first instance, this last term when calculating from the moment of prosecuting.

We observe that legislator did not set a maximum term for the measure of judicial control or on bail during the preliminary room, we believe that it is applied the term stipulated for the trial stage, meaning it may not exceed 5 years from the moment when referring the court with the indictment.

During the trial the same obligation applies to periodically check but not later than 6o days the legality and merits of the preventive measure, meaning that this operation will not interfere, the preventive measure will be found as terminated.

- In cases where the prosecutor decides not to indict a solution or the court of law issues a solution of acquittal, closure of the prosecution, waiving the penalty or postponement of penalty or punishment by fine, even not final;

Naturally, if the judicial body considers that there must be a solution of conviction against the defendant who is being investigated in a case, not even keeping the preventive measure judicial control or bail cannot exist, since it is not longer necessary for the proper conduct of the trial.

Assuming that the prosecutor decides to cancel the prosecution, we consider that the preventive measure shall terminate as from the date of issue of the order, without regard to subsequent proceedings for confirmation of the order imposed by the judge for preliminary chamber, given the fact that the prosecutor appreciated on the opportunity to exercise criminal action, meaning that no measure cannot subsist, this no longer being needed.

We note, however, that if the court gives the suspension solution under surveillance or when applied to a non-custodial educational measure, it will not be found as being terminated the preventive measure judicial control or on bail, being able to maintain this measure or on the contrary, may be revoked.

In the specialized literature[13], it is considered that the measure of judiciary control will terminate even when the fine penalty accompanies imprisonment, if the court of law decides to delay the enforcement of the penalty; therefore when the fine penalty is accompanied by imprisonment, it is not necessary for the court to have a solution for sentencing, the provisions of article 62 of C.C.P. may be applied when it is delayed the enforcement of the penalty.

- The date of the final judgment when the defendant was convicted.

The need of perpetuating the preventive measure no longer exist, given the completion of the judgement by convicting the defendant, taking into consideration that its purpose was generated even by the good conduct of the criminal trial.

2.3. Termination of the measure of house arrest and preventive detention

These two preventive measures are the toughest of the five measures covered by the legislator, which can be taken both in the prosecution phase as well as during the preliminary trial chamber, consisting of deprivation of liberty for a determined period of time. The legislator pays special attention to the conditions under which these preventive measures can be arranged, by introducing a number of guarantees against the defendant for which it is considered the need for home arrest of preventive detention.

A. General conditions for taking these preventive measures:

- There are evidence and important clues which point to the reasonable suspicion that a person has committed a crime;
- The measure is necessary to ensure the good functioning condition of the criminal trial, of preventing the defendant from absconding from the prosecution or trial or to prevent committing another offense;
- The defendant to be heard in the presence his chosen lawyer or ex officio.;
- The measure be proportional to the seriousness of the charge and necessary for achieving the goal;
- Not to be a case which prevents the initiation or exercise of criminal action between those provided in article 16 C.C.P;
- To be found as alternative achievement any of the situations referred to in article 223 C.C.P.[14].

B. Termination of house arrest and preventive detention

Analyzing article 241 of C.C.P., regulatory framework of the institution of termination of preventive measures, we observe that the legislator establishes under line 1 general cases applicable to all preventive measures and in the second line special cases which are incident only in the case of house arrest and preventive detention. Thus, the magistrate will determine as being terminated the preventive measures analyzed in the following cases:

- When the term provided by law or determined by the judicial body expires or on the expiry of 30 days term, unless the judge for preliminary chamber or court has not checked the legality and merits of preventive arrest in this period, namely at the expiry of 60 days period, if the court has not checked the legality and merits of the home arrest or preventive detention[15].

The term set by the legislator for taking these preventive measures is 30 days, meaning that, if the rights and freedoms judge or the court does not decide setting the extension or maintenance of such measures, [14] 1. a) the defendant escaped or has been hiding, in order to evade prosecution or court, or has been any type of preparing for such acts.

b) the defendant tries to influence another participant in the committing the offense, a witness or an expert, or to destroy, alter, hide or to escape as evidence or to cause another person to have such conduct.

c) the defendant puts pressure on the injured person or tries to achieve a fraudulent deal with him.

d) there is reasonable suspicion that after the initiation of criminal proceedings against him, the defendant has intentionally committed or prepares to commit a new crime.

2. The preventive detention of the defendant may be taken if from the evidence there is reasonable suspicion that he committed a deliberate crime against life, a crime that has caused injury or death to a person, a crime against national security stipulated in the Criminal Code and other special laws, an offense of drug dealing, arms trafficking, human trafficking, terrorism, money laundering, counterfeiting money or other valuables, blackmail, rape, deprivation of liberty, tax evasion, assault, judicial assault, corruption, an offense committed by means of electronic communication or another offense for which the law prescribes imprisonment of five years or more and, based on assessing the seriousness of the offense, the manner and circumstances of committing it, of the entourage and the environment from which it originated, criminal background and other circumstances relating to his person, shows that deprivation of liberty is necessary to eliminate a state of danger to public order.

they shall terminate, the defendant being released, and such legislation having a strong protection and security trait against illegal extensions.

During the criminal investigation, the total duration that can be taken in preventive detention and house arrest is of 180 days. According to article 222 line 10 C.P.P. reproduced as amended by article I of Law 116/2016, following the occurrence of the Constitutional Court Decision no. 927 of December 15, 2015[16], the length of deprivation of liberty ordered by the house arrest measure it is taken into account for calculating the maximum time of preventive detention of the defendant during the criminal investigation. We see therefore that in the event that a certain cause was decided both the house arrest and preventive detention, these two measures can be taken over a period of maximum 180 days.

In the event that the defendant was taken into preventive detention for a period of 180 days during the criminal investigation and was ordered the prosecution in preventive custody, if the judge of the preliminary chamber decides to return the case to the prosecution, this will not be able to also maintain the preventive measure because it would have exceeded the maximum limit regulated both in CCP and the Constitution.

- If the prosecutor decides to dismiss or waive the criminal prosecution or the first court ordered by the sentence an acquittal solution, to terminate the criminal proceedings, to wave the penalty, to delay the enforcement of the penalty or suspended sentence of the execution of sentence under supervision;

Given that the fact that the first phase of the criminal proceedings ceases through a nolle prosequi or waiver solution of the criminal prosecution, obviously preventive measure cannot subsist beyond those limits. Moreover, looking at the cases where other solutions are disposed, we notice that they are incompatible with the perpetuation of a state of detention against the defendant.

- When before giving a solution in the first instance, during the arrest he has reached half the maximum penalty provided by law for the offense that is the subject of accusations, without exceeding the term of 5 years from the date of notifying the court of law;

In order to identify which is the special maximum of the punishment, we will relate to the punishment provided in the text of law without taking into account the obvious reasons for reducing or increasing the punishment.

- In the appeal, if the preventive measure of preventive detention or house arrest has reached the penalty ordered by the conviction sentence;

It will be found the termination of the preventive detention measure also assuming that the court of appeal admits an appeal declared only by the defendant and sends the case back to the first court, if the penalty imposed in the first instance is equal to the duration of the preventive detention; in this case, due to applying the non reformatio in peius principles courts will not impose a punishment greater than the punishment originally applied[17].

When the court orders by sentence convicting the defendant to imprisonment equal to the duration of detention, preventive detention and house arrest;

Clearly, the same reasoning is applied and intervene the termination by law and if the punishment set by the court is shorter than the duration of deprivation of liberty through the preventive measure.

When the seized the court of law decides upon a sentence to the penalty fine or a non-custodial educational measure;

From our perspective, we will operate with this institution of termination and when the court decides that the fine penalty is accompanied by imprisonment, and on which suspends the supervision or delays the enforcement of the penalty.

- At the date of the final decision of conviction to imprisonment with execution or life imprisonment;

In this circumstance, the preventive measure converts to penalty, which is to be enforced by the convicted person, the latter becoming convicted person from a person under arrest.

3. Aspects of Comparative Law

Analyzing other countries' legislation, we find that detention measure may be taken for a period of 24 hours in Luxembourg, Greece, Canada, Colombia and Germany and in Portugal, Russia or Poland of 48 hours and 5 days in Brazil.

In the Netherlands, as a preventive measure may be ordered for a period of 3 days, which may be extended by the prosecutor for a further period of 3 days.

In The Republic of Moldova[18], in case when the instruction judge, examining the steps regarding the application for preventive detention of the suspect according to article 307 of the CCP, rejects the request or applies a lighter preventive measure, the detained suspect is released after the expiry of 72 hours, and if in the process of examining steps it is found an essential violation of law to the person's arrest, he will be released immediately from the hearing room.

According to the criminal procedural legislation of the Republic of Moldova, the preventive measure terminates:

- when the terms provided by law or determined by the prosecuting authority expire (taking into account by the prosecutor) or by the court of law, if it was not extended according to the law;

- in case of removing the person from criminal prosecution, finishing the criminal proceedings or of the person's acquittal;
- in case of execution of the conviction sentence;
- in case of adopting a conviction sentence with non- custodial penalty;
- the expiry of 10-day term of preventive detention or any preventive measures applied to the suspect, 30 days of arrest of the accused, or 6 months, 12 months or 4 months to extend the preventive detention of the accused, of 30 days ordering the not to leave town or the country by the accused:
- conviction with establishing the sentence and with exempting from punishment;
- conviction without punishment, and exempting from criminal liability;
- imprisonment with suspension of parole.

The Dutch Code of Criminal Procedure regulates in Title IV, the special means of coercion that can be arranged in criminal proceedings. Analyzing the criminal law legislation, we can observe that the concept of termination of coercive measures is regulated, but it uses the cancellation phrase, as follows:

- if case of decisions regarding the declaration of incompetence and release from prosecution, the temporary arrest will be canceled;
- in case of all final sentences - except for the provisions of line 6 and article 17 line 2 - the temporarily arrest will be canceled if, in connection with the offense for which the order was issued, the defendant is not required unconditionally the punishment of imprisonment for a period greater than the time spent by him in temporary custody, nor any measure that would attract imprisonment or which may attract imprisonment;
- in case that the period of the penalty of deprivation of liberty it is unconditionally imposed already exceeds the period made during the temporary arrest with less than 60 days, and it was not unconditionally imposed any measure that entails or may entail imprisonment, the temporary arrest will be cancelled in the final decision, without breaching the provisions of Article 69 with effect from the moment during this arrest is equal to the respective penalty.

In the Serbian Criminal Procedure Code, we have identified as incident the following measures to ensure the presence of the defendant and peaceful conduct of criminal proceedings, which are: summons, mandatory presence, provisions relating to travel and other restrictions, bail and detention. In the case of the measures on travel[19], according to article 168 line 11, these can last as long as necessary, but not later than the judgment becomes final. Instruction judge or the presiding judge has the obligation to check every two months if the measure applied is required.

The detention may be ordered for a period of one month, which can be extended up to two months, up to three months respectively, when the punishment provided by law is five years or more. In the event that, at the end of the periods charges are not brought, the defendant is released (in procedure held before the instruction judge).

The Belgian Code of Criminal Procedure governs the preventive detention. Thus, the arrest may be ordered for a period of 24 hours in case of flagrante delicto or where there are serious indications of guilt on a felony or a misdemeanor, but this time, with further conditions.

The person arrested or detained shall be released as soon as the measure has ceased to be necessary. The deprivation of liberty may in no case exceed 24 hours reckoned from the notification of the decision, if precautionary measures of coercion were taken from the time when the person no longer has the freedom to come and go.

The arrest warrant issued by the instruction judge is valid for a maximum of five days from its execution. The ordinance to keep in detention is valid for one month from the day in which it was given. As long as the detention has not ended and the instruction is not closed, the Council chamber is called upon to decide, every month, on maintaining the detention. Before the action of the defendant presents himself before the Council Chamber, provided in Article 262, the instruction judge can decide on the withdrawal of the arrest warrant by a reasoned order and immediately informs the King's prosecutor.

This ordinance is not subject to any appeal. Following the decision of the Council chamber under article 262, the instruction judge may, during the instruction, lifting the arrest warrant by a reasoned order and also informs the King's prosecutor. The Registrar shall inform as soon as possible in writing the defendant and his counsel. If the King's prosecutor does not oppose this ordinance within 24 hours of notification, the defendant is released. If the Council chamber did not decide within that period, the defendant is released.

According to article 267 C.C.P., in case of unwatched ordinance or resubmission ordinance to the police, the defendant is released, provided that he is not sent back for an act constituting an offense under Articles 418 and 419 of the Criminal Code or article 33, § 2, and 36 of the Law of March 16, 1968 relating to the road traffic police.

If the Council chamber resends the defendant before the Criminal Court or the police court, on grounds of a deed which should not lead to a penalty equal to or greater than a year, the defendant will be released on condition to be present on a fixed day before the competent court.

[19] (1) If there are circumstances indicating that the accused might run away, might hide or could go into an unknown place or abroad, the court may prohibit him from leaving home without permission by issuing a decision with stating of the reasons. (2) In situations referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article, the court may issue a decision prohibiting the defendant to leavehe the apartment or house, or ordering him to leave the apartment under surveillance on certain people. (3) According measures 1 and 2 of the article, the defendant may be ordered the following:1) prohibition from visiting certain places; 2) prohibition to meet with certain people; 3) to be present, occasionally and on exact time, in front of the court of law or any other state body; 4) temporary depriving of travel documents; 5) temporary deprivation of driving license and vehicle driving ban.

When the Council chamber, adjusting the procedure, resends the defendant before a police court for reasons of an act for which preventive detention is founded and which is legally punishable by imprisonment superior to the duration of preventive detention which has already been subject to, it can release the defendant or decide by ordinance that the defendant will remain in custody, or he will be released, imposing him more conditions.

Provided that he is not be detained in another case, the defendant or remand prisoner is, despite the call, immediately released if acquitted, sentenced suspended or only fined, or if they benefit from have suspension of the pronounced sentence. The immediate release of the defendant or the remand prisoner involves, as far as he is concerned, the ban on the use of any means of coercion.

If he is sentenced to primary prison without delay, he is released, despite the appeal, from the time of the undergone detention is equal to the main prison term; in other cases, he remains detained for the time the decision will be given because of the action that motivated the detention.

In the IVth book of the Italian C.P.P. there are regulated the preventive measures (preventive detention and house arrest) and coercion (prohibition of expatriation, obligation to present oneself to the judicial police, the removal of the family home, the ban and obligation of the residence).

Analyzing the article 300 of C.C.P., we can observe as being regulated the institution of termination of measures following the delivery of certain sentences, such as:

- The measures ordered against a particular act immediately lose their effectiveness when, for this act and against the same person, archiving[20] is decided or sentence is pronounced due to lack of procedure in order to continue or to be released;
- If the defendant is in a state of preventive detention and by the sentence of release or lack of procedure to continue to apply the security measure of internment in the judiciary psychiatric hospital, the judge takes action according to Article 312;
- When in any court it is pronounced a convicting sentence, the measures lose efficiency if the imposed penalty is declared extinctive or conditionally suspended;
- The preventive detention also loses its effectiveness when the convicting sentence is pronounced, yet it is subject to the attack, if the period of the arrest is already lower in amount than the imposed penalty;
- The released defendant or against whom the judgment has been issued for lack of procedure in order to continue is subsequently convicted for the same offense may be ordered some coercive measures against him when preventive requirements are restored as per article 274 paragraph 1 b) or c).

Termination of the arrest due to not taking to the questioning of the person in a state of preventive detention, can intervene if happens during the preliminary investigation and judge does not take the interrogation in a certain period of time. However, the preventive detention loses its effectiveness when:

- the commencement of its execution the terms provided by the law already passed without the provision the judgment or order through which the judge has short judgment to have been issued according to article 438, or without being pronounced the sentence of enforcement of the penalty at the request of the parties;
- three months, when action is taken for an offense for which the law provides imprisonment not exceeding a maximum of 6 years;
- six months, when action is taken for an offense for which the law provides imprisonment of more than 6 years, except the provisions from no. 3;
- a year, when action is taken to an offense for which the law provides imprisonment for life or with imprisonment of not less than 20 years, or for one of the offenses indicated in article 407, paragraph 2, letter a), provided that this law provides for imprisonment of up to maximum 6 years.;
- from issuing the provision which requires judgment or from execution of the arrest have passed following terms without being pronounced the convicting sentence in the first instance:
- six months, when action is taken for an offense for which the law provides imprisonment of more than maximum 6 years;
- a year, when action is taken for an offense for which the law provides imprisonment of not more than 20 years, except for the provisions of no. 1;
- one year and six months, when action is taken for an offense for which the law provides imprisonment for life or with imprisonment exceeding maximum 20 years;

The total duration of arrest, taking into account the extensions provided by article 305, cannot exceed the following limits:

1. two years, until action is taken for an offense for which the law provides imprisonment not exceeding a maximum of 6 years;
2. four years, when action is taken for an offense for which the law provides imprisonment of not more than 20 years, except the provisions of letter a);
3. six years, when action is taken for an offense for which the law provides imprisonment for life or with imprisonment exceeding maximum 20 years;

[20] Until the dates provided for previous articles, the prosecutor, if the information on the case is unfounded, shows the judge the archiving request.

4. The procedure through which a preventive measure is established as terminated

The holders of issuing a preventive measure as being terminated as are the judicial bodies which having ordered the measure, or prosecutor, the rights and freedoms judge, the preliminary chamber judge or the court of law before which the case is pending. The judicial bodies will decide by an ordinance (the prosecutor) or terminate ex officio upon the request or referral of the prison administration[21].

The judicial bodies will have the right decide upon the termination of the preventive measures, ordering if the one detained or taken into preventive detention to immediately release him, if not detained or arrested in another case. Therefore, we find another incongruity of the legislator which does not also mention the situation of the one under house arrest for the same reasons there should be the same solution.

The rights and freedom judge, the preliminary chamber judge and not least the court of law shall rule by a reasoned conclusion in the presence of the defendant, who will be mandatorily assisted and with the participation of the prosecutor. There is a possibility that the judiciary bodies to rule in absentia but is required to be represented by a lawyer chosen or not producing any harm in such case, but aiming to promptly solve the request or notification. The judicial bodies are incumbent upon the obligation to immediately notify[22] the person against whom the preventive measure was decided and the institutions responsible for enforcement of the measure a copy of the order or conclusion / judgment / decision through which it has been detected the termination of preventive measure.

Against that conclusion, a complaint can be made by the prosecutor or the defendant within 48 hours of delivery for those present, and from the communication of the prosecutor or the defendant, who missed the pronouncement. The complaint filed against the decision through which the termination of this measure was found does not suspend the execution, the termination being enforceable[23].

5. Conclusions

Through this work we tried to go over the cases of termination as preventive measures under national law and a comparative presentation with other legislation on criminal procedure. The study developed under review we identified deficiencies institution and also have highlighted tasks judicial bodies in this matter and the rights of persons subject to preventive measures.

[22] See case Ogică c. Romania (judgment of May 27, 2010): Friday, January 31, 2003, immediately after final judgment according to which the sentence imposed expires at midnight (see paragraph. 8), the Registry of the Court of Appeal Bucharest wrote a letter to inform the Bucharest-Jilava Penitenciary about the judgment so that the administration can take appropriate action. A report prepared in the same day at 3:10 p.m. graft court of appeal referred to the steps taken on the basis of the judgment mentioned above. In this it is mentioned that, on the phone, the commander of the Bucharest-Jilava Penitentiary Registry informed that the secretariat was closed and that no one could receive the fax regarding the judgment. According to this report, the commander redirected the call to the prison guard officer who, in turn, stated that releasing the defendant cannot be made solely on the basis of a phone call, in the absence of a written document. After receiving the fax, on Monday, February 2, 2003 at 7:52 am, the judgment of 31 January 2003, the Bucharest-Jilava Penitentiary administration has taken the necessary steps and, at 10:40, the defendant was released. Concerned, the Court notes that the final decision of 31 January 2003 sentenced the defendant to a term equal to the duration of detention already served by that date and that, immediately after the judgment, the Registry of the Court of Appeal contacted the Bucharest-Jilava Penitenciart to take the necessary steps in order to release the interested party; The Court notes that the failure of these efforts was recorded in the minutes drawn up on the same day at 3:10 p.m. The Court recalls that, in considering the term for enforcement of judgments for reconditional discharge of the plaintiff in cases where the conditions required for the release were achieved at a time when prison staff in charge of operations required in this regard was not present due to the work program, it did not exclude periods as evening and night. It can not, much less, to adopt an approach to the question especially since, unlike the case Calmanovici, the Registry of the Court of Appeal contacted the administration of the Bucharest-Jilava Penitentiary during the day to inform of the final judgment and the need to take the measures required to release the defendant. The Court can not accept that, because of the work program of the secretariat, the administration of prisons do not take steps to reception, on Friday, in the early afternoon, a document sent through fax, necessary for releasing the defendant, knowing that closure of Secretariat will result in maintaining the concerned party of an additional detention for more than forty-eight hours. According to the Court, such a delay can not be an "inevitable minimal delay" for the execution of a final judgment has the effect of releasing an individual. Therefore,the detention in question was not based on one of the paragraphs of art. 5 of the Convention. Therefore, it appears that a violation of Article. 5 § 1.

OBSERVANCE OF THE FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS OF CONVICTED INDIVIDUALS DURING THE RE-EDUCATION AND SOCIAL REINSERTION PROCESS

Dorian CHIRIȚĂ[*]

Abstract

The recent criminal justice reform brought by the entry into force of the new Criminal Code and the new Criminal Procedure Code carries forward the changes in approach with regard to sentence execution, introduced following the adoption of Law No. 275/2006 on the execution of sentences and the measures ordered by judicial bodies during the criminal trial. Having as a point of departure the joint standard set by Recommendation 2006/2 of the Commission of Ministers, this scientific paper is aimed at presenting the evolution of the Romanian legislative system in terms of sentence execution and the manner of regulation of the new institutions, including custodial educational measures that may be ordered for juvenile offenders, but also in terms of the positive obligations incumbent upon the institutions of the State involved in sentence enforcement and sentence execution supervision.

Keywords*: International and European recommendations transposed into national criminal legislation, organising custodial sentence execution, re-socialisation for convicted individuals, rights of convicts, execution of custodial educational measures, national strategy for social reinsertion of former convicts.*

1. Introduction

The overall national legal system and the laws governing the serving of criminal sentences cannot be approached in isolation. It is paramount to correlate them to the relevant European benchmarks and values.

This is actually the very reason for which the Romanian state undertook ample reforms in the matter of criminal law and criminal trial, but also in the field of sentence execution, the latter being started by the adoption of laws on the enforcement of sentences and measures ordered by judicial bodies during the criminal trial.

This legal science paper provides a significant contribution, by dealing distinctly and specifically (in relation to the common standard set by Recommendation 2006/2 of the Committee of Ministers) with the development of each legal institution in the matter of criminal sentences, the regulation of the new institutions, but also the positive obligations incumbent on the different national entities responsible for the enforcement and supervision of sentence execution.

Thus, this comparative research furthers the existing relevant literature, by carrying out a critical review of each principle set forth in Recommendation 2006/2 of the Committee of Ministers, and by presenting their integration in the national laws, indicating the level of internalisation of these guiding principles and pointing out specific challenges encountered in the process of integration.

On the other hand, this paper does not only provide a comparative legal iteration, but also a historic perspective of the relevant international and national values set forth by Resolutions no. 663C (XXIV) of 31 July 1957 and no. 2076 (LXII) of 13 May 1977, Recommendation R (87) 3 of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe, Recommendation R (93) 6, Recommendation R (98) 7, Recommendation R (99) 22, Recommendations R (79) 14, R (82) 16 and R (79) 14, Recommendation R (2003) 23, Recommendation R (2003) 20 and Recommendation R (75) 25, Recommendation (2006) 2 and not only, at international level, as well as Law no. 275/2006, Law no. 253/2013, Law no. 254/2013, Criminal Code, Criminal Procedure Code, at national level. This paper explicitly illustrates the qualitative leap of the national law in the matter of sentence execution, but also areas that should be improved in the future.

2. Paper content

Adopted on 11 January 2006 by the Committee of Ministers during the 952nd meeting of Ministers' Deputies, the Recommendation of the Committee of Ministers to Member States on the European Prison Rules (2006) 2 arises from constant international and European concerns with standardising minimum rules on the treatment of convicted prisoners, thus being included in a series of international documents of maximum relevance for defining the concept of social reaction to crime.

The First United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders held in Geneva, in 1955, adopted Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners, approved by the Economic and Social Council in its Resolutions no.663C (XXIV) of 31 July 1957 and no.2076 (LXII) of 13 May 1977. Recommendation R (87) 3 of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe established the "European Prison Rules". These were followed by an series of recommendations on the rights of convicted prisoners and execution of sentences: Recommendation R (93) 6 on prison and criminological aspects of the control of transmissible diseases including HIV/AIDS and related health problems in prison, Recommendation R (98) 7 concerning the ethical and organisational aspects of health care in prison, Recommendation R (99) 22 concerning prison overcrowding and prison population inflation, as well as Recommendations R (79) 14 and R (82) 16 on release/leave from prisons, Recommendation R (2003) 23 on the management of life-sentence and other long-term prisoners, Recommendation R (2003) 20 on education in prisons, and Recommendation R (75) 25 on prison labour.

Recommendation (2006) 2 on the European Prison Rules was one of the benchmarks for harmonising Romanian laws with international regulations in the matter. In the successive development of all the regulations covering the enforcement of custodial sentences, the 107 Rules set forth by the Recommendation were considered alongside the above-mentioned international documents, and provided the foundation for a radical reform of the national sentence execution system.

This international instrument provided a premiere in collecting the rights of convicted prisoners in a veritable code of rules, and setting forth correlative obligations for the Member States to implement the contents of such rules[1], of which the following should be recalled:

- All persons deprived of their liberty shall be treated with respect for their human rights.
- Persons deprived of their liberty retain all rights that are not lawfully taken away by the decision sentencing them or remanding them in custody.
- Prison conditions that infringe prisoners' human rights are not justified by lack of resources.
- Life in prison shall approximate as closely as possible the positive aspects of life in the community.
- All detention shall be managed so as to facilitate the reintegration into free society of persons who have been deprived of their liberty.
- National law shall provide mechanisms for ensuring that these minimum requirements are not breached by the overcrowding of prisons.
- Prisoners shall be allowed to communicate as often as possible by letter, telephone or other forms of communication with their families, other persons and representatives of outside organisations and to receive visits from these persons.
- Prison authorities shall ensure that prisoners are able to participate in elections, referenda and in other aspects of public life, in so far as their right to do so is not restricted by national law.
- While prisoners are being moved to or from a prison, or to other places such as court or hospital, they shall be exposed to public view as little as possible and proper safeguards shall be adopted to ensure their anonymity.
- Disciplinary procedures shall be mechanisms of last resort. Whenever possible, prison authorities shall use mechanisms of restoration and mediation to resolve disputes with and among prisoners. Only conduct likely to constitute a threat to good order, safety or security may be defined as a "disciplinary offence".

Representing the start of reforms in the matter, Law no. 275/2006 on the execution of sentences and measures ordered by judicial bodies during the criminal trial, in its Title I, reiterates the principles established by the Constitution of Romania and the European Convention on Human Rights (CEDO). Articles 1 to 5 state the principles of lawful detention of a person after conviction by a competent court; respect for the dignity of human beings; prohibition of subjecting convicted prisoners to torture, inhuman or degrading treatment or other ill-treatment; and prohibition of any forms of discrimination in the serving of sentences.

As a novelty in the field of sentence enforcement regulations, Law no. 275/2006 introduces the institution of the "judge delegated for the serving of custodial sentences", judge responsible for supervising and verifying the lawfulness of prison sentences and pre-trial custodial orders regulated by the previous Criminal Procedure Code.

Intended to regulate the enforcement of penal fines, supervision orders and other obligations imposed by courts on the grounds of the 1969 Criminal Code (in the case of supervised suspension of sentence serving provided for by Article 86^1 and subsequent), Titles II and III also include provisions on the responsibilities of the judge seconded to the criminal sentences enforcement unit of the enforcement court, but also on the work of the counsellors employed by the services for victim protection and social reinsertion of offenders. The effective organisation of the serving of custodial sentences is regulated under Title IV that, in 9 chapters, lays down rules on sentence serving regimes; detention conditions; rights and obligations of convicted prisoners; labour carried out by convicted prisoners; educational, therapy, psychological counselling, social assistance, school and training activities in which detained convicts participate during their term in prison; rewards that may be granted and sanctions for breaches of rules; conditional release; documents prepared by the prison administration.

Pursuing correlation with the provisions of Law no. 301/2004 on the Criminal Code (a bill that was adopted on 28.06.2004 and published in the Official Journal of Romania no. 575/2004 la 29.06.2004, but that never came into force), Law no. 275/2006 envisaged reconsidering the criminal policies, such as to abandon the repressive approach to punishments in favour to an educational one, based on the need for social reinsertion and education of convicted prisoners. This was the first instance (Cap. II, Articles 18-24) when four regimes for the serving of custodial sentences were identified, defined by a progressive or regressive system, as applicable, whereby convicts may be relocated to a different regime, depending on their behaviour during detention, thus: maximum security, closed, semi-open and open prison regimes. The differences between the prison regimes are defined by the detention conditions; limitation of inmates' freedom of movement; conditions of working; and participating in educational, cultural, therapy, psychological counselling and social assistance activities. A board for individualisation of sentences set up in each prison was tasked with determining the detention regimes and the judge seconded for supervision of custodial sentences was given the authority to change the regime at any time to a more or less severe one, as applicable, depending on the conduct of the convicted prisoner. The measures ordered by the judge may be appealed against with the court of jurisdiction in the area where the prison is located.

By transposing Rules 14-18 of Recommendation (2006) 2, Chapter III of Title IV of Law no. 275/2006 regulates the detention conditions, namely reception, accommodation, clothing and nutrition, strictly defining the cases when, in order to prevent a real and present danger, detainees may be physically restrained. Thus, in compliance with the above-mentioned international standards and rules, Article 37 positively prohibits chaining of prison inmates, providing that this measure may only be taken in exceptional cases, when no other means is available for removing the risk, by prior approval of the prison director. Furthermore, the prison management is required to communicate immediately to the delegate judge any use and cessation of use of any means of constraint, detailing the facts that led to such use.

A novelty is Article 31 (4) of the Law prohibiting the transfer of underage individuals serving educational or custodial sentences to any prisons and, in the latter case, to adult prisons, for longer than 5 days, this provision being compliant with Rule no. 11 of Rec. 2006 (2) and set forth both for the purpose of preventing juveniles being placed in environments that may impair their social rehabilitation process and for ensuring continuity in the education of juveniles who participate in schooling or vocational qualification programmes.

Article 34 also introduces an element of novelty, by regulating the dress code of convicted prisoners [in compliance with Rule 20 1-3 of Rec. 2006 (2) and the UN Prison Rules], thus eliminating the mandatory wearing of prison clothes and envisaging the provision of detention conditions approximating as close as possible the life of free individuals and transposing into the Law Principle no. 5 stated in the Preamble of Rec. (2006) 2. Thus, the Law provides that, during their imprisonment, the convicts are to wear civil clothes, irrespective of the detention regime and, in case they do not have personal clothes, such will be provided free of charge by the prison administration.

Moreover, by transposing Rules 24 and 29 of Rec. (2006) 2, the provisions of Chapter IV of Title IV recognise the rights of persons serving prison sentences to express their opinions and religious beliefs, to information, correspondence, telephone calls, to receive visits and goods, the right to health care, diplomatic assistance for foreign nationals, and the right to marriage. Articles 38-39 instate a system of guarantees for observance of these rights, by providing the right to complain to the delegated judge about any breach of rights and to appeal the latter's decisions with the court of jurisdiction of the place of detention. The same Articles also impose on the prison administrators the positive obligations of taking the required measures to ensure that these rights are exercised in full. The procedure for petitioning the delegated judge (Article 38 (3-4) involves the mandatory hearing of the convicted prisoner, but also the possibility to hear any person that may provide data and information required for determining the truth.

Article 46 (5) provides that, in case convicted prisoners lack the necessary money, the costs of petitioning national courts, international organisations whose jurisdiction is recognised in Romania, or legal advice and non-governmental organisations active in the field of human rights is to be covered by the prison administration. For the purpose of avoiding any interference of the prison administrators with the right to correspondence, Article 45 (4) lays down explicit and limitative situations when mail may be opened or withheld, with rules that are similar with those applicable for free individuals, namely, only when reasonable cause exists to suspect that an offence was committed and only based on a written and reasoned order issued by the delegated judge, the convict being notified in writing as soon as such measure was ordered.

Given that, according to the 1969 Criminal Code, labour is a main component of offenders' social rehabilitation, Chapter V of Title IV establishes a new regime for the work of convicted prisoners, such as to harmonise the legal provisions with Rules 26 1-15 of Recommendation (2006) 2. The general provisions on work carried out in detention facilities (Article 57) instate the principle that such work is remunerated, except for housekeeping work required in the prison and work carried out in case of calamities. The subsequent articles detail the working conditions, exclusively based on the agreement of the inmate, the duration of the working day, working regime, payment, distribution of income due to inmates, health and safety at work rules and forms of social assistance available in case of work capacity loss caused by work accident or professional illness occurring during imprisonment (Reg. 26.14). Another novelty ensuing from the above-mentioned Recommendation is the assimilation of educational, qualification, training or retraining activities with effectively carrying out work. Article 57 (10) provides that such work is to be remunerated. The regulations governing vocational training provide that such programmes are to be delivered based on curricula developed jointly by the administration of each prison together with the National Employment Agency or its territorial branches, with the programmes being adapted to the inmates' preferences and aptitudes. In order to facilitate social reinsertion of convicts, Article 66 (1) provides that the certificate of completion of a training programme should not mention that the training programme was completed whilst in detention.

According to Rule 26 (8) of Rec. (2006) 2 – providing that though any financial profit generated for the penitentiary can be valuable for raising standards and improving the quality of training, yet the interests of the prisoners should not be subordinated to that purpose –Article 15 (6) of the Law provides that the income obtained by detained convicts from their work is to be used for improving the conditions of detention.

Regarding the distribution of earnings, the percentage due to the prisoner was increased to 40% compared to the previous regulation (Law no. 23/1969), of which 75% can be used by the prisoner during his/her imprisonment and 25% is deposited in a savings account on his/her name and is to be handed over to them on release, including any interest due. Article 60 (2) transposes Rule 105.5 and provides that, in the case of a sentenced prisoner who was also ordered to pay some form of reparations that were not covered before his/her reception in the prison, 50% of the 40% share of earnings due to him/her for the work done during detention will be used for providing reparations to the damaged party.

In the light of the principle of lawfulness of sentence execution, Chapter VII of Title IV provides for a new system of rewarding convicted prisoners that demonstrate good behaviour and diligence in work or educational activities. Such rewards include assignment of responsibilities in educational programmes, lifting of previous sanctions, extra rights to visits and packages, awards or leave from prison for maximum 5 to 10 days, as applicable. At the same time, in compliance with Rules 56-60 of Rec. 2006/2, the punishable disciplinary offences were explicitly listed, with the specific determination that any such punishment cannot limit the prisoners' right to defence, petitioning, correspondence, health care, food, light and daily outside walk. Also, collective and corporal punishments or the use of instruments of restraint or of any from of degrading or humiliating treatments are explicitly prohibited as punishments for disciplinary offences. Article 74 provides guarantees against arbitrary punishments: the convicted prisoner is entitled to challenge the punishment decided by the disciplinary board by petitioning the delegated judge. Such petition procedure must include the hearing of the convicted prisoner and the decision of the judge may be appealed against with the court of justice of jurisdiction in the area of the prison.

Title V of Law 275/2006 transposes the Rules laid down in Part VII of Rec. 2006/2 (on untried prisoners) and includes rules on the enforcement of custodial remand orders differentiated by trial stages: in preventive detention and arrest centres subordinated to the Ministry of Administration and Internal Affairs, in the case of custodial orders issued during the criminal investigation, or in preventive arrest centres or in special sections of prisons – both subordinated to the National Prison Administration. These articles also state that the above-mentioned provisions on detention conditions, rights and obligations of convicted prisoners, work, educational and cultural activities, therapy, psychological counselling, social assistance, rewards (except for prison leave and disciplinary punishments) also apply to untried prisoners.

The coming into force on February 1st 2014 of Law no. 286/2009 on the Criminal Code and of Law no. 135/2010 on the Criminal Procedure Code caused material changes in the matter of prison sentence enforcement and required the improvement of the legal framework established by Law no. 275/2006 which, being focused on execution of prison sentences, did not correspond to the circumstances created the introduction of the new criminal law or criminal trial institutions.

Law no. 254/2013 regarding the execution of sentences and custodial measures ordered by the court during the criminal trial appended the substantive and procedural law rules comprised in the two new Codes, detailing the manner of implementing such for achieving the judicial purposes of social rehabilitation of convicted adults or underage individuals, preventing reoffending, ensuring good conduct of the criminal trial by preventing the suspect from absconding from the criminal investigation or trial.

Similarly to Law no. 275/2006, Title I reiterates the principles of lawful imprisonment – respect for human dignity, prohibition of torture, inhumane or degrading treatments or other ill-treatments, prohibition of discrimination in the serving of prison sentences – enshrined both in the Constitution and in the New Criminal Procedure Code, with the new regulation (Article 7) additionally stating – in compliance with ECoHR and Rule 2 of Rec. 2006/2 – that inmates shall exercise all the civil and political rights except those taken away from them in compliance with the law by the decision sentencing them, as well as those rights that cannot be exercised or are limited inherently by the status of being imprisoned or for reasons related to the safety of the prison facilities.

The institution of the judge delegated for the execution of custodial sentences is now redesigned and redefined under the title "judge for supervision of deprival of liberty" in Title II, Articles 8 - 9 of Law no. 254/2013, such judge being assigned to supervising and verifying the lawfulness in the execution of sentences.

By the listing of all such judge's responsibilities, a number of practical difficulties were removed that existed in the implementation of the previous rules on sentence execution (mainly separation of administrative duties from administrative-jurisdictional ones). The law-maker's decision to strengthen the institution of the supervision judge was based on the need to effectively control the execution of prison sentences, with the new regulations introduced in Article 9 on the designation of stand-ins, seconded court clerks and the imperative obligation imposed on the detention facility management to provide the amenities required for these activities, as well as any necessary information or documents, establishing such judges' functional independence. The resolutions of the delegated judge – now enforceable – and the written orders issued in compliance with the prison law under the procedure applicable in cases where inmates refuse food are mandatory for the prison director or the head of the pre-trial detention and arrest centre.

In addition, the above-mentioned provisions state that, in carrying out his/her judicial duties, the judge for supervision of deprival of liberty may hear any person, request information or documents from the detention facility management, carry out on site checks, and has access to the personal file of the prisoner, records and any other documents required for discharging his/her duties.

A separate chapter is dedicated to regulations on safety in prisons. Articles 15-21 impose both safety measures and provide for the assessment of individuals (in compliance with Rule 52 of Rec. 2006/2) on admission to the detention facility, in order to determine the risk they may pose to the community, in case of breakout, and to the safety of the other inmates, prison facility staff, visitors or to themselves. In the light of the same recommendations, clear, imperative and explicit rules are laid down on the use of restraint instruments and antiterrorist and specialised control applicable to all persons and luggage they carry, but also to any vehicles that gain access to the prison. The prisoners' body search is explicitly regulated, with clear distinction between body search, external body examination and internal body examination, with a special focus on the intrusive character of this measure, Article 19 (5) providing that examination can only be carried out by medical staff, as also provided by Rule 54.6 of Rec. 2006/2.

In compliance with Rule 69 1-3 of Rec. 2006/2, Article 21 of the Law provides that only the prison guarding staff and that carrying out escort missions outside the prison facilities, in the cases and under the terms provided by law, are permitted to carry fire arms. The carrying and use of fire arms or other non-lethal weapons in the detention facilities is prohibited, except in critical incidents explicitly defined in the Rules of Implementation approved by the Minister of Justice.

Article 23 provides for the possibility to protect inmates who intend to injure themselves or commit suicide, injure another person, destroy goods or cause serious disorder, in that the possibility is provided for such prisoners to be accommodated individually, in a specially designated and fitted room. During the accommodation in such a protection room, the prisoner at risk of harming him/herself or committing suicide is to be monitored by medical staff, receive psychological counselling and be kept under permanent video surveillance, but ensuring that human dignity is respected at all times. When using restraint instruments or weapons and when temporarily accommodating the prisoner in the protection room and keeping him/her under video surveillance, it is mandatory that the judge for supervision of deprival of liberty be notified in writing accordingly.

Intended to regulate the prison sentence serving regimes, Chapter III of Law no. 254 reiterates the four prison regimes provided for by Law no.275/2006, namely maximum security, closed, semi-open and open, the novelty being the possibility to instate a certain regime on a provisional basis (Article 33) for a short period of time, after the completion of quarantine, and only if the prison regime was not determined during the quarantine. The effective sentence serving regime is decided by a board, based on criteria explicitly stipulated in the Rules for Implementation, namely: the duration of the sentence; risk levels of the convict; age and health status; good or bad conduct of the convict, including in previous detention terms; identified needs and abilities of the convict required for his/her inclusion in educational programmes; convict's needs for psychological and social assistance; and his/her willingness to work and participate in educational, cultural, therapeutic, psychological counselling and social assistance, moral-religious, schooling and vocational training activities and programmes.

In terms of dealing with any petition filed by a convicted prisoner or the prison management against a resolution of the supervision judge, a new procedure is established under the jurisdiction of the local court where the prison is located. The convicted prisoner only appears in court if and when summoned by the judges (in such case, he/she is also heard) and legal advice is not mandatory. When a prosecutor and a representative of the prison administration participate in the court session, they make claims and submissions.

Also, as an exceptional measure, it is provided that prisoners may be included in an imprisonment regime more or less severe than that associated with the duration of the prison term, taking into account the nature of the crime and the manner it was committed, the convicted prisoner's personality and behaviour until de determination of the prison regime.

Another novelty is the provision for a social rehabilitation programme adapted to each prisoner, accompanying the imprisonment regime and being a manner of individualising the regime of prison sentences (Articles 41 and 42). This means that each individual prisoner should participate in educational, cultural, therapy, counselling and social assistance, schooling, vocational training and work activities depending on his/her prison term, conduct, personality, risk, age, health, identified needs and capacity for social reinsertion.

Chapter IV of Law no. 254/2013 represents a real progress in approximating Rules nos. 14-18 of Rec. (2006) 2, by detailing the basic requirements applicable for admission to the prison; quarantine and observation period; rules for transportation of prisoners; imprisonment of convicted persons from special categories; release, transfer, accommodation, clothing and food; refusal of food; and documents to be drawn up by the prison administrators in the case of deceased prisoners. According to the above-mentioned rules, Article 43 contains a new provision on the minimal measures required on admission to the prison, namely: detailed body search; making a list of personal belongings; general clinical examination with findings entered in the medical record; fingerprinting that are kept in hard copy on the personal record of the prisoner and stored in electronic format in the national fingerprint match database; photographing for records; and interviewing to ascertain the immediate needs of the convicted person. The law text pays special attention to persons who do not speak or understand Romanian or to persons with disabilities.

Regarding the transfer of convicted prisoners, Article 45 (8) reiterates the previous provision that prohibited the transfer to prisons for more than 10 days of juveniles serving a sentence of internment in an educational or detention centre.

Another novelty are the regulations on the nutrition of convicted prisoners (Article 50), requiring the administration of the detention facility to provide adequate conditions for the cooking, distribution and serving of food, in compliance with the food hygiene regulations, depending on the age, health status, kind of work done, and in observance of the religious beliefs declared by the prisoner in a sworn statement.

The rights and obligations of convicted prisoners, stipulated in Chapter V, to a large extent take over the provisions of the previous Law no. 275/2006, but clarify the matter of legal advice, which should be provided on any legal issue, the room and facilities necessary to consult a lawyer being provided, in observance of confidentiality but under visual monitoring. Furthermore, the provisions on medical care and examination carry forward most of the previous regulations, the new aspects covering convicted prisoners with serious mental disorders, who are to be placed in special psychiatry wards [Article 73 (7)]. These provisions were introduced based on Rules 47 and 12 of Rec. 2006/2, but also following the visit reports of the European Committee for Prevention of Torture, which found that a significant number of prisoners show signs of mental conditions.

The matter of work by convicted prisoners – detailed in Chapter VI – did not undergo substantial changes compared to the previous Act. The new provisions include the possibility for prisoners to carry out voluntary or community work, thus making better use of the prisoners' interest for working, taking into account that work is one of the most important social rehabilitation factors. The distribution of the money earned by convicted prisoners for their work is the same as in the previous regulation, with only the share that can be used by the prisoner during imprisonments being changed from 75% to 90%. Also, based on the transposition of Rule no. 105.5, Article 60 (2) of Law no. 275/2006 was maintained, which provides that, when the convicted prisoner was also ordered to provide reparations that were not covered before his/her reception in the prison, 50% of the 40% share of earnings due to him/her for the work done during detention is used for providing reparations to the damaged party.

Educational, psychological and social assistance activities, school education, higher education and vocational training of convicted prisoners are all detailed in chapter VII that includes specific rules on the conditions for the provision of such activities, but also distinct rules on the status of disabled convicts. Rules are set forth for the carrying out of a multidisciplinary educational, psychological and social assessment of each convicted prisoner at the time of their admittance into the prison. This assessment informs the development of a personal educational and therapy evaluation and intervention plan, including the activities recommended in relation to the prison regime and sentence serving route.

Chapter VIII presents a new approach to parole (conditional release), emphasizing its optional character. Besides the requirements set forth in the previous regulation, when considering a parole, the board takes into account the prison regime to which the convicted prisoner was allocated and his/her reparation of any civil liabilities ordered in the sentence, except where the prisoner demonstrates that he/she had absolutely no means of meeting such obligations.

The enforcement of educational prison sentences applied to juveniles is regulated in Title V and is required by the reform of the system of criminal punishments introduced by the New Criminal and Criminal Procedure Codes.

The execution of prison sentences is to be carried out in special juvenile rehabilitation facilities or in educational and detention centres set up by the reorganisation of minors and youth prisons and re-education centres.

In the case of underage interned in detention centres, two types of sentence serving regimes are provided: open and closed. The decision is the responsibility of a board in which a probation counsellor, and a representative of the General Department for Social Assistance and Child Protection of the County Council or the Local Council, as applicable, may participate. After the convicted juvenile has served a quarter of the sentence, the board is tasked with reviewing the conduct of the candidate and his/her efforts towards social reintegration.

With a view to the social rehabilitation of the underage, the law provides that, 3 months before the end of the term, the persons serving educational sentences under open regime may be accommodated in specially designated facilities, where they will carry out self-managing tasks under the direct supervision of designated personnel form the centre.

In the case of internment in an educational centre, unlike in a detention facility, the execution regime is the same for all inmates, and the individualisation of the regime – in terms of deciding educational, psychological and social assistance provided to each convicted person – is the responsibility of a purposely established Educational Board. The board membership includes the centre director, centre deputy director for education and psycho-social support, the case educator, primary teacher or form teacher, a psychologist, a social worker, and the head of the supervision, records and allocation of rights for interned persons. Also, a number of guest members may be invited: a probation officer and a representative of the General Department for Social Assistance and Child Protection of the County Council or the Local Council. A board with a similar membership is set up in each detention centre and is responsible for determining, individualising and changing the internment regime.

Irrespective of the type or custodial educational sentence being served, the regime applicable to convicted minors is aimed at providing them with assistance, protection, education and development of their vocational skills, with a view to their social rehabilitation, so that the provisions governing their rights and obligations during internment (Articles 161-170) focus on social reinsertion, psycho-social support, school education and vocational training activities and programmes. Moreover, the regulations on disciplinary offences take into account the specific obligations and interdictions applicable to convicted juveniles, namely to attend school up to completing compulsory education and to participate in vocational training programmes and in other activities provided by the centre, for the benefit of social reintegration. To an equal extent, the adopted reward system includes specific regulations for minors, with a new rule providing for: 24 hours leave of absence in the town where the centre is located; weekend leave to the town of domicile; family leave during school holydays for up to 15 days, but not more than 45 days per year; participation in camps or field trips organised by the centre alone or in partnership with other organisations.

The development of the regulations on the enforcement of custodial educational sentences was based on a number of international instruments[2], namely United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, United Nations Rules for the Protection of Juveniles Deprived of their Liberty, United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for Non-custodial Measures (Tokio Rules), United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (Beijing Rules), Recommendation 87 (20) of the Committee of Ministers on social reactions to juvenile delinquency.

Starting from the international and European regulations in the matter of human rights and, in particular, the rights of children – to which Romania is a party – the criminal justice reform does not end with the adoption of specific provisions on the serving of sentences.

Bearing in mind that "the current regulations do not make full and systematic reference to cooperation and complementarily aspects in the provision of support to persons serving custodial sentences by the prison staff, probation officers or representatives of other public agencies, associations and organisations involved in the provision of post-imprisonment support", the National Strategy for the social reintegration of persons deprived of liberty 2015-2019[3] identified the need for the criminal justice policies to develop a framework for the cooperation and synergy between public agencies, associations and organisations involved in then provision of post-imprisonment assistance, alongside with defining clear responsibilities of the social stakeholders.

The three objectives laid down in the National Implementation Plan, as a tool for the implementation of the Strategy cover:

- institutional capacity and institutional development in the field of social reintegration of inmates and persons who served custodial sentences, by the training of the staff involved, development of the institutional infrastructure, improving the regulatory framework and promoting amendments to the laws;
- developing educational programs, psychological support and social assistance in detention, by providing education, psychological and social support to persons deprived of liberty, and raising public awareness on the issue of social reintegration of the inmates;
- facilitating post-prison assistance at systemic level, by ensuring continuity of intervention for people who executed custodial sentences, developing partnerships with public institutions, associations and non-governmental organisations and local communities, in order to facilitate the social reintegration of persons who executed custodial sentences; developing inter-institutional procedures concerning the responsibilities of the stakeholders in the social reintegration of persons who served custodial sentences; aking over cases and providing post-prison support.

3. Conclusions

The numerous recommendations issued by the Council of Europe in the matter of execution of sentences underline the need for the Member States to take legal and administrative measures aimed at maintaining the necessary balance between the need to protect public order, on the one hand, and the crucial requirement to consider the social reinsertion needs of offenders, on then other hand.

In the light of these recommendations, it is my opinion that the social reintegration of persons deprived of liberty is a complex process that starts at the time the conviction sentence becomes final and continues, from the admission of the convict at the detention facility until the term in prison is served or deemed to have been served, but also subsequently, through the various types of support provided by the society to the former convict.

Thus, within these time milestones, the role of the prison system is not only to provide the guarding, escorting, supervision and enforcement of detention regime, but also to prepare the prisoners for post-imprisonment life, the prison administrators being required to permanently evaluate the educational, psychological and social support needs of the inmates, to individualise and plan their sentence serving route, by organising and delivering school education, vocational training, educational, psychological and social assistance programmes so that, at the end of the prison term, to accomplish the educational function of the prison term or custodial educational measure.

Designed as a tool for improving the European Prison Rules of 1987, Recommendation (2006) 2 is a true code of requirements regulating all the aspects related to the management of detention facilities, with a special focus on observance of fundamental rights and all other rights that have not been explicitly taken away by the sentencing decision or that are obviously incompatible with the status of imprisonment. The rules included in the above-mentioned Recommendation are not intended to lay down an exemplary system of operations, but rather codify a minimal standard the provision of which should be of real concern in any modern and progressive judicial systems.

The approximation into the national laws (by the successive adoption of Laws nos. 275/2006 and 254/2013) of the system of rules established by Recommendation (2006) 2 does not mark the end of the prison system reform. Improving the prison system efficiency requires the continued promotion of criminal justice policies aimed at improving the legal-regulatory framework, the development of cooperation and synergy between public agencies, associations and non-governmental organisations involved in the provision of post-imprisonment support, at adapting and improving the prison staff training system and at intensifying international cooperation with the prison systems of the other Member States.

This paper draws attention to the need to continue the process of correlating the national to European laws, to maintain the efforts in this direction, for the purpose of raising the quality of national laws on the serving of prison sentences, with the ultimate outcome of improving the protection of convicted prisoners' rights.

SHORT REFLECTIONS REGARDING PRECAUTIONARY AND PREVENTIVE MEASURES ORDERED IN THE CRIMINAL TRIAL AGAINST AN INSOLVENT LEGAL PERSON

Luminița CRISTIU-NINU[*]

Abstract

The judicial realities have shown us that the field of the precautionary and preventive measures ruled in the criminal trial against the insolvent judicial person is not correctly and efficiently regulated. There are a series of peculiarities that should be attentively analyzed in order to eliminate the negative effects of the interference of the criminal procedures with those of insolvency. The lack of a specific package of standards that help managing such a situation, but also, sometimes, the misinterpretation of the existing regulations in the field may generate situations that go almost beyond the legal persons in such a position.

Keywords: insolvency, procedure, legal person, precautionary measures, preventive measures, order, trial/ law suit.

Introduction

This study is intended to approach some aspects implied by the interference of the insolvency procedure with the criminal trial and since the most frequent question of the experts in insolvency has become if, the criminal trials may block the insolvency procedure, it seems convenient to start with the conclusion itself, that criminal trials should not hold back the insolvency procedure.

The lack of clear judicial provisions and especially enacted for managing such issues and sometimes the misinterpretations of the existing provisions may generate situations that the legal persons may find hard to go beyond.

1. Economic measures taken against the insolvent legal person

During a criminal trial, several categories of economic measure can be taken against a legal person and it is important to make a clear-cut distinction between measures that may be taken during the criminal trial and those taken by final criminal judgement.

If the respective legal person is in an insolvency procedure, as a debtor, the distinction above is very important since the existence of an ongoing criminal trial or, on a case to case basis, of a final criminal judgement influences in different ways the insolvency procedure, as follows.

1.1. Measures taken during the criminal trial

The measures that may be ordered during the criminal trial that have economic consequences for the legal person and for the insolvency procedure, are:

- precautionary measures meant to remedy the damages caused by the offence;
- preventive measures;

These two categories of measures raise significant problems with respect to the interpretation of the law and to the correct and efficient management of the two procedures.

1.1.1. Precautionary measures that can be inflicted on a legal person during the criminal trial

Precautionary measures have as a result the preservation of the assets or real estate belonging to the suspect, defendant or to the liable person, with a view to a special confiscation, to an extended confiscation, to the execution of the fine sentence or of the judiciary expenses or to covering the civil damages.

During a criminal trial, against the legal person the court may rule precautionary measures in three situations:

- the legal person has the quality of defendant in a criminal trial in which it may undergo precautionary measures in order to offer the guaranty of executing the fine sentence, the judiciary expenses, the warranty of the special confiscation and of the extended confiscation, the warranty of repairing the damages resulting from the offence;
- the legal person is liable in the civil lawsuit, case in which it may undergo precautionary measures that guarantee the recovery of the damage resulting from the offence, in order to cover the judicial expenditures;
- finally, the legal person may not have any of the qualities above, but it may be imposed precautionary measures, as a third party, in whose custody or possession are the goods that may be affected by the safety measures of the special confiscation or of the extended confiscation, stipulated in art. 112 and 112 [1] of the Criminal code.

The provisions regulating the criminal liability are contained in art.135 of the New

Criminal code, and from the way of regulating this liability, we can easily conclude that a legal person may frequently be considered liable from the criminal point of view, be it only for offences committed while achieving its own objectives, to its benefit or in the name of the legal person.

Still, as it is, the criminal liability of a legal person is a problem of law that cannot be solved only by the simplistic interpretation of the provisions in the criminal laws, but also by corroborating them with the stipulations of Law 31/1990 on companies, regarding liabilities and the mandate of managers and other persons representing legal persons, and with the stipulations of the Civil code, that are particularly relevant from this point of view.

Thus, according to art. 219 of the Civil code, lawful or illegal acts committed by the representatives of the legal person, are incumbent upon the legal person itself, but only if they are connected to the attributions or to the purpose of the positions it was entrusted with.

At the same time, according to the provisions of art. 72 of Law 31/1990, the obligations and liabilities of managers are regulated by provisions regarding the mandate and by those especially mentioned in this law.

As a result, even in situations when an executive, an agent, the representative of the legal person commit an offence within the sphere of activity developed by the legal person in carrying out the object of its activity, according to the law or to the articles of incorporation, or to the benefit of the legal person (the offence to the benefit of the legal person is that when the profit resulting from the offence goes wholly or partly to the latter or when the profit consists in avoiding a loss)[1] or in the name of the legal person (we must stress the fact that in the name of the legal person, offences may be committed only by the persons officially appointed for representation attributions)[2], in my opinion, the legal person cannot be automatically, ope legis, held liable, except when material evidence shows that the natural person who committed the offence did not exceed the limits of the mandate or the attributions or purpose of the position the legal person entrusted him/her with.

That is why I consider faulty the opinion formulated in the doctrine[3], according to which if hypothetically a natural person commits an offence to his/her exclusive benefit, but in connection with the object of activity of the legal person or even against its interests, given the fact that at least one of the hypothesis alternatively stipulated by the law is met, the legal person may be considered criminally liable.

Accepting the thesis of the criminal liability of the legal person only as a result of meeting only one of the three alternatives stipulated by art. 135 of the Criminal code (the offence was committed while carrying on the object of activity, to the benefit or in the name of the legal person) would mean denying the principle of criminal personal liability, but also a dilution of the criminal and civil liability of natural persons – actual authors of the offences- who, under the umbrella of the liability of the legal person may continue the criminal activities.

The problem of the criminal liability of legal persons is very sensitive in the case of the legal persons whose objects of activity are very complex, who have many employees, multiple shareholders, many executives and it cannot be approached in the same way with the situation of the companies with limited liability, where the manager and the associate are usually taken for the legal person.

Without enlarging upon the issues connected to the criminal liability of the legal persons, the opinion in the doctrine[4] is worth mentioning: the legal persons in the phase of compulsory liquidation may be held criminally liable for offences committed exclusively during this phase, for the reason that the liquidated legal persons maintain the legal capacity necessary for capitalizing goods as money and for the payment of the liabilities.

B. Legal person, a party with civil liabilities

The legal person may undergo precautionary measures with a view to the remedy of the damage resulting from the offence committed by its agent and of the judicial expenditures made during the criminal trial, when it has the quality of a party liable in the civil lawsuit.

Regulations on the tort, in a criminal trial, regarding the legal person as a party liable in the in a civil lawsuit, are to be found in the provisions of the procedural criminal and civil law.

According to art 19. Par 2 of the Criminal code procedure , the civil action in a criminal trial is exercised against the defendant and, on a case to case basis, against the party liable in a civil lawsuit.

According to art. 86 of the Criminal procedure code, a party liable in a civil lawsuit is that person who, according to the civil law, is liable to remedy, wholly or partially, single or jointly, the damages resulting from the offence.

According to art. 1373, par. 1 of the Civil code, the principal is liable to remedy the damage caused by his/her agents anytime the offence committed by the latter is connected to the attribution or to the purpose of the positions they were entrusted with, while according to par. 2 of the same article, the principal is the person who, by virtue of an agreement or by law, exercises direction, supervision and control of the person who has positions or assignments to his interest or to another person's interest.

It goes without saying that the legal person, as the party liable in the lawsuit, will be held responsible for the remedy of the damages caused by its agent only to the extent the latter committed the offence in connection with his attributions or functions he was assigned.

The principal will be held liable for the damage caused by his agent(s), according to art.1373 in the Civil code, only when the agent causes damages to a third party as a result of an illicit action outside the field of the agreement, that is tort. The principal will always be held responsible for cases when the agent committed the illicit action to his own interest or upon his request to another person's interest, within the strict limits of the attributions entrusted to him, by complying with the instructions and orders the principal gave him. The principal will also be held responsible for damages caused by the agent when the latter acted by deviation from his assignment, by exceeding his limits and even by abuse of office, if the offence committed was connected to his/her assignment or with the purpose of the entrusted position"[art.1373 par. (1) final part of the Civil code] or, if at least apparently the agent acted – when the harmful event was committed – in connection with the assignment or with the purpose of the entrusted position [art. 1373 par. (3) in the New civil Code][5].

Art 1373 par. (3) stipulates that this condition is not fulfilled and, consequently, the principal will not be held liable in case he "proves that the victim knew, as the case may be, or could know – at the moment of the harmful event was committed – that the agent acted in no relation to the assignment or with the purpose of the entrusted position"; in the New Civil code, bona fide is presumed by the law to the benefit of all the natural and legal persons until proven otherwise; thus, the principal may dispute the relative legal presumption of the victim's bona fide, proving the contrary.

In the New Civil code, the liability of a legal person, as a principal, is regarded as an objective liability, based on the idea of the principal's obligation of guaranteeing everyone's safety in connection with the activity it organizes and develops, by association with or by hiring agents, and it manages it to his own direct or indirect interest. The obligation of guarantee is sustained by the risk of activity which also includes the authority's risk, since between agents and principals there are subordination relations that give the principal the right to give orders, instructions to the agents and to supervise, guide and control them[6].

C. The legal person, third party in the criminal trial

Precautionary measures may be inflicted to legal persons, third parties in the criminal trial who own or have in custody goods that may be subject to a special or extended confiscation.

The goods stipulated by law that can be subject to special confiscation and according to art. 112 in the Criminal Code that, thus, may undergo precautionary measures, are the following:

- goods obtained by committing actions stipulated in the criminal law;
- goods that were, in any way, used or meant to be used to commit an offence stipulated by the criminal law, if they belong to the offender or if, belonging to another person, the latter knew the purpose to which they were used;
- goods used immediately after committing the offence, in order to ensure the offender's escape or keeping the profit or the product obtained by offence, if they belong to the offender or if, belonging to another person, the latter knew the purpose to which they were used;
- goods that were given to determine committing the offence stipulated by the criminal law or for rewarding the offender;
- goods acquired by committing the offence stipulated by the criminal law, if not returned to the injured person and to the extent they do not serve to the latter's remedy/compensation;
- goods whose possession or holding is forbidden by the criminal law.

The precautionary measures with a view to the special confiscation may be taken, as shown above, in most of the cases, when the legal person has the capacity of defendant (or suspect) and less in cases where it has the capacity of third party in the criminal suit. An exception is the situation in which, although a third party and owner of the goods, the legal person was aware of the purpose to which the offender used them, be they goods used to commit the offence, or goods that ensured the offender's escape or the keeping of the benefits or of the product obtained by offence. The incidence of these cases in practice is rare, since we speak about a psychological, cognitive element, that is, about the legal person's awareness of the fact that its goods are used to a certain purpose by the offender, and, in most of the times, it is hard to be proved.

As regards the extended confiscation, according to art. 112^1 in the Criminal code, this measure can be taken only if there is a decision of conviction for one of the offences mentioned by the legislation and, given their peculiarities, only certain of them can be committed by the legal person, for example: offences against the patrimony, tax evasion, violations of the customs regime, disclosure of classified economic information, unfair competitions, offences against the financial interests of the European Union.

According to art.112^1 in the Criminal code, the extended confiscation may also be decided if the value of the goods (obtained by the convicted person during the previous 5 years, and, if necessary, after the offence was committed, until the issue of the referral note) is obviously exceeding the income obtained illicitly by the convicted person and if the court has the firm belief that the goods were obtained by offences of the kind stipulated in the same judicial text.

According to art 112^1 of the Criminal code, the value of the goods transferred by the convicted person or by a third party, to a member of the family or to a legal person controlled by the convicted person will also be taken into account.

According to par. (7), money and goods obtained from the service or use of the goods confiscated as well as the goods produced by the latter, will also be confiscated[7].

At present, the measure of extended confiscation, as per criminal laws, may be taken in several cases against a legal person, as compared to the special confiscation, at least in its capacity of legal person controlled by a convicted person, but criminal laws, as conceived by the law makers, are rather vague and the law maker did not establish a procedure to be followed for determining the incomes during the 5 years before and after committing the offence, the incomes that exceed the licit amounts, as, for example, stipulates Law no. 176/2010 regarding integrity in public offices. At the same time, the too vague wording of this legal text, according to which the confiscation may be decided if the court "firmly believes" that the goods result from offences, has been received with a grain of salt. During the criminal suit, all the decisions of the court, both criminal and civil law decisions, are based only on firm proofs, on material evidence and not on presumptions and, on the other hand, the question arises if by these decisions, the law maker did not deviate from the constitutional principle of the licit acquirement of property, stipulated in art.44 par. (8) of the Constitution.

The Constitutional Court's jurisprudence states that "regulating this presumption of innocence does not impede the investigation of the illicit character of the acquirement of property, the task of presenting the proof being incumbent on the part invoking it. To the extent the interested party proves that some goods, part of, or all the property of a person was acquired illicitly, for those goods or for the property acquired illicitly, confiscation may be decided, "under the conditions stipulated by the law'. The Constitutional Court's jurisprudence also states that "regulating the presumption of innocence does not impede the primary or authorized legislator to implement the provisions of art. 148 of the Constitution – European Union integration, to adopt regulations that allow the full compliance with the legislation of the European Union in the field of fighting criminality", with direct reference to the Framework- Directive of the Council of February 24th 2005 regarding the confiscation of products, instruments and goods connected with the offence[8].

Still, due to the lack of regulations in a probation system, the lack of a procedure defining clear rules for overturning this relative legal presumption, but also appropriate procedural guarantees for the owners of goods, the legal provision regarding the extended confiscation may be regarded as an interference in the right to a private property, according to art.1 of the Protocol no.1, additional to the Convention for the defense of human rights and fundamental liberties.

The court's firm belief that the goods or money owned by the convicted person might result from offences committed before the one for which the conviction was decided, can be based only on evidence, the criminal trial being governed by the principle of finding the truth based on evidence, or speaking about previous actions that are not the subject of the pending judgement and for which, as a result, no evidence has to be produced, this firm belief cannot be but subjective, arbitrary. The arbitrary will also be found in the quantification of the sums of money that will be confiscated, in distinguishing the licit from the illicit incomes. Not very clear is also the way of establishing the sums of money transferred to the legal person controlled by the convicted person, but, most probably, the law maker had in mind the contribution/ shares within the legal person, under the form of goods or sums of money, equities or interests owned by the convicted person.

Cautiousness in applying these rules regarding the extended confiscation is even more necessary as we also speak of goods belonging to third parties that have the constitutional right to have their property rights protected. Any interference with the exercise of this right can be justified only by strong beliefs, based on material evidence, on the respect of all the procedural guarantees and of the right to defense, including the third parties, meaning that their goods, all or part of them, result from offences of the type stipulated in art.112¹ Criminal code – provisions that are also to be found in art.8 par.(8) of the 2014/42/EU Directive.

It is also important to mention that according to the Constitutional Court's decision no. 365/June 25th 201, the precautionary measures connected to the extended confiscation can be taken only for goods acquired after Law no.63/2012 took effect, while the offences should have been committed after that date.

1.2. Measures taken as a result of a final criminal judgement

If the criminal trial is over and the legal person, be it convicted, or a party liable in a lawsuit, was deemed to pay damages to the civil parties, the judiciary expenses or condemned to a criminal fine (as defendant), or if a special or extended confiscation was inflicted on the legal person, according to art 112 or 112¹ of the Criminal code, we will face certain and exigible claims in favor of common creditors or, on a case to case basis, in favor of the State. Within the insolvency procedure for legal persons, these certain and exigible claims do not differ much from the rest of the competing claims, the only difference being that they are decided by final judgement and can no longer be challenged in court. Moreover, they are not subject to the trustee's or liquidator's verification, according to art 58, par (1) let. K and art 64 let. f of Law no. 85/2014.

[7] By the decision of the Constitutional Court no. 11/2015, they found out that the dispositions under art. 1121par.. (2) letter. a) din of the Criminal Code are constitutional to the extent to which the measure of extended confiscation will not apply to assets acquired prior to coming into force of Law no.. 63/2012 on amending and supplementation of the Criminal Code of Romania and Law no.. 286/2009 on the Criminal Code.

The fact that these claims have the judicial regime of the common receivables or of tax receivables results from the provisions of the criminal procedure that regulates the way the claims are executed.

Thus, civil damages and judicial expenditures due to the parties and established by criminal judgement, will be executed according to the civil law, as stipulated in art.581 of the Criminal code procedure.

As regards the safety measures connected to the special or extended confiscation, according to art. 574 of the Criminal code procedure, the confiscated goods will be handed over to the bodies lawfully appointed to take them over or to capitalize them. If the confiscation regards sums of money that are not registered in banks, the judge appointed for the execution will send a copy of the operative part of the judgment to the tax bodies, the execution being performed according to the legal provisions on budgetary debts.

As a result, in case the criminal trial is over, the claims resulting from the final criminal judgement will be capitalized against the insolvent debtor, just like any other claims, in a collective procedure and having the priority conferred by the insolvency law.

2. Interference of safety measures with insolvency procedure

Against a legal person under the insolvency procedure they can order security measures, in the criminal trial, for the purposes already above presented. Naturally there is this question arising: what is going to happen with the assets affected by the safety measures, in relation to the ongoing insolvency procedure?

We should seek the answer in the definition given by the law in connection with establishment of the safety measures, respectively to avoid hiding, alienation or removing the assets from investigation, this is, assure the creditors' chance to obtain enforcement of the enforceable title against the debtor, at the time of delivery of the final judgment, and also in respect of the definition given by the law for the actual safety measure, and also the definition of the safety measure itself, according to art. 249 par. 2 of the Criminal code procedure, respectively preservation of movable and immovable assets by establishing a seizure on them.

Preservation of the movable or immovable assets means for the owner of the assets loss of the right to dispose of them, execute deeds on the disposition of the assets, according to the meaning of the word preservation itself.

Such preservation may not have the effect of, in principle, blocking the insolvency procedure, yet with certain nuances. To the question whether the criminal investigation can hold down the insolvency procedure, there is no simple answer: the criminal investigation cannot hold down the insolvency procedure since there is no legal disposition in this respect, yet at the same time, it does not allow the procedure to take place normally, according to the provisions of the Insolvency code.

We should point out that at this time, the criminal procedure no longer holds down the civil procedure, absolutely and unconditionally, as provided by former criminal procedure provisions.

According to the provisions of art. 27 par. (7) Criminal code procedure, when the victim of an offense decides to initiate an action before a civil court, the lawsuit before the civil court shall be suspended after initiation of the criminal action, yet solely until settlement of the criminal case by the court of first instance, and no longer than one year.

Setting aside the fact that suspending the law suit before the civil court, in carrying out the right of indemnification, may not exceed one year, and the civil law suit may continue unimpeded even when there is no final decision in the criminal procedure, we should add that , if suspending of a civil action before the civil court is grounded on the fact that the object of civil action itself is based on the damage caused by an offense, the insolvency procedure is not a civil action, and the object thereof is not to establish the claims of various creditors, which are usually preexistent, but its object is to capitalize such claims, by a collective procedure and following a certain order as provided by the law, and also set up a collective procedure in order to cover the liabilities of the debtor under the insolvency procedure.

The legal provisions in this matter make few references and definitely are not helpful in the settlement of this issue.

Thus, according to art. 75 of Law no. 85 / 2014, " starting with the date of commencement of the procedure, all judicial and extrajudicial actions or enforcement measures for establishment of the claims against the debtor's assets will be lawfully suspended. Recovery of their rights will only take place within the insolvency procedure, by filing the request for registration of the claims.

According to par. (2) , the lawful suspending provided under par. (1) will not operate for: (1) the debtor's appeals against the actions of one/several creditor/s commencing before starting of the procedure, and also the civil actions brought in the criminal trials against the debtor".

According to art. 91 of Law no. 85/2014, "(1) the assets alienated by the judiciary administrator or judiciary liquidator, in carrying out its attributes as provided under this law, are acquired free of any encumbrances, such as privileges, mortgages, pledges or detention rights, seizures, of any kind. The precautionary measures ordered in the criminal trial for the purpose of special and / or extended confiscation are excepted from this regime.

(2) By way of exception from the provisions under art. 85 par. (2) of the Civil code, removal from the land book of any encumbrances and interdictions as provided under par. (1) will be carried out in compliance with the deed of alienation signed by the judiciary administrator or judiciary liquidator."

According to art. 102 par. (8) of the Insolvency code, the claim of a damaged party in the criminal trial falls under the suspensive condition, until the final settlement of the civil action in the criminal trial in favor of the damaged party, by filing a request for registration of the claim. In case the civil action in the criminal trial is not settled until closing of the insolvency procedure, either due to the success of the reorganization plan, or the liquidation, any claims resulting from the criminal trial will be covered by the properties of the re-organized legal person or, where necessary, from the amounts obtained in the action of joint patrimonial liability of the persons having contributed to the insolvency of the legal person, in compliance with the provisions of art 169 and the subsequent ones.

The above provisions, beside the fact they do not settle the issue, are somehow contradictory.

The interpretation of the provisions under art. 75 of the Insolvency code reveals the fact that, the civil action brought in the criminal trial and the insolvency procedure are taking place at the same time, and the insolvency procedure can block any other civil actions on the establishment of claims against the debtor's property, less the civil action initiated in the criminal trial.

Upon the systematic and grammatical interpretation of the dispositions of art. 91 of the Insolvency code it results that they can sell also the assets under criminal seizure, with only one exception concerning thereof , namely they will not be sold free of encumbrances (respectively precautionary measures ordered in the criminal trials, in view of the special confiscation and extended confiscation)

The text of art. 91 of the Insolvency code is criticizable. We can see that, although art. 75 of this code seems to grant a certain protection to the potential creditor in the criminal trial, which could be the person suffering damage by the offense, in case his claim for damages is accepted, but this can be the state as well, when the special or extended confiscated is ordered, art. 91gives up the protection of the ordinary creditor and preserves solely the right of the state, maintaining solely the seizures established in view of confiscation.

Nevertheless, it is essential to retain that, by maintaining the seizure in favor of the state, even after selling the assets, the lawmaker indirectly admits that the assets can be sold prior to the completion of the criminal trial.

Thus, according to jurisprudence[9], they appreciated that, "establishment of preventive seizure will not prevent selling of the assets in the insolvency procedure, and will not affect the distribution order of claims in the procedure, the only scope of the seizure being preventing the debtor to alienate his property in detriment of creditors, for whom it might be impossible to recover the damage caused by the alleged offense imputed to the debtor.

Blocking the recovery in the insolvency procedure, similarly with blocking the enforcement, would signify non compliance with the principle of proportionality between the demands of the general interest and individual rights imperative defense.

(…). The text of art. 91 of Law 85/2014 refers to the pre-existing situation of alienating, by the judiciary administrator or judiciary liquidator of the assets under seizure, therefore the measures taken in the criminal trial are compatible with the insolvency procedure, and the assets under seizure are not overlooked. The criminal law establishes an interdiction for the suspect, accused or civilly liable party to carry out activities of voluntary disposal of the assets making the object of seizure.

In the hypothesis of the assets under pre- existing warranty, the mortgagee has priority even when there is a preventive seizure established in connection with the asset, noted prior to the mortgage, since the mortgage is a real accessory right granting its holder a pursuing right, whoever is holding it, and a preferential right in order to satisfy his claim against the other creditors (in this respect see also the Decision of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, Criminal section, no. 1392/2013)".

We consider that, in principle, the precautionary measures in the criminal trial should not block the insolvency procedure, nevertheless, when prior to the time of distributing the amounts of money resulted from the liquidation of the debtor's property the criminal trial has not been completed, at least this distribution should be postponed until obtaining an executory title. Otherwise, the persons suffering damages caused by the offense, and the state, in case of confiscation, would be definitively deprived of the right to recover their claims against the debtor, the more so as the law allows that their civil action continue against the debtor under insolvency procedure.

Conditioning the claim settlement of the civil party in the criminal trial by the decision of personal liability of the administrator or the person having contributed to the insolvency of the legal person is opposed to the provisions of art. 75 which allow continuation of the civil action in the criminal trial, since this personal liability is totally unsure, both regarding the existence and the amount thereof.

As regards the opinion expressed in practice, according to which it is impossible to sell the assets under seizures, during the insolvency procedure, taking into account that the state, following the confiscation , would be granted a preferential right, and I consider, being in agreement with the experts in the field of commercial and insolvency law, that such right cannot be granted.

[9] Resolution dated 10.02.2017 of the Court of Appeal Bucuresti, First Criminal Section, delivered on case no. 1022 / 2/ 2017.

Special confiscation and extended confiscation represent economic safety measures , having direct effects on the property regime, and representing a specific way of acquiring properties by the state, as a consequence of Court decisions, and , implicitly, a means to put out the property right of the subject, as of right, suffering this sanction.

There is no legal disposition which confers such preference to the state, the claim acquired by it being a budgetary, tax claim.

3. Preventive measures ordered during the criminal trial

As regards the preventive measures that can be ordered during the criminal investigation, and also during the Preliminary Chamber procedure, and during the trial, against the legal person; there are five measures according to art. 493 of the Criminal Procedure Code and can be ordered:

- if reasonable doubt exists that the legal person committed an action falling under the criminal law;
- solely in order to ensure the good procedure of the criminal trial.

Mention should be made that the law does not condition taking the preventive measure of the nature of the offense, or seriousness thereof, which means that theoretically, the preventive measures against legal persons can be taken for any kind of offenses, solely on the condition that they are necessary for the good performance of the criminal trial.

Unlike the preventive measures taken against natural persons, for which the criminal procedure law provides conditions relating to the seriousness of the offense, resulting from the punishment limits or enumeration of the offenses for which they can order the preventive measures (art. 223 par. 2 of the Criminal procedure code), and the offender's behavior (the defendant ran away, went into hiding, in order to avoid the trial, tried to influence finding out the truth, continued to commit offenses), conditions related to protection of public order – letting the defendant go free may endanger the public order, for the legal persons the lawmaker no longer provided such conditions, and only stipulated that preventive measures can be ordered for the good performance of the criminal trial. According to the modality of setting the conditions, we may draw the conclusion that the lawmaker was more permissive, reagrding the preventive measures against legal persons, which can sometimes lead to arbitrary measures against them and prejudices to the good performance of their activity.

We should point out that, in the case of legal persons, the legal dispositions (art. 493 of the Criminal procedure code) do not provide a maximum limit of the preventive measures, which obviously contravenes the prevention regime that applies to natural persons. Nevertheless, by Decision no. 139/2016, the Constitutional Court turned down the constitutional challenge of the dispositions of art. 493 of the Criminal procedure code, holding that " If a maximum limit up to which they can extend/maintain the preventive measures against the legal person would be set up, then the scope of the criminal action itself is denied, which is to hold the legal person liable for criminal offense, since, by allowing the dissolution, liquidation, merger or splitting thereof, the object of the criminal action, thus defined by art. 14 of the Criminal procedure code, would be left without purpose, Thus, although when the criminal trial has ended, the Court would order the punishment of the accused, this could no longer be held liable for criminal offense, since it lost its identity due to the legal disappearance thereof and removal from the Trade Registry"

Nevertheless, there is a legitimate question arising: what is happening with the activity of a legal person , the accused in a criminal trial, when certain activities thereof have been forbidden, as a preventive measure, and the criminal trial would last for several years. Although the legal person enjoys the presumption of innocence, and theoretically is innocent until being sentenced by final judgment, extended preventive measures may lead to the liquidation de facto thereof, prior to being found guilty.

3.1. Interdiction to initiate or suspend the procedure of dissolution or liquidation of the legal person

In fact, this preventive measure includes two hypothesis: first, interdiction to initiate or suspend the procedure of dissolution or liquidation of the legal person, when such procedure was not yet initiated, secondly, suspending the procedure of dissolution or liquidation, when it was already initiated.

Since the terms used are rather clear, I consider the issue refers strictly to the dissolution and liquidation, and not the insolvency procedure, which the lawmaker did not understand to forbid, as a preventive measure, specifically taking into account the declared scope of this procedure.

The reason for which the lawmaker provided this preventive measure is obvious. Any legal person suspected for having committed an offense cannot cease to exist at the time of its investigation, since not only that this would any longer hold the capacity of a legal person, and therefore the passive subject of the criminal action, but it might lose its patrimony as well, and the consequence would be the impossibility to be held liable for a criminal offense, as the case may be.

3.2. Interdiction to initiate or suspend the merger, splitting or decrease of the registered capital of the legal person, which started prior, or during the criminal investigation

The above reason also applies in the case of this preventive measure, since they are interested in preventing the risk that the legal person ceases to exist by merger with other legal person, or by absorption by other legal person, or by distributing the patrimony of the legal person terminating its activity, between two or among several legal persons that already exist, or which are established as such. The measure does not apply to a legal person under insolvency.

3.3. Forbid certain asset transactions that may cause a significant decrease of the patrimony or the insolvency of the legal person

This is the preventive measure usually taken against the legal persons in criminal trials, leading to many discussions regarding the generic character of the text.

For instance, in a criminal case on the dockets of the Court of Appeal, Bucharest[10], Second Criminal Section, concerning the appeal filed by a trading company, accused in a criminal file, against the Court resolution ruling the extension of the preventive measure of forbidding the asset transactions that may cause the decrease of the patrimony or insolvency of the legal person, for another 60 days, they had ordered against the company investigated for several tax evasion offenses, the preventive measure of forbidding the asset transactions that might cause the decrease of the patrimony or insolvency of the company, without actually specifying which asset transactions were forbidden.

The Judge of Rights and Liberties of the Court of first instance ordered this measure while he actually held by the resolution for extending the preventive measure that the company was already under the insolvency procedure, but that, there was the risk that the company assets were decreased within the general procedure of the insolvency, prior to the final settlement of the criminal trial.

As a consequence of the preventive measure ordered in the case, the company could no longer carry out any kind of activity, or any kind of operations, all the accounts thereof being blocked, and even the salaries could not be paid, on the grounds that all the company's economic and financial transactions had been forbidden.

The legal person appealed against this resolution, by the judicial administrator, who essentially, besides the argumentation on the non existence of guilt in perpetrating the acts of which the company was accused, also showed that the text of law specifically provides that solely those asset transactions that may cause the negative results provided by the law can be forbidden, and not all the economic and financial transactions, and that the legal person carries out solely the activity for which it was established, according to Law no. 31/1990, while totally forbidding the asset transactions will represent the dissolution de facto of the legal person, prior to the delivery of the solution on criminal grounds, and by the unlawful deprivation of property, and that it is impossible for the company to perform the preservation and management of the assets, and also to support the legal procedures for the recovery of the claims from its own debtors.

The Judge of Rights and Liberties of the Court, having assessed the resolution against which the appeal was filed, ruled that it did not comply with the legal demands:

"According to art. 493 par. 1 of the Criminal procedure code, the Judge of Rights and Liberties can order, if reasonable doubt exists to justify the reasonable suspicion that the legal person has committed a criminal offense as provided by the criminal law and only in order to provide a smooth operation of the criminal trial, one or several preventive measures be taken, among which forbidding certain asset transactions, that may cause the decrease of the company's patrimony/assets or the insolvency of the legal person (letter c).

According to par. 4 of the same article, the measure can be extended during the criminal investigation, and each extension may not exceed 60 days.

According to par. 5 the preventive measures shall be ordered by the Judge of Rights and Liberties by reasoned judgment; this demand being also provided by art. 203 par. 5 of the Criminal procedure code.

The Court resolution challenged in this case does not meet the prerequisite condition of its motivation, which entails consequences both legally and as regards the impossibility of controlling thereof, in this appeal. The judgment includes solely one motive, which represents the grounds for extending the measure of forbidding the transactions that may cause the decrease for the company's assets or the insolvency of legal person , respectively, "the risk continues that the company assets be decreased during the insolvency procedure prior to the final settlement of this criminal file". This sole argumentation will not cover the non-existing motivation and it is not compatible with the exceptional character of the preventive measures.

(…) The existence of the reasonable doubt that the company committed the offense provided by the criminal law is not sufficient itself to take/extend the measure, but the measure shall be taken solely to assure the good operation of the criminal trials, and this condition was not analyzed at all by the Judge of Rights and Liberties of the Court of First Instance, and no specification was given regarding the reason for which such measure was deemed necessary for the good operation of the criminal trial, and not to what extent the good operation would be prevented in the absence of this measure.

Although in the judgment it was specified that there was the risk that the assets be decreased during the insolvency procedure, the judge did not show the circumstances based on which he concluded that there was the risk of decreasing the assets, and this while preventive measures were applied to the company assets and the insolvency procedure against the company was controlled by the syndic judge.

As regards the other operations, as correctly presented by the accused person in the appeal, such operations were not individualized, since there are many categories of operations which, in either way, can decrease the assets, yet it is important to know whether they belong to the category of preservation actions, or management or disposition. Forbidding all the operations as a whole equals with the interruption of the company activity, and liquidation in fact thereof, while this is not the scope of the provisions of art. 493 of the Criminal procedure code. No actual specification of the grounds making it necessary, in the opinion of the judge of first instance, extension to the measure, non identification of the operations forbidden for the accused party, make the control of the resolution of the appeal impossible.

In this case, the argumentation of the accused was not at all examined, and the forbidden operations were not specified, and the accused party was thus faced with the impossibility of carrying out its activity any more.

At the same time, we find that the connections between the two procedures in which the accused is a party were not clarified, respectively the criminal procedure and the insolvency procedure, taking into consideration that, according to art. 46 of Law no. 86/2005, all the acts, operations and payments performed by the debtor are null except for the operations and payments authorized by the syndic judge. Therefore, it is not clear, what was allowed by the syndic judge to the debtor and what was forbidden by the judge of rights and liberties"

Consequently, in view of the above considerations, according to art. 282 par. (1) of the Criminal code procedure and art. 6 of ECHR, the Instance – Judge of Rights and Liberties admitted the appeal filed, annulled the court resolution challenged and sent the case for retrial to the same instance.

3.4. Forbid signing of certain legal acts, as established by the judicial body.

This measure is similar to the above one, referring to legal acts strictly determined, and deemed by the judicial body that might influence the proceedings of the criminal trial.

3.5. Forbid activities of the same nature as those on the occasion of which the offense was committed.

This preventive measure seeks to prevent repetition of the material criminal acts, although actually it is an ancillary punishment.

4. Conclusion

The criminal liability of the legal person in general, and of that under insolvency procedure , in particular, represent a rather complex issue, which definitely requires a more accurate regulation, especially concerning the area of confluence of the two procedures , and which, according to the law seem to be parallel although in reality they intermingle with each other and represent an inconvenience for each other.

The preventive measures that may be ordered against the legal persons need revaluation, in order they may not lead to the dissolution de facto of the legal person, prior to settlement of the guilt thereof by means of the judgment.

HEARING AS A WITNESS THE PERSON AGAINST WHOM CRIMINAL CHARGES MAY BE FILED

Mircea DAMASCHIN[*]

Abstract

In the present study we address the issue of hearing as a witness, during the criminal trial, the person against whom, when considering the evidence included in the file, a charge could be pressed for a criminal offense. Referring to this issue, it is necessary to mention that the current Romanian Code of Criminal Procedure, entered into force on 2.1.2014, introduced a new article to the previous regulation which had enshrined the witness's right against self incrimination. As we shall see, however, this new regulation does not apply to the present case. In these circumstances, the solution whereby the person against whom there are reasonable grounds for his/her participating in committing a criminal offense shall not testify as a witness arises from the case law of the European Court of Human Rights (hereinafter ECHR).

Keywords: witness, criminal charge, the right against self incrimination, the equity of the criminal procedure, the new Romanian Code of Criminal Procedure

In criminal proceedings, in order to establish the truth, witnesses' testimony represents crucial evidence, which has led some authors[1] to label the testimonial evidence in the criminal trial as proper, inevitable evidence, as it is the tool to be used in order to find out about the circumstances related to committing the offense. Similarly, in order to emphasize the importance of this type of evidence in criminal proceedings, some authors have called witnesses as 'the eyes and ears of justice'[2].

In some cases, prescribed by law or, as we shall see, resulting from the case law of ECHR, some persons may not act as witnesses during the criminal trial. As noted in the literature[3], it is not about persons who cannot act as witnesses in any criminal case, but about persons who, in particular criminal cases and in relation to specific facts or circumstances, cannot be summoned as witnesses or about persons who, in certain cases, can be heard only in relation with specific facts or circumstances. In this regard, according to art. 115 and 116 of the Romanian Code of Criminal Procedure (RCCP), the parties and the main subjects, the person unable to consciously report facts and circumstances which are actually certified as accurate, as well as the persons who must keep either secrecy or confidentiality may not be heard as witnesses in the proceedings.

The parties and the main subjects cannot be heard as witnesses, as they are directly concerned in the judgment to be passed regarding the given case. The parties and the main subjects, as stakeholders, cannot become a witness, because no one can testify in his/her own case.

Moreover, it is justified to disqualify as witnesses those individuals who are unable to consciously report facts or circumstances which are actually certified as accurate. This regulation, introduced in the Romanian criminal procedure legislation in 2014, is justified by the actual impossibility of the person concerned to tell the truth.

As for the persons who are bound to keep secrecy or confidentiality, they cannot act as witnesses in the criminal proceedings, provided the following two conditions are met:

1. it has been found that the information considered relevant for the criminal case was obtained while practicing a profession or holding an office involving the obligation of keeping secrecy or confidentiality;
2. the secrecy or the confidentiality are to be opposable to criminal judicial bodies, according to the law.

In our opinion, there is one more category that might be added, besides the already three mentioned: the persons who may be prosecuted in the respective case. In other words, which is the procedural regime of the person who is summoned to testify, considering the fact that, against this person, the criminal prosecution bodies have specific information which shows that the respective person may have taken part in committing the offenses listed in the case file?

2. Case Study

In the criminal case that resulted in undertaking this study, the Prosecutor's Office ordered the initiation of criminal proceedings for corruption, the referral to the criminal prosecution bodies being made by denunciation. The person who made the denunciation, heard as a witness, told the criminal prosecution authorities that the corruption offenses had been committed due to the complicity of a third party (hereinafter referred to as the Witness). Thus, it appears that, at the starting point of the criminal case, the prosecutor was in possession of a piece of information which might have led to allegations referring to the Witness's committing the corruption offenses. In other words, at the beginning of the criminal prosecution, this piece of information could have been considered as reasonable grounds to allow the prosecutor to assume that the Witness had participated in committing the offenses being under criminal investigation.

Later, during the criminal investigation, the prosecutor invoked the claims of the denouncer while procedures related to taking preventive measures, and while evidentiary procedures, respectively, were being conducted. Thus, in the application for a writ of execution related to strip search, vehicle search and house search, the criminal prosecution body refers to the denouncer's statement, according to which the corruption offenses were committed with the help of the Witness. The probative relevance of this piece of factual evidence comes up from the resolution of the judge for rights and liberties to allow for the search. Also, the prosecutor refers to Witness's alleged offenses of material complicity in the draft submitted to the judge for rights and liberties on remand custody for the persons accused in this case.

Thus, it can be seen that the statement of the denouncer on the Witness's alleged offenses of complicity to commit corruption offenses was provided to the criminal prosecution authorities ever since the beginning of the criminal investigation, being, subsequently, invoked while evidentiary procedures, and preventive measures, respectively, were being conducted.

Nevertheless, although invoked during the criminal investigation, these pieces of information do not corroborate other pieces of evidence presented in the case. In other words, when applying the principle of free assessment of evidence, enshrined in art. 103 para. (1) RCCP, considering the possibility for a witness's statement to be divisible, the denouncer's statements are likely to have been ignored by the criminal prosecution authorities.

In this context, the next step of the criminal prosecution proceedings taken by the criminal prosecution authorities was to hear the defendant accused of committing the offense of accepting bribe. In that statement, the defendant stated that the meeting in which the offense of corruption was committed was intermediated by the Witness. In a subsequent statement, the defendant reiterated the issues mentioned before, related to the Witness's activity of intermediating the corruption offenses.

One should note that the denouncer's statements on the Witness's offenses of complicity, given at the beginning of the criminal investigation, later invoked by the criminal prosecution authorities, corroborate the defendant's statements, accused of accepting bribe.

In this context, resulting from the evidence produced in the case, although there was enough evidence to consider the sui generis capacity of the possible participant in committing the corruption offenses, the criminal prosecution authority proceeded to hearing the alleged intermediary as a Witness. During the hearing, the Witness stated that he/she arranged the meeting between the defendants accused of corruption offenses. For this statement, the Witness was charged with the offense of perjury and criminal prosecution proceedings started herein.

3. Hearing the witness against which there is evidence opening up the possibility to press criminal charges against him/her

As far as the procedure for hearing the witness is concerned, there stands out a very interesting question related to the legality of the evidence in the criminal lawsuit, i.e. which is the manner of hearing a witness who may be criminally prosecuted in the case for which he/she is summoned? Thus, it is essential to determine which the procedural regime of the person summoned to testify as a witness is, given the fact that against this person, the criminal prosecution authorities have specific information which opens up the possibility that the respective person participated in committing the offenses listed in the case file.

Firstly, it is necessary to analyze the provisions of art. 118 RCCP, which enshrines the witness's right against self incrimination. In this sense, 'A witness's statement given by a person who had the capacity as suspect or defendant before such testimony or subsequently acquired the capacity of suspect or defendant in the same case, may not be used against them.' The legal text, though marginally called 'the right of the witness to avoid self incrimination' primarily focuses on the assumption that a person, initially heard as a witness, is subsequently charged with the offence for which he/she was heard (hence the accusation against that person refers to his/her committing an offense included in the case file, and not the offense of perjury). In this case, the initial witness statement cannot be used against the person accused, since it is an extension of the right awarded to the suspect or the defendant against self incrimination. For these reasons we consider that the provisions of art. 118 RCCP are not applicable to the specific case which led to the preparation of this study.

Secondly, provided that in the case file there is reasonable evidence[4] on the possibility of an offense by a particular person and the criminal prosecution authority does not inform this person about the criminal charge, preferring to engage him/her in criminal proceedings as a witness, legally bound to withhold nothing from what he/she knows and refrain from making false statements, thus placing him/her under the criminal rule provided for in art. 273 of the Romanian Criminal Code, the witness in this case is to choose between the following two procedural conducts:

1. either to state everything he/she knows and, thus, to contribute to his/her eventual indictment by being held criminally liable for the offense which is included in the case file,
2. or not to state what he/she knows or make false statements, thus being held criminally liable for the offense of perjury.

The thesis statement of 'the two options' described above is found in the practice of ECHR[5]. Also, this theory is present in the case law of the Supreme Court of Romania[6], in a different enunciation as 'the theory of the three difficult choices the person is faced with.' Under this thesis statement, it is not natural to require the person against whom there might be pressed a criminal charge to choose between

1. being sanctioned for his/her refusal to cooperate,
2. providing the authorities with self-incriminating information
3. lying and thus risking to be convicted for this type of conduct.

To reduce the incidence of this thesis statement, it is important to identify the answer to the following question: when will one consider that a criminal charge is likely to be pressed against a certain person?

In terms of the provisions of art. 305 para. (2) RCCP, in a criminal case, the charge shall be initiated in personam when, considering the existing data and evidence in the case, there shall result reasonable evidence that a particular person has committed the offense for which criminal proceedings have started. In this situation, the prosecutor shall order the criminal prosecution to be carried out against this person, who shall become the suspect.

In a broader interpretation of the concept of 'suspect', ECHR ruled that a person shall become the suspect not starting with the moment when he/she is informed about it, but once the judicial authorities had reasonable grounds to suspect him/her to have participated in committing a certain offense.

In this respect, in the case Brusco v. France[7], it was decided that the right to a fair trial was violated, by violating both the right against self incrimination and the right to remain silent. Thus, the complainant, suspected of having instigated somebody to commit an assault, was questioned as a witness after having taken an oath. Nevertheless, according to ECHR, he was not a simple witness, but he was in fact the subject of 'criminal charges' and, therefore, benefited from the right against self incrimination and the right to remain silent, as guaranteed by art. 6 para. (1) and (3) of the European Convention on Human Rights.

The plausible reasons which may lead the judicial authorities to conclude that a certain person participated in committing an offense are represented by data and proofs that make up the reasonable evidence about the offense being committed. So, in the case file, there should exist data and proofs that are to make up the reasonable evidence. Thus, if the evidence about the possible involvement of the Witness in committing the offense is, initially, included in the act of apprehension, and, subsequently, this information is taken over by the judicial bodies, serving as a factual basis for the issuance of procedural measures or for carrying out evidentiary activities, the prosecution may press criminal charges against the Witness. Moreover, this conclusion gets weight considering the hypothesis according to which the initial data are confirmed during the investigation by other proofs.

Given these considerations, the witness who is in the position to be indicted in connection with his/her participation in committing one of the offenses which are criminally investigated must be regarded as a suspect and, as such, he/she has the right against self incrimination, in that he/she can benefit from the right to silence.

This theory was expressly enshrined in the case law of ECHR, in the case Serves v. France[8], *i*n which this court ruled that against the autonomous nature of the concept of 'criminal charge', the witness has the right against self-incrimination as far as, by means of the statement he/she makes, he/she may contribute to his/her indictment.

A brief examination of the literature leads to the conclusion that the practice of hearing a person against whom there is evidence (reasonable grounds) for having participated in committing the offense which is the subject of the case file violates the right to a fair trial, in terms of violating the right of the person to avoid contributing to his/her indictment. In this regard, it was stated that 'what seems to be even worse is the practice of hearing the perpetrator (or person against whom there is evidence thereof, AN) as a witness'[9]. This theory is also adopted in other papers, which have analyzed the case law of ECHR, concluding that 'a person may refuse to give statements, to answer questions or to produce evidence that could self incriminate him/her (nemo debet prodere se ipsum)'[10].

In conclusion, in the theoretical, as well as the case law related background described above, if in the criminal case file there are reasonable grounds on which charges may be filed against a person, this person, summoned as a witness, has the right to remain silent on issues which might incriminate him/her. Otherwise, hearing a witness – possibly a suspect – can contribute either to self incrimination or to holding him/her criminally liable for the offense of perjury.

4. Consequences of hearing as a witness a person against whom there are reasonable grounds to press a criminal charge

To identify the right solution in such a case, we will analyze a similar possible situation. In this sense, which are the procedural consequences of hearing as a witness a person by violating that person's right to refuse to give statements as a witness and, subsequently, by indicting the respective person on charges of perjury? Specifically, we will suppose that the defendant's ex wife, summoned to give a statement as a witness, refuses to testify. For this procedural conduct, the defendant's ex-wife is indicted, under the charge of perjury. Clearly, if the factual situation described here were real, the defendant's ex-wife could not be held criminally liable, and if this process were triggered, then the criminal action would stop, being incident the case referred to in art. 16 para. (1) (d) RCCP, 'there is a justifying cause,' i.e. 'exercising a legal right.' Thus, we believe that the defendant's ex-wife could not be held criminally liable for refusing to give statements as a witness, because exercising a legal right ignored by the judicial body may not constitute a criminal offense, as it is lawful conduct, allowed by law. We appreciate that in this case we may find ourselves in another situation which may lead to reducing the ability to 'exercise a lawful right', which adds to classical assumptions, e.g. practicing a profession, trade, other occupation or sports, the hypothesis of jurisdictional immunities, respectively.

For the same reasons, we believe that the Witness who refused to give statements or failed to report to judicial bodies facts and circumstances that could have contributed to his/her own indictment and, who, based on this conduct, was indicted for the offense of perjury, has exercised a right which arises from the practice of ECHR. Consequently, the solution in this case is acquitting the defendant for the offense of perjury, based on the existence of a justifying cause.

In conclusion, if in a criminal case there are reasonable grounds on which a person may be indicted, this person, summoned as a witness, has the right to remain silent on issues that might incriminate him/her. Otherwise, hearing the witness – possibly a suspect – may contribute either to self incrimination or to the likelihood of being held criminally liable for the offense of perjury.

With specific reference to the case which served as a basis for this study, we consider that by ignoring the reasonable grounds that could have given support to the criminal charge, the Witness was deprived of the right against self incrimination. Under these circumstances, the Witness's hearing was purely formal, since the prosecutor had enough evidence to suspect him/her as a participant in committing the corruption offenses included in the case file. In the case presented, the Witness was not a simple witness, heard in connection with the facts and factual circumstances which constituted evidence in the respective criminal case. Against this witness a de facto charge was brought, about alleged complicity in corruption offenses, charge which was based on the evidence existing in the file ever since the beginning of the criminal investigation. Basically, the Witness's compliance with the procedural obligations specific for being a witness could have minimized his/her right against self incrimination.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE MATERIAL ELEMENT OF THE OBJECTIVE SIDE OF THE CRIMINAL OFFENCE OF PUBLIC ORDER AND TRANQUILITY DISTURBANCE, AS PROVIDED IN ARTICLE 371 OF THE CRIMINAL CODE

Traian DIMA[*]
Lamya - Diana HĂRĂTĂU[]

Abstract

These considerations are brought about by Decision no. 9 of 12 April 2016 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, the Panel for the settlement of matters of criminal law. The panel was called to rule on the following matter of criminal law: "whether the material element of the objective side of the criminal offence of public order and tranquility disturbance provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code needs to be directed at several individuals and whether, in the case where the action described above referred to only one person, de-criminalization operates in accordance with Article 4 of the Criminal Code."

Keywords: objective side, offence of public order and tranquility disturbance, several individual.

In settling the issue above, the decision emphasizes that, in the legal world, two opinions were manifested:

a) A majority opinion supporting that the material element of the objective side of the criminal offence of public order and tranquility disturbance, as provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code is fulfilled even if the defendant's action refers to only one individual, because it also touches on all present individuals, provided that the key requirement that the criminal offence be committed in public is fulfilled;
b) A minority opinion supporting that the material element of the objective side of the crime of public order and tranquility disturbance, as provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code, needs to be directed at several individuals, the incriminated wording including the term "individuals";

Having regard to the considerations above, the Panel decided that "the provisions of Article 371 of the Criminal Code shall be enforced, in relation to the criminal offence of public order and tranquility disturbance, in order for the criminal offence to exist, the violence, threats or severe prejudice against dignity need not be committed against several individuals, as it suffices for the violence, threats or severe prejudice against dignity, disturbing public order and tranquility, to be committed in public against a certain individual."

Having regard to the above ruling reached by the Panel of Judges, correct in our opinion, we want to nuance the variant where the severe prejudice against dignity is committed in public, against only one individual, a passive subject of the committed offence.

Public order and tranquility consists, for the members of the society, of important social values, around which social cohabitation relationships occur and develop, in the absence of which a community could not efficiently operate. In principle, social cohabitation relationships established between the members of the community and protected by the State are "habitation relationships between people and other people"[1].

The State needs to protect social cohabitation relationships because, in the absence of such protection, such relationships would be jeopardized or damaged, entailing a negative effect on the society, because the members of the community would no longer have the guarantee of their moral security.

The doctrine emphasized that "social cohabitation relationships in restrictive meaning shall mean the social cohabitation relationships requiring close, direct, frequent contact between people and whose breach result in moral suffering".[2]

The care of the Romanian law-maker to ensure a civilized social cohabitation environment, based on morality and mutual respect between the members of the society materialized in the legal field by the issuance of appropriate laws.

In Romania, the social values consisting of "public order and tranquility" are especially protected by Law No 61 of 27 September 1991 (republished) sanctioning the infringements of social cohabitation rules, public order and tranquility[3] and by the Criminal Code, Article 371, incriminating the offence of public order and tranquility disturbance.

[3] Law no. 61 of 21 September 1991 penalizing infringements of social cohabitation rules, public order and tranquility, was published in Official Gazette of Romania no. 96 of 07 February 2014.

In light of the above-mentioned laws, it follows that, depending on the degree of social jeopardy pertaining to the disturbance of public order and tranquility and on the outcome, the illicit offences in this field may amount, as the case may be, either to contravention or to criminal offence.

Thus, in accordance with Article 2 paragraph (1) item (1) of Law no. 61/1991 (republished), contravention shall be "the perpetration in a public situation of actions, obscene acts or gestures, abusive language, offensive or vulgar expressions, threats of violence against individuals or their property, likely to disturb public order and tranquility or to incite the citizens' indignation or prejudice their dignity and honor or that of public institutions."

Mention is also to be made that, in the case of the misdemeanor referred to above, in respect of the passive subject thereof, the lawmaker employs the plural number, within the meaning that the actions amounting to the material element of misdemeanor shall be able to disturb public order and tranquility or incite the citizens' indignation or prejudice their dignity and honor.

In accordance with Article 371 of the Criminal Code, the criminal offence of public order and tranquility disturbance consist of the "action of an individual who, in public, through violence committed against individuals or their assets or by threats or severe prejudice against personal dignity, disturb public order and tranquility".

As it may easily be noticed, the material element of the contravention provided for in Article 2 paragraph (1) item (1) of Law no. 61/1991 (republished) is similar to that of the offence referred to in Article 371 of the Criminal Code, but there are also differences separating the contravention from the incrimination amounting to criminal offence.

The substantial difference between the contravention referred to in Article 2 paragraph (1) item (1) of Law no. 61/1991 and the offence incriminated in Article 371 of the Criminal Code consists of the fact that, while the contravention is, in its legal configuration, a jeopardy offence, the incrimination provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code is an offence of result.

Thus, the misbehaviour provided for in Article 2 paragraph (1) item (1) of Law no. 61/1991 (republished) amounts to contravention, when, in the particular circumstances in which it was perpetrated, it is only able to disturb public order and tranquility, while the offence provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code only amounts to a criminal offence when it disturbed public order and tranquility and therefore entailed a particular outcome.

The legal provisions existing before the effective date of the New Criminal Code, when the contravention provided for in Article 2 paragraph (1) item (1) of Law no. 61/1991 (republished) was provided in Article 2 of Decree no. 153/1970, and the criminal offence was provided for in Article 321 of the previous Criminal Code, it was intended to separate the contravention from the incrimination.

In one case, the local prosecutor's office of the town of Roman, county of Bacau, decided by means of an ordinance[4] that the "offence of the individual who, under the influence, made threats against the clients of a restaurant, also breaking a glass, as a result of which the tranquility of the establishment was disturbed, is susceptible to amount to public order disturbance, as provided for in Article 321 of the Criminal Code" (previous, note added).

In the same ordinance, without correlating the offence committed by the law-maker with the contravention provided for in Article 2 of Decree no. 153/1970, the prosecutor reached the conclusion that "having ascertained that the disturbance against the tranquility of the establishment was not of significant proportions, that the perpetrator has a mental disorder, which under the influence determines violent reactions, that he had alcohol by accident that evening, being upset because of family misunderstandings, that, although he has criminal antecedents, his behavior in the society and at his work place is appropriate and that he has proven an intention to complete his training, all of the considerations above should lead to the conclusion that the misconduct does not have the social jeopardy of criminal offence and the Court shall impose an administrative nature, in accordance with Article 18^1 of the Criminal Code" (previous – note added).

In criticizing the decision of the prosecutor, the commentators of the ordinance above have emphasized that "in order to appropriately classify the offences committed by the defendant, the prosecutor should have focused on the distinctive criteria of the criminal offence of indecent exposure and public order disturbance, on the contraventions provided for in Article 2 of Decree no. 153/1970 in letter (a) ("an individual committing, in public, actions, gestures and actions or using indecent, offensive, obscene language, likely to incite citizens' indignation") and letter (d) ("causing scandal in public establishments") and, in light of the criteria above, to classify the offences either in Article 321 of the Criminal Code or in the above-mentioned sections of Decree no. 153/1970[5]."

Between the legal wording stipulating the contravention set forth in Article 2 paragraph (1) item (1) of Law no. 61/1991 and the wording of the offence incriminated under Article 371 of the Criminal Code, there are also interesting differences as regards the description of their legal content.

Thus, while the wording of Article 371 of the Criminal Code, the law-maker refers to "threats or severe prejudice against personal dignity", in the wording of the misconduct provided for in Article 2 paragraph (1) item (1) of Law no. 61/1991, the law-maker no longer uses the phrase "severe prejudice", on the other hand, it explains the manners in which personal dignity may be prejudiced, in particular: obscene acts or gestures, abusive language, offensive or vulgar expressions, all of which shall obviously be committed in public, provided that they incite the citizens' indignation or prejudicing their dignity and honor.

In comparing the two legal texts, in particular Article 2 paragraph (1) item (1) of Law no. 61/1991 and Article 371 of the Criminal Code, it is revealed that obscene acts or gestures, abusive language or offensive or vulgar expressions, in public, in order to amount to the incrimination provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code, need to have a certain intensity amounting to severe prejudice against personal dignity. In our opinion, the wording of Article 371 of the Criminal Code infers that if everything the perpetrator did could not reach a certain amplitude, causing severe prejudice against the dignity of the passive subject, the misconduct shall be qualified as contravention, and not criminal offence. For instance, if the offence consisted of a mere curse or the tendentious reference to a physical flaw of the passive subject, it shall not meet the constituent elements of the criminal offence provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code.

In terms of structure of the constituent content, the offence of public order and tranquility disturbance, as provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code has an alternative content, as it may be committed as follows:

a) by violence committed against individuals or assets; this is the case most dealt with in court practice;
b) by threats or severe prejudice against personal dignity.

In both regulated methods (a+b), in order to amount to a criminal offence, the action shall be committed in public and disturb public order and tranquility.

In reference to the regulated method specified under letter (a), committed in public, irrespective of whether the offence is committed by several individuals or only one, the offence shall always fall under the incrimination provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code, and not contravention, because it reaches an intensity whereby it becomes able to disturb public order and tranquility and hinder the social security environment.

The doctrine emphasized that "public order is a feature of normal social life, where the relationships between people are conducted in a peaceful manner under conditions of mutual respect, personal security of trust in the behavior and actions of others. Public order and tranquility is disturbed when immoral manifestations or behaviors take place in public, when scandal occurs, when people face the risk of being subject to physical or language violence"[6].

As indicated in the beginning of the paper, the Panel for the settlement of matters of criminal law decided that the incrimination referred to in Article 371 of the Criminal Code persists even when the threats or severe prejudice against dignity, disturbing public order and tranquility are committed against only one individual. In connection with this assertions, several clarifications are in order.

As regards the offence of public order and tranquility disturbance, as regulated in the new Criminal Code in the manner of "threats or severe prejudice against personal dignity", the question arises whether the perpetration of threats, acts, gestures, or the use of indecent, offensive, obscene expressions against only one individual (passive subject) in public, in a location where, by its nature or intended purpose, is accessible to public, however, no one is present, satisfies the constituent content of the incrimination provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code.

In the court practice preceding the effective date of the New Civil Code, it was decided that the "offence of having an irreverent behavior against an individual who reprimanded the perpetrator because he was singing with others in front of a residential building and plunging his fist against the other's face, causing injury, requiring 12 days' of medical care, does not amount to the criminal offence of indecent exposure and public order disturbance"[7]. The same court practice preceding the effective date of the New Criminal Code decided that the "content of the criminal offence provided for Article 321 of the Criminal Code (previous – note added) is not satisfied as regards the offence of an individual who, after asking permission of the train attendant, enters a 1st class compartment, where he knew there was an individual against whom he had dissatisfaction and uttered offensive words against the latter, also assaulting him"[8].

The doctrine contends that, in case of the offences provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code, what is relevant for incrimination is not the number of individuals touched by the author's actions, but the disturbance of public order and tranquility by means of the behavior committed in public and having such characteristics (violence against individuals, violence against assets, threats or severe prejudice against personal dignity)"[9].

[9] S. Bogdan, D.A. Serban, D. Zlati, The New Criminal Code, special section – Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p. 716.

The above assertion is accurate, within the meaning that the violence perpetrated in public, even against only one individual or only one asset, meets the constituent elements of the incrimination provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code, however, in our opinion, in dealing with threats or severe prejudice against dignity, the number of individuals against which they are performed also matters.

We believe that the threats or severe prejudice against the dignity of only one individual, when committed in public, without any other people in attendance, meet the constituent elements of the misconduct provided for in Article 2 paragraph (1) item (1) of Law no. 61/1991 (thus a contravention) and not of the incrimination provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code.

In differentiating the above-mentioned contravention from the offence provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code, a decisive element shall be whether public order and tranquility was indeed disturbed. If the offences consisting of threats or severe prejudice against dignity resulted in the disturbance of public order and tranquility, then we are dealing with the incrimination provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code, and if the actions were merely likely to disturb public order and tranquility, without actually disturbing it, then we are dealing with the contravention provided for in Article 2 paragraph (1) item (1) of Law no. 61/1991 (republished).

The criterion of whether public order and tranquility has been disturbed or not is decisive in differentiating the contravention from the criminal offence.

Both the criminal law, and Law no. 61/1991 (republished) do not define the meaning of "public order and tranquility disturbance". In its case law, the former Supreme Tribunal deemed that, in order to rule in favor of the existence of public order disturbance, it is required to examine, in reliance upon the evidence submitted, whether the actions committed by the defendant were likely or not to induce strong indignation and disavowal both in the social environment immediately impacted by the perpetration of the offence, and outside it[10].

Considering that the interpretation of "public order disturbance", the extent to which the objective side of the offence provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code, in the method of "threats or severe prejudice against dignity" is satisfied should be ascertained, where they are perpetrated in public against only one passive subject, without any other people in attendance. In our opinion, in such a case, the misconduct shall amount to contravention and not criminal offence, because it does not have the intensity required to cause the disturbance of public order and tranquility, insofar as there was no indignation and disavowal by members of the society and there is no increased social jeopardy by the perpetrator.

In the case where the "threats or severe prejudice against dignity" are directed against more than one passive subjects, at the same time and upon the same occasion, in public, without any other people in attendance, we believe that the outcome stipulated by law is caused, in particular, disturbance of public order and tranquility, and the action shall amount to a criminal offence, as the perpetrator proves a higher degree of social jeopardy.

Older court practice also decided that the "stalking, approaching and hitting without any reason, in the street, two individuals, shall amount to a conduct prejudicing good morals"[11].

Conclusion

In our opinion, in order for the misconduct to fall under the scope of the incrimination provided for in Article 371 of the Criminal Code, in the variant of the objective side – "threats or severe prejudice against dignity" – it needs to be directed against more than one passive subjects, because this is the only instance in which the offence has the required intensity for disturbing public order and tranquility.

COMPARATIVE STUDY ON THE RIGHT TO HEALTH CARE SYSTEM PRISON LAW INTENDED TO ROMANIAN NATIONAL HEALTH LAW

Florentina Laurenţia GĂIŞTEANU*

Abstract

Health protection represents a protection measure for persons being a guaranteed right in Romania provided by the 34 Article of Romanian Constitution. The state is liable for taking measures of protecting physical and mental health, both for free persons and for those persons serving custodial measures.
Starting from the Recommendation of the Committee of Ministers of the Member States relating to the European Prison Rules Rec (2006) 2, which provides in paragraph 2 of subparagraph 40 – "The organization of health care in prisons"- that health policy from prison will be integrated in national health policy, being compatible with that. That comparative study aims at the implementation of European's recommendations in different medical specialty areas.
During this presentation are highlighted identical or different provisions stipulated in the relevant legislation of both two health systems, concluding that in certain areas of prison system, the state provides extra healthcare legislation.
Comparative study between the right of medical assistance provided by Romanian Prison Legislation and the right of medical assistance provided by Romanian National Health Care System.

1. Introduction

Staying healthy is one of the fundamental rights of every person, regardless of race, nationality, religion, gender, sexual orientation, age or social origin.

The World Health Organization has provided since 1946 the definition of health as,, the good functioning of the body[1]", requiring each state acceptance of amendments provided for by the Constitution of the World Health Organization, the right to protection health.

In Romania, right of health protection is a measure of protection a person is a right guaranteed, provided by the Article 34 of the Constitution, the rule criminalizing and penalizing any infringements on public health[2].

Also, this law is regulated and in legal norms adopted by Parliament (Law), Government (ordinances, resolutions) and other public institutions that provide the organization and functioning of the health system and the conditions for granting medical assistance (orders, decisions).

With a view to ensuring exerting effective right to health care to citizens of Romania and those who are separated from society for a time imposed a consequence of committing a crime, the State has adopted legal provisions regarding the right to care for persons deprived of liberty under the criminal sanctions enforcement regulations.

The living environment of the prison system is recognized as one with specific medical needs. The aggressive behavior of some detainees, precarious sanitary educatio among them, increased risk of sexual trasnmision disease, poor state of prison conditions in some penitentiaries are factors conditioning the maintenance and health protection of persons deprived of their liberty[3].

Recognise that medical assistance in prisons is important for public health in general has been stipulated in the Council of Europe recommendations on "European Prison Rules" and health policy in Romania had to regulate legal standards for providing medical assistance to private persons freedom, creating for the prison system an own health network that is similar to the public.

National Prison Administration is a public service responsible with the implementation of the detention regimes and ensuring recuperative interventions, but under conditions that guarantee respect for human dignity, helping ensure all necessary rights[4].

Lately, Romanian prison system has faced numerous interpretations concerning about organization and functioning of the healthcare system from the institutions/organizations for human rights, the media and the European Court on Human Rights (ECHR).

We live in a society constantly changing and with its evolution we are witnessing a change in perception of the role of the prison service in the community.

Frequently the cases reported by the media on the prison system are focused on presenting inducing flaws of this system induceing in society, a negative image. Communication with all relevant community, transparency decisions and actions with significant impact on the prison system and improve the organizational functioning of this segment are essential for a true penitentiary administration system[5].

The proposed study concerns from the need to highlight the legal provisions developed by the prison system and aims to remove first the concept of division between the two health systems and demonstrate that in terms of regulatory health policy in prison is organized in accordance with national health policy.

2. Text content

No doubt over Romania developments, manner of delivering health faced many legislative health reform last being represented by Law no.95 of 2006 Republished. According to the normative act invoked sure patients are divided into social health insurance and uninsured.

Health insurance is the main system of health care financing that ensures access to a basic package for sure[6].

The objectives of the social health insurance system are: protecting policyholders with respect to medical costs in case of illness or accident and protect universally insured, fair and non-discriminatory in terms of efficient use of the single fund health insurance[7].

Article 221 of the Law no.95/2006  Republished on healthcare reform provides in para. (1) d) that people are not proof of being insured is not ensured only a minimal package of services that includes health care services, medications and medical supplies only if surgical emergencies and illnesses potentially endemoepidemic, monitoring of pregnancy and child wife, family planning, prevention and care services to community healthcare.

Due to the fact that the right to health care of inmates is a right guaranteed legislature has provided that inmates should have the status of people insured and not uninsured, but with payment of the contribution from other sources, a fact stated in letter c) para. 2, art. 224 of Law no. 95/2006  Republished on health reform.

„Are insured persons involved in one of these situations, the duration, the payment of the contribution from other sources, according to this law: a sentence of imprisonment, are under house arrest or in custody and those enforcement measures referred to in art. 109, 110, 124 and 125 of the Criminal Code, as amended and supplemented, which is the period of deferment or interruption of sentence of imprisonment, unless they have income."[8].

Transposition of the aforementioned regulation, legislation is given in the Criminal Execution provisions of the Order of the Minister of Justice and Minister of Health no.429 / C 125/2012 on healthcare insurance of detainees in the custody of the National Penitentiary Administration.

Inmates are secured with payment of contribution for health insurance from the state budget through special purpose amounts by National Administration of Penitentiaries budget. „Following these issues, health service costs are paid by the prison unit from the funds available to them. Because the health insurance applies to all prisoners, regardless of their financial situation, resulting consequently that those who, when they were free and not beeing insured, for various reasons, will benefit from health insurance under and in accordance with law.

The process of granting prophylactic and curative healthcare in Romania are represented by the three important levels: primary care (family medicine), specialist outpatient care and hospital care.

Law no.95 / 2006 - Art. 30

(1) preventive and curative health care is ensured through:

a) outpatient medical offices of family physicians and other specialties, diagnostic and treatment centers, medical centers, health centers, laboratories and by other public and private hospitals;

b) public and private hospitals with beds.,,

In order to ensure quality medical care, at least equivalent to the health network public after 2000 prison system has entered into contract with home health insurance (CASAOPSNAJ) and primary healthcare (medical cabinets unit). At that time, entry into contract with CASAOPSNAJ aimed at relieving the Directorate General of Prisons, major financial efforts on providing medical assistance, especially since that legal norms that Law No.23 / 1969 on the enforcement of sentences, require that healthcare to be provided with funds from the state budget.

For understanding the concept of primary healthcare medical specify the following terms and definitions according to Law no. Republished 95/2006 on health reform.

f) family medicine cabinet - private health unit specializes in providing medical services in primary care, organized under the law.

Exceptionally, ministries and institutions with own health network may establish the structure of family medicine cabinets, as public health units;,,

I mention that on 28 April 2006 when Law no.95 take effect, in Article 60 it makes no reference about the establishment of family medicine cabinets for ministries and institutions with own health network. However, to support the work of medical and other institutions including the prison system since 2008, from the legislator courtesy was promulgated Government Emergency Ordinance (OUG) no. 93/2008, which amended article 60 paragraph f) at that time for the purposes of establishing by exception, as public health units, family medicine cabinets and for ministries and institutions with own health network.

Following this, national health policy for integration into the prison system has developed legal rules with references to primary health care organization, raised by Decision no. 1897/2006 approving the Regulation implementing Law No. 275/2006 on execution of punishments and measures ordered by the court in criminal proceedings[9] thereafter Decision no. 157/2016 approving the Regulation implementing Law No. 254/2013 on execution of punishments and measures ordered by the court in criminal proceedings[10] and Order of the Minister of Justice and Minister of Health no.429 / C 125/2012 onhealthcare insurance of detainees in the custody of National Administration of Penitentiaries[11].

I mention that for countries like Germany, Norway, Northern Ireland, Holland, Denmark, Latvia, Lithuania, health care is provided entirely by the state budget.

Currently, the difference between nationally family medical care and the penitentiary system is more practical because in 90% of cases, detainees invoke the law enforcement - Article 71 of Law no.254 / 2013 which states that:

Art.71

,,(1) The right to healthcare, treatment and care of sentenced persons is guaranteed without discrimination as regards their legal situation. Right to healthcare includes medical intervention, primary care, emergency care and specialized medical assistance. The right to treatment includes both health care and terminal care.

(2) Health care, treatment and care in prisons shall, trained staff, free of charge, by law, on demand or whenever necessary.

application[12], which may be granted both in outpatient specialist for the prison system and in outpatient specialized health centers profile public or private homes under contracts with health insurance.

The provision of specialized medical care is contained in Article 155 of Decision no. 157/2016 approving the Regulation for enforcement Law no.254/2013 on execution of punishments and measures ordered by the court in criminal proceedings and Article 37 of the Order of the Minister of Justice and Minister of Health no.429/C-125/2012 on healthcare insurance detainees in custody National administration of Penitentiaries.

The vast majority of investigations recommended in the specialized clinic (ex.computer Scanner (CT), magnetic resonance imaging (MRI)) which are need to be made, many times against cost, in order that the detained person to benefit from making swift them, and not wait for a possible appointment to a date too far removed from the time the recommendation shall be borne by the prison units.

Dental Healthcare

Public health network in over 90% of dental offices are organized privately. Even if there are legal provisions for granting conditions of the minimal basic package of health services in outpatient specialist dentistry (Annex 14 of the Order of the National Health Insurance nr.763 / 2016), the vast majority of dental offices are not in contract with the health insurance fund, so that Romanian citizens even if their insured status, receive dental services only against payment.

In the prison system according to law, stipulated in executional-criminal legislation, detainee persons have secured the services of basic dental, free, and in case of making a dental prosthesis, national house health insurance covers a percentage of 60% and the detained person, if it has cash funds, a percentage of 40%, representing personal contribution. If the detained person lacks the funds to cover his personal contribution, prison unit is forced to cover the person deprived of liberty.

(6) If the prosthetic treatment is necessary due to an accident when due in connection with the work that was assigned to the detained person or the fault of proven employees of the National Administration of Penitentiaries, consideration therefor shall be,, unit covered by the budget.,,

In the case of dental medical care for inmates, European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) ruled against Romania judgment of violation of Art. 3 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, retaining as maltreatment cases of delays in providing dentures to certain prisoners who lacked funds and penitentiaries had not provided funds to cover personal contribution to the detained person. (Fane Ciobanu against Romania no 27.240/03/2012).

Hospital care

Hospital care for inmates in prisons is performed inpatient hospital and other hospitals of similar homes under contracts with health insurance[13].

Law no. 254/2013 on execution of punishments and measures ordered by the court in criminal proceedings within prisons-hospital Art.12 par. (2) c) as special prisons.

First of all the operation of prison-hospital is primarily and necessary operation of the prison system, which is consistent with the provisions of the Standard Minimum Rules of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which states: "The medical care were paramount and detainees' health should be a priority in jail. The level of health care in prison and medication must be at least equivalent to those of society."

Prisons-hospital are in contract with the health insurance fund (CASAOPSNAJ) empower funds for hospital services provided to inmates, relieving the budget of the National Administration of Penitentiaries of the major financial efforts on healthcare insurance.

So far the health reform law (Law no.95 / 2006) failed to integrate the specificities prison-hospital, they are often required to apply rules that conflict with execution - criminal practice. Following these aspects prison hospital they were considered as any hospital unit in the public system is obliged to secure funding in the first laugh from their own income as required by Article 11 para. (8) of Decision no.756/2016 organization, functioning and powers of the National Penitentiary Administration and the amendment of the Government Decision nr.652 / 2009 on the organization and functioning of the Ministry of Justice.

„(8) Prisons-hospital are providing special prisons, law, medical services under the specific conditions of the prison system. Prisons hospital are funded entirely from own revenues through social health insurance system and other own revenue; they may receive money from the state budget under the law„

It must be emphasized that the organization of prison-hospital may not be similar to any hospital unit in the public system or in the system of defense and public order, their work entails obviously a special specific, given the nature of the disease, the risk posed to the staff, specific modalities of action, guard and escort. Regarding financing regime it certainly can not be like other establishments of public health or those of the defense system, as these special prisons do not provide health services surcharge for other people outside the prison system.

Applying the same hospital for prisons specific funding regime in the public hospitals, while the legal status and scope of activity is totally different, which created over time problems financing and operation of these units.

3. Conclusions

Specifics of healthcare in the prison system imposed adapting and harmonization of all regulations which relate both to the execution of sentences and the health care.

A comparative analysis of legal norms underpinning of the right to health care in the prison system to the public health network, health policy highlights that the prison system has made significant progress in recent years. As measures to improve the regulatory framework is necessary for the public health system to accept the specifics of the particular peculiarities prison hospital and to integrate these units in health reform legislation.

FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND VIOLENCE AGAINST JOURNALISTS

Radu Florin GEAMĂNU*

Abstract

This study will contain an analysys on the international and regional standards in the field of freedom of expression, as stipulated in the United Nations conventions and in the European Convention of Human Rights.
Further we will establish a link between the breach of the freedom of expression when cases of violence against journalists arise, especially tackling the impunity problem.
The paper will focus on the study of the ECtHR judgements regarding freedom of expression and cases of violence against journalists. Also, we will address the recent recommendations at the Council of Europe level.
Concluding, the study will attempt to express some reccommendations in solving the problem of violence against journalists.

Keywords: freedom of expression; journalists; violence; United Nations; Council of Europe; ECHR.

1. Introduction

Freedom of expression can take many forms, encompassing verbal, artistic, and pshycal expression. Freedom of opinion and expression is the cornerstone of any democratic society. However, it is a freedom which, as history attests, has been, and is, compromised in a number of States[1].

The right to freedom of expression, guaranteed both at international level (Universal Declaration of Human Rights, International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights) and regional level (Convention for the Protection of Human Rights), constitutes one of the essentials in a democratic society, ensuring, amongst others, the sound information of the citizens and, if proper implemented, an effective functioning of the rule of law.

So, from this perspective, safeguarding freedom of expression has an even more importance when coupled with the necessity to safeguard the integrity of the jurnalists and to protect them from cases of violence.

Of course, given the expansion of internet-based information, when referring to journalists, one should have in mind a larger interpretation of the notion, rather than the stricto sensu one. Thus, the term 'journalists' will include media workers and social media producers who produce significant amounts of public-interest journalism.

At Council of Europe (CoE) level, the term 'journalist' means any natural or legal person who is regularly or professionally engaged in the collection and dissemination of information to the public via any means of mass communication[2].

Also, ongoing technological developments have transformed the traditional media environment, as described, inter alia, in CM/Rec(2011)7 on a new notion of media[3], leading to new conceptions of media and new understandings of the evolving media ecosystem. Advances in information and communication technologies have made it easier for an increasingly broad and diverse range of actors to participate in public debate. Consequently, the European Court of Human Rights has repeatedly recognised that individuals, civil society organisations, whistle-blowers and academics, in addition to professional journalists and media, can all make valuable contributions to public debate, thereby playing a role similar or equivalent to that traditionally played by the institutionalised media and professional journalists[4].

2. Freedom of expression

2.1.International level

At international level, freedom of expression is provided for in art. 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948), which states that everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers. Similarry, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966) provides, in article 19 para.2 and 3, that everyone shall have the right to freedom of expression; this right shall include freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas of all kinds, regardless of frontiers, either orally, in writing or in print, in the form of art, or through any other media of his choice. The exercise of the rights provided for in paragraph 2 of this article carries with it special duties and responsibilities. It may therefore be subject to certain restrictions, but these shall only be such as are provided by law and are necessary: (a) For respect of the rights or reputations of others; (b) For the protection of national security or of public order (ordre public), or of public health or morals.

2.2. Regional level

At regional level, freedom of expression is regulated in art. 10 from the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights (ECHR):

1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. This Article shall not prevent States from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises.

2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.

In an impressive amount of judgments the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) has found that the national level of protection of the right to freedom of expression, media freedom and rights of journalists does not meet the requirements of Article 10 ECHR. The Court's case law has emphasized that freedom of expression constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and one of the basic conditions for its progress and for each individual's self-fulfilment, while restrictions and sanctions need a relevant, pertinent and sufficient motivation. An interference with free speech and media freedom can only be justified if there is a pressing social need and insofar as the interference is proportionate to the aim pursued[5].

Any interference with the right to freedom of expression of journalists and other media actors therefore has societal repercussions as it is also an interference with the right of others to receive information and ideas and an interference with public debate[6].

In a democratic system, the acts or omissions of government must be subject to the close scrutiny not only of the legislative and judicial authorities but also of the media and public opinion. The interest which the public may have in particular information can sometimes be so strong as to override even a legally imposed duty of confidence[7].

In Bucur and Toma v. Romania the Court considered that the general interest in the disclosure of information revealing illegal activities within the Romanian Intelligence Services (RIS) was so important in a democratic society that it prevailed over the interest in maintaining public confidence in that institution. The Court observed that the information about the illegal telecommunication surveillance of journalists, politicians and business men that had been disclosed to the press affected the democratic foundations of the State. Hence it concerned very important issues for the political debate in a democratic society, in which public opinion had a legitimate interest. The fact that the data and information at issue were classified as 'ultra-secret' was not a sufficient reason in this case to interfere with the whistleblower's right to divulge the information. The conviction of Bucur for the disclosure of information to the media about the illegal activities of RIS was considered as a violation of Article 10 ECHR[8].

2.4. Restrictions

It was noted that at first sight it is remarkable that precifically with respect to the right to freedom of expression, to which Western democracies attach such great value, the restrictions are formulated more broadly than with respect to other rights and freedoms. However, in practice this broad formulation is of little impact[9].

Subject to paragraph 2 of Article 10 [of the European Convention on Human Rights], it is applicable not only to 'information' or 'ideas' that are favorably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offend, shock or disturb the State or any sector of the population. Such are the demands of that pluralism, tolerance and broadmindedness without which there is no 'democratic society'[10].

Tolerance and respect for the equal dignity of all human beings constitute the foundations of a democratic, pluralistic society. That being so, as a matter of principle it may be considered necessary in certain democratic societies to sanction or even prevent all forms of expression which spread, incite, promote or justify hatred based on intolerance (…), provided that any 'formalities', 'conditions', 'restrictions' or 'penalties' imposed are proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued[11].

Note should be made that, the essential function of the press is always taken into account when an assessment is made whether in the given situation a restiriction of the freedom of expression is permissible or not[12].

Interference by public authority in exercising the rights provided for in Article 10 will only be valid and legal if it meets the requirements of paragraph 2 of Article 10: such interference was prescribed by law, motivated by one or more of the legitimate aims set out in that paragraph, and necessary in a democratic society.

Concluding there are 3 main conditions that have to be met in order to meet the requirements of paragraph 2 of Article 10:

- A measure is prescribed by the law if it has, both, basis in domestic law and the national law, and it has a certain quality, meaning that it must be accessible to the person concerned and foreseeable as to its effects[13].
- The interference must purse a legitimate aim which justifies the interference with its rights.
- Finally, the interference must be *necessary in a democratic society. As set forth in Article 10, this freedom is subject to exceptions. Such exceptions must, however, be construed strictly, and the need for any restrictions must be established convincingly, particularly where the nature of the speech is political rather than commercial. The Court's task, in exercising its supervisory jurisdiction, is not to take the place of the competent national authorities but rather to review under Article 10 the decisions they delivered pursuant to their power of appreciation. This does not mean that the supervision is limited to ascertaining whether the respondent State exercised its discretion reasonably, carefully and in good faith; what the Court has to do is to look at the interference complained of in the light of the case as a whole and determine whether it was "proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued" and whether the reasons adduced by the national authorities to justify it are "relevant and sufficient". In doing so, the Court has to satisfy itself that the national authorities applied standards which were in conformity with the principles embodied in Article 10 and, moreover, that they relied on an acceptable assessment of the relevant facts[14].

3. Violence against journalists and the 'chilling' effect

Journalists play a particularly prominent role in society: when they are threatened, attacked or killed, information flows shrink and entire communities are cowed. Citizens are deprived of the necessary information to develop their own opinions and take informed decisions about their lives and development[15].

The safety of journalists and the struggle against impunity for their killers are essential to preserve the fundamental right to freedom of expression, guaranteed by Article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Freedom of expression is an individual right, for which no one should be killed, but it is also a collective right, which empowers populations through facilitating dialogue, participation and democracy, and thereby makes autonomous and sustainable development possible[16].

In July 2011, article 19 was the subject of the General Comment 34 by the Human Rights Committee, which stated that States parties should put in place effective measures to protect against attacks aimed at silencing those exercising their right to freedom of expression. Paragraph 3 may never be invoked as a justification for the muzzling of any advocacy of multi-party democracy, democratic tenets and human rights. Nor, under any circumstance, can an attack on a person, because of the exercise of his or her freedom of opinion or expression, including such forms of attack as arbitrary arrest, torture, threats to life and killing, be compatible with article 19. Journalists are frequently subjected to such threats, intimidation and attacks because of their activities. So too are persons who engage in the gathering and an alysis of information on the human rights situation and who publish human rights-related reports, including judges and lawyers. All such attacks should be vigorously investigated in a timely fashion, and the perpetrators prosecuted, and the victims, or, in the case of killings, their representatives, be in receipt of appropriate forms of redress[17].

Also, Resolution 29[18] condemns violence against journalists and calls upon its Member States to uphold their obligation to prevent, investigate, prosecute and sentence those which are commiting crimes against journalists. More to the point, the legislation must provide that the persons responsible for offences against journalists discharging their professional duties or the media must be judged by civil and/or ordinary courts and that there should be no statute of limitations for crimes against persons when these are perpetrated to prevent the exercise of freedom of information and expression or when their purpose is the obstruction of justice[19].

Moreover, Human Rights Council condemned in the strongest terms all attacks and violence against journalists and expressed its concern that there was a growing threat to the safety of journalists posed by non-State actors[20].

While recognizing that investigating crimes against journalists remains the responsibility of Member States, the acts of violence and intimidation (including murder, abduction, hostage taking, harassment, intimidation and illegal arrest and detention) are becoming ever more frequent in a variety of contexts. Notably, the threat posed by non-state actors such as terrorist organizations and criminal enterprises is growing. This merits a careful, context sensitive consideration of the differing needs of journalists in conflict and non-conflict zones, as well as of the different legal instruments available to ensure their protection[21].

Impunity has remained the predominant trend, with few perpetrators of killings or attacks against journalists being brought to justice. Impunity refers to the effect of exemption from punishment of those who commit a crime. It thus points to a potential failure of judicial systems as well as the creation of an environment in which crimes against freedom of expression go unpunished, posing a serious threat to freedom of expression. The practice and expectation of impunity may further encourage violations of numerous human rights besides freedom of expression and press freedom, while also encouraging other forms of criminality. Physically silencing criticism, arbitrary arrests and detention, enforced disappearance, harassment and intimidation have often been aimed at silencing not only journalists, but also intimidating a population towards self-censorship[22].

In other words, impunity remains one of the greatest challenges to the safety of journalists around the world. As violence against and harassment of journalists goes unpunished, the problem persists and even increases. However, if real legal consequences exist, perpetrators may think twice before committing such acts. The problem of impunity for crimes committed against journalists is acute and enduring, and it must be addressed by all stakeholders - especially government and state representatives – in order to have any hope of resolution[23].

The safety of journalists and question of avoiding impunity for acts of violence against them interacts, also, with other relevant provisions from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, such as: the right to life (Article 2), the prohibition of torture (Article 3), the right to liberty and security (Article 5), the right to a fair trial (Article 6), no punishment without law (Article 7) and the right to an effective remedy (Article 13).

3.2. Regional level

It is alarming and unacceptable that journalists and other media actors in Europe are increasingly being threatened, harassed, subjected to surveillance, intimidated, arbitrarily deprived of their liberty, physically attacked, tortured and even killed because of their investigative work, opinions or reporting, particularly when their work focuses on the misuse of power, corruption, human rights violations, criminal activities, terrorism and fundamentalism. These abuses and crimes have been extensively documented in authoritative reports published by the media, non-governmental organisations and human rights defenders[24].

Protection of journalism and safety of journalists and other media actors must be organized into four pillars: prevention, protection, prosecution (including a specific focus on impunity) and promotion of information, education and awareness-raising:

- Prevention: Member States should put in place a comprehensive legislative framework that enables journalists and other media actors to contribute to public debate effectively and without fear. The legislative framework, including criminal law provisions dealing with the protection of the physical and moral integrity of the person, should be implemented in an effective manner, including through administrative mechanisms and by recognising the particular roles of journalists and other media actors in a democratic society[25].
- Protection: Legislation criminalising violence against journalists should be backed up by law enforcement machinery and redress mechanisms for victims (and their families) that are effective in practice. Clear and adequate provision should be made for effective injunctive and precautionary forms of interim protection for those who face threats of violence. State authorities have a duty to prevent or suppress offences against individuals when they know, or should have known, of the existence of a real and immediate risk to the life or physical integrity of these individuals from the criminal acts of a third party and to take measures within the scope of their powers which, judged reasonably, might be expected to avoid that risk. State officials and public figures should not undermine or attack the integrity of journalists and other media actors, nor should they require, coerce or pressurise, by way of violence, threats, financial penalties or inducements or other measures, journalists and other media actors to derogate from accepted journalistic standards and professional ethics by engaging in the dissemination of propaganda or disinformation. State officials and public figures should publicly and unequivocally condemn all instances of threats and violence against journalists and other media actors, irrespective of the source of those threats and acts of violence [26].
- Prosecution: Investigations must be effective in the sense that they are capable of leading to the establishment of the facts as well as the identification and eventually, if appropriate, punishment of those responsible. The authorities must take every reasonable step to collect all the evidence concerning the incident. The conclusions of the investigation must be based on thorough, objective and impartial analysis of all the relevant elements, including the establishment of whether there is a connection between the threats and violence against journalists and other media actors and the exercise of journalistic activities or contributing in similar ways to public debate. For an investigation to be effective, the persons responsible for, and who are carrying out, the investigation must be independent and impartial, in law and in practice. Any person or institution implicated in any way with a case must be excluded from any role in investigating it. Moreover, investigations should be carried out by specialised, designated units of relevant State authorities in which officials have been given adequate training in international human rights norms and safeguards[27].
- Promotion of information, education and awareness raising on the issue of violence against journalists is extremely important, as it is aimed at underlining the necessity to respect the freedom of expression. Also, training programmes should be organized, as well as putting in place a platform for cooperation between public institutions and civil society.

Regarding the impunity problem, it should be stated firmly that impunity represents the general failure of the functions of government and the rule of law.

In recent years a large number of cases of killings and attacks on journalists remain unsolved. The low rate of successful prosecution in cases involving journalists is in contrast with the much higher conviction rate recorded in cases of violent crime where the victim is a nonjournalist[28].

Impunity is a serious barrier to safeguarding a free press. The failure to properly investigate and prosecute crimes against journalists needs to be urgently addressed. By effectively prosecuting criminals, governments can decrease the number of future attacks[29].

In order for an investigation to be effective, it should respect the following essential requirements: adequacy, thoroughness, impartiality and independence, promptness and public scrutiny[30].

[30] CoE, Committee of Ministers, Guidelines of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on eradicating impunity for serious human rights violations.

When it occurs, impunity is caused or facilitated notably by the lack of diligent reaction of institutions or state agents to serious human rights violations (e.g. in relation with art. 2, 3, 4, 5 paragraph 1, 8 of the Convention). In these circumstances, faults might be observed within state institutions, as well as at each stage of the judicial or administrative proceedings[31].

Combating impunity requires that there be an effective investigation in cases of serious human rights violations, whether committed by state agents or private persons. This duty has an absolute character[32].

Where an arguable claim is made, or the authorities have reasonable grounds to suspect that a serious human rights violation has occurred, the authorities must commence an investigation on their own initiative. Although there is no right guaranteeing the prosecution or conviction of a particular person, prosecuting authorities must, where the facts warrant this, take the necessary steps to bring those who have committed serious human rights violations to justice. A decision either to refuse to initiate or to terminate investigations may be taken only by an independent and competent authority in accordance with the criteria of an effective investigation. It should be duly reasoned. Such decisions must be subject to appropriate scrutiny and be generally challengeable by means of a judicial process. Also, States should ensure the independence and impartiality of the judiciary in accordance with the principle of separation of powers. Proceedings should be concluded within a reasonable time. The sentences which are handed out should be effective, proportionate and appropriate to the offence committed. Domestic court judgments should be fully and speedily executed by the competent authorities[33].

Regarding the positive obligations of the State, the ECtHR has constantly held that public authorities have positive obligations inherent in an effect respect of the rights concerned. Consequently, for a real and effective exercise of certain freedoms the State's duty isn't only not to interfere, but also the State has the obligation to take measures of protection. In order to be in line with ECtHR case-law, such positive measures a fair balance has to be struck between the general interest of the community and the interests of the individual and, also, the obligation must not be interpreted in such a way as to impose an impossible or disproportionate burden on the authorities[34].

On the positive obligations of the state which rise under article 10, the Court has frequently stressed the fundamental role of freedom of expression in a democratic society, in particular where, through the press, it serves to impart information and ideas of general interest, which the public is moreover entitled to receive (see, for example, mutatis mutandis, Observer and Guardian v. the United Kingdom, §59, and Informationsverein Lentia and Others v. Austria, §38). Such an undertaking cannot be successfully accomplished unless it is grounded in the principle of pluralism, of which the State is the ultimate guarantor[35].

The concept of positive obligation assumes greater importance in relation to any violence or threats of violence directed by private persons against other private persons, such as the press, exercising free speech. In this sense, in the Özgür Gündem v. Turkey case, the Court has held that, although the essential object of many provisions of the Convention is to protect the individual against arbitrary interference by public authorities, there may in addition be positive obligations inherent in an effective respect of the rights concerned. It has found that such obligations may arise under Article 8 and Article 11. Obligations to take steps to undertake effective investigations have also been found to accrue in the context of Article 2 and Article 3, while a positive obligation to take steps to protect life may also exist under Article 2. The Court recalls the key importance of freedom of expression as one of the preconditions for a functioning democracy. Genuine, effective exercise of this freedom does not depend merely on the State's duty not to interfere, but may require positive measures of protection, even in the sphere of relations between individuals. In determining whether or not a positive obligation exists, regard must be had to the fair balance that has to be struck between the general interest of the community and the interests of the individual, the search for which is inherent throughout the Convention[36].

3.3. Case study: prohibition of torture

- Substantial limb. The safety of journalists regarding the acts of violence against them interacts, inter alia, with Article 3 of the ECHR regulating the principle of pohibitoion of torture.

Article 3 of the ECHR enshrines one of the basic values of the democratic societies whose core purpose is to protect a person's dignity and physical integrity – prohibition, in absolute and unqualified terms, of torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment[37].

[37] Article 3 – Prohibition of torture.

No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

The unconditional terms of article 3 also mean that there can never, under the Convention or under international law, be a justification for acts which breach the article. In other words, there can be no factors which are treated by a domestic legal system as justification for resort to prohibited behaviour – not the behaviour of the victim, the pressure on the perpetrator to further an investigation or prevent a crime, any external circumstances or any other factor[38].

According to the well-established case-law of the Court, ill-treatment must attain a minimum level of severity if it is to fall within the scope of Article 3. The assessment of this minimum level of severity is relative; it depends on all the circumstances of the case, such as the duration of the treatment, its physical and mental effects and, in some cases, the sex, age and state of health of the victim. In order for a punishment or treatment associated with it to be "inhuman" or "degrading", the suffering or humiliation involved must in any event go beyond that inevitable element of suffering or humiliation connected with a given form of legitimate treatment or punishment[39].

- From the procedural point of view, where an individual raises an arguable claim that he has been seriously ill-treated in breach of article 3 of the Convention, the member state has an obligation to initiate a thorough, prompt, independent and effective investigation, which should be capable of leading to the establishment of the facts of the case and, if the allegations prove to be true, to the identification and punishment of those responsible. This means that the authorities must always make a serious attempt to find out what happened and should not rely on hasty or ill-founded conclusions to close their investigation or as the basis of their decisions. They must take all reasonable steps available to them to secure the evidence concerning the incident, including, inter alia, eyewitness testimony, forensic evidence etc. Any deficiency in the investigation which undermines its ability to establish the cause of injuries or to identity the persons responsible will risk falling foul of this standard. For an effective investigation into alleged ill-treatment by state agents, such investigation should be independent. Thus, the investigation lacked independence where members of the same division or detachment as those implicated in the alleged ill-treatment were undertaking the investigation. The independence of the investigation implies not only the absence of a hierarchical or institutional connection, but also independence in practical terms[40].
- In Najafli v. Azerbaijan[41], a journalist had been beaten by the police while covering an unauthorised demonstration in Baku. The Court noted that the role of the press in imparting information and ideas on matters of public interest undoubtedly included reporting on opposition gatherings and demonstrations which was essential for the development of any democratic society. It found in particular that the physical ill-treatment by State agents of journalists carrying out their professional duties had seriously hampered the exercise of their right to receive and impart information. Irrespective of whether there had been any actual intention to interfere with Mr Najafli's journalistic activity, he had been subjected to unnecessary and excessive use of force, despite having made clear efforts to identify himself as a journalist at work. In conclusion, the Court found violations of Article 3 (prohibition of inhuman or degrading treatment) concerning Mr Najafli's ill-treatment, on the procedural limb of Article 3, concerning the investigation into his claim of ill-treatment and also of Article 10 regarding freedom of expression[42].

3.4. Statistics

Pursuant to the International Press Institute, in the period since 2000, more than 900 journalists have been killed as a result of their professional activities. The number of violent attacks against journalists is rising. The increase of targeted killings against representatives of the critical media is particularly alarming. At the same time, the number of resolved cases is appallingly low – around 94% of reported cases are never resolved and perpetrators enjoy impunity[43].

Around 19 journalists were killed in Central & Eastern Europe in 2007-2012. As a comparison, only 3 journalists were killed in the same period in Western Europe & North America[44].

According to UNESCO data, fewer than one in ten killings of journalists have led to a conviction in the past period. The UN Special Rapporteur on the Promotion and Protection of the Right to Freedom of Opinion and Expression has attributed the root cause of impunity to the lack of political will to pursue investigations[45].

While the commitment to protect freedom of the media is a noble goal, its implementation has not been successful so far. In the OSCE region, around 30 journalists are estimated to have been killed in the past five years alone. And that number is surpassed exponentially by those who were beaten or whose lives were threatened[46].

3.5. Cases of violence against journalists

- Romania. Reporters Without Borders invoked the freelance cameraman Christian Gesellmann's violent arrest by police officers while covering an anti-government demonstration in Bucharest on Wednesday 1 February 2017. The police hit Gesellmann and held him for several hours for refusing to delete or surrender the video he had shot of clashes between police officers and hooligans during the protest. Gesellmann was not clearly identified as a journalist and did not have a Romanian press card. But it would not have taken the police long to confirm that he was indeed a journalist, instead of detaining him and confiscating his video recording[47].
- Croatia. On 3 November 2010 a court convicted and sentenced six men for the murder of Ivo Pukanić, the director of the weekly Nacional and its marketing director Niko Franji. Both men were killed by a car bomb in 2008; it is hoped that those responsible for ordering the killings will also be brought to justice[48].
- France. In France, in January 2011, Michael Szames (reporter for France 24) was allegedly the victim of a violent attack. The reporter filed a complaint with the police accusing eight security staff of the National Front Party of having beaten and insulted him as he was covering a party congress[49].
- Serbia. The Independent Journalists' Association of Serbia (IJAS) said its records showed that as many as 128 assaults on journalists occurred since 2014: 27 of the assaults were physical. The stable trend of frequent physical and verbal attacks on media and journalists continued in the year behind us, as corroborated by IJAS data, according to which 69 journalists were assaulted in 2016: nine physically[50].

Several death threats have been sent to journalists at the investigative journalism portal insajder.net which is owned by broadcaster B92.The threats have been sent via email to several reporters over a week's time, between 14 and 22 March 2016. They have also been received by Insajder's editor-in-chief Brankica Stankovic and B92's editor-in-chief Veran Matic. Both have been under police protection for years due to serious threats. Due to a pending police investigation no details of the threats have been revealed, according to Veran Matic[51]. According to a reply from the Republic of Serbia provided by the Ministry of Interior (21 Nov 2016)[52], the Department of Criminal Police, Office for combating organized crime, filled criminal charges against persons in respect of whom there is reasonable suspicion of committing a criminal offence endangering security (art. 138 Criminal Code). The criminal offence was done by sending (from private e-mail address, via contact form on portal Insajder) several threatening messages to Ms Brankica Stankovic and to all employees of the portal Insajder, as well as threats to Mr Veran Matic.

In another case, the 27-year-old investigative journalist Ivan Ninić was attacked on 27 August 2015 in front of his home as he was locking his car in the parking lot. Two young men beat him with metal rods. The journalist suffered a hematoma under his eye, severe bruising to the thigh bone and an injury to the right shoulder. The incident, which has been condemned by all journalists' organisations in Serbia including the three IFJ/EFJ affiliates, the Association of Journalists of Serbia (UNS), the journalists' union of Serbia (SINOS) and the Independent Association of Journalists of Serbia (NUNS), has been reported to the police[53]. According to a reply from the Republic of Serbia provided by the Ministry of Interior (21 Nov

"It is a matter of trust". Trust is something you need to build, both with individuals and institutions - when the trust is broken, serious problems occur – resignations are given, media are covering the story, and the people responsible for the situation stay marked for a lifetime[56].

Impunity – meaning the the failure to bring perpetrators of human rights violations to justice – must be adressed as gives a sentiment of uncertainty and of failure to prserve the rule of law and freedom of expression.

To this sense, in evaluating the legal framework of a country, the main conclusion is that only a comprehensive approach can lead to an improvement of the cases of violence against journalists. By that we mean is of paramount importance to maintain an open dialogue between the institutions and the representatives of the journalist and civil society organisations.

Securing an effective implementation of the existing legal provisions by the states` institutions and the existence of an open and effective dialogue with the media organisations, civil society representatives, States and international organisations constitutes, in our opinion, the pillars that will result in the effective protection of journalists, thus ensuring the freedon of expression, as it was said[57] that the Court has repeatdly emphasized the vital role that freedom of expression, and the free press in particular, have to play in a democratic society.

The safety of journalists and the combating of impunity for crimes against their use of freedom of expression, can only be effectively addressed through a holistic approach: preventive, protective and pre-emptive measures, through to combating impunity and promoting a social culture which cherishes freedom of expression and press freedom[58].

All in all, the relevant institutions and stakeholders must be aware that the rationale is that the safety of journalists is an important prerequisite for achieving freedom of expression, democracy, social development and peace[59].

Although, the international and regional documents recommend that the crimes involving attacks against journalists must be designated as 'aggravated offences'[60], which may attract more severe penalties, and that no statute of limitations should apply to such crimes, we think that before amending the criminal framework, a country must try to tackle the problem of violences againt journalists using the existing legal framework, which usually is enough, if properly enforced, to ensure the punishment of those quilty of violences against journalists.

To this end, some possible solutions can be imagined, other than amending the legislation, but rather aiming at a proper implementation of current legal framework:

- There is a stringent need to effectively investigate murders and other serious violent crimes against journalists; investigations should be carried out promptly and efficiently and that the prosecutors and investigators must be independent, as well as trained and qualified for the job. No political interference should hinder them from doing their work[61].
- There is a need to facilitate capacity-building in state institutions, thus encouraging all the relevant stakeholders to fully respect and implement the existing legal provisions, as the only way of effectively ensuring the reality of a satisfactory level of protection ensured in cases of violence against journalists. To this sense, it was said that State authorities must advocate that the authorities make it their priority to carry out swift and effective investigations, sending a message to society that perpetrators and masterminds of violence against journalists will be efficiently brought to justice[62].
- For the judicial authorities (public prosecutor's office and the court system) is necessary to communicate to the general public, thus increasing the transparency (e.g. by posting on their websites) the evolution and the effectiveness of the investigation on murders and other serious violent crimes against journalists, which shall include the following, in the form of press statements: the fact that investigations respected the needs to be carried out promptly and efficiently; the final decision as given in a particular case by the court; the posting on the website (and periodic update) of the Statistics of cases of violence against journalists (no. of cases, no. of cases still under investigation, no. of solved cases, the criminal provision incident in the case (the type of crime committed against a journalist), if the case is linked or not with the responsible of a journalist.

- As State authorities, namely the law enforcement agencies and media need to jointly establish good practices that can increase the safety of members of the media[63], the publishing of Good practices is a way of levelling the implementation of the legal provisions on violence against journalists and ensuring the necessary transparency that a real content is provided by the national relevant authorities as a way of addressing the violence against journalist issue.
- For the judicial authorities (public prosecutor's office and the court system) is necessary to organise trainings in order to emphasise and make them aware of the importance of bringing everyone responsible for violence against journalists to justice.
- State authorities must ensure that law enforcement agencies be given sufficient resources and expertise to carry out effective investigations in the particular field of the media and to develop practices that respect the legal rights of members of the media.[64]
- Only if evaluating the above solutions the conclusion is that a state does not have a proper and effective system of protecting the journalists of cases of violence, the two solutions amending the criminal legislation can be implemented:
- crimes involving attacks against journalists must be designated as 'aggravated offences', which may attract more severe penalties,
- no statute of limitations should apply to such crimes.

Of course, in this situation, also, there will be a pressing need to ensure effective mechanisms that can ensure the existence of investigations capable of leading to the establishment of the facts as well as the identification and eventually, if appropriate, punishment of those responsible.

THE USE WITHOUT RIGHT OF THE PRIVILEGED INFORMATION (INSIDE TRADING) – OFFENSE REGARDING THE CAPITAL MARKET

Mirela GORUNESCU[*]

Abstract

This study addresses the particularly complex problem caused by one of the offense that can be committed in the capital market. Naturally, the article also includes an introductory analysis of the field and the regulation of the capital market, aspects that complement the premise of all offenses defined by the Law no. 297/2004, but examines in particular one of the incrimination texts regulated by the same normative act. It is about article 279 paragraph b) and article 245 of the Law no. 297/2004 which, without having a marginal designation, was intended to define the offense of unlawful use of the privileged information.

Keywords: capital market, privileged information, offenses regarding the capital market, capital market manipulation

1. Introduction

The capital market field is a highly controversial one because of its novelty in our country, its special technicity it presents, and the seriousness of the offenses already committed within it. For this reason, as well as due to the need to prevent the criminality's import, which is very easy by reference to the specifics of the field, multiple legislative changes occurred, with a high celerity which have often determined difficulties in understanding and applying the legal norms, especially the norms of incrimination.

The legislative framework consisted, in turn, in the Law no. 52/1994 regarding securities and stock exchanges, the first with this specific in contemporary Romania, in the Government Emergency Ordinance no. 28/2002 regarding securities, financial investment services and regulated markets, approved with amendments and completions by the Law no. 525/2002, and, currently, in the Law no. 297/2004. This normative act is an ample, complex one, including virtual regulations that came into force at a later moment than the one decided for the entry into force of the Law no.297/2004[1].

As with the previous normative acts, the Law no. 297/2004 as well includes legal norms of incrimination, therefore rules defining crimes[2]. Thus, the article 279 of the Law stipulates : "It is a crime and is punished by imprisonment from 6 months to 5 years and the interdiction of certain rights: a) the deliberate presentation by the administrator, director or executive manager of the company to the shareholders of inaccurate financial statements or unrealistic information about the economic status of the company; b) committing the crimes referred to in articles 245-248; c) intentional access by unauthorized persons of the electronic trading systems, depository or clearing and settlement systems. "

In addition, the article 279[1] of the same normative act states: "Theft of the financial instruments of the customers and / or of the money funds related to them constitutes an offence and is punished in accordance with the provisions of the Criminal Code."

In order to ensure the main rules for the fulfilment of the criminal norms, the Law no. 297/2004 regulates the establishment and the functioning of the financial instruments markets, with their specific institutions and operations, as well as the collective investment bodies, in order to mobilize the financial resources through the investment in financial instruments. This law applies to the above-mentioned activities and operations performed on the Romanian territory. The National Securities Commission is the competent authority that applies the provisions of the special law by exercising the prerogatives established in its statutes. However, the provisions of the Law no. 297/2004 do not apply to money market instruments, regulated by the National Bank of Romania and to government securities issued by the Ministry of Public Finances, if the issuer chooses for trading them a market other than the regulated market defined in article 125.

A regulated market is a trading system for financial instruments that:

a) operates regularly;
b) is characterized by the fact that the regulations issued and subject the approval of the Romanian National Securities Commission (C.N.V.M.) define the operating conditions, the market access, the conditions for admission to trade a financial instrument;
c) complies with the reporting and transparency requirements for the protection of the investors being laid down by law as well as with the regulations issued by C.N.V.M. in accordance with EC law.

[1] Based on article 290 from the Law no. 297/2004, it entered into force 30 days after its publication in the Official Journal of Romania.

[2] For a thorough analysis of all the crimes (offenses) defined by this normative act, see the chapter drafted by the same author in the collective work: Criminal Law of Business (co-authored by Al. Boroi), CH Beck Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016.

The provisions of the Law no. 297/2004 do not apply to the management of public debt in which are involved the National Bank of Romania, the central banks of the Member States and other national entities in Member States with similar functions, the Ministry of Public Finances, as well as other public entities.

All offenses defined by the Law no. 297/2004 suppose that those behaviours described by the incrimination rules must be adopted within or about some operations performed on the capital market. The body with specialized attributions in this field is the Romanian National Securities Commission.

Originally, the market was the public place in the city where supplies or other items were put up for sale, but through generalisation, currently the market represents a body of persons who are in close business relationships and who perform large-scale transactions in relation to any commodity[3].

The market economy means even interdependence between four markets: the goods and services market, the labour market, the information market and the financial market.

The one who presents interest for the current analysis is the latter, as the market where the financial assets are traded.

The financial assets are the valuable documents that consecrate current or future financial entitlements of their holder, resulting from their capitalization (interest, dividends, etc.). They differ from real assets which are tangible or non- tangible goods which generate income in the future in the form of monthly rent, rents, profits, but are the money correspondent of the real assets, thus revealing the dual nature of the market economy, consisting of a real economy (the material processes of producing the goods and the services necessary for the individual consumption and the resume of the production) and the symbolic or financial economy (informational type processes, represented by the movement of the money and securities)[4]. The financial asset may be: the exchange value, when the good (viewed as commodity) helps to obtain another good; the investment value (capital) when the good is used to produce revenue in the future.

The financial assets may be: banking assets; non-banking financial assets; capital assets; monetary assets. To this, the hybrid assets (deposit certificates, etc.) are added.

The financial market is composed of three components, depending precisely on the type of financial assets that are traded within it[5]:

1. the banking market - is characterized by transactions with banking assets resulting from banking operations carrying a high level of safety interest.
2. the money market - through it, monetary transactions are made between the residents of a country, using the national currency.
3. the capital market - specialized in the intermediation of transactions with financial assets that have maturities on average terms (1 to 5 years) and long terms (over 5 years). Through this market, the applicants 'capital needs are met by the bidders' capital availability.

The capital market exerts the following functions:

1. issuance and sale for the first time of the financial titles of the issuers or the debtors toward the owners of financial capital who wish to buy financial assets;
2. negotiation of securities, provided that they are sold and converted into liquidities by their first holders and prior to maturity.

The components of the capital market[6] are: the primary market (where the first placement of the securities issue takes place) and the secondary market (where the securities absorbed by the primary market are bought by banks, investors and private individuals).

Article 1 paragraph (1) of the Law no. 297/2004, on the capital market, regulates the establishment and the functioning of the financial instruments markets, with their specific institutions and operations, as well as the collective investment bodies in order to mobilize the financial resources through investment in financial instruments.

2. The offense foreseen in article 279 letter b) and article 245 of the Law no. 297/2004 - the use without right of the privileged information (inside trading)

In accordance with the legal texts previously quoted: “The violation of the provisions of article 245 paragraph (1) constitutes a crime and is punished by imprisonment from 6 months to 5 years and the interdiction of some rights: It is forbidden for any person possessing privileged information to use that information for the acquisition or disposal or for the intention to acquire or dispose of, for himself or for the account of a third party, directly or indirectly, of the financial instruments to which such information relate to”.

Along with other texts of incrimination, the Law no. 297/2004 also includes the one quoted above. The offense so described is thus committed by an act of use for own account of privileged information by the person who knows the information, that results in the acquisition or disposal of financial instruments to which that information relates.

The legal specific object of the offense is to protect the capital market against unfair activities. It is important to ensure that this value is respected as market mechanisms will not function properly and the chances of those involved in trading activities are not equal.

We consider that the crime has no material object, since the use to which the incriminating rule refers to consists concretely in trading or the intention to trade securities on the capital market and this activity does not affect the information, but the market share of the securities.

The active subject of the offence is a qualified one. Anyone with privileged information may be in this position:

a) in his capacity as a member of the board of directors or of the managerial or supervisory structures of the issuer;
b) as a result of its holdings in the issuer's share capital;
c) by exercising his / her function, profession or duties;
d) illegally or fraudulently, as a result of criminal activities.

Moreover, the article 247 of the Law no. 297/2004 broadens the scope of the active subjects of the crime we are studying and of the one that follows. This text specifies that the provisions of the article 245 and the article 246 shall apply to any other person who holds privileged information, provided that those persons know or should have been aware that that information is privileged.

Another category of persons who may become active subjects of crimes is the one consisting of persons responsible for executing orders related to trading financial instruments when the information relates to the orders given by clients and not yet executed.

The passive subject is the State, as the holder of the obligation to ensure, through C.N.V.M., the legally functioning of the activity in the capital market field. There may be a natural or legal person injured by the market abuse, as a secondary subordinate subject.

The material element consists in a commissive behaviour to use the privileged information under conditions other than those lawfully admitted. In this way, the crime is to use in the unauthorized ways indicated by the incriminating norm of the privileged information, which due to its specificity can lead to abuse of the capital market. In concrete terms, it will be about the use of such information for the acquisition or disposal of or for the intention to acquire or dispose of, on its own account or on the account of a third person, directly or indirectly, of the financial instruments to which this information relates to.

In order to achieve the objective content of the offense, however, we appreciate the need to meet the following essential requirements:

a) there is an activity of using the privileged information. The use may take the form of securities trading activities on the capital market (e.g. - an information is known about the imminence of the state of insolvency of the patrimony of a company whose shares are held by the person who has access to this information. The shares are immediately sold at the usual trading price and financial loss caused by the disclosure of the information is avoided).

In the legal interpretation provided by the article 244 of the Law no. 297/2004, privileged information means the information of a precise nature which has not been made public and which relates directly or indirectly to one or more issuers or to one or more financial instruments and which, if publicly disclosed, could have a significant impact on the price of those financial instruments, or on the price of related derivative instruments.

When referring to commodity derivatives, "the privileged information" shall mean the information of a precise nature which has not been made public and which relates directly or indirectly to financial derivatives and which the participants in the markets on which those financial derivatives instruments are traded are expected to receive it, in accordance with the accepted market practices.

For the persons in charge with the execution of orders for the trading of financial instruments, "the privileged information" means as well the accurate information sent by a client about his orders that have not yet been executed, relating directly or indirectly to one or more issuers or to one or more financial instruments, information which, if made public, could have significant effects on the price of those financial instruments or on the price of the derivative financial instruments with which they are related.

b) the activity must be performed by the person who knows such information. The requirement concerns the circumstance in which, when the use is made by another person, even at the instigation of the person who knows the privileged information, the act committed will be the one provided for in article 279 letter b) and article 246 of the Law no. 297/2004.
c) the third essential requirement is that it is mandatory for transactions not to be made, considering that the person engaged in such transactions had a contractual obligation to acquire or dispose of financial instruments and that this contract was concluded before the respective person had the privileged information. If the requirement is not met, we will be faced with a cause of special justification.

According to article 12 of the Law no. 78/2000 on the prevention and sanctioning of the corruption, the following actions shall be punished by imprisonment from one to five years, if they are committed for the purpose of obtaining for themselves or for another money, goods or other undue advantage: a) performing financial operations, as acts of commerce incompatible with the function, the duty or the assignment of a person or the conclusion of financial transactions, using the information obtained by virtue of his or her function, duty or assignment; b) the use in any way, directly or indirectly, of information that is not intended to be advertised or to allow unauthorized persons to have access to such information.

On the other hand, by article 245 of the Law no. 279/2004 any person possessing privileged information is forbidden to use that information for the acquisition or the disposal or in order to acquire or dispose, on his own account or on behalf of a third party, directly or indirectly, of financial instruments to which that information relates.

By comparing the two legal texts, it can be easily observed that the difference between them is due to the existence of an additional condition in article 12 of the Law no. 78/2000[7]. Apparently, the two criminal norms [article 279 of the Law no. 297/2004 and article 12 letter b) of the Law no. 78/2000] are identical, refer to the same situations and are therefore concurrent. This simple analysis, however, does not resist when performing a legal, literary, rational and systematic interpretation, with the observance of the strict interpretation of criminal laws, but without extending them.

Thus, the offense under the law regulating the capital market refers to "own advantage or the advantage of third parties", a much narrower concept in its content than the wording of the Law no. 78/2000 – "for the purpose of obtaining for himself or for another money, goods or other undue benefits". In the first case, we face a hypothesis of a facility in relation to the other participants in the capital market operations, being an unfair speculation. The condition regarding the purpose within the regulation of article 12 of the Law no. 78/2000 largely exceeds the previous case, as it implies a very elaborate volitional process that seeks to obtain undue use of a certain benefit, asset or money, that is not legally due and cannot be procured otherwise than in violation of the law[8] .

Thus, the action of any person holding privileged information insider who purchases or sells for himself or for another, directly or indirectly, movable assets or other rights related thereto of the issuer in respect of which he holds the respective privileged information, or makes use of the information in any other way and transmits them or facilitates their publication for the benefit of themselves or of third parties, is sanctioned under the law of the capital market.

The immediate consequence of the offense is to jeopardize the proper conduct of the business in the capital market. The causality link results from committing the material element.

The form of guilt with which the offense is committed is the intention. We appreciate that each time the mode of intent will be the direct one.

Given the provisions of article 16 paragraph (6) Criminal Code, we appreciate that the intention is the form of guilt with which is committed the offense provided for in article 279 letter b), article 245 of the Law no. 297/2004 and in the hypothesis regulated by article 247 of the Law no. 297/2004 which considers the situation of committing the offense by another person who has acquired the privileged information. It is noted that engaging in a trading activity on the capital market before the information is made public makes the content of the offense only if those individuals know or ought to have known that that information is privileged. This last formula, "ought to have known" is characteristic from the intelligible point of view of the guilt without provision. However, if there is no mention of committing the act with guilt, it follows the common rules, being mandatory to be committed with intent. In fact, it can happen that the person learns about the privileged information before being advertised and that the person performs a trading activity, being in fault regarding the specific nature of the information he uses in this way. There is thus a contradiction between the indication of the intentional nature of the non-compliance with the obligations imposed by the law and the specific attitude of the form of fault. However, we interpret the text in the sense that the act will always be committed with direct intent, the information being used with the clear representation of its privileged character.

The motive and the purpose are elements of individualisation of the punishment.

The offense is with intent (wilful) and, for this reason, it may also know atypical modes of the acts of preparation and attempt. Neither the former nor the latter are sanctioned by the criminal law.

The primary punishments that may be applied for committing this crime are imprisonment from 6 months to 5 years and the interdiction of certain rights.

Where the privileged information is used by a legal person, the interdiction shall also apply to the natural person who took part in the decision to execute the transaction on the account of that legal person.

3. Conclusions

The capital market is of great importance, and because of its specificity it is difficult, if not impossible, to be protected to an effective extent by the risk of having within it antisocial behaviours being committed whose gravity would justify the intervention of the criminal law. By the completion norms it provides, but also by the incriminating rules it regulates, the Law no. 297/2004 has taken on the difficult role to prevent and combat, at least at the virtual level, the criminal deeds that could be committed in this context and which could disturb it in a serious way.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE PRINCIPLE OF LEGALITY OF CRIMINALISATION

Mihai Adrian HOTCA*

Abstract

Although the new Criminal Code made a series of amendments to the criminal legislation, the regulation of the principle of legality of criminalisation has not been significantly changed, but only from the point of view of the structure of governing rules.

Thus, while the previous Criminal Code regulated through a single provision both the legality of criminalisation and the legality of criminal penalties, the new Criminal Code has split the content of the principle of legality of criminalisation and criminal penalties into two principles - the legality of criminalisation and the legality of criminal penalties, by allocating them two separate articles in Chapter I of Title I of the General Part.

In this article, we aim to examine the theoretical side of the substance of the principle of legality of criminalisation and to analyse some of the most important legal issues concerning the application of this principle in the case-law.

Keywords*: Legality, legality of criminalisation, foreseeability of criminal law, retrospective effect of criminal law, continuing effect, application of the more favourable criminal law.*

1. Introduction

In a democratic regime based on the rule of law, the state's right to punish (jus puniendi) is restricted, therefore the latter must punish only those acts which constituted criminal offences at the time when they were committed and impose solely the penalties existing in the system of penalties at the time when the criminal offence was committed, except when a more lenient criminal law enters into force before the criminal relationship of conflict ceases. Although the principle of legality is a basic rule of the entire legal system, it is also a fundamental principle of criminal law and should be dealt with in a special manner, because the legality in the field of criminal law has a particular nature, has some distinctive features. The specific features of legality in the field of criminal law are given by two components: the legality of the regulation of the act which constitutes a criminal offence and the legality of penalties. The principle of legality is expressed in the well-known adages: nullum crimen sine lege și nulla poena (sanctio) sine lege.

In this article, we aim to examine the theoretical side of the substance of the principle of legality of criminalisation and to analyse some of the most important legal issues concerning the application of this principle in the case-law.

The new Criminal code has no longer compressed the principle of legality of criminalisation and the principle of legality of criminal penalties in a single article, as they were regulated by the 1969 Criminal code, but it has reserved an article to each of the two principles, namely Articles 1 and 2. According to Article 1 of the Criminal code, having the nomen juris the legality of criminalisation: "(1) Criminal law defines the acts that constitute offences.

(2) No person can have criminal liability for an act that was not covered by criminal law at the date of its commission"[1].

One can note that the legislator has expressed two fundamental ideas in the two paragraphs dedicated to the principle of legality of criminalisation: the compulsory existence of the criminalisation rule (nulum crimen sine lege) and the non-retrospective effect of the criminal law criminalising ex novo.

We specify that the provision found in Article 1 paragraph (2) of the Criminal code, according to which: "No person can have criminal liability for an action that was not covered by criminal law at the date of its commission" is, in fact, taken in another form from the provisions of Article 11 of the previous Criminal code[2].

According to Article 2 of the Criminal code, having the nomen juris the legality of criminal penalties: "(1) Criminal law establishes applicable penalties and educational measures that can be ruled against persons who committed offences, as well as security measures that can be ruled against persons who committed actions covered by criminal law.

(2) No penalty, educational or security measure can be ruled that was not stipulated in criminal law at the date when the violation was committed.

(3) No penalty can be ruled and enforced outside the law's general limits".

* Professor, PhD, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (email: mihaihotca@gmail.com).

[1] As regards the fact that Article 1 paragraph (2) of the Criminal code mentions the penalty and not the criminalisation, the doctrine has specified:"the consistency specific to a thorough legislative technique would have required a more coherent expression of the idea, by making recourse to a slightly different wording, avoiding the explicit reference to the penalty and sending a direct message concerning the concept of criminalisation" (See M.-I. Michinici and M. Duinea, in T. Toader, M.-I. Michinici, R. Răducanu, A. Crișu-Ciocîntă, S. Răduleț, M. Duinea, The New Criminal Code. Commentaries on articles, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2014, p.5).

[2] According to Article 11 of the previous Criminal code: "Criminal law shall not apply to any act which did not constitute a criminal offence at the time when it was committed".

Giving efficiency to the requirement of clarity and foreseeability of criminal law (in claris non fit interpretatio), the new Criminal code lays down expressis verbis, in the legal provision dedicated to the principle of legality of criminal penalties, all three categories of criminal penalties: penalties, educational measures and security measures.

Also, the new Criminal code provides that the educational measures may be taken only against persons who have committed criminal offences, while in respect of security measures it provides that these may also be taken against the persons who have committed mere acts provided for by criminal law, which do not fulfil the elements of criminal offences.

Then, in Article 2 paragraph (2) of the Criminal code, the legislator emphasizes the idea of non-retrospective effect of criminal law, by laying down the prohibition according to which no penalty, educational or security measure can be ruled that was not stipulated in criminal law at the date when the violation was committed.

Finally, Article 2 paragraph (3) of the Criminal code lays down a provision unmatched in the 1969 Criminal code, according to which no penalty may be imposed and enforced outside the general limits thereof.

2. Analysis of the principle of legality of criminalisation

The legality of criminalisation is a fundamental principle of criminal law, intended for the legislator and the judicial bodies, according to which only the acts defined by criminal law at the time when they were committed constitute criminal offences and may be punished by criminal law[3].

It is normal to be so because the recipient of the law must relate his behaviour to the legal rules in force at the time when the conduct is carried out. The legality of the criminal offence means the clear and precise description of the acts which constitute criminal offences (nulum crimen sine lege certa). The determination of acts which constitute criminal offences must be carried out by using an everyday and accessible language, in order to avoid the risk of avoiding the law by analogy and the misunderstanding of the criminalisation rules. If technical or special terms are used, the legislator must contextually interpret them[4].

The legality of criminalisation was criticized on the ground that the criminal law founded on this rule cannot keep pace with social evolution, because the social relationships constantly change. If the new illegal acts committed in society cannot be foreseen, then acts dangerous to the social values would remain unpunished and only acts whose elements do not require anymore the application of the criminal constraint would be punished[5]. On the other hand, the principle of legality does not protect the recipient of the criminal law in the case where tyrannical laws are adopted, because observing such a law amounts to the acceptance of the abuse.

This point of view may not be accepted, for the arguments summarised below.

First of all, individuals guide their behaviours by the legal rules in force at the time when they engage in conduct. A subject of law may not be required to anticipate the future criminalisations.

Secondly, the legality of criminalisation guarantees that no discrimination or inequality in the legal treatment arise from the application of criminal law in similar cases. There are many cases of unequal application of criminal law by the use of the institution laid down in Article 18^1 of the previous Criminal code (the act does not pose a danger to society). Using the models provided by comparative laws, in particular the French criminal law, the new Criminal code provides, for example, that in the case of acts punishable by imprisonment of not more than one year, the court may waive the punishment of the defendant who has no criminal records and proved that he can be rehabilitated even without punishing him.

On the other hand, if the principle of legality is not regulated, the powers of the judiciary would partially overlap with those of the legislative, which may not be accepted in a state governed by the rule of law, even if it is accepted that separation of powers does not mean their isolation.

In order to be the basis for the imposition of the criminal penalty, the act must constitute an offence under criminal law not only at the time when it is committed, but also at any time after that date, until the final judgment which solves the criminal relationship of conflict is rendered.

The first coherent theoretical approach of legality of criminalisation is found in the work of Cesare Beccaria, Dei delitti e delle pene[6]. Beccaria said that "the laws only can determine the punishment of crimes, and this authority can only reside with the legislator, who represents the whole society (...)"[7]. More than a century after Cesare Beccaria had stated and argued the principle of the legality of criminalisation, the latter has been enshrined for the first time in a regulatory act, the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, adopted following the 1789 French Revolution. Article VIII of this regulatory act provided that: "no one can be punished but under a law established and promulgated before the offence and legally applied."

[4] The Strasbourg Court has stated in its case-law: "Article 7 paragraph 1 of the Convention is not confined to prohibiting the retrospective application of the criminal law to an accused's disadvantage. It also embodies, more generally, the principle that only the law can define a crime and prescribe a penalty (nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege) and the principle that the criminal law must not be extensively construed to an accused's detriment, for instance by analogy; it follows from this that an offence must be clearly defined in law" (Kokkinakis vs Greece, 1993).

The principle of legality of criminalisation is very important for criminal law, because criminal law is the law area which imposes the most severe legal liability in the society. History, even the recent one, tells us what might happen if this principle is not regulated. The transposition of the principle of legality of criminalisation in the social life also implies that the legislator criminalises only those antisocial acts which might substantially harm the social defence relationships. Thus, the legislator must decriminalise certain acts which are irrelevant from the viewpoint of criminal law, namely to remove from the scope of criminal offences those acts which do not pose the social danger required for criminal repression.

In another train of thoughts, the legislator must monitor the dynamique of social relationships in order to intervene promptly and to criminalise new dangerous acts, whenever this is necessary.

The principle of legality of criminalisation is regulated by many international, universal or regional treaties. For example, by Article 7 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

Art.15 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights enshrines the principle of legality in the following terms: "No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed".

In Romanian law, all previous criminal codes, including the 1923 Constitution, have enshrined the legality of criminalisation.

We specify that the application of temporary criminal law, after it ceases to be in force, to the acts committed during the period in which it was in effect is not a derogation as such from the principle of effectiveness of criminal law (the academic literature uses the wording improper continuing effect), but it is rather a particular application thereof (tempus regit actum). Possible derogations from the rule of effectiveness of criminal law are the retrospective effect and the continuing effect of criminal law.

De lege lata, the continuing effect of criminal law as such has no practical relevance, because it would mean that a previous law, which ceased to be in force before a criminal offence was committed, still applies to an act committed after the previous law has ceased to be in effect, although it was not in force on the date when the act in question have been committed.

The retrospective effect of the more favourable criminal law is allowed on the basis of constitutional provisions. Indeed, according to Article 15 paragraph (2) of the Constitution: "(2) The law shall only act for the future, except for the more favourable criminal or administrative law". It follows from the provisions of Article 15 paragraph (2) that the retrospective effect of criminal law is an exception from the rule of non-retrospective effect of criminal law, but which may be restricted by the legislator.

The principle of legality of criminalisation imposes five standards, and in the absence of any of them one cannot speak of legality within the meaning of the principle we are dealing with here. Indeed, a criminal law complies with the principle of legality if it is:

a) Written (lex scripta);
b) Certain (lex certa);
c) Non-retrospective (lex pravevia);
d) Strict (lex stricta);
e) Adopted according to the Constitution[8].

1. Lex scripta

Thus, an inherent requirement for the existence of the criminal offence is the definition of the elements of the act deemed criminal offence by a written law (lex scripta). Romanian law - member of family of the Romano-Germanic law system - does not accept, as a rule, other formal sources (custom, settled case-law).

This requirement does not need special discussions, because criminal laws are always written laws[9]. Only written laws have to ability to comply with the requirement of accessibility of criminal law. The European Court of Human Rights has held that, in order to be imposed by the coercive force of the state, the law must be sufficiently accessible, in the sense that any person must be able to have information on the legal rules applicable in a given situation[10].

The Constitutional Court also agreed to this standard of quality of the law. According to the Constitutional Court, from a formal viewpoint, the accessibility of law concerns the information of the public on the infra-constitutional legal acts and their entry into force, which is carried out under Article 78 of the Constitution, meaning that the law is published in the Official Journal of Romania, Part I, and enters into force 3 days of the date of the publication or on a further date provided for by it.

The Constitutional Court has specified that:"But, in order to meet the requirement of accessibility of the law, it is not enough for a law to be brought to the attention of the public, but it is necessary that the regulatory acts governing a specific field are both logically connected so as to enable the recipients thereof to determine the content of the regulated field and identical from the point of view of their legal force.

[8] See F. Streteanu, Criminal Law. General Part, Rosetti Publishing House, Bucharest, 2003, p.49.
[9] The academic literature also mentions several exceptions. For example, the custom (see F.Streteanu, op.cit., p.110).
[10] Criminal law must be sufficiently accessible (see the case Sunday Times v. Great Britain, 1979).

It cannot therefore be allowed a scattered regulation of the field or which is a result of the correlation between regulatory acts with different legal force. In this respect, the legislative techniques rules concerning the integration of the project in the entire body of legislation state that the regulatory act must be organically integrated in the system of legislation, for which purpose the regulatory act must be correlated with the provisions of regulatory acts of higher level or of the same level to which it is connected with (Article 13 letter (a) of the Law No 24/2000). The reference provision (Article 16, second sentence of paragraph 1 of the Law No 24/2000), which always operates between regulatory acts with the same legal force shall be used for the purpose of emphasizing certain legislative connections"[11].

2. Lex certa

The law, in general, and the criminal law, in particular, must be foreseeable. The European Court of Human Rights has held that a law should be not only accessible, but also foreseeable, meaning that it is formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct[12]. In another case, the European Court of Human Rights has held that the law should accessible to the person concerned and foreseeable as to its effects. For a law to be foreseeable, it must indicate the scope of any such discretion conferred on the competent authorities and the manner of its exercise with sufficient clarity, having regard to the legitimate aim of the measure in question, to give the individual adequate protection against arbitrary interference[13].

The certain nature of criminal law is related to the foreseeability of this law, which must be, par excellence, a clear and precise law (in claris non fit interpretatio). Giving effectiveness to the principle of legality of criminalisation, the Constitutional Court has declared unconstitutional several criminalisation rules on the ground of failure to meet the clarity requirement[14].

By way of example, we mention Decision No. 363/2015 and Decision No. 603/2015, by which the provisions of Article 6 of the Law no. 241/2005, Article 301 of the Criminal code and Article 308 of the Criminal code have been declared unconstitutional.

In the grounds of the Decision No. 363/2015, the Constitutional Court has held the following: "the achievement by the state of specific objectives, even when they are of general interest and necessary, may only be made in compliance with the Constitution, which, according to Article 1 paragraph (5), is mandatory. Thus, a subject of law may not be required to comply with a law that is not clear, precise, foreseeable and accessible, whereas he is not able to adapt the conduct according to the normative assumption of the law; this is precisely why the legislative authority, the Parliament or the Government, as the case may be, has the obligation to lay down rules which comply with the features shown above"[15].

In the grounds of the Decision No. 603/2015, the Constitutional Court has held: "the words 'commercial relationships' found in the provisions of Article 301 paragraph (1) of the Criminal Code are lacking clarity and foreseeability, preventing the precise determination of the elements of the offence of conflict of interests.

This lack of clarity, precision and foreseeability of the words 'commercial relationships' found in the provisions of Article 301 paragraph (1) of the Criminal Code is contrary to the principle of legality of criminalisation provided for in Article 1 of the Criminal Code and in Article 7 of the Convention for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and, consequently, to the provisions of Article 1 paragraph 5 of the Constitution, that refer to the quality of the law"[16].

However, the precision of criminal law should not be understood in an absolute manner. The wording used by the legislator is, however, a general one, which concerns indefinite persons and the behaviours prohibited by the rules of criminalisation must be described by sufficient elements so that the recipients are able to understand the contents of the law, even if sometimes they need to make recourse to experts. In other words, the legislator admits a margin of discretion of judicial bodies in assessing the contents of the law.

In this respect, the European Court of Human Rights has held that a law may still satisfy the requirement of foreseeability even if the person concerned has to take appropriate legal advice to assess, [11] See Decision No 363/2015.

[12] See, for example, the judgment rendered in Sunday Times v. Great Britain, 1979. In this case, the Strasbourg court has held that: "The citizen must have enough information on the legal rules applicable in a given case and be able to foresee, to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail. In short, the law must be accessible and foreseeable at the same time." to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail[17].

[13] See the Judgment of 4 May 2000, rendered in Case Rotaru versus Romania, paragraph 52. The ECHR has also stated the rule of foreseeability in the Judgment of 25 January 2007, rendered in the Case Sissanis versus Romania, paragraph 66.

The Strasbourg Court has held that legal rules cannot be drafted with absolute precision. One of the standard regulation techniques consists of rather making recourse to general categories and not to exhaustive lists. Thus, many laws necessarily use more or less vague wordings, whose interpretation and application depend on the case-law. However clearly drafted a legal provision may be, in any system of law, including criminal law, there is an inevitable element of judicial interpretation. There will always be a need for elucidation of doubtful points and for adaptation to changing circumstances. Although the certainty in drafting the law is desirable, this could lead to an excessive rigidity or the law must be able to adapt to changing circumstances. The decision-making role conferred to the court aims precisely at removing the doubts persisting in relation to the interpretation of rules, the progressive development of the criminal law through judicial law-making as source of law being a well-entrenched and necessary part of legal tradition of the Member States. Consequently, Article 7 paragraph 1 of the Convention cannot be read as outlawing the gradual clarification of the rules of criminal liability through judicial interpretation from case to case, provided that the resultant development is consistent with the essence of the offence and could reasonably be foreseen[18].

3. Lex praevia

Criminal law may not be retrospective, except for the more lenient law (mitior lex) and may not be applied by analogy[19].

The application of law by analogy means the extension of the scope of this law to acts not prescribed by the law. The analogy was regulated by the 1936 Criminal code and it was repealed by the Decree no.102/1956. In the inter-war period, the analogy was laid down even in the codes of certain western states with a democratic tradition; for example, in the 1930 Danish Criminal code.

According to the provisions of Article 3 of the Criminal code:"Criminal law shall be applicable to offences committed when it is in force"[20].

According to Article 4 of the Criminal code:"Criminal law does not apply to actions committed under the applicability of the previous law, if such actions are no longer included in the new law. In such case, the serving of sentences, the educational and security measures ruled on under the previous law, as well as all criminal consequences of court judgments concerning those actions, shall cease once the new law comes into force"[21].

According to Article 5 paragraph (1) of the Criminal code: "In case one or several criminal acts have been enacted between the time the violation was committed and the final judgement in a case, the more favourable stipulation shall apply".

According to the provisions of Article 6 paragraph (1) of the Criminal code: "Whenever, between the time of the final judgement in a criminal case and the time the sentence is fully served, a law is enacted that stipulates a lighter penalty, the original sentencing shall be reduced to the special maximum of the new sentencing if the previous one exceeded that special maximum".

Finally, according to Article 15 paragraph (2) of the Constitution: "The law shall only act for the future, except for the more favourable criminal or administrative law".

More favourable interpretative laws, the decriminalising laws and the more favourable laws stricto sensu fall within the scope of the more favourable criminal laws[22].

Criminal law may have retrospective effect only if it is:

- a decriminalising law;
- a more favourable new criminal law (including

[17] This is particularly true in relation to persons carrying on a professional activity, who are used to having to proceed with a high degree of caution when pursuing their occupation. They can on this account be expected to take special care in assessing the risks that such activity entails. (Judgment of 15 November 1996, rendered in Case Cantoni v. France, paragraph 35; Judgment of 24 May 2007, rendered in Case Dragotoniu and Militaru - Pidhorni versus Romania, paragraph 35; Judgment of 20 January 2009, rendered in case Sud Fondi SRL and others versus Italy, paragraph 109).

[18] See the Judgment of 22 November 1995, rendered in Case S.W. versus Romania, paragraph 36. See Decision No 405/2016 of the Constitutional Court of Romania.

[19] The application of law by analogy and the retrospective effect are two legal monstrosities. All dictatorships have made recourse to these "institutions" in order to achieve their totalitarian purposes and eliminate the "uncomfortable" persons. The fascist, Nazi and communist states of the 20th century have trampled on the principle of legality of criminalisation which is violated by the dictatorial states of today.

[20] The corresponding text of the previous Criminal code is laid down in Article 10 and has the following content: "Criminal law shall be applicable to offences committed when it is in force".

[21] According to Article 4 of the previous Criminal code: "(1) Criminal law shall not apply to actions committed under the applicability of the previous law, if such actions are no longer included in the new law. In such case, the serving of sentences, the educational and security measures ruled on under the previous law, as well as all criminal consequences of court judgments concerning those actions, shall cease once the new law comes into force. "

(2) The law prescribing security or educational measures shall also apply to criminal offences which have not been the subject of a final judgment until the entry into force of the new law".

[22] The laws concerning the regime of execution of criminal penalties may not have retrospective effect. By the Decision no.214/1997, the Constitutional Court has supported this point of view. According to this decision: "In the case of the institution of conditional release, the transitional situation is also created on the date when the criminal offence is committed and lasts until the penalty of life imprisonment or of imprisonment is executed or deemed executed. The intervention, during this period, of a criminal law which amends the institution of conditional release, as it is the case of the Law no. 140/1996, renders the determination of the applicable law subject to the rules contained in Article 15 paragraph (2) of the Constitution and Article 13 paragraph (1) of the Criminal Code, irrespective of the date on which the ruling of conviction has remained final.

Therefore, the provision of paragraph (1) of Article II of the Law no.140/1996, which refers to the applicability of the law to acts committed before its entry into force, violates the provision of Article 15 paragraph (2) of the Constitution of Romania."

the interpretative law);

- a procedural law (which shall apply immediately, irrespective of the date when the act was committed).

The subsequent interpretative criminal law may also decriminalise, if its content narrows down the sphere of facts deemed criminal offences by the previous jurisprudence of judicial bodies or if it determines a more favourable legal qualification. For instance, by reference to the provisions of the 1969 Criminal code, Article 183 of the Criminal code constitutes a subsequent more favourable interpretative criminal rule[23].

The subsequent interpretative criminal law is the law by which the legislator defines certain terms or expressions used by the criminal law after the entry into force of the interpreted law (rule).

4. Lex stricta

The principle of legality requires that the result of interpretation of the law is in line with the will of the legislator, i.e. it should be construed neither extensively, nor restrictively (lex dixit quam voluit). The extensive interpretation (lex dixit minus quam voluit) or the restrictive interpretation (lex dixit plus quam voluit) must not be admitted in criminal law.

In this context, the question is: how can one construe the criminal law in the cases where this is not clear, is equivocal or incomplete?

Although no express legal rule, which answers to this question, is prescribed, it follows from the essence of the principle of legality that in such cases and in any other cases of unsatisfactory regulations, the criminal law shall be interpreted restrictively - lex poenalia est strictissimae interpretationis et aplicationis; poenalia sunt restringenda.

The practitioner may not create criminal rules, may not extend the application thereof to unforeseen cases and must interpret any result of this operation in a strict manner, if the rule interpreted is unfavourable to the offender.

In the case of criminal rules with doubtful meaning, the adage "in dubio mitis" and not "in dubio pro reo" must be applied. This last adage is applicable only to the assessment of evidence during the criminal proceedings, because it is founded on the principle of the presumption of innocence[24].

It was held in the academic literature that "the rule of strict interpretation may not require the judge to confine the application of criminal law only to those hypotheses laid down by the legislator, when the careful analysis of the cases brought before the court prove that the latter fulfil all the elements of the criminal offence, but could not be foreseen at the date of criminalisation"[25].

5. Adoption of criminal law according to the Constitution

According to Article 73 of the Constitution: "Organic laws shall regulate (...):

h) criminal offences, penalties, and the execution thereof;

i) the granting of amnesty or collective pardon".

According to Article 115 paragraph (4) of the Constitution:

"(4) The Government can only adopt emergency ordinances in exceptional cases, the regulation of which cannot be postponed, and have the obligation to give the reasons for the emergency status within their contents".

According to Article 173 of the Criminal code:

"Criminal law means any criminal stipulation included in organic laws, emergency ordinances or other regulatory acts which, at the date they were adopted, had legal power".

It follows from the abovementioned legal and constitutional provisions that there are two categories of legal acts by which criminal rules may be prescribed, namely the organic laws and the emergency ordinances.

We conclude that criminal law may only be regulated by organic laws and emergency ordinances.

3. Conclusions

The legality of criminalisation is a fundamental principle of criminal law, intended for the legislator and the judicial bodies, according to which only the acts defined by criminal law at the time when they were committed constitute criminal offences and may be punished by criminal law.

The principle of legality of criminalisation imposes five standards, and in the absence of any of them one cannot speak of legality within the meaning of the principle we are dealing with here. Indeed, a criminal law complies with the principle of legality if it is: written (lex scripta); certain (lex certa); non-retrospective (lex pravevia); strict (lex stricta); adopted according to the provisions of the Constitution.

Criminal law may only be regulated by organic laws and emergency ordinances.

[23] Moreover, Article 146 of the 1969 Criminal code was amended several times and every time the scope of acts with "very serious consequences" was narrowed down.

CIVIL ACTION SETTLEMENT IN CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS THE DANGER RELATED CRIMES

Andrei-Viorel IUGAN[*]

Abstract

Article 1357 para. (1) Civil Code stipulates that "one that causes harm to another by an unlawful act committed with guilt is obliged to repair it". In this study, we propose to analyze whether and to what extent, a danger related crime can generate a prejudice, and if for committing such a crime, civil action may be exercised in criminal proceedings.

Keywords*: civil action, danger related crimes, criminal proceedings, moral damage, patrimonial damage.*

1. Introduction

Article 1357 para. (1) Civil Code stipulates that "one that causes harm to another by an unlawful act committed with guilt is obliged to repair it". The conditions are therefore tort: wrongful act, injury, causation between them and guilt. When the wrongful act committed is not only a civil offense but also a crime, the legislator created the possibility for the injured person to seek compensation for the damages encountered due to the criminal act subject matter of the criminal proceedings[1]. In this regard, Article 19 para. (1) Criminal Procedure Code shows that "civil action pursued in criminal proceedings is meant to hold accountable those responsible for tort in line with the civil law, for the damages caused by the act subject to criminal proceedings".

As it is rightly shown in the literature"the exercise of the two actions in one single process has advantages both for justice and for the persons concerned. Thus, justice means a saving of time and material resources when the two actions are performed in the same criminal case and settled by the same court, thereby avoiding the separate administration of relevant proof for the same offense/crime and the same perpetrator and avoidance of contradictions that could intervene in the decisions of two different courts. For the person aggrieved by the offense/crime it constitutes an easier and faster way to obtain compensation for the damages suffered, with reduced expenses. For the defendant, there is the possibility to concentrate its defense at the same time on both criminal and civil parts of the action, which reduces the costs that he would have to bear"[2].

2. The danger related crimes. Notion of.

Depending on the immediate consequences produced, crimes have been classified as regular crimes and crimes resulting from danger[3].

Danger related crimes are those offenses which are not implemented immediately through a concrete result, into a change in the surrounding reality, but the immediate result is a state of danger to the social value protected by the incrimination rule. In this regard, this type of crimes are for example traffic offenses, offenses of breach of the regulations on ammunition and weapons, offenses of forgery, breach of the measures on child custody, bigamy, incest, electoral related crimes, treason, etc. In these cases, the crime is consumed simply by taking action or inaction banned by the incrimination rule, not being necessary to also produce any concrete results.

Instead, in the case of regular crimes - result related, the immediate consequence is an actual result, and it is actually necessary to have some tangible changes in the surrounding reality. The regular result related crimes are: murder, manslaughter, interruption of birth, fetal injury, personal injury, fraud. In these cases, by simply committing the action or inaction that constitutes the material element of crime, is not sufficient for the existence of the crime itself to be considers as consumed, it is always necessary to produce a certain result.
In the majority opinion of the doctrine there is an overlap between the categorization of offenses in result related or danger related and in material crimes or formal crimes[4]. Such an overlay has been criticized, however, showing that "categorization of crimes as formal or material is made proportionally against the existence or absence of a physical object as a constituent element of the crime"[5].

Starting from this criterion of classification between formal crimes and material crimes, the author points out that there are many danger related crimes that have a material object and numerous regular crimes that do not have a material object. Such a distinction between danger related crimes and formal ones is not the subject matter of this work. In this study, we propose to analyze whether and to what extent, a danger related crime can generate a prejudice, and if for committing such a crime, civil action may be exercised in criminal proceedings.

3. Exercising civil action for danger related crimes. Jurisprudential highlights

In the guiding decision no. 1/1969 issued by the former Supreme Court show that crimes of danger are not causing harm through themselves and, as such, for such offenses, the trial court vested with the criminal proceedings is not competent to settle joint criminal and civil action. However, in our opinion, this rule should not be generalized, but analyzed reported to the issue with which was the subject matter of the reported guiding decision. Specifically, through that decision, the former Supreme Court has shown that when the person driving on the public highway a motor vehicle without a driving license, commits also other acts, through a committed or omitted action, causing material damage by degradation or destruction of property by negligence, and may be ordered by the criminal court to pay civil damages to repair the damage unless those facts, distinct from the offense of driving on public roads a vehicle without driving license, fall under other provisions of criminal law and the perpetrator was prosecuted for committing them.

Incidentally, five years later, in a decision of this case covering committing offenses of forgery and use of forgery, the Supreme Court stated that the fact that the existence of ,,crimes of forgery and use of forgery is not conditional on the occurrence of material injuries and does not exclude the possibility that, in fact, these are generating claims, either exclusively or involved in an antecedent causal complex and, as such, there is no denying the injured party the right to pursue civil action in criminal proceedings against their author, since - in this situation - a civil action has its source in the same material acts as the criminal proceedings and these material facts constitute crimes"[6].

The High Court of Cassation and Justice was also seized to decide on the path of appeals on such points of law, namely on the possibility of exercising civil action in connection with crimes of danger.

By decision of 2 June 2008, published in the Official Journal, Part I no. 230 of 08.04.2009, the High Court stated that – "the trial court vested with the criminal action in case of driving a motor vehicle on public roads by a person that doesn't have a driving license will not resolve also the civil action exercised by the owner of the damaged or destroyed vehicle during road offense". The decision showed in its justifications that "as long as the criminal court referral is made only for the offense of driving on public roads by a person not possessing a driving license, offense which by its nature is not generating injury, the party injured by the effects of other acts of the defendant committed on the same occasion, is not entitled to also proclaim itself as a civil party in the case and to join action for both civil and criminal liability. To consider otherwise would mean admitting to the possibility of exercising and joining any civil proceedings to the criminal proceedings, without deriving from it, which would be contrary to the principles governing the criminal process.

Indeed, it should be noted in this respect that the offense of driving a motor vehicle on public roads by a person without a driving license is not causing material damages by itself, because for such damages to occur, the driver would have to commit either through a committed or omitted action, at least one act to result in the damage. Therefore, in such a situation where the driver has committed another action, committed or omitted, generator of the damage, the claim cannot be accepted by the criminal court if that act that produced the damage is not incriminated under by criminal law.

In another appeal on points of law, the High Court of Cassation and Justice has shown that "the criminal court vested with the prosecution of offenses under article. 84 of Law no. 59/1934 on checks, as amended and supplemented, does not have competence to solve the civil action joint to the criminal action, as such its ruling rejected as inadmissible the civil action."

In support of decision no. 43/2008, published in the Official Journal, Part I no. 372 of 03.06.2009, the High Court showed that "essentially such crimes are: issuing a check without the authorization of the drawee; issuing a check without sufficient availability pulled, issuing a check with a false date, issuing a check which lacks an essential element or is issued in favor of the person issuing it. The aim of the incrimination of such facts is to primarily prevent the issuing of bad checks when the bank account does not have the required reserve for completing the operation to other ways that would harm the recipient. The offenses covered by Law no. 59/1934, amended and supplemented, called in the doctrine as formal, jeopardize the civil circuit in the broad sense. Their existence does not require the production of consequences to property because these protect the social relationships related to transactions with checks in order to ensure the credibility of these payment instruments, holding a particular role in trade/commercial relations. In case of committing such acts, the passive subject is the banking institution whose credibility has been compromised by the action of issuing a check without observance of the legal requirements, and not the beneficiary of the check that was issued in violation of the law.

As a result, the crimes stipulated under article 84 of Law no. 59/1934, as amended and supplemented, are crimes of danger and the purpose of their incrimination under the criminal law is to determine the correct issuing of checks and not to cover any damage. It is further noted that in the case of the crimes covered by the provisions of art. 84 of Law no. 59/1934, as amended and supplemented, the situation-premise is given by the existence of a legal report of a contractual nature, in which the check as a payment instrument represents a guarantee for the obligations of borrowers through commercial contracts concluded. Therefore, in case of committing such acts, the harm made to the creditor as injured party is determined by non-performance of the obligation assumed by the debtor-defendant in line with the concluded commercial contract and not by the subsequent issuing of the check in breach of criminal law.

It is natural, therefore, that in such cases, in order to cover the damages suffered, creditors have available only the separate civil action as means od redress, stemming from the contract and not a civil action based on tort law, in which joint civil and criminal liability can be encountered."

In practice there have been many controversies also with regards the possibility of exercising civil action in the criminal offenses of forgery.

Being endowed with a request for a dispensation of law matters, the High Court of Cassation and Justice dismissed as inadmissible the complaint by decision no. 16/2015, published in the Official Journal, Part I no. 490 of 07/03/2015.

In the reasoning of the judgment, the High Court of Cassation and Justice showed that "in the present case the subject of the referral is the aspect which falls within the scope of the rules on civil action having as subject matter the obligation to pay pecuniary and moral damages to the defendant prosecuted for the offense of forgery of private documents. Examining the conclusion brought before the High Court of Cassation and Justice, it was found that the court does not require the interpretation of legal provisions in the abstract, but to rule on the admissibility of the civil action exercised in a criminal lawsuit, jointly with the criminal law action. The method of settlement of a civil action exercised in criminal proceedings is the exclusive prerogative of the court seized with such an action.

As such, the question that can be address to the High court should only cover issues of interpretation of the law, not facts, the analysis of which being the exclusive prerogative of the respective court."

Having examined the case law it is found that the possibility of formulating civil action for crimes of forgery received different interpretations. For example, one court "re-analyzing the civil claims brought by the civil part, in accordance with the first court stated that the crime of forgery in general and the crime of forging documents under private signature in particular are danger related crimes and not outcome/ result related ones. In other words, if the case of such crimes, the crime is considered as consumed when there is a danger to the protected social relations and is not connected with the production of a detriment.

Therefore, these crimes are not by themselves causing material damage but favoring their cause. (...) It should be noted that the crime of forgery of private documents is not causing material damage by itself, whereas for their production the defendant was required to commit at least a commissive or omissive act for which to be prosecuted and sent to court and that would have had the damage as an outcome.

For these reasons, we will not accept any ground of appeal from the civil party requesting an order binding the defendant to pay material damages, because there is no causal link between the act of the defendant (which is a danger related crime) and the alleged pecuniary damage sustained by the civil part, consisting of expenses and loss of profit. Concerning moral damages, the judge wrongly considered that through the criminal act moral damage was caused to the civil party, due to stress and the need to withdraw from the authorized accounting expert profession. The crime of forging documents under private signature is a crime of danger and the aim of its incrimination as such is to defend those social relations whose training and normal development depend on public trust given to private documents and not that of coverage of any material or moral damage. Of course it would have been a different assumption if the defendant would have been prosecuted and sentenced for the offense of forgery of private documents, as a crime of danger, along with other crimes with an end result (eg. Fraud), case in which the civil action may be joint with the criminal action.

But in this case the criminal proceedings have as subject matter the crime of forgery of private documents so that civil action may not be made jointly with the criminal action"[7].

To the contrary, for the moral damages, another court showed that "with regards moral damages (40,000 euro - f. 19 folder background), from reading the constitution of the civil party as such, it follows that these claims are related, inter alia, to the use of the forged document in the civil lawsuit, act which falls into content of the offense committed by the accused. In the Court's view, the use of the forged document is capable of producing to the opposing side frustration, anguish, this part being aware that there is a risk to lose the lawsuit, through the use of illegal methods by the other party. Therefore, use of forged document in order to produce legal consequences (whether these consequences occurred or not) is likely to produce a moral injury, so claims covering damages are admissible. Regarding their amount, the Court considers that the sum of 2,000 euros is a fair compensation, given (mostly) the relatively large time (several years) in which the civil parties were deprived of fair proceedings (civil) due to the crime committed by the defendant."[8].

With regard to the facts in the two cases, in the first case the defendant was prosecuted because she used the stamp of an expert accountant to forge several balance sheets of several companies, while in the second case, the defendant falsified a document which afterwards used in a civil lawsuit.

The solutions are not uniform nor as regards the possibility of pursuing civil action for other danger related crimes.

For example, in one case of the offense of failure to comply with measures regarding child custody, the Court findings showed that "first court concluded erroneously that in line with the nature of the case before hand, it is not justified and it is not possible for one to establish itself as a civil party for the granting of material and moral damages, conclusion that is manifestly erroneous in relation to the actual data of the case. Thus, it is observed that the injured party, also civil party in the case, made dozens of failed trips at the residence of the defendant to perform parental care of the child, which generated obvious expenditure evidenced by relevant proof and whose repayment is required, seeing the damage thus created is in direct causal link with the act of the defendant.

At the same time, preventing the civil party for a long time to get in touch with his son, created a sharpened mental suffering, considering that the second son of only 4 years of age cannot meet with his brother G. At the same time the negative attitude manifested by the defendant also affected the civil party's reputation in society - against which different claims not to reflect reality were expressed, which were also capable of deepening the state of distress and negative moral due to effective inability to enforce the provisions contained in the definitive judgment, fulfillment of which was supported by local authorities with responsibilities in child protection and by the police, but all these actions failed. In those circumstances, the Court considers that admission of the civil action was necessary and admissible and ordered the defendant under Art. 19 reported to Art. 397 paragraph 1 of the Criminal Procedure Code corroborated with Art. 998 Civil Code prior, to pay material damages in the amount of 6,600 lei representing the transport for the 17 failed trips on the route B-M, in line with the documents attached as proof to the request for establishment of the civil and moral damages assessed by the Court and the amount of 15,000 lei to cover non patrimonial related damages, as such admitting the civil party's appeal under Art. 421 para 1 item 2nd letter a Criminal Procedure Code"[9].

With regards the crime of perjury, in practice it has been shown that "the crime of perjury is a crime of danger, and by incriminating such action, the legislator is aiming at protecting the ordinary course of justice, so it is not possible to formulate a civil action. The crime of perjury is not liable to cause damage seeing the legislator doesn't care if it led or not, specifically, to an unjust solution, namely if the state of danger materialized or not"[10].

In another case, however, with regards the offense of misleading the judicial bodies (slanderous denunciation according to the old Penal Code) to the person against whom the denunciation was filed and against who the concocted evidence has been used, there was admitted as moral damages payment of the sum of 100 000 euro (the person concerned had been in custody unlawfully for more than one year as a result of that denunciation)[11].

On appeal, the amount of punitive damages were reduced to 30 000 euro. The court of judicial control showed that "on the civil side of the case, the appellate court does not deny the serious consequences produced by committing the acts of the defendant B, the main impact occurred in the victim's life by deprivation of liberty on the basis of false evidence, but it believes that the damages awarded should not be disproportionate and would constitute a means of unjust enrichment of the civil party. Therefore, given the amounts set by the ECHR in finding a violation of the right to liberty and security, by way of analogy (in this case is not about the responsibility of the state for this violation since at the time of arrest against the victim there were serious indications such as to convince an objective observer that he may have committed the acts, based on the evidence the defendant B products, breach is caused due to a particular action), the Court considers that the amount of 30,000 euros is sufficient to cover moral damage suffered by the civil party. In determining the amount, the appellate court took into account the principle of full compensation for the damage caused, principle that basically excludes consideration of the material situation of the defendant as a criterion"[12].

4. Conclusions

As for us, we believe that the possibility of pursuing civil action for the cases of danger related crimes must be analyzed on a case by case basis. In this regard, the court must examine whether the offense for which the defendant is being prosecuted and trialed (even if it is a danger related crime) produced, in particular, any patrimonial damage to any other person. In the event that the damage had really occurred, it should be considered whether the injured person has any other possible way to recover the damage, except of course the formulation of a separate civil court action.

For example, if a person falsifies a document and uses it to proceed with a judicial action, the defendant may recover the expenses incurred in carrying out the lawsuit in a dispute settled by a civil court, according to Art. 451- 453 Civil Procedure Code.

If an innocent person is prosecuted following a complaint made in bad faith by the injured party, he/she will be able to recover expenses incurred from the perpetrator that mislead the judicial organs, in line with Art. 275 Para.5 Criminal Procedure Code.

If the person against whom the complaint was made is not prosecuted, it is natural for him/ her to be able to recover the expenses incurred to prove his innocence in the criminal case in which the perpetrator prosecuted for misleading the judicial bodies has the capacity of defendant. The same reasoning should be applied to the person injured by the offense of perjury.

Also we have to bear in mind that making a false complaint or any deceptive statements made by a witness can often affect the prestige and reputation of a person. In these circumstances we find no reason why those whose interests were affected could no seek justice through a civil action. Even if the offenses of perjury or misleading the judicial bodies are danger related crimes and belong to the category of crimes against justice, it must be taken into account that the unanimous doctrine considers that the person harmed as a result of false testimony or against whom the complaint or denunciation has been made has the capacity of secondary passive subject.[13] In our opinion these persons may exercise the civil action in criminal proceedings to the full extent if they prove the existence of actual damage.

We consider pertinent the arguments of the High Court of Cassation and Justice on the inability of pursuing a civil action (as determined in appeals on points of law mentioned above) in such cases as the ones connected to traffic offenses or offenses under the "Law of the check" provisions, but this cannot be extended in respect of every danger related crime. It remains the task of the Court to review on a case by case basis if the danger related crime subject matter of that judgment produced any damage and whether the claims of the civil party are founded.

THE JUDGE'S ROLE OF SURVEILLANCE OF DEPRIVATION OF LIBERTY IN THE EXECUTION OF THE CUSTODIAL PENALTIES

Dantes MARCOVICI[*]

Abstract

In this study, I decided to analyze the activity of the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty in relation to the amendments made by Law no. 254/2013 on the execution of sentences and custodial measures ordered by the court during the criminal trial, published in the Official Gazette no. 514 of August 14, 2013.
I will also analyze its role, both in terms of the powers of an administrative nature, especially those with administrative-jurisdictional nature in establishing and changing the arrangements for enforcement and custodial, educational measures for the solving of the complaints regarding the disciplinary sanctions and the complaints regarding the exercise of the rights provided by Law no. 254/2013;

Keywords*: judge, surveillance, deprivation of liberty, powers, administrative, administrative-jurisdictional, Law 254/2013.*

Introduction

The domain covered by the theme of the study is the judge's institution of supervision of deprivation of liberty in relation to the amendments made by Law no. 254/2013 on the execution of sentences and custodial measures ordered by the court during the trial.

The importance of the proposed study lies in the fact that the institution of the Judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty has a huge impact in terms of the rights of persons deprived of their liberty, as well as of establishments and arrangements for enforcement that is applied in one form or another to all detainees, both those who are serving a penalty applied by a final judgment, as well as persons against whom preventive detention was ordered.

It should be noted that the institution of the delegated judge is a relatively new Romanian law, the first time being regulated by Law no. 275/2006, it has the powers which, in a lesser or greater extent, have an administrative character (either purely administrative - as if refusing food or participation in the commission of parole from the prison, either mixed, administrative and judicial, as if resolving complaints made by prisoners or prison administration).

The objective of the study is the presentation of the work of the delegated judge for supervision of deprivation of liberty, his contribution to the rights of persons deprived of freedom, censorship, according to functional competence, of the mode of establishment and individualization regimes and changes during the execution of punishment, the solution of the complaints having the object of disciplinary sanctions for the detainees and other administrative tasks with a direct impact on how relationships are established in case of life imprisonment.

Since preparing the detained person for release must be made on the first day of detention, and this is the goal of all actions undertaken, following the fundamental objective of increasing the capacity of the convicted person of social reintegration, to facilitate the rehabilitation of the prisoner to life in freedom, to an attitude of compliance and respect for societal values, the role of the judge regarding the surveillance of deprivation of liberty, through the tasks he performs, is essential to respect the rights of the convicted persons but also in reference to the progressive changes, during the detention, of the enforcement regime in one sentence less severe, which has a special importance in reaching this goal.

In the first section of the study I will present a brief history of the institution of the Judge regarding the surveillance of deprivation of liberty, including the Romanian relevant legislation, and in the second part I will present the role of the judge in the surveillance of deprivation of liberty, the way of appointing the report by the prison administration.

The base of the study will be established in the third section of the presentation of the judge's duties regarding the surveillance of deprivation of liberty, including on the interpretation of the European Court on Human Rights, on field art. 3 and 6 of the Convention.

1. Brief history of the judge's institution for the supervising of deprivation of liberty. Legislative provisions.

The institution of the delegated judge (now called in the Romanian legislation, judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty) first, in history, appeared in Brazil in 1923 and the first European country to implement it was Portugal in 1924 through the creation of the Court of Enforcement of penalties, but his duties were limited to safety.

In Italy, the institution of the delegated judge, appears in 1930 and was not adopted by the Anglo - Saxon countries nor in the Scandinavian and Eastern European countries, including in Romania was published into law after the fall of the Iron Curtain.

As regards the legal nature of the powers of the delegated judge there are three guidelines. The first relates to purely administrative duties, the second to the exclusive jurisdictional nature and the third to the mixed.

For example, the Execution Italian Criminal system adopted as a model the administrative judge, while in the French system, although it was inspired by the Italian model, the judge has more powers, in that it disposes the deprivation of liberty, decides matters of parole, sets when the sentence is considered served, or controls the safety periods after the release.

The Romanian legislation, by Law no. 275/2006, adopted predominantly the mixed doctrine regarding the powers of the delegated judge, which is a guarantor of the rights of persons deprived of their liberty, but not their lawyer.

By Law no.254 / 2013 on the execution of custodial sentences imposed by judicial bodies during the criminal trial was proposed a new name - the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty, which as shown in the explanatory memorandum to the bill, is a name more concise and suggestive, for the judge who, being employed in prisons, arrest and detention centers, remand centers, educational and detention centers, has as main attribution the supervision and control of the legality of the execution of punishments and measures of deprivation of liberty, whether in prisons or other places of detention or arrest.

Concurrently, unlike the previous law, through the current framework law regarding the execution of penalties, were listed explicitly all the powers that it has, separating clearly the work of its management activity from the administrative-jurisdictional activity, the distinction is meant to end controversies after the entry into force of the previous law, regarding the legal nature of the activity of the judge: custody surveillance.

2. The Judge's oversight role regarding the deprivation of liberty, the way of appointing and the report with the prison administration.

Through the execution of sentences are pursued goals established by Law 254/2013, focusing on preventing the committing of crimes by applying criminal coercion.

The subsidiary aim would be of an individual order and refers to the formation of an attitude to the rule of law, to the rules of social coexistence and to work to reintegrate into society of persons detained or interned[1].

The Criminal proceedings are the activities regulated by law, the work carried out by the competent authorities, with the participation of parties and other persons[2], and the procedural rules are designed to ensure the effective exercise of the powers of judicial bodies to guarantee the rights of parties and other participants in criminal proceedings.

The Criminal proceedings distinguish several stages, of which, important for this paper work is the phase of enforcement of criminal judgments that became final, resulting in the achievement of the purpose of criminal law and criminal procedure law.

Thus, during sentencing, the judge's role to oversight the imprisonment, highlights the relationship between the judiciary power and the administration of execution penalties, between the enforcement of a final judgment and the taking of the steps to enforce specific content of mandate of imprisonment or other educational measures of deprivation of liberty. The executory effect of sentence gives birth, for the penitentiary institution or educational center, to the right to enforce sanctioning provisions and convict must obey these provisions[3].

The Institution of the judge for the surveillance of deprivation of liberty comes to reinforce and express the option of the Romanian legislator for effective control of how people are deprived of freedom, and on the line to improve and streamline the work of these judges, but also for the practical delimitation of their activity by the one held by the prison administration, the framework law contains rules on the appointment of replacements and some clerks, and the obligation of the competent state institutions to provide the necessary means to carry out the activity under optimum conditions.

In relation to the manner of appointment, according to art. 8 and 9 of Law no. 254/2013 and the provisions of art. 8- 9 of the judgment of the Superior Council of Magistracy no. 89/2014 for the approval of the organization of the activity of the judge of surveillance of the deprivation of liberty[4], in every such units are annually appointed one or more judges from courts across the court of appeal, and several alternates judges who will exercise their powers of those designated judges during the period in which they are unable to perform their duties. Appointment is made with the written consent of the judge concerned, from those who had this quality or were part of the court's criminal chamber executions.

To ensure smooth conduct of business of the supervision judge for the deprivation of liberty, the president of the appeal court annually appoints clerks and alternates clerks needed for the registration and registry office.

Concurrently, during the exertion of the duties regarding the surveillance of the execution of penalties and of the custodial measures, the judge of surveillance of the deprivation of liberty can not carry out other activities in which the court has been designated.

In art. 3 of the Higher Magistrates Council Resolution no. 89 of 31.01.2014 it is stated that in the exercise of its attributions, the supervising judgeof deprivation of liberty is independent, impartial and is subject only to the law.

The Regulation provides many more cases of incompatibility, respectively the situation in which the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty has to resolve complaints or requests concerning the spouse, relative or his in-laws, or up to grade IV inclusively, or may be located in a different situation from those set out in art.177 of Law no. 286/2009 on the Criminal Code, as amended and supplemented, or on who we believe would be affected impartiality, they shall be settled by alternate judge. The existence of such circumstances shall be immediately informed to the President of the Court of Appeal in whose territorial jurisdiction is the place of detention.

These provisions shall be applied accordingly and where the hearing or the research aim a misconduct committed in the presence of the judge of supervision of deprivation of liberty.

Regarding its activity, should be noted that the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty may hear any convicted person or working in the prison system, may request information or documents from the administration of the detention, can make spot checks and has access to individual file of prisoners, to records and any other documents or records necessary to fulfill the duties provided by law, with the respecting of confidentiality and professional secrecy, obligation incumbent to the Registrar appointed by the President of the court of appeal.

Concurrently, any person, organization, institution or authority is obliged to respect the independence of the judge supervisory of imprisonment and to provide it with requested documents and information. Space available to judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty must be equipped with furniture and cabinets for storage of archives, IT equipment and to enable him access to the Internet, the program legislation and computerized system of registration of persons deprived of freedom in detention.

Consequently, the prison staff is bound to support the office of the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty, by forwarding all complaints and appeals made by inmates to communicate closings, to submit files to the court, to notify those concerned about receiving in audience, or for other hearings to resolve complaints.

Regarding the logistical conditions in which must operate the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty and the delegated Registrar, the penitentiary administration or, where appropriate, of the center of detention and arrest, of the Centre of arrest, of educational center or detention center, is bound to provide the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty with the space arranged to enable the conduct of its work in good conditions and are used exclusively by it.

In order to implement these provisions in most places of detention such requirements are met, the judge and the clerk being given one individual desk that they use exclusively, located in the building related to the prison administration; Each office is equipped with appropriate furniture and IT equipment (computer, printer) with Internet access, the legislative program and the ANP database - records of detainees.

Also, the consumables necessary to the work of the Office of the judge, shall be provided by the prison administration, and the hearing of the persons sentenced by the Judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty takes place in a room made available to this effect by the administration, located inside of the prison.

3. The powers of the judge of surveillance of the deprivation of liberty in relation with the amendments brought by The Law no. 254/2013

It can be said after analyzing the legal duties that the primary role of the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty is to monitor and control the execution of sentences and ensuring the legality of custodial measures and the respecting of the rights of convicted persons.

1. The main judicial administrative duties of the judge of surveillance of imprisonment provided for in art. 9, paragraph. (2) of Law 254/2013, as follows:

handles complaints of prisoners on exercise of the rights provided by this law;

2. handles complaints regarding the establishment and changing of regimes for enforcement and educational measures involving deprivation of liberty;
3. resolve complaints from prisoners regarding disciplinary sanctions; In art. 9 para. (2) of Decision Of the Superior Council of Magistracy No. 89/2014 are provided also the administrative duties of the judge of surveillance of imprisonment respectively: provides audiences to the detainees; exercise the powers provided by the law on the procedure for refusal of nourishment; participates as chairman at meetings of the commission for parole; participates as president, in the procedure to replace the measure admission to the detention center or educational center with daily assisting educational measure; participates as president, in the procedure for granting the release from the educational or detention center; participates as president, in the procedure to continue the execution of the educational measure of imprisonment in the penitentiary; grants approval for collection of biological samples for testing convicted person, if there are indications that it has consumed drugs, alcohol or toxic substances or ingested without prescription drugs likely to cause behavior disorders; carries out spot checks in places of detention. "

The difference between these functions is that the duties of administrative jurisdiction are exercised within the special procedures prescribed by law and are terminated by an administrative-jurisdictional act called closing and the closings of the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty that became enforceable according to the law, are required.

Since the procedure is an administrative judicial one and the conclusion was not a judgment, it is not necessary that it contains all the specific judgments (for example: pending, at the roll call, pronounced in open court; pronounced in the council chamber of ....).

In addition to the mention expressly made in the law, another argument that the procedure completed by a judicial-administrative conclusion and not a judgment is that it has a special regulation established by Law no. 254/2013, different from the hearing of the criminal procedure code.

Thus, first, the hearing requires the compliance with rules and principles that can not be applied in the procedure of the delegated judge that takes place in prison (ex: officialdom, contradictory, advertising, provide legal assistance, etc.);

Concurrently, in the prison in which is operating the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty, often is not possible the managing of evidence in terms of the Criminal Procedure Code (ex. Hearing of witnesses under oath, the bringing before the court of people who are not in prison, for hearing, etc.; as a matter of fact, the law does not use the terms of witnesses or parties);

This conclusion is based on the fact that the detained person unhappy with the solution of the judge given in this procedure, can make an appeal in the court, where he will have all procedural guarantees specific to hearing.

As a way of working, the complaints are submitted by the prison authorities through the secretariat, with an address and a registration number from the computerized application and at their receipt, the complaints are registered in the general register, in the register of administrative-judicial complaints and in the alphabetic list, in the order they were received.

After registering the complaints in the records, the file is formed, which received number in order to highlight the register of complaints with an administrative-judicial character and on the cover of the file is specified the file number, the name of the complainant, the subject of the case, and after settling the complaint, number and date of conclusion.

After the managing of evidence, the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty shall prepare a reasoned conclusion that resolves the complaint, which has two parts. The first part includes: case number, the name of the judge of surveillance and the name of the prison, number and date of conclusion of the proceedings, the object of the case and the date of notification, the name of the person deprived of liberty, the pleas and the evidence, the facts retained, the motivation of the solution and the presentation of the grounds of law justifying the solution.

Part two includes: the rendered outcome, the mention that this is subject to appeal, the deadline until the appeal can be filed and the court to whom is addressed, date of delivery, the signature of the judge.

The decisions handed down by the Judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty receive a number from the register of conclusions in the order of delivery. Date and number of conclusion are listed in the register for administrative-judicial claims. The conclusion is drawn up in 5 copies. Of these, one copy is kept at the map of conclusions, one is lodged in the case file, and the other three copies shall be communicated to the prison administration to ensure that a copy will be forwarded to the representatives of the prison in exercising the right to appeal the decision, another to be handed to the person deprived of liberty and the last to be submitted to the individual file of the prisoner.

Appeals against the solutioning of complaints shall be forwarded by the penitentiary administration by address (with proof of communication of the conclusion) to the Judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty, who mentions on the address, the date of receipt of the appeal, and after registering in the registry for complaints with an administrative-judicial character, the disputes shall be submitted to the competent court, along with the case file (bonded, sealed and numbered) within two days of receiving them, based on address, through the Secretariat / mail of the penitentiary administration.

The Shipping data of the files is referred by completing the relevant headings in the register of complaints with administrative-judicial character and in the delivery-receipt of correspondence Register(ledger), where the employee of the prison signs.

As regards the deadlines for dealing with complaints by the judge for supervision of imprisonment, according to art. 39 para. 6 and art. 56 para. 7 of Law no.254 / 2013, the judge is obliged to settle the complaint within 10 days of its receipt (in case of complaint against the establishment or modification of the regime for penalty) or 15 days (in case of complaint concerning the respecting of the rights of the sentenced persons) and by the pronounced conclusion, he will be able to dispose one of the following solutions:

a) allows the complaint;
b) rejects the complaint if it is unfounded, late or inadmissible and / or devoid of purpose;
c) notes the withdrawal of the complaint.

From the formal point of view, after the solution of the complaints regarding the duties provided for in art. 9 paragraph. 2 letters a-c of Law 254/2013, the conclusion of the custodial surveillance judge shall be communicated to the convicted person and to the penitentiary administration within 3 days from the date of delivery thereof, and against the conclusion, the convicted person and the prison administration can make an appeal to the court in whose jurisdiction is located the prison, within three days or five days from notification, as appropriate.

The legislator has provided this remedy for respecting the constitutional principle of free access to justice and the censorship by a court of an administrative decision, as the one of the committee establishing or modifying the regime of execution or enforcement of a disciplinary sanction, constitute an additional guarantee to the convicted person.

The appeal does not suspend the execution of the conclusion and is examined in open court, summoning the convicted person and the prison administration and the convicted person is brought to court only when ordered by the court, in this case being heard. Legal aid is not compulsory, and if the prosecutor and the prison administration participate in the trial, they make conclusions and the court will pronounce a definitive sentence.

Regarding the Administrative Judicial attribution of solution of the Complaints of the inmates regarding the application of the disciplinary sanctions, should be noted, (in terms of fairness and of the reasonable duration of the disciplinary proceedings of detainees in relation to the interpretation of the European Court on Human Rights, on the field of the art. 6 of the Convention for the subject of this study, although the article in question refers explicitly only to the "criminal" allegations), that the Court made three criteria governing the conditions under which Article 6, along with its safeguards, is applied in disciplinary proceedings in the execution of custodial sentences.

The Court first established that should be considered the classification of the offense in domestic law and even if it is not a crime but is classified only as a disciplinary offense, in the proceedings, the Article 6 may be used, being the situation in which the offense can be equated with a criminal offense, in terms of its nature and by this principle, the Court sought to prevent from the start the removal of procedural guarantees stipulated in Article 6 for some misbehaviors, based on internal classifications.

Thus, the court established, independently of the autonomously, internal law, what is meant by the accusation "criminal" and investigating the facts that, under national law, are not criminal offenses, if they can be equated to an offense, in terms of their nature. Also, the Court examined whether the imposed penalties can be equated to a criminal penalty, in terms of the nature and severity (see ECHR, June 8, 1976, Engel and others / Netherlands, no. 5100/71, 5101/71, 5102 / 71, 5354/72, 5370/72, pt. 81.82), and in this respect, recognizes the particular context which characterizes the internal disciplinary procedures in prisons.

The Court considered that there may be practical reasons and fundamental considerations, to determine the need for a special system in prisons to maintain discipline, a system that should not be considered as a procedure of accusation "criminal" in this category being found the considerations safety, public order, a rapid resolution of cases of inappropriate behavior of inmates, the existence of sanctions tailored to the this sector and the obligation of management of the place of detention to take responsibility for safety and order in the place of detention (see ECHR June 28, 1984, Campbell and Fell ./. United Kingdom, no. 7819/77, 7878/77, pt. 69)

However, in The European court's sense, the guaranteed right to a fair trial is a fundamental principle of a democratic society. Despite the particular context of internal discipline in prisons, stating that "dividing line" between the disciplinary measures that do not fall under Article 6 and the "criminal" accusations under Article 6, shall be determined having regard to the intentions and purposes of this article.(ECHR, June 8, 1976, Engel and others ./. The Netherlands, no. 5100/71, 5101/71, 5102/71, 5354/72, 5370/72, pt. 81, 82; ECHR June 28, 1984, Campbell Fell ./. United Kingdom, no. 7819/77, 7878/77, pt. 69)

Thus, the Court specified all these in its case in the cause Campbell and Fell v United Kingdom, that the plaintiffs protested the mistreatment of other detainees, sitting down in the corridor of the prison and refusing to get out of there, being lift by force. Campbell and other inmates were disciplined for mutiny or incitement to mutiny. It should be noted that at the time, in the United Kingdom, if it was pronounced a sentence of imprisonment for a limited period of time, each person deprived of liberty had the automatic right to a sentenced reduced by one third, and the penalty was imposed to several prisoners, including Campbell, in disciplinary proceedings, and the sanction consisted of denying the right to release before the deadline, given that one of the persons concerned, could benefit from a total reduction of the sentence of 570 days and this was, in the light of the Court, a serious consequence for the duration of the penalty, so that this penalty must be classified, under the Convention, as a criminal charge, although technically, the punishment was not directly imprisonment.

Regarding the administrative-jurisdictional task of the judge of surveillance of imprisonment, provided for in art. 9 paragraph. (2) of Law 254/2013, to solve the complaints of prisoners on exercise of rights under this Law, should be noted that the legal rights of detainees are set out in art. 56-80 of Law no. 254/2013, and any person is not allowed to restrict the exercise of these rights more than does the law or the Constitution.

In the execution of this task, the judge sees over the respecting of the rights of detainees, to assess the conditions of detention and the magistrate must take into account the cumulative effects of these conditions also considering the period during which a person is held under those special conditions.

Given that the acute shortage of space in the cells of prisons from Romania has an increased share, this should be considered in particular by the Judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty at the time when the complaints are analyzed, following to determine whether the conditions of detention may be considered degrading, including in terms of art. 3 of the Convention. Art. 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights enshrines one of the most important values of democratic societies categorically prohibiting torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. Incident to be applied treatments must meet a minimum threshold of gravity, and in this context, the state is assigned two types of obligation: a negative, overall one, not to subject a person within its jurisdiction to treatment contrary to Article. 3:01 and substantial positive obligation, to take preventive measures to ensure the physical and moral integrity of detainees, such as the provision of minimum conditions of detention and adequate medical treatment.

The European Court has admitted on several occasions that it was a violation of Article 3 if the detention rooms were small, overcrowded or unbearable renovation conditions and hygiene.

Thus the cause of Kalashnikov against Russia, the detention room was permanently overcrowded. Each person had only 0.9 to 1.9 m2, two or three people had to share a bed, and thus can only lie flat sequentially. The detaining room was light during the day and night. The 18 to 24 inmates were continuously producing noise, the smoking was allowed, no ventilation, and the prisoner was entitled to spend only two hours a day outside the detention room. At the same time, the sanitary equipping was poor, there was no disinfection, and in the four years of detention in these circumstances, there was a substantial worsening of his health. Considering these aspects, the Court held that it is a degrading treatment within the meaning of Article 3 (ECHR, 15 October 2002 Kalashnikov./ Russia, no. 47095/99, §. 92-103).

At the same time the Court held in the case Iacov Stanciu against Romania, application no. 35972/05, paragraph 166, that custodial measures applied to a person can sometimes involve an inevitable element of suffering or humiliation but, nevertheless, suffering and humiliation involved must not go beyond the inevitable element of suffering or humiliation connected with some form of treatment or punishment with legitimacy.

With respect to detainees, the Court showed already in previous cases that a prisoner does not lose, through the mere fact of his incarceration, his rights guaranteed by the Convention. On the contrary, people in detention have a vulnerable position and the authorities are obliged to defend them, and under art. 3, the state must ensure that a person is detained in conditions compatible with respect for his human dignity, that the manner and method of execution of the measure are not subject to distress or hardship for the detain person, exceeding the unavoidable level of suffering inherent in detention and that, given the practical needs of imprisonment, his health and well-being are adequately secured.

According to art. 48 para. 5 of Law 254/2013, the minimum binding rules on conditions for accommodation of sentenced persons shall be established by the minister of justice. According to art. 1 para. Annex 1 of the Order of the Minister of Justice no. 433/2010, spaces for the accommodation of detainees must respect human dignity and must meet minimum standards of health and hygiene, taking into account the conditions and climates, especially the living space, air volume, lighting, heating and ventilation. In terms of the living space, art. 3 letter b of the same law provides that the accommodation rooms from the existing prisons must ensure at least 4 square meters per person deprived of liberty, framed in incarceration regime or maximum security regime.

In its jurisprudence, (Iacov Stanciu, par. 168), The Court decided that, in the causes in which the applicants were given less than 3 m² of living space, it found that overcrowding was severe enough to justify, itself, the violation of art. 3 of the Convention.

Regarding the administrative attribution of the judge of supervision of the deprivation of liberty, to participate in the refusal of food is found that the refusal constitutes a severe form of protest of detainees, which can cause health consequences or consequences regarding their lives, but also with respect to the execution of custodial sentences, because during detention, convicts are in state custody, who has the duty to enforce penalties. For this reason, essential duty of the state is to ensure the conditions for the execution of penalty and to ensure the protection of life, health and bodily integrity of the detainees.

According to art. 54 of Law 254/2013, in the situation in which, a convicted person intends to refuse food, notifies the supervising agent, verbally or in writing and submits to it any written claims on the reasons for refusal of food, and if the convicted person refuses to receive three consecutive meals, notifies the prison's director.

At the same time, the director of the prison, hears the convicted person stating the reasons for refusal of food, notifies the judge of surveillance of imprisonment, about reasons of the refusal to eat of the prisoner and his decision to continue to be in denial of food. From the moment when the judge of surveillance is notified, it is considered that the prisoner is in refusal of food and in some cases, the judge of surveillance has the obligation to hear the prisoner and and to resolve by conclusion the notified aspects.

After hearing, if convicted person keeps refusing food, the Judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty may make proposals to the prison's director.

In this context, it is very important that the judge of surveillance of deprivation of liberty to identify and analyze the reasons that led the person to enter into refusal of food, and whether they are within its fold or in the prison's administration fold, to order the appropriate measures.

The refusal of nourishment shall be recorded in an established special register, entitled 'Register of refusal of food "and notices and work done is kept in chronological order, in the file of refusal of food, but there are cases when are made folders for each referral.

In most cases, they proceed to the hearing by the judge of the person deprived of liberty, the issues shown by it being recorded in a statement written either by the prisoner or by the delegated Registrar or delegated judge or typed and signed by person in the refusal of food, the delegated judge and the clerk.

Regarding the place for the hearing of inmates entered in the refusal of food, this is done inside the prison or detention center and even in the court when the judge fulfills other duties within it.

From the practice of the delegated judges, was revealed that in some cases, the detainees resort to this form of protest only in order to gain access as soon as possible to judge without respect for the audience program.

Conclusions

With the implementation of judge institution of supervision of the deprivation of liberty, in the Romanian legal system appeared certain animosities and struggles of egos between magistrates and directors of prisons, and the latter, following the transfer of administrative duties to the judge, found that there was a decrease of their authority in the eyes of their subordinates, or even the inmates.

The Judge of surveillance of the deprivation of liberty does not have organizational attributions, though to verify aspects shown by the persons convicted regarding the conditions of detention, can make checks in the prison, and the administration of the prison is obliged to provide the necessary support for such actions.

If upon inspection resulted in deficiencies to be rectified, the findings of the supervisory judge of imprisonment, shall be notified by address, to the director of the prison and the judge may make proposals on the measures it considers necessary to remedy the situation.

However, the judge is not the director of the prison nor above him, he must be impartial and be a guarantor of the rights of persons deprived of liberty without turning into an advocate for them.

Between the judge and the prison management is not beneficial to have a relationship of rivalry, because they must work together to find solutions for prevention of occurrence of discontent among the detainees on the application and enforcement of laws, and to limitate the complaints made often in bad faith by some inmates.

However, although the new legislative provisions are generous in terms of the judge's role of surveillance of deprivation of liberty, which has a predominant role in the observance of the rights of detainees, in the establishment and modification of the regimes of enforcement, the Romanian prison system is still in crisis, suffering from overcrowding and underfunding detention places and application of the new provisions of Law no. 254/2013 is a costly undertaking that transfers crime problems especially to prisons and to a lesser extent even to the judge of surveillance of custody.

THE EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS – A COMPARATIVE APPROACH

Mihai MAREŞ[*]

Abstract

The present paper examines the exclusion of evidence within the criminal proceedings, as regulated in the Romanian legislation as well as in other legal systems, pertaining both to the common law and to the civil law major legal traditions. The focus shall be placed upon the configuration of this procedural institution in the two aforementioned categories of legislation, namely of the exclusionary rule specific to the former and the exclusion of evidence by means of the nullity sanction, which is likely to be encountered in the latter, while also revealing the elements of approximation between them, as presented especially in the national legal paradigm, including in the relevant case-law. Further consideration shall be given to the European standards having a bearing on the matters in question, provided both by the European Convention of Human Rights and the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights, and the European Union, with regard to the need to achieve a common set of principles in the application of the exclusionary mechanism.

Keywords*: common law and civil law legal traditions, criminal proceedings, the principle of legality, the exclusion of evidence, nullity.*

1. Introduction

The legal systems throughout the Western world are deeply rooted in a specific legal culture based on two major traditions, namely the Romano-Germanic or civil law tradition and the Anglo-American or common law tradition.

The aim of the present paper is to illustrate the specific traits of the two traditions as they are reflected in the evidence law within the criminal proceedings of several states belonging to both traditions, by placing a special focus upon the exclusion of evidence.

This outline becomes especially relevant for the analysis of the Romanian criminal procedure law, belonging to the civil law family of legal systems, as, in the process of reforming the criminal justice system carried out, among other measures, by the lawmakers' adopting new codes of substantial and procedural criminal law, in effect as of February 2014, the common-law legal institutions have served as a recurrent source of inspiration. Such is the case of the newly-introduced procedural sanction of excluding unlawfully or disloyally adduced evidence.

By building upon the Romanian and foreign literature and case-law, the underlining idea of the present study is that the provisions regulating the exclusion of evidence within the Romanian criminal proceedings represent in fact a synthesis of some apparently incompatible traits of the two traditions.

Consequently, the present study is anchored in the scholarly endeavour to further deepen the novel nature of the exclusion of evidence procedural mechanism, which, in order to be fully understood and uniformly applied in practice, requires a proper knowledge of the origins, general configuration, and mutations of this institution, in the legal systems belonging to both aforementioned legal traditions as well as by considering the relevant European instruments.

1.1. The Criminal Proceedings as Developed in the Two Major Legal Traditions

One of the main traits of the civil law tradition is codification, which determines the proceedings to unfold under very strict rules, as opposed to the common-law tradition, based on judicial precedent, where the established case-law is the driving force of legal development[1]. Also, it has been noted that while the former is "person-centered", the latter is "centered on adjudication"[2].

The structural differences that shape these two paradigms also become apparent in the configuration of the criminal proceedings.

For instance, there are several differences in the legal treatment of evidence law according to the two legal traditions. In general, in common-law jurisdictions, the judge rules on issues of law, controlling the procedural aspects and instructing the jury thereof, while the lay jury is in charge of determining the facts, whereas in civil law jurisdictions, the evidence gathered during the prosecution phase is collected in a dossier, which forms the basis for the trial phase[3].

Moreover, in the common-law systems, the review of the ruling rendered by the court of first instance tends to focus on issues of law, while, in the civil law systems, the appeal has a broader scope, also dealing with the findings on facts[4].

1.2. The Inquisitorial and the Adversarial / Accusatorial Models of Criminal Proceedings

There are two models of criminal proceedings, largely corresponding to each of the two legal traditions: the inquisitorial model, representative of the civil law legal systems and the adversarial or accusatorial model, specific to the common-law legal systems.

Within the adversarial adjudication process, the parties play a central, active part by presenting their arguments and suggesting evidence in accordance with their position before a decision-maker who has no prior knowledge of the case; conversely, in the inquisitorial adjudication process, the judge's role is more prominent, not being a mere recipient of the information in a packaged form, but actively overseeing the unfolding of the proceedings[5].

As the scholars rightly argue, there is no purely inquisitorial or purely adversarial criminal procedure[6]. What is more, the dichotomy is considered by a part of the literature as "limited or even outdated", considering the set of common values shared by both models[7].

2. The Exclusion of Evidence in the Common-Law Legal Traditions

2.1. The Exclusionary Rule in the Legal System of the United States of America

The exclusion of evidence in the North American proceedings is closely connected to the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution, as a remedy against violations of the provisions regulating search and seizure, self-incriminatory statements, and the defendants' right to counsel, respectively[8].

The scope of the Fourth Amendment is to safeguard a person's right to liberty and security as well as the right to private life against arbitrary arrests and invalid searches or various forms of surveillance[9].

The adoption of the USA PATRIOT Act (its full title being Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act of 2001), as a reaction to the 9/11 terrorist attacks, has represented a challenge for the issues pertaining to the exclusion of evidence in the context of the necessity to comply with the constitutional guarantees provided for under the Fourth Amendment. In this regard, it may seem paradoxical that the act allowed for significant restrictions placed upon the fundamental rights and freedoms with the exact purpose of protecting them (for example, by eliminating the probable cause standard required to legitimise the intrusive acts of the state authorities or the obligation to notify the person targeted by a search)[10], which is liable to create an imbalance between the public interest of protecting the national security and the private interest of exercising the fundamental rights[11].

The application of the Fifth Amendment in criminal matters relates to the right to a grand jury, the interdiction of "double jeopardy" (an institution similar to the ne bis in idem principle in civil law systems), as well as to some guarantees regarding the fair nature of the proceedings (protection against self-incrimination, "due process of law")[12].

As far as the privilege against self-incrimination is concerned, the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that the evidence obtained in violation of what has come to be commonly known as the "Miranda rights" or the "Miranda warning" are to be excluded. These legal concepts derive from the well-known decision rendered in the Miranda v. Arizona case, whereby, in 1966, the Supreme Court ruled on the exclusion of the statements provided by the defendant Ernesto Miranda before the police body, admitting to committing the offences he had been charged with, namely kidnapping and rape, without his being properly informed beforehand of the right to remain silent and the right to an attorney and without the judicial body ensuring that the accused has understood these rights and the consequences of waiving the exercise thereof[13].

The literature[14] also suggests an innovative interpretation of the "Miranda rights", by arguing that the hearing of a suspect in custody raises issues including from the perspective of the Fourth Amendment, in the sense that the judicial body must obtain the voluntary consent of the accused before "searching" his mind and "seizing" his answers, the protection being applicable regardless of whether the statements have a self-incriminatory nature or not.

The Sixth Amendment comprises the following rights of defendants in criminal proceedings: the right to a public trial without undue delay, the right to a lawyer, the right to an impartial jury as well as the right to be informed of the accusers and the nature of the charges and evidence against the accused; the application of this legal text in practice includes cases of terrorism and issues of jury selection or witness protection[15].

Considering that the exclusionary rule has been shaped by the judiciary in the course of decades, especially by the case-law of the Supreme Court, which established, among other aspects, that the rule should not only be applied within the federal system but also at state level, the rationale of exclusion has gradually suffered a mutation, by shifting from being a remedy to becoming a means of deterrence, aiming at discouraging the improper conduct of the judicial body[16].

This shift of perspective allowed for several exceptions to the exclusionary rule to be enshrined, as follows:

1. the good faith exception, preventing the exclusion of evidence if officers reasonably relied on a search warrant subsequently proven as invalid (this exception was addressed in cases such as Arizona v. Evans, 1995; Herring v. U.S., 2009; Davis v. U.S., 2011);
2. the independent source doctrine, which implies that initially unlawfully obtained evidence may still be admissible if it is subsequently obtained by means of a constitutionally valid search or seizure (addressed in Maryland v. Macon, 1985);
3. the inevitable discovery doctrine, allowing for evidence to be admissible if it would have been obtained irrespectively of the unlawful means;
4. the attenuation doctrine, implying the admissibility of evidence if its relationship with the unlawful means of discovery is considerably attenuated;
5. evidence admissible for impeachment, aiming at questioning the credibility of defendants' testimonies but which cannot be used in order to prove guilt; or
6. qualified immunity, protecting the officers from legal action if it is reasonably thought that they have acted in good faith[17].

On June 20, 2016, the Supreme Court rendered its judgment in the Utah v. Strieff case, settling the issue of law consisting in determining whether the exclusionary rule applies when a police officer takes knowledge, during an unlawful taking into custody of a person, of the existence of an arrest warrant issued against that person, proceeds to enforcing the warrant, and discovers incriminatory evidence during the search relating to the arrest (in this case, there were drugs found in the person's pockets). The court found the evidence thus obtained to be admissible, by noting the good faith of the judicial body as well as by stating that the causal link between the unconstitutional act consisting in the unlawful deprivation of liberty and the discovery of the evidence had been attenuated by the existence of a valid arrest warrant, which ultimately may be interpreted as yet another departure from the traditional view on the "fruit of the poisonous tree"[18].

2.2. The Exclusionary Rule in the Legal System of the United Kingdom

With reference to the theoretical justification of the exclusion of evidence, the case-law of the British courts reflects various points of view[19]: thus, according to the – rather controversial – reliability principle, which is based on a clear-cut distinction between the judicial functions, the rationale of the exclusionary rule itself is under debate, the main argument being that the unlawfully obtained evidence (especially the material evidence) may be as reliable as the evidence obtained lawfully, the evidentiary value being the same, regardless of the manner in which they were adduced. According to the deterrence principle, the purpose of the exclusionary rule is to increase accountability among the criminal investigation body, preventing violations that may compromise the prosecution. From the perspective of the protective principle, the exclusionary rule is aimed at safeguarding the rights of the accused. The judicial integrity principle, taken from the 1961 Mapp v. Ohio case pertaining to the application of the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, rejects the absolute separation of the judicial functions, by means of the argument that the investigative and trial phases are connected both from the procedural point of view and in the public perception, so as the infringement of the rights occurring in the incipient phase of the proceedings may threaten the integrity of the justice dispensing mechanism.

The relevant provisions regarding the exclusionary rule within the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland are to be found in the following acts: the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE), which comprises criminal procedure provisions regarding the powers of the police in England and Wales, as well as codes of practices relating to the exercise of those powers; similar provisions are encountered in the Police and Criminal Evidence Order 1989 (PACE NI) applicable in Northern Ireland, and the Criminal Procedure Act 1995, applicable in Scotland[20].

Section 76 paragraph (2) of PACE 1984[21] provides that the confessions made by an accused person that, as is represented to the court, have been or may have been obtained by oppression or in consequence of anything said or done which was likely, in the circumstances existing at the time, to render them unreliable are not allowed to be given in evidence against him except insofar as the prosecution proves to the court, in accordance with the probative standard beyond reasonable doubt, that the confession – notwithstanding that it may be true – was not obtained as aforesaid.

The circumstances determining a confession to be unreliable have been broadly interpreted by the Court of Appeal in the 1987 R v. Fulling case, to include the following: confessions obtained as the result of an inducement, such as a promise of bail or a promise that a prosecution would not arise from the confession; hostile and aggressive questioning; failure to accurately record the statement, to caution, to provide an appropriate adult where required, to comply with the Code of Practice in relation to the detention of the accused (for example, not allowing sufficient rest prior to an interview) or to act properly in the capacity of a defence solicitor or appropriate adult[22].

According to paragraph (4) of Section 76 of PACE 1984, the exclusion of a confession, wholly or partly, shall not affect the admissibility in evidence of any facts discovered as a result of the confession or where the confession is relevant as showing the particularities of his way of speech, writing or expression, of so much of the confession as is necessary to show such issues.

Section 78 of PACE 1984 is entitled "Exclusion of unfair evidence" and, in the two component paragraphs, this legal texts provides for the general possibility of a court to refuse to allow evidence on which the prosecution proposes to rely to if it appears to the court that, having regard to all the circumstances, including the ones in which the evidence was obtained, the admission of the evidence would have such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings that it should not be admitted. It is further stated that nothing in this section shall prejudice any rule of law requiring a court to exclude evidence.

The fairness of the adduction of evidence has been successfully challenged so far as a result of invoking breaches of the European Convention of Human Rights, breaches of the Codes of Practice issued under PACE or bad faith on the part of the police[23].

3. The Exclusion of Evidence in the Civil Law Legal Traditions

3.1. The Exclusion of Evidence in the German Legal System

In the German legislation, the procedural institution of the exclusion of evidence dates from the 1950s, borrowing some elements from the American model, such as the exclusionary rule, the "fruit of the poisonous tree" doctrine or the attenuation doctrine[24].

The regulation pertaining to excluding evidence is not provided for at constitutional level and does not operate with the notion of nullity, the exclusionary rules provided by law being scarce and lacking general applicability. There are several statutory exclusionary rules (gesetzliche Beweisverwertungs-verbote) under the German Code of Criminal Procedure – one example of a statutory rule is the exclusion of evidence obtained following the judicial body's failure to inform the suspect of the rights provided for under Section 136 paragraph (1) second sentence of the Code of Criminal Procedure[25], namely the right to respond to the charges or to remain silent, and the right, at any stage, even prior to his examination, to consult with his chosen defence counsel – but, in the majority of cases, the court shall decide in these matters based on non-standardised exclusionary rules (nicht normierte Beweisverwertungsverbote), especially in cases of a manifest violation of rights[26].

Other classifications of the exclusionary rules distinguish between, on the one hand, independent exclusionary rules (selbständige Beweisverwertungsverbote) and dependent exclusionary rules (unselbständige Beweisverwertungsverbote) and, on the other hand, between obligatory exclusionary rules (absolute Verwertungsverbote), implying a strict exclusion of evidence, and relative exclusionary rules (relative Verwertungsverbote), which are left to the discretion of the judge. The two categories are intertwined, as independent exclusionary rules are generally obligatory, while dependent exclusionary rules, based on serious violations of evidence adduction rules may be either obligatory or relative[27].

The exclusion of evidence is closely connected to some of the principles applicable in the German criminal proceedings, as indicated in the literature[28]: the case-law acknowledges a certain margin of discretion in assessing whether the principle of proportionality (Grundsatz der Verhältnismässigkeit) should apply, aiming at removing any arbitrariness concerning the investigation and balancing the individual's interest of exercising the constitutional right to privacy with the public interest of fighting crime. Under Section 244 paragraph (2) of the German Code of Criminal Procedure, the principle of establishing the truth is enshrined, allowing the court to extend the taking of evidence, proprio motu, to all facts and means of proof relevant to the decision; however, as noted by the Federal Court of Justice, this principle is not absolute, being limited by the necessity to comply with the standards of protecting human rights. At the same time, the principle of the free assessing of evidence (freie Beweiswürdigung) is acknowledged, requiring that the judge eliminates, within his evaluation, the factual elements derived from excluded evidence.

According to Section 244 paragraph (3) of the same Code, an application to adduce evidence shall be rejected if the adduction of such evidence is inadmissible, so the court must dismiss such an application if the evidence was obtained unlawfully[29].

3.2. The Exclusion of Evidence in the French Legal System

Although the regulation pertaining to the exclusion of evidence in France has undergone a long history (its apparition may be identified around 1910), it has been observed that it has not been accompanied by a consistent case-law in the course of time, the cases whereby the exclusion of unlawfully obtained evidence is registered to having been ordered being quite rare[30].

According to the French legislation in force, similarly to the Romanian law, the invalidation of unlawful evidence takes place through the nullity sanction, the relevant provisions being set out under articles 170-174 of the French Code of Criminal Procedure[31], entitled "Des nullités de l'information", representing the equivalent of the exclusionary rules in the Anglo-Saxon law[32].

Thus, according to article 170 of the French Code of Criminal Procedure, throughout the investigation, the investigation chamber may be referred for the annulment of a procedure act by the investigating judge, by the prosecutor, by the parties or by an assisted witness.

Under article 171 of the same Code it is provided that the nullity sanction intervenes when the breach of an essential procedural condition has interfered with the parties' interests it concerns. The party in respect of whom the breach of an essential procedural condition has occurred may waive the invoking thereof and, consequently, cover the irregularity; the waiver must be explicit and made in the presence of an attorney or where the latter has been duly summoned (art. 172).

In accordance with the provisions set out under article 173 paragraph 5 of the French Criminal Procedure Code, one of the rulings that may be rendered within the investigating chamber is to find the application inadmissible, by an unappealable order, for the reasons pursuant to this legal text or for the lack of providing reasoning thereof, in which case the file is returned to the investigating judge, and, in other cases, it is transmitted to the general prosecutor.

Article 174 of the French Criminal Procedure Code states that, when the investigating chamber is referred, pursuant to the provisions set out under the previous article, all grounds for nullity transmitted to it must be invoked, without prejudice to the possibility of their being invoked ex officio. Should the parties fail to comply with this condition, they will no longer be able to invoke them, except for the case when these grounds could not have been known. The investigating chamber shall decide whether the annulment must aim all vitiated procedural acts, be limited to a part thereof or extend to all or part of the subsequent proceedings. 4. Milestones for Interpreting Evidence Law as Set Out in the Relevant Case-Law of the European Court of Human Rights

The case-law of the European Court of Human Rights in matters of evidence law is extremely vast, the decisions rendered thereby addressing various issues relating to the exclusion of evidence, such as evidence obtained in the following circumstances: by applying torture or by way of inhuman or degrading treatment, as a result of entrapment, deception or constraint exercised by state authorities, by means of wiretapping and other technical covert surveillance methods, by a de facto hearing of suspects not in the custody of the judicial body, or by using undercover investigators or informers[33].

As highlighted by the European Court of Human Rights, although the provisions of the European Convention of Human Rights guarantees the right to a fair trial in article 6, it does not cover the admissibility of evidence as such, which is a matter that first and foremost belongs to the national law, so the Court shall not be able to exclude the admissibility of evidence adduced in breach of the national law[34]. This interpretation reflects the principle of subsidiarity, preventing the Court from acting as a "court of fourth instance"[35].

Therefore, the role of the Court is to determine whether the proceedings as a whole, including the way in which the evidence was obtained, were fair and, in this process, special consideration must be given to the manner in which the rights of the defence were respected, particularly to assess whether the applicant was given the opportunity to challenge the authenticity of the evidence and to oppose its use. Another relevant factor is the quality of the evidence, by determining whether the circumstances in which it was obtained cast any doubt on its reliability or accuracy[36].

If a conviction ruling rendered in the national law is mostly based upon evidence obtained in breach of the principles enclosed in article 6, it results that the proceedings as a whole are considered unfair. Nevertheless, as a rule, the national courts' taking into consideration of evidence obtained by breach of another article of the Convention (e.g. article 8) does not automatically hinder the fair nature of the proceedings as per article 6 of the Convention[37], except for the evidence obtained in serious violation of one of the absolute rights, such as article 3, which shall raise issues of fairness at all times, even if that piece of evidence was not decisive in the rendering of the conviction[38].

5. The Treatment of Evidence in the Context of EU Judicial and Police Cooperation in Criminal Matters

As reported in the literature, the cultural differences between the adversarial and inquisitorial models constitute a major impediment to the development of the criminal law of the European Union, both from the substantial and from the procedural perspective. In the Euro-skeptical circles, especially in the British environment, there have been fears that a uniform system of criminal justice based on the inquisitorial tradition may be imposed, which would prove significantly flawed as far as the guarantees of ensuring a fair trial acknowledged under the adversarial model are concerned, by ignoring that, within the Union, the modern criminal proceedings of each Member State encompass elements belonging to both legal traditions. Although it is relatively premature to speak of a European criminal procedure, it cannot be denied that the EU law has a deep influence on the regulations of the national legal systems, including over the evidence law[39].

According to Article 82 paragraph 1 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU)[40], judicial cooperation in criminal matters in the Union shall be based on the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions and shall include the approximation of the laws and regulations of the Member States in the areas referred to in paragraph 2 of Article 82 – mutual admissibility of evidence between Member States, the rights of individuals in criminal procedure, the rights of victims of crime, and any other specific aspects of criminal procedure which the Council has identified in advance by a decision – as well as in Article 83, referring to minimum rules concerning the definition of criminal offences and sanctions in the areas of particularly serious crime with a cross-border dimension resulting from the nature or impact of such offences or from a special need to combat them on a common basis.

Regarding the provisions set out under Article 82 paragraph 2 of the TFEU, it is mentioned that, to the extent necessary to facilitate mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions and police and judicial cooperation in criminal matters having a cross-border dimension, the European Parliament and the Council may, by means of directives adopted in accordance with the ordinary legislative procedure, establish minimum rules with respect to the aforementioned areas and that such rules shall take into account the differences between the legal traditions and systems of the Member States. Moreover, the adoption of these minimum rules shall not prevent Member States from maintaining or introducing a higher level of protection for individuals.

The provisions pertaining to police cooperation set out under article 87 et seq. TFEU, which involve all the Member States' competent authorities, including the police, customs and other specialised law enforcement services in relation to the prevention, detection and investigation of criminal offences imply, among other aspects, the establishing of measures concerning the collection, storage, processing, analysis and exchange of relevant information as well as common investigative techniques in relation to the detection of serious forms of organised crime.

6. The Exclusion of Evidence according to the Romanian Criminal Procedure Law

In Romania, the relevant provisions that regulate the exclusion of evidence are essentially contained in article 102 of the New Criminal Procedure Code, in force as of February 2014, consisting of four paragraphs, with the following content:

Firstly, as a reflection of the absolute right enshrined under article 3 of the European Convention of human Rights and the standards of protection developed by the Court in Strasbourg[41], it is stated in an unconditional manner that the evidence obtained by way of torture as well as the evidence deriving therefrom cannot be used within the criminal proceedings.

Secondly, the legal text further states that the evidence obtained unlawfully cannot be used within the criminal proceedings.

In this context, one of the most visible and controversial issues of law has been determined by a decision rendered by the Constitutional Court[42] relating to the covert surveillance techniques, whereby it has been found that the phrase allowing the enforcement of such techniques by "other specialised body" was unconstitutional. The legal text concerned thereby – article 142 paragraph (1) of the Criminal Procedure Code – has been since amended. But, as of this decision, the courts have witnessed a wave of pleas, submitted throughout all stages of the proceedings, requesting the exclusion of evidence thus obtained, the vast majority of them being dismissed either in first instance or before the review courts on different grounds, starting from the inadmissibility of exclusion in the stages of the proceedings exceeding the preliminary chamber to the inability to prove any procedural harm caused by such potential violation that would justify the application of the relative nullity rules, etc.

The concept of unlawfully obtained evidence, by means of a broader interpretation[43], also comprises the evidence adduced in breach of the principle of loyalty governing the evidence law, enshrined under article 101 of the Criminal Procedure Code, forbidding the use of coercive means or incentives, of hearing methods or techniques affecting a person's capacity of remembering and consciously and voluntarily recounting the facts, or of provocation in order to obtain evidence. As shown in the relevant national case-law[44], the loyalty principle, deriving from the right to a fair trial, implies a form of "judicial morality" of the criminal prosecution body in the activity of evidence adduction, there existing a presumption in favour of the good-faith of the judicial body (similar to the common-law view on the matter), which can only be overturned by indicating some elements of proof regarding the application of one of the situations falling within the scope of article 101 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Thirdly, the nullity of the act whereby the adduction of evidence was ordered or authorised or whereby the evidence has been adduced determines the exclusion of the evidence. By explicitly referring to the nullity sanction, this provision shows that the legal design of regulating the exclusion of evidence cannot be separated from that of nullities. Although, initially, some scholars or even legal practitioners were tempted to promote the theory of a clear-cut dividing line between the two sanctions, this controversy has been put to rest by the Constitutional Court of Romania. Thus, by Decision no. 383/2015[45], the Court has established that the sanction provided for under paragraph (3) of article 102 mandatorily requires the application of the nullity rules, either absolute or relative, as the case may be, pursuant to articles 280-282 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Finally, as explained in the Memorandum accompanying the Project of the New Criminal Procedure Code, the last paragraph of article 102 transposes the "fruit of the poisonous tree" doctrine, providing that the derived evidence is excluded should it be directly obtained from the unlawfully obtained evidence and if it could not have been gained otherwise. For instance, in a case put forward in the literature[46], the preliminary chamber judge ruled on the exclusion of a witness statement made by a person that has later been turned into a defendant in the same file, and, by finding that all other evidence – with the exception of a couple of witness statements – were directly connected to this statement excluded as a result of it being deemed a disloyal practice, they have also been invalidated due to the extensive effect of nullities (it must be mentioned, though, that this view is not unitary among the judicial body).

Diachronically speaking, prior to the regulation currently in force, there has been no well-established tradition of excluding evidence in the Romanian legislation, as the previous national regulation of criminal proceedings, pursuant to article 64 paragraph (2) of the 1968 Criminal Procedure Code, inserted by Law no. 281/2003, provided solely for a broad principle of exclusion, namely that the evidentiary means obtained unlawfully cannot be used within the criminal proceedings. At the time, some commentators[47] criticised this legislative solution, arguing that this input, inspired from the common-law tradition, had been poorly integrated into the Romanian regulation, in an oversimplified manner, lacking an adequate procedural mechanism of invalidating evidentiary means which were unlawfully or disloyally adduced. This is exactly what the new legislation brought forth.

The Government Decision no. 829/2007 for the approval of the preliminary theses of the Criminal Procedure Code project provided that, with respect to the general rules of evidence, the following proposal is addressed: to consolidate the regulation of excluding unlawful evidence, a specific sanction in matters of evidence law whereby the most powerful guarantee of complying with the legal provisions is ensured. With this aim in view, a clear regulation of the exclusionary mechanism was being pursued, having a twofold preoccupation, namely the establishment of the application conditions and the application procedure in each phase of the criminal proceedings. There is also mention made to the exclusion of evidence deriving from the unlawfully obtained evidence, when they are closely dependent on the main pieces of evidence.

Subsequently, in the Explanatory Memorandum accompanying the Project of the New Criminal Procedure Code, the exclusion of evidence has been described as being taken over from the common-law tradition as well as by considering the relevant case-law of the European Court of Human Rights.

Furthermore, the Memorandum mentioned the appropriation into national law of the theory of legitimacy, which places the focus on the long-term public impact of the judicial decision-making process or on the moral value of the judicial rulings, which implies that a possible conviction judgment based on unlawfully obtained evidence would undermine the status of the court as this would mean that it simultaneously tolerated and sanctioned the breach of law – a certain balance being necessary in this respect, considering that not all violations of the legal provisions determine the exclusion of evidence[48].

In the course of the three years run as of implementing the reforming provisions regarding the criminal justice system, the judicial body has addressed the issues pertaining to the exclusionary rules in a variety of cases, especially within the preliminary chamber phase.

7. Conclusions

By adopting the New Romanian Criminal Procedure Code, numerous adversarial elements, representative of the Anglo-American legal paradigm, have been inserted in the national legislation, including with respect to evidence law, but, as far as the exclusion of evidence is concerned, the lawmakers' preference for a mixed procedural design can be clearly observed, as it is not completely separated from the classical regulation of nullities, which generally applies to the continental legal systems. Although this latter approach lacks, in some respects, the flexibility and dynamism of the adversarial proceedings, it has the merit of conferring certain coherence to the regulation, thus avoiding the inadequate impact of these proceedings in practice. All things considered, the exclusion of evidence under the national legislation is undoubtedly a living and evolving procedural institution.

At the same time, it is appropriate to emphasise that, beyond any shadow of a doubt, the exclusion of evidence cannot be conceived outside the framework of the guarantees enshrined in the relevant case-law of the European Court of Human Rights and, at the EU level, the principle of mutual recognition and the harmonisation of the legislation with regard to judicial and police cooperation in criminal matters imply common procedural standards by progressively attenuating the legal and jurisprudential differences among the national legal systems.

THEORETICAL AND PRACTICAL CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING THE PROCEDURE OF PRELIMINARY CHAMBER

Bogdan MICU[*]

Abstract

The paper addresses from the theoretical point of view, but also taking into consideration some practical references, one of the most controversial procedures covered by the Code of Criminal Procedure in force - namely the procedure of preliminary chamber. The study notes that since the entry into force of new criminal legislation and until its writing, this procedural stage has undergone many modifications and adjustments, in particular through the unconstitutionality decisions it invokes and analyses briefly. At the same time, issues of judicial practice resulting from the recent jurisprudence of the national courts facing different problems caused by the causes brought to their attention are also discussed.

Keywords: criminal trial; Preliminary Chamber; the lawfulness of the conduct of criminal prosecution acts; the object of the preliminary chamber.

1. Introduction

Animated by the desire to have more celerity in the progress of the Romanian criminal trial, the legislator wanted to speed up its various procedural stages or phases through some of the new institutions included in the Code of Criminal Procedure that came into force on February 1st, 2014. Among the institutions through which this objective would have been achieved is also the procedure of preliminary chamber. In the very explanatory statement accompanying the draft of the new Code of Criminal Procedure, it is stated that "through the institution of the preliminary chamber, the project aims to meet the requirements of legality, celerity and fairness of the criminal process"[1]. The same document presents the preliminary chamber as a "new, innovative institution, which aims at creating a modern legislative framework that would remove the excessive length of proceedings in the trial phase."

At the same time, the stated purpose of regulating this procedure is to "resolve the issues of the lawfulness of the referral and of the lawfulness of the administration of the evidence, ensuring the premises for the speedy resolution of the case". The authors of the explanatory memorandum are even convinced that by regulating the procedure of preliminary chamber: "some of the deficiencies that led to the conviction of Romania by the European Court of Human Rights for violating the excessive length of the criminal trial are eliminated."

The Explanatory Memorandum foresees that it will: "have a direct, positive effect on the speedy resolution of a criminal case" ... by the fact that "the project aims to meet the objective of improving the quality of the act of justice, through punctual regulation, both in terms of the term (maximum 30 days from the registration of the case and not less than 10 days from the same date) in which the preliminary judge of the case is ruling, as well as under the conditions in which he orders the commencement of the judicial inquiry".

As presented, the institution of the Preliminary Chamber offered special positive perspectives on the effects it would have on the pace of the criminal proceedings, implicitly on the duration the criminal trial was going to have under the new Code for Criminal Procedure. However, animated by the desire to have more celerity in the progress of the criminal trial (at any cost we might say), the authors of the new Code for Criminal Procedure have failed to create safeguards to preserve some categories of human rights consecrated at the international level.

As it stands, the doctrine noted that, in order to ensure the celerity expected in the field of the preliminary chamber, the legislator provided a maximum period for the implementation of this stage, it determined that its specific aspects are solved in the council chamber (meaning in the non-public sittings) without the participation of the prosecutor and the parties, the conduct of the procedure taking a predominantly written form[2]. In the same way, we even showed immediately after the entry into force of the new Code for Criminal Procedure that there are some problems regarding how the procedure for preliminary chamber was regulated in this new Code. In particular, we have shown that precisely one of the features characterizing it - the preponderantly written character - casts doubt on the real and effective contradictory (controversial) feature, since neither the defendant nor the prosecutor have the opportunity to express their views directly before the judge[3].

Given this backdrop of criticisms brought by doctrine and by the judicial practice as well, it came to the situation where the texts governing the procedure for preliminary chamber were subject to constitutional control, and many of them were identified as being in contradiction with the principles enshrined in the Constitution or with internationally accepted standards in the field of human rights protection[4].

Synthetically, the Constitutional Court noted that the rule governing the procedure for the preliminary chamber procedure: a violation of the principle of equality of arms[5] - by that that it provided the prosecutor's exclusive access to the claims and exceptions made by the defendant; by not communicating to the other parties the claims and the exceptions made and by excluding from the course of the procedure for the preliminary chamber the civilly responsible party, the injured party and the civil party. In the same way, the Constitutional Court found a violation of the contradictory (controversial) and oral principles, the proceedings being conducted exclusively based on the documents filed by the parties without summoning them, as well as an obvious breach of the rights of defence by not allowing to administrate other evidence beside the documentary evidence. Equally, the restriction of the prosecutor's participation in the proceedings of the preliminary chamber was deemed to be in breach of the provisions of article 131 of the Romanian Constitution.

In this way, the whole philosophy of the organization and functioning of the preliminary chamber procedure was forced to be rethought and put on the benchmarks that the Constitutional Court set out. This approach was made by the legislator, through the Government Emergency Ordinance no. 82/2014 for the amendment and the completion of the Law no. 135/2010 on the Code of Criminal Procedure[6], respectively, of the Law no. 75/2016 for the approval of the above-mentioned Emergency Ordinance[7]. Therefore, comparing to the initial characteristics, the preliminary chamber appears as radically modified.

The doctrine noted that through the Decision no. 641/2014 of the Constitutional Court the preliminary chamber procedure has radically changed, being much closer to the ECHR's view of a criminal proceedings before a judge, even if it does not end with a ruling on the substance of the criminal charge. In this context, the quoted author characterizes the modification operated by the Law no. 75/2016 on the preliminary chamber procedure as a step forward in the attempt to transform it into a fair procedure[8].

2. About the current regulation of the preliminary procedure for the chamber

Regarding the preliminary chamber procedure, it is appreciated, in some opinions, that it does not have the nature of a distinct procedural phase for the following arguments: the judicial function it involves does not refer to the merits of the case, it does not have the capacity to stop by itself the criminal trial, it only has an intermediate character, it does not have the nature and the size of a procedural phase[9] .

Differently, in other opinions, it is considered that the preliminary chamber procedure is a "new phase of the criminal trial (and not a procedural phase of the trial phase) in which the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber achieves a precisely determined objective, namely, he analyses the lawfulness of the administration of the rules of evidence, of the court's referral through the indictment and of the acts performed by the criminal prosecution bodies, thus preparing the next stage of the criminal trial, that of the trial in order to achieve the purpose of the criminal trial"[10].

We agree with the first of the two opinions expressed, the fundamental argument that makes us accept this solution lies in the fact that, in such a procedure, one cannot reach a solution that will lead to the conclusion of that case. Evidence in this respect is that even if the death of the defendant occurs between the time of the indictment and the completion of the procedure of the preliminary chamber, the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber cannot rule on the merits of the case but he would be bound to order that the deceased is to be arraigned.

Following the changes made to the preliminary chamber procedure by the two above-mentioned normative acts, the doctrine notes that others are currently the characteristics of the preliminary chamber stage. It is appreciated that the decision of the Constitutional Court overturned the characters initially imagined by the legislator for the preliminary chamber procedure, which made it transformed from a procedure carried out without the participation of the prosecutor, parties and the injured person, with a limited controversial feature between the prosecutor and the defendant and preponderantly written into a procedure conducted with the participation of the procedural actors, completely contradictory and oral in which becomes possible to administer evidence[11].

In another opinion, criticism is made regarding the legislative changes introduced by the Law no. 75/2016, considering that although this normative act should have come under the Constitutional Court's Decisions, the especially Decision no. 641/2014, "quite surprisingly, the legislator did not understand the essence of the Court's reasoning and was not receptive to the judicial practice and to the opinions of the experts drafted after the Decision no.641". Thus, "by misinterpreting the principles of contradiction and the right to an oral hearing before the court, the Law no. 75/2016 returns practically in time, where we were before the Court's decision from November 11th, 2014, on the realm of the non-controversial procedure and of the decisions taken without summoning"[12].

It is particularly criticized that the Law no. 75/2016 amended article 346 paragraph (1) from the Code for Criminal Procedure, which regulates the situation of the passivity of the parties in submitting requests or exceptions, stipulating that: "If no requests and exceptions have been formulated within the terms provided for in article 344 paragraphs (2) and (3), nor any objections were raised ex officio, upon the expiry of these time-limits, the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber shall declare the lawfulness of the court referral, of the administration of the evidences and of the execution of the criminal prosecution and orders the commencement of the trial. The judge sitting in the Preliminary Chamber shall pronounce his findings in the council chamber, without summoning the parties and the injured person and without the participation of the prosecutor, by resolution, which shall be immediately communicated to them." It is considered that this new regulation is practically a regrettable return to the non-controversial character of the preliminary chamber, as it was before the constitutional court remedied it[13]. The arguments invoked for the support of that assertion are in the sense that the presumption that a party to the criminal proceedings which has not complied with the time-limit granted by the court does not wish to invoke personal procedural nullity before it is lacking legal support. However, we believe that legal support is given by the criticized provision itself, which clarifies a doctrinal dispute generated by the regulatory framework governing the preliminary chamber procedure.

The controversy concerns the legal nature of the term of at least 20 days provided by article 344 paragraph (2) Code for Criminal Procedure, in which requests and exceptions may be formulated on matters which may form the subject-matter of the preliminary chamber. In the doctrine, it was appreciated, first, that this term is a forfeiture term, which makes the requests and the exceptions filed after its passing to be ignored by the judge, being a legal term[14]. Differently, it is considered that the term is not a forfeiture term, but a recommendation, being a judicial one[15].

We believe, however, that given the manner in which the Preliminary Chamber procedure is currently governed, the term of at least 20 days (which may be increased by reference to the complexity of the case) has acquired a clear forfeiture character. In the same sense, in the judicial practice[16] it was appreciated that from the systematic interpretation of the provisions forming the legal framework relating to the procedure of preliminary chamber it results that the legislator has established in this field two types of procedural deadlines with distinct effects:

- An imperative procedural term, absolutely and indissolubly linked to the exercise of the procedural right of the parties or the injured person to formulate requests and exceptions regarding the lawfulness of the complaint, the lawfulness of the administration of evidence or the execution of criminal prosecution acts (this category is considered to circumscribe as well the term provided for in article 345 paragraph (3) from the Code for Criminal Procedure, whose non-compliance by the prosecutor has the binding effect of restitution of the case, according to article 346 paragraph 3 letter c) from the Code for Criminal Procedure)
- A procedural term of recommendation, relative, fixed by the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber for the handling of applications and exceptions, the non-observance of which does not affect the legality of the act performed.

The terms provided by article 342 paragraphs (2) and (3) have the role of disciplining the activities in the preliminary chamber and giving this procedure the speed needed to achieve its purpose. In that context, in the case-law, it is justly appreciated, in our opinion, by reference to how the procedure for preliminary chamber is currently regulated, that the term regulated by article 342 paragraph (2) Code for Criminal Procedure has a forfeiture character, which means that the failure to formulate requests and exceptions within this term generates the sanction of forfeiture of the right to formulate them after its expiration. Even in the event of formulating them after that time, the judge sitting in the Preliminary Chamber judge should ascertain the delay in invoking the claims or the exceptions.

While we accept that this is the possible legal solution by reference to the current regulatory framework, we believe that it is susceptible to unconstitutionality itself. Any provision that would have the role of disciplining the conduct of the preliminary chamber procedure cannot lead to solutions that would violate a person's right of access to justice (governed by article 21 of the Romanian Constitution), and which would not allow the establishment with clarity of the object and boundaries of the judgment by reference to the case with which the court is vested. The way in which the procedure for preliminary chamber is currently governed can lead to this negative solution, especially by referring to the fact that the possibility for the court to invoke ex officio requests and exceptions is limited to absolute nullity. In the same sense, it is clear from the case-law that: "... in relation to the content of the provisions of article 282 paragraph 2 Code for Criminal Procedure, the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber cannot, of its own motion, invoke violations of the law which are punishable by relative nullity … As a rule, the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber may censor ... the legality of the evidence and the acts of the criminal prosecution only to the extent that they have been challenged by the parties and, by way of exception, ex officio, under the limitative and restrictive conditions foreseen in article 281 paragraph 1-4 Code for Criminal procedure, regarding the absolute nullities"[17].

A further negative aspect of the way the preliminary chamber procedure is regulated is the limitation of the type of evidence that can be administrated in the preliminary chamber procedure - an aspect that violates the principle of finding out the truth. We take into consideration the provisions of article 345 paragraph (1) Code for Criminal procedure, in accordance with which "... the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber shall settle the requests and the exceptions formulated or the exceptions raised ex officio, in the council chamber, on the basis of the works and the material in the criminal investigation file and any other new documentary evidence being presented, listening to the conclusions of the parties and of the injured party, if present, as well as of the prosecutor." It is noted that the only new evidence that can be administrated in the preliminary chamber is the documentary evidence, although such a limitation does not result from the findings of the Constitutional Court. By the way the text is formulated in the new regulation, situations can may appear where this limitation may lead to the fact where the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber cannot administer evidence (for example, he cannot hear witnesses), issue that leads to the impossibility to determine whether an evidence has been unlawfully or unfairly administrated during the prosecution. Such an impossibility to establish the illegality of the evidence makes it impossible to exclude it from the evidence at the end of the procedure for the preliminary chamber, and after that moment the sanction of exclusion is no longer accepted by the legislator. Thus, determined by the impossibility of finding out the truth about the illegitimate or unfair character of an evidence administered during the criminal prosecution, renders the evidence impossible to be removed from the evidentiary material. We believe that the regulatory solution needs to be reconsidered as it is not in line with the constitutional principles.

3. About the subject-matter of the preliminary camera

Under the article 342 Code for Criminal Procedure, "the subject-matter of the preliminary chamber procedure is the examination, after the indictment, of the jurisdiction and the lawfulness of the court's referral, as well as the verification of the lawfulness of the administration of evidence and the execution of the acts by the criminal prosecution bodies". The doctrine states that the subject-matter of the preliminary chamber procedure is to verify certain aspects: the jurisdiction of the court, the lawfulness (not the merits) of the court's referral, the lawfulness of the administration of evidence by the criminal investigation body, the lawfulness of the criminal prosecution[18].

Similarly, it is considered as purpose of the preliminary chamber procedure to check: the jurisdiction of the court, the competence of the criminal investigation bodies, the lawfulness of the court's referral and the lawfulness of the deed of intimation, the legality and the loyalty of the administration of evidence and the lawfulness of the procedural or procedural acts[19] .

It has been shown in the case-law that the examination of the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber is limited, by the legislator's will, to issues of law which are circumscribed to the requirements related to the form and content of the procedural documents, their concordance with the procedural acts which they incorporate or the legal pertinent provisions in the criminal prosecution phase, characteristics that inevitably imply a formal character of this examination[20]. This examination is one that involves assessing the evidence from the sole perspective of legality or, as the case may be, of the loyalty of the administration of evidence, and does not aim at analysing the appropriateness of their administration.

4. Some aspects of judicial practice regarding the subject of the preliminary camera procedure

Given the fact that it is a new institution, the procedure for the preliminary chamber has recorded sufficient issues on which the case-law registers different findings or from which it results that the subject-matter of the preliminary chamber was not correctly understood.

Thus, it has been shown in the case-law that the following are criticisms of the merits of the case and cannot be assessed in the Preliminary Chamber: the requests and the exceptions concerning the incidence of a case preventing the initiation of the criminal proceedings, the lack of foreseeability of the legal, incrimination norm, the succession in time of the legal provisions in the field, the failure to assemble the constitutive elements of the offense or the wrong qualification of the active subject of the offense[21].

Regarding also the issues that cannot constitute the subject of the procedure of the preliminary chamber, it is stated in a decision of a case that "unfortunately, in our opinion, in the current regulation, the judge sitting in a preliminary chamber is not allowed to administer evidence to prove the disloyalty of the administration of some evidence in the criminal prosecution phase and, as such, the issues raised by chosen lawyer of the defendant BE cannot be verified by the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber"[22].

Similarly, it has been shown that "to statue, even only tangentially, over the convincing character of the description of the subjective aspect of the offense or over its ability to subsume the constitutive element of the offense ... is equivalent to dealing with issues that are essentially about the merits of the case, whose analysis clearly outweighs the subject and limits of the pending procedure"[23] (namely of the procedure for the preliminary chamber – author's note B.M.).

In a concrete situation, the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber excluded from the evidentiary material administered during the criminal investigation phase the witness statement given by the defendant's lawyer. In order to do so, from the documents and papers existing in the criminal investigation file, the judge found that Mrs. Ş.D. had no prior express and written permission from the defendant S.G., which is why the criminal investigation bodies could not hear her as a witness, being thus violated the provisions of article 116 paragraphs 3 and 4 from the Code of Criminal Procedure[24] .

Similarly, the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber observed that the criminal investigating authorities had heard the persons suspected of committing offenses under the criminal law, before ordering the continuation of their prosecution, as foreseen by the provisions of article 305 paragraph (3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, before informing the persons concerned persons that they have acquired the status of suspect, before informing them of the facts for which they are investigated, their legal qualification as well as their rights provided for by article 83 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. For this reason, it was appreciated that the criminal investigation bodies disregarded the legal provisions meant to ensure the observance of the right to defence and to a fair trial, and, justly, the first instance found to be incident the case of the relative nullity provided by article 282 paragraph 1 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which leads to the cancellation of the minutes, since the harm to the defendants cannot be eliminated otherwise, being thus excluded from the evidentiary material of the case[25].

5. Conclusion

The procedure for the preliminary chamber is, in the Romanian legislation, still in search of the place it has, but also of the balance that it must ensure between the need to speed up its course and to reduce the costs of justice on the one hand and the necessity to ensure the respect of the right to a fair trial for all those who have an interest in the criminal proceedings. Marked by findings of unconstitutionality and legislative adjustments, the procedure of the preliminary chamber is still susceptible to findings of new contradictions between the principles of the Constitution and the way it guarantees the fairness of the procedure.

CRIME OF MONEY LAUNDERING REFLECTED IN THE RECENT MANDATORY JURISPRUDENCE OF THE HIGH COURT OF CASSATION AND JUSTICE

Constantin NEDELCU[*]

Abstract

This study represents an in-depth analysis of the rulings of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, by the Panel for clarifying certain legal issues. In actuality, it is about the way in which the Supreme Court ruled when issuing such a decision, respectively the Decision no. 16/2016, the conclusions reached being explained and sometimes criticized. In addition, the study identifies other aspects that receive different classification solutions in the judicial practice, which generates a non-unitary practice in criminal matters.

Keywords: money laundering, multiple crimes, multiple regulations, the author of the predicate crime

1. Introduction

We can observe, in a study presented on a similar occasion[1], the history of the definition of the money laundering crime in the Romanian criminal legislation, reaching the conclusion that it appeared in the Romanian legal provisions after our country ratified the Council of Europe Convention on laundering, search, seizure and confiscation of the proceeds from crime of 1990[2], European Union Council Directive 91/308/EEC of 10 June 1991 on prevention of the use of the financial system for the purpose of money laundering, as well as the Council Framework Decision of 26 June 2001 on money laundering, the identification, tracing, freezing, seizing and confiscation of instrumentalities and proceeds of crime (2001/500/JAI)[3].

Under the influence of these regulations, the Law no. 21/1999 on the prevention and punishment of money laundering[4] was adopted in the Romanian legislation, which was subsequently repealed and replaced by the Law no. 656/2002[5]. Article 29 (after the republication) of the new law defines the crime of money laundering and this incrimination text, even after 15 years of activity, is far from being protected against controversies and difficulties in its application.

2. In the study mentioned above, we can note that, among the practical application difficulties of the incrimination regulation from Article 29 of the Law no. 656/2002, are the following: the difficulty to set out the crime of money laundering from the crimes of concealment and abetment in crime already existing in the Criminal Code; another practical difficulty is answering to the question if the active subject of the crime of money laundering can also be the author of the main crime.

3. On the recent rulings of the High Court of Cassation and Justice on the subject of the crime of money laundering

Since the publication of our previous study and until the elaboration of this article, the High Court of Cassation and Justice, by the Panel for clarifying certain legal issues, ruled on the issues we have previously presented, but also on other aspects that the judicial practice or the case law identified under different appreciations. It is about the Decision no.16/2016 of the Panel for clarifying certain legal issues within the High Court of Cassation and Justice[6], and the questions the Supreme Court clarified are if:

„1. Do the actions listed in Article 29 paragraph (1) letters (a), (b) and (c) of the Law no.656/2002 on prevention and punishment of money laundering, and on setting out certain measures for prevention and combating terrorism financing, republished, as further amended and supplemented (exchange or transfer, respectively the concealment or dissimulation and, respectively, the acquisition, possession or use) represent different regulatory ways to commit the crime of money laundering or do they represent alternative versions of the material element of the subjective aspect of the crime of money laundering?

2. Can the active subject of the crime of money laundering be the same as the active subject of the crime from which the goods come from, or must it be different from it?

3. Is the crime of money laundering an autonomous crime or is it a crime subsequent to the one from which the goods come?"

All these issues were brought before the High Court of Cassation and Justice to be clarified exactly because the interpretation of legal texts included in Article 29 of the Law no.656/2002 has important nuances in the case law, and also in the judicial practice.

The importance of the clarification which the High Court was asked to give cannot be called into question.

The solution of the first issue may in a concrete case, determine the acknowledgment of a single crime of money laundering, or of multiple crimes if an individual commits more offenses constituting the material element of the same crime. A negative to the second question could exclude the hypotheses of multiple crimes acknowledged in the judicial practice for the cases in which the same individual commits the main crime, as well as the crime of money laundering. In the same way, if the crime of money laundering would not be recognized as an autonomous crime, it could never subsist to the extent to which the main crime (from which the goods to be laundered come), due to a reason or otherwise, would lose its criminal nature.

The High Court of Cassation and Justice analyzed in turn the three issues, settling them by way of mandatory jurisprudence.

Thus, with regard to the type of the regulatory methods listed in Article 29 paragraph (1) letters (a), (b) and c) of the Law no. 656/2002 on prevention and punishment of money laundering, and on setting out certain measures for prevention and combating terrorism financing, republished, as further amended (exchange or transfer, respectively the concealment or dissimulation and, respectively, the acquisition, possession or use), the High Court found that they have an alternative character and that they do not justify the acknowledgment of multiple crimes in the case of the same individual, as it often happens in the judicial practice. The Supreme Court correctly highlighted that "money laundering is a crime in which the material element consists of an action that can be performed in seven alternative ways (exchange, transfer, concealment, dissimulation, acquisition, possession or use)". … "Therefore, the performance of several actions representing the material element of the crime of money laundering, for carrying out the same intent, does not affect the criminal unit.

It is often found that it is chosen to acknowledge two crimes at the same time against an individual who committed two of the regulated alternatives from those listed by Article 29 of the Law no. 656/2002, under one of the three letters. Such practice was invalidated by the HP Decision no. 16/2016 of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, which even gives an example: "the individual possessing a good he/she is aware of the fact that it comes from committing a crime commits the crime of money laundering. If, afterwards, this individual transfers this good, this shall represent the same crime, as only a new type of the material type, without legal relevance, is carried out. If the money laundering crime was committed by carrying out more types of the material element pertaining to different variants, this aspect shall be taken into consideration in the legal classification, by acknowledging all these variants".

With regard to the second issue brought to the attention of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, we expressed our opinion in the study mentioned above, i.e. the crime of money laundering cannot be committed by the author of the main crime in any hypothesis, the main argument for this purpose being the text. In our opinion, the expression "being aware of the fact that it comes from committing a crime" included in the incrimination regulation of Article 29 of the Law no. 656/2002 means the exclusion of the one who commits the main crime from the circle of the potential active subjects of the crime of money laundering, as the expression appear as useless regarding this individual.

We do not agree with the ruling of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, as the court appreciates that there is no such an incompatibility. The arguments given by the High Court in order to support this ruling are certain arguments related to the history of the incrimination. It was taken into consideration the fact that the incrimination regulation on money laundering appeared in our legislation after Romania ratified the Council of Europe Convention on laundering, search, seizure and confiscation of the proceeds from crime and on financing of terrorism, adopted at Warsaw on 16 May 2005, by the Law no. 420/2006. the Supreme Court shows that, even if the Article 9 paragraph (2) letter (a) of this international legal instrument creates the opportunity that the Member States provide that the "offenses set forth in this paragraph do not apply to the individuals who committed the predicate offense" in their internal legislation. The Supreme Court noted that, at the time of the accession the Warsaw Convention, the Romanian State did not express any reserve, and the Law no.656/2002 "does not provide otherwise in order to hinder the acknowledgment of the crime the goods come from and the crime of money laundering against the active subject, therefore, such multiple crimes are possible from theoretical point of view".

We believe that this method for settling the analyzed legal issue is not in accordance with the need to unify the judicial practice regarding this issue. The High Court preferred to analyze the incrimination history of money laundering, without making available to the professionals facing such cases clear criteria differentiating between the crime of money laundering and of abetment, respectively concealment. We believe that the different solution than the one established by the case law and accepted in practice in the case of the two crimes from the Criminal Code could be only explained this way.

It is true that the High Court showed in its decision that "the crime of money laundering must not be automatically acknowledged against the author of the crime which the goods come from due to the simple reason that one of the actions of the material element of money laundering was carried out, as this would deprive the crime of money laundering of its individuality". Moreover, the High Court emphasizes that "the legal bodies are responsible for deciding in concrete cases if the crime of money laundering is sufficiently individualized in relation to the crime which the goods come from and if multiple crimes or only one crime must be acknowledged".

The two phrases are in perfect accordance with the rigors of the law, but they shall not lead to the unification of the judicial practice, they shall not give an explanation for the concrete annulment of the abetment and concealment, and they shall not lead to a review of the current circumstances in which the acknowledgment of the multiple crimes, the predicate crime and the money laundering, is almost mandatory for all cases in which, after committing the predicate crime (irrespective if this is about a corruption crime, drug trafficking or tax evasion), the same individual takes various steps in order to be able to use those obtained advantages. There are many cases in which, after committing the main crime, the simple purchase of a good with the money coming from the predicate crime is deemed money laundering. Thus an organized crime is transformed in an unimportant one, even it cannot be said the same for the level to which the special punishment limits rise in the case of this crime.

We believe that this is only a legislative omission that occurred when the international legal instrument generating the obligation for the national legislation to incriminate money laundering had been ratified, i.e. the natural reserve related to the impossibility that the active subject of the predicate crime is also the author of the money laundering had not been formulated. This omission was also accompanied by the impossibility to identify clear criteria with whose help the difference between the crime of abetment, respectively concealment, and the money laundering could be unitary made. In our opinion, the High Court did not settle this legal issue.

With regard to the third issue submitted for clarification, the High Court acknowledged the autonomous nature of the crime of money laundering. The significance of this ruling is that "its existence is not contingent on giving a conviction sentence (postponement of the enforcement of the punishment or withdrawal of the enforcement of the punishment) for the crime which the goods come from". The arguments supporting this solution are also conventional, because Article 9 paragraph (5) of the Warsaw Convention, ratified by Romania by the Law no. 420/2006, provides that: "Each Party shall ensure that a previous or simultaneous conviction for the predicate crime is not a prerequisite for a conviction for money laundering". Besides, an adequate regulation can be also found in Article 29 paragraph (4) of the Law no. 656/2002[7]. Nevertheless, the High Court recognizes the limiting nature of this assumption, showing that "nevertheless, it is obvious that, if there is no conviction for the crime the goods come from, the competent court for the settlement of the case regarding money laundering must not only suspect that the goods come from a criminal activity, but must be certain of this fact".

4. On issues regarding the crime of money laundering which are not yet settled in the case law and jurisprudence

All these rulings are welcome for the unitary interpretation and enforcement of the provisions of the incriminating regulation regarding money laundering. But there are also other issues that are solved differently in practice. One of these issues is that, in the judicial practice, it can be encountered the case in which a tax evasion crime falling under the provisions of Article 9 letter (c) of the Law no. 241/2005 for preventing and combating tax evasion is committed, the method being the following: fiscal invoices are issued by a company for fictitious operations, they are recorded in the books of another company, the pertaining amounts are transferred on the basis of the invoice, these amounts are withdrawn in cash by the representatives of the first company, the amounts are handed over to the directors of the second company, the one helping with this operation retaining a fee. In the judicial practice, this case described above in short is often classified as representing multiple crimes, the tax evasion and the money laundering. Ignoring the debatable nature of the legal classification, which we have mentioned, the courts do not give unitary rulings regarding the case that, by such legal classifications, the money laundering is committed before the predicate crime is committed, nor why the object of the money laundering is larger than the object of the predicate crime.

Our statement takes into consideration the fact that, even if the damages are covered in accordance with Article 10 of the Law no. 241/2005, the courts order the confiscation of the entire rollover between the two companies as representing the object of money laundering. Due to this solution, it can be reached the case in which the amounts resulting from committing the main crime are much smaller than those indicated as representing the object of money laundering. Essentially, the money laundering represents the "whitening" of the product of a crime, and it is abnormal that the product being "whitened" is essentially larger than the result of committing tax evasion. We believe that this very extensive judicial practice from the point of view of the scope is fundamentally wrong, and the High Court should rule on it by means of the previous mechanism for uniting the judicial practice – prior decisions clarifying legal issues, without waiting the creation of a non-unitary practice in order to activate the previous mechanism - the referral in the interests of the law.

5. Conclusions

The crime of money laundering is a crime that still generates a number of issues regarding its understanding and enforcement, despite the 15 years of existence of the legal regulation defining it. Even if the High Court of Cassation and Justice tried to settle certain issues by means of mandatory jurisprudence of the decisions for clarifying legal certain legal issues, the given solutions cannot always eliminate the controversies, and other issues have yet to be submitted to this jurisdiction.

THEORETICAL AND JUDICIAL PRACTICE REFLECTIONS REGARDING THE OFFENCE OF PUTTING INTO CIRCULATION OR DRIVING AN UNREGISTERED/UNLISTED VEHICLE (ART. 334. CRIMINAL LAW)

Alin Sorin NICOLESCU*

Abstract

With the entry into force of the New Criminal Code, the offenses of road safety on public roads have been repealed from the Government Emergency Ordinance no. 95/2002 and inserted into the contents of the normative document.
At the time of the transition, the legislator has chosen to amend certain aspects relating to the existing criminal incriminations of antisocial deeds in direct connection with the road domain.
The regulation of the offense for putting into circulation or driving an unlisted vehicle contained in the provisions of article 334 of the New Criminal Code has a correspondent in Article 85 of the GEO no. 195/2002 on the circulation on public roads.
The deeds incriminated by the provisions referred to in Article 334 par. (1), (2), (3) and (4) have the content almost identical with the previous settlement thereof, with differences under the aspect of the sanctioning regime. Also, regarding the content, the only difference which is meant to better clarify the incrimination conditions refers to the requirement that the vehicle or the tram not to be registered or recorded according to the law.
During the study, we shall try to present a series of theoretical aspects and judicial practice regarding the committing of such crimes.

Keywords: offenses, safety, roads, circulation, public, unlisted, vehicle

1. Introduction

Essentially, a given society assumes a series of rules, principles and fundamental values of the citizens, values that are sustained and defended by the rule of law and, implicitly, by the legislation composing their defense mechanism. The whole community revolves around a well-defined system of law that is permanently expanding and adapting itself to the social demands.

"Following the appearance of the state, the function of defending the essential social values that underlie and develop the society is achieved by the help of the criminal law"[1]. As against this opinion we will stress the fact that criminal law represents, at the same time, the most complex mechanism of defending the fundamental rights of citizens, that its main pillar.

Normally, criminal offences stipulated in the specific regulations are the mirror of the social values, and the role of the criminal law is that of defending them from anyone violating them. Though, to a certain extent, it might seem a metaphor, criminal law is applicable to all the aspects of life.

The regulations in the New Criminal Code[2] also comprise those criminal offences against the traffic safety on public roads.

This survey regards the offence stipulated and punished by art. 334 of the Criminal code. The appearance of the new criminal code also brought to the Romanian system of law a reform of the criminal law. This reform was greeted, in most of the cases, by the great doctrinaire authors, but just like any novelty, it was also criticized, which in some cases overshadowed the benefits brought by the new legislation.

As a novelty, a series of offences in the special legislation were included in the new Criminal code, so as, offences such as those falling under the Government Emergency Ordinance no. 195/2002 regarding the circulation on public roads, were repealed and included in the Criminal code.

Art. 121 of Law no. 187/2012 for the implementation of Law no. 286/2009 regarding the Criminal code abrogated art. 85 of the Emergency Ordinance of the Government no. 195/2002.

This survey takes into account the analysis of the provisions of the incriminating text in art. 334 of the New Criminal code, corresponding to art. 85 in the E.O.G. no.195/2002.

2. Analysis of the offence

2.1. The legal contents

According to the provisions of art. 334 par.(1) of the New Criminal code, putting into circulation or driving on public roads an unregistered or unlisted vehicle or tram is punished, according to the law, with prison from one to 3 years or fine.

According to the provisions of art. 334, par (2) putting into circulation or driving on public roads a vehicle or tram with a fake license plate or registration number is punished with prison from one to 5 years or fine.

Furthermore, the provisions of par. (3) of the same article stipulate that towing an unregistered or unlisted trailer or of a trailer having a fake registration number or license plate is punished with prison from 3 months to 2 years or fine.

Finally, according to the provisions in par. (4*), driving a vehicle on public roads or towing a trailer whose license plate numbers have been called in, or driving a vehicle not allowed in the Romanian traffic, although registered in another country, is punished with prison from 6 months to 2 years or fine*.

At first sight, we may notice that within the same article we find four distinct offences.

2.2. Pre-existing conditions

The legal object of these offences resides in the social relations that ensure the safe traffic on public roads.

Offences stipulated in art 334 of the Criminal code are void of a material object, as they are endangering offences, while putting into circulation or driving a vehicle on public roads or towing a trailer under the circumstances stipulated in the incriminating text are means by which the respective offence is committed and not its material object.

Since the law does not require any kind of quality for the person committing the offence, we may say that the active subject is not qualified and can be anyone filling in the requirements for criminal liability.

The criminal stake is present under all its forms.

It is important to stress the fact that the deed of putting into circulation of an unregistered or unlisted vehicle or tram and of driving it on public roads will constitute a single offence. At the same time, the person involved in different ways is committing these two alternatively incriminated activities, commits only one offence.

The offence may be committed by co-authors, in case of co-owners, but there will be no co-authors in case one person puts an unregistered vehicle or tram into circulation and the other drives it. In this case we speak of two autonomous offences, that is the offence of putting into circulation an unregistered vehicle or tram and the offence of driving such a vehicle[3].

With respect to the perpetration of the offence by driving, we can say that under no circumstance can we speak of accomplices, of co-authors, as only one person can drive a vehicle, while a simultaneous action of driving by two or more persons is practically impossible.

As regards the legal persons, we can say that, under certain conditions, they can perpetrate the offence stipulated by art. 334 of the Criminal code.

The passive subject is the State, "on which reverberate the consequences of all the violations of the state of law, as well as the consequences of traffic violations on public roads[4]."

2.3. The constitutive elements

As previously stressed, the contents of art. 334 of the Criminal code defines a number of four offences. We will further try to describe them individually in order to offer a more comprehensive and efficient analysis.

The material element of the offence stipulated by art. 334, par. (1) is constituted by a person's putting into circulation an unregistered or unlisted vehicle or tram on public roads, as stipulated by the legislation in force.

Related to it, we must specify that by "putting into circulation" we mean the prerogative of the person that can decide with respect to the vehicle (owner, custodian/keeper, thief, beneficiary of a leasing contract, etc.) to allow putting the said vehicle in traffic on public roads.

Driving on public roads an unregistered or unlisted vehicle or tram is the action by which the said vehicle is set in motion on public roads by using its own power of movement. The active subject of this offence may be a simple keeper, for example, a thief that entrusts the stolen vehicle to another person in Driving on public roads an unregistered or unlisted vehicle or tram is the action by which the said vehicle is set in motion on public roads by using its own power of movement. The active subject of this offence may be a simple keeper, for example, a thief that entrusts the stolen vehicle to another person in order to be driven on public roads[5]. This entrusting will have a criminal value only if preceded by driving such a vehicle (according to the legal text) on public roads. Thus, the permission to put into circulation the vehicle, not followed by the act of driving it (perpetration) will not be considered an offence. The action of putting into circulation a vehicle implies a series of actions committed by two persons. A first person will decide to allow the said action, under the circumstances shown above, and a second person that will implement this decision by driving the respective vehicle on the public road. In this case we consider that both persons will be liable as accomplices/ co-authors of the offence.

There are opinions in the specialized bibliography that claim that putting into circulation a vehicle means the moment when the vehicle is started and it has the power transmission coupled to the wheels[6]. Certain authors dispute, of course, this theory, claiming that, in such a situation, the moment of putting the vehicle into circulation would overlap the moment of driving, fact that would leave the regulative procedure void/without substance.

The criminal investigation of the offence should determine the exact nature of the activity of the offender: putting the vehicle into circulation, driving the vehicle or both cumulated actions perpetrated by the same person. Clarifying the situation is of particular importance with a view to the right legal qualification of the offence and, implicitly, to clearing up all the other unknown factors, such as: participants, form of guilt, conjuncture, etc[7].

The vehicle is a vehicle equipped with an engine capable of moving it on the road. Trolley-busses and road tractors are also considered vehicles[8].

The trailer/ tow is an engine-less vehicle meant to be towed by a vehicle or tractor[9]. It can be of two types: light trailer, whose total maximum authorized weight is under 750 kilos and semitrailer, whose maximum authorized weight is taken over partly by a vehicle or tractor[10].

In order to circulate on public roads, vehicles, except those trailed or pushed by hand or bicycles, should be registered or listed, on a case to case basis, and should bear license plates with a registration or list numbers having forms, dimensions and contents stipulated in the standards in force. Vehicles that are not registered or listed may circulate on public roads only under circumstances stipulated by regulations[11].

Vehicles, except mopeds and trolley-busses, as well as trailers are to be permanently or temporarily registered or listed by the authority under whose territorial – home address, residence or headquarters – competence they fall, under the conditions stipulated by the legislation in force.

Vehicles, trailers and agriculture or forest tractors belonging to the Ministry of Defense, to the Ministry of Home Affairs, as well as those belonging to the Romanian Information Services will be registered by these authorities. Vehicles and trailers may, on a case to case basis, be registered under the conditions mentioned above. Before registration, the vehicles, except mopeds and trolley-busses may circulate with temporary license plates, based on a special certificate, issued by the competent authority.

Upon request, legal persons that manufacture, assembly, or perform the coachwork or the testing of vehicles, trailers or agriculture or forest tractors may receive authorizations and temporary plates for these tests.

The accounts of the registered vehicles will be kept by the authority under whose jurisdiction is the owner's home address, residence or headquarters[12].

Trams, trolley-busses, mopeds, agricultural or forest tractors, other than those of the Ministry of Defense, of the Ministry of Home Affairs and of the Romanian Information Services, including the trailers meant to be towed by the latter, as well as the animal-drawn vehicles, will be registered by the town or city halls or by the municipalities of the departments of Bucharest, which keep these accounts through their specialized compartments[13].

Once the vehicle registered, the competent authority will issue to the owner or custodian/keeper a registration certificate, according to the category or sub-category to which the respective vehicle belongs, as well as the license plate with the registration number. Upon the vehicle owner's written request, the registration certificate may list a person, other than the owner, specifying in what capacity that person may use the vehicle, based on a legal right. In case the owner of the vehicle is a leasing company, mentioning the identification coordinates of the custodian/keeper in the registration certificate is mandatory. At the same time, it is forbidden to put into circulation a vehicle, registered or listed, that has not the license plate issued by the competent authority or whose plate does not comply with the standards in force, or a vehicle whose registration certificate has been suspended, while the certificate replacing it was issued without a circulation permit or its validity period expired[14].

By registration or listing we mean, of course, the administrative activity of certifying that a vehicle may circulate on public roads. The proof certifying the registration/listing is the registration/listing certificate and the given number on the license plates.

It can be of two types:

Permanent registration/listing, which represents the registration/listing activity which grants a registration/listing certificate and number plates for an undefined period of time.

Temporary registration, which represents the registration/listing activity that grants a registration certificate and number plates for a determined period of time.

We can still notice that the criminal deeds stipulated by par. (2) and (3) of art. 334 harm the same social values as the criminal deed incriminated under par. (1). And we mean the social values regarding the accounts of vehicles circulating on public roads, that is the social relations that ensure a safe traffic on public roads.

[14] Art. 15 din O.U.G. nr. 195/2002.

The material element of the offences stipulated in par (2) and (3) will be embodied by putting into circulation or driving a vehicle or a tram with a fake license plate, and towing an unregistered trailer or a trailer with a fake license plate.

"Perpetrating these offences is the act of ignoring the right of both police agents, or on a case to case basis, and of the other state authorities that keep the accounts of vehicles and trailers, to demand to the owners of vehicles and trailers not to change their license plate numbers, as well as to impose them the correlative obligation of circulating on public roads only with the valid license plate number"[15].

The notion of "fake license plate number" may, of course, have several definitions, but we consider that this phrase defines not only a fake, imaginary number placed on the vehicle, but also the number corresponding to a previous registration, whose validity expired at the time of the perpetration of the offence, the vehicle being erased from any kind of accounts of the competent authorities. In another sense, this phrase defines the inconsistency existing among the elements constituting the plate numbers and the truth resulting from the official documents relative to the vehicle on which the respective plates with the registration/ listing number are fixed[16]. Thus, it is important that the prosecuting authority establish if the vehicle had a fake registration number and if the perpetrator committed one of the illicit activities stipulated by the law. Furthermore, the prosecution shall also establish the fact related to the exact place of the perpetration, since the offence is likely to be committed only on a public road[17].

In the section dedicated to legal practice, in connection with the offence stipulated by art. 334, we are going to present certain issues with great influence on understanding this institution, yet we are also going to make some remarks in this respect.

By the criminal sentence no. 77/1996 of Bucharest Court of Appeal they point out that a license plate number legally obtained in the past, at the time of registering other vehicle, be it the defendant's property, will represent a fake license plate number with reference to the vehicle whereupon it was illegally placed, since it does not reflect the actual situation of this vehicle for which there is no valid registration in the police records, or the competent bodies for this purpose.

By decision no. 192 / 1999 of Suceava Law Court, the Court held that registration numbers become fake numbers at the time of their removal from circulation, since any number written on the plates placed on the vehicles and not listed with the competent authorities should be deemed a fake license plate number. Under such circumstances, we point out that the time of deregistration of any vehicle will superpose over the moment when license plate numbers become fake numbers, if they continue to be placed on the vehicles.

In Romania certain courts ruled that driving on public roads an unlisted vehicle, with expired temporary license plate numbers, means perpetrating the offence of driving an unlisted vehicle in ideal concurrence with driving a vehicle with fake license plate number. The criminal sentence no. 154/1989 delivered by Bucharest Law Court ruled to the same purpose.

The relevant published literature[18] also points out that under such circumstance we are solely subject to the offence of driving an unlisted vehicle, driving a vehicle with fake license plate numbers implying other prior condition, respectively: placing imaginary license plate numbers, or other number that the attributed one.

The decision of Alba Iulia Court of Appeal was also delivered to this effect, by the criminal sentence no. 468/2010, where they ruled that in order to retain the offense of driving a vehicle with fake license plate number it is necessary to exist a deceptive action in order to forge the license plate number.

Certainly, in support of this point of view, the authors considered that expiry of the license plate number may not attract the incidence of driving a vehicle with fake license plate number since, with reference to the material element of the offense of forgery, there is no counterfeiting, or alteration, or any other normative means of committing such offense. Without the deliberate intervention in order to manufacture, imitate, change the form or mentions on the license plate number for the purpose of creating a seemingly legal framework, there is solely the offense of driving an unlisted vehicle, art. 334 par. (1) New Criminal Code.

The High Court of Cassation and Justice ruled, by the decision no 18 of the 10th of December, 2012 on the uniform interpretation and implementation of the dispositions under art. 85 par. (1) and (2) of the Government Emergency Ordinance no. 195/2002 on public roads circulation, that putting into circulation, or driving on public roads of any vehicle on which they placed license plate number with expired temporary license plate number, and the validity of the temporary circulation license also expired, meets solely the elements of the offense provided at Art. 85 par. (1) of the Government Emergency ordinance no. 195/2002 on public road traffic, republished, with subsequent modifications and supplementations.

Thus, we can say that when any person is driving a vehicle registered in another state, with expired license plate numbers, we encounter the same offense.

Also, they considered including the offense of driving an unlisted vehicle in the offense of driving a vehicle with fake license plate number, since we could say that committing the latter offense, the driver's passivity should exist concerning the legal registration of the vehicle, since nobody will use fake numbers save for creating a framework that may be apparently legal regarding the vehicle listing or registration of the unlisted vehicle or registered.

The Court of Appeal of Ploiesti, by the criminal sentence no. 833/2009, determined there will be concurrent offenses between the offense of driving an unlisted vehicle and driving a vehicle with fake license plate numbers, when an individual is driving an unlisted vehicle on public roads with license plates issued for driving test in other European states, and expired validity.

As regards the concurrent offenses, we say that this offense (art.334, par.(2) Criminal Code) might enter an ideal concurrence with other offenses, such as, driving a vehicle under the influence of alcohol or other substances, driving without a driving license etc.

Further on, taking into consideration the decision of the High Court of Cassation and Justice above mentioned, it is important to specify that the lawmaker understood to make a clear distinction among the types of numbers a vehicle can have, and that not all such plate numbers are designed for listing or registration in order to bring along the incidence of art. 334par. (2) of the Criminal Code.

Thus, according to art. 23 and art. 25 par. (1) of the regulation implementing the Government Emergency ordinance no. 195/2002 on public roads circulation, approved by the Government Decision no. 1.391/2006, with subsequent modifications, there are the following types of numbers:

- listing number – consisting of the county symbol or Bucharest Municipality, order number, expressed by Arabic numerals, and a combination of three letters with capital Latin characters;
- temporary listing numbers – in case of which, besides the symbol of the county or Bucharest Municipality and the order number, they will add the month and year of listing validity termination;
- registration number for tests – consisting of the county symbol of Bucharest municipality, order name and the mention "TESTS";
- registration number – granted solely for the vehicles registered at the local councils, and consisting of the name of the respective locality and abbreviated name of the county, in capital Latin characters, and also an order number, in Arabic numerals;
- number of temporary circulation license – consisting of the county symbol or Bucharest Municipality and order number.

According to the said dispositions, it results that in the matter of the vehicles circulation on public roads there are three types of listing numbers, one registration number and one temporary license number for circulation.

According to the dispositions of art. 334 par. (2) of the Criminal Code, the lawmaking body referred to the situations where the vehicle has a fake listing or registration number, yet not to the situation where this number is the number attributed by the temporary circulation license (a hypothesis subject to solving the Law matter by the appeal on points of law concerned the former regulation of art. 85 par. (2) of the G.E.O. no. 195/2002, republished).

We conclude that the dispositions of art. 334 of the Criminal Code refer solely to those situations where any kind of intervention was operated on the listing number of any actually listed vehicle, as above described, either by manufacturing the license plate number or imitating an authentic license plate number, or by changing the aspect or mentions of such license plate number, thus creating an improper appearance of truth, as well as the situation where the vehicle may be listed or not, yet it bears the license plate number of another vehicle[19].

"Yet, any expired license plate number cannot be assimilated by analogy with a fake license plate number, where there was no intentional forging thereof, according to the above mentioned issues.

Where the vehicle's right of circulation is limited solely to a specified period of time, and afterwards the activities required to registration of the respective vehicle were either not carried out, or not completed, will not tantamount to forgery of the temporary license plate numbers, the number mentioned in that license will not become a fake number, but the respective vehicle will become an unlisted vehicle"[20].

On the other hand, by the incrimination provided by art. 344 par. (20) of the Criminal Code, "the lawmaker took into consideration that the offender may abscond from prosecution, in connection with an offense caused by the impossibility to identify the vehicle. Yet, when the temporary license plate number is being used, the vehicle can be identified, since the respective license plate number has not been attributed to any other vehicle.

Thus, identification of the vehicle will be carried out under the same conditions as in the case of final registration.

A similar situation will be found in respect of the regulation of identity documents of Romanian citizens.

In connection with these identity documents as well, expiry of the validity term thereof and use of this document will not lead to such finding that this act is fake, but will incur solely the personal liability.

If the opposite point of view were adopted, this would mean that only the expiry of the validity of identity documents and providing the expired identity documents by the holders thereof, to the competent authorities, would be forgery relating to the identity"[21].

[19] Vasile Dobrinoiu, Ilie Pascu, Mihai Adrian Hatca, Ioan Chis, Mirela Gorunescu, Norel Neagu, Maxim Dobrinoiu, Mircea Constantin Sinescu, op. cit. p. 709.

[20] Decision no.18 /10.12. 2012 on the interpretation and uniform application of dispositions under art.. 85 alin. (1) and (2) of Government Emergency Ordinance no.. 195/2002 on public roads circulation.

No doubt, even when the legal matter referred to the High Court of Cassation and Justice concerned the dispositions of art. 85 par. (2) of the Government Emergency Ordinance no, 195/2002, hereinabove, we tried to adjust all such issues to the text of the law in force, respectively the dispositions of art. 334 par. (2), since the appeal on points of law (Romanian RIL) still applies in this respect.

Nevertheless, there are opinions in the published literature[22] which do not approve of the efficiency of the decision delivered by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, since they started from the questionable premises that a fake license plate number will always be a fake number, while in practice there is the possibility that temporary and expired license plate numbers be placed on registered vehicles. Thus, since this is not about counterfeited numbers involving the vehicle on which they are placed, we confront with the situation of fake license plate numbers.

Furthermore, as regards the offense stipulated and sanctioned by art. 334 par. (3) of the Criminal Code, the material element is represented by towing an unlisted or not registered trailer, or bearing a fake listed or registered license plate number.

As regards the fourth offense, as provided by art. 334, par. (4), we say that the material element thereof will be driving on public roads of a vehicle, or towing a trailer having the license plate numbers removed, or a vehicle registered in other state, not having circulation rights in Romania.

Certainly, for better understanding of such institution, we find it necessary to bring into attention a number of issues regarding the listing, registration, removal and other operations closely connected to vehicle records.

Listing, registration or granting of temporary license plate numbers, or for tests to a vehicle will be cancelled by the authority having performed such operation, when they find out the legal regulations relating to the said operations have been violated[23].

Cancellation of vehicle records will be carried out by the authority which performed the listing or registration of the vehicle solely in case of definitive removal thereof from circulation, when:

- the owner desires the definitive removal from circulation of the vehicle, and brings evidence of suitable vehicle storage space, held in compliance with the lawful dispositions;
- the owner brings evidence about the dismantling, cassation or handing over the vehicle to specialized units for the purpose of dismantling;
- upon definitive removing the vehicle from the country;
- in case of vehicle theft.

Removal from records of registered vehicles, upon passing thereof to other owner, will be carried out by the authority having performed the registration, at the owner's request, in compliance with the law.

The vehicles which were declared without any owner, or abandoned according to the law, by order of the public local administration, will be removed from records automatically in 30 days from receipt of the respective order[24].

As regards the place of perpetrating the offense, we say that the offenses specified under art. 334 of the Criminal Code, will be deemed offenses solely when committed on public roads. Without this spatial condition, the criminal activities analyzed above will not be offenses, according to the dispositions of the incriminating text.

The immediate consequence of such offence is represented by the creation of dangerous conditions to the traffic safety on public roads.

The causal relationship results from the materiality of the offense, which needs no proof.

As regards the subjective side, the offenses provided under art. 334 Criminal Code are committed with intent (direct or indirect). Committing an offense by negligence or without guilt will not involve criminal liability.

There is a direct intention when the offender foresees the result of his act, pursuing occurrence thereof by committing this act. There is an indirect intention when the offender foresees the result of his act, and although not pursuing the result, he accepts the occurrence thereof.

The incrimination rule does not include specifications as to the motive of the criminal act or scope of the offender.

The offenses take place at the time when the material element thereof has been achieved.

As regards the sanctions, committing the offense provided under art. 334 par. (1) will be sanctioned by imprisonment between 1 and 3 years or fine. The offense provided in par. (2) will be sanctioned by imprisonment between 1 and 5 years or fine. The hypothesis of par (3) proposes a sanction system between 3 months and 2 years imprisonment or fine. Finally, the offense provided under par. (4) will be sanctioned by imprisonment from 6 months to 2 years or fine.

3. Aspects of judicial practice

In connection with the judicial practice, in Romania, there are two opinions as regards settlement of the situation according to which a person is driving, on public roads, a vehicle registered in other state without having a valid Civil Auto Liability (RCA) insurance.

Thus, one of these opinions held the incidence under art. 16 par. (1) letter b) the final thesis of the Code of Criminal Procedure (the offense is not provided by the criminal law) where a person is driving a vehicle registered in other state, without a valid insurance, or with an expired insurance.

According to other opinion, they held that the offense is incriminated by the criminal law, pursuant to the provisions of art. 82 par. (2) of G.E.O. no. 195/2002, the vehicles registered in other states can circulate on Romanian territory solely for the time when there is an insurance policy for them. Otherwise, the vehicles fall under the scope of art. 334 par. (4).

By the criminal sentence no. 1491/A/05.11.2015 delivered by the Court of Appeal of Bucharest, the defendant was acquitted, based on the provisions of art. 16 par. (1) letter b) final thesis, for perpetrating the offense of driving a vehicle registered in another state without the right of circulation in Romania, consisting in the fact that the defendant drove on Romanian territory a vehicle registered in Bulgaria for which he did not have a valid mandatory insurance.

By the criminal sentence no. 32/A dated the 8th of January, 2015, delivered by the Court of Appeal of Bucharest, the defendant was acquitted based on the provisions of art. 16 par. (1) B the final thesis, for perpetrating the offense of driving a vehicle registered in other state without the right of circulation in Romania, consisting in the fact that on the date of 12th of April, 2014, around 00.10 AM hours, the defendant B. F.M. of Vitanesti commune, Teleorman County, was driving the car brand Chrysler Neon, black, with license plate number x, on street y. of Alexandria town, Teleorman County, and was stopped in traffic by the traffic police of Alexandria, and he presented the car documents, driving license, registration certificate and green card series X, with validity term expired on 22.02.2014.

By the criminal sentence no. 127 dated the 19th of January, 2016, the Law Court of sector 5, Bucharest acquitted the defendant B.N. for perpetrating the offense of driving a vehicle registered in other state, without the right of circulation in Romania, this offense being stipulated and sanctioned by art. 334 par. (4) Criminal Code, consisting in the fact that the defendant was driving a vehicle registered in other state, without a valid insurance, on the Romanian territory.

This sentence was appealed by the Prosecutor's Office attached to District Court, sector 5, Bucharest. As concerns the perpetration of the offense making the object of this survey, The Court of Appeal of Bucharest sentenced the defendant B.N., the Court noting that the dispositions under art. 334 par. (4) Criminal Code sanctions as an offense the act of driving on public roads a vehicle registered in other state, without the right of circulation in Romania. The Court holds that, pursuant to the dispositions under art. 82 par. (2) of G.E.O. no. 185/2002, the vehicles registered in other states can circulate on Romanian territory solely for the period when there is an insurance policy covering the civil liability resulting from the damages caused by car accidents.

As a consequence, namely, from the expiry date of the mandatory car insurance, respectively from the date of 01.02.2014, the car brand Mercedes Vito, license plate number X, driven by the defendant on the date of 05.11.2014, no longer had the right of circulation in Romania, thus falling under the scope of the sanctions pursuant to the dispositions under art. 334 par. (4) Criminal Code.

In law, the act of the defendant J, who, on the date of 17.09.2008 removed the license plates bearing registration no. X from the car belonging to the damaged party, parked on a street, and placed these plates on another car which he subsequently drove on the streets, the act of the defendant meets the constitutive elements of the offense of aggravated theft pursuant to art. 208 par. (1), art. 209 par. (1) letter e) of the Criminal Code and the offense driving on public roads a car with fake registration numbers placed on it, pursuant to art. 85 par. (2) of the G.E.O. no. 195/2002[25].

Driving on public roads of a vehicle with a trailer attached thereto, without registration, meets the constitutive elements of the offense pursuant to art. 85 par. (1) of G.E.O. no. 195/2002[26].

Art. 85 par. (1), correspondent in art. 334 par. (1), incriminates the expiry of the registration number, and not the expiry of the civil liability insurance (RCA). The consequences relating to the non-existence of the RCA are not of a criminal nature, but contraventional offences.

The serious error in fact should not be confused with an incorrect assessment of the evidence, this case of cassation being incident whenever the erroneous determination of the facts is obvious, concerning their existence or non-existence, their nature and the circumstances of committing thereof, by not taking into consideration the evidence confirming their existence, the sole condition being their influence on the solution taken[27].

The defendant sitting behind the wheel of a towed vehicle, when the engine of this car is not running, does not meet the constitutive elements of the offense pursuant to art. 85 par. (1) of G.E.O. no. 195/2002, since this car moved along the public roads being towed by another vehicle[28].

4. Conclusions

Although, at first glance, the offense provided and sanctioned under art. 334 Criminal Code would not raise problems for the correct determination of the legal classification of a factual situation, in this survey I admitted and presented that the doctrine, and the juridical practice as well, experienced fields with different interpretations.

It is important, in such cases, to analyze very carefully whether the factual situation meets the constitutive elements of an offense.

On points of law in practice, we agree with the solution that the act of a person driving on Romanian territory a vehicle that was registered in other state, yet not having the mandatory car insurance, does not meet the constitutive elements of the offense analyzed.

The principle of legality of incrimination and punishment, enshrined in art. 7, par. 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms requires, inter alia, that the legislation define clearly the offenses and punishment, in compliance with the principle of predictability.

The term "law" includes the legislative and jurisprudential law, at the same time, and involves certain qualitative conditions, including those of accessibility and predictability. In this respect, the European Court of Human Rights consistently held that the meaning of the notion of foreseeability depends, to a large extent, on the content of the concerned text, the area covered, and the number and quality of its recipients[29] , and the predictability of the law does not oppose that the concerned person would have to rely on good advice in order to assess, to a reasonable level, the consequences that could result from an action or inaction thereof.

At the same time we appreciate that art. 334 par. 4 of the Criminal Code is written in a manner that creates confusion for its recipients regarding the scope extent of the objective side of the offense or the certainty that solely certain actions would be included in the content thereof, respectively specifically involving driving of a vehicle registered in other state without the right of circulation in Romania.

THE CRIMINAL CHARGE

George Octavian NICOLAE[*]
Sebastian Bogdan GAVRILĂ[]

Abstract

The process of criminal prosecution against a particular individual is ordered by the prosecutor or law enforcement investigator by ordinance. After the decision to carry on with the criminal investigation, the suspected person, the perpetrator acquires a legal standing which allows a full spectrum of rights and obligations stipulated by law. This project is focused on the link between our national criminal law regulation regarding the criminal investigation and the demands of the European Convention for human rights.

Keywords: criminal prosecution; European Convention on Human Rights; criminal law, reasonable suspicion, criminal charge.

1. Introduction

The start of the criminal investigation proceedings has undergone significant changes under the provisions of the new Criminal Procedural Code over the old regulations of 1968.

Thus, according to art. 305 of the Criminal Procedural Code, "when the preliminary criminal complaint fulfils the conditions stipulated by law, the investigator begins criminal proceedings regarding the committed or prepared illicit act, even if the author is indicated or known".

Compared with the provisions of the Criminal Procedural Code of 1968, which in art. 228 stated that " the investigator notified by resolution, begins criminal proceedings when from the content of the complaint or from the preliminary investigatory acts does not result any legal impediment stipulated in art. 10" we may ascertain the occurrence of two major changes in the national criminal policy.

2. Content

Firstly, according to the Former Criminal Procedural Code, after notification the prosecution could commence proceedings regarding both the offense (in rem), and on one particular person (in personam). Nowadays, authorities are required to begin with the in rem phase, even if in the complaint the offender is indicated or enough information exists to allow his identification in order to concentrate the investigation on a particular individual prosecution (initiation of the in personam phase).

The new Procedural Code thus establishes the obligation of the prosecution to be initiated only regarding an offense, so initially it can capitalize only on the in rem part of the process.

Secondly, the prosecutors are obligated to initiate in rem proceedings every time they were seized legally and have established the document meets the form and substance and in the case self-notification. Consequently, the new Code of Criminal Procedural vision has eliminated the Preliminary acts of criminal prosecution, previously covered by art. 224 of the old C.p.p.

The immediate start, quasi-automatic prosecution after formulating a notification enables the creation of a procedural framework necessary for the investigators can effectively manage the evidence relevant to verifying the merits of the complaint and, further on, to identify and prove the act was committed by the perpetrator. Thus, the message stemming from the start of the criminal investigation concerning a crime means that the investigators have been lawfully notified, are legally invested and are currently analysing evidence to verify the complaint[1].

In order to indict after receiving the complaint, the criminal investigator (prosecutor or law enforcement official) should first verify their competence, in accordance with art. 294 C.p.p. In case they consider that they are generally, materially and territorially competent, they then proceed to check the notification act (criminal complaint, denunciation, acts signed by other authorities) in terms of form and content. During this "regulatory" stage the alleged criminal complaint is verified if it is described in a clear and sufficient manner, and if not it shall be resent to the complainant, in order to be completed.

By analyzing art. 305 par. 1 C.p.p., as amended by Ordinance No. 18/2016, one can notice the elimination of the condition that none of the cases that prevent the criminal action stipulated by art. 16 par. 1 C.p.p. should be applicable[2].

The elimination of this negative condition is useful because at the beginning of in rem investigations, an analysis of legal impediments to the criminal indictment related to a person's criminal liability is not necessary. This condition was apt to lead to difficulties at the start of investigations, especially in cases in which criminal action was conditional upon prior complaint of the victim who was in a physical or moral impossibility to formulate preliminary the complaint (as an example road accidents which caused a bodily injury leading to a period in which the victim was unconscious and in intensive care, given that the offense provided by art. 196 penal Code, the criminal proceedings required the previous complaint the injured person to be set in motion)[3].

However, judicial practice has provided cases in which even if the criminal complaint met the content and form conditions, the prosecutor found evidence of one of the cases stipulated by art. 16 par. (1) C.p.p., certain situations which require the dismissal of a case, without the criminal proceedings in rem can be identified.

Also, if the investigator finds nonessential errors that can be corrected by complainant, he may decide to return it for completion. In case the deficiencies are major, essential and cannot be rectified, the case is to be closed, in accordance with art. 315 par. 1 letter. a C.p.p.

After verification of the formal conditions of the notification act and upon establishing their competence, the in rem phase can commence. In this regard it should be noted that in the process of finding the applicable law, the investigator is not bound by initial complaint.

From a procedural standpoint, the criminal investigation shall be ordered by the law enforcement investigator or by the prosecutor by ordinance. The procedural act of commencement of prosecution in rem must include the particulars set out in art. 286 par. (2) letter a-c and g: name of the prosecutor's office and date of issue; full name and position of the person making it; the object of the prosecution, the applicable legal frame, data on the suspect or accused person; signature of the person who wrote it.

By analyzing art. 286 par. 2 letter a, C.p.p., in relation to art. 305 par. 1 C.p.p., a mismatch can be found. Thus, considering that the order of commencement of prosecution in rem must be made by the law enforcement investigator (be it by the police as part of the structures of the judicial police or special criminal investigation unit), the name of the police unit in which the law enforcement official is enrolled should also be mentioned.

Therefore, in the vision of the New Penal Code, the law enforcement investigator is not obliged to submit the ordinance for confirmation by the prosecutor who supervises the activity, but merely to inform the prosecutor, as stated in art. 300 par. (2) C.p.p .: " the law enforcement investigation units are required to inform the prosecutor concerning ongoing or future activities."

Even if the in rem stage is quasi-automatic, it should be subjected to thorough analysis and legal rigor, as required by art. 5 C.p.p., which states that the authorities have the obligation to find the truth concerning the facts and circumstances of the case, and also regarding the suspect or accused person, but by reference to art. 97 and art. 100 C.p.p. we can conclude that the process of finding evidence should be conducted after creating the necessary procedural framework. There are of course exceptions to this rule, such as art. 111 par. (10) which states that the injured person's statement provided during a hearing conducted immediately after registration of the complaint, constitutes evidence even if it is administered before the start of in rem criminal proceedings.

After starting the in rem criminal investigation, authorities may proceed to administering evidence in order to achieve the objectives under art. 285 C.p.p.

Thus, according to art. 285 par. 1 of the C.p.p., "the prosecution is to gather the necessary evidence regarding the existence of the crime, to identify those who have committed a crime and to establish criminal liability, in order to assess whether or not it should be sent to trial ".

When concerned in conducting research that there is evidence proving the reasonable suspicion that a particular person has committed the offense for which prosecution has begun and there is one of the cases mentioned in art. 16 par. 1 C.p.p., the criminal investigation shall order, under art. 305 par. 3 C.p.p., making further prosecution against the suspect (in personam).

The process of criminal prosecution against a particular individual is ordered by the prosecutor or law enforcement investigator by ordinance.

The ordinance of the law enforcement investigator against the suspect is subject to confirmation by the prosecutor within three days from the date of issue. The procedural term stated in art. 305 par. 3 is not mandatory.

However, the confirmation act by the prosecutor is of particular importance. Thus, if the law enforcement investigators administer evidence which requires the existence of a suspect in the case (reconstruction[4] or hearing of the suspect), in case later on the prosecutor overseeing the prosecution cancels the ordinance, this will entail the exclusion of the evidence outside the procedural framework as unlawfully. In addition, after further criminal investigation, law enforcement investigators have apprehended the suspect and the case prosecutor cancels the ordinance, the revocation of detention is also a direct consequence. According to art. C.P.P. 209, in conjunction with art. 203 par. 1 and art. 202 par. 4, letter a, C.p.p., the arrest can be done only against the suspect or defendant, which requires the confirmation by the prosecutor. If the prosecutor should cancel the ordinance, under art. 304 par. 1 C.p.p. the positive condition instituted by art. 209 par. 1 C.p.p. is no longer fulfilled, which stipulates that law enforcement investigators may make an arrest if the conditions of Art. 202 C.p.p. are met. art. 202 C.p.p. stipulates that preventive measures can be arranged if there is evidence or reasonable suspicion that a person has committed a crime, as a minimal standard of proof that would lead to a reasonable charge against the suspect or defendant.

[2] According to art. 16 para. (1) C.p.p., criminal action cannot be set in motion, and if it was set in motion cannot be exercised if: a) the act does not exist; b) the act is not provided by criminal law or was not committed with guilt established by law; c) there is no evidence that a person has committed the offense; d) there is an explanatory; e) lack of preliminary complaint, authorization or notification by the competent body or another condition stipulated by law, required in support criminal action; f) amnesty or prescription, the death of the suspect or accused person or suspect legal termination in a case of a business; g) withdrawn prior complaint, so that criminal liability is removed, reconciliation, agreement or mediation under the law; h) legal impediment to punishment; i) there is res judicata; j) transfer procedure with another state.

After the decision to carry on with the criminal investigation, the suspected person, the perpetrator acquires a legal standing[5] which allows a full spectrum of rights and obligations stipulated by law.

Thus, in accordance with art. 77 C.p.p. and art. 83 C.P.P., the suspect has the following rights:

a) the right not to give any statement during trial, bearing in mind that should he refuse to testify, he will not suffer any negative consequences, and he should give statements, it can be used as evidence against him;
b) the right to be informed of the offense of which he is suspected of and its legal qualification;
c) the right to see the file, in a accordance with the law;
d) the right to have a lawyer of his choice, and if should not not designate one, in cases of compulsory legal assistance the right to be appointed one;
e) the right to propose evidence in accordance with the law, to raise exceptions and draw conclusions;
f) the right to make any other claims related to the settlement of civil and criminal side of the case;
g) the benefit of an interpreter free of charge when he does not understand, isn't able to express himself well or cannot communicate in Romanian;
h) the right to appeal to a mediator in cases permitted by law;
i) the right to be informed of his rights;
j) other rights provided by law.

The legal doctrine has stressed out the importance of this particular stage in which the prosecution efforts are confirmed which has the significance of formulating a criminal charge against a person when the prosecutor or the law enforcement investigator, after evaluating the existing evidence in question comes to a reasonable suspicion that a particular person committed the act stipulated by criminal law[6].

The term criminal charge is an autonomous one, judicially established by the E.C.H.R.[7]. This means any official notification, issued by a competent authority, which is attributed to a person committing a crime, is able to bring forth significant repercussions on the rights and freedoms of the individual.

We appreciate that the disclosure of the criminal charge should not be confused with the disclosure to the accused that he is a suspect, the criminal act that he is suspected of and the legal classification under art. 307 C.p.p.

The E.C.H.R. ruled that the notion of the "formal notification" is in direct correspondence to the moment when the accused person becomes liable for prosecution (for example when a house search is carried, which under art. 158 of the C.P.P. can be performed even in the in rem stage of the criminal proceedings[8]).

It is essential to accurately establish the time of the criminal charge, because from that moment on the rights and guarantees provided by art. 6, E.C.H.R. become applicable.

The Criminal Procedural Code established in Article 307 the obligation of the prosecution to bring to the attention of the suspect before his first hearing, the procedural capacity he has acquired, the act he is suspected of, it's legal classification and the procedural rights he is entitled to.

However, in judicial practice interpretations differ substantially regarding the moment of the prosecution is confirmed, with the disclosure of the accusation and the actual time when the criminal charge against a person is brought forth in the autonomous meaning established by the E.C.H.R..

To analyse the importance and effects of these issues we shall endeavour to address some cases with a proven applicability of the concept.

Thus, the moment at which the prosecution is confirmed against a person he consequently becomes the suspect indicated in art. 305 par. 3 C.p.p., which

[4] According to art. 193 par. 1 of the C.p.p., the investigator or the court, if it is necessary for the verification and accurate data or to determine circumstances which are important to solving the case, can reconstruct, in whole or in part, the manner and conditions in which the offense was committed.

[5] Art. 33 C.p.p. states that the main subjects in the criminal proceedings are the suspect and the injured person.

[6] Mihail Udroiu, op. cit., p. 46.

[7] ECHR ruled in the Engel v. The Netherlands case, para. 81, three alternative criteria in order to ascertain the concept of the criminal charge: qualification as a crime by the domestic law, the nature of the offense and the severity of the sanction that can be applied to the defendant.

[8] ECHR, Rulling Hozze c. Pays-Bas, 25.05.1998.

states that when the law enforcement investigator considers that there is enough evidence leading to a reasonable suspicion that a person has committed a crime, further investigation may be carried out.

Although there isn't a strict and rigorous method of separating the in rem stage and the in personam phase, the prosecutor and law enforcement investigators must, when there is evidence leading to a reasonable suspicion of an offense by a determined subject to confirm the criminal proceedings. This obligation stems from the wording of the law itself, which does not provide an option for the law enforcement investigator, but firmly establishes it as a rule by using the imperative verb "has" and not "may"[9].

However, in order to come to this particular stage, enough evidence should be administered, thus establishing a factual basis for prosecution of a person, since the criminal complaint itself has no probative value.

That way in which the evidence was administered during the stages of the criminal prosecution in rem stage has a significant bearing on the rights granted in this stage and the fairness of the criminal investigation.

In support of this statement, there are instances where the very nature of offenses for which criminal proceedings have been triggered may maintain a balanced procedural process and ensure a fair trial, the right to defense of the person suspected, but nonetheless involves certain difficulties.

For example, the case of injury committed by a doctor. At first in rem proceedings shall commence, by administering preliminary evidence. Most times, the evidence necessary for building a reasonable suspicion of an unlawful medical fault is limited to the hearing of the injured, witness testimony and an expert report which establishes malpractice. But in this case the prosecutorial in rem efforts are directed against a particular person, the only one that could have committed the crime under investigation. Even so, the person under investigation (perpetrator), not until the confirmation of the investigation can he participate effectively in the administration of evidence. The right to propose evidence and the right to hire a lawyer become functional only after the in personam stage. Moreover, the right to see the file of the criminal investigation, granted pursuant to art. 83 par. 1 letter b C.p.p. may be exercised by the suspect and not the perpetrator. If he should formulate requests for the administration of evidence or to consult the file, they can be easily dismissed after a purely formal interpretation of the legal provisions that stipulate the necessity of acquiring the quality of the suspect in order to enjoy the rights and guarantees.

Also, in such cases it is necessary that the authorities to weigh in very carefully the evidence, so that the in rem stage isn't prolonged more time than necessary. Infringement of this obligation once the evidence leading to a reasonable suspicion of committing a crime by a particular individual may cause injury of the right to a fair trial, which may attract in case of real and substantial harm, the cancelation of procedural acts and procedural samples obtainted after this time.However, it should be stressed that to establish a possible injury to the right of the accused persons to defense, the proceedings must be examined in their entirety[10].

After confirmation of the in rem prosecution, the suspect may propose more evidence. The European Court of Human Rights determined that the admissibility of evidence is primarily based on nation law and appreciation about the usefulness of evidence remains the attribute of the investigators with the added necessity to motivate their decision.

Another vulnerability stems from the existence of an unusual lag time between the start of the investigation and the disclosure of the accusation. Although art. 307 C.p.p. does not set a time frame, but merely states that the obligation must be fulfilled until the first hearing of the suspect, considering the fact that in some cases the evidence should be taken expeditiously, the authorities must inform the suspect in the shortest possible time. Only this way can he understand the charge, prepare his defense and in doing so the process does not stagnate or threaten the administration of evidence[11].

Doctrine has encountered another potential problem, namely the examination of a witness with the right to refuse to testify[12]. Namely, the husband and former spouse, relatives up or down in a direct line, brothers and sisters of the suspect or persons as nominated by art. 117 par. 1 C.p.p. Strictly procedurally speaking, these people do not have the right to refuse to testify in cases when a criminal investigation is underway in order to document the alleged criminal activities of a specified perpetrator, but during the in rem stage.

3. Conclusions

In conclusion, it should be noted that both the prosecutor but also the law enforcement investigators have the difficult task of administering the evidence in order to establish the judicial truth and to carefully weigh in on the value of the evidence to meet the obligation of confirming the investigation without undue delay .

We appreciate that between the notion of confirmation of the investigation and the criminal charge is a part-whole relation, the second incorporating the first one both in terms of extended

THE PRIVATE VISIT – RIGHT OR COMPENSATION

Iulia POPESCU[*]

Abstract

The connection of the person deprived of his/her liberty with the family is an important aspect to be kept in the prison environment both for him/her and for the family. This connection is accomplished in particular by the right to private visit as provided within the legal regulations. Identifying the origins of the right to private visit and establishing the nature of this private right represent a goal, given that its peculiarity is that although it is regarded as a right, its implementation seems to be closer to the concept of reward.

The radiography of the concept „private visit" is trying to identify both the willingness of the legislator that regulated this right, but also the realities from the prisons in terms of concrete realization of this right, considering both the legal provisions and the concrete situations in prisons.

Keywords: rights, private visit, family, penitentiary, compensation

Introduction

The deprivation of the persons' freedom, as a result of the imposition of a sentence or of the disposition of the preventive custody, inevitably leads to their separation from society, and especially from the family environment. The physical closeness between the prisoner and the family members is affected with priority when they are separated, especially the possibility of preserving a private life between the partners when one of them is imprisoned.

The lack of contact between the prisoners and their partners can lead to abnormal behaviour, taking into account that, in addition to the sentence imposed, the prisoners suffer from other penalties not mentioned in the court decisions of conviction.

The work aims to highlight the pros and cons regulating this right, or to clarify to what extent, in its current form, the right to private life of the prisoners can be regarded as a right or as a compensation (possibly a conditional right).

Thus, the intended purpose in achieving this objective is of particular importance, because if it proves that the right to privacy of the convicted person is not in fact a law, the conclusions drawn can be taken into consideration by the legislator in order to harmonize the existing legislation with the concept of the rights.

Thus, this study supplements the existing literature by making an objective analysis of the provisions governing the right to privacy of the prisoners, presenting also the specific issues arising in the process of implementing them, trying to identify the weaknesses.

The work is based on the systematic analysis of the Romanian legislation represented by laws and regulations, which regulated the right to private visit (Law no. 275/2006, Law no. 254/2013 and their implementing regulations), the Constitutional Court Decision no. 222/2015, Case Gaciu against Romania, the relevant matters, and the transposition of the legal rules in the form of standard procedures at the level of prisons.

The right or the compensation are two concepts with different meanings, resulted from their definitions.

"Right = Power, legal prerogative recognized to a person to have a certain conduct, to enjoy certain privileges etc."[1].

„Compensation = what is or is given in order to reward someone for the committed action; reward; gratification"[2].

From the definition of law it can be extracted its essential characteristic, namely that the right person is a recognized power, without being subject to any conditionality.

On the other hand, the concept of compensation reflects a benefit due to the implementation of other activities. Hence, a compensation exists prior to a performed activity that gives rise to a reward. As such, the reward is conditional.

The private visit, new concept in the prison system, was first granted as an experimentally compensation in 1995 and starting with 2006 it was introduced as a legal right[3].

275/2006 on the execution of the punishments and measures ordered by the court in criminal proceedings (hereinafter REG 1). Within art. 43-45 of REG1 it is defined who can benefit from the private visit, the conditions and procedure for granting this right. Currently, the right to the private visit is regulated by Law no. 254/2013 on the execution of the sentences and custodial measures ordered by the court in the criminal proceedings, which repealed Law no. 275/2006 on the execution of the punishments and measures ordered by the judicial bodies during the criminal trial.

The need to regulate this concept through REG 1 results from the importance of its existence for people deprived of their freedom and for their partners.

The private visit, as stipulated in REG 1 (article 43 paragraph 1), allowed the meeting between the convicted person and the husband/ wife, partner/ partner, quarterly, for 2 hours. An exception was also foreseen if the marriage was officiated in prison in the first year of marriage, the private visit being paid monthly (article 43 paragraph 1).

In oredr to grant this right, it was necessary that the convicted person to meet certain conditions established by law.

It is at least peculiar as for achieving a right, it was necessary to comply with certain conditions. Analyzing also other rights of the convicted persons for example, the right of access provided for in art. 38, the right of petition provided for in art. 50 or right to correspondence mentioned in art. 51, it is noted that for exercising these there were not required certain conditions. The law regulated the existence of such rights, for which the administration of the prison had to take certain measures, by no means imposing conditions on the persons convicted.

Introducing the private visit, even conditionally, it was just normal considering the fact that within the Constitution, among the rights recognized to the citizens it was set out in art. 26 para. (1) the right to private family and private life, such as "The public authorities shall respect and protect the family and private life".

It is true that the convicted person must bear the consequences of his antisocial actions, but it is required that the government to create optimal conditions for serving the sentence without restricting the convicted other rights which have not been limited by the sentence.

By Law no. 254/2013 on the execution of the sentences and of the custodial measures ordered by the court during the criminal trial, which repealed Law no. 275/2006 on the execution of the punishments and measures ordered by the court during the criminal trial, the right of the private visit was introduced as free-standing law.

It is worth mentioning that the old regulation regarding the private visit was stipulated in REG 1, now this right is provided within the Law regarding the enforcement of the sentences in art. 69 - Chapter V entitled "Rights of the convicted persons".

According to this article, in order to benefit from the right of the private visit of the persons convicted must meet certain conditions, cumulatively:

a) They have been convicted and are distributed in a regime of enforcement of custodial sentences;
b) It is under trial as a defendant;
c) There is a marital relationship, as evidenced by the certified copy of the marriage certificate or, where appropriate, a partnership relationship similar to the relations established between the spouses;
d) They have not benefited in the last 3 months preceding the request for the private visit, from permission out of prison;
e) They were not disciplinary sanctioned over a period of 6 months prior to the request of the private visit, or the sanction was lifted;
f) Actively participates in educational programs, psychological and social assistance or working;

(2) The married convicted person can only benefit from the private visit of the spouse.

(3) For granting the private visit, partners must have had a similar relationship with the relations established between spouses prior to the date of receipt in prison.

(4) The proof of the partnership relation is done by affidavit, authenticated by a notary.

(5) The director of the prison can approve private visits between the convicted under this article.

(6) The number, frequency of the visits and procedure of carrying out private visits shall be determined by the implementing regulation of this law".

The text of the legislation mentioned above made no significant changes compared to the previous regulation, concerning the conditions for granting a right to visit intimate and the categories of persons to whom it recognizes this right.

What it is worth mentioning is that if in the previous regulation, the convicted and their partners were not married, they had to prove the existence of a relationship similar to that of a marriage in the last 6 months prior to the request for the intimate visit, the main evidence representing the visits under art. 40 of REG 1, as in the new regulation this period is not foreseen anymore and neither the proof of this relationship through the visits.

A new aspect of the new legislative text is the possibility that the governor approves private visits between the convicted under the same conditions as those laid down by Art. 69 of the law.

The rules of implementation of the Law no. 254/2013 (hereinafter REG 2) transposes the obligation regulated in art. 69 para. (6) of the Law, so that the number, frequency and procedure of conducting the intimate visits.

Analyzing the right to visit as foreseen in REG 2, we could say that it provides a significant change in the art. 69 para. 1 letter b). Thus, art. 145 par. (1) letter a) in REG 2 states that the persons "who are convicted and are sent in a regime of enforcement of custodial sentences, and they are remanded during the trial" have the right to intimate visit.

The necessity of this change was imposed by decision no. 222/2015 of the Constitutional Court which, upholding the exception of unconstitutionality, reflected that the provisions of art. 69 para. (1) b) of the Law are not constitutional.

Thus, the Constitutional Court was hearing a plea of unconstitutionality in terms of the fact that the right to intimate visit does not apply to people in custody.

In the exception invoked it was mentioned that the existing provision in art. 69 para. (1) letter b) of Law no. 254/2013 - There are not under trial as defendant – the persons in custody are exempted from the right to intimate visit.

The Court by its Decision, motivated also by the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights (Case Varnas against Lithuania, Case Moiseyev against Russia), upheld the exception of unconstitutionality and found that the difference in legal treatment regarding the right to intimate visits as it is provided in the art. 69 para. (1) letter b) and art. 110 para. (1) letter b) of Law no. 254/ 2013, when regulating the enforcement regime of the custodial preventive measures and the final criminal punishments, it has no objective and reasonable justification and are not based on considerations of security activities in the detention centers. Therefore, this difference discriminates the persons remanded in relation to those sentenced to deprivation of liberty, being likely to contravene the provisions of article 16 of the Fundamental Law, related to those of article 26 of the Constitution[4].

The Constitutional Court decision came shortly before Romania would be condemned by the European Court of Human Rights, Tuesday 23rd of June 2015, in Case Costel Gaciu against Romania, for discrimination and violation of the right to respect family life, establishing that the authorities applied on the plaintiff differential treatment when they refused his request to receive conjugal visits from his wife during remand.

The new regulation represents normalization of the present situation in prisons because, for example, it was not fair that a person sentenced to imprisonment for two years to be given the right to intimate visit and a person who spent the same period in custody not to have the same rights. One should not lose sight of the fact that the person who is not definitively convicted still benefits from the presumption of innocence. So it was quite unnatural as a person who was found guilty to have a right recognized, which implies a strong emotional involvement and other who hadn't the "chance" to be condemned not to have this right recognized. Moreover, the court ruled definitively on the crime committed by the convicted, but in terms of a person in custody, the court found that the evidence results in the reasonable suspicion that one committed a crime.

It can be concluded that the Constitutional Court decision restores, if allowed, a balance in the rights of the persons deprived of their liberty.

The conditions imposed (article 69 letters a-f of the Law) in order to benefit from this right determines the special status of the right to intimate visit compared to other rights. The text of the law requires both positive and negative circumstances.

The connection of the imprisoned with the outside world can represent that opportunity to motivate in an attempt to overcome the difficult situation they are in.

The new regulation still left unsettled the possibility of the unmarried or single detainees to benefit from intimate visit. This positive condition in para. 1 letter c) art. 69 of the Law sets out the categories of the persons to whom this right applies.

Even the doctrine[5] stated the fact that barring the right to intimate of the young and unmarried individuals not involved in a long-term relationship, is still a type of discrimination. It is quite true that you can have an intimate life even if you're not in a relationship, moreover if you are a young person. Therefore, the lack of intimate activity can affect people depending on their lifestyle and not on their marital or civil status.

It would probably be very interesting to find out what were the reasons envisaged by the lawmaker at the time of regulating this right in its current form.

Hypothetically, if the lawmakwer chose to establish this right to preserve the matrimonial ties or a stable relationship and avoid its collapse, it would still not justify the exclusion of other categories of persons from benefiting from it.

Thus, it is really important to preserve the links between the persons deprived of their liberty and their partners, for physical and mental health of both parties. An additional reason is the fact that the partner of the person deprived of liberty should not be brought into the situation to serve the sentence imposed on the convicted.

However, as far as preserving the links was the main reason for recognizing this right, young and unmarried people should have been included as beneficiaries of this right, just to facilitate the links that may have the gift to temper the aggressive behaviour of the persons imprisoned.

The studies conducted on animals and humans emphasizes an interdependence, although uneven, between high testosterone and aggression. At biological level this fosters competition in order to adapt to the environment, but in case of humans it is associated with antisocial behaviour (domestic violence, DUI)[6].

In prison, such a behaviour can foster abuse and violence. Besides the aspect related to the discrimination between people, according to the Declaration from Geneva, the right to marital life could have a beneficial effect in order to reduce psychological tension and homosexuality in prison[7].

Since 1959 these reasons are supported by literature data, when an American psychologist stated that not only sexual satisfaction should be taken into account, but also the possibility of reuniting with the family, of keeping marital relations or cohabitation and finally the prisoner can foresee a future after the imprisonment[8].

The emotional discharge achieved through intimate activities can normalize the behaviour of people, especially of the young who have much higher hormonal disorders due to age.

If the reason for introducing this right represented an attempt to maintain a balance between the health of the person deprived of his liberty and his partner or to avoid changes in the sexual orientation as a result of the physical contact deprivation with your partner/ spouse, restricting the access of other persons to this right is not justified. Young people who before imprisonment had an active private life may be more frustrated by the loss of this possibility by imprisonment. It is true, as stated above, that by imprisonment, the person must be taken out from the environment where he/ she committed the offense, for his/ her own good, and especially for the society but this does not mean deprived of other rights that were not mentioned in the sentence. The rights whose exercise may be restricted to imprisoned are strictly stipulated by law and individualized by the court in order to personalize each sentence separately. If all imprisoned, regardless of the offense committed, who ab initio would have been restricted from all rights benefiting from as free people, it would create a too heavy situation and certainly with no positive consequences. So, irrespective of the act committed, in addition to the sentence imposed, the person would loose all rights and this would have had a devastating impact on him/ her and he/ she would get frustrated and, besides the less serious situations, the persons concerned would be tempted to commit more serious offenses that would produce some of the same consequences.

Often, the imprisoned who are young or who are involved in stable romantic relationships are tempted to rebel more easily since, in most cases this is the only way to suppress, and that their behaviour affects not only them.

It is true that it is difficult to establish a friendship, maybe stable between the persons in detention and the people at large, but it is not impossible, however this can not be a reason for restricting the right to benefit from when knowing someone with whom you can establish a relationship even later after leaving the prison.

The communication with the outside world is much easier today, given the fact that through the Internet connections between people on a very large physical distance can be preserved.

However, communication without physical contact, even occasionally, is a form without substance, and as Titu Maiorescu said "The second nature, and most important, that we must focus on, is this: the form without substance is not only useless, but it is truly corruptible"[9].

Based on the reasoning set out, it can be appreciated that the exclusion of the persons mentioned above from the right to intimate visit is not justified and moreover leads to discrimination.

Going back to the analysis of the legal texts, one should mention that the first negative condition, also preserved in the law in force, is that in the last three months preceding the request to intimate visit, the detainee must not have permission to get out of prison.

Restricting the right to intimate visit compared to the right to visit can be noticed more clearly in this condition. Thus, only the right to intimate visit is subject to permission, not necessarily the right to visit. The reason for different treatment between the two rights is not easily identifiable. If one of the reasons for limiting the intimate visit is that in the last 3 months there was a meeting between the imprisoned and the partner, when granting the permission to leave the prison for a certain period, it is difficult to understand why it is not applied the same treatment as to the right to visit. Why the permission as measure ordered by the prison administration does not affect the frequency of the right to visit, and only granting the intimate visit?

The differential treatment between those two rights generates natural questions. It is important for the detained person to have the right to visit or the right to intimate visit? Why should it be distinctive?

The right answer is difficult to be given because for some people the lack of closeness to family, partner, may be more painful than the lack of intimacy with your partner. At the same time there are people who give a greater significance to privacy and the deprivation of this right is deeply felt.

In an attempt to understand the cause of establishing the circumstances for exercising the right to intimate visit, one can assume that the lawmaker found that the intimate visit has a value equal to or greater than the right to visit the detainee and it can be conditioned without unpleasant consequences.

On the other hand, the answer could be on the opposite, the right to intimate visit being more important and conditioning it as a deprivation of the detainee to those that would have been benefited from if he was free, showing him again the consequences of his actions.

It is true that by imprisonemnet, the person loses the exercise of several rights that benefited from when free, however regular exercise of some of these rights may lead to the idea of suppressing the punishment nature of the penalty imposed by the court.

Thus, we can conclude that this condition does not justify the existence of the right to the intimate visits.

The second negative condition established in letter e) of para. (1) article 69 of the Law is the lack of disciplinary sanctions for a period of six months preceding the request for the intimate visit.

The right to intimate visit arises especially under this circumstances. According to this condition, the right to intimate visit is granted if the imprisoned has not a behaviour that needs to be punished. So, the detainee is "rewarded" for his behaviour, namely he is rewarded because he was not sanctioned.

The same conclusion is extracted from the last condition laid down in art. 69 para. 1 letter f) of the Law, otherwise positive condition. This condition aims the behaviour of the imprisoned that must actively participate in educational, psychological and social assistance programs or working.

These last conditions seem to be the most restrictive of all. While the other conditions are, to a certain extent, independent of the imprisoned person's will, the last two are referring to his will.

All the conditions established for obtaining the right for an intimate visit, and, above all, the last two, are turning it into one closer to a reward.

The right to a visit, being the closest notion to the one referring to an intimate visit, does not require to meet certain conditions in order for it to be applied. There are conditions stipulated for its denial and interruption, mentioned in the art. 141 from Reg. 2. It is only natural for a right to be denied as long as manifesting that right is threatening the order and security. In the art. 141 from Reg. 2, denying the right for a visit applies for: a) guns, amunition, hallucinogenic substances, drugs, medicines or any other objects that are forbidden for the visitors to have on them and which they hadn't declared before the security check; b) the visitors may have a negative influence on the convicted person's behaviour; c) the visitors are under alcohol use; d) there is proven information that the visitors might trouble the security, order or discipline of the conviction area; e) the visitors do not comply with the specific check.

In case of an intimate visit, prior to signing a marriage contract, which lasts 48hrs, it can be interrupted for maximum 24 hrs for reasons related to the administration of the conviction place, without shortening the 48 hrs, according to paragraph no 2 and 3, art. 146 from Reg. 2.

The difference between the right for an intimate visit and other rights, especially the ones related to visits, to which it is mostly related, comes from the fact that if the right for visits does not imply respecting certain conditions, and not only in special situations stipulated by law can be restricted, the right to an intimate visit is conditioned right from the beginning. Altogether, the intimate visit in the case that is referred to in art. 146 paragraph 3, can be interrupted for different reasons that the law did not specify. It is clear the fact that the right for an intimate visit has a particular judicial status. It seems to be a "taming" method for the convicted, by giving them certain benefits if they behave according to the requirements. The convicted themselves perceive it as a reward, especially that such a rewards exists, which is imoral and inadequate for a serious institution as the prison[10].

The ambiguity of the notion referring to the intimate visit is also given by the procedures of implementation for the legislation regarding giving the right for the intimate visit, elaborated by the prisons. According to the procedures, giving the right for intimate visits involves more stages, such as:

- offering information for the implementation of the procedure
- filling in the forms for applying for an intimate visit by the convicted persons and submitting the documents proving the relationship. In the form it has to be specified the person with whom they want to have a personal visit, no other than the husband/ wife, male/ female partner.
- disseminating the information related to the implementation procedure and processing staff, with representatives of the chamber and all imprisoned and informing the tutors.
- analyzing the request and approving it by the departments. The analysis is done by the personnel from the visiting sector, education and psychosocial assistance, labor organization, staff that keeps track of the detainees and of the work organization, the discipline committee secretary, the rewards committee secretary and crime prevention in the prison environment that make notes on the request form, depending on the activities the convicted has conducted.
- checking the request and final resolution given by the director responsible for the security and prison regime, who may or may not approve of the visit.
- approving the intimate visit and filling in the declaration form;
- filling in the documents, making notes in the register, in the form for giving the right and in the electronic system.

The time consuming procedure and the multitude of filters through which the convicted person's request is analysed in order to get the right for an intimate visit, don't have an explanation. The consequences of the penalty are not diminished by the existence of the intimate visit right. There are plenty of deprivations so that the reason of the penalty takes effect, so much so giving the unconditional right for an intimate visit cannot create the ilusion of lenience in the emprisonment system.

All these activities, and especially the effective procedure of verification for meeting the conditions and the large amount of factors that have to approve the request, prove what has been highlighted in the law text, namely the right for an intimate visit, even though it is regulated in the chapter regarding the rights for the convicted persons, is nothing but a reward.

Conclusions

After the systematization of the above presented data, it can be stated that the right for an intimate visit, even though regulated in the Law 254/ 2013, is far from being a right. All the aspects that refer to this notion show that this is a rewarding way for the convicted persons and at the same time a confining one for their behaviour. Conditioning the approval of this right, restricting the access of other persons apart from the ones already established by the law and presenting this right as an "exchange method" turns what is desired to be a right into a new form of punishment, creating space for certain abuses.

The analysis realized through this study conducts to the idea that the existence of the right for an intimate visit is a consequence of the development of the society that understands and should understand the human psychology and that correcting the behaviour of people is realised rather through understanding, communucation, phisical contact, than through oppresion.

In order to clearly establish whether the current form of the right to intimate visit is beneficial for physical health, mental and moral development of the imprisoned or the consequences would be undoubtedly others if they had regulated as a true right and not a right compensation as today still remains a goal.

ASPECTS OF GUILTY PLEA AND PROCEDURE OF GUILT ADMITTANCE, NEW JUDICIAL INSITUTIONS FOR A CRIMINAL TRIAL OF HIGHER QUALITY

Rodica Aida POPA*

Abstract

During the broad reform process that has taken place in recent years for the criminal proceeding activity, following the entry into force of the new Criminal Procedure Act on February 1st 2014, there have been changes of some legal institutions from the old Criminal Code, such as the procedure of admitting the deeds the defendant is held responsible for (art 320 from former Code of Criminal procedure) by its provisions in the content of art 374, alignment 4, as it has been modified by Government Emergency Ordinance and introducing new ones, such as the guilty plea (art 478-488) under the circumstances of modifying GEO nr 18/2016 a special procedure meant to insure the judging of causes with celerity. Both procedures have a common component given by the guilt plea from the defendant, having an additional condition in the case of the guilty plea, besides the aforementioned one, which is the one of accepting the legal classification of the offence for which the criminal proceedings were commenced.

The two legal institutions ensure the compliance with the procedural guarantees of the right to a legal counsel of the defendant, sanctioning this one, taking place with a reduction of the sentence, under conditions stipulated by law.

Furthermore, by admitting the guilt and the legal classification of the offence by the defendant found guilty, in the two procedures also takes place a confirmation of the legality and compliance of the evidence submitted in the course of criminal proceedings.

Keywords: simplified procedure, guilty plea, admittance of guilt, legal classification of offences, quality of the criminal proceedings.

1. Introduction

1.1. Procedure of admitting the acts by the defendant.

The Romanian legislature has consolidated the new institution of admitting facts to be totally under the accused responsibility as it has been regulated and modified in the contents of art 374, Alignment 4 from the Criminal Procedure Code with reference to art 375 and 377 from the same Code. So, if in the art 374, alignment 4 exists the legal obligation for the president of the court in first instance to inform the defendant that he may request the trial by simplified procedure, in two other norms, of distinct nature there have been regulated procedure in the case of admittance of guilt, in art 375 and respectively judicial inquiry in the case of guilty plea, art 377. The guilty plea by the defendant only based on evidence gathered during criminal prosecution and based on documentary evidence brought by parties and by the injured party is constructed based upon a deep awareness process of the defendant that reflects upon the way in which criminal prosecution took place, the way in which legal provisions were obeyed during the administration of evidence by prosecutors, both those in favour and those against, the way in which the accused 'defendant expressed both requests and conclusions regarding the evidence presented.

In other words, when the defendant understood to request his/her judgment by simplified procedure he has accepted that the total admittance of deeds in his case is also a consequence of the prosecutor's activity in his case, confirming the abeyance of legal provisions in the case of evidence needed to prove the facts.

This request of the defendant for a total guilty plea of all his/her acts does not clear the judge from checking how evidence was administrated during the criminal prosecution , as far as its foundation is concerned since from a legal point of view they have been already undergone a judicial control from the preliminary chamber judge.

Therefore, if regarding the factual component, it is exclusively in the defendant's capacity to admit them, as far as legal classification it is concerned, the obligation belongs to the judge to assess over it, and when it is determined the need for changing it, whether ex officio, whether by the request of the prosecutor or parties, first to bring it into discussion and to draw the attention simultaneously to the accused that he has the right to request to leave the cause to the end.

1.2. The guilty plea procedure.

This procedure has been introduced into the new Criminal Procedure Act and modified afterwards in terms of specific provisions leading thus to a new retrial, in higher court, with respect to the retrial in higher court.

The specific nature of this institution is based on a negotiation form between the prosecutor's office and defendant resolved through an agreement whose object is strictly regulated by the content of art. 479 of the Criminal Procedure Code as it has been modified by Government Emergency Ordinance no.18/2016, namely the acknowledgement of the act and the acceptance of the legal classification for which the criminal proceedings were commenced and the manner and addresses the manner and length of the sentence as well as the way of enforcement of the sentence, the type of educational measure or as the case may be the solution to dismiss the penalty or the solution to postpone the penalty.

As opposed to the simplified declared procedure, which is based on the defendant's admittance of guilt, in the special declared procedure of the guilty plea, in addition to the admittance of guilt the defendant has to also agree with the legal classification of the offence that commenced the criminal proceeding, both being cumulative conditions.

2. Content

The procedure of pleading guilty by the defendant, as it was regulated at present in the Criminal Procedure Code, offers more dynamism to the criminal trial, as it benefits from increased quality, by swiftness and sensible judging of causes but also underlining the quality of criminal prosecution, respectively obeyance of legal provisions, but also the proper foundation of evidence means.

At the same time it is worth mentioning that the lawmaker allowed also the issue of admitting the facts and also requesting the judging of the cause by simplified procedure and by authenticated document, by this aspect retruning and referring to the old regulation from the previous Criminal Code.

However, we believe that the change has occurred with the purpose of an improved efficiency of judging the cause, in its simplified procedure, when the accused finds himself unable objectively speaking to present himself in front of a judge.

As seen in practice in judicial court, Even if the cause is solved by simplified procedure, The sentence delivered is well documented and motivated by the judge, retaining as to fact or law, based on evidence from prosecutor's, analyzing the judicial classification maintained, as well as fixing the individuality of the applied sanction with reduction of its limits under the provisions of art 396, align 10 from the Criminal Code, giving more efficient sense to the contents of art 374 align 4.

In the sense of the above mentioned, it exemplifies two cases settled by the High Court of Cassation and Justice at the first instance, where the simplified procedure was applied[1].

Thus, in first instance, the Supreme Court held that after the implementation of the provisions of Art. 374 par. 1 of the Criminal Procedure Code and the provisions of Art. 374 par. 4 of the same code, the defendant R.N. declared his intention to avail himself of this procedure by acknowledging the acts as described in the act of apprehension, requesting that the trial be based on evidence administered during the criminal investigation phase. In this respect, according to art. 375 Code of Criminal Procedure Code the defendant was made a statement, the court granting his request to be tried in the simplified procedure.

In the recitals of the sentence, the High Court essentially held that "in 2009, at the proposal and with the opinion of the deputy R.N. (Deputy in the Parliament of Romania for the legislature 2008-2012), R.C.(His daughter) was employed in his parliamentary office in the constituency no. 7 B, also in 2010, deputy R.N. has concluded a civil service contract in the same parliamentary office with his daughter, P)former R) S.

The High Court finds that the issue in fact presented in the indictment, also admitted by the defendant R.N. (Evidence not contested by the defendant), the whole evidence proving - beyond reasonable doubt - the existence of the acts committed by the defendant and his guilt for committing the offense of conflict of interest"

It was also reasoned that "the constitutive elements of the offense of conflict of interests are met. Thus, the actively qualified subject, respectively the civil servant who has the competence to carry out acts and / or to participate in decision-making. .. In order to achieve the material element of the offense there is no need for damage and only for the realization of a material benefit for himself / herself, husband / wife, which in this case has been achieved.

The daughter of the defendant R.N., called R.C. has earned a salary of 6391 lei during 19.10.2009-1.06.2010 on the basis of the individual labor contract no. 4924/09 and 5267 lei during 15.06.2010-01.04.2011 on the basis of civil contract 1436/2010.

Thus, the public money accesible to the defendant was directed to the members of his family, and due to this personal interest of patrimonial nature, it results that the legal condition is the non-fulfillment of the duties attributable to him as a member of the Parliament of Romania, in accordance with the principles underlying the exercise of public dignity.

The rule of incrimination does not includes that the material benefit to be unjust, but only that it has actually been obtained through a biased procedure. Thus, obtaining a material benefit is the condition for achieving the objective side of the offense provided by art. 253 [1] The previous criminal code, which does not convey to the act the character of an offense of damage, since the main strain of social relations protected by the law is the correct exercise of public authority by civil servants.

The facts of the defendant R.N. have created a state of danger regarding the social values protected by the law, regarding the functioning of the institutions, since the indirect patrimonial interest of the MP can influence the objectively fulfilling of the attributions, thus fulfilling the stipulation in the indictment rule.

In regards to the subjective side of the offense of conflict of interest results in the fraudulent intent of the defendant R.N. to act in the direct interest of his family, which has facilitated him to obtain material benefits from the budget of the Chamber of Deputies.

Thus, the case meets both the subjective aspect and the objective ones, the constitutive elements of the offense of conflict of interest provided by art. 253^1 previous Criminal Code, a text on the basis of which the defendant will be sentenced to imprisonment for 4 months, with the provisions of Art. 396 par. 10 Criminal Procedure Code and Art. 41 paragraph. 2 Criminal Code .

In regards to the method of execution of the punishment, it is considered that, in relation to the personal data of the defendant, the purpose of the punishment can be achieved without the execution of the sentence in detention, which is why it will order the conditional suspension of the execution of the sentence".

In the second cause, also conflict of interests, the High Court has retained that defendant K.K assited by chosen attorney, that he declared in front of the court that he request trial based just in evidence administrated during the criminal prosecution, admitting his facts as stipulated in the documents submitted to the court, but without accepting their judicial classifications, assessing that this aspect does not interfere with his ability to ask for simplified procedure trial.

Thus, for the case file the defendant filed a statement (also signed by his attorney) in which he made these remarks, underlining that he committed the act being convinced that it does not constitute an offence, the conviction being reinforced by the customary law existing in his activity area and confirmed by the circumstance that the legal interdiction occured later when the acts have ceased.

Along the same lines it has been pointed out in that extrajudicial statement that the defendant understood to file it to the case file in order to outline his procedural position- that his conviction of innocence has been reinforced also by the regulations of other states with democratic regime.

At the same time his hearing directly before the court, the defendant requested a time limit for filing documents, circumstantial evidence.

In view of the defendant's willingness to demand that the trial be conducted only on the basis of the evidence administered in the course of the prosecution and the documents filed in the file, in the context of the process of fully recognizing the facts detained in its task, as found and described in the indictment, as well as the fact that the High Court of Cassation and Justice - the Criminal Section did not identify any reason for which at the term of ... to reject the request for simplified procedure, the judicial investigation here in this case was conducted according to art. 375 of Criminal Procedure Code - art. 377 par. 1 Criminal Procedure Code, with the consequence of applying art. 396 para. 10 Code of Criminal Procedure concerning the Settlement of Criminal Action against defendant K..K.

With a view to the delivered sentence, it was retained the issue in fact and law, the judicial classification was motivated, dismissing the invoked defence. Therefore, „contrary to the claims made by the defence regarding the so called lack of precision, predictability and foreseeable quality of criminal law, in the sens that at the date of the acts there was no legal interdicition on hiring family members in the Parliamnetary offices – The high Court of Cassation and justice finds the conflict of interest offence as stipulated in art 253 Former Criminal Code (legal text for incident mentioned) was introduced by Law 278/2006, and the interpreting of the incrimination text brings the conclusion that the acts of the accused falls under the scope of criminal illicit when the activity of a public clerk is related to personal interest by not acting in a transparent way, and not to abstain from decison making, with the purpose of gaining material benefits for any of the persons mentioned in the incrimination norm.

Neither the defense constructed on the lack of quality for the active subject of the criminal offence, that of public clerk, cannot be accepted in consideration to the fact that in the special status of MPs, the Constitutional Court has stated that "although the constitutional and legal status of MPs, as poeples representatives, is different from public clerks status, and different from other citizens in general ….but this status cannot be retained as being enough to accept a different legal treatment in report to other categories of individuals for which the law 176/2010 on integrity and public function is applied (to be consulted decision 279/2006 of CC, decision 81/27 February 2013. In the cause above mentioned the accused received a 2 year sentence in prison, by applying art 86 Criminal Code and art 5 Criminal Code, with application of complementary sentence and accessory penalty, being reduced to 1 year and 6 months, by applying art 81 from former Criminal Code and removing the complementary penalty applied initially, by course of appeal from accused that was accepted.

Unlike the admittance of guilt by the defendant in front of a judge, in first instance the guilt plea is a special procedure that has been recently introduced in the Romanian criminal procedure with incidence during criminal prosecution, based on a negotiation process between prosecutor and the defendant in limits explicitly provided by its object, in limits established by a preliminary notice and written by a prosecutor with a superior role in hierarchy. Admittance of guilt is under judicial control from the court instance, its sentence may be submitted under legal and regular remedies. Therefore, the procedure starts in the course of the criminal prosecution, the initiator of the agreement, being both the prosecutor and the defendant, the subject of cumulative conditions, namely the acknowledgment of the commission of the act and the acceptance of the legal classification for which the criminal proceedings were initiated, unlike the procedure in which recognition does not concern legal classification and the type and amount of the punishment, as well as its form of execution, namely the type of the educational measure, or, as the case may be, the solution to the application of punishment or postponement of punishment.

In the judicial practice, the application of this special procedure is increasingly applicable in view of the change in the sense that the guilty plea agreement can only be concluded with regard to the offenses for which the law provides for the fines or imprisonment For 15 years. As with the simplified procedure, the consequence of the application of this procedure is that the defendant benefits from a reduction in punishment.

The scope of the offenses in which an agreement on the recognition of guilt can be concluded is widely extended, in the case of the High Court, either in the cases of jurisdiction at first instance or in the appeal, ranging from conflicts of interest under the conditions Old regulations, art. 253 1 of the Criminal Code, as a result of the more favorable criminal law, for abuse of office against public interests, provided by art. 248 Previous criminal code, favoring the offender, provided by art. 264 par. 1 Penal Code, False Intellectual Code provided by Art. 289 Penal Code, the offense of using in any way, directly or indirectly, information which is not intended to be advertised or to allow unauthorized persons access to such information for the purpose of obtaining for itself or for another undue advantage provided by art. 12 letter B of Law no. 78/2000, the driving on the public roads of a motor vehicle by a person who has an alcoholic admix of over 0.80 gr / l of pure alcohol in the blood provided by art. 87 para. 1 of GEO no. 195/2002 with the application of art. 5 Criminal Code.

Thus, as an example, in the agreements with which it was invested admitted, condemning the defendants to the punishments in the amounts and modalities of execution[2], either admitted in the appeal, as a result of the finding that the provisions of art. 478-481 Criminal Procedure Code that the penalties applied and the manner of execution is appropriate[3].

Conclusions

In the research carried out over the newly presented institutions, respectively the admission of facts by the accused and the special procedure of guilt plea, it has been noticed that these two have a real and efficient applicability during the criminal trial, offering a guarantee for the obeyance of right to defence, but as well of respecting principles such as contradiction, oral speech and finding the truth.

The existence of such procedures in the Romanian Code of Criminal Procedure ensures an alternative to the procedure of common law, that reflects the reality when the quality of criminal prosecution gives the possibility of guilty plea or/and judicial classification, reduction of sentence under conditions stipulated by law, ensuring the possibility of raising awareness of the consequence of a criminal act done.

The quality of the criminal trial in the simplified procedures presented can be found also within the contents of the decisions given, in which are examined not only legal provisions, but also the factual situation, the judicial classification and the analysis of observing the fulfillment, criteria that are needed for the individual sentence in each and ways of serving the sentence.

THE JUDICIAL TREATMENTN APPLICABLE TO INFRIGEMENT OF THE PROVISIONS ON SETTING AS CIVIL PART IN THE CRIMINAL TRIAL

Irinel Dumitru SAMOILĂ*

Abstract

Admisibilitatea echivalează cu permisivitatea din partea legii. Un anumit act poate fi interzis de legea ce guvernează procedura în care care este efectuat, însă același demers judiciar poate fi permis într-o altă materie, de o altă lege. Constituirea de parte civilă îndeplinită legal potrivit legii vechi, își păstrează valabilitatea și sub imperiul legii noi, cea din urmă aplicându-se doar cu privire la modalitatea de soluționare a acțiunii civile.

The admissibility is the equivalent of the permissiveness of the law. A particular act may be prohibited by the law governing the procedure inside which it is performed, but the same approach can be allowed in other judicial matters, by another law. The legal constitution of civil party fulfilled under the previous law, remains valid under the new law, the latter one being applicable only on how to solve the civil action.

Keywords: inadmissibility, civil action, civil party, transitional regulations

Test case: Following a traffic accident, caused solely by the defendant on September 22, 2011, the injured party suffered injuries, which required 150-160 days of medical care. In legal terms, this is a civil part in the criminal trial, according to the legal provisions in force at that moment, namely the provisions of article 15, line 1 and 2 of the Code of Criminal Procedure from 1968[1], without indicating the amount of the claims, grounds of evidence on which they are based.

By the indictment of October 26, 2015, the defendant was prosecuted for bodily injury by negligence.

At the first hearing, the injured person has been suggested that he should also specify the civil action, obligation that was not carried out.

By the Criminal Verdict 273 of March 14, 2016 pronounced by the Court of Law of District 3, it was rejected as inadmissible the civil action exercised by the civil party inconsistent with the defendant and the civilly responsible party, considering that "...failure to comply with any of the conditions cumulatively set in line 1 and 2 of the article 20 of CCP entails, according to the provisions of article 20 line 4 CCP, the mandatory penalty of inadmissibility of civil action in a criminal trial, the civil party having the option to bring it in a civil court.", therefore "...the civil action in a criminal trial constitutes a procedural benefit granted to the victim, in order to harness all elements gathered by the prosecutor in the prosecution, as well as the entire procedural framework of the criminal proceedings, in order to meet all the civil, patrimonial or moral interests affected by committing the offense and, therefore, should have been exercised in the conditions imposed by the legislator...".

Vested with the civil party appeal against this verdict, the superior court considered that "... assuming that constitutions as civil part does not meet the conditions provided by law, the situation is equal to the one in which the injured party has not been civil part in the criminal trial, therefore it does not justify rejecting the civil action as inadmissible (solution which involves constituting as civil part in the criminal procedural law conditions, to be in the presence of a civil action adjoining the criminal one)."

Moreover, the judicial control has further mentioned that "... in question, indeed, the constitution of civil part of the injured party has taken place on November 21, 2011, therefore according to the old law and, hence, remains valid, over the provisions of article 4 line 1 of the Law no. 255/2013."

Accordingly, the appeal of the civil party it has been partially admitted and sent the case back for another trial to the first instance court, only with regard to its civil side[2].

In addition to the relatively innovative solution to send back the case for another trial by strictly taking into consideration these aspects[3], but which is not the subject of the present study, I consider that the case raises a series of discussions regarding the judicial treatment and the procedural penalties applicable to the civil action performed in the criminal trial.

In the criminal procedure, the concept of admissibility is equivalent to the permissiveness from the law in order to achieve a particular judiciary approach (to perform an act or exercise a right).

Inadmissibility is therefore a procedural penalty, which burdens a right that is prohibited by the law. This impermissiveness of the law occurs, though, in two ways:

- Tacitly, when the law does not provide the existence of the right[4].
- Expressly, when the law prohibits the exercise of the right[5] or its depletion[6].

In other words, if the law does not grant a procedural vocation to a certain participant at the criminal, to achieve a substantial right or judicial interest, the judicial instrument used by the participant in question is ab initio invalid, by legislative will. However, declaring this invalidity is the exclusive privilege of the judicial authorities, which basically runs an a posteriori control over the document drawn up in such conditions.

It follows therefor the latent character of inadmissibility, which becomes operative on the act, only after observing it.

Therefore, whether it is a tactically or expressly prohibited right, the procedural law is the one that determines its inability.

Drawing a parallel, more or less offset, the admissibility of criminal procedural law is similar to typicality[7] of the criminal law, therefore it's the lack of correspondence between the conducted approach and the procedural rule that governs it.

It is noteworthy the fact that, the inadmissibility may be a general one, which affects a judicial approach regardless of the subject it covers, as well as particular, meaning that it prohibits a manifestation in a certain subject.

In other words, a certain act may be prohibited by the law regulating the procedure that is performed, but the same judicial approach is allowed in another subject, by another law which regulates it. For example, according to the dispositions of article 20 line 7 of CCP, the civil action cannot be performed in the criminal case, the person who was informed on a conventional way the entitlement to compensation, but it is perfectly admissible its performance thereof under the conditions stipulated in the provisions of article 1349 et seq CCV.

According to the doctrinal views,"...the inadmissibility concerns only the acts of the parties of the trials and not the judicial bodies, because the latter do not make their jurisdiction comply with the limits set by the law, and if they are exceeded, the penalty of nullity may occur."[8]. I consider this paradigm as being inaccurate, at least not in the context of the current regulations, because the inadmissibility may affect also the judicial bodies' undertakings[9].

The civil action is the means provided by law to reach, on a judicial way, to undamaging the person who suffered an injury as a result of an illegal act[10].

The earlier regulation of the institution, was minimal concerning the manifestation of will on the implementation hereof, the provisions of article 15 line 1 and 2 of CCV regulating only the term until when the constitution can be regarded as civil, and not with other formal requirements thereof[11].

Broadly speaking, the institution keeps its previous rules already established by the previous regulation, the current enactment coming with a surplus of regulations meant to align to a new legislative concept, strewn with additional elements of adversity and conventionality.

Such a regulatory surplus is also the one stipulated by the provisions of article 20 line 2 of CCP, which constitutes a series of additional formal conditions (indicating the nature and the extent of the claims, reasons and evidence on which it is based), under the mechanism of constituting as civil part, conditions once unfulfilled, draw the penalty treatment provided by the dispositions of line 4 of the same article.

I consider that because of these consequences that arise from failure to comply with this rule, presents great importance to establish the legal nature of the incident penalty, so as to also be determined the legal status applicable to its occurrence.

Thus, I consider relevant to determine if the phrase "can no longer constitute civil part in a criminal trial", is equivalent or not to an express establishment of inadmissibility.

As shown in the example above, it was specified by the fund court that not mentioning the civil action by the civil, in terms of the amount of the requested

[4] For example, even though it is a common law and more frequently encountered, there is no legal provision which allowes scheduling a certain hour to call the case. Even though there are normative sources in this regard (please refer to the provisions of article 121 line 4 of Annex to HCSM 1375/2015, regarding the approval of the Court's Internal Regulations, published in the Official Gazette 970/ Dec. 28, 2015), but given their infralegislative nature, procedural penalties cannot be applied, in case of violation of the provisions set there.

[5] For example, according to the provisions of article 409 line 1 letter c) with refference to article 87 line 2 of CCP, the civilly responsible party cannot make a call on the criminal side of the case, only insofar as the solution from this side has influenced the civil side's solution.

[6] For example, according to the provisions of article 213 line 6^1 of CCP, the rights and freedom judge's pledge with which a decision is made against the prosecutor's order through which the judicial control is taken, is final. Accordingly, the appeal against such verdict becomes inadmissible, the right to a superior jurisdiction being depleted.

[11] The fact that, unlike the previous regulation, it has been stipulated the possibility of constituting as civil part " in writing or oral", doen not constitute an express dedication of the alterniteveness manifestation form of will.

damages, which represents this and the evidence it intends to use, thereby attracts the inadmissibility of the action carried out this way. At the same time though, the inadmissibility implies the absence of the right or its depletion.

Or, under the given assumption, the injured person is in full vocation to get indemnities for the injuries which have been caused, therefore one cannot speak of an absence of the right. Furthermore, this right has not been depleted in another form of prescription by the law, from those stipulated by the provisions of 22-27 CCP, namely trading, mediation, civil court settlement and so on.

Consequently, the approach of the civil party is allowed by the law, because there is correspondence between this and its prescriptive rules, included in the provisions of article 19 CCP.

This correspondence loses though its validity of the act which is burdened by further formal conditions, such as those provided by the provisions of article 20 line 2 of CCP, whereas the provisions of article 19 of CCP governs exclusively the possibility of exercising the civil actions, in the criminal trial.

Therefore, the final thesis becomes reasonable of the provisions of article 20 line 4 of CCP, in the sense that failure to comply with the formal conditions of constituting the civil part, invalidates itself the whole procedure exercised in the criminal proceedings, but not in a civil one.

Accordingly, in this hypothesis, we can talk about a particular inadmissibility of the civil action, but not a general one, the fund court's reasoning being correct regarding to this aspect.

It is therefore wrong the argument of the appeal court according to which the civil action admissibility implies the initial existence of this actions (thus failure to comply with the conditions stipulated in the provisions of article 20 line 2 CCP is equivalent to the absence of this action), because it induces the idea of interference of the most severe criminal procedural penalties, namely what qualifies the doctrine as being absent.

Besides the fact that this penalty does not benefit from a legislative regulation, the absence involves an actual reality and not a legal one[12], producing no legal effect and no need to be taken into consideration. In the present case, not complying with the conditions stipulated in article 20 line 2 of CCP, produce a series of legal consequences, namely the impossibility of joining the civil action to the criminal one, or opening the way to perform the action in the civil court. Therefore, one cannot speak about the incident of this penalty.

Another penalty, which can be discussed as being incident, would be incapacity, but the assumption established by provisions of article 268 line 1 of CCP and namely not complying with the legal term prescribed to exercise the right, is not also satisfied. This is because the civil party expressed its option within the legal term stipulated by article 20 line 1 of CCP.

Moreover, I believe that failure to comply with the dispositions of article 20 line 2 od CCP, cannot draw the nullity penalty, with all its legal status, because the nullity's essence is the possibility to remake the act which was declared invalid, this time lawfully, according to the dispositions of article 280 line 3 of CCP. Compared to the present case, this would mean therefore the possibility to remake on a civil way, according with the legal provisions, and taking them into account in the criminal proceedings, but this possibility de plano excluded by the legislator, which provides the unique possibility to appeal to civil court.

On the other hand, it is correct the second level of reasoning at the court of appeal, meaning that the conditions of becoming a civil party are met according to the previous regulations, its effects still being valid according to the new law, under the dispositions of article 4, line 1 of the Law no. 255/ 2013.

Proceeding with a virtual dismantling of the civil action next to the criminal one, I believe that this progressively follows three major components: constituting as civil party, the actual implementation of the civil action and its resolution.

According to article 3 of the Law no. 255/2013, the new procedural regulation applies to all criminal cases that have a pending status at the judicial bodies, except the cases as stipulated by this law. Such an exception is the one referred to in the article 4 line 1, according to which, the procedure acts legally fulfilled before the Code of Criminal Procedure entered in force, shall remain valid, with the exceptions provided by this law.

Because in a civil action, the transitional rules[13] comprised in the Law no. 255/2013 does not stipulate such exceptions, I believe that the constitution as civil part is legally fulfilled according to the old law, keeps its validity under the new law, the latter applying only when on the way to solve the action. This is because the new law is applied only on the civil action steps that were not yet covered until the moment of its entry into force, the reflection of the principle tempus regit actum.

Compared to this case study, since establishment as a civil party has already taken place under the rule of the old law, the new law will govern only two of the remaining steps, namely the its implementation and the resolution of the civil action.

Therefore with this regard, the court of appeal's resolution for which the admissibility of the civil action was found, appears as being the correct one.

Conclusions

Compared to the arguments above, I consider that the principle of tempus regit actum received express provisions in Law no. 255/2013, these behave as special provisions derogating from the general principle under specialia generalibus derogant. As such, these rules have priority in applying in relation to those contained in the Code of Criminal Procedure concerning acts initiated or conducted under the rule of the old law, but continue to take effect and under the influence of the new. Thus, the legal establishment as a civil party in the criminal proceedings conducted prior to 2.1.2014 remains valid after this date, but will be specified and complemented by the mentions expressly provided by art. 20 para. 2 CPP, within the term provided by art. 20 para. 1 CPP, under penalty of its inadmissibility exercise criminal proceedings.

However, if these gaps are not filled, civil action may be exercised only in civil court without civil party applicants to be enforceable against res judicata judgment or criminal inadmissibility civil action stated in the frame procedure as according disappear. art. 28 para. 1 CPP, res judicata judgment criminal civil court reflects only the existence of the crime and the person who committed it.

COMMENTS ON THE OFFENSE SET FORTH UNDER ART. 13IN THE LAW NO. 78/2000

Mircea Constantin SINESCU[*]
Ionuț-Cristian CARACOTI[]

Abstract

The law conditions the application of its provisions only to the arbitrary conduct of the head of a political party, union, employers' association or some non-profit corporate bodies. Considering the contradictory judgments pronounced so far in case law, we believe that some comments on the capacity of the passive subject against the active subject of an offense are required. In fact, we consider that the dispositions of this article should be conditioned only following some influence exercised on the members of one's own political party, union, employers' association or non-profit corporate bodies.

Keywords: head of political party, members of political party, exercising influence, using authority, offenses assimilated to corruption offenses, law no. 78/2000.

1. Introduction

Fighting against corruption involves a sine qua non premise, namely understanding the concept of „corruption". For these purposes, an outline of the meanings of the notion of „corruption" was required. The first substantial amendments to the legal status of corruption deeds were made in the Law no. 78/2000, as subsequently amended by the Law no. 161/2003.

Through this law, the legislator aimed at fighting against any types of corruption, among which the offenses assimilated to corruption offenses.

The provisions under art. 13 in the Law no. 78/2000 (as subsequently amended and supplemented) incriminated the deed committed by a person holding a management position in a political party, union, employers' association or a non-profit corporate body, exercising their influence or authority for obtaining, for themselves or for others, money, assets or other undue benefits.

2. Content

The legal object[1] referred to in the dispositions under art. 13 in the Law no. 78/2000 consists of „the social relationships related to the honesty and fairness of the persons leading political parties, unions or other institutions playing an important role in the political and social life and in the creation and operation of the rule of law and market economy. Such persons' conduct should be materially subordinated to the idea of serving the public interest and only secondly their own interest".

In light of the form the material element may take, the law mentions two alternative versions arising exactly from the management position held by the active subject. The influence or authority exercised by the active subject of the offense refers to the employ or use of their capacity for changing a decision or judgment, based on the position held. Such use may refer either to the influence or to the authority the active subject has, or to both of them, these completing each other.

Influence, in the meaning relevant to this case, is the ability/capacity of a person holding a management position in a political party to determine or to convince someone to change their attitude, belief, judgment or decision, in virtue of the position held.

Authority means the prestige, consideration, importance, as generally accepted, of the person holding the position specific to the active subject of the offense.

Both influence and authority arise from the very position held and not from the individual/personal characteristics of the person holding a management position in a political party, being inherent to them.

The socially dangerous consequence consists of the risk posed to the social relationships, that the special legal – main and secondary – object of the offense and, ipso facto, the object that safeguards the penal law, namely the creation of some danger to the reputation of the entity managed by the active subject (a political party, employers' association, etc.). Once created, such danger determines the appearance of the cause-effect relationship that should exist between the immediate consequence and the material element, strengthening thus the objective element of the offense. The actual achievement of benefits is not a condition for the existence of the offense.

In support of our claim, we recall the case law[2] of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, according to which „the offense imputed to the defendant is the danger it poses, which means that its existence does not involve that the benefit aimed at be actually obtained".

Such facts may be noted, among others, within the relationships existing within a political party (in the first case) or within a non-profit corporate body (in the second case). Therefore, we consider that both the person exercising their influence or authority, and the victim of such pressure should be members of the same political party. Otherwise, the influence or authority exercised would not arise from the position held by the doer in the political party, but could arise from any other circumstances, a case the legislator did not envisage.

Such manner of construing the legal disposition is apparent also in the case law of the National Anticorruption Directorate: „one shall order the rescission of the case as regards the offense set forth under art. 13 in the Law no. 78/2000, corroborated with art. 35 par. 1 in the Penal Code (2 material documents), as retained in charge of the defendant G. M. S., given that the evidence taken showed that the persons meeting the defendant's requests held in the political party positions that were higher than the position held by the first, therefore the defendant could not have imposed a decision on them; thus, S. N. E. acted deliberately and fully aware, for the purpose of fulfilling its own interest, whereas F. D. attested, by signing the neighborhood minutes, an actual situation".

The facts mentioned above show that the offense is related to a limited range of social relationships, namely those governing the activity of a political party/employers' association/union or a non-profit corporate body. Therefore, the legislator aimed, through the incriminating rule under art. 13 in the Law no. 78/2000, to sanction the deed committed by a person that, upon fulfilling their management position held in the entities aforementioned, uses their authority or influence for obtaining, for themselves or for others, undue benefits. Or such influence or authority should be exercised, in the hypothesis related to a political party, only over the members of the political party in which the active subject holds the management position. Otherwise, exercising the influence or authority has no relevance whatsoever, given that these may be exercised only over some persons that are subordinated to the active subject of the offense. It is absurd to suppose that the head of a political party may exercise any influence or authority over some persons that are not members of such political body. This is the reason why the legislator incriminated such deed, in order to limit the discretionary actions of party leaders in their relationships with the members of their own political party. As such, we consider that the offense set forth under art. 13 in the Law no. 78/2000 has a limited scope of applicability, regarding only the relationships deployed within a political party by its leader and not outside such context.

Further, such opinion was stated also by specialist authors[3]: „when we speak about influence, we consider those relationships between the doer and the injured person and the manner in which the doer's position might harm in the future the activity of the injured person. When we speak about authority, we should consider the somewhat subordinated status of the injured person against the doer, inclusively the doer's moral authority over that person. (...)

If the doer's deed is not based only on the influence or authority arising from the position held, but also on other kinds of relationships, such offense may not be considered (for example, a party leader approaches a good friend for acquiring some funds for supporting the party election campaign).

We take as an essential requirement for considering such offense that the doer's deed causes the panic of the person approached, making the latter surrender to the doer's insistence".

In support of such claims, we should recall also another judgment[4] against the defendant M.D.I. who, as the head of a county party organization, was tried for committing the offense set forth under art. 13 in the Law 78/2000. „The evidence showed that, under a sole resolution, criminal in character, the head of P. N. L. G. branch, M.D.I., ordered the local party branch to buy books and magazines in value of RON 43 million from his own company, SC A. SA, ordered the managers of public institutions to buy school materials that were distributed in the name of P. N. L., and exercised his influence as a political leader in order to determine some central decision makers to appoint managers of public institutions, as agreed upon under the protocol signed on 6th March 2005.

The prosecution documents showed that, in the period aforementioned, the defendant M.D.I., as the head of P. N. L. G. branch, exercised his influence and authority for obtaining undue benefits consisting of amounts of money requested from several persons, who were members of P. N. L., or who held management positions in several public institutions or trading companies, with full state capital; such amounts of money were requested outside the legal framework, for supporting the election campaign for the European Parliament, scheduled to start on 13th April 2007.

As regards the persons holding management positions in several public institutions or trading companies, the Court considered that the influence exercised was based on the relationship between the political party and the person influenced. Therefore[5], „for the purposes mentioned above, the appointment of the chief commissary of the Financial Guard of G. is also relevant. I.T. was appointed managing chief commissary of the Financial Guard, G. Section, on 1st November 2005, and on 1st January 2006, he was appointed permanent holder of this position. He mentioned in the statement made on 22nd March 2007 as follows: „Upon the emergence of these problems, Mr. C.A.D. came to me with a party membership application and asked me insistently to complete it, given that I was not a member of P. N. L. and I paid nevertheless the membership fee as a party supporter, and he told me that it would be better to become a member. I completed the application, but I did not fill in the date, so that a previous date could be put down. As a P. N. L. G. supporter, I was recommended, given that I held a position that, according to the political allocation of positions, should have belonged to P. N. L., to pay RON 100 monthly, as a party membership fee or as a donation to the party. I should mention that such fee was also paid by Mr. P.G.A., the manager of the General Directorate of Public Finances, by Mr. P.D., a deputy manager of the General Directorate of Public Finances, and by Mr. P.G.B., a deputy manager of the General Directorate of Public Finances. These amounts of money were requested from us by the president D.I.M. on the occasion of certain events, such as Easter and Christmas; each of us contributed as we were able, with products specific to such holidays (such as cake, sweets, juice, etc) for orphanages and rest homes for the elderly. On the occasion of such holidays, press conferences were conducted that we did not attend but where such products were provided. The audio recording broadcast on the TV channels and in the local press regarding the P. N. L. meeting on 5th March 2007, at which D.I.M. asked some amounts of money from various institution managers, was genuine".

On the contrary, a court judgment[6] pronounced by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, the Penal Section, considered that „the law listed with limitation the active subjects (a person holding a management position in a political party, union or in a non-profit corporate body), described clearly the incriminated conduct (exercising influence or authority for obtaining, for themselves or for others, money or other undue benefits). The fact the law does not mention that influence or authority should be exercised only in one's own organization (political party, union or non-profit corporate body) leads to the conclusion that the legislator considered this conduct as illicit, notwithstanding the place or persons it is employed against. If the law does not differentiate these hypotheses, it results that the person construing the law is not entitled to make such a distinction and, therefore, that one should not limit the scope of application of the law, as requested by the defense.

Further, the Court finds that there can be no confusion, based on the incriminating rule, between supporting the initiatives of the members of an election circumscription by the person representing them and the deed of exercising influence or authority, given that the law incriminates only the conduct that aims at obtaining, for themselves or for the others, money or other undue benefits. (...)

Exercising one's influence or authority is illicit conduct, notwithstanding the persons over which this is exercised (over one person or several persons, over an individual or over a corporate body), considering the purpose (obtaining undue benefits) and whether the conduct was caused also by other circumstances, such as the relationships between the person exercising the influence and the person benefiting from it (relatives, friends or persons with whom there are no such relationships)".

In our opinion, the deed of a person that is the head of a political party, consisting of receiving financial support from a person that is not a member of such political party and has no direct or indirect political connection with the first is not set forth in the penal law. Even more so when the relevant support was not requested by the person holding that position, but was offered willingly by other persons outside the party and then remitted to the poor in several locations, on certain holidays; therefore, we consider that this is not the sponsorship of a political party by a person without political affiliation; a charitable act may not be considered a penal deed.

We consider that this interpretation may be supported also by another judgment[7] in the case law. On 16.01.2009, the defendant A. N. was indicted for committing the offense set forth under art. 13 in the Law no. 78/2000 corroborated with art. 41, par. (2) Penal Code, „namely that he repeatedly and with the same criminal determination exercised his influence and authority arising from his position as president of P.S.D., and obtained, with the help of the defendants J.I.P. (a state general inspector in the State Inspectorate for Constructions), P.B., P.M.I. and V.M.C. (representatives of some trading companies), as well as of other persons, undue benefits, consisting of bearing the cost of some election propaganda materials within the presidential election campaign during November – December 2004, amounting to ROL 34,223,906,475 (ROL 33,841,734,455 from SC E.G. SRL and ROL 382,172,020 from SC V.T.C. SA Bacău)".

In light of the influence or authority exercised over the defendant J.I.P., the High Court of Cassation and Justice retained the following[8]:

„Evidently, the closest relationship was that of the defendant J., involved recently in the construction of the house of the defendant N. in the 1st district (starting from 1999), as a director of SC C.N.P. SA. Bacău.

In this context, on 22nd January 2001 the defendant was appointed deputy state general inspector in the State Inspectorate for Constructions, an institution subordinated to the Ministry of Public Works within the Government led by the defendant N., as a Prime-Minister.

Subsequently, as of 1st April 2001, the defendant was appointed a state general inspector within I..C., a position she held until after the elections in the fall of 2004, despite the legal changes made during that period, which affected the status of that institution, being confirmed in that position directly by the defendant N., under the decision no. 149 of 15th July 2004.

[6] The High Court of Cassation and Justice, Penal Sentence no.1039 of 22.11.2013, pronounced as final by the Judge Panel 5, page 32.
[7] The High Court of Cassation and Justice, Penal Section, Penal Sentence no. 76 of 30.01.2012.
[8] The High Court of Cassation and Justice, Penal Section, Penal Sentence no. 76 of 30.01.2012.

The relationships between the defendant J. and the defendant N. and his family became tighter after she was appointed a state general inspector, as evidenced by her trips to China together with N.D., the wife of the defendant N, during 2002 and 2003, for buying some goods for the houses owned by the family N. in 1st district. The manner in which such goods were bought, as well as the involvement of the defendant J. in this business are the subject matter of another corruption case on the docket of I.C.C.J, in which both N.A. and J.I.P. are defendants.

All these facts are sufficient for considering the defendant J. influenced by the defendant N".

Thus, the Supreme Court considered that the offense set forth under art. 13 in the Law no. 78/2000 may be committed also through exercising some influence, based on a relationship between friends. However, even in the case previously mentioned, the relationship between friends, namely between the defendants N. and J., was strengthened through the position acquired by J. Therefore, even if the defendant J. was not a member of the political party, she held a position which, according to political allocation, belonged to the party, or was under the authority of the defendant N., as a head of the governing party.

Moreover, we consider that a correct application of the incriminating rule under discussion involves approaching it by construing the legal dispositions.

Thus, the very content of the rule results implicitly in a clear description of the scope of the persons – secondary passive subject versus active subject, and the penal rule should be construed in its spirit and not automatically, as the doctrine also shows[9]: "the enforcement body (the judge or administrative body) should comply with, by its activity, the law, in its letter and also its spirit."

We consider that it is absurd to suppose that a person managing a political party/union/employers' association/non-profit corporate body is able to exercise their influence or authority over some persons outside such organizations.

As such, in order to be able to establish the application of the incriminating rule to an actual situation, we should establish clearly the meaning considered by the legislator when developing the rule, in order to find out whether the defendant's activity is penal or not.

The only way to identify the legislator's intention is to construe the legal rule in a manner suitable for the accurate enforcement of the penal law.

Thus[10], „the need for interpretation is based on the fact that, during the process of law enforcement, the enforcing body (the judge, administrative body, etc.) should clarify precisely the rule content, should establish its applicability to a certain actual situation (a case ruled by it)".

If an official interpretation, which could remove any possibility of arbitrariness upon establishing the match between the penal rule and the actual situation subject to indictment, is missing, we are in the hypothesis required for the legal interpretation, involving the responsible efforts of the court of law to check whether the aim of the penal law regarding the alleged criminal activity in charge of the defendant was fulfilled or not.

For these purposes, one is obliged to analyze this rules by using the most common interpretation methods, so that to establish the penal nature of the deed beyond any doubt.

Thus[11], in light of the grammatical method, the Court has the obligation to understand the meaning of the legal rule, by considering its terms, phrases and their syntax within the rule. „The grammatical method aims at establishing the disposition contained in the legal rule, by means of the grammatical (syntactic and morphologic) analysis of the content of the legal rule".

By using the grammatical method, we notice that the legislator listed comprehensively the persons that may act in capacity of active subject of the offense, but did not consider necessary to describe the persons that may become a passive subject of such offense. However, the syntax of the terms used by the legislator shows clearly that these are within the scope of the entities at the top of which the active subject of the offense is placed, a position which grants them, further, the authority or influence they exercise.

Specialist doctrine[12] stated the same: „The passive subject is the political party, the union, the employers' association or the corporate body within which the active subject holds a position".

Moreover, the use of the logic method results in the same kind of interpretation of the incriminating rule. In the hypothesis the legislator intended to extend the scope of passive subjects, the phrase „or other persons" would have been inserted in the incriminating rule. Thus, to make the argument more effective per a contrario seems to be mandatory, the inexistence of such phrase supporting the interpretation that the persons that may act in capacity of passive subjects are limited to the political party, union or the non-profit corporate body within which the active subject exercises their authority or influence.

Last but not least[13], we should use also the systematic method for interpretation, which „regards the manner of establishing the meaning of the legal rule, by considering it in the context of the law it is a part of or by comparing it with other laws".

Or, the Law no. 78/2000 was developed in order to regulate the efficient removal of corruption deeds lato sensu, committed, usually, by persons in a capacity or in a position in which they are able to decide as regards the interested/influenced/subordinated person, a fact that allows them to condition/ to constrain/ to influence the said person. Thus, we consider, according to the fundamental principles of the material penal law, unanimously used in the specialist doctrine, that the interpretation and enforcement of the penal rule should be strict, while the extension of the meaning of the rule, for purposes of a comprehensive interpretation, is a risky operation, liable to change the legislator's intentions and to result in an overlap between the legislative function and the court function.

As some authors in this field[14] said: „However, an extended interpretation should be made carefully, given that, rather often than not, the possibility of extending the meaning of a notion used by the legislator in the case of a new situation is debatable, and such uncertainty is difficult to reconcile with the legality principle. (...) A last issue to discuss regards the situation in which all the interpretation approaches presented failed to offer the result expected, namely the ambiguity of the law content is maintained, being thus liable of divergent interpretations. The Canadian doctrine and case law claim that, in such a situation, one should use the interpretation that is more advantageous to the defendant, given that doubt would benefit the latter".

The principle in dubio pro reo became legal upon the coming into force of the New Code of Penal Procedure, art. 396 par. 2 reading as follows: „the Court should pronounce the conviction, if it finds, beyond any reasonable doubt, that the deed exists, is an offense and it was committed by the defendant".

The rule in dubio pro reo complements the presumption of innocence, an institutional principle reflecting the manner in which the principle of finding the truth, as regulated by the dispositions under art. 5 in the CPP, is found in the evidence taken. According to such rule, the Court, if not being able to be convinced based on certainty, should rule the defendant's innocence and clear the charges against them.

Therefore, the Court should not and may not construe a law widely, against the defendant's interest, if the doubt the latter would benefit from regards precisely the existence and capacity of the passive subject.

Thus, as the doctrine also established, the method of wide interpretation should be used only if none of the other interpretation methods described previously is able to lead to a correct legal reasoning.

In light of the subjective aspect, this shall include, besides the culpable form of direct intention, also the purpose of obtaining undue benefits, in form of cash, goods or other benefits.

As regards the description of the manner of committing the deed, the High Court of Cassation and Justice considered[15] that „it is irrelevant, in light of incrimination, as set forth under art. 13 in the Law no. 78/2000, whether the defendant was aware or not of the actual manner in which the undue benefits were to be obtained, being unimportant whether the defendant knew or not the details of the criminal activity carried out by the other defendants". Therefore, in order for the dispositions under art. 13 in the Law no. 78/2000 to be applicable, the existence of the purpose to obtain undue benefits is sufficient.

3. Conclusion

Given the facts described so far, we consider that, as regards the offense set forth under art. 13, the legislator intended to sanction the conduct of a person that takes advantage of their position in order to go beyond the limits of the law, by exploiting their moral superiority against other persons, perceived by the latter also in light of the position held by the active subject. Therefore, the possibility of the active subject to exercise their influence or authority exists only if considered within some relationship framework, in which the passive subject is integrated, and, thus, may be exposed to the doer's illicit conduct. If the passive subject is not a member of the entity managed in whatever way by the active subject, we cannot speak about the existence of any criminal act subject to the incriminating rule.

CRIMINAL LIABILITY OF A LEGAL ENTITY ACCORDING TO ROMANIAN LAW NO.46/2008

Sorin-Alexandru VERNEA*

Abstract

The purpose of this paper is to highlight the main practical issues concerning the enforcement of Law no.46/2008, in regard to the protection granted under the regulations of title VI, in the particular case when the perpetrator is a legal entity.
In order to establish a frame for the content of this article, alongside the introduction, its structure shall be divided in three parts.
The first part will point out the terminology used in Romanian Law no.46/2008, which shall prove to be necessary for the analysis proposed.
The second part will refer to specific provisions found in Law no.46/2008, mainly articles 106-110, with a brief reference to the Decision of the Romanian Constitutional Court no.670/2008, alongside the Decision given in an appeal in the interest of the Law, by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, no. XII/12.02.2008, and will also consist of a critical approach, from a practical point of view, of the provisions earlier mentioned, holding into account the manner of incrimination by reference to another provision, or to another normative act.
The third and final part will consist of brief conclusions as resulting from the present article.

Keywords: Forest protection, criminal liability, moral person, legal entity, practical difficulties

Introduction:

The idea for this paper occurred while trying to establish the compatibility of Romanian special criminal legislation with the criminal liability of legal entities, especially when the legislation referred to is prior to the enforcement of the actual Romanian Criminal Code, namely Law no.286/2009.

The importance of this issue is given by the need to effectively protect the national forest fund, mostly because the greatest environmental damages are not made by individuals acting separately, but by organizations, regardless of their legal form.

My approach was to analyze particular crimes provisioned by title VI of Law no.46/2008 taking into account especially the problems that emerge alongside the interpretation of legal norms as requested by the need of clarity and predictability of criminal law, when the perpetrator is not an individual, but a legal entity.

Mainly because judicial practice lacks in this matter, I focused on analyzing the provisions earlier mentioned in a critical manner, expecting to cover some of the issues that may be raised in practice, without claiming that my approach is exhaustive.

Unfortunately, dedicated literature in this matter is hard to encounter, reason for which my paper deals with issues which are not definitively settled neither in practice nor in theory.

Specific terminology:

It is useful, for the purpose of this paper, to highlight the terminology used in Law no.46/2008[1].

Art. 1 of the Forest Code, in its first paragraph, defines the "national forest fund" as all forests, fields intended for afforestation, land that serves the needs of crops, production, or forest administration, ponds and other fields with forestry destination, including those that are not productive, part of forest arrangements on the 1st of January 1990, including surface modifications, done according to the law, regardless of the form of property exercised upon the land[2].

The second paragraph provides that, according to the first paragraph, the national forest fund includes:

a) forests,
b) fields under regeneration, and plantations established under forestry purposes,
c) fields intended for afforestation,
d) land that serves the needs of crops: nurseries, solariums, plantations and crops of mother-plants,
e) land that serves the needs of forest production: walnut plantation, trees destined for Christmas, ornamental trees and shrubs and fruit trees,
f) land that serves the needs of forest administration: fields intended to represent feed for the game, and for the production of

Any reference to the Forest Code, will be considered made to the form republished in the Official Gazette, no.611/12.08.2015, after the last amendments made by law no.232/2016.

feed, or fields temporary used by the forestry staff,

g) fields occupied by constructions and the yard associated with them: administrative headquarters, cottages, pheasant raising facilities, trout raising facilities, animal breeding grounds for hunting purposes, roads and railways used for forest transportation, industrial spaces, forestry technical equipment, fields temporary occupied or affected by obligations or litigation, alongside forest fields in the border corridor and the border protection strip and those intended for objectives within the State Border Integrated Security System,

h) ponds, and non-productive fields, part of forest arrangements.

Paragraph 3 of article 1 states that all surfaces included in the national forest fund are defined as fields with forestry destination.

Art.2, paragraph 1 defines the "forest" included in the national forest fund as the surface of at least 0,25 ha, covered with trees, that must reach a minimum of 5 meters at maturity, in normal growth conditions.

The second paragraph of the same article states that a "forest", as defined by the law, contains a) the surfaces used as forest, part of forest arrangements on the 1st of January 1990, including surface modifications, done according to the law, b) forest protection curtains, c) fields on which juniper thickets are located, d) fields covered with forested pastures with a higher consistency than 0,4, calculated only for the surfaces effectively occupied by forest vegetation, e) plantations forest species located in the protection area for hidrotechnic developments or land improvements on fields that are part of the State public property, if they satisfy the conditions imposed by paragraph 1 of the same article, earlier mentioned.

Paper content:

Title VI of Law no.46/2008 reunites the crimes provisioned by this law, and, to indicate the main practical issues that can rise from the interpretation of these provisions a punctual analysis will be made on art.106-110 of the earlier mentioned law.

Art.106, in paragraph 1 incriminates the reduction of the national forest fund surface, contrary to the provisions of art.36 and 37 of Law no.46/2008 which represents a crime and is punished by prison between 6 months and 1 year, or a fine.

The act incriminated, more precisely the material element, is the reduction of the national forest fund surface. This can be done either by an action of deforestation, destruction or by an omission, like the avoidance of taking the legal measures for the protection of the integrity of the forest, or of other components of the national forest fund, as defined by art.1 of Law no.46/2008. For this act to be a crime, it is essential that the reduction of the national forest fund surface to be done with disrespect to the provisions of art.36 and 37 of Law no.46/2008.

Article 36, paragraph 1 stipulates that by exception from the provisions[3] of art.35, the reduction of the national forest fund surface is allowed by the removal of fields necessary to accomplish objectives of national interest, declared of public utility, according to the law, and of fields on which production facilities and/or services for strategical defense in the purpose of national security are placed.

The second and third paragraphs of this article mainly stipulate that by the request of the beneficiary of the land removed from the national forest fund, in order to fulfill the objectives indicated in paragraph 1, the value of the land can be compensated by another land of at least equal value and surface. In this case, the value of the land definitively removed from the national forest fund will not be reimbursed, but other monetary obligations will be paid in advance.

The fourth and fifth paragraphs essentially indicate that no compensation or other monetary obligations are owed if the reduction of the national forest fund will be done at the request of the Ministry of Defense for strategical defense reasons. Equally, if the land measures less than 400 square meters, at the request of the Ministry of Internal Affairs, it will be excluded from the national forest fund without compensation or other monetary obligations, only if it will be used for the accomplishment of an objective within the State Border Integrated Security System.

Art.37, paragraph 1 states that surfaces from the national forest fund can be definitively removed, only if their value is compensated, without the reduction of the entire surface of the national forest fund and with anticipated reimbursement of monetary obligations, only for the fields necessary for the edification or extension of the following categories of objectives:

a) exploitation of mineral resources indicated in art.2, paragraph 1 of Law no.85/2003[4],

b) tourist objectives, including touristic facilities, places of religious worship, medical and sporting objectives, or social objectives done only by the providers of social services, for the administrative territory in the area of economic interest of the Danube Delta Biosphere Reserve mooring pontoons for tourist boats in order to provide food and fuel, floating pontoons and fishing shelters for fishermen organized in associations,

c) holiday houses, only in the private owned surfaces of national forest fund,

d) objectives installed in the national forest fund prior to 1990, alongside the surfaces related to actives sold by the National Forest Administration Romsilva, [3] Art.35 of Law no.46/2008 stipulates: The reduction of the national forest fund surface is prohibited.

[4] Law no.85/2003 regarding mines, Published in the Official Gazette no.197/27.03.2013.

e) sources and networks of water and sewerage, sources and networks of energy from conventional or regenerable resources, networks and systems of communication, roads of districtual or local interest, recreational parks, theme and educational parks, alongside hidrotechnical and fishing facilities,
f) exploration of the following mineral resources: coal, useful rocks, mineral aggregates, ores, the exploration, exploitation and transport of petrol and natural gas, alongside the installation, repairs, maintenance and dismantling of transportation networks used for petrol, gas and electric energy distribution.

Paragraph 2 of the same article stipulates that the location for the objectives found in paragraph 1, letter c, shall be done according to the following conditions: a) both construction and land are property of the same entity, b) the maximum surface that can be removed from the forest fund, including the building, access road and yard is of maximum 250 square meters if the entire forest property is larger than 5 ha., and maximum 5%, but not more than 200 square meters if the entire forest property is smaller than 5 ha.

Paragraphs 3 to 10 of art.37 establish particular rules regarding the manner of compensation for the fields removed in accordance with paragraph 1.

As previously pointed out, the incrimination is activated only if the reduction of the national forest fund surface is contrary to art.36 and 37, therefore, art.106, paragraph 1, consists of an incrimination per relationem, with reference to another article from the same law.

In what concerns art.36, only the first paragraph establishes the conditions in which the fund can be diminished, and the other four paragraphs indicate particular provisions regarding the compensation or reimbursement for the land removed.

I find this particular case imprecise, mainly because it refers to all provisions of art.36, not only to the first paragraph, and the effects of an interpretation regarding all these provisions might exceed the intentions of the legislator. As a consequence, in a theoretical case, if a legal entity exploits, without legal conditions, part of a forest by illegally placing an industrial building on the site (contrary to paragraph 1), the legal qualification of this act will be the same as in the case of a legal entity that intends on building a public utility facility and offers in compensation a field of the same dimensions, but of an inferior value (contrary to paragraph 3). Here, actions themselves and the effects of the crime are completely different, and it is excessive to qualify both acts under the same provision.

Also, I cannot consider the provisions of paragraphs 2,3,4,5 as legal stipulations of a action or omission allowed, because they are only used to indicate the conditions in which a compensation or reimbursement for the value of the land removed is necessary.

In what concerns art.37, I believe that for the same reasons as shown above, only paragraphs 1 and 2 are able to represent the complimentary part of the incrimination, because these are the only provisions that establish the actions allowed in order to reduce the national forest fond. Paragraph 2 consists of a special provision for the case in which the forest fund is reduced in order to allow a holiday home setup, reason for which I believe it can be treated as a supplement of paragraph 1, letter c.

Equally, I must add that the legislator regulated in art.37, paragraph 2, the situations in which the entire forest property is strictly larger or strictly smaller than 5 ha, without providing any rules if the forest property is exactly of 5 ha.

Therefore, I believe that art.106, paragraph 1 should have only indicated art.36, paragraph 1 and art.37 paragraphs 1 and 2, not the entire article, in order for the incrimination to be adequate.

Art.106, paragraph 2 states that the same penalty, as provisioned in paragraph 1, shall be applied if the destination of an objective from the national forest fund, that was removed or occupied, is changed within 5 years since the approval date.

In this case the material element is clear, and it consists of an action to change the destination of an objective that was earlier found in the national forest fund, and afterwards removed or occupied, with approval.

It is essential that the change of destination occurs in an interval of 5 years, since the approval to remove the objective from the national forest fund was given. The purpose of the provision is to prevent the unlawful use of an objective after its removal from the national forest fund, by continuously changing its destination into something that would have never been approved. After five years since the approval date, the destination of the object may be changed, and it is likely to be changed for economic or social reasons, fact that is not incriminated according to the provision earlier mentioned.

Paragraph 3 of the same article, 106, provides that the author of the acts indicated in paragraphs 1 and 2 must clear the land of any constructions or installations illegally edificated.

The first element of debate is the legal nature of this provision: is it a complementary sanction established by the law against the author of the actions incriminated in the first two paragraphs or is it a legal obligation of private nature imposed by the law as part of reestablishing the facts as they were before the action described in paragraphs 1 and 2?

The solution I find most suitable is that of a legal obligation, derived from an action prohibited by the law, mainly because the complementary sanctions are expressly stipulated in the Criminal Code or other normative acts and secondly because it is not consequent to a criminal conviction[5], but to an unlawful act, regardless of its qualification as a crime or not. Personally I consider this obligation to be a partial[6] form of restitutio in integrum after an unjust conduct.

Criminal law literature[7] appreciates that this provision has the nature of a reparatory measure.

The second element of debate is whether the term "author" refers only to the perpetrator of the acts, or to any entity in whose interest the act was committed or if a conviction for the crime is necessary to qualify, beyond reasonable doubt, an entity as the author.

The answer relies in the definition of the author in the Criminal Code (art.46, paragraph 1), which applies accordingly by effect of art.114 of the Forest Code. By these texts, an author is a person that directly commits a fact incriminated by Criminal law. As a consequence, apparently, there is no need for a definitive conviction of a person for it to be liable under the provisions of art.106, paragraph 3 of the Forest Code.

In this case, can the provision be applied to a legal entity, given the specific manner in which it is regulated, namely the author of the acts indicated in the first two paragraphs must clear the land?

My point of view is that a legal entity can be considered author a crime, only if it is convicted by a definitive criminal ruling mainly because under Romanian law it can be liable for a crime as an author, if the conditions provisioned in art.135, paragraph 1 of the Criminal Code. In this case, the legal entity is considered to be the author of the crime, if during its activity, in its interest, or in its name, a crime is committed. Criminal law literature[8] stipulates that the Romanian legislator established a form of direct liability for the legal entity, therefore it can act as author of a crime.

To attract the liability of the legal person it is essential for a crime to be committed, not only an act prohibited by Criminal law. If there is no crime, for no matter what reason, although the act is regulated by the law as a crime, it shall not attract the liability of a legal entity.

Equally, if the conditions provisioned in art.135, paragraph 1 of the Criminal Code are not fulfilled, the legal entity cannot be considered as author of the crime, because, by its nature, it cannot directly commit the crime.

Therefore, to answer the question earlier stated, the legal entity is liable under the provisions of art.106, paragraph 3 of the Forest Code only if it is convicted as an author for the crimes regulated by the first 2 paragraphs of the same article. If a definitive conviction was not ruled, the legal entity cannot be author in the acceptance of art.46, paragraph 1 of the Criminal Code, reason for which it cannot be held liable under the provisions of art.106, paragraph 3 of the Forest Code.

The third and final element of debate for paragraph 3 of article 106 is the reference to both previous paragraphs.

Although the legislator stipulated that the author of acts regulated by "paragraph 1 and 2" must clear the land, I believe that the purpose of this provision wasn't to establish a legal obligation only for those perpetrators that commit both crimes (the main form in paragraph 1 and the assimilated form in paragraph 2), but to remove the effects of either crimes, so I consider that the rational interpretation is to hold liable the author of the crime regulated by paragraph 1, or the author of the crime regulated by paragraph 2, in accordance with the legal obligation found in paragraph 3.

Paragraph 4 of article 106, indicates that the reinstallation of forest vegetation is done, on the expense of the author of the crimes regulated by paragraphs 1 and 2, by the Forest district which provides forestry services or administrates the forest, on the site that is the object of the crime.

Here, the legislator used the term "crime", and for this reason, I believe that it implies a definitive legal ruling that establishes the fact that a crime had taken place and its author. For this reason there is no doubt that a legal entity can be held liable under this provision. More than that, this provision has the nature of a legal obligation, subsequent to a conviction, with the purpose of reestablishing the facts before the crime.

Art.107 paragraph 1, art.108 paragraph 1 and art.109 paragraph 1 will be briefly analyzed together, because the main difference between al three of them is the material element, which is clear in all cases, and it is not plausible to generate difficulties in practice.

The most important point of the analysis is the main penalty for each crime, which is set, by the legislator, depending on the value of one cubic meter of wood, value established by Government decision.

Therefore, in order to establish the punishment for a certain act it is necessary to refer to a Government decision that is adopted annually, according to art.116 of Law no.46/2008, based on information provided by the National Statistics Institute, according to point 39 of the Appendix to the Forest Code.

In this matter I do not see a problem regarding the legality of the incrimination, mainly because by organic law the constitutive elements of the crimes have been established, and the penalty is subjected to an update depending on the price of the cubic meter of wood, fact expressly stipulated in the provisions of the articles mentioned.

[5] The text does not refer to a definitive legal ruling that establishes the author of the crime provisioned in paragraphs 1 and 2, or to a conviction, but only to an "author" of the acts indicated in the previous paragraphs.

[6] The term "partial" has been used because the simple clearing of the land from construction facilities does not take it back to its original state. This action can, at most, prepare the area for afforestation, and in a matter of 5-10 years a complete restitutio in integrum can be made.

[8] G.Antoniu, T.Toader (coord.) – Explanations of the New Criminal Code (original title: Explicaţiile Noului Cod Penal), vol.II, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, pag.388.

The only way in which the regulation would have been arbitrary is when it would have depended only on the free will of the Government, with no limitations, but, in accordance with article 116 of the Forest Code, the medium price of a cubic meter of wood is established annually, by Governmental Decision, at the proposal of the central public authority in matter of forestry. The price is settled in an objective manner, namely, in accordance with the medium sale price of a cubic meter of wood, at national level, determined according to statistic data issued by the National Statistics Institute, as provided by point 39 of the Appendix to the Forest Code.

This way, firstly, the incrimination is not about to be established in a subjective manner, depending on the interests of the Government, but in an objective manner, as resulting from an organic law, updated in a manner provided by the same law, depending, essentially, on national statistics.

Secondly, the text is not contrary to art.23, paragraph 12 and art.73, paragraph 3 letter h of the Romanian Constitution[9], as continuously shown by the Constitutional Court of Romania[10]. Essentially, the Court decided that the establishment of the medium price of a cubic meter of wood is done by enforcement given by the organic law to the administrative authority that establishes the price.

Thirdly, considering the decision given in an Appeal in the interest of the Law, by the High Court of Cassation and Justice, no. XII/12.02.2008[11], it is obvious that the incrimination by reference to a Government decision (the act of an administrative authority) is subjected to the principle of the most favorable criminal law, in case of a time-succession of penal laws. In this situation, although at the time of the act it would have been considered a crime, if the price later established by the Government generates a prejudice under the value of 5 cubic meters of wood, the action will not be qualified as a crime.

Paragraph 2 of the same provisions establishes an aggravated form for each of the incriminations, but, as long as my research focuses, this does not raise practical issues, therefore, it doesn't fit the purpose of this paper.

Art.110, provides in its only paragraph that the disrespect of the obligation stipulated in art.30, paragraph 1 represents a crime and it is punishable by fine. According to article 30, paragraph 1, activities of artificial regeneration and of completion of natural regenerations is done in an interval of at most two vegetation seasons starting from the unique or definitive cutting of the trees.

The first point of the analysis aims at stipulating the limits of the penalty, given the fact that the legislator only stipulated a fine.

The answer for this issue resides in the provisions of art.137 of the Criminal Code, namely in paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 letter a.

The second paragraph stipulates that the quantum of the fine is determined by the system of days-fine, were the value of one day-fine (established between 100 and 5.000 lei) is multiplied by the number of days-fine (between 30 and 600 days). Paragraph 3 indicates that the specific number of days-fine will be determined by general criteria in what concerns the individualization of the punishment, and the value of one day fine will be established depending on the sales figure, for legal entities with a lucrative purpose and by the value of patrimonial assets and other obligation for other legal entities.

The special limits of the number of days fine is established, according to paragraph 4, letter a, between 60 and 180 days, if the law only stipulates the fine as a penalty.

In this case, for the crime provisioned by art.110 of the Forest code, the effective penalty can be established between 6.000 and 900.000 lei, depending on the factors indicated in art.137 paragraph 3 of the Criminal Code.

The second point of analysis regards the material element, as referred to in art.30, paragraph 1. Effectively it consists of an omission to accomplish the activities of artificial regeneration and those of completion of natural regenerations, or to accomplish them in more than two vegetation seasons since the unique or definitive cutting of the trees.

A vegetation season is defined by point 45 of the Appendix to the Forest code as the time frame between the entry into vegetation and the vegetative rest of an arboret.

In this case, the act can be qualified as a crime if the perpetrator failed to act according to the provision previously stipulated for at least two vegetation seasons, that cannot be established in precise intervals, depending on the trees found in the arboret.

More than that, the law did not specify that the vegetation seasons should be complete, reason for which, if the definitive cutting is made a few days before the end of the vegetation season this year, after the end of the vegetation season of next year the act could be qualified as a crime because one vegetation season was pending when the cut took place and the other was completed next year. Therefore, two vegetation seasons can practically represent one year and a few days.

[9] Art.23, paragraph 12: Penalties shall be established or applied only in accordance with and on the grounds of the law.
Art.73, paragraph 3, letter h: Organic laws shall regulate: criminal offences, penalties, and the execution thereof.

[11] Published in the Official Gazette, no.866/22.12.2008.

Equally, given the relativity of the time frame that represents a vegetation season, the incrimination of article 110 of the Forest code does not effectively meet all expectations of predictability.

Conclusions

In this last part of the article, the main conclusions will be highlighted in a brief manner, primarily considering that the purpose of this paper was to identify practical issues regarding the enforcement of title VI of Law no.46/2008.

As a general observation, an incrimination per relationem, as found in all provisions subjected to analysis has its own limitation, determining an imprecision in establishing the material elements of the offence[12].

In this regard, I stated that art.106, paragraph 1 should have only indicated art.36, paragraph 1 and art.37 paragraphs 1 and 2, not the entire article, in order for the incrimination to be adequate.

Equally, analyzing the provisions of paragraph 3 of the same article I consider that the legal entity is liable under those provisions only if it is convicted as an author for the crimes regulated by the first 2 paragraphs of the same article. If a definitive conviction was not ruled, the legal entity cannot be author in the acceptance of art.46, paragraph 1 of the Criminal Code, reason for which it cannot be held liable under the provisions of art.106, paragraph 3 of the Forest Code.

In what concerns art.107 paragraph 1, art.108 paragraph 1 and art.109 paragraph 1, I believe that the legality of the incrimination is satisfied, mainly because by organic law the constitutive elements of the crimes have been indicated, and the penalty is subjected to an update depending on the price of the cubic meter of wood, objectively established, fact expressly stipulated in the provisions of the articles mentioned.

Finally, given the fact that incrimination is depending on the time frame that represents a vegetation season, the provisions of article 110 of the Forest code don't effectively meet all expectations of predictability.

By this approach, surely many practical issues were not treated accordingly, but I consider those already indicated to be part of the main problems usually encountered in criminal judicial activity, when enforcing title VI of Law no.46/2008.

ACTUAL ISSUES REGARDING THE ENFORCEMENT OF LEGAL STANDARDS OF THE DEED OF INTIMATION LODGED WITH THE COURT OF LAW IN THE ROMANIAN COURT PROCEEDINGS

Andrei ZARAFIU[*]

Abstract

The dynamic evolution of the new fundamental law in criminal matters triggered serious challenges in the adaptation process to the new legal realities of the Romanian legal system, as a whole.
Within the seeming conclusion of the transition period given by the profound change of the criminal substantial and procedural regulations, the new dimensions of the functional relation between the two classes of authorities who perform main judicial functions have been clarified: prosecutors and courts of law. The action that refers to the way functional competency is transferred from the investigating authorities to decisional authorities and through which the progressive route of the criminal trial passes from the preliminary stage, the investigation stage, to the trial stage and that of the actual dispute settlement is an essential element of this relation.
The study aims to identify and analyse some of the most important court trial matters or issues that might occur in the recent practice with regards to observing the legal standards of form and contents of the deed of intimation lodged with the court of law.
Equally, the theoretical analysis and the jurisprudence tackles to identify certain actual resources in order to render efficient mechanisms submitted to assessment.

Keywords: deed of intimation, form, effects, limits, legality

1. Introduction

The exercise of any function with judicial nature is subject to a prior formal authorisation, materialized in a legal document whose form and content are confined to a strict regulatory regime.

Especially in the case of the jurisdiction on the merits, the principle of ne procedat iudex ex officio prevents the self-authorisation and forces the subject performing that function to manifest only within the limits of his investiture, even if the judicial context is of criminal nature. As jurisdiction implies both the authority to resolve and decide on the conflict submitted to settlement (cognitio) as well as the power to have the decision taken being executed (imperium)[1], the modality in which the apparent excess power may be tempered is to draw a predetermined frame for its manifestation.

In the criminal trial, the act that initiates the exercise of the judgment function and contributes mainly to set the procedural framework in which the scope of the judgment shall be accomplished is the indictment drafted by the prosecutor who conducted the prosecution. It has the nature of an act characterized not only through the provision it contains and in which the prosecution function is focused - the arraignment, but also in terms of its content, regulated in an imprecise manner through the provisions of article 327 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

2. General considerations concerning the form and functionality of the indictment

Regardless of the way how the current structure of the type of Romanian criminal trial[2] is perceived and addressed, it is undisputed that within the major subdivisions of the trial an essential place is occupied by the prosecution. Even abandoning the autonomous concept of procedural stage and rallying to the current trend developed in continental systems that were the main inspiration of the present Code, the importance of the investigative stage of the trail is obvious. Thus, in the French system, there are two main phases of the criminal trial. A preparatory phase that includes the monitoring, the investigation and the instruction, and a decisional phase, which includes the court's proceedings[3]. In the Italian system, a distinct system amongst continental mixed systems due to the preponderance of adversarial elements, the jurisdictional phase (the actual trial) is preceded by an investigative phase (non-procedural - indagini preliminari) and the decisional power is characteristic only to the jurisdictional phase[4].

Having the role to mark the beginning of the criminal trial, in the opinion of the current Criminal Procedure Code, the prosecution represents the procedural phase suitable for the gathering of the evidence material required to solve the criminal cases. Moreover, considering the recent changes in the procedural manner through which the initiation of the prosecution is ordered[5], this phase is the only context allowed by the law in which evidence able to lead to the establishment of a person's guilt or innocence can be administered. Although it knows exceptions [the statements taken from the person that formulated the criminal complaint is considered evidence even if it was administered before the initiation of the prosecution, under article 111 paragraph (10) CPP, the objects collected by the extra-judicial bodies in case of new offenses ascertained under article 61 and 62 CPP may be used as evidence even if they were won for the case prior to the initiation of the prosecution, etc.] this rule is able to highlight the object of the prosecution. Expressly prefigured through the provisions of article 285 CPP in a form taken from the former regulation[6], the object of the prosecution captures the essence of the activity corresponding to the scope of this phase, which constitutes as well the main or qualified activity of the prosecution "the prosecution has as object to gather necessary evidence of the existence of crime, to identify the persons who have committed a crime and to establish their criminal liability, in order to ascertain whether it is appropriate to order an indictment". As pertinently shown in the relevant literature[7] the collection of evidence means in fact a series of activities without which it would not be possible to know whether an act that was committed is a crime – and that means first and forehand to conduct a research in rem. These activities involve operation of discovery, gathering and preserving evidence, involving specific tasks in the probation activity: identifying, managing and appreciating the evidence. To this respect, article 99 paragraph (1) CPP stipulates that the burden of administrating the evidence (proof) in criminal proceedings lies mainly with the prosecutor. The exclusivity of the judicial body in terms of evidence administration is tempered by the recognition of the right to propose evidence administration, right that belongs to distinct parties in the proceedings (suspect, injured party and parties) and cannot be refused unless the observance of the restrictive conditions of article 100 paragraph (4) CPP. The existence of crime means on one hand the material existence of an offense and, on the other hand, if the respective offence constitutes a punishable attempt or a fait accompli. "Identifying the persons who committed a crime" means that the administrated evidence must provide as well the needed data to know the perpetrators (the person who committed the crime, the instigators, the accomplices), both regarding their person (natural or legal) as regarding the identity, activity corresponding to a in personam research.

"Establishing the liability of the perpetrators" means that the necessary evidence should concern not only the facts but also enough data to be able to know whether the perpetrators acted or not guilty, if they can be held criminally liable for acts committed and whether it is appropriate that they are prosecuted. This activity of collecting evidence, specific to the prosecution, is subordinated to a precise purpose - to ascertain whether it is appropriate to order the indictment, purpose which in turn comes under the general purpose of criminal trial, as foreseen by the article 8 CPP[8].

Therefore, the criminal prosecution may determine primarily a positive finding, when the indictment and thus the passing into a new stage of the trial are necessary. As a judicial disposition, the indictment is the result of a triple findings, namely that the crime exists, that it was committed by the defendant and that it is criminally held liable. Also, the result of the main activity of prosecution may result in a negative finding, in the sense that the indictment is not necessary, in which case the criminal trial is interrupted, either temporarily (if subsequently the prosecution is resumed) or permanently (if the solution of the non-indictment is confirmed by the judge). This finding occurs in a distinct stage of the prosecution, in the stage of the finishing the criminal prosecution and the case's solving by the prosecutor, that does not mean the exhaustion of the criminal prosecution phase but only the finishing of the investigation activities. Since the function and the purpose of the criminal prosecution have a significant impact, the result it incorporates is submitted to a preliminary verification, which is transposed by the establishment of preliminary filters: the presumptive end of the criminal prosecution, in which, according to article 321 CPC, the criminal investigation body shall prepare a report on the solution it considers appropriate, the actual termination of the prosecution, in which, according to art. 322 and 327 CPP, the prosecutor proceeds to a review of the works of the criminal prosecution and gives the case a solution through one of the means provided by the law, plus possibly the further verification of the indictment by the prosecutor hierarchically superior to the one who drafted it, according to article 328 paragraph (1) CPP.

[8] Per article 8 CPP the judicial bodies are obliged to carry out the prosecution and the judgment with the respect of the procedural guarantees and rights of the parties, so as to ascertain, in due time and completely, the facts constituting the offense, not to prosecute an innocent person, and anyone who has committed an offense to be punishable by law in a reasonable time.

In considering these preliminary explanations, the procedural positive act - the indictment - represents the document that focuses the entire judicial function of criminal prosecution, representing the solution through which the prosecutor decides to institute the proceedings and the passage, in a progressive manner, to another stage of the criminal trial. To dispel any arbitrary assessment, the law conditions the indictment to the prosecutor's belief, formed following the assessment of the evidence legally administrated and materially supported by them that the crime exists, it was committed by the accused and that it is criminally responsible. The only legal instrument by which the arraignment is made is the indictment drafted by the prosecutor. The indictment is the deed of intimation of the court, through which the prosecutor asks the court to apply the law whereas the defendant is concerned[9]. The indictment and its processual consequence, the court's referral, are acts placed under the exclusive competence of the prosecutor as the main organ to carry out the prosecution. Having the ability to determine the procedure in which the judgment will take place, the indictment is materially funded on the same elements that the court may use to found its verdict of guilt, being obvious a functional symmetry between the act ordering the indictment (act of essence of the criminal prosecution) and the procedural act through which a person is prosecuted (act of the essence of the judgment). In this sense, both acts of disposition are materially grounded on the same essential elements of the report of conflict: fact and person.

Through the act of disposition that it incorporates, the indictment, when expressed under the procedural form established by the law, simultaneously produce two types of legal consequences, with positive character (the court's referral) and with negative character (the end of the formal authorisation of the criminal investigative body regarding the case). Therefore, accomplishing further criminal prosecution activities about the fact and the person for whom the indictment who issued appears as an unlawful way to proceed whereas through the indictment, a transfer of functional competence occurred between organs exercising different judicial functions. After that moment, the prosecutor cannot take any action and, in the continuation of the trial, he no longer has the powers he had as investigating authority[10].

In consideration of its specific nature, the indictment is an act characterized, both by the particularity of the main procedural act it includes as by its shape. As an exception to the rule foreseen in article 286 paragraph (1) CPP, the procedural act (the content) – the arraignment is not materialized in an ordinance but in one type of written procedural act (the form) – the indictment. Being a complex act, the indictment may include several acts of disposition since it ensures a multiple functionality but the main and binding disposition that it contains and that customizes its nature, is the arraignment. By reference to this disposition, the indictment is the main court's deed if intimation, through which the matters to be judged upon are to be set. The court's referral can be achieved as well through other legal means but they do have the main character. Thus, in accordance with article 341 paragraph (7) point 2 letter c) CPP, the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber referred with a complaint against the solution of not to indict in a case in which the criminal proceedings were initiated, whilst granting the complaint, may order the initiation of the judgment when the evidences lawfully administrated during the criminal investigations are sufficient. In these circumstances, the conclusion (resolution) of the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber who ordered the initiation of the judgment[11] is the deed of intimation for the court. Also, within the special procedure of plea bargaining agreement (article 478-488 CPP) the court's referral is accomplished by the convention (agreement) concluded between the subjects of the criminal proceedings: the Public Ministry and the defendant.

To accomplish its function as deed of intimation, the indictment must conform to a predetermined format, with mandatory content elements, that must be limited to the fact and the person for which the criminal investigation was conducted and must meet national and conventional standards aimed at ensuring both the effective exercise of the judicial functions as the effective protection of the defendant. Thus, by the formal removal of the active role, the court is required to deploy the activity specific to its judicial function within mandatory specific limitations, drawn following its legal investiture. The possibility of extending those [11] In disagreement with the opinions expressed in the specialized literature (M. Udroiu, Criminal procedure. Special Part, 3rd edition, CHBeck Publishing House, 2016, p.131, etc.) I consider that, although the law does no longer expressly qualifies it as deed of intimation, the complaint submitted to the judge against the not-to-indict solutions remains the main factor in accomplishing the atypical deed of intimation, as per article 341 CPP. This complaint, as an unofficial act, together with the resolution of the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber for the initiation of the judgment will determine the factual elements of the investiture.

investiture's limitations by appropriate means, known to the old legislation (the extension of the criminal proceedings, the extension of the criminal trial) as well as the possibility of refusing the benefits of the investiture (the return of the case to the prosecutor's office during the judicial investigation) are no longer currently allowed. Therefore, per article 349 paragraph (1) CPP, the court is obliged to resolve the case submitted to trial, within the mandatory limits of its investiture.

The responsibility for the accurate and complete setting of these limits (boundaries) lies therefore with the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber, to whom has been transferred the functional competence to verify the legality of the prosecution and to ensure the remedy of the irregularities in the deed of intimation. The judge sitting in the preliminary chamber contributes actively to the court investiture as this is achieved by the combined action of two distinct acts: the indictment for the arraignment, establishing the object of judgment (by indication of the fact and person to be judged) – the deed of intimation, and the conclusion of the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber who finalizes the limits of the judgment (through the remediation of the material required to solve the case) - the investiture act.

But even in the context of this joint action, the deed of intimation lodged with the court of law remains the exclusive prerogative of the prosecuting authorities. In this regard are as well the provisions of article 329 paragraph (1) CPP, which provides that the indictment is the deed of intimation lodged with the court of law. Therefore, the legal and the complete referral of the court must be reported to the mandatory content of the deed of intimation, as foreshadowed by the provisions of article 328, with reference to article 286 paragraph (2) CPP, in which the requirement to indicate the offense incriminating the accused is specifically mentioned. The fact must be indicated in its materiality as the court is not vested with a legal qualification (determination) but with a fact. The fact is the material premise of the criminal proceedings, which terminates when its object has been accomplished – the criminal liability. Consequently, the fact, in its material dimension, is the first element to be set for a proper solution of the criminal proceedings. A symmetry is relevant, in this respect, between the procedural act ordering the prosecution (article 327 letter a) of the CPP and the act through which the criminal proceedings is solved in first instance, in the sense of the conviction [article 396 paragraph (2) CPC], acts that are materially based on the same three elements: offense (fact), person and guilt.

The requirement to indicate the actual offense incriminating the defendant, by mentioning the time and place elements, by describing how the offence was committed (especially with alternative incriminations), by specifying the number of material actions, by identifying the separate elements and the type of connection existing in case of plurality of crimes has an essential character, serving not only to meet the requirements related to the establishing of the object of judgment but also the requirements related to the exercise of procedural rights, guaranteed as fundamental principle. Moreover, beyond the explicit and implicit guarantees of the right to a fair trial and the right to defence, the solving itself of a criminal case is accomplished by the court, under the article 349 paragraph (1) CPP, with the guarantee of the compliance with the procedural rights. This is the reason why the material description of the offense incriminating the defendant requires both a complete individualization of the facts which compose the content allegedly criminal as an indication of the correspondence between each factual element and evidence on which it is based.

Regarding the obligation to describe in full the facts that form the content of the criminal charge brought against the defendant, beyond the national regulation, the deed of intimation lodged with a court of law must also comply with a conventional standard designed to ensure the fairness of the proceedings and the effective exercise of the right to defence. In this regard, the European Court of Human Rights[12] held that article 6 paragraph 3 of the Convention recognizes the right of the accused to be informed in detail not only regarding the cause of the accusation, meaning the material facts of which he is charged with and on which the accusation is grounded, but also regarding the nature of the accusation, meaning a legal qualification of the facts.

Also, the European Court of Human Rights[13] held that the right to a fair trial was violated because the information contained in the accusation regarding the essential details on place and time of the offense was vague and contradictory so that the defendant has not been able to prepare a practical and effective defence.

The Court held that an accurate and full information on the facts incriminating the accused and a legal qualification represent an essential condition for the fairness of the judicial proceedings, and this must be done including throughout the indictment that must not be characterized by vagueness about the essential details. In its jurisprudence[14] the European Court of Human Rights explained what it means by the cause and nature of the accusation against a person throughout the indictment, showing that they relate to the material facts on which the accusation is grounded, to the legal qualification of the accusation as well as to the existing aggravating circumstances, and that the detailed information on the facts being charged and on their legal qualification should not be, in any circumstance, follow the indictment. Such findings determined the doctrine[15] to appreciate in a pertinent manner that the requirements under which the ability of the indictment to apprehend and validly invest the court is assessed should start from the same criteria under which the European Court has ruled on the quality of the law to be predictable. To this regard, taking into consideration the need to ensure real and effective protection for the defendant in relation to the acts he is being charged, the description of the fact in the indictment must be sufficiently precise to enable the defendant (who can call for specialized consultancy/advice of a lawyer, either chosen or appointed ex officio) to understand the fact of which he is accused, its legal qualification and the punitive treatment[16]. Moreover, even in a case rendered against Romania[17] the European Court recalled that fairness is determined in relation to the procedure as a whole. The provisions of article 6 paragraph 3 express the need to pay special attention to the notification of the "charge" brought to the concerned person. The deed of intimation plays a decisive role in the prosecution: after the notification, the person prosecuted is officially notified in writing on the legal and factual basis of the charges against him. Article 6 paragraph 3 letter a) recognizes for the accused the right to be informed not only about the cause of the accusation, meaning the material facts of which he is charged with and on which the accusation is grounded, but also regarding the legal qualification of the facts, and this in a detailed manner. In criminal matters, an accurate and precise information about the charges against a person therefore on the legal qualification the court may hold against him is a prerequisite condition of the fairness of the proceedings. Finally, there is a connection between letters a) and b) of article 6 paragraph 3 and the right to be informed of the nature and the cause of the accusation must be considered from the perspective of the accused's right to prepare his defence (Pelissier and Sassi v. France recitals 52-54). The clarity in describing the facts as acknowledged in the deed of intimation lodged with the court falls within broader requirements, regarding the right to information in criminal proceedings, the standard accepted at the national level transposing provisions imposed at the European level[18].

In this context, the constant case-law[19] the High Court of Cassation and Justice (both before and after the entry into force of the new Code of Criminal Procedure) held that the fact described in the deed of intimation lodged with the court of law must not represent only the mere reference to a given action mentioned in the sequence of the defendant's activities, but a detailed description of that action in a manner likely to produce legal consequences, namely to invest the court.

Finally, in terms of the finality of the indictment it should be noted that the in the new regulation this act has lost its ability to cause the indictment of the accused, its issuance being subjected to the preliminary initiation of the criminal proceedings. Even if it is not expressly provided for, in terms of the drafting technique, the indictment retained the tripartite structure consisting of an introductive, expositive and operative part. It is no doubt that the expositive part of the indictment is prefigurating its operative part and, naturally, the prosecutor, whilst drafting the indictment, will indicate, in the expositive part, the evidence of the prosecution, and the operative part will materialize the will's manifesto of the representative of the Public Ministry to order the arraignment[20]. The indictment has a subpoena part, in which the persons that must be subpoenaed are indicated, mentioning their quality in the trial and the place where they are subpoenaed. Any irregularities identified in this segment cannot determine the impossibility to establish the object and the limitations of the judgment. In subsidiary, depending on the possible acts of disposition that it may include, the indictment may also contain provisions as to not to indict, in complex cases involving a plurality of facts and perpetrators. In this context, the provision not to indict may be accompanied by complementary measures determining the initiation of different procedures. Thus, if the same indictment is ordering the arraignment, the waiver of prosecution as well as the apprehension of the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber regarding the confiscation or the closure of a document in case of dismissal, considering that the judicial procedures being initiated involve different rules [on the procedure of preliminary chamber under the articles 344-346 CPP, on the confirmation of the waiver of prosecution under the article 318 paragraph (12) - (16) and on the issuance of an order by the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber, under the article 549^1 CPP], these provisions, although embedded in the same act must be handled administratively as three different complaints and assigned to different judges sitting in the preliminary chamber. Also, the indictment may incorporate proposals for preventive measures, precautionary or safety, in which case, per articles 330 - 331 CPP it is no longer required to draw up separate documents. In all these situations, considering its main purpose – the apprehension of the court, the indictment remains a unique act being always drafted in a single copy, even if the prosecution's activities concern several facts or more persons and even if they get different solutions. However certified copies are made of the indictment, which are communicated to the defendants regardless of their status (free or in custody). To satisfy the requirements of an efficient information, the indictment must be translated if the accused does not speak Romanian or it must be communicated as well in a mother-tongue translation if the accused, Romanian citizen belonging to a different nationality, requests it. The provision, provided by article 329 paragraph (3) CPP, transposes into national law the provisions of the Directive 2010/64/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council, on the right to interpretation and translation in criminal proceedings, as pertinently noted in the literature[21].

3. Practical issues regarding the types of types of irregularities of the indictment

Overall, to achieve its function act deed of intimation, the indictment must be verified in terms of legality and validity by a prosecutor of higher-level to the one who drafted it. This requirement is a form of transposition of the principle of the hierarchical control governing the activity of the Public Ministry and involving a functional subordination and not an administrative one. The generation of the legal effects of the indictment shall be subject to the submission of this procedural act to a form of enablement[22] from a higher-level prosecutor. This verification concerns equally the observance of the legal provisions in the work of drafting the deed of intimation as the validity of the solutions it incorporates in relation to all prosecuting acts performed in the case and the evidence being administrated. In accordance with the article 328 paragraph (1) CPP, the verification is performed by the head of the office (first prosecutor or general prosecutor) where the prosecutor who drafted it belongs, and when the indictment was drafted by the latter the verification of the indictment is performed by a higher-level prosecutor. When it was prepared by a prosecutor within the prosecutor's office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice, the indictment is verified by the prosecutor chief of the section, and when the indictment was drafted by the latter, the verification is accomplished by the general prosecutor of this office. The law does not establish a term for the indictment to be verified by the higher-level prosecutor, pointing out only that in cases with arrested persons, the verification is accomplished urgently and before the expiry of remand in custody. From the material point of view, the legal operation of the verification is realized by applying on a mark checked in terms of legality and validity on the indictment, accompanied by the signature of the prosecutor who conducted the verification[23]. The lack of mention attracts the irregularity of the deed of intimation that can be invoked and remedied within the preliminary chamber procedure, without determining the impossibility to establish the object and the limitations of the judgement[24].

The verification of the indictments prepared by the prosecutors within the National Anticorruption Directorate is made under the terms of article 22^2 of Government Emergency Ordinance no. 43/2002 – the indictments prepared by the prosecutors within the territorial services of the National Anticorruption Directorate are verified by the chief prosecutors of these services, those drafted by the chief-prosecutors of the territorial services as those drafted by the prosecutors within the central structure of the National Directorate Anticorruption are verified by the chief-prosecutors of the sections and when the indictments are drafted by the chief prosecutors of the sections within the National Anticorruption Directorate, their verification is made by the chief prosecutor of this directorate. The application of this provision in the causes in which the indictment was drafted by a chief prosecutor of a territorial service (but in which, amongst prosecution acts, there are also orders issued by the Chief Deputy Prosecutor of the directorate which infirm some dismissal solutions) involves the establishment of an exclusive competency for the chief prosecutor of the directorate in accomplishing the verification of the legality and validity of the deed of intimation.

In practice and in the specialized literature as well a question was raised on how to accomplish the verification of the indictment when the prosecutor hierarchically superior to the one who drafted the indictment was the one who conducted criminal proceedings in the cause. In doctrine[25] it was validly considered that in these circumstances the hierarchically superior prosecutor is obliged to submit statement of abstention based on article 65 paragraph (1) reported to article 64 paragraph (1) letter f) CPP as [21] I. Neagu M. Damaschin, op cit., P.103.According to the provisions of Article 3 of the Directive, "Member States shall ensure that suspected or accused persons who do not understand the language of the criminal proceedings concerned are, within a reasonable period of time, provided with a written translation of all documents which are essential to ensure that they are able to exercise their right of defence and to safeguard the fairness of the proceedings. Essential documents shall include any decision depriving a person of his liberty, any charge or indictment, and any judgment.".

[23] The absence of an express provision indicating the nature of the act in which the result of the verification is materialized determined the doctrine to appreciate, still under the rule of the previous regulation, that the act confirming the indictment translates into a written resolution on the indictment - V. Dongoroz, and others, op. cit., 6th volume, p.71.

[24] In this regard, there are still applicable the judgements issued by the High Court of Cassation and Justice in resolving appeal in the interest of the law under the old regulation – High Court of Cassation and Justice, the Joint Chambers, Judgement no. 9 / February 02, 2008 (OJ no. 831 of December 10, 2008).

there is a reasonable suspicion that his impartiality in evaluating the legality and validity of the deed of intimation might be affected. But since in practice[26] this solution was not always shared a few additional clarifications are required.

Per article 62 paragraph (2) of the Law no. 304 / 2004, the prosecutors are deploying their activity within the Public Ministry, in accordance with the principles of legality, impartiality and hierarchical control. This general provision is implemented as well on the particular plan and on the work carried out by the prosecutors of the National Anticorruption Directorate which, in accordance with the article 2 of the Emergency Government' Ordinance no. 43 / 2002 exercise their powers only under the law and for its enforcement. The legality of the acts being accomplished in carrying out the judicial functions of prosecution supposes as well, inter alia, the absence of any prejudice or any preconceived ideas on the solution ordered by the prosecutor during at the termination of the criminal prosecution, issue that doesn't concern the independence but the impartiality of prosecutor. In terms of justice, the existence of a reasonable suspicion that the impartiality of the prosecutor is affected determines the occurrence of the incompatibility as provided by article 64, letter f), applicable to the prosecutor under the article 65 paragraph (1) CPP. If the incompatibility was not remedied by internal tools (restrain) or external (disqualification) provided to that end, the act accomplished by an incompatible prosecutor it is affected by a legality vice (flaw).

Thus, in the said cause, the judge sitting in a preliminary chamber circumscribed the reasons invoked for the support of the criticism regarding the incompatibility of the prosecutor who verified the indictments to the case of incompatibility as foreseen by article 64 paragraph (1) CPP, "in the current cause he conducted the criminal prosecution or he participated as a prosecutor in all proceedings before a judge or a court" case that obviously is not applicable to the prosecutor in accordance with the article 65 paragraph (1) CPP. According to the opinion of the judge sitting in a preliminary chamber these arguments cannot be extended to the broader incompatibility case, as foreseen by article 64 paragraph (1) letter f) CPP, which had been raised expressly, given that article 6 paragraph 1 ECHR covers only an independent and unbiased court. In disagreement with this assertion, we consider that the incompatibility status of the chief prosecutor of the territorial service, proven by the direct involvement in accomplishing the criminal prosecution and in making accusations against the defendant sued, based in part on the same material elements cannot be circumscribed to another incompatibility case than the one foresee in article 64 paragraph (1) letter f) CPP, having the nature to allow to retain a reasonable suspicion that the impartiality of its extremely important work of control of legality and validity of the deed of intimation was affected.

The regulation under the form of a distinct case of incompatibility, applicable to the prosecutor, as established in article 5 paragraph (1) CPP, of the suspicion of lack of impartiality implements in the matter of incompatibility the constitutional principle of impartiality of the activity of the Public Ministry, provided for in article 132 paragraph (1) of the Constitution. In the case-law of the Constitutional Court[27] the impartiality was analysed as a corollary to the principle of legality, and which generates the requirement for any prosecutor to perform his duties in an objective, without any other predetermined general purpose and without bias. In the current regulation, the incompatibility case based on the reasonable suspicion of lack of impartiality was designed as a general case, in which, depending on the particularities of each case, multiple circumstances can be assimilated, some of which have been covered in previous Code as distinct cases (article 48 of the CPP from 1968 - circumstances out of which result the interest, in any form, enmity result) while others must be justified.

Therefore, it was an option assumed by the legislator to extend the concept of impartiality from the conventional area corresponding to the notion of court as well to the judicial bodies exercising the other main function, the function of prosecution, due to the nature and consequences of acts in which this exercise is materializing.

Secondly, in a wrong manner, the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber considered that the direct accomplishment of criminal prosecution in the pending case or in another case (but to a degree of connection that allowed the judicial body to take measures and evidences) by the prosecutor who is required to verify the legality and validity of the deed of intimation issued in the case shall not have the nature as to create a reasonable suspicion that his impartiality could be affected. In our opinion, the incompatibility status of the chief prosecutor of the territorial service is of an obvious nature, the materials prerequisites that generated it being in fact recognized even by the prosecutor who drafted the indictment. It is undeniable the risk of bias of the prosecutor who not only conducted criminal prosecution that led to obtaining important evidence but also expressed in a judicial context his opinion on the factual circumstances envisaged in this case as well as to the possible guilt of the defendant being prosecuted.

Thus, examining the prosecution performed in another case (in which he is the prosecutor of the case), the chief prosecutor of the territorial service expressed his opinion on the "the extensive criminal activity of the defendant, which is actual and presents a particularly high social danger". To this respect, by the ordinance through which the criminal proceedings against the same defendant were extended, the prosecutor who subsequently verified the indictment expressed clearly his opinion also with regard the activity that constitutes the object of the current case, pre-constituting his opinion on circumstances and statements which represents as well the foundation of the charge for which the defendant was indicted. Therefore, the concrete modality in which the chief prosecutor of the territorial service involved himself in performing the criminal prosecution and in ordering procedural measures against the defendant justifies the retention of the reasonable suspicion that, at the verification of the indictment for the same defendant, his impartiality was affected. To this respect, the doubt or suspicion about the lack of impartiality, as element of subjective nature, covered a reasonable form since it was objectified in materially verifiable elements, having the nature to confirm the state of inadequacy in which the head of the prosecutor's office finds himself.

Thus, the conviction of the chief prosecutor of the territorial service about the criminal activity of the accused who guided and controlled in fact companies that he no longer had any stake and which, moreover, are estimated to be the instruments through which in this case the defendant committed the offense of bribery, materialized in acts and measures ordered in the case in which he acted as prosecutor of the case. Or, all these measures were based on the pre-constituted opinion of the chief prosecutor of the territorial service that the defendant carried out during 2000-2015 a comprehensive criminal and extremely dangerous activity, which include the facts for which he was indicted in this case.

In essence, the reasonable suspicion that the impartiality of the chief prosecutor of the territorial service was affected is supported both by the direct involvement and coordination in conducting the proceedings that deliberately targeted the defendant being indicted, as through the fact that, in reality, the prosecutor called to verify the legality and validity of the deed of intimation filed criminal charges against the defendant (in the opinion of article 6 paragraph 1 ECHR) due to the expansion of the prosecution and the criminal proceedings in the case in which he acted as prosecutor of the case, circumstance which is likely to infringe the procedural rights of the defendant and the fairness of the proceedings. Third, the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber wrongly considered that no procedural harm was produced, due to the verification of the indictment under the mentioned condition and that, anyway, if such harm would exist, it might be remedied directly before the judge or the court.

In our opinion, in the absence of the verification with impartially, the indictment drafted by the prosecutor's office of the National Anticorruption Directorate is in fact an indictment unconfirmed, that was not subject to an effective control of legality and validity, being unable to perform, in accordance with the article 328 paragraph (1) CPP the function of deed of intimation to be lodged with the court of law. The processual damage caused by the non-observance of the provisions governing the impartiality of the prosecutor [article 132 paragraph (1) of the Constitution, article 62 paragraph (2) of the Law no. 304 / 2004, article 65 paragraph (1) reported to article 64 paragraph (1) letter f) CPP] consists in depriving the defendant of internal, effectively control performance on the legality and validity of the deed of intimation. By the will of the law, the functionality of the deed of intimation to be lodged with the court of law (to determine the investiture and to set the limitations for the judgment) is subject to implicit confirmation (after verification) issued by a prosecutor hierarchically superior to the one who drafted and that thus materializes in conditions of impartiality, the principle of the hierarchic subordination governing the activity of the Public Ministry.

This internal control of the deed of intimation, even if it does not exclude the judicial review performed in the procedure of preliminary chamber cannot be exercised omisso medio, directly by the judge or the court as this is contrary to the requirements of the principle of separation of the judicial functions, provided for by article 3 CPP, and affects the independency in the functioning of the Public Ministry. The verification of the deed of intimation to be lodged with a court of law does not represent a formal requirement but it is a guarantee for ensuring the legality and validity of the prosecuting proceedings, being instituted as an essential prerequisite for the operation of the functional transfer of competence between different categories of judicial bodies. In fact, in the special procedures of the plea agreement as well, the compulsoriness of the internal control is materialized in the requirement for the endorsement - by the prosecutor hierarchically superior - of the agreement concluded by the prosecutor of the case, in accordance with the article 478 paragraph (2) CPP. Consequently, given the situation of incompatibility described above, we consider that for the proper application of article 22^1 paragraph (1) of the Emergency Government Ordinance no. 43 / 2002 in relation to article 328 paragraph (1) CPP, the verification of the indictment drafted in the current case should have been accomplished by the prosecutor hierarchically superior to the head of the prosecutor's office where the prosecutor who drafted the indictments was functioning, namely the prosecutor chief of section within the National Anticorruption Directorate - the central structure.

Perhaps the most common form taken in practice by the irregularity of the indictment is the one related to the incomplete or unclear description of facts, which prevents delimitation of the contribution of each defendant or the identification of all material acts, the impossibility to establish, in cases of offenses with alternative content, the modality incriminating the defendant[28]. In this regard we consider to be appropriate to present a solution in which, without justification, the commencement of the criminal trial was ordered in the conditions in which the indictment unequivocally presented such an irregularity[29].

Regarding this issue, the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber found that the indictment in the mentioned case has 387 pages, out of which 234 are dedicated to describing the actual state of affairs, with reference to the evidences from which the prosecutor considers that this state of affairs results, and appreciated that there is, in the indictment, a detailed description of the facts charged to the defendant, containing all circumstantial elements necessary for the identification of the accusations brought against the defendant. The judge sitting in the preliminary chamber took into consideration as well the fact that the defendant did not invoked the problem throughout the entire prosecution, although at the time of the initiation of the criminal proceedings the accusations were brought to his knowledge and the defendant, during the prosecution, gave the statement regarding the accusations.

In matters related to the insufficient description of the offense of traffic of influence in a repeated form, the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber invoked the case-law in accordance to which, in case of the objective impossibility to describe all the material acts of a continued offense, it is sufficient to indicate a period of time during which the material acts composing the offense were committed, if in this way it is possible to determine the object (scope) and limits of the judgment. It was also shown that the issues regarding the compliance of the elements of a continued offense, of a natural unity of crime or of a plurality of offenses are a matter of legal qualification of the fact, which cannot be questioned during the procedure of preliminary chamber. Similarly, the existence or the inexistence of the actions which the prosecution claim to constitute the material acts of the continued crime or if there are evidences proving their existence are matters regarding the merits of the case and not the regularity of the deed of intimation.

In our demurral, made against the resolution of the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber within the Court of Appeal Brasov, we show – in advance – that by invoking some problems related to the incomplete description of the material facts incriminating the defendant it was not aimed to provoke an anticipated evaluation of the evidences nor to attempt to discuss questions as to whether the allegations made against the defendant are valid. This is the reason why the issues related to the legal qualification given to the facts through the deed of intimation were not discussed, aspect that exceeds the processual framework of the preliminary chamber[30]. We invoke the fact that the deed of intimation is imprecise in terms of correspondence between legal qualification, as held by the prosecutor, and the facts described, which takes the form of an irregularity of the deed of intimation. This irregularity must be remedied in the preliminary chamber procedure - and not through a possible change of the legal qualification, submitted for the parties' discussion during the judicial inquiry, under the article 386CPP 386 - since it determines the impossibility to establish the object (scope) and the limitations (boundaries) of the judgment, affecting as well requirements related to the exercise of procedural rights guaranteed as fundamental principle. The description of the fact must not be confounded with the reproduction only of the constitutive content of the offense, as described in the criminality norm. The description of the offense within the indictment must consider all circumstances of place, time, means, mode, aim to which the offense was committed, with consequences on the constitutive elements of an offense and on its qualification in a specific criminality text. To meet the legal requirements for the establishment of the object of judgment it is necessary that the fact is presented in the indictment with all elements of criminal relevance, thus creating the possibility for the court to rule on that fact and for the defendant to defend himself efficiently[31].

Per article 371 CPP, the judgment is limited to the facts and persons shown in the deed of intimation. The deed of intimation is the indictment. Per article 328 paragraph (1) CPP, the indictment is limited to the fact and the person for whom the criminal investigation was conducted and contains factual data adduced against the accused and its legal qualification. Therefore, the indictment must contain a description in a reasonable manner of the facts incriminating the defendant. The judgment on the merits cannot take place unless the indictment describes in a clear, understandable and concise manner the facts which the defendant presumably has committed, so the court may understand from the beginning what are the charges being brought, may provide clarifications and explanations to the defendant in the early phase of trial under the article 374 paragraph (2) CPP and, at the same time, to be able to assess in terms of the article 100 paragraph (4) letters a) and b) CPP whether the claims made by the defendant to administer new evidence are justified (assessment that requires a full understanding of the subject of the evidences in relation to the facts indented to be proven).

Beyond the need for the court to precisely determine the procedural framework, a clear description of the facts is important for the defendant as well. He can effectively exercise his right to defence only if, as a priority, he understands the charges being brought, at least at the level of factual situation. Through the indictment no. 259 / P / 2015 from May 17, 2016, the defendant was indicted for the offense of trading in influence, "foreseen in article 291 paragraph (1) Criminal Code, with the application of article 35 paragraph (1) Criminal Code and article 5 Criminal Code". This offense was placed in the charge of the defendant as being committed in a continued form, during September 2006 - spring of 2013. As it can be seen, there is no indication whatsoever of the number of material actions that are part of this continued crime. The judge sitting in the preliminary chamber appreciated that the situation was determined by an objective impossibility to describe all the material actions, invoking practice to this respect.

In our opinion, this appreciation is wrong, because the deed of intimation lacks not the description of the material actions, but their very individualization in space and time. The indictment contains a state of facts covering a long period, subsequently qualified as traffic of influence in a repeated form. The reproach brought to the indictment consists in the circumstance that, while retaining the repeated form of the offense, it does not individualize the material actions falling within the content of the continued offense in relation to the facts described. Therefore, what we understand to submit to the analysis is not the status quo, but the circumstance that, although it refers to the continued form of the offense, this status quo was not shared by the prosecutor in any way, so that the defendant can understand primarily how many material actions (in terms of numbers) he is being accused from, what are they, when were they committed, each of them (at least the approximate time). In these conditions the defendant cannot build an effective defence because he cannot determine whether a factual circumstance that the Public Ministry encompasses within the described status quo is being charged to him as a distinct material action in relation to another circumstantiated fact. Moreover, this type of irregularity of the indictment is expressly indicated by the legal doctrine as likely to affect the establishment of the object of the judgment[32]. The jurisprudence invoked by the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber in the resolution being challenged is undoubtedly justified. It is difficult to ask the prosecutor, from obvious reasons related to the extent of the indictment, to describe each individual material action, especially if their number is high and the similarities between them are major. However, we consider that these cited judgments have no relation with the issue being addressed in the cause because, as noted above, it is not the description of the facts that is missing, but its individualization based on the different material actions. The description of these material actions was not possible because, in fact, they were not separately identified by the prosecutor (which is why their number was not listed), and they were appreciated as an overall factual situation.

Without the indication of the number of the material actions, of the elements relating to the time of occurrence of each of them (for which temporal coordinates are not indicated, but only the whole period of the continued offense, as legal unity), of the specific ways of committing the offenses (act committed or omitted, alternative or successive committed personally or through intercessor etc.), we appreciate that the object of the judgment cannot be legally established, as the acts of judicial inquiry can be made only regarding the issues completely defined. This incomplete way to describe the offense of traffic of influence affects as well the right of defence of the defendant guaranteed not only in the form but also in its exercise because he is being rendered unable to prove the unreal appearance of an argument if it is not individualized. Only in relation to a precise fact a real defence can be made, and one of the core tasks in the work of the prosecutor is to formulate clear, rigorous accusations "and not to create a puzzle that would eventually be settled by the defendants"[33].

We underline as well that the need for such additional indications is justified by the fact that, from the material point of view, the offence of traffic of influence involves demanding, receiving or accepting the promise of money or other benefits, and on the other hand, in accordance with article 35 paragraph (1) Criminal Cod, one of the conditions of the continued offence is that each action or inaction taken as material action has to present the content of the same abstract pattern of criminality. Or, if the material acts - to which the prosecutor refers implicitly when holding the continued form of the offense - are not individualized separately, the defence also cannot analyse the accomplishment in relation to each part of the condition foreseen in article 35 paragraph (1) Criminal Code. The continued offense represents a form of the legal unity of offense, through which criminal actions capable by themselves to achieve the content of the offense are joined by the will of the legislator in a single offense (because they are committed under the same criminal intention). The material actions entering the content of the continued offense, being themselves criminal actions, must be presented in the indictment with all the elements having criminal relevance under the content of the offense, whilst being necessary that the will of the prosecutor to manifest in the sense of the arraignment. If the material actions are not individualized it cannot be verified if each of them meets the standard of the norm of criminality, and the defendant cannot thus defend against the charge being brought to him. Finally, we show that the exercise of the two antagonistic procedural functions (accusation -defence) before the court of law is inextricably linked to the object of the judgment which is however unilaterally established by the accusation. Or, in this case, the object of the judgment cannot be established, the charge brought against the defendant being a formal one, unspecified from the material point of view, which sets the defendant unable to formulate an effective defence.

For the support of the denial of the requests for irregularity of the resolution, the judge sitting in the preliminary chamber argued using the fact that the defendant did not invoked, throughout the prosecution, the problem of the insufficient description of the facts he was held with, although at the time of the initiation of the criminal proceedings he was informed about the accusations and he gave a statement regarding the accusations during the criminal proceedings. In our opinion, this argument adds to the law. To invoke problems regarding the unlawful referral of the court is not subject to the procedural attitude of the defendant during the criminal investigation, since the law does not contain any indication to that effect. On the other hand, the initiation of the criminal proceedings by the prosecutor is not the procedural act setting the object and the limitations of the judgment. Therefore, it is irrelevant to determine whether the allegations are understood upon indictment. The object of the judgment is fixed through the indictment, which is the deed of intimation. So, based on this act, it is essential to determine if the action has been fully described.

In relation to the issues presented, the description in a reasonable manner of the facts being apprehended represents a prerequisite for the regularity of the deed of intimation, since the establishment of the object of judgment depends, in a determinate manner, on the clarity of presentation of the accusation, the court losing in the current processual system the capability to reconfigure the object of the judgment and thus complement the initial shortcomings of indictment. The importance of ensuring a regular notification of the court was still observed under the old regulation when, anyway, the court, under its active role expressly recognized[34], had at its disposal the appropriate procedural remedies to help during the proceedings to the extension or the abbreviation of the object of the judgment. In this sense, in the specialized literature it has been appreciated that the verification of the regularity of the deed of intimation has priority over the verification of the courts' competence, being possible to accomplish or provoke the remedy of the irregularities by a court of law that did not have jurisdiction to resolve the merits of the case in question[35].

4. Conclusions

The national regulation is undoubtedly deficient in terms of implementing the conventional standards established in the field of requirements that must be met by the main act in which the accusation formulated against a person in criminal proceedings is materialized. The absence of provisions that would develop the minimum requirements in relation to which the function of verification of the legality of the indictment is exercised was most of the time compensated by the courts.

Taking into consideration the functional relation between the subjects applying the procedural norms and the authorities establishing them, this circumstance do not remove the need to improve the regulatory framework in the domain.

A legislative intervention aimed at ensuring not only the guarantee of the rights of the participants in the trial and a fair trial as well as the effective exercise of the powers of the judicial bodies will help to strengthen the safeguards of a modern process system.

THEORETICAL AND CASE-LAW CONSIDERATIONS ON THE PROFESSIONAL NEGLIGENCE OF DOCTORS THAT COULD RESULT IN CRIMINAL, NOT ONLY CIVIL, LIABILITY

Adrian HĂRĂTĂU[*]

Abstract

In this study we aimed to analyze guilt, in the form of negligence, that is governed in Romanian criminal laws in Article 16 paragraph (4) of the Criminal Code, as follows:"An offence is perpetrated in negligence when the offender:a) foresees the outcome of his actions but does not accept it, deeming that it is unlikely for it to occur; b) does not foresee the outcome of his actions, although he should and could have."This form of guilt applies in the case of all incriminations stipulated in the criminal law perpetrated in a negligent manner, while keeping in mind that, in accordance with Article 16 paragraph (6) of the Criminal Code "an offence committed in negligence amounts to a criminal offence when expressly provided by law".

Keywords: guilt, negligence, criminal liability..

In a modern State, with a strongly developed economy and technology, a wide range of professions, jobs and other such activities useful for the society are undertaken, but which also pose a risk factor for some of the social values protected under the criminal law. That is why, the State steps in and, within the limits of a risk accepted by the society, regulates and lays down the legal frame appropriate for the performance of certain hazardous professions, jobs or other activities, in order to prevent consequences inconvenient for the society.

All these regulations specific in the performance of certain professions, jobs or other activities hazardous for the public, compels the practitioners of the above to conduct their professional activities with particular care, attention, to act in a prudent and diligent manner in fulfilling their professional obligations, in line with the legislative enactments governing the relevant activity.

Having regard to this reality of the hazard posed by the performance of certain professions, jobs or other similar activities, the Romanian criminal law maker incriminated the negligent perpetration of actions inconvenient for the society, as a result of the practitioners of such hazardous professions (jobs) failing to comply with the professional obligations originating from the governing legal frame. In that respect, as far as the Romanian criminal legislation is concerned, two incriminations are material, in particular: manslaughter [Article 192 paragraph (2) of the Criminal Code] and involuntary bodily injury [Article 196 paragraph (3) of the Criminal Code].

In both of the legal texts referred to above, the law maker provides more severe penalties for manslaughter and involuntary bodily injury, where the outcome results from "the failure to comply with the legal provisions or precautionary measures in exercising a profession or job, or for the performance of a certain activity".

Mention is to be made that, both in respect of manslaughter, and involuntary bodily injury committed by the practitioners of professions (jobs) hazardous for the society, harsher penalties are imposed than in the case of manslaughter or involuntary bodily injury perpetrated by other individuals.

The explanation for the difference in the criminal treatment, more severe in the case of the practitioners of jobs (professions) hazardous for the society, who commit manslaughter or involuntary bodily injury, as compared to other persons who commit the same offences, is simple, although, objectively speaking, the outcome is the same, more specifically death or bodily injury of another individual. Thus, there is a principle in place, according to which persons conducting activities that are hazardous for the members of the society have an obligation to act in a prudential, more careful manner and use their best endeavors in fulfilling their professional duties, so that to avoid the violation of the social values protected by the criminal law, because they are, by virtue of the nature of professional activities performed, a latent source of jeopardy for the members of collectivity.

For instance, a driver should follow with great responsibility the traffic rules on public roads and slow down when encountering crosswalks, so as not to cause traffic accidents resulting in human victims, because he is driving an automobile which, when not driven in accordance with the requirements stipulated by law, turns into a source of major jeopardy for traffic participants. On the other hand, a pedestrian who does not stop at the red traffic light, is not a source of jeopardy for traffic to the same degree as the imprudent driver who ignores the red traffic light, because the car he drives could cause irreversible consequences.

Conversely, the practitioners of hazardous jobs (professions) are trained in their field of activity by education, training or other specific forms of education, which means that they are well aware of the risks their activity poses to the public and of the need to conduct such job (profession) in strict compliance with the stipulations of legislative enactments and regulations governing their professional activity.

Precisely in light of these features (characteristics) of the practitioners of hazardous jobs (professions), in relation to the other members of society, the law maker deemed that their failure to fulfill their professional obligations, which led to the perpetration of offences set forth in the criminal law, should be subject to more severe punishment (for instance, simple manslaughter is penalized by 1 to 5 years imprisonment, while manslaughter further to the failure to observe legal obligations in exercising a profession, job or another activity, is penalized by 2 to 7 years imprisonment).

Given the existence of regulations set out in Articles 192 and 196 of the Criminal Code, concerning manslaughter and involuntary bodily injury resulting from the failure to comply with legal provisions of precautionary measures in exercising a profession or job or in performing a certain activity, criminal doctrine created, for such cases, the phrase of "professional negligence", as a variation of negligence.

Professional negligence occurs "when the agent fails to fulfill or inappropriately fulfills his legal or regulatory duties (the rules for exercising most professions are laid down in professional, technical and ethics regulations) by lack of prudence, care or attention to the given circumstances; he fails to foresee what an ordinary professional would have foreseen in similar conditions. The same applies to the person who fails to foresee, although he should and could foresee the outcome of an action, either by lack of knowledge which he should possess, or for lack of certain qualities, proficiency or skills"[1].

In the definition of professional negligence given above, we may identify all the ingredients necessary in defining a doctor's professional negligence.

Furthermore, the law maker himself has defined medical professional negligence (medical malpractice) in law no. 95/2006[2]. Thus, in accordance with Article 653 paragraph 1 letter B) "malpractice is the professional error perpetrated while performing a medical or medico-pharmaceutical act, which may generate damages for patients, involving the civil liability of medical personnel and of the provider of medical, healthcare and pharmaceutical products and services". The second paragraph of the same article stipulates that "medical personnel shall be held under civil liability for damages caused by error, which also included negligence, imprudence, or insufficient medical knowledge for exercising that profession, through individual acts during prevention, diagnosis or treatment procedures". In accordance with paragraph (3) of the same article, "medical personnel shall also be held under civil liability for damages deriving from the failure to comply with the regulations in this section in respect of confidentiality, informed consent and obligation to provide medical care": Paragraph (4) of the same article provides that "medical personnel shall additionally be held under civil liability for damages occurred during the performance of a profession when the limits of competence are exceeded, save for emergency cases, where medical personnel of required competence is not available". Finally, paragraph (5) of Article 653 sets forth that "civil liability regulated by law does not preclude criminal liability, if the offence having caused the damage is a criminal offence, under the law".

From the regulation of Article 653 in Law no. 95/2006, as a whole, the general conclusion may be drawn in the matter of interest herein, that a doctor's tort civil liability lays the basis for criminal liability for professional negligence.

It is well-known that, among all professions and occupations, the most special and peculiar is the profession of doctor, because, by the very nature of this profession, a doctor is working with people, saves lives, cures or alleviates patients' suffering. The cases where a doctor may found himself face to face with his commandments and the purposes his profession are so numerous, and in certain circumstances so full of unpredictable risks, that sometimes it is difficult to determine the requisite nexus between the medical act and the damage caused by it. The medical doctrine considered that the "regulations on the performance of the medical profession are still insufficient, as it is often necessary for the correlations between doctor and patient, between their mutual rights and obligations to be treated in the light of ethics principles"[3], but also Law no. 46/21 January 2003[4].

Thus: B.A. Sârbulescu, in Reflecţii cu privire la culpa profesională ca formă a vinovăţiei (II), in R.D.P., no. 3/195, p. 56, stating that: "the concept of professional negligence refers to a certain variety of negligence and occurs as a subjective element in certain categories of criminal offences, of a peculiar nature: criminal offences committed while performing or in relation to the performance of activities of a professional nature, which could entail jeopardy for the society". The perpetrator, B.A. Sârbulescu states in the cited paper p. 54-55, "is held under professional negligence whenever he knew the specific rules for performing an activity (and, implicitly, the requirements of diligence he should have foreseen) and acted lightly, not heeding them. Furthermore, a perpetrator will be held professional negligence when he acted in a reckless manner, not knowing such rules, although he should and could have known them". As concerns a doctor's professional negligence, definitions may be found in medical literature. As such: "failure to fulfill obligations pertaining to professional deontology, in the form of unpardonable severity, amounts to the doctor's professional negligence" (Ion Turcu, Dreptul sănătăţii. Frontul comun al medicului şi al juristului, Wolters Kluwer Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, p. 299); Malpractice is "the illicit action committed with guilt, which generated damages – committed while performing a medical or medical-pharmaceutical act and involving the civil liability of medical personnel and of the supplier of medical, healthcare and pharmaceutical products and services" (Gabriel Adrian Năsui, Malpraxisul medical. Particularităţile răspunderii civile medicale, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, p. 395); Cristian Stan, in the paper Malpraxisul medical, Etna Publishing House, Bucharest, 2009, p. 15, asserts that "malpractice is the professional error committed while performing a medical or medical-pharmaceutical act which caused the patient to incur damages, involving the civil liability of medical personnel and of the supplier of medical, healthcare and pharmaceutical products and services"; In another definition, medical malpractice is "a system of legal medical liability exclusively correlated to the field of legal liability" (Gheorghe Bălan, Diana Bulgaru Iliescu, Răspunderea juridică medicală în România, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2015, p. 55).

Precisely in consideration of the complexity attached to the medical act and the consequences it may entail, doctors conduct their professional activity which may entail negligent legal liability in a highly extensive legal frame.

Thus, performance of the medical profession takes place in a legislative area made up of: Law no. 95/2006 on health reform, republished; the By-Laws of the Doctors' College, Medical Ethics Code[5] and Law no. 46/2003 on the patients' rights.

In this sequence of legislative enactments governing the delivery of the medical profession, it may be noticed that the Medical Ethics Code is one of them. As already emphasized in medical literature, "medical profession required the recording of doctors' ethics obligations in ethics codes and setting up of professional organizations, colleges or ethics orders to foster principles of ethical conduct, to ensure that they are observed, and penalize departures from the rule"[6]. Insofar as the failure to comply with ethics regulations entails the perpetration of offences stipulated under the criminal law, the doctor will be held under criminal liability.

Through its increasing complexity, the "medical act requires increasingly wider knowledge and more advance specialization, and certain circumstances occur more and more frequently where the skills of a single individual (doctor, note added) is insufficient. Therefore, the need ensues to set up more or less cohesive, more or less structured teams, with an unexpected legal impact in determining the potential damages which may occur[7].

For professional negligence in general to exist, as deriving from the provisions of Article 192 paragraph (2) and Article 196 paragraph (3) of the Criminal Code, it follows that certain requirements need to be met. These conditions are:

a) the perpetrator is a professional, a handyman or an individual performing a certain activity;
b) an offence has been perpetrated during the performance of the profession, job or of a certain activity;
c) there shall be certain legal provisions, rules of conduct or prudential measures for the performance of the profession or job or of a certain activity;
d) the offence committed further to the failure to comply with legal provisions or prudential measures in the performance of a profession, job or of another activity regulated under the law shall amount to an offence stipulated by the criminal law;
e) the requisite nexus shall exist between the offence committed further to the failure to comply with legal provisions or prudential measures in the performance of a profession, job or of another activity and the criminal outcome.

In criminal court practice, there have been cases where the courts of law have held, in the doctor's charge, negligence subject to hardship and have sentenced him. Here is one of them:

By means of the indictment issued on 16 March 2009 by the Prosecutor's Office attached to Piteşti Local Court, the defendant G.C. was sent to trial, without being detailed, for having perpetrated the criminal offence of manslaughter, as provided in Article 178 paragraphs (1) and (2) of the old Criminal Code. The court noted that the defendant, being a gynecologist in the County Hospital of Argeş, failed to provide appropriate medical treatment to the person named C.I., which resulted in the latter's demise on 21 March 2006.

The evidentiary material existing in the case file revealed that the material element of the criminal offence of manslaughter materialized in actions attributable to the defendant: failure to comply with medical ethics rules, substantially consisting of having omitted to recommend certain para-clinical investigations/medical analyses in order to determine a full diagnosis, having omitted to determine such diagnosis in a timely manner and to prescribe an appropriate and full medical treatment, having omitted to have a gynecological therapeutic conduct able to preclude the complications which have led to the patient's demise.

The court noted that no routine medical investigations have been performed, generally applied to any patient admitted to a hospital section, or specific investigations, mandatory in case of threatening miscarriage, which could have shed a light on the etiology of this case and on the status of the conception outcome. The court decided that, between the immediate consequence (the patient's demise) and the defendant's inactions there is a direct cause-effect relationship, and the form of guilt is negligence while foreseeing the result or recklessness (the defendant foresaw that the diagnosis determined upon the patient's admission to the hospital meant that the fetus could have died at any time, but thought, without any ground, that this would not occur and did not conduct any para-clinical investigation, not even the customary one, which would have helped him determine the full diagnosis of intra-uterine death of fetus, with the consequence that he failed to apply an appropriate medical conduct)[8]. The arguments issued by the court for the doctor's negligence, in this case, comply with the general pattern laid down in the doctrine in respect of negligence while foreseeing the outcome, within the meaning that the "author deems that the outcome would not occur precisely based on certain objective circumstances, which, however, are misinterpreted. Therefore, it may be said that the ground does not miss, but proves to be insufficient"[9].

This case, as well as others contained in the criminal case-law, draws attention to the form of guilt noted by the court, in particular negligence while foreseeing the outcome, in the case of the defendant doctor.

Whereas, in the case of other professional negligence instances, there are no difficulties in the court holding negligence while foreseeing the outcome, in our opinion, in the case of professional negligence of a doctor, a more thorough investigation could lead to another conclusion. Thus, in our opinion, a doctor performing his profession, but who, while delivering a medical act, departs from the regulations governing his professional obligations, as it happens in the case at hand, the court may not rule on guilt in the form of negligence while foreseeing the outcome, but always as negligence in the form of recklessness.

In making this assertion, we do not mean to criticize the rulings of "negligence while foreseeing the outcome" issued by courts in everyday practice, because they rely on the criminal law and specialized doctrine, on the contrary, our aim is to also emphasize another potential approach to professional negligence, only for the specific case of a doctor who is the active subject of a criminal offence.

Thus, the active subject of the criminal offence foreseeing the socially hazardous outcome, as indicated in Article 16 paragraph (4) letter a) of the Criminal Code cannot be brought into debate in a doctor's case, as this contradicts the very idea of medicine and the doctor's existence rationale, since doctors dedicate their lives to saving the lives or ameliorating the health of their patients. Therefore, in our opinion, the consecrated idea that, in case of a doctor's professional negligence he foresees the socially hazardous outcome (for instance: the death of his patient as a result of his actions or omissions during diagnosis and treatment) considering, in an unjustified manner, that it would not occur, is untrue and misleading. It would be absurd to believe that any doctor, while fulfilling his professional obligations, foresees the death of his patients, but he "considers in his inner belief, in reliance upon objective circumstances, that this would not occur" and would not immediately act in the meaning of precluding the patient's death.

The doctor, as the one in the case described above, in light of his education and experience in his field of activity, upon the patient's admission to the hospital, did not have "ab initio", at any time during the performance of the medical act, such as it was performed, the representation of the fact that she would die because of him, however, this outcome did occur as a result of the fact that he acted in a negligent manner, after the patient was admitted to the hospital, in the medical conduct adopted in treating the patient in this case, and failed to do everything he was supposed to, in accordance with the best medical practices available to him. The patient's demise which occurred after her admission to the hospital, is, in our opinion, in terms of guilt, attributable to the doctor, in the form of simple negligence, recklessness. Because of cases of hospital doctors' recklessness related to the deaths of certain patients, there is a folks' saying that "one goes to the hospital alive and gets out dead".

In our opinion, the cases of professional negligence which have resulted in the death of bodily injury of patients are not cases particularly difficult to solve, from the medical perspective, but curable in light of medical science and which should lead to a positive outcome, in the patients' benefits, but which, precisely because of the doctors' recklessness in their approach to the diagnosis and treatment applied, have a tragic end.

In all this cases of medical malpractice with criminal implications, in our opinion, the doctors' negligence while foreseeing the outcome is excluded, as the form of guilt will always be that of simple negligence or recklessness.

According to the current regulation in matters of guilt, in respect of professional medical negligence, the trial should prove whether, although the socially hazardous outcome was foreseen, the doctor also had the strong belief that such an outcome would not occur. This is particularly important to be decided during the trial, because this is the only way of segregating, in an actual case, between negligence while foreseeing the outcome and indirect intention for the socially hazardous outcome to occur. Thus, if, in performing the medical act, the doctor estimates that a socially hazardous outcome could occur – for instance, the patient's death – and persists in that act, failing to take the measures required to preclude the outcome threatening the patient, and that outcome, more specifically the victim's death, occurs, the offence will be held in his charge as manslaughter in the form of guild consisting of indirect intention, excluding the negligence while foreseeing the outcome.

For instance, in observance of the contract between the doctor and the patient, the former undertakes to cure the latter by applying a certain treatment. In fulfilling his obligation, the doctor progressively applies the treatment, but after the first procedures applied, the patient's condition worsens, and then the doctor realizes that undesirable consequences occur, which, if left unattended and continued, would further impair the patients' health and he could no longer fulfill the obligation incumbent upon him. Therefore, any undesirable consequences that could occur need to be removed by the doctor, who has to step in and stop those procedures, changing the treatment. However, undesirable consequences which endanger the patients' life or health need to be prevented or removed precisely by a more diligent control held by the doctor in respect of the patients' health and the evolution of their illness.

The regulations in the matter of guilt, in Article 16 of the Criminal Code, set forth that in certain circumstances, negligence while foreseeing the outcome may be tangential with indirect intention, and in many cases which have come before the supreme court, it was decided that the form of guilt is not negligence while foreseeing the outcome and indirect intention. Given the many such cases, where some courts have ruled, in specific files, that the guilt was negligence while foreseeing the outcome, and the supreme court decided that indirect intention applied, the question may be asked: why did that happen? The answer is that, as already emphasized in the doctrine, "the phrase used by the Romanian criminal law maker in defining negligence while foreseeing the outcome – the offender foresees the outcome, but does not accept it, believing, in an unreasonable manner, that it will not occur, may create confusion"[10]. Court practice confirms this remark.

Other authors are more decided, deeming that, in principle, the law maker did not give a scientific regulation for the concept of guilt, a remark with which we agree. Besides, the doctrine claims that the "variants of intention, as well as of negligence, should be removed for good from criminal science, which, precisely because it is a science, is not allowed to use concepts so equivocal as that of «direct intention» and «negligence while foreseeing the outcome»"[11].

We opine that, in the case of criminal medical malpractice, the concept of negligence while foreseeing the outcome and of negligence while foreseeing the outcome converted into indirect intention does not apply in the exceptional case of doctors who, in light of the noble art they fulfill in the society, but also in observance of the contract concluded with the patient, have a sacred mission of saving human lives, not end them. If, however, as a result of professional negligence, damaging outcome occurs, such as the patients' death or bodily injury, this is solely and exclusively due to their negligence in performing a medical act.

The fact that medical liability as the doctor's civil liability for the prejudice caused while performing a medical act relies on the traditional idea of negligence (error)[12] and/or the concept of professional error brought forth by Law no. 95/2006 on health reform[13], could also amount to an argument and, as far as the doctor's criminal liability for professional negligence is concerned, consideration shall only be placed on negligence in the form of recklessness (error).

Negligence while not foreseeing the outcome (recklessness or mere negligence) is referred to in most unintentional criminal offences, as it also happens in the case of doctors' professional negligence. This variant of negligence contains two important items, setting it apart from negligence while foreseeing the outcome, in particular:

a) the doctor's obligation to foresee the socially hazardous outcome
b) the doctor's actual ability to foresee that outcome.

A doctor's obligation to foresee the outcome relates to an obligation of prudence or diligence imposed upon him in connection with the medical act he is about to perform, so that the act at issue does not entail a consequence able to prejudice a social value protected by the criminal law. The obligation of diligence or prudence incumbent upon the doctor may be contained in a legislative enactment governing the medical profession, in other laws, such as the patients' rights law, the doctors' ethics code, Government Emergency Ordinances or Orders of the Ministry of Health.

The doctor's ability to foresee that a socially hazardous outcome would occur as a result of the medical act or its omission shall be analyzed against the actual conditions in which the action took place (against the standard reference doctor), but also taking into account the subjective features of that doctor.

In court practice, it was decided that "in objective terms, upon determining the obligation to foresee the outcome, consideration shall be placed on the circumstances in which the offence was committed, so as to ascertain if anyone in the category of the offence had, at the time when it was committed, the ability to foresee the outcome. If, in light of the circumstances of the case, it is decided that the outcome could not have been foreseen, than the perpetrator would not have had the obligation to foresee it"[14].

In subjective terms (if the doctor could have foreseen the outcome), the court ought to determine the doctor's professionalism, experience and training in the field, wit, expedience in finding ad-hoc solutions or the physical fatigue existing at the time when the medical act was undertaken.

In a specific case, the court ruled that the surgeon, after having performed a C-section, forgot in the plaintiff's body a surgery equipment fragment operator which caused her harm. The court, in that case, ruled that the "doctor's omission of taking out a foreign item from the patient's body amounts to negligence" on his part[15].

In court practice, it was decided that "recklessness is the omission of doing what a slightly imprudent individual, under the guidance specific to a prudential conduct, would do or acting in a manner in which a prudential and diligent individual would not. Recklessness in medical practice comes in the form of haste, superficiality, undutiful performance of obligations. Recklessness may take the form of: inappropriate consultation case history; failure to perform a suitable clinical examination; failure to undertake routine para-clinical examinations"[16].

Medical negligence by failing to foresee the outcome was largely described and explained in medical literature. Thus, it was stated that "failure to foresee the outcome, the reasonable inability of foreseeing it, are a mere variant of professional negligence involving the frustration of a professional's average, normal ability to foresee the outcome, but also and the possibility to foresee it. On the contrary, the impossibility to foresee any outcome is equivalent to a fortuitous case, when faced with risks implicit to medicine, which are specifically referred to as unfortunate or tragic cases"[17].

Specialists in the medical field opine that "the need to foresee the outcome ought not to become excessive prudence, especially in the context of current medical practice, where the risks are sometime overwhelmingly present in medical practice"[18].

Given that risk is implicit in performance of the medical profession, and may sometimes entail unfavorable consequences, we deemed necessary to emphasize several theoretical considerations in connection with medical risk.

Risk is a future event. In common language, the term of risk is synonymous with "jeopardy, danger, unfortunate event, objective threat"[19].

Any medical procedure or surgery intervention performed for a diagnosis or therapeutic purpose poses a potential risk of accident totally unconnected with the primary pathology or with medical error, but whose severity could result in the patient's demise or infirmity[20].

In every therapeutic act, there may be severe and exceptional risks involved, or frequent risks[21].

Risk goes hand in hand with medical act. One may never know, in undertaking a medical act when, where and why risk occurs. That is why, medical doctrine underlined that "the difficulty in determining the existence of therapeutic risk which does not originate from medical negligence, requires careful consideration of each and every case by experts, so that to remove any suspicion related to the surgeon's lack of dexterity or inappropriate handling of the patient by the medical team in charge of his care"[22]. It was further emphasized that "any medical procedure cannot escape a certain element of risk, which could lead to unsuccessful cure or to side effects. Risk forms part of the medical procedure itself, in most medical interventions, the risk of unfavorable evolution occurs independent of the doctor's fault"[23].

Doctors always accept risk exclusively for the best interest of the patient. In their turn, patients also freely and strongly accept risk both for their interest, but also in order to cover the doctor's responsibility. In accordance with Article 6 of Law no. 46/2003 on patients' rights, "patient shall have the right to be informed on his state of health, on the medical interventions proposed, on the potential risks attached to each procedure, on the alternatives available for the procedures proposed, including on the failure to undergo treatment and comply with medical recommendations, but also on the diagnosis and forecast". In accordance with Article 13 of the above-mentioned law, patients shall also be entitled "to stop a medical intervention, undertaking liability in writing for their decision; the consequences deriving from refusing or from discontinuing medical acts shall be explained to the patient". Objectively speaking, the doctor and the patient accept the risk by solving a medical necessity. The doctor not undertaking the risk in a particular case could have unfavorable repercussions. Thus, this matter was detailed in medical literature, and attention was drawn to the fact that "failure to undertake the risk, because of the doctor's unjustified caution, limited skills or even indolence, becomes of form of negligence known under the name of refusal to intervene"[24].

10. We deemed necessary to also refer, herein, to a series of practical variants of medical negligence in general, also widely known by lawyers, which may result in civil or criminal liability, as the case may be, placed on the doctor. It is good to know that all these instances of negligence derive from the doctor's breach of professional obligations, such as:

- an obligation of diligence in the treatment applied to patients;
- an obligation of result in certain dentistry treatments;
- an obligation of correct diagnosis of the patient's suffering;
- an obligation of caution the patient on the risks involved in the treatment he is about to undergo;
- an obligation of permanent supervising the patient's evolution, following an applied treatment;
- an obligation of monitoring the patient.

These obligations listed as examples, in addition to many others, are set forth both by the enactments delineating the general legal frame in which medical profession is conducted, but also from Law no. 46/2003 on patients' rights.

In medical literature[25], from the perspective of the manners which could result in medical malpractice, a segregation was made between:

a) negligence by doing ("in agendo"), a case in which malpractice is committed by the doctor following his clumsiness, imprudence, lack of skill, lack of dexterity, indifference to the patient's needs; caution not justified by need, inappropriate use of working conditions or failure to work with particular care or prudence;
b) negligence by not doing ("in omitendo"), which takes place when the patient loses the chance to be cured or survive because of the doctor's failing to take necessary actions. Omission itself may manifest as the doctor's indifference, failure to take note or recklessness, and the doctor will be held liable if the requisite nexus is identified between his negligence and the damage incurred;
c) negligence "in eligendo", consists of the doctor choosing the wrong technical procedure, delegating certain obligations to an unsuitable person, or delegating his own obligations to someone else, in breach of the principle according to which "delegated obligations shall not be further delegated";
d) negligence "in vigilando", consists of the doctor infringing a duty of collegiality as regards the request and obligation to attend an inter-clinical examination, by failing to provide aid, by failing to inform on the patient's fate or by inappropriate supervision of subordinates.

The criterion against which negligence will be appraised is the customary – reasonable professional conduct of a doctor who, under the same working conditions, would not have committed the error.

To conclude, we want to emphasize that intense publicity of various cases of medical malpractice may incite an attitude of revolt and reproach from the public to the doctors who were in charge of patients who, because of their negligence, have died or suffered bodily injury. At the same time, excessive publicity of malpractice forces medical professionals to conduct their professional activity under the pressure of public eye, which could be prejudicial to the image of the medical profession.

Therefore, we have sought to combine here medical and criminal considerations and set out commented theory and court practice on doctors' criminal professional negligence, in order to better understand, from the legal perspective, the immense responsibility carried by doctors in performing medical acts, while having regard to the risks of this profession.

Medical criminal liability needs to be correctly understood by doctors, within the meaning that when they err and should not have, they will pay, but also by the families of those who suffered from professional medical negligence, because the process of curing a patient is a long road, sometimes full of unforeseen events and complications, along which the doctor endeavors to use all his art in the patient's favor, to save him, and not to end his life. If, however, this happens, this ought to be food for thought for medical professionals, who cannot take patients' lives easy and should use more wit, precision and diligence in performing a medical act.

The Consent of the Victim as Legal Defence in Cybercrime cases

Maxim DOBRINOIU[*]

Abstract

The rise of Cybercrimes provides with great concerns among users, industry, banking sector or public institutions in terms of how much secure their computer systems or computer data are. Both Ethical and Non-Ethical hacking came-up as viable solutions for any natural or legal person willing to perform its own security checks. Taking into consideration the nature of such security evaluation techniques, that in certain situations may be regarded as cybercrimes, there should be a proper understanding of the circumstances when the victim may grant permission to the attackers to perform specific tasks against its own systems or data, especially when these belongs to a public institution.

Keywords: cybercrime, Ethical Hacking, criminal law, consent, computer system, legal defence

1. Introduction

Considering the scary statistics about the real level of Cyber-related crimes and offences in the nowadays modern and technological society we live in, and the dark forecast provided by the Cybersecurity researchers, more and more individuals and organisations are keen on taking precautions and perform various tests and scans of their own computer systems in order to evaluate the risk of becoming a Cybercrime victim, with all known consequences: stolen virtual or real identity, stolen or damaged data, financial or even property loss, privacy disturbance, affected business or current activities, information leakage and so on.

To prevent this happening, both individuals and legal persons are in pursuit for the best solutions available on the market to assess their cyber vulnerabilities, ranging from simple AV protection to complex hacking-style techniques.

But, asking professionals from both Ethical and Non-Ethical hacking communities or IT security companies to perform such complex penetration tests or vulnerability scans means to accept your computer systems being hacked, personal of financial data being compromised (even temporarily), IT infrastructure being affected (for a while) or remotely controlled by others. In other words, there are some risks that the willing natural or legal person should take on when deciding to let a hacker or an external IT security specialist to perform hacking-style tasks on your systems.

Knowing that their hacking-type actions may be regarded as computer crimes, the Ethical Hackers or the IT security professionals are taking precautions and choose to conclude specific commercial/civil contracts with the clients, while seeking for a legal approval for their further activities against clients' computer systems or computer data.

This means that even if they technically commit a cyber-related crime (e.g. hacking, access to a computer system, data or system interference, data interception, data transfer or alteration), every such act may be considered per se as "authorized", "legal" or "with right", and thus they are exempted from being charged or prosecuted for committing a crime (according to the law).

While in the case of a natural person (individual) the situation is clear and a valid approval given represents the legal ground for the other party (the "attacker") to not be prosecuted, things are a little bit complicated in the case of a legal person, as it will be detailed below.

2. Doctrine views on Consent as Legal Defence

In the Romanian Criminal Code, the "consent of the victim" is regarded as a clause that justifies the commitment of a crime. The legal provision states that "it is justified the act described by the law when committed with the consent of the injured party, if the party could legally dispose of the affected or endangered social value"[1].

In the same time, the same provision states that "the consent of the injured person does not produce any legal result in case of crimes against life, as well as in the situations when the law itself excludes the justifiable effect".

Most of the authors agree that, with any occasion the law does not explicitly forbid, the owner or the holder of the social value (ex. computer system, computer data etc.) may accept any threat, risk, damage or prejudice to that value, considering that the act by which the value was endangered or affected in any way

* Associate Professor, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (email: office@e-crime.ro).

[1] Article 22 align. 1 of the Romanian Criminal Code is legal, authorized or with right (volenti et consentienti non fit injuria)[2].

In Cyberspace this justification clause operates only based on the following conditions:

The consent should be granted only by the owner or the legal holder of the further affected value. So, there is a need to prove the link between the consenter and the computer systems or the computer data that may be endangered by the hacking-type evaluation techniques.

Another condition is that the consent regards a value/good the consenter has a legal right to dispose of. This way, we may consider just a few situations when the consent is valid and justifies a possible cyber-related crime.

Things are more clear and simple when the person authorizing the hacking is the real owner of the affected value and has the legal ability to dispose of his own values (ex. computer system, computer data).

The scenario becomes more complicated when the values protected by the law belongs to the state – through the patrimony of a public institution/authority.

According to many authors, if the values targeted by the perpetrator's actions are bound to so-called collective rights (such as national security, state authority, public trust, public safety, family etc.), these values cannot be protected by the justifiable clause (legal defence) of consent.

While the owner of the goods can transfer to a third party the right to alter of affect in any way its own goods (including computer systems and data), the public institution – acting as the administrator of the state goods and interests - has certain limitations in what regards the capacity of disposal of those goods in such manner.

But the more important aspect of this analysis resides in the primary condition for the existence of consent, as an accepted legal defence: the existence of a crime. Unless a crime occurs, there is no need for a justification, chiefly not for a consent.

Based on an opinion[3] we should agree with, if the lack of consent is one of the main conditions for a certain activity to legally be considered a crime, therefore the existence of such a consent (whether is a permission, authorization, provision of a law or a contract) places the respective activity out of the criminal code provisions, due to the missing typicality requested by the principles of criminal law.

3. The legal characteristics of the Cyber-related crimes

The Cyber-related crimes have all got a specific condition: to be committed "without right". In this respect, it is worth mentioning that the Romanian legislator took over the Council of Europe Convention on Cybercrime's provisions and also considered that "without right" means: a) that the perpetrator has no authorization based on a law or a contract, b) even if an authorization exists, the perpetrator exceeds its limits, or c) the perpetrator has no permission – from the individual or legal person competent, according to the law, to grant it - to use, administer, control a computer system or to undergo any scientific research or to perform any other operation in a computer system.

As envisaged by the CoE Convention, the Romanian legislation also took into consideration the necessity to criminalize the intentional and unlawful behaviour of a person regarding a computer system or computer data.

Moreover, the CoE Convention, in its Explanatory Report, stated that the "without right" provision reflects the insight that the conduct itself may be legal or justified "not only in cases where classical legal defences are applicable, like consent, self-defence or necessity, but where other principles or interests lead to the exclusion of criminal liability"[4].

So, basically, the term "without right" is set forward to cover any other situation (scenario) where the hacking activity is not performed in the general framework of legal defences, excuses, justifications or undertaken based on a formal authorization, whether legislative, executive, administrative, contractual or consensual.

In other words, if the cyber-related activity is "with right", there should be no crime and no criminal liability for the eventual Ethical Hacker.

The "right" to perform any actions against computer systems or data relies on the ability of the person which either owns or just administers (control) the target system or data. And, while the owner has a commonly recognized and legal right to do whatever act against his goods and values, not the same regime may apply in case of a public institution, where the manager has the responsibility to preserve and to protect the safety of the goods and values he administers or possesses.

4. Conclusion

As revealed by the above analysis, in the Ethical Hacking scenarios (hacking with consent), there is a legal problem posed by the existence of an authorization for the performance of specific cyber-attacks and hacking techniques against computer systems and data, while these computer systems and data belongs to the state.

Considering the theory of the consent, as a legal defence mentioned by the Criminal Code, the authorization issued by the management of a public institution for cyber-attacks is a condition for not claiming the existence of any computer-related crime, but, in the mean time, the question remains to what extent the management of the respective public institution indeed has the right to issue such authorization for the performance of specific computer-related activities, by a third party, against the computer systems and data that are covered by a national interest.

[4] https://rm.coe.int/CoERMPublicCommonSearchServices/DisplayDCTMContent?documentId=09000016800cce5b – point 38

While there should be a right for the public institution manager to issue an authorization/permission for the performance of certain hacking-type activities in order to identify the vulnerabilities related to the state-owned computer systems and data he has a legal obligation to protect and secure, certain limits and restrictions may also be considered in this respect, as the protection of the state interests and values needs a broad approach, from both legal perspective and cyber-security concerns.

Therefore, a possible solution may be for the management of a public institution to allow only certain specific hacking techniques to be applied or used by the pen-testers. The kind of techniques that do not harm, interfere or affect in any way the good functioning of the systems or the confidentiality, integrity and availability of the data stored or processed by the target systems.

In this way, the need for cyber-security will meet the other legal aspects related to the right of disposition (of the public institution manager) and the permission to be granted to the IT security specialists to perform their tasks with the confidence that no crime is committed and no law is trespassed.

BEATING BANKS THROUGH KNOWLEDGE

Monica CALU[*]
Costel STANCIU[]

Abstract

In Romania, in the last decade, a significant number of solutions favorable to consumers with foreign currency denominated loans were obtained in courts against the banks or non-bank financial institutions. The judges noted the unfairness of the contractual terms inserted in the loans agreement and absolute nullity of these clauses. Also, in the context of the global economic and financial crisis triggered by the collapse of the banking system with the consequence of depreciation and/or sudden and high fluctuation of domestic currencies against the "safe-heaven currencies", the theory of unpredictability becomes a particularly important institution.

This paper deals with the concepts of „abusive clauses", „unfair commercial practices" and „providing untruthful information to consumers to influence their choices". It is also presenting a view of good faith and equity on the performance of contract and the "distribution of the risk" of the contract in the conditions of applying to the "unpredictability theory" in the context of terms of law doctrine and the relevant case law.

The objective of this study is to demonstrate that by applying the theory of unpredictability to the occurrence of currency risk associated with loans in foreign currency and by subjecting to examination by court to the clauses whereby the consumer must assume the risk given by the changing of the circumstances of the execution of the contract can be obtain by the consumer or a rebalancing of the understanding of the parties or the cancellation clause which significantly unbalanced the consumer's obligation to bear any risk.

1. Introduction

In the last ten years, Romanian courts had to face a large number of files in which the National Agency for the Protection of the Consumers and/or the consumers requested the lack of effects of the abusive clauses included in the agreements of bank credits entered into between consumers and professionals. Although for most of the times the courts established the presence of abusive clauses and admitted the complaints, other contracts of the same type belonging to the same professional continued to produce their effects. Moreover, that final solutions obtained in court did not stopped the professionals from concluding other contracts whose content include the clauses qualified by the court as abusive. Starting from this reality and in order to stop its continuation in the future, certain aspects on abusive clauses of the Law no 193/2000 were modified in 2010. Given that the problem of the over indebtedness of the consumers due to the contracts concluded before the economical and financial crisis starts, the existence of the abusive clauses in loan contracts is currently an important topic of public debate in Romania, as well as in other European States.

Although it is prohibited by law for professionals to insert abusive clauses in contracts (paragraph 3 of art.1 of Law 193/2000 regarding abusive clauses from the contracts concluded between professionals and consumers, republished), the Romanian credit contracts contains unfair terms which stipulates e.g.: risk commissions, account administration fees, unilateral increase in interest rates, modifiable fixed interest, variable interests which vary and increase only upward, even if they where connected to the ROBOR/ EURIBOR/ LIBOR indexes or variable interests calculated following an internal and non transparent bank indexes. Also we can meet clauses providing for the extension of mortgage in favor of the bank or terms excluding the consumer's right to undertake legal actions or to exercise a different legal remedy or the obligation of the consumer to give up to all legal actions in course and to any pretention when concluded a novation of contract in the case for the initial contract the consumer is having a dispute in front of the court.

1.1. The Romanian legislation regarding abusive clauses

The European Directive 1993/13/CEE, whose provisions were transposed into Romanian legislation by Law 193/2000, defines abusive clauses as being those contractual clauses which have not been negotiated directly with the consumer, and will be considered abusive if by themselves or together with other provisions generate disadvantage for the consumers and, in a manner contrary to good faith, a significant imbalance between the rights and obligations of the parties.

The abusive clauses from the contracts concluded between the professionals and the consumers are being enumerated by the Law 193/2000 and we can enumerate from it:

The trader's exclusive right to interpret the contractual clauses;

The trader's right to unilaterally alter the terms of the contract;

Provisions that limit or cancel the consumer's right to demand indemnifications in case the professional does not comply with his/her contractual obligations.

The consumer's obligation to obey some contract terms he never had the real possibility to know when signing the contract;

Provisions that restrict or cancel the client's right to denounce or to unilaterally cancel the contract, in cases when the professional either unilaterally changed the contractual clauses, or he/she did not fulfil his/her obligations or he/she imposed to the client clauses regarding payment of a fixed amount (in case of unilateral denunciation);

According to Law no. 193/2000, the provisions regarding the abusive clauses are applicable to those juridical reports that take place between consumers and traders. Art.1, paragraph 1 of this law, provides that any contract concluded between traders and consumers for the sale of goods or for providing services will include clear contractual clauses, in no uncertain terms, for their understanding not being necessary specialty knowledge.

These clauses are mentioned in contracts of adhesion and the consumers does not have the possibility to negotiate the terms of the contract with the bank. The biggest problem for the consumers is that the bank has the possibility to appreciate discretionarily when financial imbalance occurs in the market. The consequence is the modification of the contract terms without any real negotiation between the parties. Furthermore, if the consumers do not agree with these terms, the banks notify them to pay back in advance the money (ECJ, Kušionová v. SMART Capital a.s, 2014) within 30 days.

2. The Theory of unpredictability in Romanian Civil Code

During the execution of the contract, might appear certain circumstances which can make the execution of the contract excessively burdensome for the consumer. Sometimes, during their execution, contracts are exposed to certain events related to the economic conjuncture. Most often, they are related to currency fluctuations. An example represent the acceleration growth of the currency in which the loan was granted which leads to an increased monthly installments owned to the bank. We can mention the case of Swiss franc which in 2007 had a rate of 1.9 RON and in 2015, a rate of 4.6 RON.

In this case, should be applied the principle of unpredictability.

Art.1.271 New Civil Code, in paragraph 1 provides that "The parties are bound to fulfil their obligations even if their fulfilment has become more onerous, either due to the increase in the costs of fulfilling their own obligations or due to the decrease of the value of counter performance"

Art.1.271 paragraph 2 provides "However, if the contract execution has become excessively onerous due to an exceptional change in circumstances, which would render the binding of the debtor to fulfil the obligation evidently unjust, the court of law may order: a) the adaptation of the contract in order to equitably distribute between the parties the losses and benefits resulting from the change in circumstances; b) the termination of the contract at the moment and under the conditions established by it".

Art.1.271 paragraph 3 provides that "The provisions of para. 2 are applicable only if: a) the change in circumstances intervened after the conclusion of the contract; b) the change in circumstances as well as their extent were not and could not have been reasonably considered by the debtor at the moment of contract conclusion; c) the debtor did not undertake the risk of the change in circumstances and it could not have been reasonably considered that he had undertaken that risk; d) the debtor tried within reasonable term and in good faith to negotiate the reasonable and equitable adaptation of the contract."

The Romanian Civil Code of 1864 did not expressly regulate unpredictability, but doctrine and case-law accepted it as per art. 970 para.2 Civ. Code of 1864 (the current 1.272, paragraph 1 N.C.C.). Art. 970 paragraph 2 Civ. Code of 1864 provided that: "They (the agreements) bind not only for what is expressly contained in them, but for all consequences, what equity, custom or law endue the obligation with, according to its nature."

According to Art. 1170 from the New Civil Code, "the parties must act in good faith, at the negotiation and at the signing of the contract, and also during its execution. They cannot remove or limit this obligation" which means that the risk of the grown of currency of the loan has to be assumed properly, by both parties, the creditor and the debtor.

The modification of consequences is relevant only in exceptional cases. The principle according to which agreements lawfully concluded between the parties are legally binding is not absolute, sacrosanct. When occurred events have the capacity to fundamentally alter the balance of the contract, there results the exceptional situation which the theory of unpredictability refers to.

In the context of the global economic crisis triggered by the collapse of the banking system, the theory of unpredictability becomes a particularly important institution. These circumstances affected the execution of loans contracts. Major discrepancies appeared between the value of performance on the conclusion of the contract and the value of performance on the date of fulfilment of obligations. It became excessively onerous (in the case of the debtor). In other words, we will refer to the category of loan contracts in which, during their execution, an event that may produce a severe imbalance in value between the parties' performances is likely to occur. At the beginning of the financial crisis, the national currency depreciated against euro by up to 50% and more than doubled against Swiss franc, placing consumers with forex denominated loans in an extremely difficult position.

Good faith in contract execution was the most viable argument to justify the necessity of accepting the theory of unpredictability. In the case of unpredictability, the bad faith of the debtor in triggering the modification of circumstances cannot be considered. The lack of fault of the debtor is a fundamental condition, also considered in the regulation of the theory of unpredictability in the NCC.

Regarding the bank credit agreements, in judicial practice, the contract for personal loans by mortgages has a special legal nature, the debtor's obligation consisting mainly in repaying the loan within the time limits specified in the document. As regards payments due, the substantial change of the debtor's financial opportunities can give to the consumer the possibility to invoke the unpredictability, especially when initially the debtor has respected even partially his obligations. The abusive character of some contractual clauses determines according to the theory of unpredictability a significant imbalance between the parties to such contracts. The theory of unpredictability applies to long or open term contracts and sometimes to fixed term contracts. Even if the possibility that unpredictability may be invoked regarding other types of contracts is not excluded, it preponderantly applies to long-term contracts. The category of long-term contracts includes successive performance contracts and some contracts that are under suspensive conditions (legal, conventional, judicial).

Even that the Romanian Constitutional Court (CCR) decided through 62/ 7.02. 2017 that the conversion of loans in Swiss francs at historical rates is unconstitutional, basically the Romanian Constitutional Court in the motivation of the Decision confirms what we want to prove, namely, extract from the decision: 49 (...) "Adapting to the new conditions may be performed inclusive through the conversion of the payment of the monthly installments into Romanian national currency at an exchange rate established by the court related to the particular circumstances of the case in order to rebalance the obligations, an exchange ratio which can be those at the date of conclusion of the contract or at the date of occurrence of unpredictable event or at the value at the date of conversion."

So, if the court finds the intervene of unpredictability, it can balance the contract by converting the balance of the credit at the foreign exchange rate from the date of concluding the contract or at the date of the appearing of unpredictable event or to order recalculation the monthly installments in foreign exchange at a ratio determined by the court as in Civil Sentence 21.02.2017a 1920/2017 of District Court of 2nd Sector Bucharest.

In short, if unpredictability is proven, then the court may include in the decision, a solution to freeze the exchange rate at the time of occurrence the state of unpredictability.

The Decision 62/2017 also does not intervene in any way on the possibility of declaring as unfair the terms of the contract related to the assuming the entire currency risk, so that consumers will be able to choose between appealing to law 193/2000 and subsequently to obtain the freezing of the exchange rate at the date of conclusion of the contract or will request the balancing of the contract, due to occurrence of unpredictability.

Among the conditions listed above for finding unpredictability is reflected negative condition of not assuming the risk of exceptional change of circumstances by one of the parties to the contract.

Customizing to the situation of credit agreements in foreign currency, in the event that there is a clause aimed award-added risk over this negative condition can not be considered fulfilled.

Finally, the remaining unresolved issue is the delicate relationship between clauses related to risk theory unfair and unpredictability. Sketch primary indicates the prevalence of the idea that it would be necessary to invoke the unfairness of a term (of course this can be covered and indirectly - the judge is not bound to rule effectively on invalidity, but may ignore the impact of this clause if it considers abusive.

A compatibility between theory unpredictability and performance of contracts for credit is only possible if the indexation clause is regarded as unfair because it covers risks not contemplated at the time of contracting (possibly associated with the idea of lack of information on the risk of over-added.

The normal risk is defined as being: "predictable fluctuations of the value of performances by considering the nature of the contract and the original balance established by the parties." The initial situation represents the landmark to which the current situation is compared in order to establish the fundamental alteration of the contractual balance. 2. The non-existence of a clause to maintain the contract value – the premise for applying unpredictability under the conditions of art. 1.271 NCC A.

The contracting parties, by their agreement, may intervene with the purpose of rebalancing the contract by concluding an agreement to adapt it to the new conditions. Furthermore, they will be diligent in the sense that they will anticipate certain unpredictable events that may occur during the execution of the contract and even in the contract that regulates the legal relationship between them (the initial contract), to regulate certain clauses that are aimed at maintaining the contract value. In order to apply the theory of unpredictability, as it is regulated in art.1.271 para.2 and 3 of the NCC, it is necessary that the contract does not contain a clause whose aim is to maintain the contract value, a preventive unpredictability clause. If a clause to maintain the contract value existed (preventive unpredictability clause), then what would apply is the legal regime of that clause, by virtue of the principle of contractual freedom, and not the provisions of art.1.271 para. 2 and 3 of the NCC. It is preferable, of course, and even recommended that the parties, when they conclude a contract, be cautious and provide clauses for its maintenance. This is also recommended in practice, considering the exceptional nature and the limited scope of unpredictability, as the fulfilment of all the conditions for unpredictability is rarely possible. As a result, the parties may provide in the contract more flexible clauses with regard to the restrictive conditions of unpredictability regulated by art.1.271 of the NCC

In case of adhesion contracts – like the loan contracts – that comprise abusive clauses, the law authorizes certain control authorities to notify the court from the professional's domicile or headquarters and to request his/her obligation to change the contracts under developments, by removing the abusive clauses, as it is provided by art.12 of Law no.193/2000. These authorities are represented, according to art.8 of the law, by the National Authority for Consumers' Protection representatives, as well as by the authorized specialists of other public administration authorities, according to their competencies. Besides them, the consumers prejudiced through the respective contracts have the right to address to the court.

In this case of unpredictable event, the Civil Code points out, the court can order "the updating of the contract, to fairly distribute between the parties both the losses and benefits" or "the cessation of the contract." Both options can be ordered by court only if "the change in circumstances occurred after the contract was signed" and "was not and could not have been foreseen by the debtor," provided "the debtor did not take on the risk of changing circumstances" and if "the debtor tried, within a reasonable period and in good faith, to negotiate the reasonable and fair updating of the contract."

The court cannot change itself the clauses considered abusive from the contract, but it will be able to force the professional to change all adhesion contracts in development, when there is observed such a clause exists in the contract, as well as to eliminate the abusive clauses from the pre-formulated contracts which are meant for use in the professional activity, as it is provided by art.13 paragraph (1) of the law to which we refer to. In case the court observes that there are no abusive clauses in the contract, it will cancel the report issued by the official examiner according to the law.

According to the civil provisions, nobody can exercise any right with the purpose of being detrimental to or to prejudice another person excessively, unreasonably and contrary to good faith, without being penalized for reasons of abusive exercise of rights (art.15 Civil Code). In the juridical literature, it is considered that the penalty applied to the abusive clauses is the nullity of the contract included by it. Actually, the penalty of nullity is also based on the legal provisions comprised in art.1 paragraph 1 of Law no. 193/2000, according to which any contract must include clauses which are clear, in no uncertain terms and easy to understand for all parties. Actually, the nullity has as basis also incompliance with the basic condition for the validity of a contract regarding its cause which must be licit and moral, due to the fact that an abusive clause has as grounds bad faith at concluding the contract. Having in view the fact that through inserting an abusive clause, only a part of the professional's will is corrupted by the bad faith at concluding the contract, breaching the legal condition regarding the cause affects only a part of the contract, respectively the abusive clause. This partial nullity will demolish only one part of the contract concluded, respectively the clause considered as being abusive and the contract remains partially valid. In case the abusive clauses do not produce effects against the consumer client, then, with his/her agreement, the contract will continue to produce effects, if the contract can be continued following to eliminating the clauses under discussion. In case the contract cannot produce effects following to eliminating the abusive clauses, then the consumer has the right to pretend its cancellation, according to art. 7 of Law no. 193/2000, case when he/she is entitled to obtain indemnifications also, the professional's responsibility being a liability in tort. Both in practice and in the doctrine there are numerous discussions based on the penalty of the abusive clauses motivated by the reality that the law regarding these clauses does not refer to a juridical procedure through which to be removed the effects of the abusive clauses, as it is provided by other legislations, like the French or Quebec region legislations. The existence of the abusive clauses must be proved by the one who invokes it, respectively by the consumer / client, according to the civil provisions in force, through evidences provided by the Civil Procedure Code; Law no. 193/2000 does not comprise special provisions in the domain. The object of the evidence can be represented by any of the three conditions necessary to the existence of such a clause: lack of negotiation, lack of good faith, the presence of a significant imbalance.

3. Conclusions

Into the loan contract where there is a series of clauses that already breach the legal norms and a certain clauses have already been proven as unfair, they can be considered as being abusive clauses, not being able to be directly negotiated with the client and not being in his/her favor, as well as being contrary to good faith. It would be desired to be brought modifications to the actual Romanian law regarding the abusive clauses for clarifying these aspects that refer to the above mentioned juridical mechanism to remove the effects of these clauses.

The court cannot change itself the clauses considered abusive from the contract, but it will be able to force the professional to change all adhesion contracts in development, when there is observed such a clause exists in the contract, as well as to eliminate the abusive clauses from the pre-formulated contracts which are meant for use in the professional activity, as it is provided by art.13 paragraph (1) of the law 193/2000. In case the court observes that there are no abusive clauses in the contract, it will cancel the report issued by the official examiner according to the law.

These abusive clauses in loan agreements must be eliminated even in cases where the consumers have not denounced them yet. The economic imbalance between consumers and banks is obvious and the lack of predictability of consumers is seriously affected. In contracts of adhesion, the consumers have no option but to adhere to the contract, negotiation being impossible. So, we believe it is necessary to eliminate all the abusive clauses and ensure predictability of the contracts if we want to protect the consumers. To legislate the consumers' rights to be fully, correctly and accurately informed on the main characteristics of the products and services provided by the trading companies, which is attained through the elements of identification and characterization provided by law.

Although there is still a long way to go, Romanian consumers do not lose hope that their rights will be better protected through the harmonization of European Union legislation with national legislation and after the years of fights against the abuse of economic power the first step in defending their rights would be a better quality legislation.

The situation of Romanian consumers may not be unique in Europe and it seems the same pattern can be seen in most of situations: low level of consumers' financial literacy, lack of any responsibility from the banks in lending, weak reaction from the authorities, not only to the methods used by the banks, but also in regards to the involvement in public education. The situation has begun to change, painfully slow for those affected, although it still faces a very strong reaction from the banks. It is very important the things our organization warned about even since 2004-2005, such as over-indebtedness or irresponsible lending, are in the public discussion and there are small steps taken to improve the situation of those affected and to prevent such situations to appear in the future.

PRACTICAL ASPECTS REGARDING THE CLAIM FOR THE ANNULMENT OF THE RESOLUTIONS OF THE GENERAL MEETING OF SHAREHOLDERS, FROM A SUBSTANTIAL AND PROCEDURAL PERSPECTIVE

Roxana - Mihaela CATEA[*]

Abstract

The purpose of this paper is to provide a brief analysis of the legal framework regarding the procedural and substantial dispositions governing the claim for the annulment of the resolutions of the general meeting of shareholders. The main objective is to render a practical tool both to stakeholders and third parties who are interested in the legal means available for blocking the implementation of any measures which are contrary to the company's interest.
Further to the amendments brought through the New Civil Procedural Code, the claim for annulment of the resolutions of the general assembly must be analyzed from a procedural point of view, as well as from a substantial standpoint. The shareholders must be aware of the grounds for challenging a general assembly's resolution to properly safeguard their rights. One common issue which is invoked as grounds for annulment is the abuse of majority of the majority shareholder. However, the difficulty of alleging such a reason is left to practitioners. Therefore, its application, although not wide, is highly imaginative.

Keywords: joint stock company, limited liability company, majority shareholder, minority shareholder, grounds for annulment

1. Introduction

This study aims to support young practitioners in establishing preliminary guide marks by assessing the possibility to file a claim in annulment of company resolutions based on the dispositions of Law no. 31/1990.

Although recent doctrine is emphasized on the substantial grounds for the annulment of general assembly's resolutions, few studies focus on practical matters which the claimant or the defendant may encounter. Therefore, this study represents an introduction into the basic practical knowledge one must be aware of in its capacity as shareholder in a Romanian company or in its capacity as legal practitioner if attempting to suspend or annul the resolution of the general meeting of shareholders.

Its relevance and importance resides in the necessity for the shareholders and their legal representatives to be aware and actively assert their rights to oppose disagreeable resolutions. While there is unanimity in accepting that the common will of the shareholders represents the core of the company, in practice there are frequent situations in which there is substantial disagreement between the shareholders' points of view, frequently leading to adopting resolutions without considering the minority shareholder's input. Since these disagreements must be resolved prior to the company to continue conducting business, it is mandatory for the shareholders to effectively express their point of view in a manner in which the company's interests are protected through the independent filter of the court.

The utility of the below analysis lies in the fact that although it reviews general concepts, it is focused on the conclusions of recent case law, outlining specific issues which are not covered by legal provisions and their solution.

1.1. General considerations regarding the legal framework applicable for Romanian companies

- The functioning and operation of companies in Romania is regulated by the New Civil Code, which constitutes the common legal framework for both civil companies and companies destined for commercial activity.
- The New Civil Code which entered force in October 2011 establishes the general principles for Romanian companies which are not oriented for lucrative purposes, whereas the special norms comprised in Law no. 31/1990 regarding companies for commercial activity ("Law no. 31/1990") set out rules for companies aimed at creating profit, by conducting production activities, commerce activities or supply of services.
- Although Law no. 31/1990 does not contain a precise definition of the company for commercial activity, this concept has been delimitated from simple company through certain characteristics as described by legal scholars[1]:
- the company for commercial activity has legal personality and becomes a different legal subject apart from the simple company, established based on the New Civil Code, which is generally a company without legal personality and the company for commercial activities, which becomes a new subject of law, able by itself to enter commercial relations with other subjects of law,

- the company for commercial activity is fundamentally different from a civil company given the nature of its operations. While the company for commercial activity conducts production and commerce activities or supply of services aimed to obtain profit, the civil company carries out activities which are not aimed to obtain profit.
- as opposed to the civil company, which does not require special formalities for its incorporation, apart from those deriving out of the assets contributed as share capital or from special norms, the company for commercial activity must observe special rules dictated by Law no. 31/1990.

2. Legal nature of de general assembly of shareholders' resolution

The legal nature of the general assembly of shareholders' resolutions is somewhat controversial in Romanian doctrine. While some authors characterize the resolution as a agreement between the shareholders who aim to satisfy their own purpose, other believe have implied that the shareholders resolution represents a convergent manner of manifesting the their will. The most truthful opinion[2] outlines the sui generis character of the general assembly of shareholders' resolution. Therefore, the resolution of the general meeting of shareholders conveys the will of the shareholders aimed to fulfill both their purpose and the company's purpose.

3. Means for invoking the irregularities of the general assembly of shareholders' resolution

Law no. 31/1990 stipulates two different claims, based on the procedural standing of the party invoking the grounds.

As such, art. 132 of Law no. 31/1990 opens the way of the claim for the annulment of the resolution to shareholders, third parties having an interest, the company's directors and the company's censors, who can invoke absolute or relative grounds for nullity.

It is generally asserted in legal writings[3] that breaches of the dispositions of the Articles of association are sanctioned with relative nullity, since the clauses of the Articles of association aim to safeguard the shareholders' personal interest.

Law no. 31/1990 stipulates a special means of challenge for the company's creditors and for any other persons prejudiced by the resolutions of the shareholders adopted to the amendment of the company's constitutive act, Law no. 31/1990 stipulates two different claims, based on the procedural standing of the party invoking the grounds.

As such, art. 132 of Law no. 31/1990 opens the way of the claim for the annulment of the resolution to shareholders, third parties having an interest, the company's directors and the company's censors, who can invoke absolute or relative grounds for nullity.

It is generally asserted in legal writings[4] that breaches of the dispositions of the Articles of association are sanctioned with relative nullity, since the clauses of the Articles of association aim to safeguard the shareholders' personal interest.

Law no. 31/1990 stipulates a special means of challenge for the company's creditors and for any other persons prejudiced by the resolutions of the shareholders adopted to the amendment of the company's constitutive act, through the opposition governed by article 61. Shareholders are not entitled to file the opposition[5] since Law no 31/1990 expressly stipulate the special claim for the annulment of the resolutions for this category of claimants.

Generally, the purpose of such opposition is not to obtain the annulment of the resolution but to repair the prejudice produced by its adoption. Romanian courts[6] have established the distinction between the opposition and the claim for the annulment of the resolution of the general meeting of shareholders considering that the approval of the opposition freezes the effects of the resolution against the opponent, until the requested damages for repairing the prejudice produced by the resolution are repaired. It is only when the material prejudice is not repaired that the opposition may lead to the annulment of the resolution itself.

The opposition may be filed by means of a claim addressed before the trade registry where the company is registered. The trade registry shall then forward the opposition to the competent tribunal within the range of the company's registered office for judgment.

As per article 62 of Law no. 31/1990, the term for filling the opposition is of 30 days as of the date of publishing the resolution in the Romanian Official Gazette.

4. Conditions for filling the claim for the annulment of the general assembly of shareholder's resolutions. Legal procedural standing

In compliance with art. 132 of Law no. 31/1990, the persons entitled to file a claim for the annulment of the general assembly of shareholder's resolutions must fall under the following categories:

- the company's shareholders who participated at the adoption of the general assembly of shareholders' resolutions and who voted against the matters approved by the general assembly, if their objection has been included in the minutes of the general assembly,
- the company's shareholders who did not participate at the adoption of the general assembly of shareholders' resolutions,
- the company's directors, in order to prevent any prejudicial consequences for the company itself,
- the company's censors,
- any person justifying an interest for the annulment of the general assembly of shareholders' resolution.

Therefore, while the shareholders may invoke both absolute and relative nullity as grounds for the annulment of the resolution, other third parties who justify an interest may request the annulment only based on its absolute nullity[7]. As such, their claim shall not fall under any statute of limitation.

Also, as opposed to other categories of claimants, the shareholders do not have to prove their interest in requesting the nullity of the resolution since Law no. 31/1990 presumes that the interest directly derives from their capacity as shareholders and is an expression of the social character of the claim[8], which is aimed to support both the shareholders and the company.

Based on the above, Romanian courts[9] have interpreted that a shareholder who participated in the general assembly and expressed its intention to abstain from voting in favour or against the matters discussed on the agents of the meeting is not allowed to file the claim for the annulment of the resolution.

From the interpretation of art. 132 par. 5) of Law no. 31/1990, Romanian courts[10] have rightfully reached the conclusion that passive legal procedural standing in a claim for the annulment of a general assembly of shareholder's resolution can only be granted to the company itself, which shall be represented by its board of directors or its directorate.

5. The competent court and means of appealing the ruling of the first court

In compliance with art. 63 of Law no. 31/1990, the competence for filling the claim for the annulment of the resolution of the general meeting of shareholders is within the competence of the tribunal within the territorial range of the company's registered office.

The ruling issued by the tribunal is subject only to appeal which shall be judged by the higher court of appeal.

Once the ruling over the annulment of the resolution of the general meeting of shareholders is delivered, it shall be published in the Official Gazette. Starting from the date of publishing, the ruling shall be opposable to all the shareholders, per article 132 par. 10) of Law no. 31/1990.

6. Grounds for the annulment of the general assembly of shareholders' resolution

6.1. Legality vs Opportunity of the Resolution

Prior to an analysis of the grounds which certain shareholders and interested third parties must prove for the annulment of a general assembly of shareholders' resolution, it is relevant to mention that the court entrusted with such a claim may proceed to analyze exclusively arguments related to the legality of the resolution.

Therefore, as many courts[11] have decided, the opportunity for the adoption of a general shareholders' resolution is outside the scope and object of a claim aimed for the annulment of said resolution. As such, any reasons pertaining to the profitability of the shareholders' decision for the company or for the shareholders' themselves cannot be duly analyzed by the court. For example, the court vested with a claim in annulment of a resolution approving a credit agreement cannot decide that the conclusion of a credit agreement leads to the bankruptcy of the company. However, the court can dispose the annulment of the resolution approving the conclusion of a credit agreement, if the conditions disposed by Law no. 31/1990 for the adoption of said resolution are breached.

This solution is based on the fact that the cases when the court is allowed to intervene in the prerogatives reserved for the company's shareholders are expressly provided by law and thus, it would be inadmissible for the court to act as one of the company's organs in lack of any such provisions in this respect.

The general resolution of the meeting of shareholders is meant to express the general will of the company in deciding its future trajectory. Therefore, all resolutions are governed by the principle of majority, meaning that the will of shareholders must be formed through the shareholders' involvement and is mandatory for its shareholders. While the court cannot analyze and determine whether the measures adopted by the shareholders are appropriate for the company, the court is entitled to rule on the legality of the resolution or on its compliance with the Articles of association[12].

As pointed out in legal literature[13], the ground for the annulment of the resolution of the general meeting of shareholders may be either the absolute nullity, for breaching norms securing the public order and general interests or the relative nullity, for violating norms securing the personal interest of the company's shareholders, which are mostly related to the shareholders' will or capacity.

From this perspective, the claim in annulment cannot completely solve the problems encountered within the company which lead to disagreement among the shareholders. The court may only intervene insofar as to verify the legality of a resolution, in compliance with Law no. 31/1990 itself or in compliance to the law of the parties expressed through the company's Articles of association. Therefore, even though the resolution is annulled, the court cannot replace and supplement the shareholders' will for that particular operation or suggest its amendment so that both shareholders are accommodated with the result.

It is also relevant mentioning that Law no. 31/1990 prohibits the directors to file a claim for the annulment of a resolution when the object of the resolution is the revocation of said directors, as per article 132 par. 4).

6.2. Suspension of the resolution of the general meeting of shareholders

Law no. 31/1990 also grants the person requesting the annulment of the resolution of the general meeting of shareholders the right to ask the court to dispose the interim suspension of the resolution's execution, until the main trial for the annulment of the resolution is definitively resolved. The suspension may be granted pursuant to article 133 of Law no. 31/1990 and to article 997 of the New Romanian Procedural Code.

In order to obtain such a suspension, the claimant must prove the fulfillment of several conditions before the competent court. One of these conditions is the urgency for the court to dispose the suspension. Another condition is that the appearance of rightfulness belongs to the claimant. Also, the claimant must prove either that the suspension is necessary for conserving a right which would otherwise be prejudiced through the delay in obtaining the suspension, or for the prevention of a damage which could not otherwise be repaired or for the removal of any difficulties arisen with the enforcement.

For the court to dispose the interim suspension, the claimant may be asked to pay a bail, computed as a percentage established by the court.

6.3.Frequent grounds encountered in practice for filling the claim in annulment

6.3.1.Some cases of expressly stipulated grounds for invoking nullity, as mentioned under Law no. 31/1990

Law no. 31/1990 comprises a series of cases when the legislator believed it is important to specify the nullity sanction. Out of these expressly mentioned cases, some stand out through their frequency in practice, such as breaches of convocation formalities and breaches related to the length of the representation powers of a third party for a shareholder participating in a meeting.

A. Breaches of convocation formalities, sanctioned with absolute or relative nullity, as the case may be

Pursuant to article 117 of Law no. 31/1990, a summoning notice must comprise the date and time of the meeting, along with a detailed agenda of the items envisaged to be discussed. If the court is vested with analyzing the lack of observance of the convocation formalities for the adoption of a resolution by the shareholders and from the evidence administered by the parties, the court[14] concludes that the convocation formalities have been breached, it shall dispose its annulment.

This case covers any situations in which either a shareholder was not duly summoned for the general meeting or the agenda transmitted through the summoning notice lacked some or all of the points which were discussed during the meeting, thus making the it difficult for the shareholder's will to be duly formed. Any type of agenda comprising general items such as the economic situation of the company while the shareholders are voting the sale-purchase of shares represents a breach of legal dispositions and is sanctioned with the annulment of the resolution, as decided by the High Court of Cassation and Justice[15].

Another case when the court[16] considered the resolution of the general meeting of shareholders is null is when it acknowledged that the meeting has been convened at the registered office of one of the shareholders which conflicted with another shareholder.

However, the High Court of Cassation and Justice[17] deemed that if the reference date was missing from the summoning notice sent to the shareholders of a joint stock company, this circumstance does not trigger the nullity of the resolution if the claimant does not prove a specific damage deriving from the lack of the reference date.

If the summoning formalities have not been at all fulfilled or have been performed by persons who are not entitled to perform them at all, the applicable sanction is the absolute nullity of the adopted resolution, as confirmed by recent case law[18].

B. Shareholders were represented in the general assembly by members of the board of directors, by members of the directorate and of the supervision council or by the company's employees

Article 125 of Law no. 31/1990 stipulates a specific case when the resolution of the general meeting of shareholders is deemed null in case the shareholders were represented in the general assembly by members of the board of directors, by members of the directorate and of the supervision council or by company employees. Since the interest protected through art. 125 is a general one, the applicable sanction is the absolute nullity of a resolution adopted with its breach.

Although the company's shareholders are allowed to be represented at the general meeting, article no. 125 of Law no. 31/1990 establishes an interdiction for shareholders to be represented by the same company's members of the board of directors, of the directorate and of the supervision council or by its employees.

If Law no. 31/1990 would allow for shareholders to be represented by the directors or by employees, then there might be doubts whether the will of the company is duly born or whether it is impeded as a result of the involvement of other members functioning within the company, who may have contrary interests to the ones of the company.

Besides the claim in annulment of the resolution of the general meeting of shareholders where the latter breached the provisions of article 125, as outlined by the legal doctrine[19], the company and the other shareholders may file a claim requesting damages from for the repair of the prejudices caused because of such violations.

6.3.2. A case of indirect nullity, which is not expressly stipulated by Law no. 31/1990

6.3.2.1.Majority abuse, sanctioned with relative nullity

In case the company is formed by shareholders with different participations and who have different views regarding the politics of the company, it opens the gate for frequent misunderstandings related to the guidelines of the company. These disputes are manifested most actively in cases when the will of the company should be congruent, however it lacks common vision and consistency in the decision process. It is often the case that a shareholder owning a participation sufficient to grant him the possibility to determine the adoption of a certain decision without the support and approval of other shareholders with a significantly lower participation when the majority shareholder shall force passing the decision, irrespective of the other shareholders' point of view. In this case, there are no formal breaches of the law or of the Articles of association.

If this type of decision, although not contrary to the Articles of association or to the law, is contrary to the company's best interest while being supportive of the majority shareholders' interest, then we can consider that a majority abuse was committed.

Article 136^1 of Law no. 31/1990 expressly stipulates that shareholders must act in good faith and exercise their rights while observing the legitimate rights and interests of other fellow shareholders.

Legal scholars[20] have identified specific criteria for the identification of an abuse of majority participation, as folloews:

- exercising a shareholder right without the observance of law and of morality,
- exercising a shareholder right in bad faith,
- exercising a shareholder right by exceeding its limits,
- exercising a shareholder right without the observance of the social and economic purpose of its regulation.

Using a right abusively has been also regulated in the civil legislation, through article 15 of the New Civil Code, which states that no right may be exercised with the direct purpose of harming another person in an excessive and unreasonable manner, contrary to goof faith. Legal scholars[21] have determined that for an abuse of rights to be acknowledged as such, the right must be exercised in bad faith and must be inappropriately used, outside its normal limits.

Nonetheless, a shareholder's majority participation is not always a signal of an abuse of majority since its dominant position must be concretely manifested in a resolution regarding a specific operation. The accusation of having a dominant position should be interpreted in connection to a relevant issue and it is related to the shareholder's conduct in a given situation and not in general.

7. Effects of filling the claim for the annulment of the general assembly of shareholders' resolution

Once a claim for the annulment of the general assembly of shareholders' resolution is filed before a court of law and approved by the latter, certain effects derive out of this situation. The effects of the nullity are the same, regardless whether the nullity is absolute or relative.

Since the resolution is mandatory for the shareholders, once it is invalidated by the court, the shareholders must be restored to their position prior to adopting the resolution. With respect to the company's management, the latter is obliged not the enforce the resolution once it has been invalidated by the court. As regards the company itself, it shall abstain from enforcing the resolution. Also, any registrations before the trade registry based on the resolution shall be erased, as it was outlined by legal scholars[22].

However, as Romanian courts have established[23], trade registry mentions cannot be erased solely based on filling a claim for the annulment of the general assembly of shareholders' resolution.

Once the court definitively annuls a resolution of the general meeting of shareholders, any subsequent resolutions which are directly connected with the annulled resolution are therefore annulled. As shown in recent case law[24], if the subsequent resolutions are not connected with and are not the result of the annulled resolution, then the latter's nullity shall not affect them.

Given that the any valid resolutions are mandatory for the shareholders, irrespective if they have voted in favour or against them, once the court issues a final ruling for their annulment, there resolutions are no longer mandatory for the shareholders or for third parties.

Conclusions

While the main aspects for filling the claim in annulment of the resolution of the general meeting of shareholders may be stipulated by the legislator, in order to supplement these findings one must turn to case law, since Romanian courts have extensively interpreted the grounds for obtaining such an annulment.

Although the claim in annulment generally represents a means of protection for the minority shareholder who disagrees with the majority of shareholders, their protection within the legal dispositions should be increased de lege ferenda, since the court cannot supplement the will of the shareholders if the latter do not reach an agreement. In such case, the minority shareholder's rights are difficult to be asserted and so are the breaches perpetrated by the majority shareholders in their abuse of majority.

THE COMPOSITION – A REHABILITATION PROCEEDING

Corina Georgiana COSTEA*

Abstract

As a consequence of the onset of financial crisis at national level, the number of the companies facing financial difficulties has risen significantly. The financial difficulties have turned into insurmountable obstacles for many companies, which gradually became insolvent. Taking into account the necessity of a judicial instrument that ought to support the companies in financial difficulty, the Law no. 381/2009 regarding the composition and the ad-hoc mandate was adopted. Subsequently, by adopting the Law no. 85/2014 regarding pre-isolvency procedures and insolvency procedures, the Law no. 381/2009 was repealed. The composition, as suggested by its very name, aims to prevent the transformation of the state of financial difficulty into insolvency, by setting an arrangement between the debtor and its creditors whose claims sum up to three quarters of the general body of creditors. The main purpose of this paper is performing an analysis of this legal instrument, taking into account the amendaments operated by the Law no. 85/2014. This analysis aims to present the preventive composition's mechanism from an economic and legal point of view, as well as the measures regarding the identification, diagnosis and treatment of financial difficulties.

Keywords: composition, insolvency, rehabilitation, financial difficulties, debtor in financial difficulty.

Introduction

The composition is a contract whose objective is to safeguard the debtor, that aims its recovery based on a restructuring plan, while avoiding the onset of insolvency proceedings. The contracting parties are the debtor, on one side, and its creditors whose accepted and unchallenged claims sum up to 75% of the general body of creditors, on the other side. The legal nature of the composition is interesting in terms of the effects it produces also against the creditors that didn't vote in favor of the composition. Until the entry into force of Law no. 85/2014 regarding the pre-insolvency and insolncy proceedings[1], the composition was regulated by the Law no. 381/2009 regarding the composition and the ad-hoc mandate[2]. Subsequently, the Law no.381/2009 was repealed[3], a part of its' provisions being taken over by the new regulation. However, the Law no. 85/2014 covers other essential aspects, which are to be analysed in this paper. Although the legislator has provided this legal instrument, it has been observed that it is rarely applied. In most of the cases, the debtors don't adopt precautions measures on time, ending up in the inevitable situation of being subject to insolvency proceedings. An interesting aspect is that, unlike the previous regulation, the fundamental principles[4] listed in article 4 of Law no. 85/2014 are also applied to pre-insolvency proceedings, emphasizing the need of the debtor's safeguard and also his maintenance in the economic cycle. One can easily notice some similarities between the composition and the judicial reorganization proceeding, as well as many notable differences, which will be outlined throughout the paper. The composition procedure commences by filing an application at the competent court, and acquires the legal nature of a contract once it has been approved by the judge. In the current economic context, too few debtors seek this form of safeguarding, trying to search appropriate remedies when it's too late. Although the insolvency proceedings provide a recovery method, through the judicial reorganization proceeding, it wouldn't be optimal for a financially distressed company, but it would be optimal for an insolvent one. Considering the hypothesis in which debtors would recourse to the composition at the appropriate time, the number of applications regarding the insolvency proceedings commencement would certainly decrease. We consider that the correct diagnosis of the company is the factor that leads to the specific proceeding that should be applied. For this reason, a limitation between financially distressed companies and insolvent companies is crucial. This paper aims to approach the composition proceeding from the participants' perspective, as well as outlining the main differences brought into force by the new Law.

1. The Composition

According to the Law no. 85/2014[5], the composition is a contract signed by the financially distressed debtor, on one hand, and creditors that hold at least 75% of the value of accepted and unchallenged claims, on the other hand, approved by the syndic-judge, a contract in which the debtor proposes a rehabilitation and a repayment plan, that is ratified by the creditors who support the debtor's efforts of overcoming the financial difficulties faced. The composition is a pre-insolvency proceeding, which has a judicial nature and whose objective is to rehabilitate the financially distressed debtor through a recovery and a repayment plan. The financially distressed debtors to which the proceeding can be applied are illustrated in art. 3 from the Law no.85/2014, according to which the proceeding applies to proffesionals, that are defined by the Civil Code as those who exploit an enterprise. The enterprise exploitations is also defined by the Civil Code[6]. Thus, in the current regulation, pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings apply to natural and judicial persons who are recognised as proffesionals[7]. However, article 16 from the insolvency Law presents the debtors which cannot apply the proceeding. Unlike the previous regulation, the debtors excluded from applying the proceeding are also the ones who have applied it in the past, without fulfilling its purpose. Also as a novelty, the list of crimes committed by the debtor or by its shareholders/ limited partners or by the debtor's administrator, which prevent the proceeding's commencement has been wided[8]. From the legal definition of the preventive composition, we understand that the state of financial difficulty represents an admisibility requirement in order to initiate the proceeding. The financially distressed debtor is defined[9] by the Law no. 85/2014, as the debtor which, although executes or is able to execute its due obligations, has a low short term liquidity ratio and/or a high long term debt ratio, which may affect the contractual obligations fulfillment in relation to the resources generated by the operational activity or to the resources raised through the financial activity. The definition takes into account the liquidity and indebtedness ratio, which reflect the debtor's state of financial difficulty. These indicators are presented in the debtor's accounting documents. Furthermore, the state of financial difficulty may affect the contractual obligations fulfillment, or it may even threaten the operational activity's sustainability, through the risk it causes. Thus, the debtor may take into consideration the application of this legal instrument, by filing an application of preventive composition commencement, at the competent court. However, companies can be balance-sheet insolvent but still liquid enough to fulfill their obligations[10]. The ideal scenario would be the one in which the debtor has a trustful relationship with its creditors, so that they could be open to the possibility of sustaining the debtor's efforts to overcome the financial difficulties faced. The life of a company runs among creation, growth, development, state of financial difficulties and liquidation[11]. By preventing insolvency, the company's maturity could be prolonged, or in other words, its life. It is notable that the Law no. 85/2014 presents a different purpose in comparison with the previous regulation, by emphasizing the possibility of granting a chance of the debtor's rehabilitation, when it is possible. Furthermore, also as a novelty, the Law no. 85/2014 provides the fundamental pre-insolvency and insolvency principles, illustrated in article 4 of the Law. A part of these principles governing the proceedings reffer to pre-insolvency proceedings and outline the possibility of granting a chance to rehabilitation.

1.1. The Initiation Of The Proceeding

The preventive composition proceeding is initiated by filing an application to the court, within whose jurisdiction the debtor is registered. The right to request this proceeding's initiation belongs exclusively to the debtor. We believe that this is a matter of course, given that by fulfilling the due obligations, the creditors have no interest in filing an application themselves. Furthermore, the debtor is the most entitled to analyse its economic and financial state, and to establish the source of the difficulties faced. The application filed by the debtor will be judged in the council room, and the parties will be subpoenaed within 48 hours after the application[12].

The sentences ruled by the syndic-judge are executory and can be apealed, within 7 days from pronouncement or communication. According to article 8 from the Law no. 85/2014, the appeal doesn't suspend the execution of the sentence. Through the application filed, the debtor will propose the appointment of a provisional conciliator, among the authorised practitioners in insolvency. By admitting the application filed, the sydic-judge will confirm the conciliator appointed by the debtor. Once the conciliator is confirmed, he and the debtor have 30 days to elaborate the list of creditors and the composition proposal. A very interesting aspect is found in Regulaion (EU) 2015/848[13], point (17), which provides that its scope should extend to proceedings which are triggered by situations in which the debtor faces non-financial difficulties, provided that such difficulties give rise to a real and serious threat to the debtor's actual or future ability to pay its debts as they fall due. By adopting the mentioned Regulation, the european vision has reformed the concept of insolvency. Other difficulties faced by the debtor[14], that could generate the risk of financial distress instalation, are taken into account.

Regarding the current activity of the debtor, as a result of preventive composition commencement, it is narrowed to the usual limits of the business, according to article 33 paragraph (1) of the Law no. 85/2014. This legal text is relevant because it narrows the debtor in taking risks that are not compatible with its current activity and that could have effects over the claims held by creditors. Furthermore, the same legal text provides for doing business under the supervision of the conciliator, so, if we consider the legal definition[15] of supervision, the current activity will be conducted with the prior approval of the measures involving the debtor's assets and of the measures regarding to conduct to its rehabilitation. The creditors' interests are therefore protected, through the conciliator's supervision, offering them the trust of the assets' correct administration, with the final purpose of the debtor's rehabilitation.

1.2. The Composition Proposal

The composition proposal will include the rehabilitation plan, with the attached declaration of the debtor's financial distress declaration, as well as the list of known creditors, indicating the amount and the preference causes. The composition proposal is the proceeding document under which the debtor may petition the syndic-judge to order a provisional stay of individual enforcement actions. According to article 25 of the Law no. 85/2014, the petition will be performed in virtue of the Code of Civil Procedure. Regarding the list of creditors, the good-faith debtor will have to indicate all of the creditors, in order for their claims to be inscribed in the list. If a creditor obtains an eforcement title against the debtor, during the preventive composition, there are two possibilities. The first is to file an application to join the preventive composition, and the second is to satisfy his claim through any other methods provided by the law[16]. From these statutory provisions, we conclude that a creditor who obtains an enforcement title against the debtor during the preventive composition can satisfy his claim in virtue of the common law, since the composition's effect regarding the stay of enforcement titles are only applied to the creditors who are parties in the preventive composition. The effect of the stay of enforcement titles, as a consequence of the composition's approval by the syndic-judge, operates only for the creditors that are parties in the proceeding. The only effect that is applied to any creditor is the one which blocks the commencement of insolvency proceedings. Unlike the insolvency proceedings, which do not allow the suspension of judicial actions against codebtors and guarantees[17], the effects of the preventive composition are extended also to them, according to article 33 paragraph (2) from the Law no. 85/2014. Furthermore, not only the effect of the preventive composition regarding the stay of enforcement titles are extended to the codebtors and guarantees, but also measures such as claim modifications. This is what differenciates the pre-insolvency and the insolvency proceedings, through the effects they produce. The preventive composition proposal will be transmitted to the creditors whose claims are registered in the creditor's list, so they can express their vote. Unlike the previous regulation of the preventive composition, who provided a majority of two thirds of accepted and unchallenged claims so that the composition would be considered accepted, the current regulation provides a majority of three quarters of the accepted and unchallenged claims. Also, one can observe the fact that in the preventive composition's case, there are no provisions regarding categories of creditors. They gain a vote by reporting their claim to the total body of creditors.

1.2.1. The Rehabilitation Plan

The rehabilitation plan is the proceeding document in which the debtor and the conciliator propose rehabilitation measures for the debtor's business. The rehabilitation plan must present in detail[18]:

1. the analytical situation of the assets and liabilities, certified by an accoutant or audited by an authorised auditor;
2. the causes of the financial distress and, if it's the case, the measures applied by the debtor in order to overcome the financial difficulties it's facing, until filing the preventive composition proposal;
3. the projection of the accounting and financial evolution over the next 24 months. One can observe that the rehabilitation plan must expose in detail the financial situation of the debtor, and the reasoning behind these dispositions results from the fact that the financial distress is the condition for the admissibility of the proceeding's initiation. If the evaluation of the debtor's financial situation concludes in insolvency, an application of the preventive composition's initiation will be rejected by the Court. The debtor will also present the financial distress causes, since it knows its activity best, and is the most entitled to identify them. Nevertheless, , there are situations in which the financial difficulties can't be identified by analysing the financial situation. The projection of accounting and financial evolution is extended to the whole duration of the preventive composition, respectively

24 months, and it represents the financial perspectives that are to be applied in order to repay the creditors' claims. In addition to these requirements, the law stipulates that the rehabilitation plan would have to include an arrangement proposal and measures that aim the debtor's recovery as well as the repayment of the claims. The plan must be adapted to each business, and should include measures such as partial liquidation, division, fusion, refinancing or any other measures seeking the debtor's rehabilitation. The condition imposed by the law regarding the composition's conduction is the repayment of at least 20% of the creditor's claims. It is easily noticeable that the preventive composition is very flexible and could really have a positive impact if financially distressed debtors would appeal to it in due time. The content of the rehabilitation plan is very similar to the recovery plan provided by the judicial reorganization proceeding[19]. Through this document, the debtor names a conciliator, as well as his emolument for the following period. If the syndic-judge admits the application of preventive composition filed by the debtor, through the same decision the conciliator will also be confirmed, as well as his provisional emolument. Taking into account that the conciliator's emolument involves an additional expense, which will be repaid by the debtor, it is natural that it will be negociated with the creditors and subsequently confirmed by the syndic-judge. Corporate financial distress and bankruptcy affect a firm s operations in cases where it is not cheap, quick and painless as presumed by neoclassical theory, but rather costly and dissipative.

By standard, costs of financial distress are distinguished between direct and indirect costs[20]. If the debtor is financed during the preventive composition, the law provides the repayment with priority at distributions, but only after the proceeding expenses repayment. The maximum duration of the negotiations with creditors is 60 days. Regarding the rehabilitation's plan modification, the law provides that amendments can be brought, as a result of negotiations between the debtor and creditors. The creditor's vote upon the rehabilitation plan will be expressed by correspondence, in accordance to the principles of pre-insolvency and insolvency proceedings.

1.3. The Effects Of The Preventive Composition's Approval

As a result of the preventive composition's approval by the creditors, the conciliator will file an application of ratification to the syndic-judge, who will verify if the admissibility conditions are simultaneously fulfilled : (i) the value of the challenged and/or disputed claims doesn't exceed 25% of the general body of creditors and (ii) the preventive composition has been approved by the creditors holding at least 75% of accepted and unchallenged claims of the general body of creditors.

The composition proceeding is similar to the insolvency proceedings in which the debtor retains its administration rights. The concordat proceeding doesn't imply the loss of administration rights ; however, the debtor will manage the business under the conciliator's supervision. Before ratifying the composition, the syndic-judge will subpoena and hear the conciliator. The application shall be rejected only for illegitime reasons regarding the admissibility conditions. The main advantages of the composition are the stay of individual enforcement actions and the rehabilitation plan that imposes a more efficient management process. In the hypothesis in which the enforcement actions concernes the debtor's assets which are essential for the continuity of the business, the composition is the optimal safeguard proceeding, even more if the debtor is still liquid enough. In the lack of such a proceeding would lead to financially distressed debtors finding themselves in insolvency proceedings and ending up in liquidation and even bankruptcy. However, unlike the insolvency proceeding, in which the suspension of accumulation of interests and other accesory claims, born after the proceeding's initiation, operates ope legis, in the case of the composition, the creditors' expess consent in writing is requested. The suspension of interest accumulation can be requested by the conciliator and approved by the syndic-judge, but only under the condition of offering guarantees to the creditors. Another effect of the composition's approval is blocking the initiation of insolvency proceedings. The composition's ratification doesn't block the liquidation proceeding, because this ca be provided as a measure of business rehabilitation. For example, if one of the debtor's assets isn't productive or brings losses to the business, it can be sold through liquidation, or it may also be repaired or rented. Partial liquidation can be a solution for some debtors, depending on the value and nature of the assets.

1.4. The General Body Of Creditors

The creditors holding claims against the financially distressed debtor will be registered to the list of creditors, which will be attached to the rehabilitation plan, as well as the declaration regarding the state of financial difficulty. The debtor will also mention the amount and the preference causes of each claim. Creditors are given some atributions in the proceeding, after registering their claim in the list of creditors. These atributions are provided by the law, and they impose the active participation to the proceeding. The general body of creditors will be summoned only in the following conditions : either by the judge, either at the conciliator's request, or at the request of the creditors' holding at least 10% of the general body of creditors. The general body of creditors' session will be organised and held by the conciliator, according to the law. Any decision adopted in the session will be considered accepted if voted by the majority, by reference to the value of the present creditors' claims. The creditors express their vote by corespondence, which means that not transmissing the vote in due time quals to the disqualification of the vote over that matter. If the general body of creditors is summoned in a meeting, the debtor shall also be invited. The opportunity of every operation and measure included in the rehabilitation plan is subject to approval by creditors' vote.

1.4.1. The Accession To The Preventive Composition

The legislator took into account the situation of the creditors who obtain an enforcement title agains the debtor, during the composition proceeding. In these situations, the creditors have two options, either the accession to the preventive composition, either the realisation of the claim through other methods provided by the law. If they would chose the second option, the preventive composition would be jeopardised. The accession to the preventive composition will be filed for approval by the creditor who obtained an enforcement title during the composition, and adressed to the conciliator. This claim will be registered in the list of creditors. The condition of the preventive composition's continuity is repaying at least 20% of the total value of claims, and therefore it is recommended to carry negotiations even with creditors who could obtain an enforcement title. The composition is the optimal solution for debtors having a trust-based relationship with its creditors, who also support the efforts of overcoming financial difficulties.

1.5. The Preventive Composition's Closure

The closure of preventive composition proceeding care be realised either by the ascertainment of its success, or by its failure. Exceptionally, the preventive composition could be cancelled, by the creditors who voted against it, or even at the general body of creditors' request, in cases when the debtor has seriously violated its assumed obligations. Regarding the cancellation, the law doesn't specify express grounds of relative or absolute nullity, but the doctrine[21] has offered opinions regarding this matter. Thus, relative or absolute nullily reasons can be considered the violation of the legal provisions regarding the vote and those regarding the percentage of claims based upon which the composition is approved.

1.5.1. The Preventive Composition's Closure By The Ascertainment Of Its Failure

The law provides[22] the conciliator's possibility to file an application of the composition's closure. The reasons may consist in economic and social factors. If the application filed by the conciliator is approved, the claims' modifications provided by the rehabilitation plan will no longer be maintained.

1.5.2. The Preventive Composition's Closure By The Ascertainment Of Its Success

The law provides that only in this case, the modification of claims will be maintained. These provisions also apply to codebtors and guarantees. The success of the preventive composition will be confirmed by the syndic-judge.

1.5.3. The Composition's Closure By Cancelling It Or Confirming Its Nullity

The composition's cancellation can be requested by the creditors who voted against it. The maximum period in which this action can be exercised is 15 days from the syndic-judge's ratification. Regarding the ascertainment of the composition's nullity, the right to exercise the action is prescribed within 6 months on the composition's ratification.

1.5.4. The Composition's Closure Through Rescission Action

The composition proceeding could also end up in closure as a result of an approved rescission action, with the consequence of putting the parties in the previous situation. The persons who are able to file a rescission action are the creditors, and the underlying reasons are represented by the debtor's serious violation of the obligations assumed through the composition. The law exemplifies situations such as favoring one or more creditors, concealment or disposal of assets during the proceeding, or payments without consideration.

Conclusions

The preventive composition is one of the few safeguard proceedings, and therefore a distinction between financial distress and insolvency is imposed, in order to chose the right proceeding. Even if a preventive composition fails, with the consequence of insolvency proceeding initiation, the debtor could subsequently benefit from the judicial reorganization proceeding, if it fulfills the conditions imposed by the law, increasing its chances of recovery. We consider that the application of pre-insolvency proceedings in due time and at a higher rate wold have macroeconomic benefits, by sustaining the debtor's efforts to overcome the financial difficulty and to efficiently rehabilitate its business. In comparison to the insolvency proceedings, in any of its forms, the appliance of the preventive composition offers the necessary flexibility to an efficient recovery. Therefore, the debtor has the chance of avoiding the highest risk it's facing, namely the deregistration of the debtor from the registers in which it's registered.

THE LEGAL REGIME OF THE MORTGAGE OVER THE SHARES AND SOCIAL PARTS IN THE CURRENT BUSINESS ENVIRONMENT

Florin CONSTANTINESCU*

Abstract

The present study aims to scrutinize the main legal traits of the mortgage over the shares (from a joint-stock company) and social parts (from a limited liability company) with focus on the modalities of establishment, the publicity, the real benefits for lender, the special situations related to the foreclosure process.
Also, one of the envisaged objective is to critically analyze the last amendments brought to the Romanian specific legislation and to submit proposals for amelioration aiming to better serve the business needs, on one hand, and to strengthen the legal security on the other hand.

Keywords: Shares, Social Parts, Security Agreement, Joint-Stock Companies, Limited Liability Companies

1. Introduction

1.1. Which is the area/domain covered by the theme of the present study?

The main objective of the present study is to present the legal regime of the movable mortgage over the shares (belonging to the joint-stock company) and social parts (related to the limited liability company) and to critically assess the important legal traits, the modalities of setting-up, the significant clauses contained by the security agreements, the benefits for the contracting parties, the contrastive analysis of the current legal framework and the foregoing legal framework, the corporate decision-making process regarding the approval by the shareholders of such guaranties, the publicity of the security agreements and some relevant situations deriving from the foreclosure operations.

The mortgage over the shares and social parts are currently used by the Romanian credit institutions to secure the repayment obligation towards a creditor.

In general terms, the movable mortgage is an institution specific to the civil law; prior to the entering into force of the new Civil Code (01.10.2011), the settlement of such guaranties was governed by the former VI th Title from the Law no. 99/1999 on some measures for the acceleration of the economic reform that was a special law in comparison with the former Civil Code that represented the general law; furthermore, the special law had priority - in terms of its application - towards the general law. So, the first covered area is the civil law.

Bearing in mind that the guaranties are set over the shares and social parts that are linked to the trade professionals (joint-stock companies and limited liability companies) the second covered area is the commercial law.

It is important to be highlighted that pursuant to the current doctrine, the commercial law represents a deriving domain of the civil law. In other words, there is no contradiction between the two legal areas (the civil law and the commercial law)[1].

1.2. Why is the studied matter important?

The importance of the study mainly consists in:

a) making a global analysis of the legal regime of the mortgage over the shares and social parts with focus on practical issues;
b) augmenting the importance and the efficacy of such guaranties both in lending operations performed by the credit institutions and ordinary borrowing operations (which are not performed by the credit institutions, as defined by the law but they are performed by other companies);
c) the proposals to amend the legislation in force.

The pursued objectives of the study are:

a) to fortify the legal regime of such guaranties with the scope to be used on a higher scale in the current activity;
b) to point out the effective benefits versus disadvantages;
c) to highlight the way the corporative will is form aiming to establish such guaranties and the potential sanctions.

1.3. How does the author intend to answer to this matter?

The main modalities that will be used to furnish the needed answers are:

a) the contrastive legal analysis of the relevant former legislation and also the analysis of the current legislation;
b) the research of the relevant practice in the field;
c) the investigation of the relevant doctrine.

The research will be made through using mainly the comparative method, the historical-teleological method and the logical method.

1.4. What is the relation between the paper and the already existent specialized literature?

The existing doctrine has not extensively and specifically analyzed the following aspects:

a) the main clauses recommended to be inserted within the security agreements;
b) the corporate approvals regarding the establishment of the mortgage over the shares and social parts plus the potential sanctions;
c) some particular aspects concerning the criminal responsibility with regard to the guaranteeing operations occurring between the companies, pursuant to the Law no.31/1990 On Companies, further amended and completed;
d) some relevant aspects coming from the foreclosure process.

Taking into consideration the above, the present study aims to complement the existing specialized literature, providing new arguments and/or solutions desirably to be widely used by all the legal professionals (experts, professors, students, practitioners etc.).

2. The shares. Concept. Traits. Legal nature.

2.1. In accordance with the Article 91 from the Law no. 31/1990, the share capital is represented by the shares issues by the joint-stock company; taking into consideration the modality of transfer, the shares may be nominative shares or shares at bearer. The type of the share will be determined by the constitutive deed; on the contrary, the shares will be nominative. The nominative shares may be issues in material form (on paper medium) or in dematerialized form when they are registered in the shareholders' registry.

A joint-stock company is set-up by minimum 2 shareholders who contribute to the formation of the share capital (in amount of minimum RON 90,000) aiming to develop a commercial activity; the shareholders are liable up to the limit of their contribution to the share capital.

2.2. The commercial doctrine provided different definitions for the concept of share, as follows:

a) a share bears three meanings: I)each fraction of the share capital;ii)the totality of the rights and obligations that derives from the bylaws for shareholders;iii)the title by which the shareholders exert their rights and these rights are transferred to the third parties[2];
b) a share has the following meanings :i)an equal part of the share capital;ii)a credit title ascertaining the rights and obligations deriving from the capacity of shareholder;iii)the document which comprises the shareholder's right[3];
c) a share is a representative title of the shareholder's contribution, representing a fraction of the share capital which confers to the holder the capacity of shareholder[4].

2.3. Following the above-mentioned definitions, the main legal traits of the shares are:

a) the shares are fractions of the share capital having a certain nominal value. Based on the Article 93 from the Law no.31/1990, the nominal value of a share cannot be smaller than RON 0,1 ;
b) the shares must have the same value. As a consequence, the holders of the shares have equal rights fact that create the needed prerequisites for the decision-making process in the general shareholders meeting. The Law no.31/1990 enables to be issued-under the conditions of the constitutive deed- shares which confer different right to the holders (Article 94, 2nd paragraph from the Law no.31/1990).

The lawmaker has in view the preferential shares with precedent dividend without right of vote that grant to the holder:i)the right to a precedent dividend charged on the distributable benefit of the financial exercise before any other charge;ii)the rights conferred to the shareholders having ordinary shares, inclusively the right to take part in the general shareholders meeting except for the right of vote (Article 95, 1st paragraph from the Law no. 31/1990).

c) the shares are indivisible, as provided by the Article 102, 1st paragraph from the Law no. 31/1990.

This legal provision has an imperative nature, the pursued scope being to overcome the intention to excessively divide the shares into many other shares.

The law does not ban to exist more co-owners of one share but they are responsible to appoint a proxy aiming to exert the related rights or to pay the due contributions.

d) the shares are negotiable titles. As moment as the shares represent the equivalent of the shareholder's contribution to the share capital, it means that the share comprises a certain value. Bearing such value, the shares may be alienated to the third parties as stipulated by the law. The shares held by the companies listed with the Stock Exchange may be alienated under the conditions governing the regulated markets.

2.4. With regard to the legal nature of the share there are some relevant opinions as follows:

a) based on an opinion, the share does not display all the traits attributable to the titles of credit meaning the integration of the law, the autonomy and the literalness; a share holds only the first trait namely the integration of the law[5];

b) in compliance with another author, a share of capital represents an uncertain receivable against the company for a quota from the social fond in the final moment of liquidation[6];

c) the shares are special titles, called corporative titles, company titles or titles of participation.

Also, the shares are not autonomous titles towards the legal document they derive; the shares come from the bylaws. Moreover, in case of transmittal, the acquirer becomes the holder of a deriving right[7];

d) based on the new Civil Code, a share is a movable, in principle, incorporeal good, indivisible good which represents a special form of the parts of interests issued by the societies as regulated by the Civil Code.

A share tradable on the capital market is an incorporeal, fungible good. On the other hand, a share to bearer issued in material form by a company not listed to the Stock Exchange is a corporeal and non-fungible good[8].

2.5. The shares grant to the holders the following rights:

a) the right to take part in the general shareholders meeting personally or by proxy;

b) the right of vote. Any paid share confers the right to a single vote if otherwise is not stipulated by the constitutive deed (Article 101 from the Law no.31/1990). The shareholders may vote proportionally with the held shares. ;

c) the right to information with regard to the activity of the company. In this respect, the administrators, the members of the Directorate have the obligation to make available to the shareholders and to any other petitioners the information regarding the structure of the shareholding etc. (Article 178, 1st paragraph from the Law no.31/1990);

d) the right to cash the dividends. The dividends are paid proportionally with the participation to the share capital if otherwise is not stipulated in the constitutive deed (Article 67, 2nd paragraph from the Law no/31/1990);

e) the right to the amount deriving from the winding-up of the company.

2.6. The aspects highlighted to the po.2.1-2.6 are also applicable to the company limited by shares (R*om. societate in comandita pe actiuni*).

3. The social parts. Concept. Traits. Legal nature

3.1. The social parts form the share capital of the limited liability company.

A limited liability company has the following characteristics in the light of the Law no. 31/1990:

a) it is established by one or many persons (associates) based on the trust;

b) the associates contribute with some goods with the scope to perform a commercial activity and to share the attained profit;

c) the associates are liable up to the limit of their contribution to the share capital;

d) the share capital is of minimum RON 200.

3.2. The legal traits of the social parts are similar, in general, with the characteristics of the shares.

So, with regard to the social parts:

a) they are fractions of the share capital;

b) they must have the same value (minimum RON 10);

c) they are indivisible;

d) they may be not represented by negotiable titles;

e) the number of the social parts distributed to each associate is proportional with its contribution to the share capital;

f) the social parts may be alienated to the third parties under the restrictive conditions stipulated by the Article 202 from the Law no.31/1990 meaning only if the associates representing ¾ from the share capital approve such operation.

3.3. The social parts confer the associates the following rights:

a) the right to take part in the general associates meeting;

b) the right to vote;

c) the right to information with regard to the activity of the company;

d) the right to cash the dividends. The dividends are paid proportionally with the participation to the share capital if otherwise is not stipulated in the constitutive deed (Article 67, 2nd paragraph from the Law no/31/1990);

4. Establishment of the security over the shares and social parts. Overview of the former and current legislation.

4.1. Prior to entering into force of the New Civil Code (01.10.2011), the establishment of the guaranty over the shares and social parts was governed by the former VI th Title from the Law no.99/1999 on some measures for the acceleration of the economic reform. Such guaranty was settled through a real movable guarantee agreement. For priority rank issues, the agreement was enrolled in the Electronic Archive. Regarding the real movable guarantee over the shares, one of the legal requirements (introduced by the Law no.441/2006) was to enroll also the agreement in the shareholders' register kept by the company. A similar requirement existed also for the real movable guarantee over the social parts.

4.2. In respect to the current legislation, the modality by which is settled such guaranty is the movable mortgage [Article 2389, letter d) from the Civil Code].There were maintained the legal provisions based on which the mortgage agreement over shares and social parts must be enrolled in the Electronic Archive and in the registers kept by the company. With regard to the shares belonging to the joint-stock companies listed with the Stock Exchange, the mortgage must be enrolled with the special accounts open on behalf of the settlor with the system held by the Central Depository (Article 96 from the Regulation no.13/2005 on the authorization and operation of the Central Depository, houses of compensation and central counterparts, issued by the Securities National Commission, further amended and completed).

5. Relevant clauses recommended to be inserted in the movable mortgages agreements

5.1. The settlor of the movable mortgage has the liberty to use, to administrate and to dispose by the mortgaged asset having the duty not to harm the creditor's rights (Article 2373 from the Civil Code).

It means that the mortgage right enrolled with the first rank in the Electronic Archive survives to any operation of sale of the mortgaged asset made by the settlor.

5.2. The settlor may not destroy, harm the mortgaged asset and also the settlor may not substantially diminish the value of the mortgaged asset only if such destruction, deterioration or diminishing of the value occurs during the normal use of the asset or in case of necessity (Article 2374 from the Civil Code).

In brief, this article imposes the general undertaking for the settlor to be diligent and to maintain the value of the mortgaged asset, except for the situations already stipulated.

5.3. The mortgage is extended over the fruits and products of the mortgaged asset and also over all the assets received by the settlor as effect of an operation of administration or disposition regarding the mortgaged asset. It is considered product of the mortgaged asset any asset that supersedes the mortgaged asset or the asset in which the value of the mortgaged asset is incorporated (Article 2392 from the Civil Code).

The main conclusion is that the mortgage covers also the right to cash the dividends stemming from the shares and social parts.

5.4. The creditor has the right to inspect the mortgaged asset without harming the activity of the settlor (Article 2394 from the Civil Code).

With regard to the shares and social parts, the meaning of the aforesaid article consists in the fact that the creditor is entitled to require and to receive any documents and/or information regarding the status of the mortgaged asset.

5.5. The mortgage agreement must contain a sufficiently precise depiction of the mortgaged asset.

In respect to the shares, the mortgage agreement comprises the type of the shares, the number of shares, the form of issuance, the value of the shares, and the numbering of the shares (if any).

Concerning the social parts, the mortgage agreement contains the number of the social parts, the value of the social parts and the numbering of the social parts (if any).

In general, the enrollment of the mortgage agreement both in the Electronic Archive and in the registers held by the companies also contain the interdictions of alienation and encumbrance.

6. Some special legal requirements regarding the approval of the guaranties over the shares and social parts

6.1. In respect to the shares, if there is needed a resolution issued by the general shareholders meeting, the creditor must pay a special attention to the formalities of convening the shareholders.

The convening of the shareholders must comprise the whole agenda of the shareholders meeting that will be held with an explicit depiction of all the items included on the agenda (the depiction of the guaranties, the object of the guaranties, the amount of the credit, the financing bank etc.).

The general rule is that the convening must be published in the Official Gazette of Romania, the IV th Part and in one of the widely spread newspapers from the locality where is the registered office of the company or from the nearest locality. The term for the convening of the general shareholders meeting may be not smaller than 30 days from the date when the convening was published in the Official Gazette of Romania, the IV Part (Article 117, 2nd and 3rd paragraphs from the Law no. 31/1990).

It is very important to be strictly followed the aforesaid conditions (especially the term of 30 days) because on the contrary the sanction is the absolute annulment of the resolution of the general shareholders meeting that ensues the cancelation of the mortgage over the shares.

The 4th paragraph of the Article 117 from the Law no.31/1990 establishes a derogation concerning the convening formalities as follows: if all the shares are nominative, the convening may be done through the recommended letter or, if the constitutive deed enables, through the letter sent via e-mail having the electronic signature incorporated, attached or logically associated at the shareholder's address mentioned with the shareholders' registry with 30 days prior to the date when the meeting will be held.

We stress that with regard to the convening formalities the general rule (publication of the convening in the Official Gazette of Romania, the IV th Part and in one newspaper as mentioned above) is applied on a higher scale in comparison with the derogatory rule established by the Article 117, 4th paragraph from the Law no.31/1990.

The convening formalities must not be performed when all the shareholders are present and there is the unanimous approval of the guaranties (Article 121 from the Law no. 31/1990).

Also it is important to be pointed pointed-out that the guaranties over the shares may be approved by the Board of Administrators/the Directorate if the value of the mortgaged asset is up to the half of the accounting value of the assets at the date when the legal document is signed (Article 153^{22} from the Law no.31/1990); on the contrary, the approval comes from the extraordinary general shareholders meeting.

In respect to the shares held by the companies listed to the Stock Exchange, the mortgage over the shares is approved by the Administrators/Directors if the value of the mortgaged asset does not exceed, individually or cumulatively, during the tenor of a financial exercise, 20% of the total value of the fixed assets, except for the receivables (Article 90 from the Law no.24/2017 on the issuers of the financial instruments and market operations); on the contrary, the approval comes from the extraordinary general shareholders meeting.

6.2. With regard to the social parts, the mortgage is legally approved by the associates representing ¾ of the share capital (Article 202, 2nd and 5th paragraphs from the Law no. 31/1990).

The convening of the general associates meeting is made in the form stipulated by the constitutive deed and, in lack of a special provision, the convening will be made by recommended letter sent with 10 days before containing also the agenda of the general associates meeting (Article 195, 3rd paragraph from the Law no.31/1990).

7. Novelties regarding the foreclosure process

7.1. The creditors of the associate may exert their rights – during the duration of the company- only:

a) on the part from the benefits due to the associate based on the balance sheet;
b) on the part that would be due to the associate after the winding up of the company.

The novelty consists in the fact that the social parts, according to the Article 66, 2nd paragraph from the Law no.31/1990 :

a) may form the object of the garnishment and seizure started by the aforesaid creditors during the duration of the company;
b) may be sold by the same creditors.

As effect, the Law no.31/990 (by the Article 66, 2nd and 3 rd paragraphs) has finally validated the existing practice, meaning the mortgage legally established over the shares and social parts may be foreclosed based on the law. The former doctrine expressed the opinion in conformity to which the social parts may be not foreclosed[9] and may be not form the object of a guaranty because of the intuitu personae trait of the social part; we highlight that the most of the practitioners did not follow it because it could mainly trigger a blockage of the business. Subsequently, the Administrators/the members of the Directorate are obliged to make available to the creditor/ foreclosure body, upon their request, the financial situations and any other documents or the information needed to assess the shares and the social parts and also to facilitate their taking-over.

The publicity of the seizure and garnishment it will be made upon the request of the foreclosure body without being applicable the provisions of the Article 71 from the Emergency Government Ordinance no. 116/2009, as provided by the Article 66^{1} from the Law no. 31/1990.

8. Special situations. Overview

8.1. A distinct attention must be paid to the guaranties furnished by and between joint-stock companies members of the same group.

We have in mind the provisions of the Article 144^{4} , 1st paragraph from the Law no. 31/1990 which expressly bans the crediting by the company of its administrators through some specific operations as: i)granting the loans to the Administrators;ii)granting financial benefits to the Administrators at the date or after the date when the company concluded with the Administrators operations of delivery of goods, services or performance of works;iii)direct or indirect guaranteeing, in whole or in part, of any loans granted to the Administrators, concomitantly or after the granting of the loan;i)direct or indirect guaranteeing, in whole or in part, of the performance by the Administrators of any other personal obligations of those towards third parties;ii)direct or indirect guaranteeing, in whole or in part, of a claim that has as object a loan granted by a third party to the Administrators or other personal service of the Administrators.

The provisions of the aforesaid Article 144^4 , 1st paragraph will apply to the operations where are interested the spouse, the relatives or in-laws up to the fourth degree inclusively of the Administrator; also if the operation regards a company where one of the persons abovementioned is Administrator or holds, alone or together with one of the abovementioned persons, a participation of at least 20% of the subscribed capital. In case of breaching this provision (Article 144^4 2nd paragraph from the Law no. 31/1990), the potential sanction is the absolute annulment of the guaranty.

8.2. In the process of setting-up the guaranties must be followed inclusively the provisions of the Article 272, 1st paragraph, letters b) and c) from the Law no. 31/1990 which stipulates the criminal responsibility (imprinsonment from 6 months to 3 years or fine) of the founder, administrator, general manager, director, member of the supervisory council/directorate or legal representative of the company who:uses in bad faith, the assets or the credit, enjoyed by the company, for a purpose contrary to the interests of the company or in his benefit or favors another company in which he has interests, directly or indirectly;borrows in any form, directly or through an intermediary, from the company that he administers, from a company controlled by this company or from the company which controls the company which he manages, the borrowed amount being higher than EUR 5,000 or makes one of these companies to provide any guarantee for his own debts.

Besides the criminal responsibility, the guaranty becomes null.

8.3. Besides the abovementioned with the points 8.1 and 8.2 any guarantee provided by a company must be justified by an economic interest taking into consideration inclusively the principle of the specialty of the capacity of use applicable to the company.

9. Conclusions

9.1. Main outcomes of the study

The main outcomes of the present study are:

a) global presentation of the mortgage over the shares and social parts with focus on the legal traits of the shares and social parts, on the rights granted to the shareholders and associates, on the clauses advised to be inserted in the mortgage agreement, on the foreclosure process;
b) analysis of the relevant foregoing legislation and current legislation;
c) presentation of some relevant precedent formalities that may have major impact on the validity of the mortgage agreement;
d) overview of some relevant aspects regarding the criminal responsibility that may have major impact on the validity of the mortgage agreement;
e) proposal to be eliminated the enrollment of the movable mortgage over the shares and social parts from the registries held by company having in mind that the enrollment in the Electronic Archive is public being available to any diligent person;
f) proposal to be amended the Law no.31/1990 meaning to be expressly stipulated : (i) if the Article 144^4 regards only the joint-stock companies or not.

If not, to be expressly mentioned which are the envisaged persons; (ii) if the Article 144^4 and the Article 272 regard also the companies as active/qualified subject of the infractions.

9.2. Expected impact of the outcomes

The main expected impact consists in the followings:

a) to raise the awareness in respect to all the issues highlighted in the present study for all the cases when a mortgage over the shares and social parts is settled;
b) to become effective the recommendations mentioned with the po. 9.1, letters e) and f) from the present study.

9.3. Suggestions further research

Please see the recommendations mentioned with the po. 9.1, letters e) and f) from the present study.

CONSIDERATION REGARDING THE LAW NO 77/2016 IN VIEW OF DECISION OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT NO 623/2016

Valentin COCEAN*

Abstract

The forced giving in payment regulated by Law no 77/2016 has created a lot of polemics which are not necessarily solved by the Decision of the Constitutional Court. The present study represents an attempt to clarify some of the implications of the Constitutional Court Decision upon the Law no 77/2016.

Keywords: giving in payment; hardship theory; loan ; constitutionality ; court.

1. Introduction

Adopted upon the existence of a conflict, significantly emphasized by economic events – the global economic crisis, but especially that of the real estate market, the evolution of the exchange rates of some currencies, between consumers and banks, Law no. 77/2016[1] sparked ample controversy. The controversy manifested mainly socially, while law professionals were almost unanimously critical towards the said Law[2]. The present study, however, does not intend to analyze the said Law but only the implications upon it of Decision no. 623/2016 of the Romanian Constitutional Court[3].

The aforementioned Decision, which is by no means safe from any criticism, brought, both legally and socially, a satisfactory solution for all envolved interests. Without preventing the application the dispositions of the Law it criticised, as some authors had anticipated[4], the Constitutional Court established the interpretation, probably the sole possible one[5], by which these could be enforced without transgressing constitutional priciples and , also, without injuring the rights of one of the categories of subjects involved in the relations sought by the Law.

Below we wish to analyze some of the aspects involved by the passing of this Decision, both regarding civil substatial law and civil procesual law, but only, as the Constitutional Court did, with regard to loan contracts placed prior to the coming into force of the Law hereunder.

2. Content

Essentially, decision no. 623/2016 of the Constitutional Court provides that in order to enforce the dispositions of Law no. 77/2016 a court should verify the conditions regarding the existence of the hardship theory6. Starting from the premise that we are only looking at contracts placed prior to the coming into force of Law no. 77/2016 and targeting a rather practical approach, we will try finding answers to three questions, two of them regarding substantial law and one regarding procesual aspects.

2.1. Can the provisions of Law no. 77/2016 be applied to loan contracts placed prior to its enforcement?

Constitutional Court Decision no. 623/2016 (published January 18th 2017), analyzing the issue of the Law's constitutionality (of some of its provisions) exactly with regard to pre-existing contracts, did not deem it unconstitutional. Therefore, the Law will also be applicable to these contracts but only if the court (CCR analysis and disposition on art.11 of the Law) verifies the conditions regarding the theory of the conditions regarding the hardship theory. For that matter, pt. 121 of the Decision clearly states that, in the hypothesis in which the conditions of the hardship theory are met, the court can rule either the adaptation or the ceasing of the contract, as the application of the hardship theory cand be made "to the upper limit provided by Law no. 77/2016 (handing over the estate and erasing the main and accesory debt)". A counter argument invoking the dispositions of art. 3 of the Law, which refers to the derogation from the provisions of Law no. 287/2009 regarding the Civil Code, cannot be taken into account, because an eventual giving in payment, even if it pertains to a juridical relation risen prior to enforcement of the New Civil Code, would have been governed by its dispositions (and not by the old regulations) as long as it took pplace after October 1st 2011 (art. 112 of Law of application no. 71/2011). And, by hypothesis, an operation of giving in payment based on Law no. 77/2016 would be ulterior to the enforcement of the New Civil Code.

2.2. What is the effect of the RCC decision on the application of Law no. 77/2016 for the pre-existing contracts upon enforcement of this Law ?

We have already established that this Law is applicable to these contracts. But only in the hypothesis in which it is established (case by case) that the requirements of the hardship theory are met. That cannot be if there is only the possibility that the parties could bring the hardship theory into matter in front of the court, but it will be necessary for the court to effectively establish if the conditions of the hardship theory had been met. Surely, if the court is invested by one of the parties regarding giving in payment based on the provisions of Law no. 77/2016 (we will see to the procedural matters separately).

The existence of the conditions of the hardship theory determines the constitutionality of the Law upon application to pre-existing contracts. The possibility of such application is provided in art. 11 of the Law, but this disposition was deemed by the RCC decision to only be constitutional "as far as the court verifies the conditions referring to the existence of the hardship theory". In the minutes, the Court did not refer to the possibility of verification but to the actual verification (grammarly interpretation – mode of the used verb). Surely, in the reasons of the Decision there are points referring to the possibility of the judicial control, but overall the reasons regard the necessity of verifying the hardship theory (pt. 119 and 120 of the Decision). The Court deems Law no. 77/2016 as being an application of the hardship theory to loan contracts (pct. 115 of the Decision) and, therefore, it will not be applicable if the conditions of the hardship theory are not met. Furthermore, the Court considers unconstitutional "the hardship theory ope legis" which the legislator had in mind when adopting Law no. 77/2016, and the elimination of this trait (ope legis) requires actually establishing the existence of the conditions of the hardship theory (either by parties' agreement – but this option is not of interest, as the parties are free to decide to modify the elements of the contractual relations between them even if there is no special regulation -, or by ruling of the court).

Thusly, for the application of Law no. 77/2016 to pre-existing contracts it will be necessary to verify the fulfillment of the admissibility requirements provided in the Law (art. 4) but also the existence of the conditions of the hardship theory. In the hypothesis in which the existence of the conditions of the hardship theory is not established in one particular case, the solution (of admittance of the creditor's contestation, or rebuttal of thr debtor's claim for ascertaiment) will be also based on the inadmissibility of the procedure of giving in payment ruled by Law no 77/2016. Practically, the premise for the application of Law no. 77 to pre-existing contracts is the very identification of the conditions of the hardship theory.

As it is the case with the admissibility conditions provided by art.4 of the Law, with regard to the existence of the conditions of the hardship theory the debtor will also have their own view by which they will decide wether or not they can follow the procedure of giving in payment ruled by Law no 77/2016. If the debtor's evaluation has a positive outcome, they will send their creditor a notice, as provided by art. 5 of the Law. In turn, the creditor will assess the admissibility requirements under art. 4 but also on the hardship theory. This is where the lagislator's intervention might be necessary, as to modify art. 5, align. 1 in order to establish an obligation for the debtor to also detail in the notice the conditions of the hardship theory, thus making it possible for the creditor to fairly assess the situation. On the other hand, we think that, given the RCC decision, the debtor would already be forced to take on the hardship theory matter in their notice, or at least would be interested to. According to their evaluation's outcome the creditor will decide wether to lodge a contestation as provide by art. 7 or to give effect to the notice (surely there is a third option, respectively the creditor could wait, keeping the possibility of defending themselves in court in the case regarding the claim for ascertainment made by the debtor, however such a position would not serve their interests, given that the effect of the loan contract would remain suspended). Should the debtor not refer to the hardship theory in their notice, the creditor could lodge the contestation (surely, should they have assessments regarding the admissibility requirements under art.4 of the Law, they will mention them in the contestation) settling to affirm the inexistence of the conditions of the hardship theory.

Finally, should the parties fail to reach an agreement, the court will also assess the admissibility requirements under art.4 of the Law and the existence of the conditions of the hardship theory. To be mentioned that, as it is the case with admissibility conditions under art.4 of the Law, the existence or inexistence of the conditions of the hardship theory, as a premise for the application of the procedure ruled by Law no. 77/2016, (if the parties fail to agree) the court will assess either upon contestation by the creditor (as per art. 7), or upon claim for ascertaiment mad eby the debtor (as per art. 8 of the Law).

The debtor's notice sent as provided by art. 5 of the Law will produce the effects provided by this law even if in one particular case the hardship theory conditions are not met (similar to the situation in which the admissibility conditions under art. 4 of the Law are not met). Surely, those effects would be removed when the ruling that establishes that the hardship theory conditions are not met remains definitive. The effects of the notice could only be avoided by priorly lodging a claim for ascertainment by the creditor, by which they ask for the establishment of the inexistence of the conditions of the hardship theory (but in such a claim, a matter of interst[7] would rise – as it would only be eventual – and, moreover, it is hard to imagine that a bank would lodge such claims regarding each contract placed rior to the enforcement of Law no. 77/2016).

Surely, we cannot exclude the hypothesis in which the debtor lodges a claim, distinct from the procedure of Law no. 77/2016, by which they ask for the verification of the conditions of the hardship theory. But such a claim's object could not be to ascertain the existence of these conditions (the rule of subsidiarity of a claim for ascertainment would be breached) but the effective application of the hardship theory, which would presume a course of action in accordance with common law, with no ties to the procedure under Law no. 77/2016. This would probably not serve their interests, given they would lose the advantage of by law suspension under Law no. 77/2016 and, on principle, also of exemption from paying court fees. Moreover, the court's ruling, assuming they establish the existence of the conditions of the hardship theory, would not be predictable, as it is highly unlikely it would exceed the advantage given by the giving in payment based on the Law hereunder.

And, as we have reached this point of the analysis, we must take into account pt. 121 of the RCC Decision. Therein the RCC hints that the court, establishing the existence of the conditions of the hardship theory (and of the admissibility requirements under art.4 of the Law) could rule any measure deemed necessary (adaptation or ceasing of the contract) to the upper limit provided by Law no. 77/2016 (handing over the estate and erasing the main and accesory debt). This option of the court could only be in the hypothesis in which they were invested with a claim based on common law.

If the debtor chose to follow the procedure under Law no. 77/2016, then either their step would be considered inadmissible (either because the conditions under art. 4 are not met, or those of the hardship theory) and it would remain without effect (in the end, after the courts decision remains definitive), or, should al the requirements for this procedure be fulfilled, it would have the outcome provided by law. The mention under pt. 121 of the Constitutional Court's Decision cannot have any actual effect, art. 2, align.3 of Law no. 47/1992 clearly stating the impossibility for the Court to alter or complete the legal dispositions submitted to their control. Thusly, a consequence of following the procedure under Law no. 77/2016 (assuming it is admissible) can only be the one mentioned in its provisions (giving in payment, respectively the extinction of the debt rising from the loan contract, accessories included, no supplementary costs, by the transfer towards the creditor of the ownership to the mortgaged asset)[8].

Besides, the principle of availability[9] precludes the court from ruling otherwise. As for the steps taken by the debtor under Law no. 77/2016, the court will be invested by claim made by either the creditor or the debtor. The creditor could file the claim under art. 7 , by which they contest the fulfillment of the requirements needed for the application of the procedure ruled by Law no. 77/2016. Should the court consider they were not fulfilled it will admit the creditor's claim without raising the matter of application of the hardship theory. And if they consider the coditions for application of the procedure are fulfilled they will reject the creditor's claim, without disposing any other measures (a counterclaim made by the debtor would lack interst and, anyway, if it would aim othe consequences, it would be subject to common law). In their turn, the debtor could file a claim provided by art. 8of the Law, but its object is pre-established by this provision (should they have other claims, the debtor would exceed the dispositions of Law no. 77/2016, choosing the way of the common law). So the court would either admit the claim (within the boundries of the expressed claims, the same provided under art. 8, align.1 of the Law), or reject it, in neither case could they rule other measures.

Surely, imposing a certain solution is not entirely in accordance with the idea of equity which stand as grounds for the hardship theory. And, indeed, it is possible that the solution chosen by the legislator reverses the situation, respectively generating an imbalance in reverse to the one they wished to remove (the value of the mortgaged asset could be clearly lower than that of the debt). But these are the provisions of Law no. 77/2016 (art. 3, art. 5, art.6, align. 6, art. 8, align.1 and art. 10), disposisions which have not been declared unconstitutional.

2.3. How can the court be invested to rule on the existence of the conditions of the hardship theory ?

We start from the premise that we are looking at the application of the procedure under Law no.

[7] For this requirement for lodging a civil claim see G. Boroi, M.Stancu, Civil Procedural Law, 3rd Edition, Bucharest, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2016, page 36.

[8] For a different opinion see M. Avram, Does forced giving for payment still exist after Constitutional Court's Decision no. 623/2016?, https://juridice.ro/essentials/760/mai-exista-darea-in-plata-fortata-dupa-decizia-curtii-constitutionale-nr-6232016.

[9] For an analysis of this principle see G. Boroi, M. Stancu, op.cit., pages 12-17.

77/2016, thus we will not address eventual claims made by the parties on different grounds (as per common law).

In this procedure, the court is invested by either the creditor, by claim as per art. 7 of the Law, or the debtor, by claim as per art. 8.

Let us first assess the case of the claim made by the creditor, as per art. 7, distinguishing between the situation in which the creditor refers to the hardship theory and that in which he makes no such reference.

Should the creditor, lodging the claim provided by art. 7 of the Law, contest the existence of the conditions of the hardship theory (we must include the case in which the creditor invokes reasons in which the court could include the inexistence of the hardship theory conditions, e.g. if the creditor invokes the inapplicability of the procedure under Law no. 77/2016) two hypotheses become possible.

In the first one the court will assess that the hardship theory conditions are not met and, consequently, will admit the creditor's claim. Of course there could be a discussion on the qualification of the creditor's claim's threads and on the solutions the court might give on each of them. On principle, the creditor will lodge a claim for ascertainment (to be ascertained that the hardship theory conditions are not met, that the procedure of giving for payment under Law no. 77/2016 is not applicable, that the debtor's notice of giving for payment lack effect or, as proposed based on the provisions of the Law, the ascertainment of the failure tu fulfill the conditions necessary for the debtor's right to extinguish the debt to arise). We do not think lodging any other claims makes sense. For example, restitution in integrum is an effect of the admission of the claim, it is not necessary for it to be object of a different thread (of course, here it would be necessary to establish the contents of restitution in integrum and, given the result, to be decided if such a claim in a different thread is necessary, but detailed – should it be deemed interest can be requested for the period the contractual effects were suspended, or if the debtor could be asked to immediately pay all the instalments which would have been due during the suspension).

In the second hypothesis, should it be deemed that the hardship theory conditions are fulfilled, the court will proceed to verify the other admissibility requirements (art. 4) contested by the creditor and will rule accordingly (admit the claim if the admissibility conditions are not met or reject it if they deem they are fulfilled).

Further, let us analyze the situation in which the creditor, filing the claim under art. 7, does not refer to the hardship theory (probably the case of claims filed prior to the ruling of the Constitutional Court).

Firstly, we must assess if the court could or could not analyze the fulfillment of the hardship theory conditions.

We deem that the court is called to check the existence of the hardship theory conditions even if the claimant (here, the creditor) fails to invoke they were not fulfilled.

This idea arises from the reasons for the RCC Decision (pt. 116, 119, 120), but also from its minutes.

Then, when solving the claim by which it was invested, the court must apply the dispositions of Law no. 77/2016 (art. 4 mainly), but their applicability (and that of the entire procedure ruled by the Law hereunder) to pre-existing contracts depends on art. 11 of the Law, and this article's constitutionality presumes establishing the existence of the hardship theory conditions. In other words, in order to assess the applicability of Law no. 77/2016 to a certain case, the court will have to firstly check the existence of the hardship theory conditions.

Therefore, the issue of breaching the availability principle cannot be taken into account by analyzing the hardship theory conditions, this analysis is necessary to establish the applicability of the procedure ruled by Law no. 77/2016. Doing so, the court does nothing more than checking the applicability of the special procedure to the contract regarded by the claim (and by the prior notice from the debtor).

And an eventual counterclaim from the debtor (notwithstanding litigation risen prior to the passing of the Constitutional Court's decision in which the moment by which a counterclaim could be filed could very well have passed – of course we could talk about a request for reinstatement within term in the 15 days following the passing of the RCC decision) would be hard to admit. Because we either appreciate that the court would have to check the existence of the hardship theory conditions anyway and then the counterclaim would lack interest, or we deem the court could not proceed to that matter and then it could not admit the claim based on the lack of the hardship theory conditions (or on the failure to prove them).

In the end, taking into account the Constitutional Court's decision, there are two possible solutions: either the hardship theory conditions are met and the application of the procedure under Law no. 77/2016 to pre-existing contracts does not breach constitutional provisions, or the hardship theory conditions are not fulfilled, in which case the procedure ruled by Law no. 77/2016 cannot be applied to pre-existing contracts. And the court not only can, but is forced to act for a correct application of the law, and in order to do that it must first establish the norms applicable to the case. And that presumes, as per the RCC decision, verifying the existence of the hardship theory conditions. The judge's active role principle[10] (art. 22 C.p.c.) prevents any doubt on an eventual breach of the availability principle (art.9 C.p.c.).

Thusly, even if the creditor (claimant) fails to invoke the failure tu fulfill the hardship theory conditions, the court will, however, proceed to analyze their existence.

Difficulties arise as for the solution the court should pass in the hypothesis in which, after analysis of the hardship theory conditions, they will not establish they exist (if it is assessed the hardship theory conditions have been met, then the court will rule according to the solidity of the creditor's contestation of the admissibility requirements under art. 4). In such case, the procedure ruled by Law no. 77/2016 would not be applicable to the contract under matter.

But let us see what are the possible solutions in case the creditor fails to invoke the lack of the hardship theory conditions.

Should the court fail to verify the existence of the hardship theory conditions three solutions are possible.

Thus, without checking the existence of the hardship theory conditions, the court could reject the creditor's claim verifying and assessing that the admissibility requirements under art. 4 are met (those contested by the creditor), with no reference (analysis) to the hardship theory. However, in such case, the court would pass a ruling regarding a pre-existing contract (by hypothesis, such contracts are subject of the matter here) based on art. 11 of the Law, though this article would only be constitutional if the hardship theory conditions are met (according to RCC decision). Without verifying the fulfillment of these conditions the court cannot apply art. 11, and if this article does not apply, the procedure ruled by Law no. 77/2016 cannot pertain to contracts placed prior to its coming into force.

In a second hypothesis, without checking the existence of the hardship theory conditions, the court could admit the creditor's claim, verifying and deeming that the admissibility conditions under art. 4 have not been fulfilled (those contested by the creditor), making no reference (analysis) to the hardship theory. But this situation is similar to the aforementioned. The court would rule in accordance with legal norms that might not be applicable to the contracts under matter, and they could not find base in the dispositions of art. 11 without checking the fulfillment of the hardship theory conditions. Surely, the interest of discussing such a hypothesis is fairly low, because, either the hardship theory conditions were met or not, the application of the giving for payment procedure ruled by Law no. 77/2016 would still be inadmissible.

Finally, without proceeding to effectively checking the existence of the hardship theory conditions, the court could admit the creditor's claim on grounds that the debtor failed to invoke and prove the existence of the hardship theory conditions, an aspect on which the admissibility of the applicability of the procedure ruled by Law no. 77/2016 to pre-existing contracts depends. However, if we were to consider that the court is prevented from analyzing the existence of the hardship theory conditions because of the availability principle, even more so we could not accept the passing os a ruling based on an aspect upon which the court had not been invested (and which was not brought into matter with the parties). And we must not omit the fact that the court's ruling (assuming it is mentained in appeal) would be res judicata, therefore there would be no more means to verify the existence of the hardship theory conditions in a new step based on the provisions of Lawu no. 77/2016.

Given the aforementioned, we deem the court will be forced to proceed to checking the existence of the hardship theory conditions. In this case there are also multiple possible outcomes.

Thusly, it is possible that the court verifies the existence of the hardship theory conditions and to assess they do exist, in which case they will also check the other admissibility requirements (art.4) contested by the creditor and will pass a solution accordingly (admits the claim if the admissibility requirement are not fulfilled and rejects it if it deems they are met).

In a second hypothesis the court may check but assess that the hardship theory conditions are not established. In which case the court should not proceed to analyze the fulfillment of the admissibility requirements under art. 4. Therefore solutions of admitting or rejecting the creditor's claim based on the failure tu fulfill the admissibility requirements should be excluded.

Two more possible solutions remain.

The court could admit the claim based on the inexistence of the hardship theory conditions. But this would mean admitting the claim based on a reason the creditor has not invoked. If the court would do so they would breach the availability principle, by changing the cause of the claim.

That is why we consider that the court should reject the claim, mentaining, though, in the reasons the inapplicability of the procedure ruled by Law no. 77/2016 (this is where the solution of rejecting the claim without analyzing the admissibility requirements contested by the creditor arises from). By such a ruling the court would abide by both principles under matter, the availability principle and the active role principle.

This last solution presumes an analysis of its consequences.

Although their claim has been rejected, the creditor wil be able to request payment of the amounts due according to the contract and can start or continue forced execution. The by law suspension of contractual effects will be deemed, in view of the passed ruling's reasons, as inoperable. Any opposition on behalf of the debtor, in any way, will be removed by res judicata which will include the reasons (decisive) for the solution[11] by which the creditor's claim was solved (including an eventual debtor's claim upon art. 8 of the Law).

The only unsolved issue for the creditor remains that of litigation costs. However, in case their claim was filed prior to the Constitutional Court's ruling, we deem that, assessing the matter of procesual guilt, although their claim was rejected, they should not be forced to pay for litigation fees.

Finally, in case the creditor did not file a claim based on art. 7, or they have filed such a claim but it has been rejected and, in all cases, did not follow the debtor's notice, tha later could lodge the claim under art. 8 of the Law. We consider that, no matter if the debtor has or has not invoked the fulfillment of the hardship theory conditions, the court must check their existence, as well as that of the other admissibility requirements. Of course, the debtor's claim was preceeded by the one of the creditor (which has been rejected), res judicata of the ruling by which the creditor's claim was solved will be taken into account (for that matter, we think it should be considered that, in a litigation having the debtor's claim as object, the creditor will be able to invoke the failure to fulfill any admissibility or hardship theory condition, if those have not been invoked by their prior claim).

From the perspective hereunder (the hardship theory) the creditor will have to contest:

a) the fact that the execution of the contract has become excessively burdensome for the debtor;
b) the fact that the situation under pt.a) is due to exceptional changes of circumstances;
c) the fact that the change in circumstances took place after the conclusion of the contract;
d) or they should prove :
e) the fact that the change in circumstances, and also thir extent were or should have been taken into account by the debtor upon concluuin of the contract;
f) the debtor took the chance of changing circumstances or it could reasonably be considered that they took that chance;

As for the burden of proof, we think the debtor will have to prove the existence of the hardship theory conditions mentioned above under pts. a), b) and c) and the creditor should have to prove the aspects mentioned under pts. d) and e). Given that the failure to meet any of these conditions makes the procedure under Law no. 77 inapplicable (as the hardship theory conditions do not exist)and they can only be assessed consecutively (on principle, in the aforementioned order) it results that the debtor will firstly prove aspects under pts. a), b) and c) and only after that the creditor, in order to win the case, will have to prove the aspects under pts. d) and e).

Regarding the condition for applying the hardship theory consisting of the debtor having tried to negotiate a reasonable an equitable adaptation of the contract, we think the failure to do that cannot be taken into matter (in the procedure ruled by Law no. 77/2016) given that the solution of modifying the contract is mentioned by the legal dispositions and, moreover, the procedure starts by notice given by the debtor.

3. Conclusions

Therefore, the Constitutional Court's Decision cannot be deemed to generate the inapplicability of the procedure under Law no. 77/2016 to pre-existing loan contracts.

Thus, the necessity to set the terms in which the procedure ruled by the Law hereunder will be applied and these have been the very object of the present study.

Of course, we do not pretend to solve all the difficulties that might arise upon application of the law according to the conditions set by the provisions of the Constitutional Court's Decision, nor do we consider our proposals to be absolute. This article represents an attempt to help practitioners, courts or representatives of involved parties, which will be called to answer the questions above.

Naturally, as per the matter's actuality, it will be subject to far more ample anlyses in the specialty literature and the solutions brought forward will be either confirmed or denied by jurisprudence of courts which have already been invested with a significant number of claims under Law no. 77/2016.

THE DISCERNMENT-REQUIRMENT FOR THE VALIDITY OF CONSENT

Valentin COCEAN[*]

Abstract

The provisions of the Civil Code 2009 have not sufficiently clarified the issue of lack of discernment upon conclusion of a juridical act. This study represents an attempt to clarify some of the aspects of this matter, that have been rarely analysed by the Romanian doctrine.

Keywords: discernment; civil capacity; consent; presumption; factual situation .

1. Introduction

The civil juridical act is a manifestation of will or, in some cases, an agreement of wills made with the intent to prodeuce juridical effects[1].

From the definition of the juridical act it results that its essence consists in the fact that it represents a manifestation of will made with purpose of producing juridical effects. In other words, the fundamental element of the juridical act is juridical will.

When establishing the concept of juridical will, the juridical literature gives relevance to just two of the phases in the forming of the the juridical will, respectively the exterior manifestation of the decision and the determinant reason, all the other being irrelevant from a juridical point of view.

In law, the exteriorized decision represents consent[2], and the determinant reason is identified as the cause[3] (purpose) of the juridical act.

Without going into details here, we will mention the obvious interdependence between the two elements of juridical will, both representing general and validity conditions of the juridical act.

This interdependence poignantly manifests in view of the validity conditions of each of the juridical will's elements.

According to art. 1.204 Civ.C., consent must be serious, free and knowingly expressed. This translates in the necessity to cumulatively meet three conditions: consent must come from a person having discernment; it must not be altered by any vice of consent; it must be expressed with the intent of producing juridical effects[4]. On the other hand, according to art. 1.236 Civ.C., for the cause of the juridical act to be valid, it must exist and it must be licit and moral. And it is deemed that the cause does not exist upon lack of discernement.

Prefiguration of determinant reason preceeds the expression of consent. Consequently, any circumstance deemed to affect freedom and awareness of consent, firstly – and necessarily – affects the prefiguration of determinant reason.

Therefore, the requirement for existing discernment equally regards both elements of the juridical will.

2. Content

Usually, doctrine analyzes the matter of discernment in connection with the element – consent, as it is considered to be one of consent's conditions.

It has been shown that this condition arises from the requirement for conscious trait of consent[5].

But what is actually the significance of this requirement? The forming mechanism of juridical will revealed that the human psychic reflects the awareness of needs and of menas of satisfying those needs. The juridical act is, above all, an intellectual operation, because the will to contract presumes the awearenes of the elements of the forseen operation, that is "weighed" by each party before conclusion[6]. It is, therefore, a premeditated juridical operation, as the parties priorly analyze all the advantages and disadvantages devolving from it. The subject of law must have the faculty to discern, because they have to deliberate, to assess the advantages and disadvantages presented by wishes and the means to achieve them.

This is the only way determinant reason (cause) can arise, which will lead to making a decision and, finally, to exteriorising the latter. And, for that to happen it is necessary that each party has the necessary intellectual faculties to "understand" and, then, to "want".

In other words, consent must be given by a person which is aware of the juridical consequences rising from the conclusion of the juridical act, which can imagine not only the rights they would gain by a juridical act, but also the obligations they would be bound by. And, this powe of foreseeing consequences translates to the existence of discernment.

If the faculty to discern does not exist, than the subject of the law cannot prefigure the determinant reason and, consequently, cannot express valid consent, as the said subject does not posess the intellectual faculties needed to "understand" and, then, to "want".

Therefore, it results that lack of discernment firstly affects the froming of determinant reason and only indirectly – by way and as a consequence of this situation – lack of discernment affects consent.

In conclusion, the condition that discernment exists is firstly a condition of cause and only after one of consent.

This reveals the interdependence consent-cause in view of the matter of discernment, as they both presume the existence of discernment, and in the hypothesis of its inexistence neither the cause exists, which triggers the invalidity of consent (which was not consciously expressed, as it misses determinant reason at the base).

Discernment equals to a person's possibility to foresee the consequences of ther actions. From a juridical poin of view and by regarding the juridical act, discernment represents the subject of law's aptitude to assess the juridical effects of their manifestation of will, to forsee its consequences.

The term "discernment" comes from Latin, respectively from discerno, discernere, which means to differ, to distinguish. And discerno comes from cerno, cernere, which means to observe. The etymology of the word thus shows its meaning. Discernment presumes firstly to observe and then to understand what you have oserved, respectively to foresee the consequences of your actions[7].

Or, looking in reverse, from the perspective of its inexistence, lack of discernment translates to the subject's disability to correctly foresee the effects of their actions. As shown, in view of the dispositions of art. 211 of Law no. 71/2011, lack of discernment means "the persons psychic incompetence to act critically and predictively regarding the socio-juridical consequences that may arise from exercising civil rights and obligations"[8].

The requirement for discernment to exist must not be mistaken for the condition of capacity[9], even if there is a close connection between them. Capacity represent a state of law (de iure), arising from law, and discernment is a state of fact (de facto)[10], being of psychological nature and having to be assessed from person to person, in view of their aptitude and psycho-intellectual power, even if the law has established some presumptions to their regard.

Discernment, theoretically, represents a premise for recognizing capacity to conclude juridical acts. The late "exclusively pertains to the legislator, which bases juridical capacity on the assumption that from a certain age we all have discernment for our actions"[11].

Thusly, individuals with full exercise capacity are presumed to posess the discernment needed for the conclusion of juridical acts. The one lacking exercise capacity (minor under 14 years of age and those placed under judicial injunction) is presumed not to have discernment, due to either early age, or mental health state. As for the minor between 14 and 18 years of age it is, generally, affirmed that their discernment is emerging, in order to emphasize ther intermediary situation. But this situation regards rather their capacity, than their discernment. In view of the matter hereunder, we must stress that the minor betewee 14 and 18 is presumed to have discernment because, as for the juridical acts they may conclude by themselves, according to rules governing capacity, the eventual lack of discernment must be proved by the person that invokes it[12].

In fact, when taking into account the issue of the existence of discernment we are only interested in acts concluded by persons with full exercise capacity and in acts conluded by persons with limited exercise capacity (minor between 14 and 18 years of age) by themselves, bot for which the rules of capacity did not request any approval.

The matter of acts concluded by those lacking exercise capacity or by those with limited exercise capacity, but for which prior approval was needed, will be solved according to capacity rules, without need for further checking the existence of discernment.

We have to mention that there are no special issues here regarding legal entities, because their representatives are always individuals with full exercise capacity.

We retain that, as a general rule, juridical capacity determines the assumption of existing discernment.

[9] French doctrine refered, when analyzing the aptitude of consenting, to two elemnts: on the one hand, incapacities – the issue of persons with an impossibility to express true consent, as per lack of juridical capacity, and, on the other hand, spiritual insanity – where we look at persons which have juridical capacity, but cannot assess the importance of their actions and, in consequence, cannot express valid consent. In both cases, the sanction is, on principle, relative nullity. See, for details, Terré, Fr.; Simler, Ph.; Lequette, Y., Droit civil. Les obligations, Dalloz, Précis Droit privé, 8th Edition, 2002, pages 98-105.

[11] I. Reghini, S. Diaconescu, P. Vasilescu, Introduction to civil law, Bucharest, Hamangiu Publishing House, 2013, page 487.

[12] To the same end, jurisprudence decided: "the capacity to contract, and also the valid consent of the party undertaking obligation are, as per provisions of art. 948 Civ.C. and of Decree no. 31/1954, validity conditions of the juridical act, the lack of either one being sanctioned by nullity. Even if they had not been declared incapable, according to law, the existence of valid consent cannot be retained, if upon conclusion of the act, for reasons of sickness, the party was lacking discernment."; see I.C.C.J., s. civ., dec. no. 51/15.01.2003, în C.J. no. 4/2004, page 75.

However, "the simultaneity of juridical and natural capacity"[13] does not exist in all cases.

Besides the cases in which the law presumes the person to be lacking discernment (legal incapacities), there are cases when persons having discernment by law (upon which, as preveiously shown, an assumption of existing discernment operates) are, however, temporarily lacking discernment (namely cases of natural incapacity). To that matter, drunkenness, hypnosis, sleep-walking, rage (ab irato) have been mentioned[14].

I must emphasize that, in the case of drunkenness, however, if it is voluntary, the cocontractor could claim compensation for damages caused by dissolution of contract for lack of discernment, naturally only if they have not participated to the occurrence of that state (in which case we might also have undue influence) or if they have not tried to take advantage of the other party's state (immoral cause or injury), situations in which their own guilt would prevent them from taking action. However, we consider that the nullity of the act could not be rejected because the law, when establishing consequence for lack of discernment, does not distinguish between the causes of that state.

To these, aforementioned, natural incapacities, we must assimilate the case of those mentally alienated or disabled before being placed under judicial injunction, surely in the hypothesis they are adults. Thusly, prior to the placement under injunction, they would be considered as having full exercise capacity and, therefore, presumed to have discernment. Yet, undoubtedly, the respective illness naturally affects discernment and, hence, eventual juridical acts concluded by them could be dissolved for failure to fulfill this condition regarding consent. In such cases it is possible for lucidity periods to appear. Should the act be conclude during a period of lucidity, the cause for relative nullity hereunder does no longer exist[15]. The mutual is not valid, to the point that a juridical act concluded by someone placed under injunction is sanctioned by relative nullity even if, upon conclusion, the person into matter would have had discernment (art. 172 Civ.C.), except, of course, for acts which the person under injunction could conclude by themselves (an aspect which further underscores the difference between discernment and capacity)[16].

This situation is also taken into account by the New Civil Code. As per art. 1205 align. 2, Civ.C., "the contract concluded by a person that is ulteriorly placed under injunction may be annulled if, upon conclusion of the act, the causes for placement under injunction existed and were fairly known".

This disposition will generate controversy when applied in practice, as the reason it was adopted, given the way it was formulated, is not clear. A grammarly interpretation of the text could lead to the conclusion that nullity could be sanctioned only if two conditions are cumulatively fulfilled: the person ulteriorly placed under injunction to have been lacking discernment upon conclusion of the act, while the causes for injunction already existed and, also, were fairly known. But this second condition appears to be excessive and har to accept. In this interpretation, the second condition is far from the reason for which it has been provided that lack of discernment triggers voidness of the juridical act, thus contradicting the expressly provided requirement (in the previous article – no. 1204), according to which consent must be knowingly expressed. There is no base for deciding to apply a sanction depending on an ulterior placement under injunction of the party lacking discernment (anyway, the cause for nullity is simultaneous to the conclusion of the juridical act, and it cannot be assessed in view of ulterior circumstances). Moreso, we cannot accept the fact that there are more conditions for annulment of the act for lack of discernment by the one ulteriorly placed under injunction, than by the one which has not been placed under injunction, even more so if the measure of placing under injunction is meant to protect the respective person[17].

The reason for which lack of discernment triggers the annulment of the contract is exactly that, in such case, the consent cannot be knowingly expressed. And, in the hypothesis hereunder, whether upon conclusion of the act, due to causes which ulteriorly lead to placement under injunction, the person lacked discernment, the requirement for the consent to be knowingly expressed is not fulfilled. And that does not depend on whether the respective causes were known or not. Knowledge of the causes which determined lack of discernment has no relevance to the validity of consent. Notwithstanding the fact that lack of discernment or its causes were known ("fairly") or not, consent was not validly expressed. The knowledge of the causes for placement under injunction could raise the issue of immoral purpose, but has no relevance to lack of discernment.

A second possible interpretation of the text hereunder would lead to the conclusion that the legislator only wanted to state the possibility of annulment of the act in the hypothesis in which, upon its conclusion, the causes that ulteriorly lead to injunction existed and were known, without representing conditions for ruling nullity. However this interpretation has two main flaws. Thusly, it does not take into account the way the text was written, failing to observe the reference to knowledge of the causes for injuction. Moreover, in this interpretation, the legal disposition has no effect. The possibility for declaring nullity given the circumstances (implying however an assessment of the extent to which, upon conclusion of the act, discernment had been affected) exists and there is no need for a norm to expressly provide it. Namely, in this interpretation, the legal disposition would be useless, which contradicts a traditional interpretation rule (taken from the matter of the juridical act) – actus interpretandus est potius ut valeat quam ut pereat.

For the same reasons we can neither agree with the opinion according to which the disposition only seeks to emphasize that, in the hypothesis thereunder, annulment can not be declared for lack of exercise capacity, but only for lack of discernment[18].

Finally, in one last interpretation it could be deemed that the text institutes an assumption of lack of discernment for the hypothesis in which, upon conclusion of contract, the causes ulteriorly leading to injunction existed and were known. Naturally we can assume that the reasons which determined the measure of placement under injunction, especially lack of discernment, existed upon conclusion of the act[19]. This interpretation has the advantage of finding, for the reference to the ulterior injunction and to the knowledge of its causes, a justification which would not contradict the validity requirements for consent. It would also give use to the disposition hereunder, by acknowledging its effect of establishing the assumption of lack of discernment[20].

As for the phrase "fairly known", it presumes the notoriety of existing causes which ulteriorly lead to placement under injunction. We must observe that there is no provision of a requirement for the cocontractor to have knowledge of those causes (case in which it would trigger the consequences of immoral cause or of injury). The condition of notoriety is meant to insure avoiding difficulties in establishing the moment when the causes which ulteriorly lead to injunction appeared.

Lack of discernment upon conclusion of a juridical act triggers the sanction of relative nullity of the respective act, as provided by both art. 1.205 Civ.C., with direct reference to lack of discernment, and art. 1.238 Civ.C., viewing lack of cause[21].

3. Conclusions

As we have seen, the existence of discernment constitutes a validity requirement for consent and a premise for the existence of cause, discernment being, hence, essential for the forming of juridical will. At the same time, discernment represents a premise for capacity, but is not to be confounded with the latter.

Therefore the necessity for the analysis brought forward by the present study, with the purpose of clarifying the requirement under matter, especially by a correct understanding of the legal dispositions referring to it.

Naturally, this analysis does not exhaustively cover the subject and it could be completed by, for example, an exam on jurisprudence in the matter, which would reveal new elements, at least regarding the difficulties of proving lack of discernment.

CLASSIFIED DOCUMENTS IN CIVIL LAWSUITS

Enikő DAMASCHIN*

Abstract

The purpose of this study is to approach classified documents from a very specific perspective: that of using them as evidence during a civil lawsuit. In this sense, we provide the definition of classified documents, give details about the way in which classification operations are performed, as well as the conditions that have to be met so that these documents could become declassified in case parties wanted to have access to the documents submitted to the case file. Moreover, we deal with the issue of submitting classified documents to court, with the way in which these documents could be accessed, considering the right to a fair trial.

Keywords: classified documents, civil lawsuit, the right to have access to evidence, the right to have access to court

1. Introduction*

With Book II, Chapter II, Section 2, Subsection 3 of the Romanian Civil Procedure Code (RCPC)[1], the legislator regulated the legal status of documents in terms of their use as evidence in civil proceedings. We recall in this connection that, according to the provisions listed in art. 250 RCPC, the burden of proof as far as a legal document or fact is concerned lies with the documents, witnesses, presumptions, testimony of one of the parties, given on its own initiative or obtained either by interrogation or expertise, the material objects, the investigation made or any other means provided for by law.

A document is defined by the provisions of art. 265 RCPC as any piece of writing or other record that contains information about a legal document or fact, regardless of its physical support or the preservation and storage means.

In a civil lawsuit, parties may use both authentic documents and documents under private signature, as well as electronic documents, for each of these categories being necessary to comply with the terms expressly provided for by the legislator. The documents can be electronically processed, and, in this situation, when the details of a legal document are electronically processed, the evidentiary instrument of this document is the document that reproduces these details, provided that it is comprehensible and incorporates sufficiently serious guarantees so that its contents, as well as the identity of the person who has produced it, could prove to be of good faith[2].

Regarding the proposal and management of documentary evidence, based on the provisions of art. 249 RCPC, according to which the party who makes a claim during the civil lawsuit must prove it, except for the cases stipulated by law, parties are required to submit all the documents they intend to use in order to resolve the dispute taken to court once they file the petition form, the statement of defense or the counterclaim, as appropriate, under penalty of preclusion.

Nevertheless, there are situations where parties, to the extent they are not state authorities or public institutions, are not in possession of the documents that are necessary to resolve the disputes. In this case, the provisions of art. 298 RCPC are to be followed, whereby, at the request of a party or ex officio, the court shall order that the given documents are to be made available by the public authorities or institutions holding them. The public authority or institution holding the documents has the right to refuse submitting the document when national defense, public security or diplomatic relations are at stake.

In other words, the public authority or institution holding the document could, for instance, refuse to send the document when it is classified, this right of refusal not being unconditional. Under these circumstances, we have to ask ourselves whether the right to a fair trial, provided for by art. 6 RCPC, as well as the principle of equality of arms, regulated by art. 8 RCPC, are observed in civil lawsuits.

In order to understand the legal status of this category of documents, we need to define this type of document. Additionally, by briefly analyzing how the information becomes classified or not, a more comprehensive perspective on this topic will be provided.

According to art. 15 of Law no. 182 of 2002 on the Protection of Classified Information[3], classified information is information, data, documents of interest to national security[4], which, due to the levels of

[3] Law no. 182 of 2002 on the protection of classified information, as amended, was published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 248 of April 12, 2002.

[4] According to art. 1 of Law no. 51/1991 on the national security of Romania, republished in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 190 of March 18, 2014, Romania's national security means the state of legality, social, economic and political stability and balance, necessary for the importance and consequences that would occur as a result of unauthorized disclosure or dissemination, shall be protected[5].

The categories of classification to which classified information may belong are state secrets and restricted secrets. The information classified as state secret comprises that information concerning national security, which, if disclosed, could compromise national security and defense, whereas the information classified as restricted secret comprises information which, if disclosed, is likely to cause harm to a legal entity of public or private law. Also, within the class of information classified as state secret information, information can be divided into special classification levels, according to the damage that might occur through disclosure: NATO top secret information, NATO secret information and NATO confidential information.

An important aspect is the fact that, in principle, the two classes of classified information are governed by different regulations: the legal status of the class of information classified as state secret is provided for by Government Decision no. 585 of 2002[6], whereas the restricted secret information is protected by the provisions of Government Decision no. 781 of 2002[7]. We used the phrase 'in principle' to refer to the legal regime to be applied to the two classes of classification because, within certain limits, the provisions of Government Decision no. 585/2002 are also to be observed in order to protect restricted classified information[8].

We would like to point out that classified information should not be confused with trade secrets, the reason for restricting access to classified information pertaining to the protection of information related to national security and defense and not to the protection of certain secrets in relevant industrial areas, which has to do with the freedom of trade and industry, as it is enshrined in the provisions of art. 135 para. (2) a) of the Constitution of Romania[9].

In this context, it might prove useful to specify that trade secret[10] is defined as information which, wholly or partly, is not generally known or easily accessible to people dealing usually with this kind of information and which acquires commercial value because of the fact that it is secret, for which the legitimate holder took reasonable steps under the circumstances, to be kept under secrecy; trade secret protection operates as long as the previously mentioned conditions are cumulatively met[11].

Romanian national state to exist and develop as a sovereign, unitary, independent, indivisible state, to maintain the rule of law, and necessary for the Romanian citizens to unrestrainedly exercise their rights, freedoms and fundamental duties, according to democratic principles and norms enshrined in the Constitution of Romania.

[5] According to art. 17 of Law no. 182/2002, "The category of state secret information comprises information representing or relating to: a) the national defense system and its basic elements, military operations, manufacturing technologies, armament and combat characteristics used exclusively within the national defense system elements; b) plans and military devices, personnel and missions of the forces engaged; c) the state cipher and other encrypting elements established by the competent public authorities and the activities related to their implementation and use; d) the organization of the protection and defense systems for the objectives, sectors, as well as the special and military computer networks, including their security mechanisms; e) data, schemes and programs relating to communication systems, as well as the special and military computer networks, including their security mechanisms; f) the intelligence activity carried out by public authorities established by law for national defense and security; g) means, methods, techniques and equipment, as well as the specific information sources used by public authorities that carry out intelligence activities; h) maps, topographical plans, thermograms and air flight records performed at scales larger than 1: 20,000, which exhibit the elements of content or the objectives classified as state secrets. i) studies, geological surveys and gravimetric analysis with density higher than one point per square kilometer, which assess national reserves of radioactive, disperse, precious and rare metals and ores, as well as data and information related to the material reserves that are the competence of the National Administration of State Reserves; j) systems and plans to supply electricity, heat, water and other utilities necessary for the operation of the objectives classified as state secrets; k) scientific activities, technological and economic activities and investments related to national security or national defense or which have special importance for the economic, technical and scientific interests of Romania; l) scientific research in nuclear technologies, besides the fundamental ones, as well as the programs for the protection and security of the nuclear materials and installations; m) issuing, printing banknotes and minting coins, the mockups of the monetary issues of National Bank of Romania and security features of banknotes and coins for detecting counterfeits, not for advertising, as well as printing securities such as government securities, treasury and government bonds; n) external relations and activities of the Romanian state, which by law are not meant for publicity, as well as intelligence belonging to other States or international organizations, to which, through treaties or international agreements, the Romanian government has committed itself to protect.".

2. Classification and declassification of documents[12]

When labeling a piece of information as classified, the originator must take into account a number of objective and subjective criteria resulting from the way the legislator intended to regulate this area. In this regard, all authorities / institutions that draft or work with classified information are obliged to draw up guidelines for classification on which proper and uniform classification could be carried out.

Besides the previously mentioned guidelines, public authorities and institutions are obliged to draw up their own lists comprising the categories of state secret information in their fields, lists that are approved and updated by Government decision. Moreover, the units holding restricted secret information are required to draw up lists comprising these categories of information, lists which shall contain information relating to that unit's activity and which, while not constituting state secrets, within the meaning of the law, should be only known by the persons who need it to perform their official duties.

In this respect, for instance, when drafting a document, the originator is obliged to consult the guidelines and the lists of state secret information, or the list of restricted secret information, respectively, in order to assign the appropriate class and level of secrecy to the document, as these are the tools which basically provide objective criteria for the originator to classify or not the information included in that document.

Nevertheless, the originator might draw up a document containing data and information from different classes of classification, or data and information from the same class of secrecy but with different classification levels, or data and information taken from both classified and unclassified documents. Usually, if the document reproduces information belonging to different classes of secrecy, the resulting document will bear the highest level of secrecy. But, at the same time, without violating any legal provision in force, in this situation, classification may also be performed considering the content criterion, which is subjective. Thus, if the information is not reproduced exactly, but it is processed or partially reproduced, the resulting information may or may not be classified, according to its actual content. The originator is the one who assesses the features to be assigned to the document, as the legislator allows him/her to assign the appropriate level of secrecy according to the content of that document.

Consequently, in practice the following situations may arise:

a) the originator[13] consults the classification guidelines and the lists of classified information, he/she finds that the information contained in the drafted document falls within one of the categories included in the list, he/she considers that it is mandatory to protect information due to its content and he/she assigns the document a class and a level of secrecy;
b) the originator consults the guidelines and the lists of classified information, he/she finds that the information contained in the drafted document falls within one of the categories included in the lists, however, he/she considers that, by referring to the content of the document, there is no need to protect it and no level of secrecy is assigned to that document;
c) the originator consults the guidelines and the lists of classified information, he/she finds that the information contained in the drafted document doesn't fall within any of the categories mentioned in the lists of classified information, but in relation to its content, it is mandatory to protect information, and thus that document is submitted for classification.

Another aspect should be outlined here: if the document has several annexes, they will be classified or not, depending on their content, but as long as the document will be treated as a whole, annexes cannot be separated in terms of their content and the document will benefit from protection measures relating to the annex / document bearing the highest level of secrecy. It is also necessary to mention in this context that each originator is required to establish the periods of classification, depending on the importance of information and the consequences that might arise in case of unauthorized disclosure or dissemination.

As far as declassifying information is concerned, according to provisions in art. 20 of Government Decision no. 585/2002, this operation is authorized when the classification period has expired, disclosure shall not endanger national security, defense, public order or the interests of public or private persons holding the information or the classified character of the respective information and when that information was classified by a person who was not empowered by law.

[12] For more details see Chapter II - Classification and declassification of information. Minimum safeguards specific for secrecy classes and levels, in Government Decision no. 585/2002.

[13] According to art. 19 of Law no. 182/2002, "The individuals occupying one of the following offices are empowered to assign documents one of the classification levels, during their drafting: a) for NATO top secret information: 1. the President of Romania; 2. the President of the Senate and the President of the Chamber of Deputies; 3. the members of the Supreme Council of National Defense; 4. the Prime Minister; 5. Government members and the Secretary General of the Government; 6. the Governor of the National Bank of Romania; 7. directors of the national intelligence services; 8. the Director of the Protection and Guard Service; 9. the Director of the Special Telecommunications Service; 10. the Secretary General of the Senate and the Secretary General of the Chamber of Deputies; 11. the President of the National Institute of Statistics; 12. the Director of the National Administration of State Reserves; 13. other authorities empowered by the President or the Prime Minister; b) for NATO secret information – those empowered referred to in subparagraph a), as well as officials with the rank of secretary of state, according to their material competences; c) NATO confidential - those empowered referred to in subparagraphs a) and b), as well as senior officials with the rank of subsecretary of state, secretary general or director general, according to their material competences."

Declassification can be done by the originators, who must obtain the prior approval of institutions that coordinate and control the safeguards for the protection of classified information, according to their material competences. Thus, it is inferred that the originator has the option to declassify information whenever he/she considers that disclosure or dissemination would not cause damage to national security, national defense, public order or the interests of public or private persons holding the information.

3. Using classified documents in civil lawsuits

As shown in the first section, the parties have the duty to submit all the documents they intend to use in order to resolve the dispute, and, in case the documents are held by public authorities or institutions, the court may order the submission of documents in court, if it considers this piece of evidence to be admissible and useful.

Insofar as the document concerns national defense, the authority may refuse to submit the document. In this context, one word of caution is necessary: essentially, based on the analysis of how the legislator defined classified information, making express reference to national security, it follows that the documents relating to national defense are usually labeled as classified. Under these circumstances, by systematically analyzing legal reference texts, we find that by means of the final thesis statement in paragraph (2) of art. 298 CPC reference is made to art. 252 CPC, according to which the substantive provisions contained in classified documents can be proven and consulted only as provided for by law.

Given these arguments, we consider that only the label 'classified' assigned to a document may not constitute a reason per se for refusing to submit the respective document to court, while courts have not only the right of access to classified information but also powers to control the overstatement or understatement of the secrecy level and the duration for which they were classified. Additionally, one has to underline the fact that, in order to achieve this purpose, the phrase "those related to national defense and security", contained in art. 5 para. (3) of Law no. 554/2004[14], was declared unconstitutional, contrary to the provisions of art. 126 para. (6) of the Constitution of Romania, as on the basis of this phrase the administrative acts related to national defense and security[15] could circumvent the judicial review of the contentious administrative court.

Thus, we consider that the provisions of art. 298 in relation to art. 252 CPC are derogatory with respect to the need-to-know principle, whose fulfillment is checked only by the originator, who is held liable for unauthorized disclosure or dissemination. Therefore, public institutions or authorities holding the document may not refuse to submit the classified document at the request of the court only by invoking its classified nature. On the other hand, we consider that the submission of such a document may be refused to the extent that such refusal is duly justified (for instance, refusal to submit to the administrative court documents that formed the basis for issuing an adverse opinion for some individuals to enter the national territory, motivated not only by their classified nature, but also by using reference documents by the authorities with jurisdiction in criminal matters).

As for the way courts deal with classified information, this activity is regulated by the provisions of the decision of the Superior Council of Magistracy no. 140 of February 6, 2014 approving the Regulation on the access of judges, prosecutors and assistant magistrates of the High Court of Cassation and Justice to information classified as state secrets and restricted secrets[16]. At the same time, we would like to emphasize the fact that this act was issued due to changes in the provisions of art. 7, para. (4) of Law no. 182/2002, in terms of providing access to classified information for all judges, provided they have been appointed and taken the oath. Prior to this legislative change, only certain judges had access to classified information, an aspect that has aroused lively controversies especially in terms of ensuring the random distribution of cases.

According to art. 11 of the decision of the Superior Council of Magistracy no. 140/2014, classified documents shall be kept in separate volumes, which are not publicly available. Classified documents may be made available to court staff or, where appropriate, to prosecutors, parties, their defenders, experts, interpreters, according to the procedures stipulated by Law no. 182/2002 and Government Decision no. 585/2002, Government Decision no. 781/2002, respectively, as appropriate, and only if they have security clearance for access to classified information or access authorization corresponding to the class or the secrecy level of each of the given [14] According to art. 5 para. (3) of Law no. 554/2004 "administrative acts issued to enforce the state of war, the state of siege or of emergency, as well as those related to national defense and security or those issued to restore law and order, to eliminate the consequences of natural disasters, epidemics and epizooties, can be contested only for abuse of power." Law no. 554 of December 2, 2004, on the administrative contentious, with amendments and supplements, was published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 1154 of December 7, 2004.

[15] In this respect, see the Constitutional Court Decision no. 302 of March 7, 2011 regarding the exception of unconstitutionality of the provisions in art. 7 para. (4), art. 17 (f), art. 20 and art. 28 para. (1) of Law no. 182/2002 on the protection of classified information, as well as art. 5 para. (3) of Law no. 554/2004 on administrative contentious, published in the Official Gazette of Romania no. 316, of May 9, 2011.

(1) and Art. 34 lit. j) of the Law no. 182/2002 on the protection of classified information and art. 3 and art. 13 of Law no. 51/1991 on the national security of Romania, published in the Official Gazette no. 798 of November 27, 2008.

documents and provided they give arguments for the need-to-know principle.

Analyzing the provisions mentioned, we have demonstrated that they cannot be fully enforced and that they are ineffective in terms of parties' access to classified documents in the file, being inconsistent with the higher level rules of law included in the Government Decision no. 585/2002. Thus, one could notice that the authorization of access to classified information is defined as a document issued by the competent institutions, the head of the legal person holding such information, which confirms that, by performing professional duties, the holder can have access to state secret information of a certain level of secrecy, complying with the need-to-know principle; additionally, the security certificate is defined as a document issued to the person with direct responsibilities in the protection of classified information, to the security officer or to the employee belonging to the security structure, who proves verification and accreditation to hold, to access and to work with classified information of a certain level of secrecy. Or, obviously, one party in a lawsuit cannot obtain authorization to access classified information / certificate security, as these authorization documents are to be issued only when they are necessary to carry out job duties.

In such circumstances, we consider that, since the resolution of a dispute involves examining classified documents, to ensure the right to a fair trial, first it is necessary to verify the conditions under which reference documents might be declassified. In this regard, the court assigned to resolve the dispute should notify the originator to consider the opportunity of declassifying reference documents, as such a procedure is possible in terms of art. 20 and art. 21 of the Government Decision no. 585/2002.

Moreover, the issuing authority is able to make and communicate declassified partial extracts, from the original document, as such a measure is expressly provided for by art. 298 CPC. In case the documents may not be declassifed, the dispute will be resolved appropriately, as these documents are kept in separate volumes, access being provided only to those who hold proper authorization and who will justify the need to know the reference documents.

It is appropriate to mention in this context that, over time, the parties have invoked the constitutional challenge of art of the provisions on access to classified information, arguing that the contested legal texts infringe the right to a fair trial under one, impartial and equal justice for all. Nevertheless, the Romanian Constitutional Court was constant as far as its case law is concerned and dismissed the constitutional challenge of art as unfounded, stating that it is natural that Law no. 182/2002 contain specific rules on certain persons' access to such information, that is persons who are parties in a lawsuit, as well as their representatives, on condition that the security clearance certificate be obtained, for which it is necessary that the requirements and the procedure, provided for by the same law, be complied with beforehand. Since the legal provisions under criticism do not have the effect of effectively and absolutely blocking access to certain information, but, on the contrary, they make it conditional upon taking certain procedural steps, stages justified by the importance of such information, one cannot advocate the infrigement of the right to a fair trial or of the principle that justice shall be one, impartial, and equal for all. On the other hand, the Constitution of Romanian itself provides for, according to art. 53 para. (1), the possibility to restrict the exercise of certain rights - including guarantees related to a fair trial - for reasons of safeguarding national security[17].

3. Conclusions

In civil lawsuits documents occupy an important place in terms of evidence and ensuring the parties' access to the case file is a key issue when respecting the right to a fair trial and exercising procedural rights equally without discrimination. It is to be noted, however, that there are situations where access to certain documents cannot be provided, or at least cannot be provided to all persons involved in the settlement of the dispute, as some of them do not have the effective opportunity to obtain the authorization documents required for consulting the documents.

We appreciate, however, that, in such a situation, the possibility of declassifying the documents to ensure access for all parties to all parts of the file should be thoroughly analyzed for each particular case. But in the event that such an operation is not possible, the dispute shall be settled by reference to all the documents submitted, even if not all the parties have access to them. We do not consider, however, that the existence of an ongoing lawsuit might constitute a pertinent reason to declassify a document as, usually, in a civil lawsuit two or more private interests are in opposition, because documents are assigned a classification level to protect certain general interests as it is widely accepted that individual rights must be exercised consistent with collective rights.

Finally, the restrictions related to the access to information have always been accepted, even in the practice of the European Court of Human Rights, on condition that they be provided for by law, have a legitimate aim and be necessary in a democratic society.

PROFESSIONAL LIABILITY. PARTICULARITIES OF CIVIL LIABILITY REGARDING THE LIBERAL PROFESSIONS

Ruxandra-Cristina DUȚESCU[*]

Abstract

With the evolution and modernization of the liberal professions, both practitioners and clients are also aware of their rights and obligations, the risks involved in exercising professions that depend on the accuracy of information, the stability of decisions, and the observance of deadlines. The present study looks at the appearance of the particularities of the civil liability in the liberal professions existing in Romania in relation to the legal obligation to conclude an insurance policy for professional liability, as well as the situations and conditions in which it produces its effects.

Keywords: liberal profession, liability, insurance, particularities, obligation

1. Introduction

The term liberal profession is found in many normative acts. According to Law no. 200/2004 on the recognition of diplomas and professional qualifications for regulated professions in Romania[1], regulated professional activity represents the activity for which the access or exercise in Romania is directly or indirectly conditioned by the possession of a document attesting the level of professional training.

Occupational regulated professional activities are considered to be professional activities if the use of such a title is reserved only to holders of documents attesting to the level of professional training. The notion of liberal profession is also found in the Fiscal Code, being defined as the occupation exercised on its own behalf by natural persons, according to the special normative acts that regulate the organization and the exercise of the respective profession. Exercising an independent activity involves doing it on its own and pursuing a lucrative purpose. However, even if exercised on its own account, the liberal profession depends on a professional body and is distinctly regulated by a normative act. Members of the liberal professions are constituted as distinct professional bodies based on their own statute, adopted under the law and by virtue of which they have the right to practice and to be accountable for the professional act they perform.

Professional liability occurs as a result of the activity of protecting and achieving a public interest, as well as of a private interest, in exchange for a payment called honor. Two of the most representative legal professions are those of a notary public and a bailiff. These are specific to the profession of lawyer in that the act of the public notary and of the bailiff is an act of public authority.

2. Content

2.1. The Notary's Responsibility

The conditions for exercising the profession of notary are provided by Law no. 36/1995 of the notaries public and of the notarial activity and in the Regulation for the implementation of Law no. 36/1995.

Notarial activity ensures legal and natural persons to establish non-litigious civil or commercial legal relationships, as well as the exercise of rights and the protection of interests, in accordance with the law[2]. The legislator regulated various types of legal liability of the notary public, each of which interfered with the gravity of the deviation from the legal norms. This will raise the question of the disciplinary, civil or criminal liability of the notary public according to the violated norm[3].

The public notary shall be liable to disciplinary action if it misappropriates its duties as to the legality of the legal relations it finds, the exercise of rights and the protection of the interests of legal persons requesting the conclusion of notarial acts. Disciplinary liability will also arise when the public notary carries out acts that affect the honor and prestige of the notary profession, facts that will impose a sanction proportional to the seriousness of the offense committed. The civil liability of the notary public will intervene in cases where, through his activity, the notary would cause damage to a natural or legal person because he violated some professional obligations by causing guilty liability in the form of bad faith, established by a final court decision. The most severe form of legal liability to which the public notary may be subjected is criminal liability.

From the point of view of the civil liability of the notary, this can be both contractual and tortuous.

[3] Ionut Alexandru Toader, Legal Responsibility of the Public Notary in National and European Context - Doctoral Thesis, Bucharest, 2016.

Regarding contractual civil liability, it intervenes under the conditions of art. 78 par. (2) of Law no. 36/1995, respectively, if a contract is concluded for a determined period between the latter and a natural or legal person, regarding the consultations given in the notarial legal field.

According to art. 72 of the Law no. 36/1995, the civic liability of the public notary may be engaged under civil law, for violation of his professional obligations, when he caused guilty, in the form of bad faith, an injury determined by a final court decision. Thus, the special law of public notaries has to be interpreted in correlation with the provisions of the Civil Code, since the special rule derogates from the general rule, but this is not capable of opposing the two normative acts.

Article 1258 of the Civil Code regulates a special form of liability of the notary who may be obliged to repair the damage in case of invalidity of the contract concluded in the authentic form[4].

In the event of the annulment or finding of the nullity of the contract concluded in the authentic form for a cause of nullity, the existence of which results from the contract itself, the injured party may require the public notary to pay compensation for the damages suffered, under the conditions of the tort liability for his own deed[5].

Article 1258 establishes a form of special responsibility for the personal act of a notary public, who is charged with the existence of a cause of nullity resulting from the content of the contract itself. The text of the law takes into account the situation of finding the nullity of a contract concluded in the authentic form and presupposes verification of the following conditions[6]:

- the cause of nullity results from the text of the contract itself. No liability can be assumed by the notary irrespective of the cause of nullity, but only for a cause of nullity in close connection with the notarial act of authentication of acts.
- there is damage;
- the law does not specify whether authentication is an ad validitatem requirement for the contract requirement or only an option of the contracting parties, so that the ubi lex non distinguit nec nos distinguere debemus rule will apply[7].

Moreover, in order for the patrimonial responsibility of the notary to be attracted, it is necessary to have a final decision stating the nullity of the legal act authenticated by the notary public[8].

Taking into account the principles of civil tort liability, the phrase "the cause of nullity of which the existence derives from the text of the contract itself" must be understood as a nullity imputable to the notary in the sense that, although he knew or ought to know that by concluding the contract Violates rules that may invalidate the contract, did not refuse to process the authentication procedure. Per a contrario, the notary can not be held liable if a contract is unenforceable for error, dollar, violence or injury, because it is impossible to censure such causes of nullity if he does not know them[9].

The special responsibility regulated by art. 1258 Civil Code is not a joint or subsidiary liability. The aggrieved party has the right to choose between to excoriate the Contractor or notary public. In the circumstances where the notary public benefits from civil liability insurance, the interested party will address with indemnity to the insurer, within the limits of the insured amount, being able to act on the contractor for possible injury differences not covered by the insurance policy[10].

Regarding the insurance, the public notary is obliged, prior to the commencement of the activity, under the sanction of non-issuance of the operating license, to conclude the insurance contract with the Public Notary Insurance House. During the exercise of the position, the notary is obliged to pay annually the price of the insurance policy established by the insurance contract. Failure to comply with this obligation results in the withdrawal of the operating license.

Specifically to this profession, as in the case of the bailiff, is the fact that the legislator imposed the establishment of an insurance house of the notary public through which the civil liability insurance for its members was to be carried out. Therefore, the Insurance House aims at ensuring the civil liability of the notary public for damages caused by notarial deeds and acts, except for the damages caused by intentional acts. The insured quality of the Notary Public Insurance Company is acquired before the public notary begins to carry out its activity, according to the law, by concluding the insurance contract and will become effective at the beginning of the activity[11]. The civil liability insurance of notaries in service is compulsory, the rights and obligations of each party being determined by the insurance contract and by Law no. 36/1995. According to art. 15 of the Statute of the Romanian Notary Public Insurance Company, the insured risk represents the damage caused by the public notaries, by fault, by notarial acts and legal acts. The civil liability insurance of the notary public guarantees the payment of the damage within the limit of the insured amount established by the contract concluded with the Insurance House.

The insurance is valid from the beginning of the activity of the notary public till the termination of his / her quality, being operative both for the period when the notary is in the exercise of the function, and after this period, provided that the insured event occurred during the exercise of the position.

Failure to comply with the term for the subscription of the subscribed insurance premiums without the approval of the Insurance House in the course of the year results in the failure to pay compensation. The insurance contract is an enforceable title for the amount due for the insurance premium and the related penalties. Depending on the professional risk assessment sheet, the notary will determine the annual amount of the insurance premium, the insured amount, as well as the type of the insurance policy.

Insurance cover:

- damages caused by the public notary, by fault, by his own deeds or by his employees, in the exercise of his professional duties;
- damages caused by the public notary as a result of the loss, destruction or deterioration of the original documents;
- damage caused to the values entrusted to the warehouse, except for cases where its disappearance, destruction or loss is the result of a fortuitous case or force majeure.

The insurer does not pay damages for damages caused by the notary through his own deeds or employees when the event occurred:

- a case of force majeure;
- from the exclusive fault of the person harmed;
- from the exclusive guilt of a third person.

The insurer will pay the damages to the injured party, insofar as he has not been compensated by the insured.

The Insurance House may conclude reinsurance contracts with insurance companies, the conditions and premiums being determined by the reinsurance contract.

By concluding, liability is incumbent on all damages caused by the public notary, by fault, by his own deeds or by his employees, in the exercise of his professional duties. Therefore, the text establishes responsibility for the notary's own deed, but also a liability for the notary's employees. In both cases, the liability of the insurer is only incidental if the detrimental act has occurred in the "exercise of his professional duties". Civil liability operates in all cases where the notary public or his employees have acted "by fault".

2.2. Liability of the bailiff

The legal liability of bailiffs in Romania is regulated by Law no. 188/2000 on Judicial Bailiffs, the Regulation for the Application of this Law, the Statute of the National Union of Judicial Executives and the Judicial Exercise and the Code of Ethics of the Bailiff. These legal provisions regulate only two types of liability, namely: civil liability and disciplinary liability.

The normative acts indicated do not regulate plenum liability of bailiffs, but this is fully applicable in situations where a bailiff commits a criminal offense[12]. However, the three types of liability co-exist, not excluding each other, but their application is neither mandatory nor concomitant. There are situations in which a bailiff for the same deed can answer civil, criminal and disciplinary. As with other professions, the civil liability of the bailiff may be engaged under civil law, for causing damage by violating his professional obligations[13].

As regards professional insurance for civil liability of bailiffs, the legislator chose a solution similar to that of notaries public, ie an insurance house operating in a mutual system. Thus, according to art. 35 paragraph (1) of the Law no. 188/2000 within the National Union of Judicial Executives operates an insurance house for ensuring the civil liability of bailiffs with legal personality.

If the bailiff works in conjunction with other bailiffs, the liability is not solid, because regardless of the form of the activity, the personal attributions and the responsibility for the drawn up acts belong exclusively to the bailiff who has drafted them.

The conditions in which the civil liability of the bailiff can be undertaken are provided by art. 1357-1371 and art. 1381-1395 Civil Code.

Thus, it must be proved that the bailiff caused damage to one of the persons concerned in forced execution by violating a subjective right as a result of an unlawful act in the exercise of his profession. The damage can be both patrimonial and moral. The reparation of the damage occurs in its entirety, being compensated and for future damage if its production is unquestionable. Injury can only be the result of an illicit act, which means that by an action or inaction the rules of objective law are violated. Regarding the obligation of the bailiff in forced execution, we consider that this is a duty of diligence, not a result obligation. This also results unequivocally from the provisions of art. 627 par. (1) The Code of Civil Procedure, which stipulates that the executor is obliged to play an active role throughout the execution of the execution, stating, by all means permitted by law, for the full and speedy fulfillment of the obligation stipulated in the enforceable title, in compliance with the provisions of the law, the rights of parties and other interested parties. Therefore, the obligation of the bailiff is to carry out all the necessary steps to carry out forced execution.

The engagement of the civil liability of the bailiff presupposes not only the existence of an illicit deed and injury but also a causal relationship between the two. In order to answer civilly, it is necessary that the wrongful act be attributable to the bailiff, so that he is guilty of commiting it.

[13] Art. 45 par. (1) of Law no. 188/2000.

Ensuring professional liability of bailiffs is mandatory, according to the law. The rights and obligations of the parties are established by statute and by contract. As in the case of notaries, and in relation to the liability of the bailiffs, the existence of an insurance house functioning in a mutual system is regulated. The Insurance Executor's Court is a body with legal personality, which includes all final, or trainees' bailiffs who work on the territory of Romania. The purpose of this structure is the compulsory insurance of the civil liability of the bailiff, for the damages caused to third parties by their own deeds or by their employees.

According to art. 24[14] of the Statute of the Insurance Company of the Judiciary Executors the insurance covers:

- damages caused by the bailiff by his own actions or by his employees, due to negligence, mistake or imprudence in the exercise of his professional duties;
- damages caused by the bailiff for the values entrusted to the depository, except for the cases where their disappearance, destruction or loss is the result of a fortuitous case or force majeure case;
- damages caused by the bailiff as a result of the loss, destruction or deterioration of the original documents given by the clients for execution, limited to the cost of their recovery.

Insurance does not cover[15]:

- damages caused by operations which are forbidden to the bailiff by the legal provisions or statutory and statutory provisions of the profession;
- the insured event that was intentionally produced by the insured person, his or her beneficiary or the beneficiary;
- damages due to mistaken drafting, exclusively due to the fault of the beneficiary;
- the part of the damage exceeding the maximum compensation limit, produced in the same year and the same insured event, regardless of the number of beneficiaries;
- prejudice to the insurer's exercise of other activities, including those permitted by law as compatible with the profession of bailiff.

The insured is obliged to notify the insurer of the insurance risk within 30 days of becoming aware of the existence of a claim for compensation. At the same time, he will inform the insurer of any claim or action brought by the lawyer to obtain damages and, in the meantime, will pass on documents, information, and litigation on time. If these obligations are not met, the insurer has the right to refuse to pay the indemnity, if for this reason he could not determine the cause of the insured event and the extent of the damage.

The rights of the indemnified persons will be exercised against those responsible for causing the damage. The insurer may be sued by the injured party within the limits of the obligations incumbent on him or may intervene in his own name in civil actions against the insured.

Compensation is established on the basis of a final court order, whereby the insured / insurer was bound, at the request of the injured party.

The insurer pays the indemnity to the injured party, insofar as he has not been compensated by the insured, indemnity that can not be tracked by the insured's creditors. Compensation is paid to the insured, if he proves that he has compensated the injured. The insurer has the right to offset the premiums due to him by the end of the calendar year, with any compensation due to the beneficiary or the insured. The indemnity established in the insurer's liability in relation to all the insured events occurring in the calendar year of insurance is made according to the Insurance Contract, regardless of the number of events, produced and notified to the insurer.

The maximum limit of indemnity for the calendar year of insurance refers to the insurer's liability for all amounts payable to a beneficiary or number of beneficiaries in respect of all insured events as a result of the insured's professional misconduct from that year of insurance. If the damage caused is greater, the insurer is not responsible for covering the difference. In this case, the bailiff remains solely responsible to the injured person. If the fault occurs through several successive acts, the fault is deemed to have occurred at the time of the first act or guilty omission

3. Conclusions

Characteristic of notaries and bailiffs is the existence of a mutual insurance system, each professional body having its own insurance house. The mutual insurance system can be complemented by the classical civil liability insurance system. Thus, for a greater coverage of the insured risk, over the limit of the mutual system, an additional insurance policy can be concluded with an insurance company.Creating a system for defamation of the person injured by the poor performance of the professional duties by the notary or the bailiff is extremely favorable as it provides a quick and effective way of compensation.

MEDICAL MALPRACTICE. THE MALPRACTICE INSURANCE

Ruxandra-Cristina DUȚESCU*

Abstract

Increasingly, complaints about medical malpractice ocure extreme situations such as the death of the person or the occurrence of irreparable injuries. Professional misconduct in the exercise of the medical or medical-pharmaceutical act generating harm to the patient implies the civil liability of medical personnel and the provider of medical, sanitary and pharmaceutical products and services. Law no. 95/2006 on the health reform stipulates the obligation of the medical staff to conclude a malpractice insurance for the cases of professional civil liability for the damages created by the medical act, the indemnities being the responsibility of the insurer, within the limits of the liability established by the insurance policy.

Keywords: medical, malpraxis, insurance, liability, sanction

1. Introduction

From the etymological point of view, the word malpraxis defines an inappropriate practice, being an internationalized, self-governing word, used only in the medical field, and currently spreading to other professions such as lawyer, notary public, Bailiff, etc. Also included in the explanatory dictionary of the Romanian language, it defines malpractice as an "improper or negligent treatment applied by a doctor to a patient, which causes him harm of any nature in relation to the degree of impairment of physical and mental capacity." In the Romanian legal system, any person has the duty to observe the rules of conduct which the law or custom of the place requires, and not to interfere with his actions or inactions, the rights or legitimate interests of others. The one who, having discernment violates this duty, is liable for all the damages caused, being obliged to repair them fully. At the same time, the person who contracts obligations is held to execute them, otherwise being responsible for the damage caused to the other party, being obliged to repair it. Specific malpractice is even the existence of rules of conduct imposed by the profession and the professional body, which establish competences and attributions in the field, rules that are violated by the professional, attracting his responsibility.

Professional misconduct in the exercise of the medical or medical-pharmaceutical act generates harm to the patient, involving the responsibility of the doctor or the medical staff. Like civil liability, the malpractice also seeks to repair the damage caused by committing an illicit act in a pre-existing legal relationship between a professional and a patient. Thus, medical malpractice is interested in determining who is to respond to the action or inaction, establishing the extent of the damage created and the limits to which the responsible person can answer.

Title XVI of Law no. 95/2006 on Health Reform establishes the extent of the civil liability of medical personnel, as well as the procedure for determining the cases of professional liability. At the same time, the same normative act imposes the duty of those who grant medical assistance, to conclude a malpractice insurance for the cases of professional liability for damages caused by the medical act.

2. Medical practice

The legal notion of medical malpractice is defined by art. 653 par. (1) letter b) of the Law no. 95/2006 on the health reform as being professional misconduct in the exercise of the medical or medicopharmaceutical act generating harm to the patient, involving the civil liability of medical personnel and the supplier of medical, sanitary and pharmaceutical products and services. Within the same normative act, medical staff is the doctor, dentist, pharmacist, nurse and midwife who provides medical services. Starting from this definition, we note that engaging civil liability in malpractice-specific conditions occurs when the individual violates a rule of professional conduct. At the same time, one of the conditions of malpractice is that there is a legal relationship of the professional nature (doctor-patient) between the victim of the injury and the victim[1].

However, it is well known that the basis of civil liability is either the law or the parties' contract. Regarding the subject of this article, according to the legal provisions (art.653 corroborated with art.660 et seq. From Law no 95/2006), we may consider that the basis of the doctor's responsibility for failure or poor fulfillment of the professional obligations has its source both in Law, but also in the medical agreement (patient informed consent).

However, the informed patient's consent implies that, prior to being subjected to any method of prevention, diagnosis and treatment with potential for patient risk, the physician has the duty to explain in reasonable terms the patient's ability to understand, will be subjected.In turn, the patient gives his written consent for the medical procedures.

In fact, written consent is only a guarantee that the patient has agreed to perform a particular medical procedure, without totally or partially exonerating him from a responsible physician in case of a professional error[2].

Thus, we can not consider the patient's informed consent as a genuine contract, as the doctor's obligations are not established. The main consequence of this circumstance is that, in the case of malpractice, we can not speak of a contractual civil liability, but exclusively of civil tort liability, the doctor's obligations stemming from the law.

Medical civil liability is always a criminal liability because life, health, physical or mental integrity can not be the subject of a convention, and if such legal acts were concluded, they should be considered null and void under Art. 1229 Civil Code, according to which, "only goods that are in the civil circuit may be the subject of contractual provision"[3].

As a form of tort law, malpractice, in most cases, is found in the form of civil liability for its own deed, as a form of tortuous civil liability. Even though the law also governs other forms of tort / delict liability, liability for other person's deeds and damage caused by things, these are atypical for malpractice.

2.1. Conditions of Liability for Own Deed

The provisions of art. 1357 paragraph (1) of the Civil Code state that "the one who causes another to suffer an offense by an offense committed with guilt is obliged to fix it." Therefore, the general conditions regarding tort liability in the sense that there must be an unlawful deed, injury, causality and guilt must be met. Liability for own deed is the principal area of liability based on the fault of the perpetrator, the fault not presumed, but must be proven by the victim.

As far as the professional error (illicit deed) is concerned, it has not been given a legal definition, but the legislator[4] has exemplified the forms of this error. Medical staff is civilian responsible for:

- professional error;
- insufficient medical knowledge in the exercise of the profession;
- preservation of legal regulations on confidentiality, informed consent and the obligation to provide medical assistance;
- depending limits of competence, except in the case of emergency where no medical personnel with the necessary competence is available.

Nonetheless, the lawyer also provided for the medical staff not to be liable for damages and damages in the exercise of the profession, namely when these damages:

a) is due to working conditions, insufficient equipment with diagnostic and treatment equipment, nosocomial infections, adverse effects, complications and generally accepted risks of investigation and treatment methods, hidden vices of sanitary materials, medical equipment and devices, sanitary equipment used;
b) acting in good faith in emergency situations, respecting the competence granted [5]

In the provision of health care and / or health care, medical staff is required to apply therapeutic standards established by nationally approved practice guides or, failing that, standards recognized by the medical community of that specialty, which What could enable the circumstance of the illicit medical offense.

Injury, as an essential element of medical civil liability, consists in the negative result suffered by the patient as a user of medical services as a result of the illicit act committed by the physical or legal person providing medical services[6].

According to art. 1385 Civil Code, the damage shall be fully rectified, unless otherwise provided by law. Compensation will also be granted for future damage if its production is unquestionable. Compensation must include the loss suffered by the injured person, the gain he would have been able to make and which he was deprived of under normal conditions, and the expenses he has incurred for the avoidance or limitation of the damage. If the illicit act also determined the loss of the chance to gain an advantage, the reparation will be proportional to the probability of obtaining the advantage, taking into account the circumstances and the victim's concrete situation.

In the case of injury to a person's bodily integrity or health, the compensation must include, as the case may be, the gain from the work that the injured person was deprived of or prevented from acquiring through the loss or reduction of his / her work capacity. In addition, the indemnity must cover the costs of medical care and, if applicable, the expenses related to the increased life needs of the injured person, as well as any other material damage[7].

If the person who suffered harm to bodily integrity or health is a minor, the established disparity will be due from the date when the minor would normally have completed his / her professional training. . Until that date, if the minor had a win at the time of the injury, the compensation would be determined on the basis of his lost earnings, and if he did not have a win, he shall be determined according to the provisions of art. 1388 Civil Code, which applies accordingly[8].

The damage may be of a patrimonial (economic) or non-patrimonial (moral) nature. Even if the damage is not susceptible to a pecuniary assessment, the compensation to be awarded for this damage will have a patrimonial character.

As regards the moral prejudice, as its difficult assessment, the courts, when granting moral damages, do not operate with predetermined evaluation criteria, but proceed to an appreciation subjective of the particular circumstances of the case, namely the physical and psychological sufferings suffered by the victim[9], as well as the adverse consequences that the event under consideration had on the particular life, taking into account the evidence to be administered.[10] Thus, the judge is placed in the situation of estimating such damages, on the basis of estimated criteria that can highlight the limits of appreciation of the amount of the indemnities.

It is necessary that there is a causal relationship between the illicit act and the damage, namely the damage caused as a consequence of the illicit deed. The causality report includes both the facts that are the necessary and direct cause, as well as the facts that have made the causal action possible, or have ensured or aggravated its harmful effects. In order to establish the causal relationship between the illicit medical act and the damage, it is necessary to establish, on a scientific basis, all the correlations between the facts and the circumstances[11].

Article 1358 The Civil Code differentiates the particular situations of appraisal of guilt. Thus, in assessing the guilt, account will be taken of the circumstances in which the damage occurred, which is foreign to the person of the perpetrator, and, if so, of the fact that the damage was created by a professional in the operation of an enterprise.

Since medical liability, as a civil liability, is based on the classic guilt (fault), professional misconduct could be defined as a form of guilt where the physician did not foresee the outcome of his deeds, although he could have foreseen it , Or predicted the results of his actions, but he considered it to be easy that they would not appear.

Medical professional misconduct consists of non-observance of the rules regarding the exercise of the medical profession by failing to adhere to or deviations from the usual rules recommended and recognized in the practice of this profession, resulting from negligence, lack of attention or non-observance of specific methods and procedures.

Any form of professional misconduct can be identified by reference to the following:

- culpa in adendo – adherence to professional misconduct, imprudence, incomprehension, non-indifference to the requirements of the profession or the risks to which a person is exposed, the inappropriate use of working conditions, or an ease in medical activity that calls for special attention and caution;
- culpa in eligendo – consists in the wrong choice of technical procedures, in a delegation to an inappropriate person of obligations or in the delegation of their own obligations to others;
- culpa in omitendo – when the patient loses the chance of healing or survival due to the failure to carry out necessary gestures;
- culpa in vigilando – which resides in the breach of a duty of confraternity on a request for the request and the obligation to answer it, the failure to ask for help, the failure to inform the patient about the fate of the patient.[12]

When establishing the guilt, the objective criterion of average diligence will be taken into account. If the physician's obligation to treat the patient is a means of diligence, caution, the doctor - without guaranteeing the outcome (healing), assumes the obligation to have the necessary conduct and to apply the most suitable medical remedies for the purpose of patient's recovery[13]. The result has a random nature, being influenced by the specific reactivity of the patient, the particularities of the disease, false or incomplete information obtained from the patient, or the limited technical and scientific resources available at the time of treatment[14].

2.2. Legal Liability of Medical Service, Sanitary Materials, Appliances, Medical Devices and Medicines Providers.

Along with the civil liability of medical personnel for the professional misconduct in the exercise of medical or pharmaceutical medicine, Law no. 95/2006 also regulates the civil liability of the providers of medical services, sanitary materials, appliances, medical devices and medicaments for damages to the patient.

The guilt of the doctors constantly in the form of omission, manifested in some inactions by not performing some necessary actions, namely not knowing the correct diagnosis and not taking the necessary treatment measure - Jud.Sect.1 Bucuresti, sent.civ. nr. 11541/ 26.06.2013.

Thus, healthcare providers are responsible for their own deed, for the deed of another person, but also for the damage caused by things.

Regarding the responsibility for their own deed, the public or private sanitary units as providers of medical services are liable civilly according to the law for the damages caused by the prevention, diagnosis or treatment activity, if they are the consequence of:[15]

a) nosocomial infections, unless it is proven to be an external cause that could not be controlled by the institution;
b) known defects of abusively used devices and medical devices without being repaired;
c) the use of sanitary materials, medical devices, medicinal and sanitary substances, after the expiry of the warranty period or the term of their validity, as the case may be;
d) acceptance of medical equipment and devices, sanitary materials, medicinal and sanitary substances from suppliers, without the insurance provided by the law, as well as the subcontracting of medical or non-medical services from providers without civil liability insurance in the medical field.

Public or private healthcare providers providing healthcare services are civilly liable for damages caused, directly or indirectly, to patients by failure to comply with the internal regulations of the sanitary unit.

Besides the responsibility for their own deed, the providers of medical services - public or private sanitary units - are also responsible for the deed of another, respectively for the deed of medical personnel.

Art. 655 par. (2) of Law no. 95/2006 stipulates that the medical units are liable under civil law for the damages caused by the hired medical personnel, in solidarity with him.

Therefore, we are in the presence of the commissioner's responsibility for the deed regulated by art. 1373 Civil Code.

With regard to liability for damage caused by things, public or private healthcare providers, and medical device and medical device manufacturers and healthcare manufacturers are responsible under civil law for harm to patients in the prevention, diagnosis and Treatment, generated directly or indirectly by hidden defects of medical equipment and devices, medicinal substances and sanitary materials during the warranty / period of validity, in accordance with the legislation in force.

2.3. The procedure to be followed in order to establish malpractice cases

2.3.1. Establishing cases of malpractice has two procedures, an extrajudicial and a judicial procedure. As regards the out-of-court procedure, as regulated by the Law on Health Reform, the Methodological Norms of Law no. 95/2006 and the Regulation on the organization and functioning of the monitoring committee and the professional competence for the cases of malpractice, approved by Order no. 1343/2006. This is a voluntary procedure, not compulsory.

Thus, the procedure for establishing cases of malpractice does not prevent free access to justice under common law. The optional nature of this procedure is manifested not only by the possibility of the person interested in choosing between the two ways - the extrajudicial and the judicial procedure - but also by his right to leave the special procedure for the determination of the cases of professional civil liability and to address of the court[16].

The minimum mandatory elements that a referral to the Commission must contain in order to be subject to verification are:

- the first and last name of the person making the referral;
- the quality of the person making the referral;
- the name and surname of the person who considers himself the victim of a malpractice case, if different from the person making the referral;
- the name and surname of the perpetrator of the act of malpractice perceived, committed in the performance of a prevention, diagnosis and treatment activity;
- the date of the act of malpractice;
- the description of the deed and its circumstances;
- the damage caused to the victim;

In the proceedings before the Commission, the interested person will participate, that is, the person or, as the case may be, his legal representative who considers himself the victim of a malpractice committed in the course of a prevention, diagnosis and treatment activity or the deceased's successor As a result of an act of malpractice imputable to a prevention, diagnosis and treatment activity.

Besides the injured person, they have the status of parties to the extrajudicial procedure and the insured person (the person who committed the malpractice act - the medical staff) and the insurer (the insurance company with which the person accused of malpractice has concluded the civil liability insurance contract). Also, there may be medical experts who can be consulted by the Commission in cases of medical malpractice.

Within 3 months of referral, the Commission must take a decision on the case, a decision that will be communicated to all concerned, including the insurer.

If the insurer or any of the parties disagrees with the Commission's decision, it may appeal to the competent court within 15 days from the date of the communication.

[15] Art. 655 of the Law no. 95/2006 on healthcare reform with subsequent amendments and completions.
[16] Dan Cimpoieru, The malpractice, Ed. C.H.Beck, Bucharest 2013 p.118.

2.3.2. The entitled person may at any time leave the administrative jurisdictional procedure before the Commission and may address the court. In all these cases, the court acts as a court of full jurisdiction, invested with the resolution of an action in tort. At the same time, the court also acts as a judicial review body when verifying, in terms of its soundness and legality, the Commission's decisions.

The competent court to resolve malpractice litigation is, according to art. 687 of the Law no. 95/2006, the court in whose territorial jurisdiction took place the alleged malpractice.

By indicating the court an exclusive competence, both material and territorial, is established.

In the case of a tort action for malpractice, addressed directly to the court, it will not be possible to resolve the case in the absence of a forensic expertise.

Insofar as criminal acts and deontological norms have been violated by the same act in its materiality, legal liability accumulates, both criminal responsibility and tort liability.

Malpractice acts within the medical activity of prevention, diagnosis and treatment are prescribed within 3 years from the occurrence of the injury.

3. The malpractice insurance

In all situations, professionals are required by law or by their own body regulations to end malpractice insurance.

Regarding the compulsory insurance of the initiated medical personnel, this was regulated by the law on insurance and reinsurance in Romania but was later introduced in Law no. 95/2006 on health reform.

The malpractice insurance is in fact insurance for civil tort liability, which means that, in addition, civil law regelations will be applied regarding the liability for the offense and the other legal norms with the incidence in the matter[17].

Ensuring malpractice has an important role in the work of professionals. On the one hand, he assures the professional against the risk of civil liability and, on the other hand, confers on the victim the certainty that his prejudice will be covered to a greater extent even though the author of the damage would be insolvent.

Moreover, ending insurance is also a sine qua non condition for the doctor who is to be employed, being obliged to submit a copy to the employing unit[18].

Even if the doctor has the obligation to present insurance when concluding the contract of employment, insurance must be maintained throughout medical practice. Moreover, the failure to conclude the medical malpractice insurance or to ensure the legal limit is a disciplinary offense. The jurisprudence also established that[19] since the Romanian law expressly regulates the provision of malpractice to healthcare personnel as a form of insurance against it, individually concluded, distinct from any form of insurance concluded by the medical institution, it is obvious that the insurance contract concluded between the medical institution and the insurer does not include insurance for malpractice.

At the same time, with regard to professional liability insurance, the legislator[20] provided for the possibility of coexistence of more valid insurance, in which case the indemnities due will be borne in proportion to the amount insured by each insurer.

Regarding the damages, the legal provisions establish that the insurer pays damages for the insured persons who are liable, under the law, to third parties who are found to have been subjected to a medical malpractice act, as well as to the costs of the injured party Through the medical act.

Art.669 par. (1) of Law no. 95/2006 provides that damages are to be paid in respect of amounts which the insured is obliged to pay by way of compensation and legal costs to the person or persons injured by the application of inadequate medical assistance, which may have the effect of including personal injury or death.

Compensation to be granted when healthcare has not been granted, although the status of the person or persons who have applied for or for whom healthcare was required implied this intervention.

The medical malpractice insurance does not cover the damages that the doctor, pharmacist, nurse or midwife who provides healthcare services will incur in the medical act.

For such damages, medical staff will have to cover the risk of accidents and occupational diseases as any other employee[21].

An important aspect of interest in the provision of medical liability is the place where the risks and damages specific to this form of insurance are incurred.

Involved activity and health care is given in hospital units, but there are cases when given outside these units, does the question arise whether the doctor's responsibility can be drawn in such situations? The answer is affirmative. The responsibility of the medical staff and, implicitly, the liability of the insurer, regardless of the place where the assistance or medical services were provided, may be attracted.

The Law on Health Reform, by the provisions of Art. 668, provides for indemnity to pay regardless of where the care was given. In conclusion, the medical malpractice insurance operates only if the inadequate assistance has been voluntarily granted outside the specially designated areas[22].

Relevant to medical liability insurance is the quality of the persons to whom the indemnities will be secured.

Thus, the insurer pays the indemnities directly to the injured party, insofar as he was not compensated by the insured. If the insured proves that he has compensated the injured party, the indemnity shall be paid to the insured. In case of death, the indemnities are granted to the successors of the patient who have requested them. As far as the patient's rights successors are concerned, they have to do so in this regard. Moreover, the insurer will not pay compensation ex officio, but only at the express request of the patient's successors.

The settlement and award of damages usually takes place amicably, when the insured's liability is clearly established.

The certainty of the insured's liability may result from a court decision or may be set by the Monitoring and Professional Competence Commission for malpractice cases.

4. Conclusions

The responsibility of the holders of liberal professions is an instrument at the fingertips of rights holders, against those who violate professional obligations and deontological principles. Thus, mistakes committed during the exercise of the profession attract the civil assassination of the culprit. The need to engage medical and medical staff in general is warranted by guaranteeing the right to health. Certainly, the civil liability of medical staff does not remove criminal responsibility, and they can coexist.

As a form of civil tort liability, the responsibility of the medical staff to be drawn must meet the legal requirements in the matter, so there must be an illicit deed, an injury, a causal link and guilt.

Having the legal obligation to close malpractice insurance for professional civil liability for injuries caused by the medical act, malpractice insurance plays an important role in the work of the professionals, the lack of which can distort the activity of the professional who, for fear of being sued for the potential harm that would cause its patients, would be extremely reluctant to take any risk.

A NEW APPROACH IN CROSS BORDER CASES - REGULATION (EU) NO 2015/848 OF THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND OF THE COUNCIL OF 20 MAY 2015 ON INSOLVENCY PROCEEDINGS (RECAST)?

Gabriela FIERBINȚEANU[*]
Vasile NEMEȘ[]

Abstract

Following numerous attempts to recast Regulation (EC) No 1346/2000 on insolvency proceedings, the appearance of EU Regulation 2015/848 (recast) aims to solve the problems encountered in practice regarding rules establishing international jurisdiction in opening the main proceedings but preventing also fraudulent forum shopping , new ways to coordinate of insolvency proceedings relating to the same debtor or to several companies belonging to the same group, new design for secondary proceedings and also a more accessible way for lodging claims and obtaining information about cross border proceedings .At last, is also important to understand the need of the extension of the scope of this Regulation to proceedings which promote the rescue of economically viable but distressed businesses and which give a second chance to entrepreneurs.

Keywords: Recast Regulation, COMI, secondary proceedings, groups of companies, publicity of proceedings

Introduction

The phenomenon of international insolvency which determines internal legislator's approaches combined with the European legislator's logic or model norms developed by international bodies such as UNCITRAL, faces many regulatory problems because, beyond the accuracy of scientific research tools and methods and the fairness of the results of this research both at a national and a global level, especially regarding the free movement of persons, goods and services, it will always be impossible to predict entirely the attitude of the human factor and the way they understand to play the role they can find themselves in an insolvency proceeding or in related contexts, because, why shouldn't we admit that, the good faith, the speculation, the attempt to obtain, regardless of the means of a more favorable position, the constructive attitude of rescuing the joint contractor who is in a state of financial difficulty, are behaviors of meaning, even if sometimes condemnable from the perspective of positive law.

Council Regulation (EC) no. 1346/2000 of May 29, 2000[1] on insolvency proceedings(referred to in this paper as Regulation) succeeded in establishing a legislative framework for cross-border insolvency procedures being necessary, at an European level and in order to ensure a proper functioning of the internal market, at the level of the European Union, to introduce an instrument leading to an effective approach to the measures to be applied to the patrimony of an insolvent debtor whose activity has a cross-border effect.

This article proposes a centralized listing of problems which arose during the implementation of Council Regulation (EC) no. 1346/2000 and also highlighting solutions identified and introduced through the new version of the Regulation on Insolvency Recast Regulation 2015/848 (the "Recast Regulation[2]"), pointing out the advantages of these new provisions.

After 10 years of application of the European Insolvency Act (the Regulation is applicable as of 31 May 2002), the Commission has analyzed its practical effects and considered it necessary to amend for the reasons that will be detailed below. However, before analyzing these considerations, it must be mentioned that, besides technical corrections, the proposals came amid a deep economic crisis which led to a change of attitude at the level of the European Union. towards firms in difficulty and debtor's good faith[3].

[2] Published by the European Parliament and Council on 20 May 2015, came into force on 26 June 2015 and applies to relevant insolvency proceedings from 26 June 2017, Official Journal L 141 on 5 June 2015.

[3] The European Commission has included in its Work Program for 2012 the revision of the Insolvency Regulation in line with the review clause foreseen in Article 46 of the Regulation, the revision being in line with the Europe 2020 Strategy with the Small Business Act, with the Annual Growth Survey 2012 and the Single Market Act II, but it is important to remember, as is apparent from the very working document of the Commission Staff that accompanied the proposal for a revision of the Regulation - available at http://eur-lex.europa.eu / Legal / content / en / ALL / ies = CELEX: 52012SC0417, the fact that in the period 2009-2011, on average, approximately 200,000 bankruptcies were recorded annually at the European Union level. In this context, all communications from European bodies have always referred to a second chance for an honest entrepreneur - see 'A Second Chance for Entrepreneurs: Preventing Bankruptcy, Simplifying Bankruptcy and Supporting Business Re-launch,' ' Report of the Expert Group, European Commission, DG Enterprise and Industry, January 2011, Communication from the

The following categories of issues have been identified, and their enumeration is to be followed in the present approach by the amendments introduced in the Recast Regulation.

1. Lack of provisions regarding pre-insolvency procedures and debt discharge procedures for individual debtors.

Updating national laws on insolvency involved, in many Member States, including in the field of regulation the pre insolvency procedures, but these procedures are not included in the Annex A of the Regulation. If such methods are not covered by the Regulation, their effects will not be recognized at a European level. Thus, there will be no suspension of individual enforcement actions against the company, the procedures that do not involve the appointment of a liquidator but in which the debtor remains in possession of its assets, are not recognized at the level of the European Union, foreign creditors would not be willing to engage in restructuring negotiations, all of which lead in the vast majority of cases to the impossibility of reorganizing the debtor and implicitly to the impossibility of saving jobs.

In addition, regarding the insolvency of individuals, it was found that the non-inclusion of insolvency proceedings of individuals within the scope of Regulation blocks the possibility to obtain a discharge of debt, the debtor still remaining liable to foreign creditors, so that the honest entrepreneur cannot get second chances, which is in contradiction with the EU policies in the field of entrepreneurship.

In this context it was necessary to amend the scope of the Regulation, which stipulated in the 1st article 1st paragraph that it was applicable to collective proceedings which entail the partial or total divestment of a debtor and the appointment of a liquidator.

Through the Recast Regulation, the 1st article was amended to include procedures that do not involve a liquidator but in which the debtor's assets and activities are subject to control or supervision by a court[4]. Furthermore, the procedures in which the debtor remains in possession of his assets and manages his / her business without being appointed a liquidator enjoys recognition at EU level. Additionally, there are procedures that allow the debtor to reach an agreement with its creditors in a pre-insolvency stage.

Another important element stated in the 7th recital of the Recast Regulation is the one inducing the method of interpretation of the Regulation in cases of regulatory gaps between it and Regulation (EU) no. 1215/2012 of the European Parliament and of the Council[5] insofar as bankruptcy, insolvency or other legal proceedings, amicable settlements, concordances or similar procedures and actions relating to such procedures are being excluded from the scope of this last Regulation. As stated in the final sentence of the 7th recital, 'the mere fact that a national procedure is not listed in the Annex A to this Regulation should not lead to its entry into the scope of Regulation (EU) No. 1215/2012 ".

2. Center of main interests and difficulties in determining jurisdiction to open insolvency proceedings. Identifying the most favorable legal forum ("forum shopping")

The Regulation does not explicitly required the court opening insolvency proceedings to examine international jurisdiction, and there is a risk that several main proceedings may be opened in parallel.

COMI really provides treating the case in a jurisdiction with which the debtor has a genuine link rather than in a jurisdiction chosen by the founders, COMI's approach being consistent with international developments, being chosen by UNCITRAL also as a standard review in its Model Law on cross-border insolvency. In order to determine the COMI, however, it is necessary to circumstantiate it, both for the legal entity and for the individuals(exercising or not an independent business or professional activity) and to clarify the ways in which the presumption regarding the identity between COMI and the registered office(principal place of business/habitual residence) can be rebutted.

As for the forum shopping, it should be noted that not all relocations are abusive and they can be considered a legitimate way of exercising the right to free settlement, all the more so as the differences in the regime between the national laws on insolvency are unquestionable. Establishing the fraudulent intention in delocalization is, indeed, a problem because there is a fine line between the flexibility of a national regime that would allow reorganization and call for a more favorable regime to the detriment of creditors who can

[4] This Regulation shall apply to public collective proceedings, including interim proceedings, which are based on laws relating to insolvency and in which, for the purpose of rescue, adjustment of debt, reorganisation or liquidation:

(a) a debtor is totally or partially divested of its assets and an insolvency practitioner is appointed;

(b) the assets and affairs of a debtor are subject to control or supervision by a court; or

(c) a temporary stay of individual enforcement proceedings is granted by a court or by operation of law, in order to allow for negotiations between the debtor and its creditors, provided that the proceedings in which the stay is granted provide for suitable measures to protect the general body of creditors, and, where no agreement is reached, are preliminary to one of the proceedings referred to in point (a) or (b)

Where the proceedings referred to in this paragraph may be commenced in situations where there is only a likelihood of insolvency, their purpose shall be to avoid the debtor's insolvency or the cessation of the debtor's business activities.

[5] Regulation (EU) No. 1215/2012 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 December 2012 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters (JO L 351, 20.12.2012, p. 1) no longer execute their claims. In addition, all foreign creditors should be able to challenge the decision to open the proceedings as the court or the insolvency practitioner appointed should inform the known creditors who have their domicile or habitual residence in another Member State of the opening of the main proceedings.

According to the 13th recital of the Regulation, the "center of main interests" must correspond to the place where the debtor ordinarily carries out his interests and may therefore be verified by third parties, 3rd article (1) pointing that "In the case of a company or legal person, the place of the registered office shall be presumed to be the centre of its main interests in the absence of proof to the contrary."

The experience of the Eurofood or Interedil[6] cases has led to the introduction of additional elements to help determine the COMI so that the content of the Recast Regulation both in the recitals and in the articles on the core of the main interests has been clarified in a fairly large proportion. Therefore, according to the 30th recital, as for a company, the presumption of the identity of the COMI within its registered office may be reversed if the central administration of the company is located in another Member State than that in which the registered office is located and if a comprehensive assessment of all the factors settles, in a verifiable manner by third parties, that the real management and supervisory center of the company and the center for the management of its interests are located in that other Member State. In the case of an individual not exercising an independent business or professional activity, it should be possible to overturn this presumption if the major part of the debtor's assets is outside the Member State where the debtor is habitually resident, or where it can be established that the main reason for the move was the opening of an insolvency proceeding before the new court and if such an opening would significantly affect the interests of the creditors whose business with the debtor took place before the move, indicating that the latter two hypotheses are provided as an example. The amendments also referred to the 3rd article, regarding the international competence, which states in the drafting of the Recast Regulation that "the center of the main interests is the place where the debtor usually manages his interests and which is verifiable by third parties", maintaining the presumption of the place where the registered office is located. In addition, in the same article determinations are added to the COMI for individuals exercising independent or professional activities (the principal place of business in the absence of evidence to prove the opposite), respectively for the individual (the place where the person has his/her ordinary residence in the absence of evidence to prove the opposite).

On the other hand, through the 4th article (Examination as to jurisdiction) and 5th article (Judicial review of the decision to open main insolvency proceedings) has been regulated the ex officio examination by the court of the jurisdiction pursuant to Article 3, and also the possibility that the debtor or any creditor may appeal in court the decision to open the main insolvency procedure for reasons of international jurisdiction.

Regarding the prevention of fraudulent use of the search for a more favorable lex fori , two temporal limitations have been brought forward, as we have seen in recital 31st of the Recast Regulation but also in the 3rd article, paragraph 1 thereof. Thus, the presumption that the center of main interests is the place where the registered office is located, the principal place of business or the habitual residence should not apply if, in the case of a company, legal entity or, respectively, individuals carrying on an economic or professional activity independently, the debtor has moved its registered office or principal place of business to another Member State within three months prior to the request for opening of the insolvency proceedings or, in the case of an individual who is not self-employed nor carries on a professional activity, if the debtor has moved his habitual residence to another Member State within six months prior to the request to open the insolvency proceedings(the debtor may present additional evidence in support of the idea that the new COMI is the real one) .

3. The matter of defining secondary insolvency procedures and coordinating them with the main procedure.

According to the 3rd article of the Regulation, when a main insolvency proceeding is opened, any subsequent insolvency proceeding initiated later on is a secondary winding-up procedure. This regulatory mode led to shortcomings in the restructuring of companies that have branches in several Member States. Although the secondary procedures were designed to protect the interests of local creditors, they often broke away from their purpose, sometimes being opened for the simple reason that the debtor had a seat on the territory of that state, without at least appreciating the opportunity to start such a procedure in a context in which a continuation of the debtor's activity would have been more profitable, including for local creditors, than a winding-up of assets located on the territory of that state. Also, it was necessary to increase the role of the liquidator in the secondary procedure and to maintain a continuous contact with the court and the liquidator in the main proceedings, as well as to establish a duty of cooperation between the courts of the two procedures.

From the perspective of the Recast Regulation, we will analyze only the two situations in which the court seized with the request to open secondary insolvency proceedings may refuse or postpone the opening of the secondary proceedings at the request of the insolvency practitioner in the main proceedings. Thus, with the approval of the local creditors, the insolvency practitioner has the possibility to give them an undertaking that they will be treated as if a secondary insolvency proceedings had been opened (recital 42nd and art 36th). The assets would be considered as part of a subcategory of the insolvency estate in the main insolvency proceedings, following that, at the distribution, the insolvency practitioner in the main proceedings will comply with the priority rights that would have been borne by the creditors if a secondary insolvency procedure had been opened on the territory of that State. In this case, the court may refuse to open these secondary proceedings if it considers that the undertaking protects the interests of local creditors.

In a second situation (recital 45th and article 38th), the court is given the possibility to temporarily suspend the opening of a secondary insolvency proceedings when a temporary stay of the individual enforcement proceedings in the main insolvency proceedings had been granted in order to maintain the effectiveness of this suspension from the main proceedings. The period of suspension may be set for a maximum of 3 months, provided that adequate measures are in place in order to protect the local creditors.

It is also necessary to say, in regard of the new treatment of secondary proceedings, that the requirement that the secondary procedure be a winding-up procedure has been removed from the text of the Recast Regulation so in this context , the possibility given to the court, notified with a request to start a secondary proceedings , to open, at the request of the practitioner in insolvency of the main proceedings, a type of insolvency procedure listed in the Annex A other than the originally requested, will ensure a higher level of protection of the interest of local creditors and better consistency between the main and the secondary proceedings (art. 38th).

Additional provisions have been added in order to regulate the cooperation and communication between insolvency practitioners designated in the main and secondary insolvency proceedings (art. 41st), including the cooperation in the form of agreements or protocols. It has been legislated also according to art. 42nd, the cooperation and communication between courts, in several forms such as the coordination regarding the appointment of insolvency practitioners, the coordination of the administration and supervision of the debtor's assets and activity, the coordination of the court hearings and, last but not least, the cooperation and communication between the insolvency practitioners and the courts (art. 43rd). In the new regulation, we can only hope that the additional costs generated by the cooperation, language barriers and national procedural rules that prevent information disclosure will no longer be such an important source of difficulties in cooperation.

4.The insolvency of a group of companies

The proposal to amend the Regulation creates a specific legal framework for the insolvency of companies belonging to a group, while maintaining the approach underpinning the Regulation currently in force, according to which each company is treated separately. It introduces the obligation to coordinate insolvency proceedings concerning various companies of the same group by imposing an obligation on the liquidators and the courts involved to cooperate, similar to the duty of cooperation established in regard of the main and secondary proceedings. Liquidators should, in particular, exchange information and cooperate in drawing up a rescue or reorganization plan if appropriate. The opportunity to cooperate through protocols is referred explicitly to confirm the practical importance of these instruments and further promote their use. The courts should also cooperate by exchanging information, coordinating, as appropriate, appointing liquidators which must cooperate with each other and approving the protocols submitted by the liquidators. In addition, each liquidator will have a procedural status with respect to the other member companies of the same group with the right to participate in the creditors' meetings.

According to Recital 53rd of the Recast Regulation, the introduction of rules on insolvency procedures for groups of companies should not restrict the possibility for a court to open insolvency proceedings in one jurisdiction for several companies belonging to the same group if the court detects that the center of the main interests of these companies is in a single Member State. In order to maximize the results of the cooperation and communication in the procedures concerning those companies making up a group, according to 61st art., group coordination procedure may be requested before any Court having jurisdiction in insolvency proceedings of a member of the group by an insolvency practitioner appointed in open insolvency proceedings in relation to a member of the group.

According to the 66th article, where at least two-thirds of all insolvency practitioners appointed in insolvency of the companies in the group agree that the court of another Member State which has jurisdiction is the appropriate court for the opening of the group coordination procedure, that court has exclusive jurisdiction. Such a procedure shall be initiated if its opening is appropriate to facilitate the effective administration of insolvency proceedings concerning the members of the group and if no creditor of any member of the group whose participation in the procedure is expected is not likely to be disadvantaged by including that member in such a procedure.

5.Information for creditors and lodgement of claims

Although the Regulation includes an entire chapter aimed to informing creditors and registering requests for admission of claims (Chapter IV, Provision of information for creditors and lodgement of their claims) the set of rules relating to the right to register requests for admission of claims, the obligation to inform creditors, the content and the form of the request for the transmission of claims do not solve concrete problems linked, on one hand, to the differences between the national legal systems regarding the way in which insolvency proceedings are opened in the territory of a Member State and, on the other hand, to the lack of timely information on the opening of the procedure, the absence of which may lead to the loss of the possibility of recovery of the claim by registering it after the expiry of the time limits provided by the national law. Additionally, the costs of translation of documents or legal representation before a court in a Member State for filing an application for admission of claim are still an issue.

The reconsideration of this chapter in the Recast Regulation brings clarifications on the form of the notification of opening the procedure that will be sent to the creditor(it shall bear the heading 'Notice of insolvency proceedings' in all the official languages of the institutions of the Union), respectively on the standard claims form , indicates the information to be included in their content and makes the explanations regarding the costs. First of all, the standard forms will be available in all of the official languages of the European Union, thus reducing translation costs. Secondly, foreign creditors shall be offered at least 30 days from the date of publication in the insolvency register of the State where the notice of opening of the insolvency proceedings was opened, to file applications for admission of claims, regardless of the shorter time limits applicable under national law. Also, creditors will be informed if the claim is challenged and will be able to provide additional evidence on the existence and amount of the claim.

The Recast Regulation sets up, within the content of the 24th art., for a better information of creditors and for the prevention of the opening of parallel insolvency proceedings, the obligation of the Member States to publish a minimum set of information regarding the date of the opening of proceedings, the reference number of the case, the type of proceedings (main or secondary), the type of debtor, the important elements of the case in question (the deadline for filing the request for admission of claims, the deadline for lodging the appeal after the pronouncement of the decision of opening), the closing date of the procedure.

The information will be stored in publicly accessible electronic registers, following that through the European e-Justice portal shall be proceeded to the interconnection of such registers. It is also worth noting that according to article 27th paragraph. 1, the set of mandatory information will be available free of charge. With regard to the publicity on the opening of proceedings, according to the 28th article, paragraph 1, the insolvent practitioner may request that the notification of the decision to open the insolvency proceedings and, if appropriate, the decision by which the insolvency practitioner has been appointed, be published in any other Member State where the debtor has an establishment, in accordance with the publication procedures applicable in that Member State. In this context, honoring of a obligation for the benefit of the debtor has been regulated by reference to the time of providing the publicity stated in the 28th article. According to the 31st article where an obligation has been honoured for the benefit of a debtor(and not of the IP) who is subject to insolvency proceedings opened in another Member State, the person honouring the obligation shall be deemed to have discharged it if he was unaware of the opening of the proceedings (this person shall be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to have been unaware of the opening of insolvency proceedings if executed such liability before the publication provided for in the 28th article).

Conclusions

This article aims not to be critical of the changes made by the Recast Regulation, its intentions are to represent the first part of a series of comments on these changes. The authors considered it appropriate in this introduction to stop on the provisions that were the most important points in the list of shortcomings noted by the practice in applying the Regulation, specifying the current texts and also those which become applicable by the coming into force of the Recast Regulation.

However, we cannot conclude without leaning on the presented texts, raising a few questions or formulating some conclusions imposed by the very meaning of these provisions.

First of all, it should be said that the scope of the Recast Regulation imposes certain restrictive conditions even if it tries to resolve the failure to include particular insolvency prevention procedures on the list of those falling under cross border rulings. Thus, according to the 1st paragraph of the 1st article of the Recast Regulation, the procedures must be collective (according to the 2nd article 1st paragraph, procedures involving all creditors of the debtor or a significant part thereof, provided that in the latter case the proceedings do not affect the claims of creditors not involved in those procedures), public (such as confidential preventive procedures as for the ad hoc mandate of Romanian Law will not fall under the scope of the rule), based on the insolvency law. Only in the framework of these collective, public, based on the insolvency law procedures and only for the purpose stated in the European act, namely salvage, debt adjustment, reorganization or liquidation, are valid the assumptions setting out in points a, b, c of the 1st paragraph of this article.

In the presented hypothesis we can ask ourselves how to reconcile the content of the" collective procedure" definition that can only concern a significant part of the debtor's creditors with the temporary stay of an individual execution procedure granted, for example, according to the text of letter c) of the 1st paragraph of the 1st article, by the effect of the law, in the conditions under which the final sentence of the 2nd article (1) states that procedures must not affect (what will the interpretation of the term „affect" be in practice?) the rights of creditors who are not involved in the collective proceedings.

In order to avoid a possible tendency to expand the scope, in the context of the same 1st article, it should be added that the 16th Recital of the Recast Regulation clarifies that procedures based on the general law of the companies which is not exclusively elaborated for insolvency matters, should not be considered to be based on insolvency law.

Regarding the way of establishing COMI according to the provisions of the 3rd article of the Recast Regulation, the center of the main interests is the place where the debtor usually manages his interests and is verifiable by thirds. The Regulation indicates in its 3rd article 1st paragraph the administration of the interests and not the place of the proper location of the headquarters as the main determinant. However, the assumptions made regarding COMI raise issues particularly within the situation of individuals who are self-employed or carrying on professional activities or in the situation of any other individual because it is presumed that the center of the main interests is the main place of activity or the place where the usual residence is located.

If in the case of a legal entity the COMI is presumed to be the place where the registered office is located, till proven contrary, which is relatively accessible to the third party verification, in the other two cases, the verification is burdensome, especially since there are no criteria available at the level of the members states for this sort of identification.

In addition, the assumption that the center of main interests is the principal place of business, respectively the habitual residence, applies only if no movement occurs to another Member State in the 3 months respectively 6 months preceding the request for the opening of the procedure. However, in the case of a move will the main criterion be applied, namely the place where the debtor usually manages his interests and is verifiable by third parties? Correspondingly, the 28th Recital of the Recast Regulation induces the idea that, when determining whether the center of interest of the debtor is verifiable by third parties, creditor's perception of the place where the debtor manages his interests is of greater importance, in the case of the relocation of the center of main interests, being necessary to inform creditors at the most appropriate time of the new place where the debtor will carry on his activities.

Regarding the individual who does not carry on an independent professional or commercial activity, according to the 30th recital, overturning the presumption of COMI is done and exemplified as follows: " In the case of an individual not exercising an independent business or professional activity, it should be possible to rebut this presumption, for example where the major part of the debtor's assets is located outside the Member State of the debtor's habitual residence ", in which case we move away from the "management of interests" as the main determinant.

One last thing that we would like to mention is the one related to the secondary insolvency proceedings, namely that related to the so-called "secondary synthetic proceedings" whose mechanism is implemented by the 36th article of the Recast Regulation. While beneficial, the unilateral undertaking that the insolvency practitioner appointed makes in the main proceedings will raise a number of questions. Although it has the nature of a unilateral act, this commitment must be approved by the local creditors. Also from this perspective how much time is needed for its approval and how will the designated practitioner carry out the identification of assets and the communication with "the known" local creditors.

Moreover, according to the 36th article 1st paragraph, the undertaking specifies the "factual premises" on which it is based, notably on the value of the assets in the Member State referred, without any further indication as to their value, the only reference regarding not the value but the time of setting the assets is stated in the 36th article 2nd paragraph, which at its final sentence states that the relevant moment for the establishment of the assets is the moment of the undertaking. In addition, the question arises as to know how the known local creditors will be treated in comparison with the creditors in the main proceedings considering the provisions of the 36th article 1st paragraph, which take into account the fact that when distributing those assets or the income originated from their sale, there are to be respected the rights of distribution and priority under national law of which the local creditors would have benefitted from if there had been initiated a secondary insolvency proceedings in that Member State.

The amendments brought by the new Regulation are more than welcome after those years when the lack of provisions had been solved by interpretations of the practice and of the courts. Without considering that the problems stop when its implementation starts, we appreciate that at least at the level of an immediate regulation the European act represents a new path, more adapted to the market's requirements of our days.

MANDATORY TAKEOVER BIDS ON ROMANIAN CAPITAL MARKET

Cristian GHEORGHE[*]

Abstract

The Romanian Capital Market Law (Law no 297/2004) lays down rules regarding public offers (to buy or sell) of securities admitted to trading on a regulated market. Such offers are not unknown in the general framework of companies' regulations, i.e. Company Law no 31/1990. Actually a public limited liability company (joint stock company) can use a public subscriptions (offering shares for sale) to raise the registered capital for incorporation of the company or to increase the company's share capital already established. But all such operations are voluntary decisions. The founders or the shareholders of the company are those who decide to launch a public subscriptions.

Capital Market Law comes with something new and at least peculiar at first sight: mandatory takeover bid, meaning a mandatory public offer made by an offeror to the holders of the securities of a company (offeree) to acquire all or some of those securities.

Can someone be forced to buy securities on the regulated market? The Capital Market Law responds affirmatively, but only if such takeover bid follows or has as its objective the acquisition of control of the offeree company in accordance with national law. The takeover bid remains under supervision and authorization of the national authority of the Capital Market (FSA – Financial Supervisory Authority).

Keywords: capital market, investments, public offers, mandatory takeover bid, securities.

1. Introduction.

A joint stock company can use a public subscriptions (offering shares for sale) to raise the registered capital for incorporation of the company or to increase the company's share capital already established. Offering shares in a public manner is a common commercial issue that usually requires the authorisation of the national Securities and Exchange Commission. Such commercial operations are always voluntary decisions of the company or shareholders' decisions. They decide to launch a public subscription in their conditions: quantity and price. A mandatary bid is not an option in common commercial framework.

Capital market environment has its own goals and principles. One of these principles states the shareholders' rights and investors' protection. Therefore it is necessary to protect the interests of holders of the securities of companies when those companies are the subject of changes of control - and their securities are admitted to trading on a regulated market.

European legislator chose to lay down certain rules relevant when control of listed companies has been acquired or has been changed. Such rules[1] target the protection of the holders of securities, in particular those with minority holdings.

In the main the European directive recommends obligation for the person who has acquired control in a company to launch an offer to all the holders of that company's securities for all of their holdings[2]. Much more: the offer should be fulfilled at an equitable price.

2. Premises and principles.

In certain conditions a shareholder of a company (offeror) should be required to make a bid addressed to all the holders of those securities for all their holdings at the equitable price. Such provisions denote an intervention in the free commercial market. Not only must launch the bid but the offeror must fulfil in full any cash consideration. He has to be prepared to buy all company's securities still outside of his holdings. Such "mandatory buy" is uncommon even for capital market and infringes the principle of freedom of trade.

We must observe de higher consideration paid for all holdings on capital market. All holders of the securities of an offeree company must be afforded equivalent treatment. As a result, if a person acquires control of a company, all the other holders of securities must be protected at the same level[3].

An offeror seeking to buy a controlling interest in a target company (offeree) from a (controlling) stockholder or different stockholders will usually pay a higher price, a premium over the market price of the target shares. Therefore control premium is an amount that a buyer is prepared to pay (over the current market price of a listed company) in order to acquire a controlling stake in that company.

European approach on capital market requires an acquiror who purchases a controlling block of shares to offer to buy the remaining shares from the minority stockholders. Such vision calls for equivalent treatment for all shareholders, which effectively requires the control premium to be shared among all stockholders, irrespective the fact they provide or not shares for building up the controlling position[4].

The relevant conclusion in EU law system is that capital market needs increased protection for investors and in case of clash of principles as abovementioned the investors' protection should prevail.

3. Mandatory bids on Romanian Capital Market.

As expected, Romanian legislator followed European vision in takeover bids matter. The European Directive pointed that Member States should take the necessary steps to protect the holders of securities when control of their companies has been changed or acquired. Such protection is enforced by obliging the person who has acquired control of a company traded on a regulated market to launch an offer for all securities issued by offeree company held by other shareholders[5].

A natural or legal person who, as a result of its purchases or of the persons acting in concert with such person, holds securities giving more than 33% of the voting rights in a company traded on a regulated market shall launch a public offer addressed to all holders of those securities for all their holdings at the earliest opportunity but no later than two months from reaching such holding position[6].

Such offer shall comply with requirements laid down for any takeover bid. Therefore the offeror is required to draw up and make public a purchase offer document comprising the information necessary to enable the holders of the offeree company's securities to reach a documented decision on the offer.

The minimum contents of information[7] which shall be included in the public purchase offer document is prescribed through FSA's regulations[8].

Before the offer document is made public the offeror shall communicate it to the supervisory authority which shall decide on the approval of the public purchase offer document within ten days from the registration of the request[9].

4. Equitable price.

The equal treatment of all shareholders in a takeover process and a real minority shareholders' protection are enforced by the European legislator by guaranteeing an equitable price for mandatory takeover bids. Such price is regarded to be the highest price paid for the same securities by the offeror (or by persons acting in concert with him) over a period of not less than six months and not more than twelve months before the bid (shall be determined by Member States)[10].

Supervisory authority may adjust upwards or downwards the price approved in a takeover bid in certain circumstances such as:

1. the highest price was set by agreement between the purchaser and a seller,
2. the market prices of the securities have been manipulated,
3. market prices have been affected by exceptional occurrences[11].

In such cases certain criteria shall applied to determine equitable price, such as: the average market value over a particular period, the break-up value of the company or other objective valuation used in financial analysis[12].

These European principles regarding equitable price are implemented by the Romanian legislator in Romanian Capital Law.

The twelve months rule: The price of the mandatory takeover bid shall be at least equal to the highest price paid by the offeror (including the persons acting in concert with the offeror) over the twelve months period prior to the submission of the mandatory bid offer document to Financial Supervisory Authority[13].

Increased accuracy for bid submitted in legal term: FSA, ex officio or further to a notification could determine, on grounded reasons, that the purchases of shares may have been manipulated or offeror (including the persons acting in concert with him) did not acquire shares of the offeree company over the twelve months period prior to the submission of the offer document to FSA.

In this case the price offered within the takeover bid shall be at least equal to the highest of the three values determined by an appraiser appointed by the offeror:

1. the weighted average trading price on regulated market related to the last twelve months prior to the submission of the purchase offer document to FSA;

2. the value of the company's net assets divided by the number of total shares, according to the latest audited financial statements;
3. the value of the shares determined by an evaluator according to international evaluation standards[14].

Increased accuracy for bid submitted after legal term has elapsed: The hypothesis is the same: FSA, ex officio or further to a notification could determine, on grounded reasons, that the purchases of shares may have been manipulated or offeror (including the persons acting in concert with him) did not acquire shares of the offeree company over the twelve months period prior to the submission – after de legal term of two months has elapsed - of the offer document to FSA.

In this case the price offered within the mandatory takeover bid shall be at least equal to the highest price determined by an appraiser appointed by the offeror:
1. the weighted average trading price on regulated market related to the last twelve months prior to the submission of the offer document to FSA;
2. the weighted average trading price related to the last twelve months prior to the date when the controlling position (33% of the voting rights) was reached;
3. the highest price paid by the offeror (including the persons acting in concert with him) in the last twelve months prior to the date when the controlling position (33% of the voting rights) was reached; iv) the value of the company's net assets divided by the number of total shares (according to the latest audited financial statements prior to the submission date of the offer document to FSA); v) the value of the company's net assets divided by the number of total shares (according to the latest audited financial statements prior to the date when the controlling position was reached;
4. the value of the shares determined by an evaluator according to international evaluation standards15.

These provisions reveal the endeavor of the Romanian legislator to lay down accurate methods to enforce an equitable price.

5. Romanian law exclusions.

Mandatory takeover bids regulations provide equivalent treatment for all holders of the securities of an offeree company. Such regulations are well intentioned and appealing but can be overwhelmed by exclusions.

Romanian Capital Market Law decided large scale exceptions from mandatory takeover bid rules.

Exempt transaction. The mandatory takeover bid shall not apply if the control over the issuer was acquired as a result of an exempt transaction. Under Romanian law exempted transactions include: i) control was acquired within the privatisation process; ii) control of the company was obtained by purchase of shares from the Ministry of Public Finance or from other entities legally authorised, within the budget claims collection procedure; iii) control obtained following the transfer of shares between the parent company and its branches or among the branches of the same parent company; iv) control resulting from a voluntary takeover bid addressed to all holders of the securities and for all their holdings[16].

Unintentionally control. The mandatory takeover bids have a distinct regime in some cases defined by the Capital Market Law as unintentionally acquiring of control in a traded company: i) the reduction of the capital through the redemption by the company of its own shares, followed by their annulment; ii) as a result of the exercise of the pre-emptive right, subscription or conversion of the initially allotted rights, and conversion of preferred shares into common shares; ii) merger, division or succession.

In abovementioned cases the person reaching the ceiling (33% of the voting rights) shall have alternative obligations: to make a public purchase offer, subject to the conditions and at the price provided for mandatory bid or to sell a number of shares, in order to drop below the control position acquired without intention[17].

Legal remedies. If the person who, as a result of his purchases (or of the persons acting in concert with him) holds more than 33% of the voting rights in a company traded on a regulated market fails to launch a public offer addressed to all holders of securities no later than two months from reaching such holding position, the voting rights related to the securities exceeding the ceiling (33%) are suspended and the person (or the persons acting in concert with him) may no longer purchase shares of the same issuer[18].

In the case of exempted transaction such ban does not apply.

Unintentionally control engages an alternative obligation that shall be fulfilled within three months from acquiring such position: to launch a mandatory takeover bid at an equitable price or to sell shares up under the ceiling (33% of the voting rights).

6. Sell-out and squeeze-out.

Mandatory takeover bids can have two special consequences:

[14] Ibidem, art. 204 para (3).
[15] Law no. 297/2004, Art. 204 para (4).
[16] Law no. 297/2004, Art. 205 para (1) and (2).
[17] Law no. 297/2004, Art. 205 para (5).
[18] Ibidem, Art. 203 para (1).

1. a minority shareholder shall have the right to request the offeror to purchase his shares at a fair price and
2. the offeror shall have the right to request the shareholders who did not subscribe within the offer to sell him such shares, at a fair price.

Sell-out procedure[19]. This procedure is a "legitimate" one. After the closing of the mandatory takeover bid, in some circumstances, the remaining shareholders receive the right to sell their holdings to the offeror in the same conditions. The procedure can be understood as a legal extension of the period of the offer. The circumstances are laid down by Romanian Capital Market Law referring to the closing of the bid: i) if the offeror holds shares representing at least 95% of the total number of shares of the share capital granting voting rights; ii) if the offeror purchased, within the public purchase offer addressed to all shareholders and for all their holdings, shares representing at least 90% of the total number of shares referred to in the offer. In these situations a minority shareholder shall have the right to request the offeror to purchase his shares at a fair price[20].

Squeeze-out procedure[21]. This procedure is more spectacular. In the same revealed conditions ((i) if the offeror holds shares representing at least 95% of the total number of shares of the share capital granting voting rights; ii) if the offeror purchased, within the public purchase offer addressed to all shareholders and for all their holdings, shares representing at least 90% of the total number of shares referred to in the offer) the offeror shall have the right to request the shareholders who did not subscribe within the offer, to sell him such shares, at a fair price. It looks like a "forced" purchase, without shareholder's consent[22].

The issuing company shall withdraw from trading on the regulated market as a result of the completion of the procedure for exercising the squeeze-out right[23].

7. Conclusions.

Romanian Capital Market Law is an example of how declaration of principles may be compromised by the exceptions stated in it. Romanian companies whose shares were admitted to trading on a regulated market are overwhelmingly privatised companies. Initially such companies have been involved in a mass privatisation process resulting in free allocation of share to population and admitting to trading floor.

Subsequently these listed companies have been privatised through the privatisation agreement concluded between the State as controlling shareholder and strategic investors. As exempted transactions such situations were excluded from the mandatory takeover bid rules.

This course of events put the Romanian Capital Law in contradiction with European principles regarding takeover bids. The law fails to ensure an equivalent treatment for any securities holders and a sound level of minority protection.

THEORETICAL AND PRACTICAL ISSUES REGARDING THE MATRIMONIAL REGIMES

Dan LUPAȘCU[*]
Cristian MAREȘ[]

Abstract

Following the entry into force of Law No. 287/2009 on the Civil Code, as republished, and of Law No. 71/2011 for the implementation of Law No. 287/2009 on the Civil Code, as further amended, that repealed the Family Code (Law No. 4/1953, as republished and further amended), the spouses may choose another matrimonial regime than the legal community regime, respectively the separation of assets regime and the conventional community regime through a matrimonial agreement. The study examines theoretical issues of the matrimonial regimes that raise some debates in the doctrine. The research also consists in the analysis of some new institutions such as clauses of a matrimonial agreement and the provisions of the primary obligatory regime both from theoretical and practical perspectives. Considering the 5 year period after the entry into force of the legal provisions that regulate the matrimonial regimes, the authors intend to carry out an analysis of the relevant case law of the courts of law in the matter of the pecuniary relationships between spouses.

Keywords: matrimonial regimes, legal community matrimonial regime, conventional community matrimonial regime, separation of spouses' assets regime, matrimonial agreement

1. Introduction

This paper intends to clarify a few issues related to the matrimonial regimes that raise some debates in the doctrine.

Given that Law No. 287/2009 on the Civil Code, as republished and further amended (hereinafter referred to as the "Civil Code")[1], regulates the conventional matrimonial regimes, the matrimonial agreement and the primary obligatory regime as a novelty after the repealed Family Code - Law No. 4/1953, as republished and further amended (hereinafter referred to as the "Family Code"), a thorough analysis of some debatable provisions is important not only for the authors of family law, but also for the legal practitioners.

In this respect, our intention is to examine some main theoretical issues of the matrimonial regimes, of the matrimonial agreement and of the primary obligatory regime and the main authors' opinions of family law already expressed in doctrine.

This paper will provide an analysis of the relevant doctrine, of the main legal provisions and of the jurisprudence in order to outline some options to be considered both by the authors of family law and by the legal practitioners.

2.1. General considerations on the matrimonial regimes

Article 312 paragraph (1) of Civil Code provides that "the future spouses may choose as the matrimonial regime: the legal community regime, the separation of assets regime or the conventional community regime." Therefore, the Civil Code regulates the principle of freedom of choosing the matrimonial regime. Should the future spouses intend to choose another matrimonial regime than the legal community one, they must conclude a matrimonial agreement in this respect.

Notwithstanding the matrimonial regime chosen by the spouses, in accordance with article 312 paragraph (2) of Civil Code, they must comply with all the regulations that are common to all the matrimonial regimes.

These basic rules represent the so called "the primary obligatory regime"[2]. This primary obligatory regime is regulated by articles 312-338 of Civil Code and refers to the effects of the matrimonial regime, its opposability, the conventional or the judicial mandate by and between spouses, the disposition acts that endanger seriously the family's interests, the spouses' pecuniary independence, the spouses' right to information, the termination, the exchange and the liquidation of matrimonial regime, the family's dwelling and the marriage expenses.

This primary obligatory regime is considered primary for two main arguments[3]:

1. it applies prior to any other legal or conventional provision and
2. it is common for all the matrimonial regimes, given that it is their base.

This primary regime is obligatory given that applies compulsorily to all spouses as simple effect of the marriage and that no one may derogate from its provisions through a matrimonial agreement[4].

Although the primary obligatory regime is common to all the matrimonial regimes, it represents their base, as other authors of family law[5], we do not consider that it is a matrimonial regime[6]. In accordance with article 312 paragraphs (1) and (2) of Civil Code above cited, the spouses may choose only between the three matrimonial regimes, respectively the legal community regime, the separation of assets regime or the conventional community regime. The basic rules that are called the primary obligatory regime by the authors' of family law only apply besides the provisions of the chosen matrimonial regime. We consider that if the legislator had regulated a fourth matrimonial regime, it would have been expressly provided as it is the case of the three matrimonial regimes.

It is important to underline that according to article 27 of Law No. 71/2011 for the implementation of Law No. 287/2009 on the Civil Code, as further amended, irrespective of the conclusion date of marriage, the provisions of the Civil Code apply to the spouses, from its entry into force, in connection with their personal and pecuniary relations.

There has also been expressed that a regime of participating to acquisitions by the spouses may be chosen based on the separation of assets regime, considering the provisions of paragraph (2) of article 360 regulated by Law No. 71/2011[7] for the implementation of Law No. 287/2009 on the Civil Code, as further amended[8].

Although the spouses may include in their matrimonial agreement a clause in relation with the receivable of participation to the acquisitions of assets, we[9] do not consider that such clause may be a separate new matrimonial regime regulated by the Civil Code, but it is a variety of the separation of assets regime.

This matrimonial regime was regulated in the first draft of the project of the Civil Code, in 2000, but after this moment the authors of the Civil Code renounced this matrimonial regime, given that it was considered highly complicated.

Therefore, we consider that article 360 paragraph (2) of Civil Code does not provide a fourth matrimonial regime, but only a clause for its liquidation that may be or not included in the matrimonial agreement based on which the spouses choose the separation of assets regime.

Moreover, we consider that there is an inexact provision regulated by paragraph (2) of article 360 of Civil Code which provides that "by matrimonial agreement, the parties may stipulate clauses related to the liquidation of this regime (separation of assets regime) depending on the assets acquired by each of the spouses during the marriage (…)". From our point of view this inexactness refers to the regulated period, respectively during marriage. Instead of this time limit, the above mentioned legal provision should have been drafted in order to refer to the assets acquired during the separation of assets regime and not during the marriage, because the spouses may change the matrimonial regime during their marriage whenever they may want, according to the applicable legal provisions.

In case of the legal community regime, on the contrary to article 360 paragraph (2) of Civil Code, article 339 of Civil Code provides that the assets acquired during the legal community regime by any spouse are common assets acquired jointly by them, not as co-owners, from their acquisition date. Tehrefore, in this case the Romanian legislator regulated the correct period with exactitude, specifically during the application period of the legal community regime.

According to the final thesis of paragraph (2) of article 360 of Civil Code should the parties have not agreed on the contrary, the receivable of participation represents half of the difference net value between the two groups of assets acquired by each spouse and will be owed by the spouse whose net value of the acquired assets is bigger than the other spouse's net value of the acquired assets. Therefore, the receivable of participation is half of the difference net value between the two groups of assets acquired by each spouse only in case the spouses have not agreed a lower value of the receivable of participation.

2.2. Matrimonial agreement

The matrimonial agreement is a public authenticated juridical act based on which the future spouses, respectively the spouses, in accordance with the principle of choosing the matrimonial regime, by mutual consent, agree on the matrimonial regime that will apply, or change the matrimonial regime during their marriage.

Under the sanction of the absolute nullity, the matrimonial agreement must be concluded as an authenticated act, with both spouses' consent expressed either personally or by a proxy based on an authenticated special power of attorney and with predetermined content[10].

Therefore, unlike a marriage that can be concluded only personally by the spouses, the matrimonial agreement can be concluded by a proxy.

The power of attorney for the conclusion of a matrimonial agreement must be:

a) authenticated by a public notary
b) special
c) with a predetermined content, which means that it must provide in detail the clauses of the matrimonial agreement that will be signed by the proxy.

It is a contract with a specific juridical cause (affectio conjugalis). In this respect, the pecuniary relationships between the spouses are to support the marriage and cannot exceed the purpose of the marriage itself – the creation of a family.

Article 313 paragraph (1) of Civil Code provides that between spouses the matrimonial regime takes effect only from the conclusion date of the marriage. Paragraph (2) of the same article provides that the matrimonial regime can be opposed to third parties from the date when the legal publicity formalities are fulfilled, except the case when they knew about this matrimonial regime by other means. And paragraph (3) of this article provides that should the publicity formalities not be fulfilled, the spouses are considered married under the legal community regime, in relation with the good faith third parties.

These legal provisions protect only the good faith third parties, given that towards the bad faith third parties, respectively those who knew about the applicable matrimonial regime either from the spouses or from another source, the matrimonial agreement will apply, even if the legal publicity formalities had not been fulfilled.

In relation with the publicity formalities, article 334 of Civil Code provides that a matrimonial agreement is publicized as follows: (i) by the mention made by the public clerck on the marriage act, after its conclusion[11]; (ii) by registration within the National Notarial Registry of the Matrimonial Regimes; (iii) by registration within the land registry, the trade registry, or any other public registry provided by law, depending on the nature of the assets. In case there is an asset that based on its nature determines the obligation of registration of the matrimonial agreement with the special public registries above mentioned, failing to fulfil the obligation of registration within this special registry cannot be covered by the registration of the matrimonial agreement only within the National Notarial Registry of the Matrimonial Regimes.

In accordance with the provisions of article 330 paragraphs (2) and (3) of Civil Code the conclusion date of a matrimonial agreement may be before the conclusion of marriage or during the marriage, but it enters into force only during the marriage.

The future spouses may conclude a matrimonial agreement either before concluding the marriage, or at the moment when they conclude their marriage. Irrespective of the moment when the future spouses decide to conclude a matrimonial agreement, it will enter into force only if they conclude the marriage. In case the future spouses do not conclude the marriage, the concluded matrimonial agreement will not enter into force.

Notwithstanding the above, even if the marriage is not concluded and the matrimonial agreement does not enter into force, the juridical acts provided by such matrimonial agreement that are not linked with the matrimonial regime and that the future spouses haven't connected them with the conclusion of their marriage will take effect, such as a recognition of filiation either by the mother, or by the father.

During marriage, the spouses may conclude a matrimonial agreement in order to change the applicable matrimonial regime, only after a period of one year as of the conclusion date of the marriage[12]. The matrimonial agreement concluded by the spouses, therefore during the marriage, enters into force on the date provided therein by the spouses or, in case no date was provided, on its conclusion date[13].

Although the future spouses or the spouses have the right to conclude a matrimonial agreement, when they agree on this issue, they do not have the right to create their own matrimonial regime. They have only the right to choose between the matrimonial regimes expressly provided by the Civil Code.

According to article 332 paragraph (1) of Civil Code, a matrimonial agreement may not derogate from the legal provisions that regulate the matrimonial regime except otherwise provided by law, under the sanction of absolute nullity. Also, the matrimonial agreement may not derogate from the legal provisions that regulate the primary obligatory regime under the sanction of absolute nullity. Moreover, a matrimonial agreement may not affect the equality between spouses, the parental authority and the legal inheritance provisions. Given that we consider the matrimonial agreement to be a contract, as any contract, it may not derogate from the legal obligatory provisions and from the good manners.

Article 312 paragraph (2) of Civil Code irrespective of the matrimonial regime chosen by the spouses or the future spouses, the matrimonial agreement may not derogate from the provisions of Section 1. Common provisions of Chapter VI. The spouses' pecuniary rights and obligations of Title II. The marriage of Book 2. About family.

Therefore, the spouses do not have the right to copy a matrimonial regime regulated by the legislation of another country, but not regulated by the Civil Code or the right to create a matrimonial regime combining the provisions of the matrimonial regimes regulated by the Civil Code.

Article 338 of Civil Code provides that in case the matrimonial agreement is null and void or is declared null, the legal community regime applies between the spouses, without affecting the rights of the good faith third parties.

The legal community regime will be also applicable, should the spouses not conclude a matrimonial agreement.

It is impossible to have a marriage without a matrimonial regime, or to have a matrimonial regime without a marriage.

Referring to the capacity for concluding a matrimonial agreement, although it is a contract, the rule habilis ad nuptias, habilis ad pacta nuptialia is applicable, which means that the capacity to conclude a marriage applies. Therefore, the individuals who are 18, as well as the children who are 16 with his parents' consent and with the authorization of the court may conclude a matrimonial agreement.

Article 337 paragraph (1) of Civil Code provides that the individual who is not 18, but he has the matrimonial age, may conclude a matrimonial agreement. The individual who is not 18 must have the matrimonial age when he concludes the matrimonial agreement, not when he concludes the marriage.

The individual who is 16 may conclude the matrimonial agreement only with his parents' consent and with the authorization of the court.

It is forbidden to a child who is 14 or 15 to conclude a matrimonial agreement, although according to civil law he has restricted capacity, given that he does not have the matrimonial age.

An individual who is 16 with anticipated capacity recognized by the competent court based on article 40 of Civil Code and an individual who is between 16 and 18 years old who marries and therefore gets full capacity based on his marriage can conclude a matrimonial agreement without their parents' consent and without any authorization of the competent court. They are considered as an individual who is 18 and who can conclude any act without any prior authorization.

Should these legal provisions related to the matrimonial age, to the parents' consent and to the authorization of the court be infringed, the matrimonial agreement may be null and void or may be declared null. Thus, on the one hand, under the sanction of absolute nullity the matrimonial agreement cannot be concluded by the individual who is not 16 years old. On the other hand, under the sanction of relative nullity the matrimonial agreement cannot be concluded by the individual who is 16 years old without his parents' consent or the authorization of the court. As we have already mentioned, should the matrimonial agreement be null and void or declared null, the legal community regime applies.

2.3. Family dwelling

A new institution regulated by the Civil Code within the primary obligatory regime is the family dwelling. Article 321 paragraph (1) of Civil Code provides that the family dwelling is the spouses' common dwelling or, in case such dwelling does not exist, the spouse's dwelling where the children live.

For opposability purposes, any spouse may request the registration of a house as the family dwelling within the land book, even if he is not the owner of that house[14].

The special legal regime of the family dwelling consists in the limits of one spouse's right of disposition of the family dwelling by his own, without the other spouse's express consent, through juridical acts.

According to article 322 paragraph (1) of Civil Code without the other spouse's written consent, none of the spouses, even if he is an exclusive owner, can dispose of his rights over the family dwelling and can conclude acts based on which he could affect its use.

In accordance with these legal provisions, given that they do not distinguish, it is not important the nature of the spouses' right over the family dwelling. Therefore, they may have a real right or any other kind of right over the family dwelling, even a right of use based on a lease/rent agreement or even a non-remunerated lease agreement.

Should the family dwelling be owned by a spouse, there is no relevance whether the spouse who intends to dispose of it is its exclusive owner or if the family dwelling is a common asset, depending on the applicable matrimonial regime[15].

Referring to the other spouse's consent, we must consider two situations: (i) when only one spouse is the family dwelling's owner (he has an exclusive ownership right) and (ii) when both spouses are the family dwelling's owners.

In the first case, should the spouse owner intend to conclude any act of disposition of the family dwelling, he will need the other spouse's written consent, but this consent will not be a consent to the conclusion of that act of disposition as a co-owner, but a consent that he does not oppose the conclusion of such act of disposition. Thus, the other spouse's consent does not affect the owner spouse's exclusive ownership right over the family dwelling.

[14] Article 321 paragraph (2) of Civil Code.

[15] See also B.D. Moloman, L.-C. Ureche, The new Civil Code. 2nd Book. About family. Articles 258-534. Commentaries, explanations and jurisprudence, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2016, page 203.

The spouse's consent who is not an owner of the family dwelling is an act of irrevocable authorization from its signature moment[16].

As a remedy, in case one spouse refuses to express his consent for the conclusion of an act of disposition of the family dwelling, without a legitimate reason, the other spouse may claim in court and request the authorization of the court in order to conclude such act[17].

The rule of the spouses' express consent applicable to all the acts of disposition of the family dwelling does not mean that the immovable asset becomes imperceptible, the family dwelling could be subject of the forced execution even for receivables contracted only by one spouse, without the other spouse's consent.

In the second case, should the spouse owner intend to conclude any act of disposition of the family dwelling, he will need the other spouse's written consent in his quality as co-owner. Therefore, in this situation both spouses will conclude the act of disposition either personally or by a proxy in their quality of owners.

In relation to the form of the spouses' consent article 322 paragraph (1) of Civil Code provides only that it must be written.

We should also consider the above mentioned two situations also referring to the form of the spouses' consent[18].

Thus, when only one spouse is the family dwelling's owner (he has an exclusive ownership right), given that the other spouse, who is not an owner of the family dwelling, does not become a party of the disposition act, we consider that his consent may be expressed through a private act that is not authenticated by a public notary[19]. Notwithstanding the above, for safety reasons, we consider that also in this situation the spouse who is not an owner of the family dwelling should express his consent in authenticated form. In this respect, we consider the verifications of the public notary in order to authenticate the act based on which this spouse express his consent, specifically his identification and ascertaining his consent. If the spouse owner presented to the notary who authenticates the act of disposition a private act signed by the other spouse, its authenticity couldn't be verified. Therefore, the spouse owner who intends to conclude an act of disposition of the family dwelling may present to the notary a private act providing the other spouse's consent that could be signed by anyone.

On the contrary, when both spouses are the family dwelling's owners, their consent must be expressed in authenticated form. This is applicable when one spouse cannot be present personally in front of the public notary in order to sign in his name and on his behalf the act of disposition. In this case, both spouses express their consent in their quality of co-owners. They become parties of the act of disposition. This rule derives from the provisions of article 1244 of Civil Code which provide that the agreements that transfer real rights that are to be registered within the relevant land book must be concluded in authenticated form, under the sanction of absolute nullity.

Failure to comply with the provisions of article 322 paragraph (1) of Civil Code will result either in the sanction of nullity[20] or in the damages[21]. For the applicable remedy, the law provides it depending on the fact whether the asset was duly registered as the family dwelling within the relevant land book.

According to article 322 paragraph (4) of Civil Code the spouse, who has not expressed his consent to the conclusion of the act of disposition or based on which the use of the family dwelling is affected, may claim its annulment in a period of one year from the moment when he acknowledges that it was concluded, but no later than one year from the moment when the matrimonial regime terminates.

In relation with the limit period of one year from the moment when the spouse, who does not consent to the conclusion of the act of disposition, may claim its annulment, we consider that it could be calculated from the registration date of the ownership right of the new owner within the relevant land book.

On the contrary, paragraph (5) of article 322 of Civil Code provides that if the asset was not registered as the family dwelling within the relevant land book, the spouse, who has not expressed his consent to the conclusion of the act of disposition or based on which the use of the family dwelling is affected, may not claim its annulment, but only he may claim damages from the other spouse, except the case when the third party knew that the asset is the family dwelling from another source.

Therefore, the exception regulated by the final thesis of paragraph (5) of article 322 of Civil Code applies in case of a bad faith third party who knew from any other source that the asset is the family dwelling. In such case, although the asset was not registered as family dwelling within the relevant land book, the spouse who has not expressed his consent to the conclusion of the act of disposition or based on which the use of the family dwelling is affected may claim the annulment of that act.

[20] Article 322 paragraph (4) of Civil Code.
[21] Article 322 paragraph (5) of Civil Code.

Referring to case law, a decision rendered by the Court of Appeal of Timișoara[22] in a second appeal registered against a resolution rendered in appeal by the Arad Tribunal[23] is relevant in relation with the registration of the family dwelling within the land book of an immovable asset. According to this decision the registration within the relevant land book of the immovable asset as the family dwelling, owned exclusively by one spouse, is allowed by the applicable legal provisions, irrespective that the immovable asset is a spouse's own or common asset, or that over this asset was priorly registered a conservatory seizure by the Directorate for Investigating Organized Crime and Terrorism (hereinafter referred to as "DIOCT"). The registration within the relevant land book of the immovable asset as the family dwelling has no effect over the conservatory seizure of DIOCT priorly registered over it. Moreover, such registration does not mean that the immovable asset becomes imperceptible. Therefore, should it be the case, even if an immovable asset is registered as the family dwelling within the relevant land book, it can be subject of forced execution as a consequence of the conservatory seizure of DIOCT.

Related to the movable assets that decorate the family dwelling, article 322 paragraph (6) of Civil Code provides that the same legal provisions applicable when the family dwelling was not registered with the relevant land book apply. Therefore, the spouse who did not consent to the conclusion of the act in writring may claim either to bring back the movable assets that were removed from the family dwelling, if these assets were not sold and the third party's patrimony is not affected, or damages[24].

It is important to underline that according to article 30 of Law No. 71/2011 for the implementation of Law No. 287/2009 on the Civil Code, as further amended, the provisions of article 322 of Civil Code are applicable also for the marriage into force on the entrance date into force of the Civil Code[25], if the acts of disposition of the family dweling or of the movable assets that decorate the family dwelling or their removal fom the dwelling were concluded after this date.

2.4. The preciput clause

The preciput clause may be provided by any matrimonial agreement concluded by and between the spouses or the future spouses[26]. Therefore, such clause is applicable either in the separation of assets regime or in the conventional community regime. Also during the separation of assets regime, the spouses may acquire common assets that will be owned by them in co-ownership.

Moreover, we consider that the preciput clause may be applicable even in case of a legal community regime, given that the spouses may conclude a matrimonial agreement that could provide only such clause.

Article 333 paragraph (1) of Civil Code provides that according to the matrimonial agreement the surviving spouse may take over one or more common assets acquired either jointly or as co-owners, without any payment and before the division of the inheritance. Such clause may be provided either on both spouses' benefit, or on one spouse's benefit.

Following these legal provisions, given that the preciput clause is a clause of the matrimonial agreement, it can not exist unless the spouses conclude such agreement. Moreover, a matrimonial agreement does not require necessarily a preciput clause, but it can be its single provision.

The beneficiaries of a preciput clause can only be the spouses in case they conclude a matrimonial agreement or they conclude a new matrimonial agreement after a period of one year from the conclusion date of the marriage and they agree that the matrimonial agreement provides such clause.

In case of future spouses who conclude a matrimonial agreement before the conclusion of the marriage, given that the matrimonial agreement enters into force only after the marriage is concluded, we may conclude that the beneficiaries of a preciput clause can not be the future spouses.

The object of this clause may be one or more common assets acquired either jointly or as co-owners, movable or immovable. Therefore, the spouses' own assets cannot be object of the preciput clause. Such assets will be included in the inheritance group of assets.

The preciput clause can not be object of the donations report, but only to reduction as provided by article 1096 paragraphs (1) and (2) of Civil Code[27].

Thus, the reduction will be done according to article 1096 of Civil Code, specifically before the donations, together and proportionally with the wills.

Although the Romanian legislator had the French Civil Code as inspiration source, respectively article 1516 that provides "Le préciput n'est point regardé comme une donation, soit quant au fond, soit quant à la forme, mais comme une convention de marriage et entre associés"[28], the juridical nature of the preciput clause has not been provided by article 333 of the Civil Code.

[27] Article 333 paragraph (2) of Civil Code.

[28] "The preciput is not seen as a donation neither in relation with the background conditions, nor in relation with the conditions of forme, but as a matrimonial agreement and between associates".

Considering these legal provisions, in the doctrine there are a lot of analyses in relation to the juridical nature of the preciput clause.

Together with other authors[29] we consider that the preciput clause is a matrimonial advantage, a special regulation in relation with the provisions regarding the reduction of the excessive non-remunerated acts.

We do not agree that the preciput clause may be considered a non-remunerated act[30], given that according to article 984 paragraph (2) of Civil Code the non-remunerated acts can be done only through a donation or a will.

According to a recent opinion[31] besides the legal inheritance and the testamentary inheritance, law regulates a forme of contractual inheritance under the name of preciput clause defined as the act based on which a person dispose of all or part of his assets, for the time when he will no longer be alive, in favour of another person who accepts it. The preciput clause is considered by this author as a donation of future assets.

The preciput clause does not affect the common creditors' right to execut the assets that are object of this clause, even before the community terminates[32].

Therefore, the assets that are object of the preciput clause do not become imperceptible, they could be executed by the spouses' common creditors before the community of assets terminates.

The preciput clause will no longer have any effect

a) when the community of assets terminates during the spouses' life,
b) when the beneficiary spouse dies before the spouse who gratified him,
c) when the spouses die at the same time or (iv) when the assets object of this clause had been sold by the common creditors' request[33].

Besides these situations expressly provided by the legal provisions of article 333 paragraph (4) of Civil Code, there are two additional situations when the preciput clause will no longer have any effect, specifically

a) if the matrimonial agreement that provides this clause is null and void or declared null and
b) if the matrimonial agreement will no longer have any effect given that the marriage was not concluded by the parties of the matrimonial agreement.

The execution of the preciput clause may be done in kind or, if it is not possible, by equivalent, in money[34].

Referring to the period of time for its execution, the law does not provide any special term in this respect. Therefore, the general prescription period of three years will apply from the spouses' death date, in case the preciput clause is mutual, on both spouses' benefit, or from the gratifying spouse's death date, when the preciput clause is unilateral, on one spouse's benefit.

Considering these legal provisions that regulate the preciput clause we consider that the surviving spouse has an important advantage regarding the use of some common assets before the division of the inheritance, specifically in case of a house taken over based on the preciput clause, the surviving spouse will no longer be interested in claiming the right of habitation that could be applicable, given that this right has specific conditions that could affect his right over that house if they are not fulfilled.

2.5. The expenses of the marriage

Article 325 paragraph (1) of Civil Code provides that the spouses must mutually support each other materially.

They must contribute to the expenses of their marriage depending on each other's means, should the matrimonial agreement not provide otherwise[35].

No agreement may provide that the expenses of the marriage are to be supported only by one spouse, any agreement contrary to this provision is to be considered unwritten[36]. Therefore, any agreement based on which the spouses would agree that the expenses of the marriage are to be supported by one of them has no legal effect.

Considering that the provisions related to the expenses of the marriage are regulated by the primary obligatory regime, we may conclude that they apply irrespective of the applicable matrimonial regime. Thus, notwithstanding the matrimonial regime chosen by the spouses, in accordance with article 312 paragraph (2) of Civil Code, they must comply with all the regulations of the primary obligatory regime that are common to all the matrimonial regimes.

Therefore, the spouses may agree within the matrimonial agreement the amount of each contribution, that may consists in money, in kind (e.g. by using the house as the family dwelling that is exclusively owned by one spouse) or in industry (e.g. one spouse's work in the house or for bringing up the children or one spouse's help for the other regarding his professional activity)[37]. As we have already mentioned above, it is forbidden for the spouses to agree that the expenses of the marriage will be supported by only one of them, but they are allowed to agree the amount of their contribution and how they contribute.

Moreover, it is important to underline that the legal provisions that regulate each of the three matrimonial regimes expressly provide that the usual expenses of the marriage and those for bringing up the children must be supported by both spouses.

Referring to the legal community regime, the spouses are jointly liable for the obligations undertaken by any of them for the usual expenses of the marriage[38]. It is important to underline that according to article 35 of Law No. 71/2011 for the implementation of Law No. 287/2009 on the Civil Code, as further amended, these provisions are applicable also for the marriage into force on the entrance date into force of the Civil Code, if the debt has been born after this date.

In case of the separation of assets regime, although the rule is that none of the spouses may be liable for the obligations undertaken by the other spouse[39], article 364 paragraph (2) of Civil Code provides that the spouses are jointly liable for the obligations undertaken by any of them for the usual expenses of the marriage and for those related to bringing up the children.

In the conventional community regime, although the spouses may limit their community to the assets and debts expressly mentioned in the matrimonial agreement, irrespective of the moment when they were acquired or they were born, either before or during the marriage, they can not exclude from their community the obligations undertaken by any of them for the usual expenses of the marriage[40].

According to article 326 of Civil Code any spouse's work in the house and for bringing up the children represents a contribution to the expenses of the marriage.

As the doctrine[41] and the jurisprudence[42] provided during the application period of the Family Code, that is also relevant in relation to the present regulation of the Civil Code, in case one spouse refuses to contribute to the marriage expenses, the other may claim against him in court and request to be forced to contribute to the marriage expenses. Also according to the current legal provisions above mentioned, a spouse may claim to force the other spouse to contribute to the marriage expenses.

In accordance with the case law[43] given that the woman's work in the house is considered a contribution to the family's income and considering that the defendant did not have any contribution to it in the last 7 years, the court decided that both spouses contributed equally to the acquisition of the common assets, even if there were some discrepancies between their incomes.

3. Conclusions

The common institutions of the matrimonial regimes are: (i) the primary obligatory regime and (ii) the matrimonial agreement.

The primary obligatory regime regulates special rules of protecting not only the family, but also each spouse's interest.

Although the Civil Code provides the principle of freedom of choosing the matrimonial regime, the spouses do not have full freedom to create a matrimonial regime combining the provisions of the matrimonial regimes regulated by the Civil Code or to copy a matrimonial regime regulated by the legislation of another country, but not regulated by the Civil Code, in order to apply it to their marriage.

Therefore, the spouses may only choose one of the three matrimonial regimes as they are provided by the Civil Code.

The family dwelling regulated for the first time by the Romanian legislation is a special case of protecting both the family and each spouse, given that without the other spouse's written consent, none of the spouses, even if he is an exclusive owner, can dispose of his rights over the family dwelling and can conclude acts based on which he could affect its use.

Referring to the preciput clause, we consider it helpful for the surviving spouse, in case it was provided by the matrimonial agreement, given that besides the common asset or assets that could be taken over by him before the division of the inheritance, he has an important advantage regarding the house taken over, specifically the surviving spouse will no longer be interested in the right of habitation, in order to avoid the specific conditions applicable in case of this right that could affect in some circumstances his right over that house, that does not happen in case of applying the preciput clause.

The Civil Code provides expressly that the expenses of the marriage are to be supported jointly by both spouses. It is forbidden for the spouses to agree that the expenses of the marriage will be supported by only one of them, but they are allowed to agree the amount of their contribution and how they contribute. The legal provisions that regulate each of the three matrimonial regimes expressly provide that the usual expenses of the marriage and those for bringing up the children must be supported by both spouses. Therefore, irrespective of the matrimonial regime and of the spouses' agreement in relation to the amount of their contribution and how they contribute, they could never avoid the joint contribution to the usual expenses of their marriage.

STUDY ON THE OBJECTIVE NOVATION OF AN OBLIGATION

Ioan Lucian MARINESCU*

Abstract

In view of the fact that there is no consensus among the authors not only with regard to the precise nature, but also with regard to the unitary or dual character of the effects stemming from novation, we have decided to prepare a study on the novation of the legal obligation report which concerns the changing of the object or its cause.
In the legal literature relating to the regulation of novation in the former civil code, novation covered two forms, objective and subjective.
In the new civil code, the regulation of novation is based on the same primary categories of novation. Certain changes of this legal figure being expressly regulated in the Civil Code.
Subjective novation (Article 1609(2) and (3) of the Civil Code is that which is carried out by changing the creditor or debtor of the initial obligation. The change of the debtor takes place when a third person undertakes to a creditor to pay the debt and it can be operated without the initial debtor's consent which is released (Article 1609(2) Civil Code). The change of the creditor intervenes by substituting the initial creditor with a new creditor, operation as a result of which the debtor will be released from the creditor of the former obligation, being bound, as effect of novation, to the new creditor (Article 1609(2) Civil Code). Thus, a new legal obligation report is created between the parties.
In addition to the theories already consecrated, the study proposes to explore the objective novation of the obligation in the light of the following analysis directions:
• Novation as a way of settling the obligation versus the unsatisfactory fulfillment of the obligation;
• The structure and characters of objective novation;
• The legal nature of objective novation.

Keywords: novation, obligations, objective novation, subjective novation, obligations transformation, animus novadi, aliquid novi, novum debitum.

1. Introduction

Novation has gradually lost the centrality that characterized it in the past within our private law system, being replaced and suffering a regression that has benefited the other institutions. Novation has also been the target of intense criticism on the part of those who, de iure condendo, questioned even the desirability of a typical discipline, remembering a presumed, irreversible crisis of the institution; vice versa, there were also attempts of reassessment and revitalization, including by enlarging its scope of application to relations different from those of binding nature even through its transposition to different sectors by private law[1]. The fervor which characterizes, even at present, the debate around the nature, role and importance of the institution and of the implications from the point of view of law's general theory, up to its possible transposition into other sectors of the system, attests the always renewed interest of the doctrine for this institution's characters and morphology.

Consequently, in spite of novation resizing within the modern and contemporary legal systems, the theme remains one of the most frequented by the doctrine, due to its indubitable conceptual and practical relevance.

As it has been noticed, the need of a study on obligation novation is presented, in fact and first of all, strictly from a theoretical standpoint; and it is reflected in the direction of investigating up to which point nova ad priorem obligationem allow the persistence of the origin report identity. The study of novation constitutes, therefore, a logical-cognitive prerequisite for the phenomena of conventional amendment of obligation's subjects or content, not being able to discuss, consistently, the change of the binding relation, unless the obligation's novation is realized at the same time[2]. The intention of the parties to novate (animus novandi), consists of the parties' wish to transform the former obligation, which is the essential element of novation. In the absence of parties' desire to novate, even if the other conditions of novation exist, we cannot conclude that novation exists. The contracting parties's wish within the meaning of novation must be explicit. Whereas "novation shall not be presumed. The will to perform it must obviously result from the document" - Article 1130 Civil Code - from 1864.

2.1. Novation as a way of settling the obligation versus the unsatisfactory fulfillment of the obligation:

In view of the aspects mentioned above the Supreme Court has established that the will to perform a novation must result in an unequivocal manner from the contract in which the parties were engaged through a legal binding relation to settle an existing obligation by replacing it with another new obligation. The absence of creditor's wish express manifestation to release the initial debtor, by signing a novation agreement, leads to the failure to comply with the conditions of validity for novation. In this situation, the legal document thus concluded cannot produce effects as a novation agreement, the initial debtor being bound to comply with the obligation undertaken[3].

In other words, in addition to the relevance give by its intrinsic value, a complex investigation of (objective) novation would allow the demarcation of its limits from the adjacent phenomenon of the contractual amendment of the contents of such obligation, the latter being allowed, inter alia, in Article 1182 NCC., where parties' power to "adjust" a matrimonial legal report existing between them is provided[4]. The practical relevance of this analysis is linked to the fact that, as long as they do not exceed the limits of the primitive obligation, the regulation and its associated guarantees remain intact.

In terms quite broad, it can be said that novation is included among the methods of extinguishing the obligation different from fulfillment, since it is reduced to an event which settles the binding report, even without the adequate direct satisfaction of the underlying creditor interest by direct achievement of the benefit provided by the obligation.

With regard to its compliance (or not) nature, the opinions in the doctrine are divided; there were also views that aimed to qualify novation in terms of claim settlement instrument, based on the required correlation - established via novation - between the effect of constitution and the effect of settlement, in relation to a mutual exchange.

It is therefore necessary to remember that, by novation, the good owed based on the primitive obligation will not be taken to its final value, but it will be used at its exchange value by exercising the power of "novation" which the holder of the right has on it; fact that, in itself, emphasizes the double plan of the interests involved, i.e. to receive the good which is the object of the initial benefit and the different interest of obtaining the new receivable right to be created through novation.

The primary interest is not intended to receive, under this plan, any "direct" satisfaction, because the right holder does not obtain the essential good which made its object; instead, he consciously waives the expectation to receive this good by "exchanging" it with the usefulness, considered equivalent, represented by the setting up of a new binding relation, i.e. a legal situation with instrumental character. The judgment with regard to the equivalence is left entirely on creditor's account, "except where, in a concrete manner, the existing economic difference is so high that it impedes and it does not allow, objectively, the identification of the novation instrument function, or event scheduled to constitute the expression of a contract concluded by error (Article NCC 1207), in the event of danger (Article 1216 NCC) or for a state of need (Article 1221 NCC)". The equivalence between the benefit due and the assignment of assets is only the result of a pure internal appreciation of the creditor which not only that may prove to be contrary to the reality, but it can also be excluded by a contrary, conscious opinion of the creditor. In these cases, we would be able to talk only about fiction of equivalence if the artificial arbitrary character of this trick was not obvious, at first sight, all the more so as the respective appreciation not only that may be ignored in a concrete manner but, in an abstract way, it is even irrelevant, given that the creditor, as debt holder, may freely dispose of it, up to causing immediate extinguishing with or without compensation[5].

Clarifying that satisfaction has only an "indirect" nature, the precise remark with regard to the instrumental nature of the lien created by novation makes us suspect also the "immediate" nature of satisfaction; however it is true that the immediate interest is designed to obtain an attribution different from that due (which shall be constituted by novation) from a new lien. However, being the case of an instrumental situation, the implicit interest is to obtain the final utility: so that creditor's satisfaction is delayed at that time and any different conclusion is presented as corrupted by excessive formal rigor.

Starting from these premises, it does not seem sufficient to assert that "the extinguishing by novation should be assigned a satisfaction nature (although of the other interest, still included within the obligation), representing the interest to obtain a different attribution than the benefit due".

By way of novation, the parties determine the settlement of the primary obligation by assuming a new debit soluto pro / without solvency guarantee.

The mechanism based on which novation acts on the primary interests structure being clarified, the qualification of novation in terms of means of settlement of satisfactory or unsatisfactory nature may be reduced to a matter rather semantic, depending on the amplitude which shall be deemed to be assigned to the attribute of "satisfactory" and hence to the concept of "satisfaction"; however, it is true that from the point of view of substance, novation does not bring the creditor a final usefulness (therefore, the satisfaction of the essential interest cannot be considered immediate), and, in particular, it does not comply directly with the interest to which the primary relation was subordinated[6].

In conclusion, taking into account the fact that any right (and any good which is its subject) has two usefulness profiles, a direct one, by its value of use, and an indirect one, by its exchange value, the creditor, by novating the primary obligation, makes use of this second usefulness profile, having as purpose a substitute interest for the one transmitted in the debit-credit primary relation.

The reason for which the doctrine does not include any consensus with regard to the satisfactory or unsatisfactory nature of novation, may be attributed to the fact that the concept of creditor interest has multiple meanings and that this unique concept is the basis of the distinction between the two categories of settlement cases.

Therefore, when account is taken of creditor's interest of obtaining the specific owed good, it must be compulsorily admitted that novation brings no satisfaction in respect of this interest and, from this point of view, it should be classified as a means of obligation settlement of unsatisfactory nature.

In theory, opposite conclusions might be drawn if it is presumed that the creditor has contracted the original obligation to protect not only the interest of obtaining a direct usefulness from the good which is the subject of the right, but also that of being able to take advantage of the indirect usefulness, from the exchange, which can be obtained to an equal extent, from this good, and that these interests have been placed by the creditor, from the very beginning, on the same level. However, thus structured, the obligation would be, from the very beginning, designed as an alternative and therefore the subsequent case would not be qualified as novation, but as the mere choice of the benefit to be achieved[7].

On the other hand, the typical replacement of creditor interest seems to be aiming at the attainment, by the creditor, of the object subject to obligation, that can express itself a final usefulness and that may respond immediately to a need within the meaning specified above.

Therefore, the conclusion seems necessarily oriented toward the unsatisfactory character of novation.

The procedure designed to lead to the attainment of final usefulness by the right holder, will certainly involve, in the case of novation, an additional transition, because between the right holder and the essential good not one, but two instrumental situations are positioned in sequence.

From this point of view, the power of disposition by novation is placed on the same level as the power of transfer disposition of the right, because both accomplish creditor's interest to obtain a new utility (i.e. the lien) instead of the original claim that goes out (novation) or is alienated (claim assignments).

Still from the point of view of satisfied interests, some authors considered inappropriate the joining between novation and other typologies of typical negotiations having an analogue function.

The negotiations diagrams which seem to be closest to novation are datio in solutum and the compensation on a voluntary basis. Indeed, by such contracts, the debtor assigns an aliud to the creditor, considered by the parties as the equivalent of the benefit due and able to achieve the domestic interest of the mandatory relation, to settle the obligation.

In a critical note it can be argued that, including in the cases mentioned by the benefit instead of achievement and voluntary compensation, the primary compulsory relation does not find its correspondent in an accurate fulfillment; the right which is its subject is not obtained recta via, but it is used for its exchange value.

Therefore, even in such cases, the primary right cannot bring its holder the final usefulness, which is not different from what happens in case of novation.

The only difference from novation consists, in the best case, of the fact that the substitute interest (and therefore, by definition, external to the initial contract, because it has not been taken into account, in advance, by the parties - except if they had intended to create the obligation as alternative) receives satisfaction (although still indirect, just as in the case of novation, but) immediately (via the different benefit provided instead of fulfillment or concomitant settlement by payment of a compensation which is not certain, liquid and payable, whose holder is the debtor); in the case of novation, it has already been proven that satisfaction is mediated by the establishment of a new binding relation.

We cannot share the assertion according to which the interest underlying datio in solutum and the compensation is identical from a legal point of view to the one found at the basis of the primary contract because the requirement of achieving a new negotiation itself attests, once more, duplicity of interests.

Finally, the diversity of novation from the point of view analyzed is presented clearly and unequivocally compared to the other two ways of settling an obligation, more precisely the direct fulfillment of the debtor and the fulfillment of the third party which, not incidentally, does not require an additional negotiation filter. The same conclusion may be drawn also with regard to the legal compensation (i.e. when the compensation is a certain, liquid and payable: indeed, in this case, the potential negotiation would have the nature of recognition of a compensation incurred at the moment of coexistence of the two reasons offset by debt, up to the competition of the lesser debt).

2.2. Structure and characteristics of objective novation

Given that the objective novation involves a succession between two subjective legal situations which refer to the same subjects, so that the first is used for its exchange value and in this way, is settled by the constitution of the new relation, it comes out that this event implies, necessarily, the existence of a relation in force, of a legal situations still in itinere, which is used for its exchange value and which is intended to be settled just as a result of this "exchange", carried out by novation. Obligatio novanda must not be settled in the meantime, inter alia, by debtor's direct fulfillment, but it will be an obligation not met or complied with only partially[8].

Also, it is considered necessary that all subjects of the relation that changes to take part to the corresponding agreement; however, the structure of the contract, the source of novation could be bilateral as well as unilateral and in accordance with the conditions of the legal relation which is settled, as well with the conventional power attributed, within a configuration contract[9] that is positioned prior to novation, to one of the parties to the primary relation.

On this point, the conclusions drawn by a part of the doctrine, which deny the admissibility of a unilateral novation created during the performance of a configuration contract previously stipulated between the parties, do not seem to be sufficient. It was argued in this issue that the difficulty in recognizing that, by a proper act of negotiation, the creditor or the debtor can constitute a novation event, unilaterally, is not based solely on the finding that, by this mode, the act of novation would pave the way for an unjustified interference in the debtor's or creditor's legal sphere. The difficulty lies in the structure of the novation event. In addition, a correct assessment of parties' will, allows to note that, if one of the parties was granted, at the time of obligation undertaking, a power of <<novation>>, an alternative obligation or an obligation with alternative right was intended (rather than predefining the configuration of a <<new>> obligation with a unilateral source) to be created (depending on the structure of interests identifiable in this case) between the same parties, recognizing to the creditor, or to the debtor, the power to transform through a unilateral declaration, the <<complex>> obligation into a simple obligation[10].

The alleged obstacle reasons which relate to novation limits of a structural nature would disappear if the assumptions under which novation must be necessarily qualified as a bilateral contract supported by a specific animus were rejected. But, in a critical note, it should be added that, in accordance with the theory shown above, we would not have a configuration contract, but an alternative or with alternative right obligation ab origine (or even ex intervallo, if performed by a contract subsequently intended to modify the content of the initial relation).

However, we do not take into account the fact that, in the alternative obligation, the debtor may be able to choose the benefit to perform, thus causing a concentration of the obligation from the alternative to the simple one, or may proceed directly to fulfillment, by the execution of one of the two benefits without passing through the negotiation conduct which has as purpose to stipulate a new obligation, not even unilaterally; the differences in terms of regulation seem obvious, for example, in matters of risk of extinction (this aspect is subject to a specific regulation in the alternative and with alternative right obligation, which does not extend to simple obligations), discharge of guarantees and accessories (which would not take place as a result of debtor's choice and of the concentration corresponding to the obligation), the invalidity of novation due to the inexistence of the primary obligation (which obviously would not be configurable in the same terms in the event of alternative or with alternative right obligation). Therefore, these are case which may be both prospected, but which are certainly different and independent of one another[11].

The legislation in the field of novation seems also to require a character of novelty for the obligation to be undertaken instead of the primary one.

However, the actual consistency of this requirement is strictly correlated with the exegesis of the rules which provide it: the latter, only easily understandable prima facie, have caused numerous controversies of interpretation in the doctrine and in the case law.

In particular, the first of these rules contained in Article 1609 NCC, mentions that the novelty must relate to the object or to the subjects of the obligation. On the other hand, it comes to confirm that the issue of a document or its renewal, the introduction or elimination of a deadline or any other ancillary

[8] By compliance understanding the „performance of benefit. The benefit designates what it is owed, namely the compulsory program; the compliance is the implementation of such program" and, vice versa, by noncompliance (understanding) the failure to implement such program.

[9] This phrase identifies those negotiations which, far from being exhausted in an actual or mandatory effect, are proposed as programming instruments of a form of actual capacity to contract, intended in a natural way to be carried out in time, through the succession of acts or behaviors whose causal relevance is predetermined by the program agreement. Precisely referring to these cases, therefore, stare pactis, in which the connection irrevocability is finally concretized, obtains independent consistency and becomes an effect meant to protect the common connection given but which, in our case, is not sufficient to exhaust the entire case from which the final effects will be arising. Irrevocability intervenes and acquires a special significance in the cases in which the contractual connection does not cover the entire complex case from which the effect should arise and is used for the qualification of this connection, specifically and particularly, when the connection itself is not solved immediately in the real or mandatory impact.

modification of the obligation, do not produce novation. The changes also brought to the deadline up to which an obligation was to be executed, does not constitute novation, this change not having as a consequence the discharge of the former obligation concomitantly with the constitution of a new obligation – and it represented only an amendment to the initial contract terms, being essential to distinguish between a simple contractual amendment and the novation of the contractual obligations.

2.3. The legal nature of novation

We consider that it is useful to begin analyzing novation and its relationships with the event of obligation amendment, by exploring the classification of the institution in generalized terms.

In this respect, it is preliminarily noted that there is no consensus in the doctrine not even with regard to the legal nature of novation.

The view that is, perhaps, predominant at present, notices that a typical negotiation diagram is chosen, i.e. a genuine contract.

On the one hand, it is claimed that the novation event, even if it is separated into two actual distinct situations (discharge of the primary obligation and the constitution of "new" obligations), does not compromise the unitary essential structure of the act of novation and, therefore, does not legitimate the construction of novation in terms of case consisting of two independent conventions, one meant to determine the settlement of an obligation and the other having as purpose to constitute a "new" obligation, so that the two effects (independent, because each derive from a different and independent act) be connected to each other by a specific intention of the parties, translated in each of the two conventions, into a contractual assembly.

On the other hand, we find the unifying time of the "essential unitary structure" of the act of novation, which expresses, therefore, the common determination of the parties (showing a constant and invariable interest thereof) to discharge an obligation existing between them in order to create a "new" obligation "instead" of the previous obligation.

The first theoretical prerequisite on which this reconstruction relies is represented by the alleged irreducibility of the effects of which novation is composed (settlement and constitution) for one alone; these effects, yet, find an independent legal qualification in a contractual case with a bilateral structure and synallagmatic nature.

According to this opinion, therefore, novatia would be concretized in a contractual diagram whose typical character should be identified, in contraposition with the ability to find, within novation (bilateral) diagram, a waiver to the debt[12], in its irreducibility in the individual moments that compose it and they compete, together, to the outlining of the typical contractual effect, and therefore, in necessary correlation between the two opposed events.

The thesis which qualifies novation as a contract leaves, therefore, from the denial of the unitary nature of the effect and from the conviction that there is, in exchange, a duality of distinct effects, but not necessarily correlated depending on the exchange operation which, in a broad sense, represents the purpose of novation: the unifying moment would be accomplished on a contractual level, through the overall effectiveness of the contract, which is presented as unitary in a necessary way, and not more radically, on the actual level.

The settlement and constitution effects maintain distinct, although they represent, from this point of view, as many fragments which, with a perfect equivalence, draw up a uniform case, that of novation contract: if the settlement of the primary obligation and the creation of a "new" obligation are two contractual, independent and distinct effects, but connected by a mutual interdependence relation, which, within the global novation event, have the same value, then they are two contractual equivalent effects.

It is necessary, further, to pay attention to another thesis, according to which novation should be understood as an effect which can result from a multitude of fortuitous heterogeneous contractual cases: any contract, characterized by an independent and specific function and occurring between the subjects of the obligation (with or without the participation of a third party), may create, within its own system of effects, a "new" compulsory relation and the loss of the primary obligation validity. In the light of those exposed, the obligation novation could occur regardless of a specific will of the parties relating to the settlement of the existing obligation for the creation of a "new" obligation and it would exist in all cases in which the "new" obligation, as is desired by the parties ex contractu, would be objectively incompatible with the primary obligation original. After a critical reading of this wording, it was noted that the difficulties emerge taking into account that the two obligations, even if "incompatible" between them, may, however, coexist and also that even if it is assumed, in general terms, that the institution of a "new" binding relation, "incompatible" with the "survival"" of the old one, implies - despite the lack of a punctual and unequivocal will of the parties - from a technical point of view, the discharge of the primary obligation, the situation in which the "new" "incompatible" obligation would appear ant it would reveal, within the global event, as fact (which produces the discharge effect), thus outlining a irreducible dynamic for the novation of obligation (even) understood as effectus iuris[13].

[12] The will of disposal of the debt, which can be seen within novation, could not even be qualified as an onerous waiver (to the debt). In fact, whenever the act of disposal does not have a purely abdicative nature, but proposes, based on the onerous nature of the act (which, therefore, falls within a wider structural context), to determine the construction of a binding relation, we will not be able to have any waiver (although onerous) in a technical direction.

The doctrinal elaborations presented until now, with all their diversity, place, therefore, predominantly on the path of reductio ad unitatem of the novation phenomenon. This is done by qualifying novation, alternatively, as contract or as effect, without taking into account the possibility that a same institution be able to receive a double qualification, in the light of the context in which it is introduced.

It is necessary, at this point, to prospect another reconstructive hypothesis, according to which novation would be characterized, in reality, in a syncretic mode, of a double nature: it could have traits, depending on the circumstances, both of independent contractual case fortuitously (when the minimum actual unit of the contract is exhausted only under the effect of novation, unitarily undertaken as actual moment of an independent contractual event of a settlement – constitution nature), and of individual effect produced by a complex and heterogeneous case fortuitously - a fragment of a minimum more extensive actual unit, which, although not exhausted in an individual novation effect, is meant to include it[14].

In (apparent) compliance with this prospecting, the doctrine emphasized the duplicity and ambivalence proper to the novation phenomenon, without reaching, however, to assign equal importance to the two different senses of novation, of contract and effect: we can speak of genuine novation only in the first case.

In fact, the independence of the effect of novation might be rejected, by postulating instead that the unifying feature of those corresponding effects would be represented by the contract with settlement - constitution effectiveness.

In this case only the subsequent application, by an integral and direct way, of the regulation proper to the institution would become possible, because, assuming that the settlement of the primary obligation was done by objective incompatibility, irrespective of the contractual moment, a irreducible dynamic would be triggered at obligation novation (even) understood as effectus iuris.

However, if we look carefully, the obligatio novanda settlement, for those who reconstruct novation (and) as effectus iuris, cannot be achieved by objective incompatibility (which would necessitate a duality of antithetic effects), so that the constitution of the new relation is not presented as a simple logical antecedent, as fact alien to the effective event.

On the contrary, the effect of novation understood unitarily, expression of a power of disposition of the right holder, synthesizes and transcends the individual effects of settlement and constitution.

In the same way in which, for the supporters of the contractual thesis, the cause of novation cannot be broken down into individual fragments that make up the typical contractual case, and the effect of novation constitutes an overrun of the settlement and constitution events and is, by itself, able to independently describe the case[15].

In order to be able to solve once and for all the dilemma concerning the nature of novation, we must therefore, first of all focus the speech on the analysis of novation effects, but without losing sight of the questions above with regard to its structure.

3. Conclusions

Finally, it should be specified that the novation about which we discussed until now is of objective type and, as such, it must be differentiated from subjective novation, which shall be concretized in a contract intended to substitute the primary debtor, which is released, for a new debtor[16]. Even if it is also an event which discharges the binding relation, the subjective novation takes place, by definition, on a subjective level of the relation and involves, in accordance with the express referral made by the legislator, the application of the rules in matter of delegation, expromission and subrogation.

Changing the creditor or the debtor of a legal binding relation is mandatory in order to deal with subjective novation. When a third party undertakes to a creditor to pay its debt, without seeking the assistance of the initial debtor to do this, this is novation by change of debtor. Expromission operates in such a novation. Within this type of novation (via change of creditor) the substitution of the former creditor with a [15] Unlike, for example, the alleged substitutive effect or, from the contractual perspective, the relation expressed in terms of substitution, we realize that, as the doctrine has not forgotten to underline, the need to call attention to the content of the "substitution" formula betrays its insufficiency in qualifying, itself, the phenomenon of novation. However, it seems excessive to deny, solely for this reason, the opportunity to express a definition of novation within the meaning of "substitution" and, thus, to consider clearly preferable to focus on the intercurrent connection between the two effects of settlement of the initial obligation and of constitution of a new obligation. In exchange, it seems that these two ways of dealing with the phenomenon are equally suitable to identify it correctly and that subsequent questions on this subject represent, more than anything, mere discussions of a lexical nature.

[16] It should be recalled that the „contract for undertaking the debit of another person, when it is not presented, as effect of the express will of the parties, as case of settlement (by novation) of the pre-existent essential report, generates a succession with a particular title in the debit, determining the entry of the new debtor in the passive subjective situation in which the initial debtor was, as a result of the change caused by convention, which implements the respective event. Also, we cannot let unnoticed the absolute relevance of the difference between the effect of novation and the effect of deprivation of undertaking the debit of another person, by attributing different relevant consequences of settlement to each of the two effective methods and confirming the absolute actuality of the analysis on the effect of succession in our system; the distinction between settlement by novation of the initial compulsory report in the succession in it with a particular title maintains its relevance as regards the regulation of prescription, of privileges, of the succession in the controversial position from the trial point of view, or of the criminal clause, of pactum non petendo and of the arbitration clause contained in the initial contract.

new one takes place. The consequence resulting from this type of novation constitutes the debtor's release from the initial creditor and its obligation toward a new creditor. The difference of novation in relation to debt assignment and subrogation in creditor's rights is constituted by debt payment. By comparing debt assignment and subrogation in creditor's rights with novation, we notice that, in the case of the first two legal mechanisms, the initial obligation remains the same and is forwarded to the new creditor while in the case of novation the initial obligation is settled at the same time with its conversion into a new obligation which will necessarily contain a new element as compared to the initial obligation[17].

Considering this summarized preliminary characterization of the institution, many profiles which, in time, have triggered heated debates that have never calmed down between the authors who were in charge of this matter, remain to be clarified.

Indeed, in novation regulation there are a few normative moments that seem to be difficult to reduce to the system.

For this purpose, a useful reading key is represented by the attempt to correctly classify the relationship between the events that change the relation and novation, because the study of novation means, in the background and on a theoretical level the " terminal point" of the events which modify idem debitum, coinciding with the very event of novation in which nova, inherent prior debitum, replace idem debitum "opening towards" novum debitum".

The doctrinal traditional statement according to which the requirement of novelty, or "aliquid novi", understood as a substantial modification of the benefit object or of the relation title, is co-essential to novation, arises from the reading of these rules. On the contrary, it is concluded that this event can occur in connection with the renegotiation which leads to a new contract regulation of the only methods for the carrying out of the pre-existing benefit.

The other normative feature traditionally attributed to novation relates to the psychological scope and is deducted also from the provisions of Article 1610 of the Civil Code, according to which the intention to novate, the will of discharging the previous obligation "must be indubitable", it must be an unambiguous result[18]. So, it is common practice to say that "animus novandi", which consists of the joint and clear intention of discharging the primary obligation, given its substitution to a new one, must be considered, together with aliquid novi, in the form of an essential element of the novation contract, in the same way as the subjects and the cause.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE CARGO INSURANCE CONTRACT IN CASE OF INTERNATIONAL LAND TRANSPORT

Dănilă Ștefan MATEI *

Abstract

Cargo international transport is an engine for the development of the economic relations between states involving cross-border movement of goods through the crossing of at least one border of a state (international transport) or by crossing at least two border crossing points, in which case we are in the presence of an international cargo transit. During the transit the goods transported may be subject to an insurance.

The object of the cargo insurance is, thus, represented by the goods, the items expressly listed in the insurance policy, within the territorial limits specified in the insurance policy, both during the transport and during the storage, in the latter case, at the express request of the insured and with the acceptance of the insurer.

This paper analyzes the characteristics of the cargo insurance aiming to present the theoretical and practical aspects of interest with regard to the cargo insurance concluded in case of an international land freight transport.

Keywords: international freight transport, cargo, insurance, risk, land transport of goods

1. Introduction

For the goods to satisfy the needs for which they were created, it is necessary that they are transported from the production site to the place where they meet the demand, so that, often, their exploitation is carried out on the international market. Therefore, the transport meets the need for movement of goods, their transit being, often, international (from the territory of a state to the place of destination located in another state).

In the field of international cargo transport we find insurance contracts within sale-purchase contracts, with direct implications on the execution of the contract, including on the transport[1]. The transport and insurance costs directly contribute to the formation of the international prices of goods.

The insurance of the goods that are subject to the international trade activity is concluded depending on the conditions included in the sale-purchase contract, respectively the clauses regarding the conditions of delivery of the goods.

The cargo insurance contract for road transport represents the agreement between the insured and the insurer based on which the insured undertakes to pay a premium to the insurer, and the latter takes over the risk of the of the occurrence of the insured event, binding himself to pay to the insured, on its occurrence, a compensation or an amount insured within the agreed limits of the content. The conclusion of the insurance for the period of transport and storage of the goods that are subject to foreign trade sale-purchase operations is optional[2].

1.1. Insurable interest.

The insurance of the cargo transported is mainly depending on the need for the existence of a patrimonial interest, assessable in money[3] with regard to the insured goods and the compensation. Under no circumstances, the insured will receive a compensation greater than the damage suffered.

For the cargo insurance for the damage suffered during transportation using road vehicles, the holder of the interest of the insurance is the forwarder or the owner of the cargo (the recipient, the purchaser) to whom the compensation is paid if the event occurs.

The forwarder is bound by the generic obligation to prepare the legal and material conditions regarding the movement of the freight carried. The forwarder must, among other things, carry out any necessary operations, from the technical and administrative point of view, in order to make possible the intended transport[4], which may include, according to the time of the cargo risk transfer, the conclusion of the cargo insurance. But, the diligence of the cargo insurance may also belong to the recipient of the cargo.

1.2. The risk of the contract.

Since Incoterms Rules become binding upon their acceptance and insertion in the sale-purchase contract[5], they become of great importance, including in terms of the legal relationship arising from the insurance of the goods which are subject to the sale-purchase and international transport contracts.

In relation to the Incoterms Rules there will be determined the time when the risk is transferred from the seller to the buyer. In this way, each party will be concerned to conclude the insurance when the risk lies with him.

The general rule is that, during the transport, the goods are carried on the purchaser's risk. The international experience has shown that there are periods, during transport, when the risk is either under the liability of the seller or that of the buyer, or that of the insured, depending on those agreed in the sale–purchase contract.

One of the obligations of the forwarder is to deliver the goods to the carrier. The delivery of goods to the carrier means not only the beginning of the hold of the carrier for the cargo but also the transfer of the risk to the buyer of the goods (its owner).

The circumstances of casus fortuitus and of force majeure raise the question of the risk of the contract both in case of the transport contract and also in case of cargo insurance contract for transport.

In the transport contract, the forwarder, creditor of the specific performance, unfulfilled due to fortuitous causes by the carrier, supports the corresponding damages, not having the right to ask for their coverage by the carrier, but neither does he owe the price of the transport. The carrier bears the risk of the contract exclusively from the perspective of the right for the cost of the transport, in the meaning that loses the amount of money representing the contract price of the transport[6].

If within the insurance contract the case of force majeure represents a clause exempting from liability of the insurer, if this risk occurs, the insurer will not indemnify the owner of the goods. By default, the carrier can not be held liable for loss or damage to goods due to this type of causes. What it is being carried is not the cargo of the carrier but the cargo of the forwarder, the carrier being a simple holder of the goods. The liability of the carrier is a contractual liability, which is based on its fault for failure to fulfill its obligations[7].

1.3. The insurance policy.

The proof for the cargo insurance is the insurance policy which is a document that includes, on principle, the following elements: the name and the address of the insurer, the name and the address of the insured, the object insured, the risks insured, the duration of the insurance, the amount insured, the insurance premium.

The cargo insurance policy used to ensure the goods during the road transport and the storage shall be drawn up in a single original document. At the request and on the expense of the insured, the insurer can issue duplicates or copies of the insurance policy.

In international trade, the insurance policy has the value of a credit instrument. It can be "nominal", "bearer" or "registered", when it can be sent or given as security, as appropriate[8].

The cargo insurance policies are of several types:

1. subscription policy (to ensure all goods shipped from the insured within a specific period of time),
2. floating policies or open policies (policies that establish a certain limit of values that is ensured and that decreases with each transport carried out, until it is finished),
3. travel policies (policies for insurance of the goods from the place of their performance to their place of unloading),
4. reinsurance policies.

The mandatory elements in the insurance policy and, also, constituent parts of the insurance contract, are the following: the contracting parties, the object and the insured value, the means of transport, the risks insured and the risks excluded, the insurance premium.

1.4. The parties of the contract.

The parties of the insurance contract are the Insurer, that is represented by an insurance company and the Insured, who can be any person who has an insurable interest, cargo owners, forwarders, creditors, insurers that reinsure.

1.5. The object of the contract.

The object of the contract is represented by any goods transported in international traffic or that is stored for shipment.

1.6. The amount insured.

For cargo insurances, the amount insured includes the following components: the price of the goods (according to the original invoice or to the value of the goods on the market of the place of shipping, at the time of the insurance), the cost of the transport (e.g.: costs for loading and unloading the cargo), the hoped benefit (e.g.: unforeseen expenses at the conclusion of the loss determination contract) and, possibly, customs duties.

The amount insured is the value within whose limits the insurer pays the compensation.

Within the cargo insurance for transport there are also policies that do not include precise specifications regarding the amount insured. Depending on determining the amount insured at the time of the conclusion of the contract, we can distinguish between assessed policies and not assessed policies. In case of the not assessed policies, when the insured risks occurs and in order to obtain the compensation, the insured will have to prove the value of the goods affected by the damage by invoices, delivery notes, bill of lading, bank statements, etc. If the insured or the beneficiary of the insurance holds an assessed policy, it will not to have to prove the value of the goods insured because it was established when the contract was concluded[9].

The insured amount determined under the insurable value, respectively, the so-called under-insurance, makes a partial coverage by the insurer, in relation to the actual value of the damages suffered by the goods during transport, the percentage of the under-insurance being applied to the insured value of the goods.

1.7. The insurance premium

Is the amount of money that the insured pays in advance to the insurer, the latter binding himself to take the risk of occurrence of certain event and to pay the beneficiary, who may be the insured or a third person, a compensation within the limits set by the contract.

Among the determining factors in establishing the level of the insurance premiums we specify:

1. the scope of the risks covered by the policy conditions, such as the existence of special risks required to be covered by the insured, determined by the nature and characteristics of the goods (e.g. breakage or scattering in case of transporting glass or food),
2. use of a particular type of packaging (e.g. use of a cheaper package),
3. the duration and methods of carrying out the freight transport (some insurers do not pay compensation for the damage suffered as a result of the delay or the extension of the travel or they increase the insurance premium when there are more transshipments of the goods as a result of increased risk of damage),
4. the way that the means of transport looks like (e.g. the age of the means transport can contribute to the risk assessment and, thus, to the establishment of the insurance premium) and
5. the conjunctural state of the international insurance market[10].

1.8. The risks insured.

Road transport insurances were influenced by the maritime transport, the latter having a longer tradition.

For the road transport, the cargo insurance can be carried out for general risks and for special risks, the insurance conditions being classified as general conditions of insurance and special conditions of insurance.

The general conditions of insurance cover either a wide range of risks (e.g.: "all risks" insurance) or "named perils". The special risks are insurable separately, in exchange for the payment of additional insurance premiums.

Within the cargo insurance procedure for international road transport the same insurance conditions as in maritime insurance are practiced, namely: conditions A, B and C.

Condition A ("all risks of loss and/or damage") offers the largest coverage but is also the most expensive. Under this condition, risks listed separately as exclusions are not covered.

Condition B covers the losses and/or the damage of the goods during transport, contains a smaller number of covered risks, risks that are expressly mentioned in the content of the insurance condition. By default, the insurance premium is smaller. Among these risks we specify: fire or explosion, overturning, collision of the means of transport with a foreign object, earthquake, volcanic eruption, lightning, water entering the means of transport, container or storage place, total loss of a package lost or dropped whilst loading onto or unloading from the means of transport. Together with these risks, some insurers also include other risks such as: collapse phenomena (bridges, buildings, tunnels), falling trees, breakage of dams, water pipes, avalanches, lightning, floods, earthquakes.

Condition C covers losses and/or damages of the goods during transport and covers fewer risks than those included under Conditions A and B. There have been included: fires and explosions, overturning or crashing of the means of transport, as well as the collision of the means of transport with a foreign object, other than water.

The insurance of the goods through conditions A, B and C covers certain categories of expenses among which we specify: those made by the insured in order to save the freight loading, for the prevention of an imminent danger or to minimize the losses and/or the damages incurred; the ones regarding the determination of losses and/or damages made by the insured, if the damage is suffered due to a cause which is specified in the insurance; rescue expenses, paid by the insured, established according to the provisions of the insurance contract and/or the applicable law; expenses that represent the rate of liability according to the clause "mutual fault in case of collision" if this clause is provided by the contract[11].

The payment of an additional premium may lead to the extension of any of the conditions mentioned above, so that special risks are covered, such as: robbery, theft, non-delivery, strike and risks related to the nature of the cargo.

Within the cargo insurance conditions a part is represented by the risks excluded, respectively, those for which no compensation is paid, the losses, the damages or the expenses caused by: willful misconduct of the insured or his representatives, as well as the criminal or administrative consequences of this behavior; losses indirectly related to the prohibition of sending or receiving the goods, moral damages, or loss of the profit expected; losses resulting from commercial operations; the usual loss in weight or volume, drying, evaporation, leakage or normal wear and tear of the insured goods; insufficient or improper packing or preparation of the insured goods; inherent defect or the nature of the insured goods; customs or commercial offenses; fines, confiscations, seizure, smuggling, prohibited or clandestine trade; insolvency or failure to fulfill the financial obligations by the owners, managers, or operators of the means of transport.

On principle, these risks are included in the category of uninsurable risks, in the meaning that none of them may be additionally insured.

Furthermore, from the general conditions of insurance are also excluded the risks of war and strikes, these risks could be, however, subject to a special insurance, in exchange for the payment of an additional amount.

Some special goods are subject to special conditions, being possible to conclude a special insurance, considering the nature, the volume, the weight or the value of that cargo (e.g.: transportation of bank bills, securities, coupons, bank notes and coins, precious metals, artworks, dangerous goods, postal parcels, even those with declared value, perishable goods, live animals and others).

Within the transit or combined road transport "the storage risks" condition is also important. This condition covers the losses and the damages of the insured goods, during the storage of the goods, for the following events: fire, explosion, lightning, heavy rain, including its indirect effects, earthquake, hurricane, collapse or landslide, avalanche. The exclusions presented also apply to this condition.

In order for this clause to take effect it is absolutely necessary that the warehouses of the forwarder and the beneficiary are indicated[12]. Romanian arbitration practice takes into consideration the correctness regarding the refusal of payment for the compensation "as long as the warehouses in question, both of the supplier and of the beneficiary, located outside the port of unloading of the goods, were not indicated in the insurance policy"[13].

The special conditions of insurance represent a supplement to the general conditions of insurance of goods, the insured requesting an additional protection for certain risks. The most common special conditions are: the risks of war; the risks of strikes; the risks of theft, robbery and non-delivery.

There is also a number of typical risks arising from the nature of the cargo. There are taken into consideration phenomena such as: overheating, spoilage, breakage, scattering, etc.

Unless otherwise provided in the cargo insurance contract, the general exclusions that have been presented are also valid for the special conditions herein mentioned.

Due to the increased incidence of the risks covered, the condition "risks of theft, robbery and non-delivery" need a few specifications.

It covers the losses and the damage for the insured goods caused by theft, robbery and non-delivery of the goods. The compensation is determined starting from the sum insured plus the expenses incurred by the insured on the account of the insurance company aimed at limiting the damage or reconditioning of the goods. Also, one can proceed to some cuts in situations such as: inexact triggering of the risk without bad faith by the insured; causing damages to the insurance company by non-preservation of the right to sue for compensation against those responsible, compensation, possibly, with the premiums remaining to be paid; payment of the deductible, etc. The resulting amount represents the final compensation.

1.9. Interpretation of the contract.

The judge must see the intention of the parties, the meaning and the occurrence of the exclusion clauses of the guarantees or of those regarding the loss of the right (forfeiture) which give the insurer the opportunity to discuss the guarantee itself, emptying the insurance contract of its essence or contents. The interpretative approach of the judge of the case is, currently, extremely complex since the detection of the content of the contractual clauses in order to establish the rights and the obligations of the parties must take into account, besides the regulatory framework conferred by the provisions of the common law, also those of the commercial law and those of the special legal provisions, without ignoring the community law in the field[14].

In addition, the judicial practice has shown that the interpretation of the cargo insurance conditions often presents difficulties, arising from the ambiguity or the lack of information from the insurance conditions or the existence of special conditions, derogating from the general ones. Consequently, we present some of these issues of wide interest:

The cargo insurance contract is the work of the insurer who "thinks it" (conceives it), drafts it and offers it for signing to those who want to be ensured against any sinister or against the event of the occurrence of a risk. The insured usually adheres to the preset contract, without doubting the general and/or special conditions stipulated by it or the content itself of the "prefabricated" legal act.

[13] Decision no. 139 of the 29th of August 1977 of the Court of Appeal Bucharest quoted by O. Căpățână in Revista română de studii internaționale nr. 3/1980, p. 267.

[14] Mona-Maria Pivniceru, Efectele juridice ale contractelor aleatorii, Ed Hamangiu 2009, p. 97.

As a consequence of the adhesion character of the insurance contract, the doctrine and the specialized practice stated that clauses that are equivocal, ambiguous or obscure are interpreted in favour of the insured ("contra proferentem").

The ambiguity covers two main causes of interpretation/where the interpretation of the contract is required: one is the lack of information within the provisions of a contract, a second one is the situation where certain policies are abundant in clauses and documents that provide excessive information;

The lack of information found while reading the contract gives it an imprecise and partly ambiguous character; the insufficiency of information may result, for example, from the lack of definitions, the use, by those who write the policies, of generic, inappropriate words or phrases, or that do not circumstantiate the situations and that become inaccurate in a particular context.

In case of lack of information, materialized, for example, by the lack of a definition of the terms used, it appears the problem of resolving differences arising between the "common" meaning of the words and their "legal" or "technical" meanings, meanings absolutely necessary for the courts, for example, when they are called upon to interpret the words or the phrases in a way that should be acceptable and accessible, especially to an ordinary ensured that requested some type of coverage (insurance).

Rules of interpretation. On principle, there are two rules of interpretation that can be applied: the first is that, if in doubt, the words of the contract are interpreted to the detriment of the party trying to diminish (or shirk from) their contractual obligations; the second establishes that, if in doubt, the words of the contract are interpreted to the detriment of the party who proposed their insertion in the contract (considering that it was its duty that those words/phrases are clear, leave no room for equivocal).

In accordance with the principle (or rule) contra proferentem, if the meaning of a contractual provision is ambiguous, it would be preferred and considered that the meaning is averse to the party that proposed (or imposed) that clause. In the name of fairness, the principle contra proferentem claims not to ever intentionally distort the clear sense of the words used to form the clauses of a contract[15].

An exclusion provided by an insurance contract is formal when it is express, clear, precise and unequivocal; it dispels any hesitation between non-insurance and the worsening of the risk insured, i.e. all the uncertainties regarding the intent of exclusion[16].

The exclusion is considered to be clear and precise when it refers to "precise criteria and assumptions restrictedly listed", being desirable that the insurer tries an exhaustive enumeration of the clauses for exclusion from the guarantee.

There are regarded as imprecise the exclusions that relate to approximations or rules (standards) that are unclear, inaccurate, adding more difficulty for the insured when the insurer has the tendency to reduce or even to refuse to grant the guarantee.

The exclusion should also be limited, i.e. to allow the insured to know the exact extent of the guarantee underwritten and to understand the terms of the agreement concluded.

In case an exclusion clause from the guarantee is neither formal nor limited, there are two solutions, both favorable to the insured: either the clause is assessed as lacking validity or it will be considered ambiguous or inaccurate and, consequently, it will be interpreted by the court against the insurer who drafted it[17].

The conflict between the general and special provisions frequently impacts on the object of the insurance contract, especially regarding the extent of the guarantee owed by the insurer;

To be considered as being formal, an exclusion should not only be included in the general conditions of the policy, but also in the particular ones, in view of the fact that "the clauses of the particular conditions benefit of primacy over the general conditions if they are not compatible with each other".

2. Conclusions

The distinctiveness of the cargo insurance contract consists of the complement of the technique for taking over the risk by a third party, who, at the same time, does not take part in the operations that he insures, but provides only the performance of the insurance, with the legal aspect concerning the contractual nature of any insurance operation, regardless of the risks covered and the ways of covering.

The presentation led to the finding of the fact that the cargo insurance represents a complex insurance, with multiple characteristics given by its technicality but also by the multitude of legal issues that may arise from the analysis of the general and special conditions, especially when they are drafted inaccurately, equivocally, ambiguously.

THE POSSIBILITY OF CONVENTIONAL REPRESENTATION OF A CREDITOR LEGAL ENTITY BY ANOTHER LEGAL REPRESENTATIVE IN THE ENFORCEMENT PHASE

Emilian-Constantin MEIU[*]

Abstract

We aim to answer the following question if possible creditor legal representation by proxy another person, during enforcement. The need to find a solution for this issue arose as a result of delivery of Decision No. 9/2016 issued Î.C.C.J., panels for a dispensation of law in civil matters. Part of the answer to this question are undoubtedly of Decision No. 9/2016, specifically the fact that the incidents of enforcement before the judge in court on representation of the legal person is possible only through legal adviser or advocate, within the law, not by an authorized person. Since the Decision. 9/2016 covers only representation before the court shall consider the possibility of this studio extinţe considerations set out decision and the facts constituting the premise of this article.

Keywords: representation, enforcement phase, legal entity .

1. Introduction

The issue for discussion is based on Decision No. 9/2016 issued Î.C.C.J., panels for a dispensation of law in civil matters. This decision Î.C.C.J., stated that "the interpretation and application of art. 84 para. (1) of the Civil Procedure Code, the application for summons and conventional representation of the legal person before the courts can not be done by proxy legal person or by legal counsel or lawyer up".

We present some of the reasons on which it based its decision mentioned above.

Decision No reasons were invoked. XXII of June 12, 2006, delivered by the High Court of Cassation and Justice - United Sections in the outcome of the appeal on points of law, namely the argument that "the activities of legal consultancy, representation and legal advice and drafting of legal documents, including introduction of actions in court, with the possibility of certifying the identity of the parties, content and date of documents, defense and representation by legal means the rights and interests of individuals and businesses in relations with public authorities, institutions and any Romanian or foreign constitute, where appropriate, specific activities of the legal profession, regulated in art. 3 of Law no. 51/1995 on the organization and the profession of lawyer, republished (2), as amended, the profession of notary public [Art. 8 9:10 in law notaries and notary activity no. 36/1995, republished (3)] or the bailiff (art. 7 of Law no. 188/2000 on bailiffs, republished, with subsequent amendments)". In paragraph no. 28 was held, referring also to Decision No. XXII of June 12, 2006, that "certain legal activities such as legal representation, drafting of legal documents, formulating actions, exercising and justifying legal remedies may be performed by legal advisors, but the provision of such activities are permitted only as regulated by art. 1-4 of Law no. 514/2003 on the organization and the profession of legal advisor, with completions, ie their capacity as civil servants or employees with individual labor contract, a legal entity of public or private ".

Also in paragraph no. 29 High Court of Cassation and Justice continued playing the reasoning of Decision No. XXII of June 12, 2006 that "since the activities referred not qualify as acts of trade, by reference to the provisions of art. 3 and 4 of the Commercial Code (effective from date of the decision on points of law) (...) they can not be exercised by companies incorporated with such an object, applications for authorization of such companies is inadmissible ".

In its decision stated there was a legal practice in that representation of the legal person by proxy legal person before the bailiff is not admissible and the justification of this case was the need to ensure consistency throughout the proceedings, given that such a prohibition It has already been stated by HCCJ decision to stage the proceedings before the court.

2.1. General considerations on legal representation during enforcement person

By paragraphs 31-34 of Decision No. 9/2016 issued by Î.C.C.J., panels for absolution matters of law, is established that the courts for the legal entity may opt for conventional representation or can stand by the legal representative. In this respect, High Court of Cassation and Justice noted that the situation representation in court legal person can choose only the categories specified in art. 84 para. (1) Civil Procedure Code., legal counsel or attorney, respectively. On the other hand, pursuant to paragraph no. 33 of the decision under review "mandate agreement concluded between two legal effect only in terms of substantive law, not in terms of procedural law governed the matter of representation of mandatory legal rules." Following the arguments above, paragraph no. 35 of the decision states that "the activity of conventional representation before the court is a non-commercial activity reserved by lawyers and legal advisors. Or, if they agree on the idea that a legal person to be represented by another person, it concludes, unacceptable, that the representation itself could be object of the trustee.

For the reasons set that decision analysis concerns the situation representation legal person before the court, which follows naturally from the fact that the notification of the application for a ruling to unlock one point of law was made by the Brasov Court strictly on this. However, according to art. 521 par. (1) Civil Procedure Code., complete absolution of points of law only to pronounce on the question of law subject to dispensation.

Regarding the interpretation of Decision No. 9/2016 issued Î.C.C.J., panels for a dispensation of law in civil matters, was put in question whether it is possible creditor legal representation by proxy another person, during enforcement. Part of the answer to this question are undoubtedly of Decision No. 9/2016, specifically the fact that the incidents of enforcement before the judge in court on representation of the legal person is possible only through legal adviser or advocate, within the law, not by an authorized person.

2.2. Considerations on legal representation during enforcement person in front bailiff

Since the Decision 9/2016 covers only representation before the court the question arises whether it is possible to expand its content and representation before the bailiff.

To this end it is necessary to analyze the scope of art. 84 para. (1) Civil Procedure Code which provides that legal entities can be represented conventionally before the courts only through legal adviser or lawyer. The rule established by art. 84 para. (1) Civil Procedure Code is interpreted and applied strictly, so that it can not be extended to the conventional representation of the legal person in situations other than in court. For these reasons, we believe that before the bailiff representing the legal entity is not limited to a lawyer or legal adviser. Moreover, in the absence of the rule laid down in art. 84 para. (1) Civil Procedure Code. Or before the court would not be there any restrictions regarding representation of the legal person.

Of course, we can say on the one hand, the reasons which led to the delivery of Decision. 31-34 of Decision No 9/2016. 9/2016 issued by Î.C.C.J. Such are the reasons underlying the decision delivery mentioned above are the non-commercial character of conventional representation activities and that these activities are reserved by law for lawyers and legal advisers. This key and retain their validity before the bailiff which could lead to the conclusion that even before the bailiff legal person must be represented by a lawyer or adviser only conventional legal considerations applying by analogy Decision no. 9/2016 pronounced by I.C.C.J On the other hand, as was pronounced and practice, there is a need for consistency in the application of rules on corporate representation.

2.3. Considerations on representation legal person consent enforcement and appeal to execution.

Since the notification of the court with the request for a declaration of enforceability is made by the bailiff, the question arises as to what conditions might censorship as a representative of the legal person which in practice acts as intermediary between the legal person-creditor and attorney / legal counsel who signed the request for enforcement to the bailiff. In this respect, it was noted that as long as the notification of the court is carried out by the bailiff, such a vote can not be achieved by means of a plea lack of representative, but only during checks on a declaration forced, which include checks on the request for enforcement.

However, checks that the court can do during enforcement are limited to checking that the reasons provided by art. 666 par. (5) pt. 1-6 Civil Procedure Code[1]. From reading the text of the law said that application for a declaration could be rejected for the existence of other impediments stipulated by law, under art. 666 par. (5) pt. 6 Civil Procedure Code, for lack of proof of the quality of conventional representative signatory of the application for enforcement. Of course it is debatable whether the absence of proof to the quality of representative conventional application for enforcement is a real impediment provided by law according to the real meaning of 666 par. (5) pt. 6 Civil Procedure Code.

The doctrine[2] consistently stated that the text envisages strict impediments and provided by law ie special legislation temporarily suspending the right to seek or continue enforcement of certain executory contracts[3]. In light of such an interpretation, without proof quality representative is such an impediment that

[1] Cited legal text provides that the court may reject the application for a declaration of enforcement only if:
1. the application for enforcement is the responsibility of another organ of execution than before it;
2. decision or, where appropriate, the document does not, by law, enforceable;
3. document other than a judgment, does not meet the formal requirements required by law;
4. The amount is not certain, liquid and due.
5. debtor enjoys immunity from execution;
6. Title contains provisions which can not be brought out by enforcement;
7. There are other impediments provided by law.

[3] It considered such a failure impediment requirements of article. 603 par. (3) NCPC, as amended by O.U.G. no. 1/2016. According to art. 603 par. (3) NCPC "if the arbitral award concerns a dispute relating to the transfer of ownership and / or the establishment of another real right would result in the rejection of the application for a declaration only by an interpretation in full and in any case strictly required by art. art. 666 par. (5) pt. 6 Civil Procedure Code.

Regarding appeal to execution, we appreciate that there may be a reason for its admission that the request for enforcement was filed legal person as proxy another person. The reasons are the same as we have shown above, recitals Decision No. 9/2016 issued Î.C.C.J. It can not be extended to the conventional representation of the legal person before the judge.

At the end of this brief analysis we express our hope that the judicial practice uniform will solve the problem at hand, even if the solution would appear to be without a fracture consistent corporate representation rules. Would like in this context to a possible legislative amendment or decision I.C.C.J legally binding, legal persons may be represented exclusively by a lawyer or legal adviser only before the courts, not before the bailiff. We appreciate that this is the solution that respects equally the letter and spirit of the law, even if a solution contrary there are many arguments opportunity.

We believe that our solution is consistent with those stated by the High Court of Cassation and Justice Decision no. 9/2016. The Court stated in that decision that the reasoning contained in recitals Constitutional Court Decision no. 485 of June 23, 2015, which was declared unconstitutional the provisions of Art. 13 para. (2) sentence II, art. 84 para. (2) and art. 486 par. (3) of the Code of Civil Procedure with respect to claims arising from mandatory preparation and presentation of the appeal by legal persons by a lawyer or legal adviser, can not be applied mutatis mutandis to the provisions of art. 84 para. (1) of the Code of Civil Procedure because, in the latter case, the text concerns only the limiting conventional legal person before the court, without prejudice to the legal status of legal representation and without turning obligation representation and assistance councilor legal or lawyer in a condition of admissibility of the action or a barrier to access to justice. Also art. 209 par. (1) of the Civil Code provides that a legal person exercises its rights and fulfills its obligations through its management as of the date of their creation. In the absence of the administrative, until the date of their exercise rights and obligations concerning legal entity shall be made by the founders or by individuals or legal persons appointed for this purpose, as required by art. 210 par. (1) of the civil code. Since the limit in art. 84 para. (1) of the Code of Civil Procedure shall act only where the legal person opts for conventional representation in court, in which case they can choose the only category referred the text said that, without representation conventional procedural rights of legal person may be exercised by the legal representative.

The decision considerations set Î.C.C.J. showed that a mandate agreement is concluded between two legal entities, this effect only in terms of substantive law, not in terms of procedural law governed the matter of representation of mandatory legal rules. The use of the adverb "only" label art. 84 para. (1) of the Code of Civil Procedure exclusive highlights how conventional corporate representation before the courts, which can be achieved only two categories of representatives nominated by text. This conclusion follows from the phrase "under the law", referring to laws governing the professions of legal adviser and lawyer.

The activity of conventional representation to the court is a non-commercial activities reserved by law lawyers legal counsel. Or, if they agree on the idea that a legal person to be represented by another person, it concludes, unacceptable, that the representation itself could be object of the trustee. Given the mandatory nature of the procedural rules, the interpretation that legal person could be represented in court by another person, including as regards the application for summons is legally unfounded.

The Court's reasoning in the foregoing considerations lead to the conclusion that the problem itself is not legal entities representation by another person in general, but to the courts. High Court made no finding on conventional representation of legal persons before the bailiff as notification was not given this object. Consequently, it must extend to other situations, principles stautuate the decision cited, especially since in the spirit of the Code of Civil Procedure in force, enforcement, the latter is no longer a part of the civil trial, but a Skin distinct phase resulting in further formulation of the Code of civil procedure and Law no. 76/2012 on the implementation of the Code of Civil Procedure.

3. Conclusions

Since the response to the above, we believe that if a declaration of enforcement, the application for enforcement was lodged legal person by proxy legal person, they will not be rejected for this reason. Notification is perfectly valid executor in case of representation by another person, and a declaration of enforcement shall be made by the bailiff, according to art. 666 par. (1) Civil Procedure Code. That the law assigns bailiff standing in a declaration of enforcement removes any question about the representation of the legal person in the process. It is therefore removed a possible discussion on the lack of representative trustee legal person as bailiff is formulating a declaration of enforcement, and the latter has been duly informed, for on immovable property, arbitration award will be presented the court or notary public to get a decision court or, where appropriate, a notary authentic. After verification by the court or by the notary public to the conditions and following the procedures required by law and paid by part of the tax on transfer of ownership, it will proceed to registration in the land and will be transferred property and / or the establishment of another real right over immovable property in question. If the arbitration award is forecloses checks referred to in this paragraph shall be made by the court in the proceedings for a declaration of enforcement (Idem, p. 430).

the above reasons, and if request for enforcement was submitted by the legal person by legal representative.

The same solution also applies to the appeal to execution. While it is possible to represent the legal person in front executor by proxy legal person, this can not be invoked as grounds for illegality of enforcement.

Finally, legal representation by proxy legal person is prohibited only in front of the court, regardless of the procedure, so including incidents that may occur during execution.

BANK RESOLUTION

Vasile NEMEŞ[*]
Gabriela FIERBINŢEANU[]

Abstract

The bank resolution represents one of the technical and legal instruments introduced in the legislative framework belonging to the banking financial market. Within the resolution process, credit institutions and other financial entities, together with supervisory and resolution authorities, are required to develop and implement a series of measures, operations and procedures aimed for preventing and overcoming financial difficulties .The resolution tools, as regulated in Law no. 312/2015 on recovery and resolution of credit institutions and investment companies, as well as on amending and supplementing certain acts in the financial system, and applied by the National Romanian Bank , as a resolution authority, shall be use to defend financial stability and to protect the public interest.

Keywords:bank resolution, sale of business, bridge institution, asset separation, bail in tool

1. Introductory note

In order to protect the interests of depositors and to ensure the stability and viability of the national and European banking system, prudential supervision rules and procedures have been established. Moreover, the authorities vested with implementation, supervision and implementation of all specific activities to prevent and identify deviations from the policies viable and sustainable in the banking system have been entitled.

The central banks of each state are responsible for defining the prudential financial supervision operations[1].

As it is known, the legal systems are required to keep up with practical realities in the field, so, in that sense, the Law no. 312/2015 on recovery and resolution of credit institutions and investment companies, as well as on amending and supplementing certain acts in the financial system[2], was adopted, and it is transposing the main European regulations in the field, such as EU Regulation no. 575/2013 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 26 June 2013 on prudential requirements for credit institutions and investment firms, Directive no. 2014/65/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 May 2014 on markets in financial instruments[3].

Although the title of the law clearly shows that recovery and resolution are envisaged, in reality the resolution is largely about the recovery of credit institutions and investment firms.

2. Entities subject to bank resolution

It emerges from the law economy that the provisions on recovery and resolution apply to the following categories of entities: credit institutions, investment firms, financial institutions, financial holding companies, mixed financial holding companies, financial holding companies with mixed businesses, parent financial holding companies in a Member State, parent financial holding companies in the European Union, mixed parent financial holding companies in a Member State and mixed parent financial holding companies in the European Union.

According to the law, the entities empowered with resolution prerogatives are the National Bank of Romania and the Financial Supervisory Authority.

Thus, the National Bank of Romania is the resolution authority for:

a) credit institutions, Romanian legal entities;
b) branches in Romania of credit institutions from third countries;
c) financial institutions, Romanian legal entities;
d) financial holding companies, mixed financial holding companies and financial holding companies with mixed businesses, Romanian legal entities and parent financial holding companies in Romania, parent financial holding companies in the European Union, mixed parent financial holding companies in Romania, mixed parent financial holding companies in the European Union, Romanian legal entities which are part of a group subject to supervision on a consolidated basis but which also includes a credit institution.

The Financial Supervisory Authority is the resolution authority for:

a) investment firms, Romanian legal entities;
b) Romanian branches of investment firms from third countries;
c) financial institutions, Romanian legal entities; c) financial holding companies, mixed financial holding companies and financial holding companies with mixed businesses, Romanian legal entities
d) parent financial holding companies in Romania, parent financial holding companies in the European Union, mixed parent financial holding companies in Romania, mixed parent financial holding companies in the European Union, Romanian legal entities which are part of a group subject to supervision on a consolidated basis whose parent is an investment firm or which, if the parent company is a financial holding company or a mixed financial holding company, but does not also include a credit institution.

All decisions regarding financial recovery and resolution adopted by the National Bank of Romania or, where appropriate, by the Financial Supervisory Authority, will take into account the potential impact on all Member States where the credit institution, investment firm or group is operating, so as to minimize the socioeconomic negative effects and financial stability in those Member States.

In addition, minimizing adverse effects with an impact on the financial stability, at a European level, is also the main objective pursued by consolidated supervision of entities operating on the European financial and banking market.

3. Measures, operations and procedures specific to the bank resolution

Within the ample resolution process, credit institutions and other financial entities, together with supervisory and resolution authorities, are required to develop and implement a series of measures, operations and procedures aimed for preventing and overcoming financial difficulties .

The main measures, operations and procedures set up at European level and detailed in the Law no. 312 / 2015 are the following: financial recovery procedure, specific operations regarding the preparation and implementation of the resolution, resolution procedure, resolution tools, early intervention, temporary administration and special administration.

All these are operations and administrative procedures because are set up and carried out under the supervision of the supervisory / resolution authorities, excluding the intervention of the courts.

In the following, we will briefly outline the main rules under which they are set up, run and ended, both at an individual and a group level.

4. Financial recovery

One of the first mandatory operations for credit institutions and other financial entities subject to the resolution is to develop strategies for financial recovery[4] for crisis situations.

Thus, in accordance with the provisions of the Law no. 312 / 2015, credit institutions which have a significant share in the national financial system elaborate their own recovery plans which will consist of measures to be taken by the entity to restore its financial position in the event of its significant deterioration.

Under the Law, a credit institution is considered to have a significant share in the national financial system if it fulfills any of the following conditions:

a) the total value of its assets exceeds 30 billion EUR;
b) the share of total assets in Romania's Gross Domestic Product (GDP) exceeds 20 %, unless the value of total assets is less than 5 billion EUR (article no. 9).

As explained above, the law obliges each supervised entity to develop its own recovery plan[5]. The Recovery Plans must contain specific elements and are subject to verification and approval by the National Bank of Romania, and mainly envisage their own scenarios of overcoming the major situations of financial difficulties and, obviously, avoiding bankruptcy.

5. Preparing and implementing bank resolution operations

Preliminary remarks

Another implementation mechanism for preventing, avoiding and overcoming financial crisis situations is the resolution.

In this context, the Law stipulates that the National Bank of Romania, as the resolution authority, shall draw up a resolution plan for each Romanian credit institution that is not part of a group subject to consolidated supervision.

Where appropriate, the National Bank of Romania shall also consult with the resolution authorities in the jurisdictions in which the credit

[4] The financial-banking recovery is not to be confused with the recovery proceedings in the judicial reorganization enshrined in Law No. 85/2014 on insolvency and insolvency prevention procedures. For details, see, St. D. Carpenaru, M.A. Hotca and V. Nemeş, Insolvency Code-Commented, Publishing Universul Juridic Bucureşti 2014, p. 371 et seq .; R.Bufan, (collectively), Practical Insolvency Treaty, Publishing Hamangiu, Bucharest, 2014, p. 583 et seq.

[5] For aspects of the common reorganization plan, see St. D. Carpenaru, M.A. Hotca and V. Nemeş, op.cit. P.380 et seq .; R. Bufan (collectively), op. Cit. P. 591 et seq.

institution's significant branches are located, as the resolution plan is relevant to those branches.

5.1. The resolution plan

The same as the financial recovery, the resolution requires a draft resolution. The difference is that, if the recovery plan is drawn up by each credit institution, the resolution plan is drawn up by the National Bank for each entity subject to supervision.

At the request of the National Bank of Romania, as a resolution authority, the credit institution provides assistance in drafting and updating the resolution plan (article no. 53).

The law also regulates the very frequent situations in which the supervised entities are part of a financial group.

In particular, the law stipulates that, in the absence of a joint decision between the resolution authorities, the National Bank of Romania, as the group-level resolution authority, adopts its own decision on the group's resolution plan, soundly supported and taking into account the viewpoints and reserves of the other resolution authorities, and notifies the parent company in the European Union of the decision taken (68th article).

5.1.1. Intragroup financial support

In order to overcome hard financial times, credit institutions and entities subject to financial supervision that are part of a financial group may resort to the conclusion of intragroup financial support agreements.

In particular, financial institutions which are included in consolidated supervision within the European Union may conclude intra-group agreements on the granting of financial support to any party of the agreement that meets the conditions for early intervention under the law.

5.1.2. Financial Support Agreement

Under the law, the intra-group financial support agreement may cover one or more subsidiaries of the group and may provide financial support from the parent company to its subsidiaries, from its subsidiaries to the parent company, between subsidiaries within the group that are party of the agreement or any other combination of the parties of the agreement.

The Financial Support Agreement may take the form of a loan, the provision of personal guarantees, the provision of assets for use as collateral or any combination of these forms of financial support, in one or more transactions, including between the beneficiary and a third party.

6. Early intervention

General notions

A range of measures that can be taken in the implementation of the financial resolution are the early intervention measures.

In this respect, article no. 149 of the law stipulates that, when a credit institution infringes or, due to, among other things, a rapid deterioration in the financial situation, is likely to breach the requirements of Regulation (EU) no. 575/2013, Government Emergency Ordinance no. 99/2006 and the regulations issued by the National Bank of Romania on their application, capital market provisions transposing Title II of Directive 2014/65 / EU or any of the provisions of art. 3-7, art. 14-17, art. 24, 25 and 26 of Regulation (EU) No. 600/2014 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 May 2014 on markets may, as appropriate, shall take at least the following measures:

a) require the management body of the credit institution to implement one or more arrangements or measures set out in the recovery plan or to update such a recovery plan when the circumstances which led to the early intervention differ from the assumptions set out in the initial recovery plan and implement one or more of the arrangements or measures set out in the updated plan within a certain time frame, in order to ensure that the conditions reffered to in the introduction of the article no longer apply;
b) request the organs of management the credit institution to examine the situation, identify the measures to overcome any identified problems and to elaborate an action program to address those issues and a timetable for their implementation;
c) require the management body of the credit institution to convene a general meeting of the credit institution's shareholders or, if the management body fails to comply with this requirement, to directly convene the meeting and, in both cases, to determine the agenda of the meeting and demand that certain decisions be taken into account for their adoption by the shareholders;
d) request for the replacement of one or more members of the organs of management or senior management body of the credit institution(if they are found unfit to perform their duties according to the Law) ;
e) request the organs of management of the credit institution to draw up a plan of debt restructuring with all or part of the creditors of the credit institution, in accordance with the recovery plan, as appropriate;
f) request changes to be made to the business strategy of the credit institution;
g) request changes to be made to the legal structure or operational structure of the credit institution;

h) obtain, including through on-the-spot inspections, and provide the National Bank of Romania as the resolution authority, all the necessary information in order to update the resolution plan and to prepare a possible resolution of the credit institution as well as to perform an assessment of the assets and liabilities of the credit institution, in accordance with the legal provisions.

For the purposes of the Law (article 149 (2)), the rapid deterioration of a credit institution's financial situation includes a deterioration in liquidity, an increase in indebtedness, on non performing loans or concentration of exposures, assessed on the basis of a set of indicators, which may include the requirements of credit institution's own funds plus 1,5 percentage points[6].

7. Replacement of the senior management body and governing body

Preliminary remarks

Another measure that could be taken by the resolution authority is the replacement of the senior management body and the governing body of the entity.

In particular, as stipulated in the art. 152 of the Law, in case of a significant deterioration in a credit institution's financial situation or when there are serious breaches of the credit institution's laws, regulations or instruments of incorporation or serious administrative irregularities and if the other measures that have been taken in accordance with the law are not sufficient to put an end to this deterioration, the National Bank of Romania may request the replacement of the senior management body or the governing body of the credit institution as a whole or some of its members. Executive management can be replaced by a temporary administrator or a special administrator as we will see in the following chapter.

7.1. Appointment of a temporary administrator

As stated above, one of the measures that can be used is the appointment of a temporary administrator. The Temporary Administrator shall be appointed if the replacement of the senior management body or the governing body is insufficient to overcome the difficult situation.

In particular, the National Bank of Romania, as the competent authority, may designate one or many temporary administrators of the credit institution, including the Bank Deposit Guarantee Fund.

The National Bank of Romania may appoint any temporary administrator either to temporarily replace the governing body of the credit institution or to temporarily work with the governing body of the credit institution.

The responsibilities of the temporary administrator and the way of working together with the bodies of the institution subject to the resolution are determined by the National Bank of Romania.

Responsibilities may include some or all of the powers of the management body of the credit institution in accordance with the constituent instruments of the credit institution and national applicable law, including the power to exercise some or all of the administrative functions of the credit institution's governing body.

The National Bank of Romania may request that certain actions of the temporary administrator be subject to its prior approval and demand the latter to prepare reports on the financial position of the credit institution and on the actions undertaken during its term of office.

The appointment of a temporary administrator must not exceed one year. This period may exceptionally be renewed if the conditions for appointment of the temporary administrator continue to be met (article 159).

7.2. Appointment of a special administrator

The National Bank of Romania, in its capacity of resolution authority, may appoint a special administrator[7] to replace the governing body of the institution subject to the resolution, in which case it shall make its appointment public on its official website. The Special Administrator must have the necessary qualifications, knowledge and expertise to perform his / her duties. The Bank Deposit Guarantee Fund may be appointed as a special administrator (article 194 of the Law).

The Special Administrator shall have all the powers of the general meeting of the shareholders and the governing body of the respective institution, which will be undertaken under the strict supervision of the National Bank.

The mandate of a special administrator shall not exceed one year. The mandate may be renewed for periods of up to one year. The law takes into account the mandate of the special administrator, but in reality it is a factual procedure of special administration.

The fate of the temporary administration and special administration procedures depends on the results achieved by the credit institution to which they have been set up. If the financial and management crisis

[6] It is noted that the "rapid deterioration of the financial situation" within the meaning of the financial and banking regulations concerns the state of insolvability of the entity concerned.

[7] The financial administrator of the bank resolution procedure is not to be confused with the special administrator established by the Law no.85/2014, either because the latter is elected by the associates / members of the insolvent debtor in a judicial procedure rather than administrative and may be, in principle, any individual. For more details, see St. D. Carpenaru, M.A. Hotca and V.Nemes, op.cit.p.156 et seq.; R. Bufan (collectively), op. Cit., P. 171 et seq.

has been overcome, then the proceedings will be lifted and the institution will resume its activity under the leadership of its own administration and management bodies, and if the procedures fail, bank resolution procedure or even bankruptcy will be put in place[8].

8. Bank resolution procedure

8.1. Preliminary clarifications

The resolution procedure is an extreme procedure to be applied in the event of a major financial difficulty and includes specific objectives, conditions and rules for setting up, running and finalizing.

For the purposes of the Law (article 181), a credit institution is deemed to enter or is likely to enter into a state of major difficulty if at least one of the following conditions is met:

a) the credit institution violates the requirements underlying the maintenance of the authorization or there is objective evidence that they will be violated in the future;
b) the assets of the credit institution are lower than the debts or there are objective elements on the basis of which it can be determined that this will happen in the near future;
c) the credit institution is unable to pay its debts or other obligationswhen due, or there are objective elements that can determine that this will happen in the near future;
d) an exceptional public financial support is required.

According to the Law, the National Bank of Romania, in its capacity as resolution authority, when it applies resolution instruments, takes into consideration the objectives of the resolution and chooses those tools and competencies that allow the highest possible achievement of the objectives considered to be relevant in every single situation.

8.2. The objectives of the bank resolution

The main objectives of the resolution are regulated in the art.178 of the law.

Thus, according to the cited rule, the objectives of the resolution are as follows:

a) ensuring the continuity of the critical functions;
b) avoiding significant adverse effects on financial stability, in particular by preventing the contagion, including within the market infrastructures and by maintaining market discipline;
c) protecting public funds by minimizing reliance on exceptional public financial support;
d) the protection of depositors covered by the deposit-guarantee legislation and investors subject to the provisions for compensation under the capital market legislation;
e) protecting clients' funds and assets[9].

8.3. Conditions for initiating the resolution procedure

According to the Law, the National Bank of Romania undertakes a resolution action on a credit institution only if it considers that the following conditions are met cumulatively:

a) The National Bank of Romania determined, in its capacity as competent authority, that the credit institution is entering or is likely to enter into a state of major difficulty;
b) Given the time horizon and other relevant circumstances, there is no reasonable prospect that the state of major difficulty could be hindered in a reasonable period of time, through alternative measures coming from the private sector, including measures taken by an institutional protection scheme, or through supervisory measures, including early intervention measures or measures to reduce the value or convert the relevant capital instruments;
c) The resolution action is necessary from the public interest point of view.

A resolution action is considered to be of a public interest if is necessary to achieve one or more objectives of the resolution , is proportionate to one or more objectives of the resolution and the liquidation of the credit institution according to the insolvency proceedings applicable to credit institutions would fail to achieve the objectives of the resolution to the same extent (article 182).

8.4. Bank resolution tools

According to the provisions of art. 216 of the Law no. 312/2015, the banking resolution instruments are the following:

a) selling the business;
b) the brigde-institution tool;
c) the asset separation tool;
d) the bail-in.

As with the other measures, the resolution instruments are put in place by the National Bank of Romania in its capacity of resolution authority.

8.4.1. The tool for selling the business

General notions

Under the Law, the instrument of selling the business consists of the transfer of shares or any other proprietary instruments, as well as any assets, rights or [8] For details on bankruptcy of credit institutions, see St. D. Carpenaru, M.A. Hotca and V. Nemeş, op. cit. P.530 et seq .; R.Bufan (Collectively), op.cit., P. 850 et seq.

[9] The objectives of the banking resolution are similar to the purpose and goals of pre insolvency proceedings, D. Carpenaru, M.A. Hotca and V. Nemeş, op. Cit. P.22 et seq .; R. Bufan (collectively), op cit. p. 91 et seq.

obligations of an institution subject to the resolution or all of them.

The transfer for the sale of the business is operated by the National Bank of Romania and can be made in favor of a buyer who is not a bridge institution.

A peculiarity of the sale of the business is that, according to the Law, the transfer of shares, property instruments or assets takes place without the consent of the shareholders of the institution subject to the resolution or of any third party other than the buyer, and is not subject to any procedural requirements laid down by applicable company law or capital market legislation.

However, in all cases, the business transfer operation is subject to the following principles (article 237):

a) the bid should be as transparent as possible and must present as accurately and fully as possible the obligations, shares or other property instruments proposed for sale;
b) the sale procedure must not unduly favor or discriminate any potential buyer;
c) the transfer must be free of any conflict of interest;
d) must not give any unfair advantage to any potential buyer;
e) must take into account the need for the resolution action to take place rapidely;
f) the aim should be to maximize, as much as possible, the sale price of the shares or other instruments of ownership, assets, rights or obligations concerned.

In this respect, article 228 of the Law stipulates that the National Bank of Romania may, with the consent of the buyer, undertake the transfer powers in respect of the assets, rights or obligations transferred to the buyer in order to transfer assets, rights or obligations back to the institution subject to the resolution, or shares or other ownership instruments, back to their original owners, and the institution subject to the resolution or the original owners has/have the obligation to take back any such assets, rights or obligations, shares or other proprietary instruments.

8.4.2. Bridge institution tool

Preliminary remarks

The bridge institution tool is still a sale / transfer of business but this time to a special entity, known as a bridge institution.

To this end, article 239 of the Law provides that the National Bank of Romania is empowered to transfer shares or other instruments of ownership and any assets, rights or obligations of one or more institutions subject to resolution or all of them, to a bridge institution.

As a result, if the transfer of shares / titles of ownership, rights and obligations is made to a bridge institution then the rules are in force and we are in the presence of the resolution tool called "bridge institution", and if the transfer is made to any other entity, the rules are also in force and we are in the presence of the resolution tool called "selling the business".

The setting up of a credit-bridge institution is subject to special rules derogating from the common law of financial institutions and other entities with legal personality.

By law, the bridge institution is a legal entity which meets several requirements.

Thus, in terms of the capital it is wholly or partly owned by one or many public authorities and the bridge institution is controlled by the National Bank of Romania. It follows that, from the perspective of the shareholders, the public institution can be fully owned by the state or, at most, a joint one, that is, of public and private participation. In the case of a joint venture, the National Bank will decide on the proportion of holdings to be set up in the bridge institution. In other words, the set up of a bridge institution with exclusive private participation is excluded.

Also regarding the capital, according to art. 260 of the Law, the National Bank of Romania may authorize a credit-bridge institution with a share capital below the level provided by art. 11 of the Government Emergency Ordinance no. 99/2006[10] but which cannot be less than the equivalent in lei of 1 million Euros. In this case, the National Bank of Romania shall notify the credit-bridge institution and the European Commission, together with the motivation for the certain level of the share capital.

Regarding the shareholders, it is expressly stipulated that, by way of derogation from the provisions of Law no. 31/1990, a bridge institution authorized according to the provisions of Government Emergency Ordinance no. 99/2006, may be formed as joint-stock company with a sole shareholder.

The Law also stipulates that the Bank Deposit Guarantee Fund, in its capacity as administrator of the bank resolution fund, may be a shareholder of the bridge institution.

As to the purpose, such entity is created in order to receive and hold some or all of the shares or other proprietary instruments issued by an institution subject to resolution or some or all assets, rights and obligations of one or many institutions subject to the resolution (article 240).

Regarding the set up, it must also be noted that according to the Law, the content of the documents regarding the establishment of the bridge-institution is approved by the National Bank of Romania.

[10] According to this text, the National Bank of Romania cannot grant the authorization of a credit institution if it does not have separate funds or an initial capital level at least equal to the minimum established by regulations which cannot be less than the equivalent in RON to 5 million EUR.

8.4.3. Asset separation tool

Overview

This resolution tool involves also a transfer, but only of assets. Unlike the sale of the business and the bridge institution instrument, the asset separation tool applies only to the assets, rights and assets of institution subject to the resolution, excluding the transfer of shares or other proprietary instruments.

The transfer is made to an entity with a special status, called "asset management vehicle".

Specifically, the Law stipulates that, in order for the asset separation tool to be effective, the National Bank of Romania is empowered to transfer the assets, rights or obligations of an institution subject to resolution or a bridge institution, to one or many asset management vehicles. Therefore, assets belonging to an institution subject to the resolution and those belonging to a bridge institution can be separated and transferred.

However, it should be noted that the National Bank of Romania may implement the asset separation tool by creating a vehicle for this purpose only if the following conditions are met:

a) the situation on the specific market for those assets is of such a nature that the winding-up of those assets in insolvency proceedings could have a negative effect on one or many financial markets;
b) such a transfer is necessary to ensure the proper functioning of the institution subject to the resolution or the bridge institution;
c) such a transfer is necessary to maximize the revenues generated from the liquidation (article 272).

As with other resolution instruments, the transfer may take place without having the agreement of the shareholders of the institutions subject to the resolution or any third party other than the bridge institution and is not subject to any procedural requirements stipulated by the applicable Company Law and capital market legislation, as the case may be.

Under the Law, an asset management vehicle is a legal entity whose share capital is wholly or partly owned by one or many public authorities and was created in order to receive, in whole or in part, the assets, rights and obligations of one or many institutions subject to a resolution or a bridge institution (article 269).

The asset management vehicle is permanently subject to control by the National Bank of Romania.

Similar to the bridge institution, the Guarantee Fund may be a shareholder in an asset management vehicle.

8.5. The bail-in tool

An ultimate resolution tool which attempts to overcome the state of financial difficulty is the bail-in tool.

In this respect, the Law stipulates that the National Bank of Romania, as a resolution authority, may apply the bail-in tool in order to achieve the objectives of the resolution and in accordance with the resolution's principles, for achieving the resolution's goal of overcoming crisis moments and avoiding financial collapse in the banking market.

In particular, the Law stipulates that the National Bank of Romania may apply the bail-in tool for the purpose of implementing the resolution only if, in its opinion, there is a reasonable prospect according to which the application of this instrument, together with other relevant measures, including measures implemented in accordance with the reorganization plan will result in the achievement of the relevant objectives of the resolution, as well as the restoration of the long-term viability and financial soundness of the credit institution or entity concerned (article 283 of the Law no. 312 / 2015).

As a precautionary measure, according to the Law, credit institutions are required to comply with and maintain, permanently, a minimum requirement/situation of own funds (capital) and eligible debts, which are set and calculated as the sum of the own funds and eligible debts, expressed as percentage of the total debts and own funds of the credit institution. From a common law perspective, it would be a balance between the assets and liabilities of the credit institution on which the resolution procedure was opened.

In addition to own funds, on special occasions there may be initiated specific procedures applied to the use of financial stabilization instruments. According to the Law, the stabilization instruments are the tool of financial support through public injection of capital and tool of temporary private-ownership of the State (art. 355 of Law no. 312/2015)

As regards public financial assistance, the Law stipulates that, in order to participate in the resolution of a credit institution, including by intervening directly in order to avoid its liquidation, to achieve the objectives of the resolution set up in relation to Romania or the European Union as a whole, it may be granted exceptional public financial support through additional instruments of financial stabilization, in accordance with the provisions of art. 221, art. 353 and the EU State Aid Framework. Such measures are taken under the leadership of the Ministry of Public Finance as a competent ministry in close cooperation with the National Bank of Romania, as a resolution authority.

With special regard to situations where the resolution authority is the National Bank of Romania, the Law stipulates that, in accordance with the provisions of Company Law no. 31/1990, the Ministry of Public Finance, as a competent ministry, may participate in the bail-in of a credit institution or of an entity subject to resolution by means of equity instruments in exchange for common equity Tier 1 instruments and Tier 1 extra or Tier 2, in accordance with the requirements stipulated in the Regulation (EU) No. 575/2013.

As regards the tool of temporary private-ownership of the State, this is implemented under the coordination of the Ministry of Public Finance, as a competent ministry, when it is considered that the application of resolution instruments would not be sufficient to protect the public interest, when the credit institution has previously been granted a public contribution of capital through the public injection of capital as a financial tool,so that the entity may be transferred to the private ownership of the State. This decision shall be taken after consulting the National Bank of Romania, as competent and resolution authority.

Specifically, the law stipulates that the Ministry of Public Finance may undertake one or more transfer orders in which the beneficiary of the transfer is an entity designated by the competent ministry or a joint stock company entirely owned by the State (Article 357 of the Law no. 312 / 2015).

We must also add that exceptional public financial support means in this cases State aid within the meaning of Article 107 paragraph (1) of the Treaty of the functioning of EU or any other public financial support at supra national level(which if provided for at national level would constitute State aid), provided in order to restore or preserve the viability or solvency of entities referred to in Article 1 of the Law.

9. Conclusions

As provided in article 7 paragraph 2 of the Law no.312/2015, the resolution tools are destined to protect the public interest, defending financial stability and shall be applied when the financial/credit institution cannot be wound up under ordinary insolvency proceedings, as this could destabilise the financial system.Having in mind the effects of the latest financial crisis, besides the provided tools for defending the financial stability, competent authorities must also discourage unsustainable financial speculation without real added value and impose higher requirements for systemically important institutions that are able, due to their business activities, to pose a threat to the economy.

PREREQUISITES OF THE RESOLUTION OF A CONTRACT

Vlad-Victor OCHEA*

Abstract

I herein want to emphasise the prerequisites of the resolution of a contract according to the Romanian Civil Code of 2009. The prerequisites of the resolution of a contract are substantially different from those identified under the former fundamental civil legislation (the Romanian Civil code of 1864). This study aims at a better understanding of the new prerequisites of the resolution of a contract: a. a fundamental non-performance of the obligation; b. an unjustified non-performance of the obligation; c. mora debitoris The analysis of these prerequisites reveals a new possible trait of the resolution: a remedy for the non-performance of the contract rather than a sanction or a variety of contractual liability. Thus the modern legislator of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009 proposed to partially change the physiognomy of the resolution of a contract, different from the former institution and here we are in front of a new law institution. The resolution of a contract under the Romanian Civil Code of 2009 is regulated under The 5th Book – The Obligations, The second chapter – The enforcement of the Obligations, The 5th Section – Resolution of the Contract, respectively under the Article 1549 – 1554. As will be shown below, the resolution of a contract has a homogeneous structure without being spread in different parts of the Civil code. The earning lies in the action of organism the new legal provisions, apparently enriched in comparison to those found in the Romanian Civil Code of 1864. Most notably, the Romanian Civil Code of 2009 preserves the Roman legacy. The modern legislator had a difficult task: 146 years of legal doctrine and jurisprudence transposed into a new legislation which, of course, has its flaws. Nevertheless, it should be praised, as it encompasses useful tools to regulate social relations

1. Introduction

The entry into force of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009 on October, 1st 2011 has brought about several changes and novelties in civil law. As it would have been expected, the vast majority of the institutions were kept in the new fundamental civil legislation. A great deal of these were improved, enriched with the developments achieved by both the authors and the jurisprudence throughout the 146 years of rule of the Civil Code of 1864.

Due to its critical importance, which derives from the fact that it represents the vehicle by which each party achieves its interests, contract law has been subject to many changes. Of all the modifications brought about by the Romanian Civil Code of 2009 in this area, I shall analise the prerequisites of the resolution of a contract.

For the first time in Romanian civil law, the resolution of a contract has a set of rules that shape its regime, as opposed to the former legislation where scarce rules spread throughout the Civil Code of 1864 and the Commercial Code of 1881 called upon the authors and the jurisprudence to discern its origin, conditions and effects.

The prerequisites of the resolution of a contract are substantially different from those identified under the former fundamental civil legislation. Despite this, there has been noticed a misunderstanding of the new prerequisites of the resolution of a contract in the sense that many practicioners of the law tend assimilate the new prerequisites with the old ones.

This study aims at a better understanding of the new prerequisites of the resolution of a contract.

1.1. Old and new legal provisions.

The Romanian Civil Code of 1864 had two main provisions regarding the resolution of a contract – art. 1020-1021.

According to art. 1020, the resolutive condition is always implied in bilateral contracts when one of the parties does not fulfill its commitment.

Art. 1021 provides that in this case, the contract is not terminated ipso jure. The party whose obligation has not been fulfilled can either claim the forced performance or the resolution of the contract. The resolution must be asked in court which, depending on the circumstances, can grant a grace period.

According to the Romanian Civil Code of 2009:

- the creditor is entitled to the fully, exact and in time performance of the obligation. (2) When, without justification, the debtor does not perform its obligations and there is a mora debitoris, the creditor shall, without waiving his right to damages: 1. ask for the forced performance; 2. obtain the resolution of the contract or the diminishment of his obligations; 3. use any other means provided by law fo the fulfilment of his right;
- if he does not claim the forced performance, the creditor is entitled to the resolution of the contract and could be entitled to damages. (2) The contract can be partially terminated, when its performance is divisible.

* PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (email: vlad.ochea@gmail.com).

With respect to the plurilateral contract, the non-performance of the obligation from one party does not lead to the resolution of the contract, except under the circumstances that the non-performed obligation should have been regarded as fundamental. (3) Unless otherwise provided, provisions related to resolution shall also be applied to resiliation (art. 1549);

- the resolution can be ordered by the court or it can be unilaterally declared by the party. (2) Also, when expressly provided by law or agreed by the parties, the resolution can operate ipso jure (art. 1550);
- the creditor is not entitled to resolution when the non-performance is not fundamental. With respect to continuing contracts, the creditor is entitled to resolution, even if the the non-performance is not fundamental, but it is repetitive. Any contrary stipulation shall be disregarded. (2) He is, however, entitled to perfom a diminished obligation, if such performance is possible under the circumstances. (3) If the diminishment of the obligations is not possible, the creditor is only entitled to damages (art. 1551);
- resolution of resiliation can intercede via a written notification sent to the debtor when the parties have agreed so, when there is an ipso jure mora debitoris or when the debtor has not performed his obligation within the grace period granted to him via the mora debitoris. (2) The declaration of resolution has to be made within the statute of limitations. (3) The declaration of resolution shall be registered in the Real Estate Register or in other public registers so it can be opposed to third parties. (4) The declaration of resolution is irrevocable, upon communication to the debtor or upon the expiration of the grace period (art. 1552);
- the commissary pact is effective if it expressly provides the obligations whose non-performance lead to the ipso jure resolution of the contract. (2) In the case provided for in paragraph (1), the resolution is subject to mora debitoris, unless the parties have agreed that the resolution shall result from the non-performance. (3) Mora debitoris is not effective, unless it expressly indicates the conditions of the commissary pact (art. 1553);
- the resolved contract is regarded as non existent. Unles otherwise provided by law, each party is held to restitution of prestations. (2) The resolution does not extend to dispute resolution clauses or to clauses meant to be effective even if the contract is terminated. (3) A contract which is resiliated ceases to exist, but only for the future (art. 1554).

The sources of inspiration for the legislator seem to be the Italian and Québécois Civil Codes. According to art. 1453 of the Italian Civil Code, (1) nei contratti con prestazioni corrispettive, quando uno dei contraenti non adempie le sue obbligazioni, l'altro può a sua scelta chiedere l'adempimento o la risoluzione del contratto, salvo, in ogni caso, il risarcimento del danno. (2) La risoluzione può essere domandata anche quando il giudizio è stato promosso per ottenere l'adempimento; ma non può più chiedersi l'adempimento quando è stata domandata la risoluzione. (3) Dalla data della domanda di risoluzione l'inadempiente non può più adempiere la propria obbligazione.

According to art. 1604 of the Québécois Civil Code, (1) Where the creditor does not avail himself of the right to force the specific performance of the contractual obligation of the debtor in cases which admit of it, he is entitled either to the resolution of the contract, or to its resiliation in the case of a contract of successive performance. (2) However and notwithstanding any stipulation to the contrary, he is not entitled to resolution or resiliation of the contract if the default of the debtor is of minor importance, unless, in the case of an obligation of successive performance, the default occurs repeatedly, but he is then entitled to a proportional reduction of his correlative obligation. (3) All the relevant circumstances are taken into consideration in assessing the proportional reduction of the correlative obligation. If the obligation cannot be reduced, the creditor is entitled to damages only.

2. A brief review of the foundations and prerequisites of the resolution of a contract

Since legal provisions regarding the resolution of a contract were scarce in the Civil Code of 1864, the task of identifying the prerequisites of the resolution of a contract was left to the authors and the jurisprudence.

The nature and number of such prerequisites is influenced by the foundation of the resolution of a contract (tacit resolutive condition, a form of contractual liability, the theory of the causa and the theory based on the causa, the pacta sunt servanda rule and the notion of guilt).

According to the first theory and based on art. 1020, cited above, each bilateral contract includes a tacit resolutive condition whose fulfilment consists in the non-performance of the obligation.

According to the second theory, the non-performance of the obligation leads to a damage suffered by the creditor. Such damage shall be repaired via the resolution of the contract, followed by its effect – restitution in integrum

The third theory claims that one party performs its obligations because and if the other party performs its own obligations and vice versa.

The reason for the fulfilment of one's obligations lies in the fulfilment of the obligations undertaken by the other party.

There is no reason to perform the obligation if the other party has failed to perform his.

A combination of the elements found in the fourth theory constitutes the foundation of the resolution of a contract.

Most authors concluded that the prerequisites of the resolution of a contract are as follows:

- the non-performance of an essential obligation;
- the guilt of the debtor;
- the damage suffered by the creditor;
- mora debitoris and

- the absence of a non-liability clause.

3. Content

Taking into consideration the previously cited provisions, the prerequisites of the resolution of a contract are as follows:

a) a fundamental non-performance of the obligation;
b) an unjustified non-performance of the obligation;
c) mora debitoris.

3.1. A fundamental non-performance of the obligation

A contract can shall be terminated if the debtor has failed to perform his obligation in a fundamental manner.

The non-performed obligation does not necessarily need to be one of the essential obligations engendered from the contract.

If the non-performance qualifies as fundamental, it shall lead to the resolution of the contract, even if the obligation is not an essential one, but a secondary obligation.

This is one of the differences in comparison to the old legislation, where many authors were of the opinion that only an essential non-performed obligation shall lead to the resolution of the contract.

The non-perfomance of an obligation shall be regarded as fundamental, if the creditor is deprived of what he was entitled to expect when he concluded the contract. From this point of view, this prerequisite for the resolution of a contract seems to be a revival of the theory of the causa, elaborated by Henri Capitant as basis for the resolution of a contract.

3.2. An unjustified non-performance of the obligation

Only an unjustified non-performance of the obligation shall lead to the resolution of the contract.

Art. 1556-1557 of the Romanian Civil Code of 2009 provides that exceptio non adimpleti contractus and the impossibility of performance constitute justified causes of non-performance.

According to these legal provisions:

- when the obligations engendered from a bilateral contract are due and one of the parties does not perform or does not offer the performance of the obligation, the other party can, in a proper manner, refuse to perform his/her obligation, unless it does not result from law, the parties' will or customs that the other party is obliged to perform first. (2) The performance cannot be refused if, according to circumstances and taking into consideration that the non-performance is not fundamental, the refusal would be contrary to good-faith (art. 1556);
- when the impossibility to perform is total and final and it regards an important contractual obligation, the contract is terminated ipso jure and without any notification from the moment of the fortuitous event. Provisions of art. 1274 (2) shall apply accordingly (art. 1557).

As a consequence, the contract shall be terminated when the debtor does not have grounds for exceptio non adimpleti contractus or when it is not impossible for him to perform his obligation.

3.3. Mora debitoris

Finally, the contract shall be terminated, if mora debitoris is in place. It can be instated following a notification sent to the debtor by the creditor or when the creditor files an action in court against the debtor.

Also, mora debitoris can be instated ipso jure, if provided by law or agreed by the parties.

Under the former legislation many authors were of the opinion that the prerequisites of the contract were: non-performance of an essential obligation; the guilt of the debtor and, occasionally, mora debitoris.

It can easily be noted that the Romanian Civil Code of 2009 does not include the guilt of the debtor among the prerequisites for the resolution of a contract. This means that the resolution of a contract seems to be one of the remedies for the non-performance of the contract and of its obligations.

It no longer has the nature of a sanction and is not a variety of contractual liability.

Caution is advised when the creditor wants to unilaterally terminate the contract or, as the case may be, when the judge is called upon to rule the resolution of a contract, because it should be perceived as a last resort used by the creditor only when it is no longer possible to receive from the debtor the prestation he was to entitled to expect at the time of the conclusion of the contract.c

Unfortunately, even if it is clear that the guilt of the debtor is not one of the prerequisites of the resolution of a contract, some courts ruled in favour of the resolution of some contracts and based their rulings on the applicable law starting from October, 1st 2011, but referred to the old prerequisites or mixed the new with the old ones.

Here are two examples:

- „the resolution of a contract is the sanction that intercedes when obligations engendered from a bilateral uno ictu contract are culpable not performed, resulting in the ex tunc cessation of the contract". It then goes on in a confusing manner referring to a fundament non-performance of the obligation and to the mora debitos;
- „the resolution constitutes a cause for anticipated cessation of a contract which intercedes when a party does not culpably perform the obligations engendered from that contract". „(...) two prerequisites must be met: (i) mora debitoris and (ii) no justified cause for the non-performance of the obligations."

4. Conclusions

The resolution or resiliation of a contract comprises of a new set of prerequisites and it has a new configuration with respect to the Romanian Civil Code of 1864 and also with the earning of the ancient Roman legislation, governed of their pragmatism. The analysis of these prerequisites reveals a new possible trait of the resolution: a remedy for the non-performance of the contract rather than a sanction or a variety of contractual liability. Such interpretation will partially change the physiognomy of the resolution of the contract which, until yesterday, was more a sanction than a remedy. Today, we analyse the new legislation together with its flaws, but considering its benefits and innovations.

ISSUES RELATED TO THE APPEARANCE, EVOLUTION, FUNCTIONS AND UTILITY OF THE LEGAL EXPENSES INSURANCE CONTRACTS, ESPECIALLY WITHIN THE EUROPEAN UNION'S STATES

Tiberiu-Vlad PATANCIUS*

Abstract

This report aims to provide a concise comparative analysis of the features of legal expenses insurance (also known as insurance for legal protection or LEI), that can be found and have been adopted in several European jurisdictions (France, England and Wales, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Finland etc), as well as in other law systems (Australia and Japan). We are studying the reasons that led to the implementation of this instrument in each jurisdiction, the evolution of its use and spread and, also, its effect on counteracting the shortcomings of the systems of justice fees and legal aid, resulting in providing access to justice, as a part of the right to a fair trial, as it is guaranteed by art.6 par.1 of the ECHR.

Keywords: the right to a fair trial, access to justice, the European Convention of the Human Rights, justice fees, sharing of the legal expenses, insurance for legal protection (LEI).

1. The importance of the research. Introductory concepts regarding the free access to justice in the ECHR system. The implicit limitations of the respective right, related to the ability of the states to regulate the duty to pay justice fees, as well as the instruments they implement, so that the exercise of „the discretion" would not be an obstacle in the way of the access to justice.

This study has a special practical importance, whereas its conclusions have in view the actual ways of ensuring access to justice, as a part of the right to a fair trial, as it is guaranteed by art.6 par.1 of the European Convention of the Human Rights.

Due to the lack of a Convention's specific regulation, regarding the content of the right to a fair trial, this one has been settled, in a praetorian way, within the jurisprudence of the Strasbourg Court[1].

As for the inclusion of the access to justice among the rights guaranteed by the Convention, which represent the content of the right to a fair trial, this has been achieved, for the first time, in the case Golder vs. United Kingdom[2], when the European Court of the Human Rights noted the fact that article 6 par.1 „does not state a right of access to the courts or tribunals in express terms. It enunciates rights which are distinct but stem from the same basic idea and which, taken together, make up a single right not specifically defined in the narrower sense of the term". This is the reason why it has been concluded that the Court should be the one to decide, by interpretation of the content of article 6, if the right of access to court is to be included in the mentioned content.

It has been noted[3] in the same above mentioned case that the Strasbourg Court admitted that the right of access to justice cannot be an absolute right, as it is subject to some limitations[4]. The Court established that those limitations are implicit, as the settlement of the right of access by the states is compelled by its very nature and the differences in settlement will be determined by the available resources and specific needs of each nation (more precise, its' society)[5].

These limitations are the expression of the states' sovereignty, this being the basis for granting them an „appreciation margin"[6].

The appreciation margin (discretion) has been defined as the recognized ability of the states to exert their national sovereignty, in the way of limiting the revaluation of some of the fundamental rights acknowledged by the Convention. The jurisprudence of the European Court has been permissive and constantly

[5] „Certainly, the right of access to the courts is not absolute but may be subject to limitations; these are permitted by implication since the right of access "by its very nature calls for regulation by the State, regulation which may vary in time and in place according to the needs and resources of the community and of individuals"…", The case Ashingdane v. the United kingdom, par.57, material studied online, at 04.01.2017, at the address: http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-57425 .

granted to the signatory states „some discretionary powers", „a certain freedom" or „an estimation power". This Court's approach has been qualified as „allowable and even necessary", in the context of numerous normative acts, with interpretable provisions[7].

The appreciation margin is shown by the very settlement of certain time limits of elapse and prescription, levying of legal taxes related to the justice activity or by the requirement of covering certain preliminary procedures, as a prior condition for the referral to the court.

On another case[8], it was noted that the appreciation margin must be exerted with caution, so that it would not alter the very substance of the right guaranteed by the Convention.

Even if the Strasbourg Court is the authorized forum to observe the compliance with the provisions of the Convention, this does not also imply empowerment of the Court to evaluate and decide upon the best solution to apply in the specific case.

On the same occasion of solving the Ashingdane case[9], there were noted the criteria that states must satisfy to exert „the appreciation margin" (hence, the name of the „Ashingdane Criteria"[10]), in order to prevent the arbitrary application of the law and to ensure the right to access. These rules must be observed cumulatively and they are the following:

- the regulated measure or the ordered proceeding (aiming restriction of the right to access) has to be motivated by its very purpose (a "legitimate aim"). This is the case of consecrating a system of legal fees, aiming to protect the general interest, expressed by the proper administration of justice, which cannot be possible without a suited financing;
- the adopted proceeding (which leads to restriction of the right) must be proportional to the general interest that it has to defend. The reasonable relationship of proportionality ends when the very substance of the right of access is altered.

In the specialty literature, it was noted[11] that, in certain cases, the Court (E.C.H.R.) additionally asks for the fulfillment of the requirement that the normative act (the national norm), or the jurisprudence that represents the basis of the restriction of the right of access, should be clear, accessible and foreseeable[12].

The latter condition is pursued only in those cases when evaluating the satisfaction of the first two requirements is delayed or obstructed because, primo, it is considered that the restriction of the right has been a disproportionate measure in relation to the particular circumstances of the case or, secundo, the reality referred to justice has not been the subject of enough causes to make the interpretation be unequivocal.

In fact, the approach of this exam is not based on the specific requirement of the law, as it happens in the case of the relative rights, guaranteed by the art.8-11 of the Convention, (for these last ones, the right of interference must be provided by the national law, as it is, per se, a condition of legality), but it seeks exclusively to confirm the occurrence of an alteration to the very substance of the right or it is able to help assessing the proportionality degree of the measure[13].

Even if among the means to exercise state sovereignty, within the above-mentioned context, there also is the empowering of the member-states to regulate the imposing of the justice fees, for the purpose of partly covering the expenses of the public service of justice, the imposition of this requirement[14] has to comply to the same line of thinking presented above, so that it should not be exerted arbitrarily, but by observing some of the requirements noted in the European court of human rights practice and which also determines the evaluation of the proportionality of limiting the right of access.

As a consequence, the provisions leading to an exaggerated amount of court fees have been declared unacceptable. Nevertheless, the limitation of access is not caused, eo ipso, by the respective exaggerated amount, but by the specific situation or circumstances of the justice seeker, who is expected to pay those taxes. Such a situation, that can block the access, is "the total lack of plaintiff's means"15 or the fact that the party has no income[16].

The profession or social statute of the party is also irrelevant (exempli gratia, businessman), as long as the respective amount, "from the ordinary justice seeker's perspective, was unequivocally substantial", so that

"the fee required for the plaintiff to formulate court action was excessive" and "led to his divestment from entering legal proceedings and his case not be heard by a court", which disagrees with the guarantees of a fair trial[17]. It also is irrelevant if the justice seeker, whose right to access has thus been violated, is a legal person, since they, too, benefit from the rights registered under "the same laws and same procedures"[18].

However, the Court decided[19] that "the judicial tax regime" is "flexible enough", when the party is offered "the opportunity to request (total or partial) exemption from payment of tax", if it satisfies the eligibility requirements or if it shows the risk to face "certain special difficulties". If these conditions are met, the establishing of the amount of legal fees, by reference to the dispute, fell under "the discretion (appreciation margin) of the state".

As a conclusion, the examination of internal rules, regarding the organization of court fees system, compatibility with the aim of an effective access to justice, will be undertaken necessarily by observing the dichotomy: de facto obstacle-positive obligation.

Given that the justice seeker's insufficient funds represent a hindrance[20] for the right of access, so that the regulating and organizing of the legal fees system complies with the above mentioned requirements, in order to ensure a real access to court, each state has the positive obligation[21] to adopt the necessary measures they appreciate to be useful, including among them, for example, the establishing of a legal aid system, to counteract the possible shortcomings of the requirement to tax the filled applications, claims and actions.

In our view, among the measures that must be considered by the Court when it decides if the provisions of art.6 par (1) of the Convention have been violated, there are also those related to the existence and functioning without failure of a legal expenses insurance system (LEI). Even though the states do not control the insurance companies that operate on their territory, the objective possibility of the justice seekers to ensure the financing of their actions to court, using this method, must be evaluated and taken into consideration as one of the factors to define the person's "specific situation", because, along with the possibility to access the public legal aid, it represents one of the instruments that help ensuring the free access to justice.

2. Legal expenses insurance. Definition. Legal nature. Classification.

Legal expenses insurance (or legal protection insurance) has been established in France, in 1820, the clients of the insurers being able to choose that the latter administrate their legal matters, regardless their quality in the litigation: plaintiffs or defendants. Another 100 years passed until this kind of policy started to be widely used. Their popularity emerged considering the beginning of the use of automobiles, so that they were adapted as provisions (clauses) of the car insurance contracts. The need to circulate in all the European countries also brought a series of risks, such as the differences between the national legal systems and the language differences, all these being covered by the very above mentioned instrument. Even nowadays, the legal expenses insurance (also known as legal protection insurance) is the most common, as an add-on to the motor insurance[22].

The shortcomings of the legal aid system, which did not cover a significant amount of justice seekers, have been crucial for the appearance of the legal expenses insurance (LEI), which was dedicated to the middle class people, as well as to the small businesses, namely people too wealthy to benefit from the legal aid, but, at the same time, not having enough financial means to cover all costs related to each and every insignificant litigation[23].

Legal expenses insurance (LEI) has been defined[24] as "a means of financing unpredictable legal costs by spreading the risk of liability among subscribers to a scheme (more exactly, the LEI insurance scheme), thereby reducing the cost to each".

Although the doctrine also uses the term of "legal expenses insurance", we think the phrase "legal protection insurance" is more appropriate, for it refers to a wider range of legal activities. In this respect, we must take into consideration the fact that the range of expenses payable by the insurer is not limited only to the legal fees (due to the state for the public justice service), but it may also include the ones for mere giving legal advice, drafting of legal documents (contracts) or initializing and carrying out of amicable procedures (such as mediation) etc.

Art.127-1 of Insurances Code from France[25] offers a comprehensive definition of this type of policy. According to its content[26], we are dealing with a legal protection insurance when this one aims "any operation which, in exchange for the payment of a premium or a tax, previously established, consists of taking over the procedural costs or provision of services on behalf of the insurance policy, in case any dispute or litigation arises between the insured party and a third party, especially for the purpose of defending or representing the insured party in his claim in a civil, criminal, administrative or any other kind of procedure, or against a complaint involving him, or to amicably achieve remedial of the caused damage."

Legal expenses insurance (LEI), or Legal protection insurance, is another category (a separate category) of "non-life" insurance[27]. This type of insurances ("Legal expenses and costs of litigation") has been specifically established by being included at point A of art.17 of the Annex to the Directive no. 73/239/EEC[28], the first Directive related to non-life insurances).

As for the overall share within the non-life insurances category, the LEI policies have a low percentage, of less than 2% (with variations between 1.5%-1.8% within the period 2002-2013, then a constant growth till 2010 and a slight decrease between 2011 and 2012, followed by a revival in 2013, which shows that this type of insurance is very sensitive to the economic fluctuations)[29].

A decisive fact for the individualization of LEI insurances is that the insured risk is represented by the necessity to cover the court costs related to justice actions brought against the policies' holders, irrespective of the fact the claimant is an individual or a legal person.

This type of insurance has its origins in Europe, where it is operated predominantly by private businesses (insurance companies) for profit. Policies tend to provide cover for unforeseeable legal events and may be sold either to individuals, or to a group or a category of subscribers, as stand-alone contracts or on add-on basis to other insurance contracts (for example, to a motor insurance)[30].

The range of legal services covered by legal protection insurances is a wide one, from legal advice, to drafting of legal documents (exempli gratia, drafting of a contract or a will), or representing the parties in the court[31].

However, in case the legal protection insurance had been concluded voluntarily (i.e., it is an independent policy), the settlement (the financing) of the above listed activities will be ensured up to the value limit established by the policy, irrespective of the fact that the expenses thus covered are those advanced by the victim of the accident for court referral, or, if the case, are the expenses that must be refunded to the adverse party by the losing party[32].

Therefore, the services granted to the holder of a legal protection insurance are not only limited to refunding the amounts paid by this one as lawyer's fee or other related court fees, but, in time, they were extended to offering professional advice, by the in-house lawyers of the insurance companies or by outsourced appointed professionals. The insurance holder can be granted professional assistance also for concluding extrajudicial transactions, or can be represented in court by the insurer himself. The range of the services settled on behalf of the respective insurance differs from a jurisdiction to another, due to the fact that they have different ways of regulating the outsourced legal services.

As a rule, the insurer is allowed to provide legal assistance, as well as assistance related to extrajudicial transactions. A contrario, in most of the EU states, the representation in court or in other administrative procedures is not allowed, or they must comply with conditions that differ from a system of law to another. The most restrictive related legislation is in Germany, where the only benefit the insurers can give is payment of damages, since they are not authorized to offer legal advice, to assist the insurance holders in the extrajudicial procedures or to represent them in court. Giving legal advice is prohibited in Poland, as well[33].

Classification of LEI type insurances subjects to the following criteria:

a) the date of concluding the insurance contract, considering the date of occurrence of the insured event;
b) according to the legal nature of the insurance and
c) according to the object of the contract (usually revealed by the policy's holder).

a) Depending on the date the policy has been concluded, the legal protection insurances can be: before-the-event (BTE) insurances or after-the-event (ATE) insurances, specifying that the latter category is sensibly more expensive than the first one[34].

The after-the-event type insurances are available only in England and Wales and, later on, we will come back with related details. Unlike the before-the-event type policies, they are purchased either when a litigation situation occurs, or even after the time the referral to court has been made. In order to study the particularities of the ATE type insurances, we must observe the risks involved in starting a lawsuit within the British legal system, such as: high litigation expenses, difficulty in estimating the costs and the risk undertaken by the losing part of having to pay burdensome legal costs. These risks motivate the parties to adopt safety measures for the event they lose in court, so that they shouldn't be forced to pay both their own lawyer's fee and a significant part or even the entire amount of the adverse party's expenses.

All these precautions can be materialized, on one hand, by concluding an ATE type insurance, which provides protection (to a certain point), in case the insured party would be compelled to pay for the litigation expenses of the adverse party and, on the other hand, by concluding a "no win-no fee" type convention with their own lawyer.

In England and Wales (but not in Scotland, too), the winning party is granted the right to ask for the adverse party to be ordered to pay the insurance premium related to the ATE policy, this one being included in the category of other litigation expenses. On the other hand, in case of losing, the risk is undertaken by the insurer, so that the insurance premium will not be paid at all. The immediate effect was that the insured party cannot be forced, under any circumstances, to pay for the litigation expenses.

Considering this situation, likely to defy the principle of equality of the parties, Lord Jackson's Report included, among its recommendations, the regulation of the inadmissibility of recovering the ATE insurance premiums and the success fees from the defendant and the analyzing of the opportunity to adopt the BTE (before-the-event) insurance system[35].

b) From the perspective of its legal nature (its' form), this type of insurance can be materialized in an added clause (package-deal or add-ons) within another insurance contract, over liability for traffic accidents, or professional indemnity or even a home insurance contract, the latter being the most prevalent form within the EU states. Still, in some jurisdictions (like Germany), the legal expenses insurances can even be stand-alone products[36].

In Switzerland and Finland, the package-deal type insurance (as a clause) can also be added to the insurance contracts for commercial activities liability. When the legal protection insurance is embedded in another policy, it devolves upon the insurer not only the task of undertaking the risk related to the liability, but also the financing of the costs related to the litigation following the occurrence of the insured event. From this type of legal protection insurance usually benefit the defendants in cases of tort liability and, for the insurers, it involves covering both the expenses of the insured party for preparing the defense and the possible litigation costs that ought to be paid in case the plaintiff wins.

The price related to the package-deal type insurances is kept to a reasonably low level, because the insurance scheme provides a spread of litigation costs to all the subscribers from the respective category, so the number of litigations occurred is small comparing to the number of sold policies.

This type of legal protection insurance is widely spread all over most of the E.U. states, but also in Australia, Japan etc. Its popularity within these jurisdictions is confirmed by the high percentage of citizens owing such an instrument, many middle class members being protected by such an insurance related to daily activities, such as: home ownership, driving a car, pursuing of a profession or developing a business.

As for the stand-alone type policies, they are also rather popular and spread (mainly in the West European states) and they are individual insurances, protecting the parties against any possible legal costs and aim both parties of a trial (the plaintiff and the defendant). There are two restrictions to this type of insurance: 1. limitation to a certain type of litigations, namely the ones frequently involving individuals (e.g., tort liability related to the performance of real estate rental/lease contracts and consumer rights; there are cases when this insurance is also applicable in family law disputes) and 2. limitation in establishing an upper limit for the amounts to be covered by the insurer. Even if this type of insurance also provides a spreading of costs among subscribers, it still involves higher costs comparing to the package-deal type of insurance, since the insured risks are higher (whereas it addresses the plaintiffs as well), which means higher prices. In spite of this fact, most of the middle class people can afford the payment of the premiums[37].

It was found[38] that the stand-alone type legal insurance policies (always concluded voluntarily by the insured party) are offered, in most of the member-states, either by companies specifically dedicated to this type of insurance, or by companies that offer other types of insurances, as well. Still, the development level of the market for these insurances is different from a jurisdiction to another, depending on the degree of maturation of the market's profile, so, in some states, this type of insurance is completely non-existent (such as in Romania) or is very much less on demand and use, while in others (such as Great Britain, Belgium, Germany, Sweden) it is owned by a big part of the population, either as a stand-alone insurance, or as an add-on to contracts like motor insurances or home insurances.

c) The beneficiary of this insurance can be an individual and/or his family. In this case, the insurance covers the amounts related to legal services provided for the following: general legal advice, neighborhood relations, injuries to the beneficiary, work litigations and even disputes with consumers. Motor legal expenses insurance (MLEI) is a higher category of insurance, which exceeds the upper limits and damage types covered by the standard motor insurances. Finally, the Commercial LEI insurances cover the costs related to any commercial litigation, such as: litigations related to the enterprise and enforcing of the contracts, debt collection, litigations related to ownership right, work disputes and tax issues[39].

During 1969, in Rome, it was founded the International Association of Legal Protection Insurers ("Rencontres Internationales des Assureurs Défense" - RIAD), an independent organization, consisting of insurance companies' representatives, but also legal specialists, from 8 European states. Meanwhile, the organization grew, so that it came to enlist members from 18 European states, Canada, Japan and South Africa.

RIAD's purpose is to establish a global network, capable of giving, to the legal protection insured persons, an easy, affordable and high quality access to justice and the law[40].

To reach this goal, the members of this organization assumed and observed the rules of a strict conduct code, according to which the specialized services are provided. At the same time, the organization submits to interested parties and informs the public about the specific activity of the legal expenses insurance companies, facilitates the dialogue between its board, politicians, authorities with control duties and other entities, in order to promote the interests of this specific insurance market. In this regard, the annual conventions are particularly useful.

The RIAD members provide both the related financing and the legal services for the legal protection insurances, expressed either by offering legal advice or by representing the insured persons in the dispute settlement, both, amicably or legally.

Therefore, members holding the status of insurance companies provide, to their clients, products that can: a) finance a quick access to already established legal and support services and b) absorb any risk that clients might face regarding the lawyers' fees or other court costs. The other RIAD members (that provide specialized legal services) offer to the clients high quality services, so that the legal protection can be effective[41].

3. Legal protection insurances regulation within the European Union.

The regulation of legal protection insurances within the union is provided by the Directive no.87/344/EEC[42].

Article no. 2 of the above mentioned Directive establishes its scope.

Therefore, article 2 par.(1) settles the regulation framework of the legal protection insurances, defined by the fact that, in exchange for payment of a premium, the insurers take over the risk of covering the legal costs, but also provide other services related to the object of the insurance, such as:

a) to make sure that the damaged or injured party will be properly indemnified, either by concluding a transaction, or by initiation of legal or criminal proceedings;

b) in case the insured party holds the status of defendant, to provide proper defending of its interests, namely to represent it in any related procedure, should it be civil, administrative or criminal or any other form of complaint.

Article 2 par.(2) also settles the application limits of the normative act, stating that its provisions does not apply in the following circumstances:

− in case of legal expenses insurance policies, when the arised disputes or litigations concern operation of ships; actions taken, in any investigation or proceeding, by the insurer who insured the party for this type of risk, if the insurer is also a beneficiary of these actions;

− in exceptional situations, generated by the member states' sovereign will, regarding the following assumptions:

1. when the legal protection activities take place in another member-state than the one the insured party is resident of;
2. when the insurance policy concerns only legal assistance granted to persons facing a dispute on the occasion of traveling, therefore while being away from the place their permanent residence is;
3. in case the contract stipulates unequivocally that it covers only the situations mentioned in par. 1) and 2) and it is subsidiary to assistance.

The means to concretize the legal protection insurance are established in article no. 3 par.(1): it has to be either a stand-alone contract, different from other types of insurances, or an add-on to a policy related to covering legal expenses. In this latter case, if the member-state requires it, the value of the premium matching this type of insurance must be indicated. Article no.3 par.(2) provides a series of obligations for the member-states, expressed by taking proper action to prevent any conflict of interest situation.

According to article no.4 par(1), the following express clauses must be included in the legal protection insurances:

1. If, during an investigation or a proceeding, it is necessary to hire an attorney or another law specialist, who is granted, by the national law, the right to offer assistance, to represent and defend the insured party's interests, the latter is given the liberty to choose his own attorney or specialist;
2. The insured person is granted the right to freely choose an attorney or another qualified person to offer assistance (if the law provides it), also in case a conflict of interests arises.

Paragraph (2) of the same text defines the notion of "attorney" by reference to the names (titles) under which the exercise of this profession is recognized in the Directive CE no.77/249/EEC.

As an exception, article no. 5 par.(1) regulates exhaustively the cases when the member-states can grant derogations from the provisions of article no. 4 par.(1), namely when a series of terms are cumulatively met:

1. the insurance covers the expenses generated by using of vehicles on the territory of the respective state;
2. the policy is related to a contract that stipulates ensuring of assistance in case of an accident or a malfunction of such a vehicle;
3. the legal liability is covered neither by the legal protection policy, nor the assistance policy;
4. in case that all parties in the litigation have their legal protection policy concluded with the same insurer, the necessary measures are ordered to ensure that the assistance and representation granted to each party are provided by „fully independent" lawyers.

Even when applying such a derogation, article no.5 par.(2) states that it doesn't exempt the member-states from further applying the provisions of article no. 3, related to the form of the contract and to the measures to prevent and combat any conflict of interests.

4. Debates regarding the application of provisions of article no 4 par.(1) of the Directive no.87/344. Interpretations given in ECJ Jurisprudence.

4.1. On the subject of recognizing, for the member-states, their ability to control the limits of the amounts payable by the insurers on the basis of the legal protection policies (LEI), in case the insured party freely chooses its own lawyer, ECJ ruled on the occasion of the execution of a request for a preliminary decision[43], regarding the interpretation of the text of art.4 par(1) lett.q of the European Union Council Directive no.87/344 EEC.

In the mentioned case, the forum did not recognize the interpretation that, in the lack of an express stipulation of article no.4 par(1) lett.a, to indicate who has the authority to decide whether it is necessary to request the services of a law professional (the insured party or the insurer), it is to understand that the liberty the insured party benefits of, starts only if the insurer considers it is necessary to request that lawyer.

A contrario, it has been decided that the text „must be interpreted as meaning that precludes a legal protection insurer, who stipulates in his insurance contracts that legal assistance is in principle granted by his collaborators, to also stipulate that the costs related to legal assistance, provided by a lawyer or a representative freely chosen by the insured party, cannot be incurred unless the insurer agrees it is required to entrust the case to an outside counsel".

This resolution was based on the following considerations:

[43] The preliminary decizion of the ECJ, regarding the cause Sneller v. DAS Nederlandse (C-442/12), studied online at 23.12.2016, at the address: http://curia.europa.eu/juris/document/document.jsf?text=&docid=144208&pageIndex=0&doclang=RO&mode=lst&dir=&occ=first&part=1&cid=779980.

− the mere interpretation of the norm's text cannot lead to a solution, whereas the interpretation of the E.U. law provisions is exclusively made by referring to the specific context that generated the normative act, as well as to the objectives pursued by the legislator when adopting that regulation (the Eschig Decision[44]);

− the Court interpreted the provisions of the 11-th consideration of the Directive no.87/344 and of the article no. 4 par.(1) of the same Directive, that the liberty to choose a lawyer or other persons accredited to provide representation is justified by the insured party's very interest for legal expenses and it is recognized for any legal or administrative procedure (Stark Decision[45]). For this reason, the interpretation will be that the free choosing of a lawyer, by the insured party, does not justify the legal expenses' restriction only to the situations when the insurer decides it is necessary to engage a lawyer outside.

− in supporting this resolution, the intended purpose, when adopting this Directive, was of no less importance, namely to ensure a wide protection of the insured parties' interests, that does not agree to the restrictive interpretation of art.4 par(1) lett.a of the Directive.

− furthermore, as regards the free choosing of the representative, it has been noted that art.4 par(1) has a general applicability, so it has a binding force (with referral to Eschig par.47 and Stark Decisions, par.29).

− concerning the ability to control the limits of the insurance premiums' amounts, it was found that there are cases when the means (the criteria) according to which the insured party chooses its representative justifies the imposing of restrictions for the expenses that it has to advance or to settle with the insurers. In this respect, it has been reiterated the outcome of the Court in the Stark decision. According to ECJ jurisprudence, enshrining the right to choose a lawyer „does not involve the member-states' obligation to impose, in every circumstance, full coverage of the expenses incurred by defending an insured party, as long as this liberty is not without content". The lack of content would occur in case the upper limit established for the obligation of bearing the costs would lead to the impossibility of reasonably choosing a lawyer or a representative (as per Stark decision, par.33). The shortcomings of such a restriction can be avoided by the contract's parties themselves, as, based on the principle of contractual freedom, they can establish a higher limit for covering the legal expenses, with a possible increasing of the premium amount (Stark decision, par.34).

4.2. As regards the freedom of the insured party to choose a lawyer, it was considered the distinction between the terms of „administrative procedure" (inquiry) and (legal) „procedure", used by article no 4 of EU Council Directive no.87/344 EEC.

This text specifies that the insured party is granted the freedom to choose his lawyer (or another person, authorized by the national law to provide legal services) in case the situation requires it, „in order to defend, represent or serve the interests of the insured party in any inquiry or (legal) procedure".

In the European Court of Justice practice, there have been noted[46] the following aspects:

Primo, art.4 par(1) of the above mentioned Directive establishes that all contracts of legal protection insurance (LEI) will stipulate the insured party's right that, in any inquiry or legal procedure that requires the services of a lawyer or another authorized professional (representative) to defend, to represent or to serve its interests by any other means, it can freely choose that lawyer (representative);

Secundo, the distinction between „administrative procedure" (inquiry) and (legal) „procedure" is unequivocally clear by the very regulation of article no.4 par.(1), so that the two terms are opposite. However, the insured party has the right to choose his representative in both situations.

The opposite solution, of the application of article no. 4 par.(1) only for the procedures undertaken before an actual court (namely, the ones with administrative jurisdiction) would result in making meaningless the notion of „administrative procedure" (inquiry), specifically indicated in the Directive. Given that, as the referred text doesn't make a distinction, applying of any restriction to the „administrative procedure" (inquiry) is considered unacceptable.

Tertio, regarding the constant jurisprudence referring to interpretation of the provisions of the Union law, it is noted that it involves, besides the examination of the wording, also the examination of the norm's context, but also of the European legislator's intend in adopting it (as examples, in this regard, the St.Nikolaus Brennerei und Likorfabrik Decision, 337/82, EU:C:1984:69, par.10, the VEMW and others Decision, C-17/03 EU:C:2005:362, par.41, as well as Eschig Decision, C-199/08, EU:C:2009:538, par.38).

As the intend of Directive 87/344 [and, even more, of the article no. 4 par.(1), lett. a)] is to protect the interests of the insured parties, the regulation of a general applicability and of a required value, recognized for the right of choosing the lawyer or the representative, are incompatible with the restrictive

5. Particularities of the legal protection insurances instrument within some of the EU member-states, as well as within other jurisdictions.

It was noted[49] that, in most of the European Union member-states[50], besides the organization and functioning of a legal aid system (in order to ensure the free access to justice) it has also been established a specialized private insurance system, for covering the legal protection expenses (LEI).

A statistic[51] made during 2013, revealed a ranking of the EU member-states, based on the reference to the percentage rate of each state on the profile market. Thus, Germany was on the first place, with a rate of approx. 45%, followed by France (13%), Netherlands (9%), Great Britain (7.4%), Austria (6.3%) Belgium (5.4%) and Switzerland (5.1%).

In another study[52], it was found that, as regards the add-ons type legal protection insurances, the absolute market leader is Sweden, where the percentage of the households benefitting of such a policy is about 90%. The explanation for this performance is the fact that the LEI clauses are automatically included within most of the home insurances policies.

The LEI type insurances market is on a constant growth. Thus, starting with 2008, the Great Britain's market has been outrun by the Dutch one. The same study revealed the fact that Germany, France, Netherlands and Great Britain totalize 74% of the profile market's overall, while in the other jurisdictions (except for the ones targeted in the report, namely: Germany, France, Netherlands, U.K., Austria, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, Spain and Finland) it is shown a low interest for this instrument, totalizing a cumulative market share of below 5%[53].

In the following, we will review a few relevant examples, regarding the particularities of the legal protection insurances systems, but also the means by which it has been tried to implement them in some states:

5.1. England and Wales.

As we showed in the above, these jurisdictions are the only ones to use the after-the-event (ATE) type LEI insurance, namely the policy concluded after the occurrence of the litigation.

Unlike the before-the-event type policies, the ATE policies are purchased either the moment when the dispute arises, or even after the moment the legal procedures have been initiated.

In order to study the particularities of the ATE type insurances, we must observe the risks involved in starting a lawsuit within the British system, i.e.: high litigation expenses, difficulty in estimating the costs and the risk undertaken by the losing part of having to pay burdensome legal costs. These risks motivate the parties to take safety measures for the event they lose in court, so that they shouldn't be forced to pay both their own lawyer's fee and a significant part or even the entire amount of the adverse party's expenses.

All these precautions can be materialized, on one hand, by concluding an ATE type insurance, which provides protection (to a certain point), in case the insured party would be compelled to pay for the litigation expenses of the adverse party and, on the other hand, by concluding a "no win-no fee" type convention with their own lawyer.

In England and Wales (but not in Scotland, too), the winning party is granted the right to ask for the adverse party to be ordered to pay the insurance premium related to the ATE policy, this one being included in the category of other litigation expenses. On the other hand, in case of losing, the risk is undertaken by the insurer, so that the insurance premium will not be paid at all. The immediate effect was that the insured party cannot be forced, under any circumstances, to pay for the litigation expenses.

Considering this situation, likely to defy the principle of equality of the parties, Lord Jackson's Report included, among its recommendations, the regulation of the inadmissibility of recovering the ATE insurance premiums and the success fees from the [47] the case Erhard Eschig v. DAS Nederlandse Rechtsbijstand Verzekeringsmaatschappij NV (C-442/12): in this case, CEJ has ruled that is incompatible with the provizions of article no.4, lett.a) of the Directive no. 87/344 the solution of conditioning the assumption of costs associated with the attorney fees only if the insurer "considers it necessary to entrust the case to an outside counsel" other than its' ordinary collaborators. In this regard, the interpretation of the norm will not be influenced neither by the fact that, in the administrative or judicial proceedings in question, legal assistance is or not compulsory, under the rules of national law. defendant and the analyzing of the opportunity to adopt the BTE (before-the-event) insurance system[54].

As regards the representation of the insured party in commercial type litigation, usually the party already knows a specific legal adviser and prefers to be represented or advised by this one in the litigation. The insurance companies will try to influence the insured party to accept appointing and using their lawyers, invoking that they will not settle the entire expenditure. This practice is illegal (as we already showed in above). The contractual obligation of paying the amounts related to the legal expenses led to an ongoing concern of the insurers to reduce the level of those costs, which also involves using of professionals with the smallest fees, a solution that might be likely to contravene the interests of the insured parties.

The British insurance companies' Regulation admits to the insured parties the right of appointing their own lawyer. This solution is also confirmed by the Solicitors' Code of Conduct. Therefore, any clause that provides the limitation of the client's right to freely choose his lawyer is likely to question his independence and contravenes his interests.

Even if the insurance companies' Regulation also indicates the hypothesis that the insurer is entitled to appoint the lawyer (only after the initiation of the legal procedure), the same document shows that the right of the insurance holder to choose his representative arises the moment when this one can ask the insurer to pay the insured amount. In the legal practice, it has been assessed that the right of choosing the representative arises when it is obvious that the dispute will develop in a litigation proceeding.

In spite of these established regulations, the insurers do not accept their interpretation, so that they would not be able to coerce, to the insured parties, a specific defender, by selecting him from their own panel of lawyers, which would mean, for them, not having any control over the legal costs or the way the legal service is provided. In sustaining the opposite solution, the insurers invoke the following arguments:

a) that only their panel of lawyers have enough experience in understanding and interpreting the insurance policies, due to the complexity of those conventions,
b) that certain policies do not also cover the legal expenses (even if it is not the case),
c) that the above mentioned Regulation does not apply to this type of insurance, too (which also is a false assertion).

The insurer's practice, to limit the settled amount to the equivalent upper limit value of their own panel of lawyers' fees, or the refusal to pay the fees of the lawyer chosen by the insured-client, can abusively limit this one's right of choosing his own defender[55].

As shown above[56], the provisions of article no.4 par(1) lett.a) of the E.U. Council Directive no.87/344 EEC, have been interpreted by ECJ by reference to the interest protected by the European legislator, meaning that, starting from the need for protection of the insured parties interests and by observing of the general and binding aspect of the right of choosing the representative, a conditionality of this right would be the same with a restrictive interpretation of the provision, which is not allowed.

As a conclusion, it is obvious that all the insurers that provide legal protection insurances all over Europe are compelled to allow their clients to freely choose their lawyer. The importance of conceding this right is proved by the situations when the form of exercising the profession, chosen by the insured party, had already provided a certain number of hours of legal activities (e.g., for clarifying the context of the litigation). In a situation like this, appointing one of the insurer's own lawyers would be an unjust solution.

In case the insured parties are not allowed to choose their own lawyers or there are signs of any conflict of interests between them and the insurers, they may undertake the following steps:

1. notify the insurer about the choosing of the lawyer (or the professional company) which is to provide assistance and representation, as soon as he had made his decision, so that any disagreement related to this aspect can be solved in due time. During these debates, the chosen lawyers or representatives can also intervene, by bringing arguments to prove their related experience and show their willingness to update the insurers about the evolution of the entrusted case;
2. ask for the insurance broker's help, to pressure the insurer to recognize the client's options for his representation. In this case, the higher chances go to the big clients, that can influence the insurer to make a decision, especially if the latter is interested in keeping those clients;
3. when running out of options, the clients are invited to address the Financial Ombudsman service[57], for settling the differences with the insurer[58].

5.2. Germany.

The percentage rate of the German profile industry on the European market of the legal protection insurances was of 44%, in 2013, a result that can be explained by the fact that it does not necessarily reflect the market volume, but rather its rate of coverage, considering that, in Germany, there are almost 50 operational insurance companies, offering LEI type policies and totalizing a number of 20 million contracts (including both the group and the individual ones). Even if the number of clients for this service diminished from 55% in 2003, to less than 43% in 2013, this decrease does not necessarily reflect a restriction of the activity, as much as a result of reaching a high maturing level of the market, comparing to other EU markets' important growth.

The beneficiaries of a legal protection insurance have the advantage of being able to exercise, or, if the case, to defend their subjective rights, any time it is required, without being held back by financial reasons. However, this advantage also comes with some shortcomings, as it can lead to a different perception within the society and to a malevolent exercising of certain procedural rights. Therefore, the client that has continuously paid his insurance premiums during the last decade will be much less interested in amicably solving the litigation, even if he is given an advantageous offer. Furthermore, even if he loses the case, the client, already caught in a vicious cycle, will also act on appeals, as long as their costs are still borne by the insurer. An experimented judge can easily see what party holds such a policy, by simply observing their attitude during the trial[59].

The explanation for the fact that the risk of the legal costs is more easily insured in Germany is that it's easier to anticipate those costs, in this jurisdiction[60].

This easy way of anticipating the costs is determined by the regulations[61] concerning the calculation method of the fees for the legal services. Thus, the related costs for the legal services are fixed, being established by reference to the value of the litigation's object, in a manner similar to that of establishing the justice fees.

Due to the structure of this legislative framework , the action's holder (the claimant) can calculate, before initiating the legal proceedings, what are the amounts he should advance, both for justice fees and his defender's fee[62].

There is no domestic norm to force the insurers operating in Germany offer the clients a certain type of legal protection insurance, as those contracts' provisions can be established on the basis of the contractual freedom's principle. Usually, the insurance services providers use a standard policy, drafted according to the provisions of the General Conditions for the Legal Protection Insurances (Alldemeine Bedingungen fur die Rechtsschutzersicherung – ARB 2010)[63].

5.3. Austria.

This law system has similar characteristics to the German one, as it is easy to anticipate the costs of a possible trial, the costs of the lawyers' fees also being easily predictable, whereas there are regulated norms[64] for calculating them, established according to the value of the litigation's object. As a consequence, in this country, as well, there has been noted a significant growth of the popularity of the insurance policies related to all legal expenses.

Even if the LEI type contractual clauses, included within the home insurance policies or motor policies can ensure the financing of the legal activities related to those litigations, in most of the cases, the interested people are forced to additionally purchase stand-alone type LEI insurance contracts. To answer the market's demands, many insurers have accommodated the motor insurance policies, to automatically include the LEI clauses[65].

The procedure by which the insurer provides the necessary amounts is started by a notification from the client (claimant) or his lawyer, revealing the intention to initiate a litigation. The insurance company makes sure that two cumulative conditions, related to the litigation, have been met, namely: if the litigation, by its nature, corresponds to the ones covered by the policy and if there are clues that it will not exceed the insured amount. If these conditions are met, the insurer confirms, in writing, to the client the coverage of the costs[66].

5.4. France.

The legal protection insurances are regulated, in France, in the Insurances Code[67], (Book I, title II, chapt.VII, articles L127-1-127-8).

The essence of the legal protection insurance is the fact that it is optional. This convention is like a precaution measure, taken for the situation when the client is involved in a legal procedure and it consists of transferring the related risk to the insurer.

The difference between the LEI insurance and the public legal aid is of a legal nature: while the public legal aid is based on the social solidarity concept, law provided, the LEI insurance is based on common risk-taking (according to a contract). In this respect, the insurance for the legal expenses has the same foundation as the one for fire insurance or hospital insurance[68].

Article L127-2 of the Insurances Code provides the means to materialize the legal protection insurance: either as a stand-alone contract, or as a distinct add-on clause of an independent policy, which has to define the LEI insurance's content and to indicate the related insurance premium's value.

Article L127-2-1 defines the concept of "insured event" (sinister) as being the refusal to a request made to, or made by the insured party, as the case. So, the legal quality of the client (plaintiff or defendant) is not relevant.

According to article L127-2-2 par.(1), the consultations granted or the legal actions taken before the moment of the insured event's occurrence does not justify the unlocking of the guarantee. Any contractual clause to provide another solution is considered unwritten. As an exception to this rule, par.(2) of the same article provides that the request of those consultations or taking of those legal actions might be settled by the insurer, provided that the client proves an emergency situation, that required those measures.

Article L127-2-3 states it is compulsory to offer the client a lawyer's assistance or representation, provided that the client or even the insurer acknowledges the fact that the opposite party in the trial benefits of the same conditions for representation.

The provisions of article 4 par.(1) of the Directive no.87/344 EEC are applied in the domestic law by the regulation of art.L127-3 par(1), which provides that when it is required to use the services of a lawyer or another person legally authorized to represent or defend the client's interests, the latter has the right to freely choose in this respect.

According to art. L127-3 par.(2) the client's right to choose his lawyer (or another representative) must be stipulated in the contract for all situations generating a conflict of interests between the client and the insurer. Under no circumstances a contractual clause can provide the restriction of the client's right to choose, unless the upper limit of the guarantee's value is not exceeded (par.3).

Finally, the par.(4) of article L127-3 states that the only case when the insurer is allowed to recommend a lawyer to his client is when the client himself has made a written request in this respect.

On the same line, article L127-5-1, states that the amount for the lawyer's fee will be established only by negotiation between the client and the lawyer. The French legislator specifically forbade the insurers to intervene in this matter.

According to article L127-4, if the case is that the insurer and the client do not agree upon the actions to be taken in order to settle the litigation, this impasse can be overcome with the help of a third party, jointly designated by the first two parties. Furthermore, if parties cannot agree upon the third party, the decision will be made by the court, following a brief procedure. As a rule, the insurer will have the obligation to pay the costs related to that procedure. As an exception, the court can rule for the client himself to make the payment, if it has been established he abusively started that procedure.

In case the client starts the above mentioned contentious procedure and is granted a more advantageous solution than the one suggested by the insurer or by the third party indicated in the previous paragraph, the insurer will have to offset the expenses related to that action, up to the guarantee's value upper limit.

In the situation the procedure is held before the third party or in court, the procedural terms established for the appeal are suspended for all the legal procedures covered by the policy and the client can initiate the procedure, by formulating the court referral, until the designated third party finds a solution and presents it to the parties.

Art.L127-5 states the obligation of the insurance companies, should a conflict of interests between them and their clients arise, to inform them they can exercise the rights stated by articles L127-3 and L127-4.

5.5. Switzerland.

In Switzerland, the legal protection insurance policies have been used since 1925, they are widely spread and they cover various legal aspects.

For those who are interested, there have been made available motor insurances, individual insurances and professional and business risk insurances. Regarding the package-deal type insurances, in this jurisdiction, as well, they involve a limitation of the covered litigations' range, so that they cannot be used in family litigations, neighborhood relations, real-estate issues or construction work contracts.

There is a maximal upper limit for the amounts that can be insured by a LEI insurance and it established by most of the profile companies to the amount of CHF 250000 (corresponding to approx. USD 250000). The insurer has the option to deny the financing of the client's actions, should he consider there are no chances of success, in which case he has to inform the client, in writing, about his opinion. The resolution of the financing denial can be appealed to a quasi-arbitrary court, on the insurer's expense[69].

5.6. Finland.

For individuals, the legal protection insurances (LEI) are included as clauses (standard, therefore, compulsory clauses) in the home insurance general policies. The companies, as well, can use such an instrument, in regards to certain claims against them (for example, in case of work accidents, or for discriminatory treatment etc).

Under these circumstances, the range of litigations for which the legal expenses can be insured is rather restricted, as most of the litigations categories (divorce and child custody, work or business litigations) cannot be financed in this way. The amount paid in 2012 was, in general, of 8500 Euro the most, which sufficed only for a modest financing or low value litigations and it only covered the insured party's legal expenses.

The using of this type of insurance policies by legal entities clients has been estimated as much more reduced, specifying that unequivocal statistical data could not have been accessed. Depending on the contractual terms, these insurances cover the financing of the client's expenses and they could, also, involve the adverse party's expenses, should the client have any claims, being forced to pay for them, as well[70].

5.7. The Japanese System – a successful implementation model of the legal expenses insurances mechanism.

From the regulation point of view, the legal protection insurance contracts have to comply to the provisions of the Insurances Law and the insurers observe the provisions of the Insurance Business Act. There is no equivalent norm for the EU Directive no.87/344/EC.

The first LEI type insurances appeared, in Japan, in middle 90's. They did not consist of stand-alone contracts, but they were add-on special clauses to non-life type insurance contracts, such as automobile insurances, fire insurances or holder's accidents insurances. Therefore, also the litigations, for which those clauses were effective, were limited to the ones pursuing compensation of damages to the clients' properties or those following a car accident.

During 2012, it was founded a specialized insurance company, providing, to the interested people, stand-alone LEI policies, to cover the financing of a wider range of civil litigations: from divorce cases or inheritance to individual work litigations or even litigations related to contracts' interpretation and unfolding.

Rights protection insurance or Attorney insurance (or „Kenrihogo-hoken") is a system created by JFBA Legal Access Center (JFBA-LAC) and which is administrated by the latter, in cooperation with insurance companies. On September 1-st, 2014, 12 insurance companies joined the system, among which, 3 of the 3 largest groups of non-life insurances.

The „Attorney insurance" system is organized in such a way to observe the provisions of the Attorney act, which do not allow to provide consultancy or representation by other persons than lawyers (art.72), or to intermediate such services, all these actions being submitted to criminal law. Therefore, the insurance companies can neither provide legal services themselves, nor indicate specific lawyers to the clients.

In this context, the only task the insurers have is to finance the related legal costs (justice fees, management of evidence costs, expertise fees etc.), but also the lawyers' fees. On the other hand, in order to properly inform and guide the client, upon this one's special request, JFBA-Access Center will ask the local bar to recommend a lawyer.

Lately, the popularity of this insurance system has grown exponentially. Rights protection insurance had reached a number of 20 million contracts, in 2012, and was used in over 20000 trials, helping to significantly improve the access to justice for the Japanese citizens[71].

5.8. Australia – a different approach for the legal protection insurances (starting by the state's involvement, followed by the slowly transferring to the private insurance system).

The concern for ensuring the free access to justice to the middle class people, not eligible for the public legal aid but, still, not affording to pay the legal services costs, made the object of a huge public debate, in Australia, starting with middle '80s.

The ability of the legal protection insurance systems to provide an improved access to legal services, has been noted in the conclusions of the Australian Senate's Cost of Justice Inquiry-1992, the Access to Justice Advisory Committee's Report - 1994 and observed in the research made by the Law Council of Australia.

In 1983, the Law Foundation started to search for means to improve the general access to justice, by providing legal services affordable to people with small and medium income. After reviewing several possibilities, it has been considered that the most efficient one would be the establishing of a company specialized in legal protection insurances marketing. In this respect, the Law Foundation and the Government Insurance Office=GIO have established, in 1986, the Legal Expenses Insurance Limited (or LEI Ltd.).

This company operated between July, 1989 and 1996, when the shares of the Law Foundation have been bought by GIO, who, subsequently, liquidated its portfolio of this type of insurances.

The fact that this enterprise supported by state, was not successful, was due, on one hand, to the particularities of the Australian legal system, which does not benefit of a specific regulation regarding the establishing of the lawyers' fees (as we showed supra that is the case in some European states, like Austria and Germany), so that it was nearly impossible to estimate the costs for those procedures.

On the other hand, the lack of success was also due to the mistrust in this type of insurances. It has been tried to implement a solution which borrows specific elements of this profile insurances from both USA (where these policies provide protection to insured groups – mostly, members of unions, for usual and predictable legal costs) and Europe (where the insurances address the individuals, but provide protection for a small number of litigations types). The result was a product intended for groups of potential clients (unions, clubs and associations), which was financing the legal costs indicated in the policy, but was also entitling the holders to certain complementary services, such as phone counseling and a small category of in-house type legal services for all litigations.

Even so, neither the large public, in general, nor the potential clients aimed by the insurers, in particular, did realize the benefits of this type of insurance, especially that nor the insurance brokers were familiar to the product's particularities, so they were not able to efficiently promote it. The recession, along with the lack of providing any fiscal facilities, were all the more reasons to prevent the employers from purchasing legal protection insurances, as benefits granted to employees.

Even if it didn't have the expected results, the LEI Ltd. Company's action contributed to the establishing of a legal protection insurances industry in Australia.

After the LEI Ltd. company's liquidation, the respective insurance policies continued to be offered by several insurance companies (private companies). Most of the legal protection insurances offered afterwards were aiming the needs of the educated and financially independent citizen and of his family, addressing, especially, to those concerned by the economic stability. Usually, the protection offered by these policies extends, also, to the client's family, living under the same roof. The same as in Europe, the legal protection insurances can be used related only to certain types of litigations (such as, cases of civil liability tort, the consumer's right, home selling or buying litigations, auto liability, defense in litigations related to the anti-discrimination legislation). They don't include matters of family law, inheritance or real estate business, transfer of real estate property, most of criminal cases.

However, the number of insured persons is not established, but the popularity is significantly lower than the one that these instruments have on the United States and Europe markets[72].

In order to improve the market and to widespread the use of this type of insurance, there have been made several suggestions[73], among which:

1. Taking certain fiscal policy measures, expressed by including the costs related to purchasing the legal protection insurances in the scope of deductible expenses;
2. The government should assume the role of promoting the LEI type insurances, so that the public can realize the necessity and the benefits resulting from purchasing this product;
3. Still the government, as being the employer of an important number of people, can encourage the spread of this type of insurance amongst its employees, by supporting certain collective bargaining schemes (enterprise bargaining etc.);
4. To complete the above mentioned promoting activity, the insurance brokers should be properly trained and improved as regards the particularities of this product.

6. Conclusions (and accounts) regarding the use of the stand-alone legal protection insurance contracts in the Romanian jurisdiction.

In Romania there is a widespread use of the clauses referring to the legal protection, included in the professional liability insurance contracts (exempli gratia, for lawyers', architects', physicians', expert accountants', assessors' liability etc), RCA type contracts (for motor insurances), home insurance contracts, or the employer's tort liability contracts. Policies that are found less often are the ones intended for the clients-legal persons, like general liability contracts or policies that aim the risks related to a specific business (such as: insurances for construction and assembly works, or insurances for forwarding liability). In these cases, as well, the legal protection insurance is embedded in the main contract and not as a stand-alone type.

Although we went through the websites of at least 20 insurance brokers, we could not find, in their general offer, any product, addressed either to individuals or to legal persons, to be an actual insurance contract for this type of risk. The author shows he found no different situation regarding the profession liability and couldn't find any signs of it either, in the specialty literature or the national courts' practice.

The same fact is revealed also in the „European Judicial Systems. Efficiency and quality of justice no.23 (ed.2016)" report74 drafted by the European Commission for the Efficiency of Justice (ECEJ). This document shows that the only Union's member-states not having such a system, in 2014, were Bulgaria and Romania.

The explanation of this fact is that, usually, the legal protection insurance systems are very developed in the states where the costs related to lawsuits are predictable, for the exact reason that there are established lawyers' fees (as we showed in the above75, regarding the fees' regulation for the law professionals, in Germany and Austria). We consider that this justification can only be partly accepted, since the lawyers' fees, in Romania and Bulgaria, are among the modest ones from the entire European Union.

Therefore, we think that the only possibilities to finance the costs of a civil lawsuit in our jurisdiction remain: either to be borne by the involved parties (both, individuals and legal persons), or, if the case, to obtain the approval for the public legal aid, for individuals (under the conditions of the article no.4 of the Emergency Government Ordinance no.51/2008, regarding the legal aid within civil trials) and facilities regarding the payment of the justice fees, granted to the legal persons (according to article no.42 par.(2) of the Emergency Government Ordinance no.80/2013, regarding the court fees).

Given that, both in the national courts' jurisprudence and in CEDO's practice, there have been criticism referring to the inefficacy of the legal assistance system, it results that the implementation and the promotion of certain legal protection insurance policies would be very useful and would be an additional guarantee to ensure an effective access to justice. It remains to be seen how and when such a reform in insurance will be adopted, considering the system's fragility and the development level of the market profile in Romania.

A FEW ASPECTS REGARDING THE SIMULATION OF CONTRACT IN THE ROMANIAN CIVIL CODE

Tudor Vlad RĂDULESCU*

Abstract

The article aims to analyze some key aspects of simulation in contracts, as regulated by the Romanian Civil Code . The process of simulation will be explained, based on the provisions of the previous Civil Code, but also with reference to the relevant provisions of the legislation of some European countries. The analyse will focus on the apparent act, and also on the secret one and a special emphasis on intention to simulate, animo simulandi, the key aspect of the matter. Also the effects of the simulation will be reviewed, both from the point of view of the parties and that of third parties, the concept of third parties having another meaning in this procedure.

Keywords: simulation, arbitration clause, relativity of contracts, overt act, covert agreement.

1. Introduction

Pursuant to art. 1280 Civil Code, contracts take effect only between the parties, unless the law provides otherwise. This is the meaning of the principle of relativity of the effects of the contract, which can be translated in that rights and obligations arising from a valid contract will benefit or will be incumbent only on people who took part in person or by proxy, at the conclusion of the contract and whose will is present in said document.

This principle, in order to be fully and properly understood, must be interpreted with reference to the provisions of art. 1282 paragraph 1 Civil Code, according to which the contractual rights and obligations of a party shall be transferred, at his/her death, to his/her universal successors or with universal title, if the law, the stipulation of the parties or the nature of the contract do not indicate otherwise.

Thus, the principle of relativity shall be understood in the sense in which it establishes that rights and obligations arising from a contract belong to the original parties, but also to their successors in title, that is the universal successors, with universal title and particular title, as regards the latter with the observance of the conditions set by art. 1282 paragraph 2 Civil Code.

Per a contrario, to all other persons not falling into any of the categories mentioned above, and who are called proper third parties, the contract will take no effect, in the sense that they will not acquire rights, obligations or that contract. The justification of the relativity principle is simple: on the one hand, the very volitional nature of the civil legal act requires such a rule, meaning that if it is natural for a person to become a debtor or a creditor for he/she expressed his/herwish to do so, so it is natural that another person does not become a debtor or creditor unwittingly, and on the other hand, the contrary solution would be liable to undermine personal freedom[1].

However, the properly so called third parties can not be totally indifferent to the new legal situation created by the contract concluded between the parties. For this reason, the current Romanian Civil Code expressly provided a principle that in the former civil regulation of our country did not benefit from a legal basis, but was recognized form a jurisprudential and doctrinary point of view, namely the principle of enforceability. Thus, according to the provisions of art. 1281 Civil Code, the contract is enforceable against third parties, who can not affect the rights and obligations arising from the contract. Third parties may rely on the contractual effects, but without the right to demand its execution, except as required by law.

From the analysis of the article, can be drawn two conclusions regarding the content of this principle[2]: on the one hand, third parties can not affect the rights and obligations arising from the contract, otherwise being drawn their liability in tort, and on the other hand, third parties may rely on the effects of the contract, but can not demand its execution, except provided by law (for example with regard to insurance contracts, or if, the legislature recognizes for the benefit of certain persons, third to a contract, a so-called direct action against one of the contracting parties).

However, in order to talk about the enforceability of a contract to third parties, it must meet certain forms of disclosure, about which the legislature speaks, in principle, in Chapter IV of the Preliminary Title of the Civil Code, entitled Disclosing rights, acts and legal facts (art. 18-24).

[2] See in this regard, C. Zamșa, în F.A.Baias, E.Chelaru, R. Constantinovici, I. Macovei, Noul cod civil. Comentarii pe articole., second edition, Ed. C.H.Beck, Bucharest, 2014, p. 1459.

From reading the chapter mentioned above, we conclude that, in cases expressly provided by law, rights, acts and facts relating to the status and capacity of persons, those related to property belonging to them and any other legal relations[3] are subject to disclosure (through the forms expressly defined by the legislature), that disclosure can have either an enforceability effect of acts to third parties (as a general rule) or a constitutive or translational effect of rights between the parties and to their successors, universal, with universal title or particular title (as an exception, when the law expressly requires it), and that the sanction in case of violation of these formalities is either unenforceability of acts, rights or legal relations against third parties, or no translative or constitutive effect of rights, between parties.

However, a contract may be enforceable against third parties, even if were not respected the disclosure formalities provided by law, if such third parties are proven to have known on any other way about the contract (art. 22 para, 1 Civil Code).

We can therefore conclude that a contract is enforceable against third parties either by fulfiling disclosure formalities established by law or by knowledge in any other way by third parties about the conclusion of that act.

The difference between the two ways of knowledge by third parties of the reality recorded by contract lies in terms of evidence. Thus, if the parties performed the necessary disclosure formalities, art. 21 para. 1 of the Civil Code presumes that that act, right exists and, therefore no one can claim its lack of knowledge. In this case, the presumption will benefit the parties, who must only prov the fulfillment of the disclosure formality.

On the other hand, if the parties have not fulfilled these formalities, it is presumed that third parties are not aware of the act or the right claimed, in which the parties have the burden of proof for the purposes of proving a matter of fact, namely that third parties have ben made aware, by any other way, of the act or the right in question.

There may also be exceptions from this principle of enforceability, i.e. those cases where a third party will be entitled to disregard, to ignore, therefore to reject those legal situations that have been created by certain contracts. In other words, the parties of these agreements will not be able to prevail against third parties of certain legal situations which they have created by their contractual will[4].

The simulation is regarded as such an exception, given the parties' intention to conceal the true relationships between them, often with the aim of frauding either the interests of unsecured creditors or the interests of their successor in title.

2. Brief comments on the simulation operation in the Romanian Civil Code of 1864

The previous Civil Code has not given legal consecration to simulation, as in the current regulation. The only provision is found in art. 1175 Civil Code., according to which "The secret document that modifies a public act, has power only between the contracting parties and their universal successors; such an act can not have any effect against the others".

Although the above article was placed in the chapter on evidence, namely the one related to documents, yet it has been widely accepted that the simulation involved the completion of two acts (in the sense of negotium, not in the sense of instrumentum) and a public act apparently disguised and a secret act (improperly called counterletter), which contained the true will of the parties.

It is assumed that the simulation is generally aimed at fraud and thus it resembles the deceit. However, simulation differs from deceit by several important characteristics. Firstly, the deceit is fraudulent by definition, while simulation may sometimes not aim at fraud, although in practice it is rare. Secondly, the deceit is always directed against one party, while simulation is the work of both parties, directed against third parties[5].

The simulation conditions, its effects and the regulatory field, although outlined in the jurisprudential the doctrine plan, they are also found in the current regulation, with the same ideas, with quite a few differences, which we will address at the right time.

3. Simulation in the current Romanian Civil Code

3.1. Notion

Unlike the previous civil code, the simulation has a legal regime in the new regulation, in art. 1289-1294 Civil Code.

Thus, simulation can be defined[6] as the legal operation in which, through a public legal act, but apparently, it creates a new legal situation than the one established by a legal hidden, secret but real act, inappropriately also called counter-letter[7].

To understand the definition given above, we consider it necessary to explain some terms used in explaining the concept.

[7] G. Boroi, L. Stănciulescu, Instituţii de drept civil în reglementarea noului Cod civil, Ed. Hamangiu, Bucharest, 2012, p. 172.

The secret act is the one expressing the real will of the parties and establishes the true legal relationship between them; to be valid, the secret act must only satisfy the merits test, the validity requirements of civil legal act, and not the formal tests, as evidenced by the per a contrario of the provisions of art. 1289 paragraph 2 Civil Code[8].

The problems have been raised in the literature[9] with regards to the persistence of secrecy of the act containing the real will of the parties, if it is subject to a form of disclosure. Thus, it has been said that whenever the counterletter is subject to a form of disclosure which, by its nature, is intended to make aware the third parties of the effects of legal acts (registration in the land register, entry in the Electronic Archive for Security Interests in Movable Property, etc.), its secret act character will miss. But as the same author goes on, receiving a certain date is unable to remove the secret character of the counterletter, not even by its registration at the fiscal authorities, as the tax administration is not a discolosing authority[10].

The public act is the one that creates the appearance and which is concluded to this end, i.e. to dissimulate reality under its lying cover; its existence is essential to the existence of the simulation[11].

As to this act, both the substantive conditions (capacity, consent, object and cause) and the the formal issues required by law must be satisfied. Moreover, if the secret act is an act for whose validity the law requires compliance with a specific substantive requirement (eg, donation), although this act shall not take the form of the authentic document, however, for the validity of the simulation, as legal operation , the public act must be concluded in that form, even though the law does not require the compliance with formal conditions for its valid conclusion[12], the the secret to act to "borrow" the form from the public act.

3.2. Conditions of validity of the simulation

To be valid as a legal operation, the simulation must satisfy, in a review, a number of conditions, that we also mention:

1. there is a secret act;
2. there is a public act;
3. the secret act must be concluded concurrently or possibly before the conclusion of the public act and
4. both legal acts must be concluded between the same parties[13].

According to another review[14], also embraced by by the the latest jurisprudence of the High Court of Cassation and Justice[15], in addition to the two acts

5. the existence of the simulaiton agreement is needed or the will of the parties that the legal operation produces all the legal effects specific to simulation, animus simulandi, which differs from the discrepancy that can occur spontaneously between the declared will and the real will, which will be solved by interpreting the contract[16].

As for the simulation agreement, it has been defined as a manifestation of will which "tells" that the public act is simulated, which expresses the will of the parties to create the appearance, to hide the reality of relationships between them, and it connects, unites the hidden act with the public, ostensible act[17]. Therefore, the simulation agreement is a legal act, regarded as negotium (whose document confirming it can even miss), by which the intention to simulate (simulating animus) is reflected[18], it may also have a fully-fledged existence (as for the simulation by disguise or for the simulation by interposition of persons), or it could lose their autonomy, being absorbed by the secret document (such as the simulation by fictional act).

As for the condition of simultaneity of colncluding the secter and the public document, some clarifications are necessary here, too.

This simultaneity must not be seen in terms of the document confirming the agreement but, as shown by the former Supreme Court, it is sufficient that the secret act precedes the public act or to be simultaneous with this one, even if the document in which the secret document was recorded has been written after the public act. In other words, it is essential that the agreement between the parties, so the convention in respect of legal operation, is prior or concomitant with the public act[19].

On the other hand, since the simulation agreement is a prerequisite, it has been admitted that once the decision to simulate was taken, so animus simulating was expressed between the simulators, the time period

[8] Another opinion has been expressed, namely that the secret act should also meet the formal conditions required by law if the simulation is achieved by interposition of persons or mandate without representation, cases in which the parties in the public act are not the same as the parties in the secret act; see F.A. elapsed between the dates when the contracts are concluded and form the simulation is irrelevant[20].

3.3. Forms of simulation

The new civil code has not expressly provided the simulation forms, referencing only to one of the ways that the parties can use to hide their true will, namely fictivity (art. 1291 Civil Code.), form the legal appearance[21].

For these reasons, in this paper we limit ourselves to briefly resume the forms of simulation, recalling that this legal operation can be achieved by fictivity, by disguise (total or partial) and by interposition of persons; in the legal literature[22], distinction has already been made between absolute simulation and relative simulation, the latter being classified in objective simulation (when objective elements of the act are hidden, such as the nature of the contract, its object or its cause) and subjective simulation (for simulation by interposition of persons).

In its first form, of the fictional act, simulation assumes the existence of only two of its three elements, the public act and the simulation agreement respectively. Thus, the parties conclude an act which is apparently devoided of any effects through the simulaiton agreement, the participants in the simulation remaining in the state before the conclusion of the public act; no new rights and obligations arise between the parties, except for those strictly determined by the will to simulate (e.g. the obligation to consent to the dissolution of the public act within a certain period, the right of the person having consented to the simulation to get some remuneration, etc.)[23]. In short, through the fictional act the parties "pretend" to conclude a legal act (aiming at often defrauding the interests of certain categories of participants in legal relationships - creditors), in reality the act is non-existent.

The disguise, the second way to hide the reality may be total or partial, depending on the item on which the parties conclude the simulation agreement. Hiding the nature of the contract that represents the real will of the parties makes disguise to be total, while dissimulating only certain aspects of the secret contract will be just a partial disguise (i.e., hiding the real price, hiding the real date on which the secret act was concluded, hiding the way that obligation is to be executed, etc.).

Finally, the simulation by interposition of persons implies the conclusion of the public act between certain parties, while the secret act (and the simulation agreement) is attended by a third person, who will be the real beneficiary of the public act, in whose patrimony the legal effects of the concluded act will be produced.

3.4. Effects of simulation

3.4.1. General effects of simulation

In terms of produced effects, the Romanian legislature in 2009 remained committed to the principle of simulation neutrality, art. 1289 paragraph 1 Civil Code. providing that the secret act shall take effect only between the parties and, if the nature of the contract or the stipulation of the parties do not provide otherwise towards the universal successors and with universal title. So simulation, as a rule, is not sanctioned than when it is aiming at an unlawful cause, the secret act having effects only between its parties, but also towards the persons related to the third parties, towards the third parties in good faith only the public act is enforceable.

As a rule, the simulation sanction is unenforceability against third parties in good faith of the legal situation created by the secret act, and if necessary, removing the simulation by action in simulation[24].

There are also situations in which the simulation of the parties will is sanctioned by absolute or relative nullity, depending on the nature of the interests protected, nullity that can cover either the secret act, or the whole legal operation.

By way of example, we mention art. 992 Civil Code., which reads as follows: (1) The sanction of relative nullity provided in art. 988 par. (2) art. 990 and 991 also applies to the liberalities disguised as a contract for consideration or provided to a third party. (2) Are presumed, until proven otherwise, as third parties, the ascendants, descendants and spouse of the person incapable of receiving special favors, and the ascending and descending spouse of such person.

In this case, the applicable sanction will be the relative nullity of liberalities disguised as a contract for considerationor made by interposition of persons, in other words, only the secret act will be abolished and not the entire legal operation.

On the other hand, nullity will affect the entire legal operation when required by art. 1033 Civil Code., according to which (1) any simulation in which the donation was the secret contract in order to circumvent the cancellation of donations between spouses is void/ invalid. (2) Any relative of the donee to whose legacy he would be calling upon donation and did not result as a consequence of the marriage to the donor is presumed third party, until proven otherwise.

As to the type of nullity, we believe that in the situation cited above, the applicable sanction would be the absolute nullity, and not the relative nullity of the simulation, although at first glance, it would be about a particular interest.

However, given that by the mentioned article, the legislature intended to defend the principle of revocability of donations between spouses, revocability that is the essence of this type of contract signed between two parties who have a certain quality (spouses), we consider that the interests protected is a general one, reason for which the nullity that occurs is the absolute nullity.

3.4.2. The effects of simulation between the parties

The secret act shall effect effects between the parties of the simulation, as required by art. 1289 paragraph 1 Civil Code. The same act shall also take effect on the universal successors or those by universal title, if the nature of the contract or the stipulation of the parties does not indicate otherwise.

So, as a rule, the category parties also includes the universal successors or those by universal title (not those with particular title), unless the nature of the contract (e.g. a contract intuitu personae) or the will of the originating parties (in case which simulation is used to defraud the interests of these categories of successors) make the assignee be seen as third parties towards simulation.

However, we can not generalize the rule established by Art. 1289 paragraph 1 Civil Code., in the sense that, depending on the form of simulation, even the public act can produce effects between the parties; thus those elements of public act to which makes reference the simulation agreement will not produce any effect between the simulation parties, but items which are not affected by the parties' intention to simulate become effective provided for in the public act (the case, for example, of a simulation by partial disguise)[25].

The secret contract between the parties shall take effect only if the conditions of validity, the substantive issues are met (capacity, consent, object and cause) without needing to satisfy also the formal conditions, as required by art. 1289 paragraph 2 Civil Code.

3.4.3. The effects of simulation towards third parties

Two clarifications are needed to understand the effects on simulation towards third parties.

The first issue to be determined even from the very beginning is that, in the field of simulation, the third party term is more comprehensive than that in the principle of relativity matter.

In the field of simulation, the third parties towards the secret act are: unsecured creditors of the parties, successors with particular title, universal successors and successors with universal title, where the simulation is the intended defrauding of their interests.

Secondly, simulation effects differ according to whether third parties in good faith or in bad faith.

Third parties in good faith are the third parties who on the date their interests arose, related to the contract concluded by the participants in simulation, were unaware of the existence of the simulation; third parties in bad faith are therefore those who have found in any way, about both the existence and the content of the simulation[26].

Once these clarifications made, we can say that, according to art. 1290 paragraph 1 Civil Code. the parties cannot invoke the secret contract against the third parties in good faith. But the latter may invoke against the parties of the simulation the existence of the secret contract through actions in simulation (art. 1291 paragraph 2 Civil Code.), as well as they may also invoke the public act, depending on their interests.

Towards third parties acting in bad faith, the parties may only invoke the secret act, but they do not have the same right of option the third parties in good faith have[27].

Moreover, according to art. 1290 paragraph 1 Civil Code., the secret contract cannot be invoked by the parties, by their successors universal, with universal or particular title or by creditors of the person responsible for the disposal apparently against third parties who relying in good faith on the public contract, have acquired rights from the real purchaser.

3.4.4. The effects of simulation among third parties

The issue of the simulation among third parties would arise in a situation where a third party would have interests in evoking the real act, while others cannot evoke the effects of the public act.

The legislator in art. 1291 Civil Code. foresaw two possible situations: 1. the situaiton of the creditors who have started foreclosure on the property which was the material object of the fictional act; in this case, for the unenforceability of the secret act to be, effectively in favor of the unsecured creditors of a real acquirer, it is necessary that, besides the condition of good faith that those creditors have started foreclosure and have registered it in the land register or have obtained a lien on those assets[28]; and 2. the conflict situation between creditors, in which case, from the perspective of the current civil code, not the good faith of the creditors, but rather the debt date would be important; thus, if the date of the debt the creditor has against the fictional person involved in disposal precedes the secret contract, the holder of the claim will provide from the asset of his debtor, but if the date of the debt six arose after the conclusion of the secret contract, the conflict will be settled in favor of the real creditor acquirer[29].

3.5. Action in simulation

Finally, one last point that we would like to discuss within this article is the action in declaring the simulation.

This is the way to disclose the dishonest nature of the public contract and the existence of another contract.

The initiators of the action in declaring the simulation may be the parties, where, for evidence, the general rules on the testimony shall apply, provided by art. 309, 310 C.proc.civ.; or may be third parties, in which case, since it is about proving a legal fact, they will be able to use any evidences.

In addition, as it is an action made by a party or of an action made by a third party, we consider that the extinctive prescription issue will be seen differently.

If the claimant in such an action is a third party, either in good or in bad faith, it is a declaratory action (Art. 35 Civil procedure code) and therefore it is imprescriptible; but if the claimant is a party in the simulation, since the declaration of the simulation is the only means by which the aimed purpose is achieved (performance of the secret contract or even its termination by cancellation, rescission, termination, etc. .), we are in front of an injuction, the prescription being subject to the rules of the purpose action matter.

As to the passive capacity to stand trial, it belongs to all the contracting parties involved in simulation; if the claimant is a third party and the defendant is just one of the parties, the court will have to introduce, under art. 78 C.proc.civ., the other contracting party, for unenforceability to be declared against it, too.

Finally, also as a procedural element, the court members will be established by public act, if it is simulation by fictional act or by disguise (total or partial); but if simulation consisted in interposing a person, the question about the act on which the members of the court will be established cannot raise any more, as the element of difference between the public and the secret act is reprsented by one of the contractual parties, its value is the same[30].

4. Conclusions

Although it currently benefits from a pretty thorough regulation, the legal regime of simulation has not been changed in substance compared to what the legal doctrine and the jurisprudence outlined before 1 October 2011. The legislature kept, as a rule, unenforceability as the main penalty against simulation, put an end to older controversies (the conditions that must be satisfied by the secret for the simulation to take effect), but it has also omitted to deeply focus on the effects of simulation, speaking in principle, only about simulation through fictivity, neither mentioning the disguise nor the interposition of persons.

Of Italian origin, the simulation regulation is welcome in the Romanian legal field, the provisions of the Civil Code being completed with provisions from other special laws.

AN OVERVIEW ON THE TRANSLATIVE VERSUS THE CONSTITUTIVE EFFECT OF THE INHERITANCE PARTITION IN ROMANIA

Silviu-Dorin ŞCHIOPU*

Abstract

Nowadays, the article 995 of the Romanian Code of Civil Procedure regulates the so-called constitutive effect of the partition decision. Although the 2004 draft of the new Civil code stipulated a retroactive (declarative) effect for the inheritance partition, the Amending Commission preferred to formulate the legal effects of partition in this way: each co owner (coheir) becomes the exclusive owner of the assets or, as the case, of the sums of money that were assigned starting only the day established in the partition act, but not before the day of the concluding of the act in case of voluntary partition or, as the case, from the date of the final court decision.

Since the Civil code's perspective seems to imply a translative effect, for a better understanding of the constitutive effect of the inheritance partition, this short overview attempts, on the one hand, to determine if the partition is or not a translative act, and, on the other hand, to examine if a possible translative effect of the property of the partition decision can be reconciled with the constitutive character stipulated in the Code of Civil Procedure.

1. Introduction

The inheritance partition is the operation through which it is put an end to the state of co-ownership between co-heirs, in the sense that the asset or the assets (inherited) mutually owned are divided, in their materiality, among the heirs who thus become exclusive owners of their respective assets[1]. Thus it is replaced the ideal undivided quota on the inherited assets, with exclusive rights of each of the co-heirs on some assets (values) determined in their individuality[2].

The Civil Code from 1864 established the rule of the declarative (retroactive) character of the partition so that each co-heir was presumed to have inherited all by himself/herself and immediately all the assets that composed his/her part and that he/she had never been the owner of the other assets from the inheritance.

The New Civil Code from 2009[3] stipulates, however, that each co-owner (co-heir) becomes the exclusive owner of the assets or, as the case, of the sums of money that were assigned to him/her starting only the day established in the partition act, but not before the day of the concluding of the act, in case of voluntary partition, or, as the case, from the date of the final court decision; and the Civil Code of Procedure stipulates that the partition decision has constitutive effect.

In the doctrine, on the one hand, it is claimed the translative character on property of the partition[4] , and on the other hand, it is claimed that the partition is not an translative act on property, but a constitutive act, because the co-owners who become individual owners of the inherited assets assigned through partition, obtain their rights „directly from the partition act, not as a result of an actual transfer of undivided quotas among co-partitioners"[5]. There are also authors who, even though admit the constitutive character of the partition decision, however claim „the translative effect on property of the partition decision"[6] but without going into details on how this property transfer operates.

Thus, it is not without interest to search within this study to what extent the partition is or not a translative act on property in the light of the Civil Code and if a possible translative effect on property of the partition decision is reconciliable with its constitutive character provisioned by the Code of the Civil Procedure.

2. Joint ownership resulted from inheritance

According to the legal definition provided by the art. 953 from the Civil Code, the inheritance is the transmission of heritage from one deceased physical person towards one or more living persons[7]. The acceptance of the inheritance consolidates the transmission of the heritage rightfully performed at the date of the death. Thus, as a result of the acceptance, the transmission of the inheritance that operated ope legis from the moment of the opening of the inheritance, but provisional, is consolidated by becoming final. In the case of the plurality of heirs a co-owned succession intervenes, each co-heir receiving an ideal quota from his/her right, none of them being the exclusive holder of an asset or of a material fraction of an asset.

Thus, the legal regime of the co-owned succession is governed by two principles: each co-heir has an individual right, absolute and exclusive of his/her quota having as an object the assets in severalty, but none of the co-owners is the exclusive holder of any undivided asset or assets, regarded in their materiality[8]. Therefore, the co-heirs have an abstract quota from each molecule of the inherited assets[9] and the acquisition of this quota takes place retroactively starting with the day of the opening of the inheritance. In the same way, the art. 688 from the Civil Code from 1864 stipulated: „the effect of the acceptance goes up to the day of the opening of the succession".

3. Inheritance partition

The Project of the Civil Code provisioned in the art. 786 that each co-owner becomes the exclusive owner of the assets or, as the case, of the sums of money that were assigned to him/her starting only the day of the partition. However, in the case of the co-owned succession, the rights of exclusive property were considered to be born at the date of the opening of the succession[10]. The inheritance partition regulated in this way was in agreement with the dispositions from the old Civil Code and the ones from the present Civil Code of Québec which in the art. 884, with the marginal name „partition is declaratory of ownership", provisions that „Each co-partitioner is deemed to have inherited, alone and directly, all the property included in his share or which devolves to him through any partial or complete partition. He is deemed to have owned the property from the death, and never to have owned the other property of the succession."

However, the Amending Commission preferred to regulate the partition unitarily, so that in its final form the art. 680 of the Civil Code from 2009 regarding the legal effects of the partition provisions that each co-owner becomes the exclusive owner of the assets or, as the case, of the sums of money that were assigned to him/her starting only from the day established in the partition act, but not before the day of the concluding of the document, in the case of the voluntary partition, or, as the case, from the day of the final court decision. In the case of the estates, the legal effects of the partition take place only if the partition act authenticated or the final court decision, as the case, were entered in the Real Estate Register.

4. The Concept of Translative Effect

In the civil law doctrine it is considered a translative legal act the one that has as an effect the resettlement of a subjective right from the patrimony of one person to the patrimony of another person[11] and which produces the effects only for the future (ex nunc). We mention, as an example, that the Civil Code, art. 1674, regarding the sale contract provisions that, excepting the cases stipulated in the law or if by the will of the parts does not result the contrary, the property will be rightfully moved to the buyer from the moment of the concluding of the contract, even if the asset has not been handed over or the price has not been paid yet, the sale having, therefore, a translative effect on property.

According to art. 17 from the Decree-law no. 115 from 27th April 1938 on the unification of the dispositions regarding the Land Registries, the real rights on estates were obtained only if between the one who gave and the one who received the rights there was an agreement of will on the constitution or the resettlement, under a shown cause, and the constitution or the resettlement was registered in the Real Estate Register.Thus, there was a distinction between constitution, on the one hand, and transmission, on the other hand. We also meet this distinction nowadays, for example in the art. 2617 from the Civil Code according to which the constitution, the transmission or the termination of the real rights on an asset that has changed the settlement are governed by the law of the place where this could be found when the legal fact that generated, modified or terminated the respective right took place; or in art. 936 which, also, makes a distinction between the constitutive and translative legal acts.

5. The Concept of Constitutive Effect

5.1. Civil Law

The Civil Code uses the term constitution regarding the mortgage (art. 2353, 2358, 2387, 2406), the superficie (art. 693), the usufruct (art. 710, 721), the right to manage (art. 868), the right of concession (art. 872), the right to use free of charge (art. 874), the creation of a deposit (art. 2191 and 2192) or of a society (art. 1882). That is why, in the civil law doctrine it is considered a constitutive legal act that gives birth to a civil right that did not previously exist[12]. Thus, it is placed in opposition the translative civil legal act (through which a pre-existent right is transferred), on the one hand, and the constitutive legal act (that gives birth to a right that did not previously exist), on the other hand[13].

5.2. Judicial Civil Law

In the matter of civil procedure, through the constitutive court decision of rights we understand that decision through which it is created a state law that is different from the one existing so far, a new legal situation[14] and which produces effects only for the future. In the doctrine of civil procedural law there is no discussion on a different category of translative court decisions of rights[15], but only on declarative or constitutive decisions of rights, the last ones being the ones which create, modify or terminate a certain legal status, thus give birth to a new legal situation[16].

5.3. Case Law

In jurisprudence it was stipulated that „the transmission of the real right that constitutes the object of the legal act subject to registration [in the Real Estate Register] is produced, in the system regulated by the Decree-law no. 115/1938, only because of the constitutive effect of the registration."[17] In the same decision it is provisioned that „the constitutive effect (attributive) of the registration means, according to the same old law, the unconditional birth of the real right (jus in re)".

However, according to art. 17 from the Decree-law no. 115 from 27th April of 1938 on the unification of the dispositions according to the Land Registries, the real rights on the real estates were acquired only if between the one that gave and the one that received the right there was an agreement of will on the constitution or the resettlement, under a shown cause, and the constitution or the resettlement was registered in the Real Estate Register. The normative act does not mention „the constitutive effect of the registration", this phrase being indubitable a creation of the doctrine, taken over by the jurisprudence, as we could see.

In the mentioned decision there is a confusion of terms which is mostly manifested through the technology used. Thus, we signal the fact that the constitutive effect mentioned in the above decision also regards the translative effect, without deducting it distinctively from the first one. Practically, at the moment when the doctrine and the jurisprudence interpreted the provisions which mention the constitution and the resettlement of the real rights on estates reunited the constitutive and the translative effect into one phrase, that of constitutive effect, phrase used indifferently both in relation to the constitution of new rights, as well as in relation to the transfer of the preexistent rights.

6. The Effects of the Inheritance Partition

In the legislation previous to the Civil Code from 1864, the Calimach Code stipulated in art. 1092 that „the inheritance partition had a buying power". In the doctrine it was considered that the partition regulated in the Calimach Code had either a constitutive effect (which would have as a consequence a transfer of rights among the co-owners)[18], either attributive or translative[19].

According to the recent doctrine „[...] in the New Civil Code it was dropped the declarative effect of the partition in favour of the constitutive effect. The consequence is that the legal act of partition marks a transfer of rights among co-owners, which emphasises the character of disposition of this act", „[...] the partition has a constitutive effect, assuming a transfer of rights among co-owners" and „as a result of the constitutive effect of the partition, among the co-owners there is a mutual transfer of rights"[20]. Thus, according to this opinion, just because of the constitutive character of the partition the mutual transfer of rights among co-heirs would take place.

On the other hand, it is claimed that the partition itself is not a translative act of property, but the partition act is a constitutive one which „gives birth to a new legal situation, different from the previous one, its effects not being either translative of property, or declarative"[21]. As a result, the constitutive character of the partition would exclude the actual transfer of undivided quotas among co-heirs.

According to art. 557 from the Civil Code, the right of ownership may be acquired, under the law, through legal or testamentary inheritance. In addition, the real rights, when they come from the inheritance, are acquired without registration in the Real Estate Register, but, according to art. 887 from the Civil Code, the holder of the rights acquired like that could dispose of them through the Real Estate Register only after the registration has been made.

Consequently, if the deceased left two estates and two heirs, each heir who accepts the succession has an undivided right (for example, a quota of ½) on each of the two estates, the acceptance of the inheritance consolidating the rightful transmission of the inheritance at the date of the death.

If as a result of the partition, one heir receives an estate and the second heir receives the other estate, because there is a stipulation regarding the legal effects of the partition art. 680 from the Civil Code that each co-owner becomes the exclusive owner of the estate only if the partition act authenticated or the final court decision, as the case, were registered in the Real Estate Register, each heir would acquire the right of property on the other ½ of the quota from the moment of the registration in the Real Estate Register[22].

Even though the Civil Code does not stipulate the way in which the co-owner heir becomes „the exclusive owner", we consider that the exit of the quota on the estate assigned through partition from one heir's patrimony to the other heir will be done as a result of the transmission of the right of property as an effect of the partition act, so that the heir to which the real estate was assigned would be the successor in title of the deceased with a quota of ½; in what concerns the rest of the asset, he/she would acquire the undivided part from his/her co-heir, in the exchange of his/her own part of the other estate. Consequently, in the light of the civil law, the partition act can only be translative of rights.

However, art. 995 from the Civil Code of Procedure expressly stipulates that the partition decision has a constitutive effect. How should we interpret this constitutive effect? In the light of the civil law, according to which the constitutive legal act gives birth to a right which did not previously exist or according to the doctrine of the civil procedural law which considers to be constitutive a decision through which it is created a state of law different from the one already existing? This provision, regarding the right of property on the inherited assets, should only be interpreted in the sense that each co-owner becomes the exclusive owner of the assigned assets, meaning in the sense of creating a new legal situation, not in the sense that the right of property on the inherited assets assigned to an heir would have been constituted (as if it did not previously exist) through the partition decision.

The right of property may also be acquired, according to paragraph (1), final part from the art. 557 from the Civil Code, through court order, when it is translative of property by itself. Since the constitutive[23] or attributive[24] court orders give birth or transfer some rights and only these orders can be translative of property, as it is required in the art. 557 from the Civil Code, so they are part of the ways of acquiring the right of property[25], from the corroboration of art.557 from the Civil Code with art. 995 from the Civil Code of Procedure, we can only conclude that the partition decision is translative of rights, the translative effect being inscribed in the constitutive effect provisioned in the Civil Code of Procedure. However, the partition decision will not have translative effect, too, but exclusively constitutive effect regarding the balance payments or, as the case, the sums dued to the other co-owners as a result of the attribution of an asset to one of the co-partners, respectively, the ones dued to this ones as a result of the sale of the asset or of the assets subject to partition[26].

7. Conclusions

Given the fact that the Civil Code of Procedure is subsequent to the Civil Code, the effect of the partition is always constitutive. However in the matter of the succession partition the translative (attributive) effect is included in the constitutive effect because, at the opening of the inheritance, the heirs acquire their indeal quota based on the translative effect of rights, becoming exclusive owners, in the equivocal expression of the Civil Code, only through the constitutive effect of the partition.

In the end, we must mention that the distinction between the translative and the constitutive effect of the partition is relevant not as much in the matter of the civil law, but especially in the matter of the tax law. The Fiscal Code (Law no. 227/2015), in art. 111, regarding the incomes from the transfer of the real estates from the personal patrimony made a distinction between the constructions of any kind with the related lands, as well as the lands of any kind without constructions, acquired within a period of 3 years included, on the one hand, and the ones acquired on a date longer than 3 years, on the other hand.

Following the recent changes of the Fiscal Code by Emergency Ordinance no. 3 from 6th January 2017 for the modification and completion of Law no. 227/2015, when transferring the right of property and of its dependent parts, through legal acts among living persons on the constructions of any kind and the related lands, as well as on the lands of any kind without constructions, the tax payers currently owe a tax which is not calculated differently depending on the moment of acquisition anymore, but by applying a flat of 3% to the income tax, the latter being established through the deduction of the transaction value of the non-taxable sum of 450.000 lei, so that only what surpasses this limit will be subject to tax.

Although the time of the acquisition of a quota from an inherited asset does not seem to have a practical relevance anymore, however, we do not exclude that in the future it might reacquire it, to the extent that there will appear legal norms whose application will need to determine the moment of the acquisition of the right of property by the heirs, and their interest will be to prove that the quota was acquired before the partition.

THE REQUIRED FORM OF A PRE-CONTRACT ALLOWING FOR A COURT JUDGMENT TO STAND FOR A SALE CONTRACT

Delia Narcisa THEOHARI[*]

Abstract

A bilateral promissory agreement for sale needs no notarial deed to constitute, in case of non-fulfillment, grounds for the delivery of a judgment which takes the place of a sale contract, a private agreement being sufficient whereas the judgment itself represents the sale contract and both the substantive and formal conditions are therefore satisfied.

Keywords: pre-contract, sale, judgment taking the place of a contract, formal requirements

1. Introduction

This article provides an analysis of the form which a bilateral promissory agreement for sale should take so that, unless fulfilled, it allows for a judgment to be delivered and stand for of the sale contract. This analysis is important because it is a matter of non-unitary judicial practice due to the ambiguity of the legal regulation of the issue at debate.

1.1. The legal regulation

According to Article 1669 (1) Civil Code, if one of the parties to a bilateral promissory agreement for sale unreasonably refuses to conclude the promised contract, the other party may apply for the delivery of a judgment which would stand for a contract, provided that all the other validity conditions are fulfilled.

Furthermore, in accordance with Article 1.279 (3) Civil Code, if the promisor refuses to conclude the promised contract, the court, upon the request of the party that did perform its own obligations, the court may deliver a judgment to stand for a contract, where the nature of the contract allows that and the legal requirements for its validity are fulfilled.

1.2. Legal solutions adopted in judicial practice

By the civil sentence no. 267/2016 delivered by the Court of Blaj in the case no. 173/191/2016, the application of applicant A against respondents B for the delivery of a judgment to take place of the sale contract, was dismissed as unfounded. Among the grounds for its judgment, the first instance court basically held the following: "In accordance with the 1st sentence of Article 1270 (3) Civil Code and the final sentence of Article 1669 (1) Civil Code, the pre-contract subject to examination should have been concluded in notarial deed, given that it envisaged the conclusion of a contract for the transfer of a right in rem in immovable property. Article 1179 (2) Civil Code stipulates that, in so far as the law provides a certain form of the contract, that form should be respected subject to the sanction provided by the applicable law. Article 1244 Civil Code stipulates that, except other cases provided by law, any agreement for the transfer or constitution of rights in rem to be registered with the Real Estate Register should be concluded in the form of an authentic document, under penalty of absolute nullity. Therefore, the respective contract should fulfill all the validity conditions if a judgment to stand for a pre-contract is aimed at. Practically, the notarial deed is not a validity requirement for a pre-contract, but a requirement which, if fulfilled, allows for a judgment to stand for the contract to be obtained."

The Alba County Law Court, before which the appeal against the above-mentioned judgment was pending rule, referred the matter to the High Court of Cassation and Justice for preliminary ruling on certain points of law, based on Article 519-521 Code of Civil Procedure. In support of its referral, the court held the following: "The bilateral promissory agreement for sale is a contract based on which the parties undertake to conclude the sale contract in future, under the terms and with the content already established in the document proving the promise. The parties agree upon their commitment to contract, but they also pre-establish the basic content of the contract to be concluded (the nature, object and price of the contract). However, the two legal transactions cannot be intermixed. The bilateral promissory agreement for sale is not an alienation document and does not transfer any property rights, but generates personal obligations to do, respectively to conclude the promised sale contract. As for the form which a promise of sale should take, the Civil Code does not provide the notarial deed ad validitatem."

At the time of this writing, the High Court of Cassation and Justice had not given a decision on the above-mentioned issue.

[*] PhD Candidate, Faculty of Law, "Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest (email: deliasterescu@yahoo.com).

2. The form of a bilateral promissory agreement for sale

The opinion I share is that a bilateral promissory agreement for sale needs no notarial deed to constitute, in case of non-fulfillment, grounds for the delivery of a judgment which would stand for the sale contract, for the following specific reasons:

1. The law does not derogate from the principle of consensualism in the case of bilateral promissory agreements for sale and neither does it introduce any specific difference as regards the form required for such agreements to produce effects (for obtaining damages, respectively for the delivery of a judgment which would stand for the sale contract).

According to Article 1178 Civil Code, a contract can be merely concluded by the will agreement of the parties unless the law requires a certain formality for its valid conclusion.

The exceptions from the principle of consensualism, among which the notarial deed ad validitatem, are required to be expressly provided by law, as it results from the text specified.

No specific exception is established in respect of the form of a promise of sale and no derogation from the principle at issue is provided.

However, a sale contract for the transfer of a right in rem in immovable property should be concluded as an authentic document, the form being ad validitatem required by Article 1244 Civil Code, which thus regulates an exemption from the principle of consensualism.

Since the promise of sale and the sale itself are two distinct legal transactions, the exception established with regard to the form of the sale cannot also be extended to another legal transaction being not subject to it, because such exception must be applied strictly (exceptio est strictissimae aplicationis).

Moreover, no distinction can be made in the interpretation of the relevant legal texts regarding the required form of the promise of sale so that it could produce each separate legal effect, as no such differentiation is provided by law (ubi lex non distinguit, nec nos distinguere debemus).

Therefore, the opinion[1] according to which, in case of non-fulfillment of the promise to contract, it is sufficient that the agreement takes the form of a document under private signature for the beneficiary to obtain damages, but for the delivery of a judgment to stand for the contract it is mandatory that the promise is made in the form of an authentic document, finds no solid legal support to give the interpreter the right to differentiate.

Thus, according to Article 1669 (1) Civil Code, if one of the parties that concluded a bilateral promissory agreement for sale unreasonably refuses to conclude the promised contract, the other party may apply for the delivery of a judgment to stand for the contract, provided that all the other validity conditions are fulfilled.

At the same time, in accordance with Article 1.279 (3) Civil Code, if the promisor refuses to conclude the promised contract, the court, upon the request of the party that fulfilled its own obligations, may deliver a judgment to stand for the contract, where the nature of the contract allows that and the legal requirements for its validity are fulfilled.

From the interpretation of the correlation of the two legal texts it results that the court may deliver a judgment to stand for the sale contract, if at the time of such delivery the validity conditions of the sale are fulfilled.

The validity conditions for the sale of an immovable property refer to the consent, object, cause, capacity and form, but other special requirements expressly provided for certain types of sale could possibly exist.

The specified text uses the words "if all the other validity conditions are fulfilled" while in its content it mentions the "refusal" of one party to conclude the promised contract (the refusal being related to the condition of consent), as well as the right to obtain a judgment with the value of a contract (judgment which gives the form of the contract).

Therefore, the "other validity conditions" include the remaining requirements provided by law for the valid conclusion of a sale contract, with the exception of those which the text already refers to, namely the respondent's consent to sell and the form of the sale contract.

As a consequence, there was no need for the legislator to make any distinction as regards the substantive conditions and, respectively, the formal conditions of the sale, since the text subject to analysis contains the reference to the form which is given by the judgment itself, all the other conditions remained to be analyzed being substantive.

2. When the legislators wanted to impose the notarial deed of a promise to contract, they expressly regulated this requirement; per a contrario, in the other cases, such as the promise of sale, there was a certain intention of derogation from the principle of consensualism.

According to Article 1014 (1) Civil Code, under penalty of absolute nullity, the donation promise is subject to formalization in notarial deed.

Therefore, the Civil Code established the notarial deed ad validitatem only for donation promises, there being no specific regulation in the case of promises of sale.

Since both the sale of an immovable property and the donation constitute formal legal transactions and the legislator understood to regulate derogating formal requirements only for the donation promises, the argument raised by the relevant literature[2] - in the sense that, in the case of formal contracts, the validity of promises to contract is conditional on the fulfillment of the same formal requirements as the promised contract, as it would result from the provisions of Article 1014 (1) Civil Code – cannot be accepted, as these provisions, interpreted per a contrario, constitute an argument in favor of the opinion I am supporting.

3. Regulating the right to obtain a judgment that takes the place of a sale contract, the Civil Code essentially provided another means to conclude sales, different from a notarial authentic document, which makes irrelevant the fact that a certain judgment may or not be fully treated as an authentic document.

Since the Civil Code expressly allows for the delivery of a judgment which takes the place of a sale contract, while Article 888 of the same code lists, among other documents (together with the notarial authentic document), the final judgment as grounds for the right to register a title to property, it is useless to analyze if such judgments can or cannot be qualified as authentic documents.

The sale is equally valid and the right in rem may as well be registered with the Real Estate Register where the parties conclude a sale contract in a notarial deed or a judgment is delivered to stand for a contract.

Therefore, under the law, the judgment is sufficient in itself, whether it qualifies or not as an authentic document, to constitute a valid sale contract that can allow for the registration of the right in rem with the Real Estate Register.

Taking into account that the judgment takes the place of the contract, the judgment itself also constitutes the form established by law for the contract concluded in a specific manner.

4. The judgment taking the place of a sale contract is a transfer of rights, not s declaration of rights document and the legal action for which it was delivered is an injunction, not a declarator, so that the terms of the sale will be analyzed by reference to a time different from the time when the promise of sale was concluded.

This argument results from the fact that the rights and obligations of the parties, deriving from the sale contract, arise out of the judgment taking the place of the contract, as they were absent at the time of its delivery.

A sale contract is considered concluded at the time the judgment remains final, not at the expiry of the deadline established in the promise of sale for the conclusion of the contract.

The judgment taking the place of the sale contract constitutes the in-kind remedy for the enforcement of the obligation to do (to conclude the sale contract), arising out of the promise of sale.

Based on the above, the court before which the matter was brought for the delivery of a judgment to stand for the contract checks the validity of each of the two legal transactions (sale and promise of sale) by reference to the time of conclusion of each transaction, as follows:

a) the existence of the validity conditions of the sale by reference to the time when the judgment was delivered, on the one hand, and
b) the existence of the validity conditions of the promise of sale by reference to the time of its conclusion, on the other hand.

a) From the first category of conditions required to be fulfilled for the conclusion of the sale, the court checks the object, the cause of the sale in the applicant's view, the capacity of the parties, and possibly other special conditions established for the sale.

Within such examination, the court does not check:

- the respondent's consent to the sale, as it is this consent which is judicially substituted, the respondent expressing his refuse to conclude the sale;
- the cause of the sale in the respondent's view, as this and the consent are part of the complex phenomenon of legal agreement and they cannot be dissociated one from another in this particular case;
- the form of the sale, as it is the judgment the court is going to deliver that will give the form of the contract.

Even if the derived object of the sale (immovable property) is indicated in the promise of sale, it does not mean that the objects of the two legal transactions are identical. On the contrary, the object of the promise of sale refers to the future conclusion of the contract, for the sale of an immovable property, while the sale refers to the transfer of the ownership right over that property. The derived object of the sale constitutes only a fine-tuning of the object of the promise of sale.

If all the validity conditions of the sale were evaluated at the time the promise of sale is concluded, it would mean, for example, that the court can also deliver a judgment to stand for the sale contract in the case the property was removed from the civil registry and declared inalienable after the conclusion of the transaction, which cannot be admitted.

As regards the capacity of the parties, the court will evaluate, in a manner similar to that of a notary public, if the parties can sell, respectively purchase at the time of the sale conclusion, not at the time of the promise of sale.

This entire reasoning given for each separate condition is only reminded to show that the form of the sale can neither be related to the time the promise of sale is concluded.

The mere notarial deed of the pre-contract cannot substitute the notarial deed of the sale. If the parties had concluded the promise of sale in an notarial deed and the sale contract in the form of an authentic document under private signature, such a sale would also have been null due to the lack of the form established by law ad validitatem.

In the case subject to analysis, the form of the sale is given by the judgment, whether or not the pre-contract was concluded in an notarial deed; this is similar to a conclusion of the sale by the parties before a notary public, in which case the legal form of the pre-contract has no relevance.

b) From the second category of conditions necessary for the conclusion of a promise of sale, the court examines all the requirements established by law for the conclusion thereof, in terms of consent, object, cause, capacity, form and possibly special conditions.

As for the form of the promise of sale, as indicated above, the law does not lay down any exceptions from the rule of consensualism.

As far as the respondent's consent requirement is concerned, the court may check the validity of the consent at the time the promise of sale was concluded, as it is substantively shown in the relevant literature3, as absolute nullity can be invoked by way of substantial law exception, whose appropriateness could lead to the unfounded rejection of the application for the delivery of a judgment to stand for the contract. The respondent is also entitled to invoke, besides the absolute nullity, the relative nullity arising from the existence of some vices of consent, either by means of a counterclaim or a nullity defense on the substance of the case.

5. The consent given at the time of the conclusion of a sale is different from the consent given upon the conclusion of the promise of sale, therefore one cannot hold that the failure to respect the notarial deed at the time of the conclusion of the promise of sale shall result in the invalidity of the consent to the sale[4].

At the time the pre-contract of sale is concluded, the parties express their consent to the future conclusion of a sale contract, but at the time of the sale conclusion the parties give their consent to the transfer of the ownership right over a property form one patrimony into another.

The existence and validity of the respondent's consent to the sale conclusion is not examined at the time of delivery of a judgment taking the place of a sale contract, as the respondent has already refused to conclude the contract, his consent to the sale being totally absent. Instead, the court will check the respondent's consent at the time the promise of sale was concluded, as representing his agreement for the future conclusion of a sale.

6. The reasons doctrinally referred to, for which the notarial deed ad validitatem is established by law for certain legal transactions do not subsist in the case of a pre-contract of sale.

Thus, the reasons for the establishment of the notarial deed ad validitatem, deduced in the legal doctrine, are intended to remind the parties of the special importance of certain legal transactions for their own patrimonies and to exercise a control of the society, by the state bodies, in respect of the civil law transactions whose importance exceeds the strict interests of a party.

However, these reasons do not maintain in the case of a pre-contract of sale, because:

- a pre-contract of sale creates just a claim, as no effect of property transfer being produced based on such pre-contract;
- if in the promise to sale document the parties established a confirmatory deposit as penalty for the refusal to conclude the sale contract, while the beneficiary of the promise claims a specific deposit, in which case the form of a document under private signature is sufficient for the promise, and if implicitly there is no warning from the notary public, the loss of the party that fails to respect the pre-contract is higher than in the case of a judgment delivered to stand for the contract, when the party refusing the conclusion thereof receives the full price of the immovable property in exchange to the property and could possibly be obliged to only pay the legal expenses;
- there is no requirement for a pre-contract to stipulate the risk of a judgment being delivered to stand for the contract in case the pre-contract is not respected, therefore even if the parties are not warned about such a risk (either orally by the notary public, or in the text of the document), the court will still be entitled to deliver a judgment, the lack of warning making no difference;
- the control of the society in terms of a sale contract is exercised through the courts.

7. The argument deduced from the claimed similarity between the case subject to analysis and the real contract would not be admitted as long as the real contract cannot be created without the transfer of a property and through a judgment no such condition would be substituted; instead, the form of the sale contract may be represented by the judgment itself which, according to law, not only takes the place of the contract, but is also able to allow for the registration of the ownership right with the Real Estate Register.

Since the transfer of property is assimilated to a formal requirement for the real contract and this requirement cannot be substituted through the judgment which takes the place of the contract, as in the case of real estate sales, it was normal for the legislator to lay down the obligation that such requirement be fulfilled at the time the judgment is delivered.

8. The amendment of Article 5 (1) of Law no. 17/2014 cannot constitute, in itself, an argument to unambiguously establish the intention of the legislator at the time the notarial deed requirement was removed from its text.

Article 5 (1) of Law no. 17/2014, as unamended, established a condition additional to those of the Code, namely the notarial deed of pre-contracts for the sale of lands located outside a built-up area.

[4] In this respect – D. Chirică, op. cit.

It cannot be considered with certainty that the amendment of this text in the sense of removing the notarial deed requirement is based on grounds related to the avoidance of tautology, whereas:

9. - the initial form of the text indicated Article 1669 Civil Code even in the provision, for which it seems that the text rather imposed a condition additional to those stipulated in the Code;
10. - in the absence of other arguments, the removal of the provision on the notarial deed cannot be justified on the assumption that the legislator initially breached the legislative technique rules, but rather that the article at issue imposed an additional condition which was then waived, as there was no reason for a derogation from the Code.

3. Conclusions

For all these specific reasons, I believe there is no need that a bilateral promissory agreement for sale takes an notarial deed in order to be able, in case of failure, to constitute grounds for the delivery of a judgment taking the place of the sale contract and that the form of a document under private signature is sufficient.

THE OBJECT OF LEASING OPERATIONS

Raluca Antoanetta TOMESCU*

Abstract

The leasing operation according to article 1, paragraph (2) of Government Ordinance 51/1997 covers movable or immovable property by their nature or which become movable by destination and by the definition of the leasing operation that the legislator offers in the same law, the leasing operation appears to be reduced to signing a lease agreement. But as practice proves, and recognized by part of the legal doctrine, leasing operations cannot be reduced only to the conclusion of the lease agreement. If the lease agreement represents the materialization of the will of the parties (lender and user), it is fact only a stage (final stage) of several operations that precede and accompany the leasing operations along their development. It is recognized in the doctrine that within the leasing operations we have a sequence of operations and contracts without which the final act, namely the lease agreement would not exist. We are referring to the sale-purchase contract signed by the financier with the supplier of goods, the mandate contract of the financier concluded with the user and the actual funding contract, the last two coexisting in the wording of the lease agreement.

Through the study developed, we aimed to individualize concretely the specific subject of each of these legal operations, with the intention of consolidate the own identity of the lease agreement and of the leasing operations implicitly.

Keywords: leasing, leasing operation, the purpose of the contract, the object of the obligation

Romanian civil law doctrine uses phrases such as "object of the contract", "the object of the obligation", "the object of the benefit ", but without referring each time, to the legal meaning of each of them. So frequently we are giving the same interpretation both to the legal notion of object of the contract as well as to the object of the obligation. This confusion has been possible due to the legal definition given by the legislator in Article 962 of the old Civil Code, which by taking over the wording in Article 1126 of the French civil code specifies that "the object of the contract is that which one party undertakes to give or one party undertakes to do or not do[1]."

The current Civil Code, inspired by the new regulation of the Civil Code of Quebec[2] defines in Article 1225, paragraph 1 the concept of object of the contract as "the legal operation, such as the sale, rental, lending and other such agreed by the Parties, as revealed by all rights and contractual obligations" and Article 1226 defines by means of the legislature distinctly the object of the obligation, as the services undertaken to be performed by the debtor thereby eliminating any confusion, being offered a possible, clear rule.

Legal literature on the subject, states by means of the view expressed by most authors that "the subject of the civil legal act is itself the object of the civil legal relationship born of that legal act, conduct of the parties namely the actions and inactions to which they are entitled or which they must meet"[3] completed by the situation in which the conduct refers to a good, it is said that the good forms the derived object of the civil legal act. Therefore, it is considered that the object of the civil legal act coincides with the object of the civil legal relationship which was born (amended or extinguished) of that legal act[4].

Finding ourselves thus before a complex concept, in my opinion, it must be defined as accurately as possible, and then to distinguish clearly between the object of the contract, the object of the obligation and the object of the benefit, distinction imposed in terms of the codification of the European contract law which requires a unified legal terminology.

As prescribed by the new Civil Code, which provides in Article 1226, paragraph 1 that "the object of the obligation is the benefit that the debtor undertakes to provide" it lead us to conclude that the provisions contained in the subsequent norm or paragraph 2 of the same text, belong to the benefit and not to the object of obligation, this relation to benefit and not to the object being thus found in all the statutory provisions which underlie the establishment of the provisions inserted in the new Civil Code[5].

Returning to the topic proposed for debate in this study, I am opportune to detail in a summary the leasing operations so we can individualize the object characteristic to each action.

Leasing is clearly a complex operation, which is performed in several stages that precede, accompany and succeed this operation, the lease agreement itself being just one of those stages. In this context, the doctrine argues that "the leasing operation" is a complex of legal relationships, which includes, besides the actual lease agreement, all other legal consequences springing from the conclusion of the contract.

The lease agreement is recognized universally to be an original contract, freestanding, built under several legal concrete operations which imply the existence of several parties, which due to the common economic aims are interrelated to each other, forming a unitary whole with an own, particular legal physiognomy.

Apodictically the "triangular" legal operation of the leasing involves the existence of three parts which interact in legal terms: the seller of the good (supplier), the buyer of the good (financier / lessor usually a leasing company) and the user (lessee) [6].

Therefore, this tripartite transaction involves a manufacturer or a supplier of goods, a financier / lessor, namely the leasing company and a lessee / user, be it a natural person or a legal person.

But as noted above, the lease agreement involves some ancillary contracts that participants conclude, and among them there are: the contract between the supplier and financier / lessor (sale and purchase or novation), the insurance contract of the property that is the object of the leasing, the mandate between the lessor / financer and the lessee / user (lease agreement).

Although according to some authors[7], it is alleged that a leasing operation can be mistaken for the conclusion of a lease agreement, the leasing operation cannot be reduced only to the conclusion of this contract. The two concepts cannot be mistaken for one another, because they do not have the same scope, the Romanian legislature, in fact, making a clear distinction between the normative provisions, between the leasing operation concept and the lease agreement[8].

The codification enacted by developing G.O. no. 51/1997 in an updated form, dissociates clearly in terms of terminology, the lease agreement, on the one hand and from the leasing operations, on the other hand[9].

Article 1 of the Ordinance defines leasing operations: "(1) This Ordinance shall apply to leasing operations whereby one party, called the lessor / financer, transmits for a fixed period the right to use an asset, whose owner he/she is to the other party, lessee / user, at his request, for a periodical payment called leasing rate, and at the end of the lease, the lessor / financer undertakes to respect the right of option of the lessee / user to buy the good, to extend the lease agreement without changing the nature of the leasing or to terminate the contractual relationship. The lessor / user may choose to purchase the property before the end of the lease, but not earlier than 12 months if the parties so agree and if they pay all obligations under the contract. "

From the definition given by the legislator we retain therefore, that the legal relationship which materializes and leads to completion of the leasing operations through a lease agreement consists of the transmission of the right of use of an asset over a specified period by its owner, in this case the lessor / financier, to the lessee/ user for a periodic payment, called leasing rate.

The object of this specific legal relationship appears to be the duty of the lessor / financer, to give for use to the lessee / user the immovable object as derivative benefit, legally provided that at the end of this period to respect the right of option of the lessee / user to purchase the asset, extend the lease agreement or return the property, which is the very essence of the entire operation.

From this perspective we can note as an additional argument brought to the purpose for which the legislator in the text of the normative act regulating leasing operations, uses the terminology adopted in the current form of GO 51/1997, respectively financier / lessor and user / lessee. As shown in the text of article 1, which defines the leasing operation in terms of the conduct that parties must have following the conclusion of the lease agreement, the object of contract is the granting to use, term which in our view defines the lease.

The ordinance specifies in Chapter III dedicated to the obligations incumbent to the parties participating in a leasing operation, namely in Article 9. that – The lessor / financer undertakes: a) to observe the right of the lessee / user to choose the supplier of goods, according to its interests; b) to contract the good with the supplier designated by the lessee / user, under the terms expressly stated by it or, where appropriate, to receive the right to permanently use the computer program. Under this codification the rule of conduct imposed is drawn, therefore the lessor / financer which is required to contract the good only with the supplier indicated by the lessor / user, under the conditions negotiated by him as the object of the obligation.

Given the duty imposed by the legal norm, the financier will not do anything but conclude with the supplier a contract for the sale and purchase of a property, the object of the benefit in their own name but for the use of another, namely of the user which will show the data necessary for its individualization. This course leads us to the contract of mandate, which will subsist in the lease agreement and by means of which the user mandates the financier to purchase a specific property for its use (Article2009, Article2013 paragraph 2, Article 2014 Civil Code).

[7] "We believe, however, that the rigid dissociation of the leasing operation from the lease agreement is not always pertinent, as one cannot ignore the totality of acquired rights and obligations assumed even if only by the two parties (the financier and the user), before or after the conclusion of the lease agreement. These rights and obligations are interrelated, so that only their approach as a whole can lead to the solution according to the purpose of the conclusion" Tita-Gabriel Niculescu - Leasing, C.H.Beck Publishing House, 2006, page 41.

From the definition given by our legislator, the leasing operations develop certain features characteristic to the lease, but a lease affected by the condition of observing the right of option enjoyed by the lessee-user, namely at the end of the lease it has to express their option to purchase the asset, to return the asset or extend the lease agreement on the same terms.

In this regard, depending on the option of the lessee / user, we deduce that the completion of the lease agreement can operate under any of the three aspects, the lessor / financer being obliged to accept the option chosen by the lessee / user.

In case the user opts for returning the good to the rightful owner, the financier will accept the good unreservedly. In this situation I believe that given the perspective offered by the regulations of the new Civil Code, the leasing operation develops a conduct specific to the lease, namely the transfer of the right to use for a specified period, for a specified price (Article 1777 Civil Code) at the end of the period the good re-entering the possession of its rightful owner. As I stated above, I assume that this was also the basis for which the legislature considered it appropriate to change by means of law 284/2008 the name of parts from financier and user as they were called in GO 51/1997 original form, in the financier / lessor or user / lessee as reflected in the updated normative act.

The user is also provided the possibility to opt to extend the lease agreement so that it continue to benefit from a right to use the good for a further fixed period, the consideration of this new use being further the lease rate. The ordinance does not specify whether at the end of this new period of lease, the way in which the contract is concluded provides the same opportunity of option to the user, namely to acquire the good, return it or to continue the lease or if the residual value changes. But by means of the specification performed by the legislature, namely that the extension will operate under the same circumstances, we consider that the user will have the same opportunity this time, to choose between the three variants. The object in this case is certainly the use, the operation being repeated as in the original situation.

The last variant the user has is the option to purchase the good that was the derivative object of the contract, which will require the conclusion of a sale and purchase document between the two parties of the lease agreement. Their conduct will ultimately be reduced to the obligation of the financier which is this time subrogated to the seller, to convey ownership of the property for a price. The price is individualized by the specific rule regulating the leasing operations in the concept of residual value because the transfer of ownership will operate only upon payment, the obligation which is incumbent upon the user being therefore to pay this amount (Article 1650 Civil Code).

Conclusions

The complex nature of the leasing operations, both from an economic as well as from a legal perspective, prompted the assimilation of the lease agreement with various other contracts, sometimes the individuality being ignored.

But to determine the exact legal nature, the corresponding delimitations must be made in relation to the tenancy, credit, loan agreements, and from the sale and purchase agreement (in instalments or upon deadline), contracts the structure of which resembles that of the lease agreement, but which should not be mistaken for this.

It therefore remains to note the main feature of the leasing operation, which lies in its atypical, special character - in that it inserts in its fundamental elements legal features specific to the legal agreement, to the sale and purchase agreement and to the loan agreement, but in no case it must be regarded from their perspective, but it should be seen and accepted individuality, as a combination thereof. Only in the ensemble conferred by their interference we shall find ourselves under the incidence of a leasing operation.

For this, the lease agreement has been described in the research literature as a "sui generis" contract, the followers of this theory relying on its characteristics[10]:

- the lease is a manner of special financing is for the concession of use of the leasing object;
- the lease agreement is not especially regulated by the Civil Code;
- the lease agreement constitutes specific triangular relationship between the provider of the property that is the object of the lease agreement - financer of the leasing operation – the user of the property which is object of leasing operation.

Under the empire of the issues presented in conjunction with the definition of the lease agreement found in the research legal literature, I believe that the object of the obligation of the leasing operation is the full financing of an asset, and the object of performance are immovables by their nature or which become movable by destination, under the civil circuit, except for the audio and video tape recordings, of theatre plays, of manuscripts, patents, copyrights and intangible property, and regarding the agreement cause, we can say that this is the use.

Thus, I believe that a lease operation is the operation whereby one party, called the lessor / financer, will provide funding for the purchase of a property, movable or immovable, in order to transmit for a specified period the right to use it, which it owns, to the other party, lessee / user at its request, for a periodic payment, called leasing rate, and at the end of the lease period the lessor / financer undertakes to respect the right of option of the lessee / user to buy the property, to extend the lease agreement without changing the nature of leasing or to terminate the contractual relationship.

IMMUNITY AND LENIENCY POLICY IN COMPETITION CASES

Ana-Maria UDRISTE*
Adelina VOICU

Abstract

It is fully known that the premises for market economics resides on free competition. In other words, market player must make all the necessary efforts in order to obtain the desired results on their own, through business innovation and increased efficiency. In order to protect this, the competition primary and secondary legislation is carefully tailored to such needs, supporting and protecting the internal market from the companies' tendency to distort competition.
As such, competition law offers the companies' involved in anticompetitive agreements methods to either waive the entire fine or to diminish it considerably. The aim is to encourage companies to bring upfront anticompetitive agreements that aim to distort competition and free market, thus protecting the internal market. The competition law itself does not pursue to sanction players that acted in an anticompetitive manner, but to prevent such behavior, because prevention is more important than reducing the effects afterwards.
In the present paper we aim to make a radiography of the methods of eliminating or reducing a fine that a company have in our national law when it comes to anticompetitive agreements.

Keywords: immunity, sanctions, leniency, anticompetitive agreements, recognition

1. Introduction

In Romania, the Immunity and Leniency Policy in the competition are is still at beginning, as very few cases have seen the light. Even though the fines applied by the Competition Council are very high, are they are settled as a percentage of the company's turnover (between 0.5 and 10), the undertakings that engage themselves in anticompetitive practice still tend to walk past by this opportunity and let the faith (or other undertakings) decide whether getting fined or not.

The present study aims to bring a shed of light in the little-known procedure of Immunity and Leniency. By doing this, we hope that we can make aware undertakings, lawyers and counsels of the advantage this procedure brings so that they can take into account this possibility when discovering that they are part of an alleged anticompetitive agreement. The purpose of the competition regulation is not to "hunt" the undertaking that breach the law, but to ensure that there is a normal competitive environment that will benefit the final consumer. The competition authority acts on two directions: (a) prevention and (b) sanctioning, the latter being activated only when the harm done cannot be reverted. By allowing undertakings to disclose possible anticompetitive agreements for an immunity deal, the competition frame aims to drop a signal with respect to competition enforcement: if more and more companies will apply for immunity deals, more and more undertakings will be fined and fewer anticompetitive agreements or practices will take place. We are still talking about the principle of prevention, but in a long term.

Until now, the subject of Immunity and Leniency Policy in competition law cases remains in shadow, as very few papers have been published on this subject. If such, this institution raised a little bit of awareness if round tables or conference where specialist from the Romanian Competition Council were invited.

In order to do this exhaustive overview of the Immunity and Leniency Policy, we decided to start with a mere introduction of this institution of our national legislation, followed by a step-by-step explanation of the procedure that needs to be followed. Afterwards, we answered some questions that arose in the practice of other competition authorities and are related to our frame regulation that we think it might clarify a few of the potential discussions. Last but not least, we focused on the very fragile case-law we identified in Romania and detailed few comparative elements with other countries of the European Union that have a more developed Immunity and Leniency Policy than we do, with the hope that their practice can shape our future actions.

A. Immunity

1. Introduction & short historic

The immunity policy was developed with the purpose of discovering the secret agreements between economic operators, as well as to eliminate them, these coordinates being subsumed to immediate scope (causa proxima) of the competition legislation, that is the guarantee of a proper functioning of the markets and, subsequently, protecting the consumer through price reduction and quality improvement.

 Student, Faculty of Law, University of Bucharest (email: adelinavoicu1201@gmail.com).

The purpose of the immunity policy is to encourage the acknowledgment of this anticompetitive agreements by the involved companies and inform the competition authorities. On this occasion, the companies will have a greater benefit than the one resulted after the effective sanctioning, post factum, once the "evil" has already produced.

In essence, the immunity policy is a favorable treatment offered by the Competition Council to the economic operators involved in anticompetitive agreements who decide to cooperate with the competition authority by providing them information and evidence, in order to discover the anticompetitive practice.

A very important instrument at European level, the immunity policy was first introduced in Romanian legislation in 2004[1]. In 2009, after Romania became part of the European Union, important amendments were brought to this secondary legislation in order to align it with the European legislation and therefore a new set of instructions were adopted ("Immunity Guidelines")[2]. In 2015, these Guidelines faced few amendments[3] so that they were updated to the latest European tendencies and case-law.

2. General conditions

In Romania, immunity is offered for both horizontal (cartels) as well as vertical agreements[4], such as price fixing, bid rigging, market allocation. Before the 2015 amendment, the parties that were involved in vertical agreements regarding territorial and/or client limitation, which offered absolute protection were also able to apply for immunity, but at the present such provisions have been eliminated.

Even though it is not expressly stated, by means of interpretation we get to the conclusion that the rewarding for economic operators which cooperate with the Competition Council, will only be granted only for the hardcore agreements from art. 5(1) of the Law no. 21/1996 ("Competition Act")[5] and/or art. 101(1) TFEU[6]. As we can clearly observe, the immunity benefit applies to anticompetitive agreements, which means that at least two parties need to be involved in order to have a valid scenario. Thus, an abuse of dominant position cannot be taken into consideration as it is a one-side manifestation from an economic operator and does not imply and agreement[7]. However, it is to be discussed whether when talking about collective dominance we can also take into consideration an immunity deal. Collective dominance, even though is not as common as single dominance, implies that two or more companies linked by economic purposes (which implies an agreement)[8], abuse their dominant position upon the market.

Of course, we also need to take into consideration pct. 3 of the Immunity Guidelines that refers to art. 5(2-3) of the Competition Act and art. 101(3) TFEU, situation where, with respect to this specific type of agreements, the immunity procedure is not applicable. In concreto, we are talking about those agreement that

In this case, point 2 let. a)-b) from the Immunity Guidelines detail the notion of „hardcore restrictions", distinguishing between two categories:

- horizontal agreements and/or concerted practices, between 2 or more competitors, aimed to or having as an effect the coordination of the competition behavior on the market and/or influencing the relevant criteria of the competition frame by adopting practices like price fixing (buy-sell) or some commercial conditions, allocation of the productions and selling market shares, customer or market allocation, bid rigging, import/export restrictions or other anticompetitive acts against competitions; these are called generically cartels;
- vertical agreements and/or concerted practices, regarding the conditions in which the parties can buy, sell or resell certain products or services, that have as object the restraining of consumer's freedom to set it's sell/resell price.

are governed by the Block Exemption Regulation[9], where these agreements create sufficient advantages in order to compensate for the anticompetitive effects and therefore will not being considered as illegal.

Our national law provides 2 types of immunity that can be offered to companies involved in anticompetitive practices: (1) type A immunity and (2) type B immunity.

As a separated notice, we must outline that our national competition provision only sanction companies and not private individuals and therefore the immunity can only be granted to companies.

Immunity Guidelines provide a series of criteria that need to be fulfilled: (a) general ones, that are applicable for both fine immunity as well as fine reduction and (b) special ones, applicable for each procedure.

General criteria

With respect to general criteria that needs to be checked when applying either for immunity or for reduction, these are provided in pct. 19-20 of the Immunity Guidelines and are as follows:

a) real, continuous and prompt cooperation with the Competition Council throughout the entire investigation procedure, respective:

- providing the Competition Council all the necessary and relevant information and evidence the company has or may have regarding the infringement;
- remaining at the Competition Council's disposal to answer any kind of solicitation which might contribute to establishing the deeds;
- the prohibition to destroy, falsify or hide relevant information or evidence regarding the alleged infringement;
- the prohibition to disclose the existence of the immunity request or its content before the competition authority will transmit the investigation report to the parties, if the Competition Council did not state otherwise;

b) stopping the implication in the alleged infringement at the Competition Council's request;

c) not disclosing the company's intention to apply for a immunity deal or any elements of the request, with the exception of other competition authorities.

Immunity

As defined by law (lato sensu), immunity from fine represents the exemption to pay the fine for the companies that are part of an illegal agreement according to art. 5(1) of the Competition Act and/or art. 101 TFEU and decide to disclose their participation to the competition authority. Thus, the immunity deal will be applied to those agreements which have as their object or effect the prevention, restriction or distortion of competition within the national market or on a part of it[10]. This national infringements, as well the European ones, are "by object infringements", which means that the effect of market competition distortion does not need to be demonstrated, as the mere agreement upon this kind of practices is sanctioned.

Art. 5(1) of the Competition Act exemplifies a series of anticompetitive practices and agreements which are the most common in practice:

a) directly or indirectly fix purchase or selling prices or any other trading conditions;
b) limit or control production, markets, technical development, or investment;
c) share markets or sources of supply;
d) apply dissimilar conditions to equivalent transactions with other trading parties, thereby placing them at a competitive disadvantage;
e) make the conclusion of contracts subject to acceptance by the other parties of supplementary obligations which, by their nature or according to commercial usage, have no connection with the subject of such contracts.

Persons excepted from immunity deal

Concerning the economic operators excluded from immunity deal, the Immunity Guidelines[11] state that the initiator is eligible to qualify for immunity while for the undertaking that encouraged others to join or stay in the cartel immunity is 'off limits'.

However, the ringleader may qualify for a fine reduction if it meets the relevant requirements set out in the Immunity Guidelines. Aside from compliance with the usual requirements set out above, in order to benefit from the immunity another important condition is that the ringleader must provide evidence that brings 'significant added value' to the evidence the Competition Council already has.

It should be mentioned that this is a significant progress towards encouraging immunity deals, as before June 2015, neither the initiator of the anti-competitive conduct nor an undertaking that actively encouraged other undertakings to join or remain in the cartel would qualify for immunity.

3. Types of immunity

Our national law regulates, as already mentioned, two types of immunity: (1) type A immunity and (2) type B immunity. This classification is made up according to the moment of time the undertaking asks for immunity: before or after an investigation on behalf of the Competition Council was opened.

[9] Commission Regulation (Eu) No 330/2010 of 20 April 2010 on the Application of Article 101(3) of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union to Categories of Vertical Agreements and Concerted Practices, (01.06.2010).
[10] Art. 5(1) *Competition Act No. 21 as of April 10, 1996 (as Further Republished and Amended).
[11] Pct. 13.

Type A immunity

Regarding type A immunity (i.e. before an investigation is opened), asides the general criteria mentioned above, there are also special requirements that need to be taken into consideration by the undertaking in order to have an eligible application.

These conditions are set out in pct. 9 of the Immunity Guidelines and are, cumulatively, the following:

a) the undertaking is the first one to deliver information and provide evidence that, according to the Competition Council, can be used to open up an investigation and set up mock dawn raids;
b) at the moment the evidence is provided, the Competition Council did not have enough evidence to open un an investigation or to set up dawn raids;

Per a contrario, the undertaking cannot claim type A immunity if the Competition Council has already opened up an investigation or has sufficient evidence to open it up at the moment the request is made. This means that we must always remember that type A immunity takes into consideration the previous situation (ex ante) before opening up an investigation by the competition authority.

However, we consider that these conditions are arbitrary and rely only upon the Competition Council's will to grant the type A immunity as the meaning of "significant information and evidence' relies solely upon the competition authority's interpretation.

Type B immunity

With respect to type B immunity, pct. 11 from the Immunity Guidelines also provides us with the necessary conditions that the undertaking needs to comply with (and which are also cumulative):

a) the undertaking is the first one to provide information and evidence that will allow the Competition Council to identify the infringement in accordance to art. 5(1) of the Competition Act and/or art. 101 TFEU;
b) at the moment the evidence was provided, the Competition Council did not have sufficient elements to establish the infringement according to art. 5(1) of the Competition Act and/or art. 101 TFEU;
c) no other undertaking was granted conditional immunity (type A) related to the alleged infringement;
d) immunity's general requirements are met.

Type B immunity takes place after the investigation procedure was opened by the Competition Council (ex post), situation in which the competition authority is fully aware of the infringement but lacks sufficient evidence in order to sustain it. Thus, the undertaking needs to actively provide information and evidence that can accurately establish the infringement.

Both type A and type B immunity mean that the undertaking that qualifies for them is exempted from paying the fine. Therefore, it is very important to always keep in mind that this kind of full immunity is provided only to one undertaking. In other word, a type A or B immunity for the first claimant exclude the possibility of the subsequent undertaking to benefit from full immunity, but does not affect its chances of obtaining a fine reduction of between 30% and 50%12, as it will be presented in section B.

Procedure

For both kinds of immunity, the applicant must submit a statement in which it should describe as detailed as possible aspects like:

- a detailed description of the alleged infringement, including:
  - the purposes, activities and functioning mechanisms:
  - the products or services involved, geographic area, the duration of the infringement and estimated market volumes affected by the alleged anti-competitive practice;
  - meeting dates and places, the content and the participants at the discussions during the alleged infringement;
  - all relevant explanations regarding the evidence provided for supporting the request;
- name and address of the applicant and of all other undertakings participating or which have participated in the alleged anti-competitive conduct;
- names, positions, locations of the offices, and if necessary, the home addresses of the individuals who, to the applicant's knowledge, are or have been involved in the alleged infringement, including the individuals who have been involved in the name of the applicant;
- a specification that the undertaking has not done anything to constrain other undertakings to join or stay in the alleged anti-competitive arrangement;
- information on the competition authorities from or outside the European Union that have been contacted or that the applicant intends to contact in relation to the alleged anti-competitive practice.

Besides this, according to pct. 21 of the Immunity Guidelines, the applicant must provide the Competition Council, besides statements, all the information and evidence that are in its possession and are connected to the alleged infringement or to hypothetically first present the information it has and subsequently present a descriptive and detailed list of the evidence that are proposed to be revealed. If the information the application provided are meet the conditions set above, then the applicant will be granted conditional fine immunity.

Immunity marker

When seeking immunity, the undertaking has the possibility to contact the designated person of the [12] According to pct. 17 of the Immunity Guidelines.

Leniency Module within the Competition Council (which we will detail below) either directly or via a legal representative by telephone, e-mail, post etc. It is advisable to have such preliminary contact in order for the applicant to know if immunity is still available or not (for example if somebody else already applied for it). If immunity is still available, the undertaking must submit (either by fax or mail) a formal or hypothetical application. On the other hand, if the immunity is not available, the applicant should request a fine reduction.

In this case, the normal question arises: but what happens when the undertaking knows about the infringements, does not have all the necessary information and evidence but can gather them?

As described before, there are two main procedures in which an undertaking can apply for a immunity deal:

a) when it has all the necessary information, the applicant can submit to the Leniency Module or directly the competition authority a statement with all the documents or
b) it can address the Leniency Module its intention, asking for a priority number.

Similar to the "marker" used by the European Commission[13], in Romania, starting with 2010, the Leniency Module has been implemented[14]. The main scope of the Leniency Module is to secure an interface between Competition Council and the undertaking that lodge immunity requests according to Immunity Guidelines. Thus, this module allows an undertaking to collaborate with the competition authority in order to identify and stop alleged infringements until all the necessary information for a completed application are gathered.

The Competition Council, after meeting with the applicant, may decide to grand the marker for a variable case by case period of time (depending on how much it considers that it will take the applicant to gather all the necessary information and evidence in that particular situation)[15]. From practice, the amount of time given is quite short, usually a couple of weeks. Of course, there are no deadlines for the marker application, which means that the competition authority has a sole discretion regarding the amount of time granted to the applicant and can therefore extend the first deadline. However, if the competition council authority decides not to extend the time and the application is not supplemented with the requested information, the application will be rejected. In this case, if the applicant will subsequently decide to submit a new request, it cannot apply for a marker or to submit a hypothetical request, but it must apply for the formal request where it will provide the competition authority all the necessary information and evidence it possesses.

In order to obtain a marker, the applicant must provide the competition authority the following information:

- its name and address;
- the parties involved to the alleged anticompetitive agreement;
- the affected product/s and geographic area;
- the type of the infringement;
- the estimated duration of the alleged anticompetitive conduct;
- the member states where evidence can be found;
- information regarding the existence of other immunity applications (or potential ones) regarding the same alleged anticompetitive practice.

In both cases, the competition authority grand the conditional immunity by a written decision addressed to the applicant and which is not made public until the end of the investigation. After the authority has assessed all the immunity conditions and found out that the applicant fulfill them, it will validate its initial decision. Afterwards, once the competition councils finalize the investigation, the sanctioning decision will be transmitted to the parties and published on the website.

Simplified procedure

The Immunity Guidelines also provide a simplified procedure for those undertakings that apply for immunity in more than one member state[16]. Afterwards, after it is established what competition authority will instrument the immunity case, the undertaking will supplement and submit to this authority the request with all the necessary documentation.

Practical questions

- Does the applicant need to formally admit the infringement?

According to the immunity guidelines, there are no specific provisions regarding the admittance of the infringement by the applicant. It is true that the applicant need to submit a statement containing a detailed description of the deed as well as the participants to it, but at no time does the law require to formally admit the infringement. We may say that the applicant informally recognizes it implications or that its participation is evident.

- Does the applicant need to stop the infringement?

The Immunity Guidelines only state that the applicant will cease its participation in the alleged anticompetitive deeds at the Competition Council's request. This means that, given the fact that the applicant acts like an informant, it may be possible to take part in the alleged agreement, in order to gather further information about the illegal deed until the competition authority considers it has sufficient evidence to start an investigation.

- Does the applicant need to compensate the victims?

As a general rule in our national legislation, there is not an express provision regarding the victim compensation by the parties of an anticompetitive deed. On the contrary, the Competition Act specifically provides that, when there are more participants in an anticompetitive practice, those that applied and where granted immunity will not be jointly liable with the rest of them. The victims need to open a separate claim in court where they can request a compensation as a result of the anticompetitive behavior, provided that they can prove their prejudice according to common provisions.

Domestic provisions are poor with respect to compensation, but further amendment will take place with the transposal of the Directive 2014/104/EU of 26 November 2014 on certain rules governing actions for damages under national law for the infringement of the competition law provisions of the Member States and of the European Union[17]. The Directive should have been transposed by the end of 2016, but no actions have been taken into this direction, with the exception of some public consultation which took place of the draft project and were published on the Competition Council's website.

The main novelty of the above mentioned Directive in the immunity policy is the limitation of liability of the immunity recipient. Accordingly, the immunity recipient will be jointly and severally liable towards direct and indirect purchasers or providers. By exception, when the victim cannot obtain full compensation from the other infringers, the immunity recipient will also be held liable towards other injured parties.

- Can a whistle-blower be considered as an immunity applicant?

According to Competition Act, whistle-blower as those "individuals that provide the Competition Council, on their own initiative, information regarding possible breaches of Competition Law"[18].

As we mentioned in the preamble of this article, only companies are eligible for immunity deals in Romania and not individuals. Therefore, if the undertaking's employee decides to inform the Competition Council upon possible anticompetitive deeds of the company he works with, the undertaking that employs the whistle-blower will not benefit from it.

In this case, in the competition authority finds that he has sufficient evidence from the whistle-blower and decides to open up an investigation or carry out dawn raids, type A immunity is no longer available for the interested parties. However, in certain conditions, type B immunity can also be granted to applicants.

- Does the competition authority provide confidentiality assurance to the immunity applicants?

According to the Immunity Guidelines[19], any statement made by an undertaking to the Competition Council with respect to the immunity procedure is part of the case-file and cannot be used or made public for any other reasons than applying art. 5(1) of the Competition Act and/or art. 101(1) TFEU.

Access to statements is only granted to the involved parties, under the condition that they will make copies (either physical or through electronically methods) of these statements[20]. Furthermore, the Competition Council is obliged to assure, at the undertaking's request, the confidentiality upon its identity until the investigation report is transmitted to the involved parties.

Also, an undertaking that requests immunity but is denied due to prior application of another party will not receive any details from the Competition Council on the identity of the first applicant.

A problem that raised several debates in practice is the potential disclosure of leniency documents in court actions for damages initiated by individuals or companies harmed by the anti-competitive practice. This issue is now settled by the Directive on damages that expressly forbids national courts from requesting a party or a third party to disclose leniency statements in courts. The scope of such procedure is to encourage the undertakings to approach the competition authorities with immunity applications.

- What happens when the competition authority discovers additional anticompetitive practice than the ones submitted by the applicant (either through formal procedure or marker)?

The marker or the acceptance granted by the Competition Council only refers to the participants, anticompetitive deeds and duration indicated by the applicant. If, for example, the first participant applied for an infringement regarding price fixing, a second applicant may as well benefit from immunity if he brings evidence regarding territorial or client allocation, even if its related to the same parties. In this case, the first participant may apply for a fine reduction for the other discovered deeds.

- What happens if a second applicant comes with better information?

The marker or the immunity deal is not revoked if a second participant comes with better information that the first one which already secured an immunity deal.

- Will the applicant be forced to submit client attorney documents?

[17] Directive 2014/104/Eu of 26 November 2014 on Certain Rules Governing Actions for Damages under National Law for the Infringement of the Competition Law Provisions of the Member States and of the European Union., (05.12.2014).
[18] Art. 35 par. (1) of the Competition Act.
[19] Pct. 44.
[20] Pct. 45 of the Immunity Guidelines.

Competition Act expressly recognizes the confidentiality between lawyer and client, mentioning that the following types of documents cannot be used as evidence during the investigation carried out by the Competition Council: the communications between undertaking/association and their lawyers (only lawyers, not in-house counsel), made exclusively with the purpose of exercising the right of defense (before or after the investigation started).

Furthermore, according to the national provisions with govern the activity carried out by lawyers, any communication between the lawyer and the client, irrespective of its support, is confidential.

The Immunity Guidelines only require the applicant to submit the competition authority with the relevant information and evidence for establishing an anticompetitive practice. Moreover, the entire procedure is voluntarily and seen as a benefit for the participants. In the light of these aspects, it is up to the participant whether he will decide to provide the Competition Council with confidential documents that are protected by the client – attorney privilege.

- Can the immunity be revoked?

Although not a common practice, the Competition Council may decide to revoke the conditional immunity at any time until it decides to close the investigation. Some of the reasons for such actions is that the immunity was no longer available or the applicant failed to comply with one or more of the requirements for being granted the immunity deal.

In case this happens, the competition authority will inform the applicant in writing about its decision. Formally, the immunity will be granted of refuse by the Competition Council through the sanction decision issued at the end of the investigation.

If the immunity application was reject, the applicant can challenge the decision in court at the Bucharest Court of Appeal in 30 days from the date it received the sanctioning decision.

B. Leniency

In case the undertaking does not qualify for the immunity deal, it can apply for the leniency program where it can benefit from a considerable reduction of fine.

Undertakings eligible for such reductions are those that can provide evidence of a 'significant added value' in addition to those already available to the competition authority. In additions, the undertaking must comply with the general conditions for the immunity applicants. It is very important that, when submitting a request to the competition authority, the undertaking specifically mentions that the information and evidence provided are for fine reduction and not for immunity. As a general rule, it does not mean than an applicant that was rejected for an immunity deal will be automatically granted a fine reduction. For this, a specifically separated request must be made.

In this case, the reduction in sanctions is at the Competition Council's discretion, the Immunity Guidelines offering only variable limits between under 20% and maximum 50% percent of the fine that would normally be applied. Applicants that comply with the conditions will benefit from the following reductions (taking into consideration the moment of time the undertaking provided the competition authority information that brought `significant added value`): between 30% and 50% for the first undertaking[21], between 20% and 30% for the second undertaking that applies and maxim 20% for all the other undertakings.

In order to determine the reduction level in accordance to the limits previously set out, the Competition Council will take into consideration the time moment the evidence and information were submitted as well the added value they brought[22]. Furthermore, the evidence that allow the establishing of additional facts that increase the gravity or duration of the infringement will be rewarded in the future through their elimination from the fine amount for the undertaking that provided that information.

In case the Competition Council reaches the preliminary conclusions that the evidence and information provided by the undertaking really do bring the significant added value, it will inform the undertaking in writing, no later than the date on which the investigation report is transmitted to the parties.

C. Competition Council's practice

Until the present time, even though at the European level the Immunity Policy is widely used, in Romania is does not the embrace the same success. Up so far, only two cases took advantage of the immunity policy, gaining full immunity:

1. during the investigation of the taxi transport services in Timisoara County[23] and

[21] By the definition of "significant supplementary contribution", the law means, according to pct. 16 of the Immunity Guidelines, the way of measure in which the probative elements, unknown until that moment, that are offered by an undertaking, consolidates, through their own, the Competition Council's ability to demonstrate the existence of the alleged agreement. In this evaluation, the Competition Council considers that, in general, the written probative elements from the period the alleged facts took place have a higher contribution than the ones from a subsequent period. Probative elements that are directly linked to the facts will be considered to be more important than the ones indirectly linked to the facts. Similarly, there will be taken into consideration the implementation to corroborate the elements brought with other sources, so that the respective elements can be successfully administrated during the investigation. Thus, the conclusive elements will be considered as having a significant supplementary contribution than the probative elements such as statements, which require the verification and corroboration with other sources if they are contested.

2. where companies where fined for a bid rigging in the bid organized by S.N.G.N. ROMGAZ S.A[24].

In the first case, the first company who brought significant evidence and disclosed the anticompetitive agreement to the Competition Council, Radio Taxi, received full immunity. The second company that brought significant evidence received a fine reduction of 50%.

In the second case, the fines were of 2.9 mil EUR. It was the first investigation opened as a result of an immunity request. The company obtained full immunity for cooperation with the Competition Council.

D. Elements of comparative law

It is well known that, in what concerns competition rules, they are similar to most member states of the European Union, as according to art. 3 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, the establishing of the competition rules necessary for the functioning of the internal market is the exclusive competence of European Union. This means that EU provides the framework for competitive activity in order to ensure that there is no distortion or restriction of competition in the market by applying the same rules to all companies operating on the internal market. Obviously, it follows that, in subsidiary, each state aligns its regulations with the requirements of the European level. For these reasons, we believe that a brief overview focused on the main points of difference between Romanian legislation and other states rules should be made, which is why we relate to France, Germany and Great Britain, countries with a consistent practice in competition law.

In line with our laws is also German and French legislation where the first applicant to qualify for leniency will be granted full immunity from fines provided they comply with the obligation to fully and continuously cooperate with the authority. Since 2006, the French Competition Authority has granted full immunity in nine of the ten decisions in which it applied its leniency program.

In what concerns the UK, rules are slightly different. First of all, it should be mentioned that there are several authorities with responsibilities in competition law. The first and most important is the Competition and Markets Authority (CMA). In parallel with the CMA, separate regulatory bodies hold concurrent powers to enforce UK law prohibitions against anti-competitive agreements. These regulatory bodies include the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA), the UK financial services regulator, as well as agencies with oversight of the energy markets (Ofgem) and water and sewerage providers (Ofwat). Unlike the other two jurisdictions mentioned above, in the UK there are two immunity regimes operated by the CMA: (i) a civil regime for undertakings under the Competition Act 1998 and (ii) a criminal regime for individuals under the Enterprise Act 2002. Both regimes operate side by side in circumstances where an undertaking seeks complete immunity from civil fines and criminal immunity for its current and former personnel. We also find here type A and type B immunity, according to the moment of time the undertaking asks for immunity: before or after an investigation on behalf of the CMA was opened.

An interesting fact regarding granting immunity after an investigation begins we found in France, where the competition authority will publish a press release after each dawn-raid it carries out in order to allow undertakings that were not visited to be informed that an investigation is underway in their sector and to apply for leniency. This way, the precautionary principle that characterizes competition law is emphasized, giving operators the opportunity to report certain forbidden behaviors before being subjects of inspections carried out by the authority. Such a mechanism is rightful if we consider that, in other countries, there is a general practice for companies to apply for leniency.

In Germany on the other side, the leniency program sets out different eligibility requirements for leniency depending on whether the application is made before or after the competent authority (FCO) has gathered sufficient evidence to obtain a search warrant. In practice, the relevant point in time for the distinction is often the beginning of the dawn raid. The first applicant who submits information that enables the FCO to obtain a search warrant will automatically be granted immunity provided that he complies with the obligation to cooperate going forward.

Moreover, while in Romania, France and Germany an explicitly admission of a violation of law is not required to qualify for leniency, as it results when the undertaking provides a corporate statement which includes a detailed description of the organization of the alleged arrangement. Therefore, in fact, the applicant acknowledges a violation of law. In the UK recognition is part of the admission requirement. Also, in the context of criminal offence, we are dealing with an individual applicant who must admit participation in the criminal offence. So, in this case, law incriminates individuals, rather than companies who enter into certain anticompetitive agreements.

The primary intention was to create a deterrent to cartel activity by threatening imprisonment (for a maximum of five years) for executives whose unlawful activities had previously carried only the threat of civil action against their company.

Related to the question whether an applicant can qualify or not for leniency if one of its employees reports the conduct to the authority first, the situation appears to be resolved by the fact that this procedure applies to undertakings. So, among the conditions that have to be fulfilled to successfully apply for immunity, the employee must be mandated by the undertaking to be considered as its representative and to qualify the undertaking.

However, an application made by an individual explicitly only in his own name or without authorization to represent a company will not cover the company. In this scenario, type A immunity will no longer be available for the company if the competition authority finds the information provided by the whistle-blower to be sufficient in order to open an investigation or carry out dawn raids. Type B immunity will still be available provided that the undertaking meets the requirements for accessing it. In the UK the CMA wishes to increase the pressure on undertakings to report collusive conduct by offering an individual who comes forward with information about cartels a £100,000 reward.

Last but not least, under the Romanian Competition Law the leniency program covers only companies or business associations, while in German or French legal system the authority can fine not only companies, but also individuals who have represented or supervised the company, for their respective participation in a cartel. If a person authorized to represent an undertaking files an application for leniency, the authority rates this also made on behalf of the individuals participating in the cartel as current or former employees of the company.

Another difference noticed is that, unlike the competition rules in Romania, in France, England and Germany is regulated a settlement process that allows early settlement of civil liability for companies in cartel cases, vertical agreements or other fine proceedings. This settlement process is distinct from the aforementioned leniency policy.

Conclusions

As we can see from the present papers, the Immunity and Leniency Policy has a very complex procedure, doubled by strong confidentiality principles. Moreover, not all the evidence can be considered in an Immunity or Leniency case, as they need to be significant and to bring the so-called added value for the competition authority.

The fact that there are only two cases of Immunity deals in Romanian until now might raise a big concern towards the applicability, understanding and nevertheless awareness of such procedure. At the very first glance, the conclusions we came up with is that undertakings prefer to take the risk and face a possible fine, considering that the chance to be sanctioned is lower than the one for getting away. This brings a serious damage to the normal competition environment as the undertaking still do not find the Immunity and Leniency as a "deal" to disclose possible anticompetitive agreement and bring balance in the competition market.

As further research, we bare the hope that more and more cases are to come in the near future and thus see how this policy will evolve at national level.

THE LACK OF REGULATION IN THE ROMANIAN CIVIL CODE OF THE LEGAL SOLUTIONS OF PRINCIPLE IN THE FIELD OF REAL RIGHTS

Aurelian Gabriel ULUITU[*]

Abstract

Romanian Civil code – Law no. 287/2009, entered into force at 1st of October 2011 – thoroughly regulates the matter of real estate rights. Unfortunately, the legislator had chosen that in some situations not to regulate a certain principle solution, useful for the determinate purposes of the subjects in their civil relations. In these cases, the Romania Civil code sends to the Court, which has to decide from case to case.

In the present study, we identified all the situations where the Romanian Civil code mentions such references and we proposed – de lege feredenda – some landmarks which the legislator could take into account in order to fix this lack of regulation.

Keywords: Romanian Civil code, real estate rights, lack of regulation

1. Introduction

As any other regulation included in a code, the regulation introduced by Law no. 287/2009 – the Romanian Civil Code[1] (hereinafter abbreviated RCC) – aims to legislatively cover all civil legal relations. As outlined in doctrine, codification 'implies intensive activity performed by the legislator, which means thoroughly revising the entire legislative material in order to remove obsolete and outdated rules (including customs), to fill in the gaps, to innovate legislatively (by introducing new rules, required by the evolution of social relations), to logically order the legislative material and to use modern means of legislative technique (by choosing the regulation manner and the external form of regulation; by using appropriate means of conceptualization)[2].

These important features characterizing the codification process of the rules governing civil legal relations were largely respected by the legislator when drafting Law no. 287/2009. Overall, the operative part of this statute – considering the specific meaning of the term as established by art. 44 of Law no. 24/2000 on the rules referring to the legislative technique for drafting new legislation[3] – meets the needs which led to the replacement of the previous regulation (which had been applied continuously since December 1865).

Nevertheless, on a detailed analysis of the solutions in the legal subject area of overall regulation of real rights (Book III – 'On property', art. 535-952 RCC), one notices that the legislator chose a debatable solution: in many cases, the rules which are provided for simply make reference to the courts for them to concretely determine how to resolve the dispute, in which, hypothetically, subjects of civil legal relations are involved.

Such an option is, in principle, open to criticism for at least two reasons:

a) By regulating such cross-referred rules, the legislator does not usually set indicative criteria for courts, so that the delivery of justice could be facilitated. Naturally, such criteria should have existed even in the substantive regulation of the issues specific to RCC and thus to be considered by the subjects of the civil legal relations in order to prevent the approach of taking recourse to the courts.

b) The legislator disregarded the particular situation existing in Romania involving the workload of the courts (especially those which deal with civil lawsuits). Excessively overloading the role of courts – a permanent reality after 1989 – should have constituted for the legislator a signal which should have led its activity towards finding appropriate solutions, in that taking recourse to the courts should have represented an extraordinary measure (without thus laying down obstacles that might unlawfully restrict free access to justice, enshrined in art. 21 of the Romanian Constitution).

In this study, we attempt to present the rules of the legal subject area governing real rights which comprise solutions of (necessary) recourse to the activity of courts. In addition to this, we put forward our own proposals to amend the texts in RCC in order to establish indicative legal benchmarks, so that the civil law subjects involved the respective legal mechanisms would be able to consider them in order to avoid going through a civil lawsuit.

2. Identifying the situations in which the legislator refers to court without laying down indicative rules which may be considered by the subjects of the employment agreements

2.1. Regarding accession

a) According to art. 587 para. (2) and (3) RCC, if the work was done by a third party in bad faith, the neighboring land owner can decide whether to request removing the work off the ground, by obliging the contractor to pay damages, if any, or to request registration of the neighbors' right of co-ownership in the land book. In determining the shares, the value of the land owned by the neighbor, as well as the value of half the contribution of the contractor shall be taken into account. In case of disagreement between the parties, the court shall determine the contribution of each party to the resulting immovable property, and the shares in the right of ownership, respectively.

Such a rule of reference could have been easily avoided if the legislator had laid down the obligation for the people involved in the legal situation hereto to recourse to a certified court expert specialized in civil and industrial engineering, mutually agreed, to determine each party's contribution to the resulting immovable property. Depending on this value, the shares in the right of ownership could have been properly established.

Even in the current regulation, in the process envisaged by the application of art. 587 para. (3) RCC, a certified court expert is to establish the value of the respective contribution, whereas the court shall only confirm the result of the evaluation.

b) According to art. 592 para. (1) RCC, whenever the owner chooses to force the contractor to buy the immovable property, in the absence of the parties' agreement, the owner may request the court to establish a price and to issue a judgment which shall substitute the sales contract.

Similarly with the situation referred to in subparagraph a) the recourse to court could have been avoided by laying down the obligation for the persons involved in this legal situation to use the services provided by an expert evaluator and, subsequently, to sign the sales contract (which, in such circumstances, would have become a forced agreement).

c) Art. 595 provides for the following: 'Whenever, under a provision of this section, the court is vested to determine the extent of indemnity or compensation, it will take into account the property price estimate calculated at the date of the judgment hereof.'

The property price estimate calculated at the date of the judgment is a landmark that is established by the expert evaluator, as court mediation might be missing.

2.2. Regarding the inviolability clause

Art. 672 para. (2) CCR provides that the buyer of an asset may be authorized by the court to dispose of the respective asset if the interest that justified the inviolability clause has disappeared or if a higher interest requires it.

Recourse to court could have been avoided if the obligation for the buyer-vendor to explicitly justify the conveyancing document had been laid down, if the interest which justified the inviolability clause had been eliminated or if a higher interest that would have required the selling operation had been manifest.

2.3. Regarding the manifestation of the legal limits of the right of ownership

Art. 630 RCC provides for the following:

'(1) If, by exercising his/her right, the owner causes inconvenience higher than normal in neighborly relations, the court may, on grounds of fairness, require of him/her to pay damages to the aggrieved party, as well as to re-establish the earlier situation when possible.

(2) If the damage caused were minor in relation to the necessity or usefulness of carrying harmful activity by the owner, the court may approve the conduct of that activity. But the aggrieved party will be entitled to damages.

(3) If the damage is imminent or very likely, the court may approve, by way of presiding judge's order, the measures necessary to prevent damage.'

Exceeding the limits specific to manifesting the normal neighborhood inconveniences between two immovable properties involves court intervention, in all the three cases regulated by the three paragraphs of art. 630. Except for the regulation hypothesis in para. (3), which is justified (but which is legislatively covered by art. 997 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, referring to the special procedure of presiding judge's order), the other two situations might have been regulated especially by considering the manifestation of obligation of the respective subjects to reach agreement on settling the dispute between them; we believe that it is such a solution that would be consistent with the requirements expressed by the principle of equity.

2.4. Regarding the status of co-ownership

a) Upon co-owners' signing the administration contract or the deeds of disposition for the property being owned in shares, according to art. 641 para. (3) RCC, the co-owner or the interested co-owners 'can ask the court to substitute the agreement of the co-owner who was unable to express his/her will or who is abusively opposing to draft a administration contract essential to maintain the usefulness or the value of the asset.'

This solution is excessive, completely unjustified. The law could provide that, in such a situation, the co-owner or the interested co-owners could nevertheless sign the administration contract, even if the co-owner who is (objectively) unable to express his/her will or who abusively opposes to draft such a contract does not agree, on condition that the drafter(s) of the contract mention(s) the occasion which has given rise to its conclusion without the participation of all co-owners.

b) Given the situation of forced co-ownership, with reference to the common parts of the buildings with several floors or apartments, art. 657 para. (2) RCC provides that, in case the extent of damage caused to a part of the common property amounts to less than half the value of the property, 'co-owners shall contribute to rebuilding the common parts, proportionally to their shares. If one or more co-owners refuse or are unable to participate in rebuilding, they are obliged to waive their shares in their right of ownership to the other co-owners. The price is determined by the parties or, in case of disagreement, by the court.'

The price might have been established – if the law had laid down this obligation for co-owners – by an expert evaluator, without the need for court intervention.

2.5. Regarding the usufruct

Art. 747 RCC provided for the following on the extinction of usufruct in case of abuse of use:

'(1) The usufruct may be terminated at the request of the bare owner when the beneficial owner abuses the use of property, causes damage to it or lets it deteriorate.

(2) The creditors of the beneficial owner may start a lawsuit to preserve their rights; they may commit to repair the damage and provide guarantees for the future.

(3) According to circumstances, the court may decide either the extinction of the usufruct or the takeover of the use of property by the bare owner, who is obliged to pay the beneficial owner an annuity during the duration of the usufruct. When the property is immovable, in order to guarantee the annuity, the court may order the registration of a mortgage in the land book.'

The intervention of the court, corresponding to the situations highlighted in para. (3) of art. 747 RCC might be legally replaced by the bare owner's conduct, which should be expressed in an appropriate and direct manner. The bare owner – justifying in advance the abuse of use ascribable to the beneficial user and being authorized by law – could directly take over the use of property. Similarly, if in such a situation, the beneficial owner could – without the need for court intervention – to require registration of a mortgage in the land book.

2.6. Regarding easements

Art. 772 RCC provides for the following on redeeming the right of way:

'(1) The right of way shall be redeemed by the owner of the servient tenement if there is a manifest disproportion between the usefulness assigned to the dominant tenement and the inconveniency or the depreciation caused to the servient tenement.

(2) In case of disagreement between the parties, the court may substitute the consent of the dominant tenement's owner. When determining the redemption price, the court shall take into account the age of easement and the change in value of the two tenements.'

The law could establish the right of the servient tenement's owner to directly benefit from the right of way, given the hypothesis regulated in para. (1) of art. 772 RCC. In such a situation, a hypothesis on the manifestation of a forced contract should also be regulated, the price being set by an expert evaluator.

2.7. Regarding the institution of managing somebody else's assets

a) To ensure the maintenance of the destination of the assets under administration, according to art. 797 RCC, the trustee 'is obliged to continue the manner of use or operation of the fruit bearing assess without changing their destination, unless he/she is authorized by the recipient or, in case of preventing it, by court.'

If the necessity to change the manner of use or operation of the fruit bearing assets and their destination is objectively justified, the trustee could benefit from the legal permission to make the required changes, emphasizing the fact that the recipient is objectively unable to authorize this change.

The same situation occurs when authorizing deeds of disposition. In this respect, art. 799 para. (1) RCC provides for the following:

'When administration concentrates on a determined individual asset, the trustee shall be able to onerously dispose of the asset or to encumber it with a collateral, when deemed necessary to preserve the value of the asset, to pay off debts or to maintain manner of use appropriate for the intended destination of the asset, only with the recipient's authorization or in case the latter is hindered or has not yet been determined, with the court's authorization.'

Para. (3) thereof provides for the following: 'When the administration concentrates on all the assets, the trustee can dispose of a determined individual asset or to encumber it with collateral whenever deemed necessary for the proper administration of the universality. In other cases, prior permission of the recipient or, where appropriate, of the court, is necessary.'

The solution we propose is the same as the one for maintaining the destination of the administered assets.

b) The legal regime of full administration assumes in reference to the prohibition of acquiring rights in respect of the administered assets, the manifestation of an exception, in that the trustee shall be able to sign the documents concerning the administered assets or to acquire, otherwise than by inheritance, any type of rights on the respective assets or against the recipient, 'on the recipient's express mandate or, in case the latter is hindered or has not yet been determined, on the court's mandate.'

At least when the trustee justifies the manifestation of an objective impediment that hinders the recipient to give him/her the mandate, the law might establish the possibility of drafting the documents deemed necessary in the case, without the need for court intervention.

c) With respect to full administration regime, art. 812 RCC, which focuses on mitigating the trustee's liability, provides for the following: 'In determining the trustee's liability limits, as well as the damages that he/she owes, the court shall be able to reduce the amount, given the circumstances related to assuming administration or the free nature of the trustee's service.'

This regulation is unnecessary because it is a sovereign attribute of the court, regardless of any express legal permission given in a particular situation, to determine the extent of liability of a person proportional to the damage, which may be evidenced by the person entitled to repair it.

d) Regarding the obligation of the trustee to perform inventory and to provide securities, art. 818 and art. 819 RCC provide for the following:

- art. 818:

'(1) The trustee is not required to perform the inventory, to underwrite an insurance policy or provide other security for proper performance of his duties, in the absence of a provision in the articles of incorporation, of a subsequent agreement of the parties, of a legal order to the contrary or of a court order passed on demand of the recipient or any other interested person.

(2) If such an obligation was established as the trustee's duty by law or by court order, the trustee shall be able to request the court, for good reasons, to be dispensed with its fulfillment.'

- art. 819:

'(1) In dealing with the requests under art. 818, the court shall take into account the value of the goods, the situation of the parties, as well as other circumstances.

(2) The court shall not accept the request for establishing that it is the trustee's duty to deal with the inventory, the securities or the insurance, if, in this manner, a provision to the contrary included in the articles of incorporation or a subsequent agreement of the parties were violated.'

If the trustee could come up with good reasons to be exempted from fulfilling the obligation to perform the inventory, to underwrite an insurance policy or to provide other security for proper performance of his duties, legally, one might establish that carrying out administration without assuming such obligations might be done on the trustee's own initiative.

In this context of analysis, we underline the fact that art. 819 para. (2) RCC is meaningless.

e) In the case of adopting decisions in special circumstances, the regulation on collective administration and delegation lays down that trustees shall be able to individually draft preservation deeds [art. 826 para. (1) RCC]. By exception, according to para. (2) and (3) of the same article:

'(2) If decisions cannot be validly taken because of constant opposition of some trustees, the other documents related to managing other person's assets shall be drafted in case of emergency, by court authorization.

(3) To the extent that misunderstandings between trustees persist and administration is seriously affected, the court may order, at the request of any interested person, one or more of the following measures:

a) to establish a simplified mechanism for the adoption of decisions;

b) to distribute the tasks among the trustees;

c) to impart a casting vote, in case of a tie, to one of the trustees;

d) to replace the trustee or, where appropriate, the trustees to whom it is ascribable the given situation.'

The authorization provided for by art. 826 para. (2) for the court to determine is not necessary. As for the measures provided for by para. (3), they should be initiated and established by the recipient.

f) With regard to blue chip investments art. 833 RCC provides for the following:

(1) The trustee may deposit the sums of money entrusted to a credit or insurance institution or to an undertaking for collective investment, to the extent that the deposit is redeemable on demand or at notice within 30 days.

(2) The trustee shall be also able to make deposits for longer periods to the extent that they are fully guaranteed by the Romanian Bank Deposit Guarantee Fund or, where appropriate, by the Romanian Policyholders Guarantee Fund.

(3) If the guarantee provided for by para. (2) is unavailable, the trustee shall not be able to make deposits for longer periods, unless the court authorizes it and in accordance with the rules laid down by the court.'

In such a situation, authorization should also be first expressed by the recipient, excluding – in principle – the intervention of the court.

g) The annual trustees' report includes the right of the recipient to conduct an audit of the administration. According to art. 843 para. (4) RCC, 'If the trustee opposes auditing, the interested party may request the court to appoint an independent expert to check the report.'

The appointment of the expert should be done – at least initially – directly by the recipient.

h) Regarding administration, RCC provides for the hypothesis of legal discharge of administration. In this respect, art. 851 provides for the following:

'(1) If any of the recipients does not accept the report, the trustee can ask the court to approve it.'

(2) Whenever deemed necessary, the court shall order for a specialized expertise to be performed.'

The expertise provided for by para. (2) art. 851 RCC could be carried out without it being manifest in resolving a lawsuit.

i) At the end of this paragraph, we left the references in art. 844 and 846 RCC, respectively, from which one could infer that the law may also give the court both the opportunity to establish the distribution of powers between the trustees (when the administration is carried out by two or more trustees) and the opportunity to order the replacement of the trustee.

2.8. Regarding the regulation of the land book

a) Changing the immovable property registered in the land book – art. 879 para. (3) RCC provides for the following: 'Annexation or detachment of encumbered immovable property shall only be done with the consent of the holders of those encumbrances. The refusal of the encumbrance holders should not be abusive, as it may be censored by the court.'

Going to court in this situation might be avoided if the law provided for the right of the owner to perform the operation of changing the immovable property – annexation or detachment – without the consent of the encumbrance holder, who, abusively, refuses to give his/her consent, on condition that the conduct of the encumbrance holder is put in writing.

b) The date of taking effect of the registration in the land book – art. 890 para. (3) RCC provides for the following: 'If more applications were received on the same day by post or courier, the mortgage rights shall have the same rank, and other rights shall gain equal rank only temporarily, followed by the court's decision, at the request of any interested person, on the rank and, if necessary, on the deletion of invalid registration.'

We believe it is imperative that the legislator would establish one or more criteria for delineating the ranks for the guarantee rights (other than mortgage).

c) Rectifying the registrations in the land book – according to art. 908 para. (3) RCC, 'When the right registered in the land book is to be rectified, its holder is obliged to hand over the entitled party, together with the consent engrossed in duly certified notarial form, enabling the performance of the rectification, and the necessary documents, as, otherwise, the interested person shall be able to request the court to order registration in the land book. In the latter case, the decision of the court shall substitute the registration consent of the party, who is obliged to submit the documents necessary for the rectification.'

In such circumstances, the law could lay down that the operation necessary to register the rectification might not need court intervention.

3. Conclusions

In all the aforementioned cases, we believe it is both possible and necessary for the legislator to intervene in order to establish legislative solutions which should not make reference to court. Only in this way the role and purpose of the regulations contained in the Romanian Civil Code would be fully manifest.

This approach would not involve depriving of or limiting the possibility of the subjects of civil legal relations to take recourse to court whenever substantive rights or legitimate interests would require this.

IMPLEMENTING THE CONSTITUTIONAL COURT'S RECENT DECISIONS REGARDING CERTAIN PROVISIONS STIPULATED FOR CREDIT AGREEMENTS AND CREDIT CONVERSION

Gabriel VASII[*]

Abstract

The article aims to analyse the practical consequences of the Constitutional Court's recent decisions in respect to the provisions of Law no. 77 / 2016 for credit conversion and of Law amending Government Ordinance no. 50/2010 (credit conversion). The analysis shall be made from the bank's perspective and from the consumer's point of view.

Keywords: unfair terms, Constitutional Court, credit agreements, credit compensation

1. Introduction

With this analysis, we aim to present a theme recently appeared in Romanian legal society, namely the changes in the legal framework applicable to the commercial relationship between the consumers and the banking institution. The analysis shall be performed both from the perspective of Law no. 193/2000 and from the point of view of the applicability of Law no. 77/2016 for the return of the asset in exchange for the receivable, published in the Official Gazette no. 330/28.04.2016 ("Law no. 77/2016"). The novelty of the aspects which are to be presented resides in the amendments brought by the Constitutional Court's Decision no. 623/2016[1] regarding the unconstitutionality exception of articles 1 par. 3), article 3, article 4, article 5 par.2) articles 6-8 par. 1), 3) and 5), article 10 and article 11 of Law no. 77/2016 and well as of Law no. 77/2016 itself ("Decision no. 623/2016").

This paper sets out a challenge to analyse the manner of application and the implementation of the dispositions of Law no. 77/2016, pursuant to the modifications brought by Decision no. 623/2016, both from a scholar's perspective and from a practical approach of the procedure for returning the asset in exchange for the receivable, as established by Law no. 77/2016.

2. Review of the main dispositions of Law no. 77/2016

Law no. 77/2016 entered into force on 13 May 2016. This legal norm appeared as a solution for certain retail borrowers who can now opt between paying their loan or using a legal mechanism of transferring the title to the immovable assets which were given as collateral for securing the obligations under such loan agreements to the lenders or to the assignees of the corresponding receivables (jointly referred to as "Creditor").

Law no. 77/2016 applies to credit agreements. Romanian doctrine[2] has criticised the general definition given by the legislator to the agreement during 2009 – 2011, considering that the agreement should be defined through its most general and representative characteristics and should emphasis that the agreement is a special, complex type of legal act, deriving from the parties' will, motivation, interests, finality and purpose.

Recent Romanian doctrine[3] has defined the agreement as being a legal understanding between the parties, meaning a qualified form of the parties' will and consent, which ensured the party acting in good faith that it shall benefit from the state's coercitive force.

This definition applies also to loan agreements concluded between banks, as credit institutions, and individuals, as consumers.

To entail the application of the Law, the following criteria must be cumulatively met, in compliance with article 4 par. 1) of the Law:

a) the Creditor is a credit institution, a non-banking financial institution or an assignee of receivables originated by such credit or financial institutions.
b) the loan agreements are concluded between retail borrowers and consumers, as defined by Government Ordinance no. 21/1992 for consumer protection and by Law no. 193/2000 regarding unfair contractual terms within the agreements between professionals and consumers,
c) the retail borrowers have not been charged by way of a final court decision for criminal offences in relation to that loan;
d) the loan agreements are secured with at least one mortgage on a residential property. The Law applies even if there are other collaterals besides the mortgage on a residential property;

e) at the date of granting the loan, the principal amount did not exceed EUR 250,000 or the equivalent amount in another currency (based on the exchange rate calculated by the National Bank of Romania for the date when the loan agreement was signed);

The following type of loans are excluded from the application of Law no. 77/2016:

a) loans granted under the "Prima Casa" governmental program;
b) loans (including mortgage loans) secured with collaterals which do not have a residential purpose, e.g. commercial properties, office buildings, land (even if the land may be used for residential purposes but does not have any residential buildings on it);
c) loans which have (at the date of extending the loan) a principal exceeding the threshold of EUR 250,000 (or the equivalent in any other currency);
d) corporate loans, even if such loans are secured with residential properties.

In order to avoid producing a disruption in the balance of legal relationships between parties, Law no. 77/2016 shall apply both to ongoing loan agreements at the date of its entry intro force and to loan agreements which are envisaged to be concluded after this date. Proof of the fact that the Law is oriented to protect consumers is its application to cases when the collateral has already been sold within the enforcement procedure, but only to the extent there are other enforcement proceedings (related to the same loan) which are ongoing against the debtor.

The steps for implementing Law no. 77/2016's mechanism are the following:

- at the debtor's, guarantor's or collateral provider's initiative, a notice is sent to the creditor, informing the latter of the debtor's, guarantor's or collateral provider's intent to return the ownership over the mortgaged property for the full settlement of the debt,
- certain formalities must be observed for sending the Notice, which can be transmitted either through an attorney, or a notary public or a bailiff.
- the Notice must convey two alternative days and a precise timing in which the legal or conventional representative of the credit institution presents himself to the notary public appointed by the debtor, guarantor or collateral provider for the conclusion of the deed for transferring ownership over the mortgaged property and discharge of debt. By debt, Law no. 77/2016 refers to any principal, interest or delay penalties deriving from the loan. The date proposed by the Debtor for the notary's appointment cannot be sooner than 30 days from the date of the Notice.

Legal doctrine[4] stated that the right to settle the bank receivable and the correlative debt, as stipulated through articles 3-5 of Law no. 77/2016 appears to be a truly potestative right, since it empowers a person to unilaterally amend, settle or recreate a pre-existent legal situation. However, the same author reaches the conclusion that this right cannot be qualified as a potestative right since it would grant excessive powers to the consumer. Further on, the same author concludes that Law no. 77/2016 does not stipulate a specific case of hardship, but that the legislator's intent is to make this legal norm compatible to important values and principles in line with our Constitution and internal legislation, with European Union laws and with the guidelines of the European Convention for Human Rights[5].

The primary effect of this mechanism regulated by Law no. 77/2016 is the immediate suspension of any payment obligation of the Debtor to the Creditor together with any legal and administrative proceedings initiated by the Creditor against the Debtor (including guarantors and collateral providers) or its assets, as of the date when the notice is served to the creditor.

Although Law no. 77/2016 carved the way for a higher protection of the debtor, it has also provided a safety mechanism for the creditor, as well, by stipulating the possibility for the latter to challenge the debtor's request to return the asset, within 10 days as of the receipt of the notice, if the creditor deems that the conditions provided by article no. 4 of Law no. 77/2016.

Such a challenge should be judged by the relevant local court (i.e. the local court in the jurisdiction where the Debtor has its domicile) with urgency. Any court decision is subject to appeal which may be filed within 15 working days from the date when the first court decision is communicated. The appeal must be judged with extreme urgency, as well.

In case the Creditor's challenge is successful, the parties will return to their original legal positions prior to the issuance of the notice, meaning that the debtor's obligation to continue to pay the outstanding loan amount is not suspended any more and is due. However, Law no. 77/2016 does not expressly mention when the payments towards the bank are to be resumed.

If no challenge against the debtor's request is filed or if such challenge is finally rejected by the court, the creditor must continue the settlement procedure, as requested by the debtor. To this end, the creditor must present himself before the notary public appointed by the debtor within 10 days as of the final rejection of his challenge, as per article 7 par. 6) of Law no. 77/2016. Further on, the creditor and the debtor will sign a notarial deed which will evidence the transfer of title over all relevant collaterals, from the debtor to the Creditor. Upon such transfer of title, all the debtor's obligations to the dreditor will be deemed settled.

[5] Valeriu Stoica s.a., Legea dării în plată, Ed. Hamangiu, 2016, p. 29.

Law no. 77/2016 has foreseen a method for supporting the debtor in case the creditor fails to comply with its obligations after a final ruling is rendered. In this situation, the debtor may file a court claim requesting the court to release him of its debt and to acknowledge the ownership title over the collaterals to the creditor.

Upon the conclusion of the notarial deed or upon a final court decision being rendered, in each case for the transfer of title over the collaterals, from the debtor to the creditor, the debtor's (re)payment obligations to the creditor will be deemed settled in full.

3. Unconstitutionality grounds against Law no. 77/2016

Starting from the contractual relationship between credit institutions and consumers, legitimated through credit agreements, the legislator intervened through Law no. 77/2016 in order to relieve the already accumulated tension between these parties. Law no. 77/2016 was born under the auspices of the world economic crises which led debtors to the impossibility to settle their payment obligations deriving from the credit agreements[6]. Law no. 77/2016 entered into force after 16 years as of the promulgation of Law no. 193/2000 for unfair clauses in credit agreements with consumers, giving rise to a new wave of litigations against the manner in which Law no. 77/2016 has understood to rebalance the risks pertaining to credit agreements and the devaluation of immovable properties.

The constitutionality of Law no. 77/2016 has been contested through the exceptions filed against article 1 par.3), article 3, article 4, article 5 par. 2), articles 6-8 par. 1), 3) and 5), article 10 and article 11, as well as the exceptions filed against the law itself.

The main arguments in support of the unconstitutionality of Law no. 77/2016 may be comprised as follows:

- critics based on the fact that Law no. 77/2016 has been adopted as an ordinary law, instead of an organic law. This opinion is based on the fact that the general legal regime of ownership over lands is governed by the Romanian Constitution, which is an organic law. Therefore, there are no grounds to amend the general regime set through an organic law by using an ordinary law, whose purpose is to regulate other areas.
- Law no. 77/2016 triggers the insecurity of the civil circuit since it may lead to the retroactive the amendment of credit agreements that have been concluded under laws in force at the moment of their conclusion and which are subject to their applicability, based on the principle tempus regit actum. The authors of this argument also believed that the bank's access to an economic activity and its freedom of commerce is severely affected since the bank loses its receivable right gained through the credit agreement. In addition, the bank's position would also be affected if the mortgaged asset is transferred in its patrimony along with the guarantees and encumbrances constituted by other creditors, thus becoming a guarantor for the debtor itself, instead of remaining a creditor.
- the dispositions of Law no. 77/2016 have been criticised also from the point of view of the limited conditions in which the bank may proceed to contest the debtor's request to return the asset, since there are no mentions regarding the bank's possibility to analyse the current status of the returned asset, the debtor's fault for diminishing the value of the mortgaged asset or the debtor's actual status of necessity which makes him eligible for such a procedure. The authors of this argument also invoked the fact that the bank has extremely limited possibilities to rebalance it's contractual risks.
- Law no. 77/2016 has been criticised also for being imprecise, since it stipulates a derogation from the provisions of the Romanian Civil Code, without mentioning which are the legal dispositions subject to this exception,
- the authors of the unconstitutionallity exception also express their disapproval of the fact that Law no. 77/2016 is not exactly correlated to other legal norms, although the provisions of the Law expressly mention this correlation.
- there is an inadvertency between the purpose of Law no. 77/2016, which is said to be the safeguard of debtors overcoming a difficult financial situation and the provisions of the law itself, which do not emphasise its application only to debtors in a difficult financial situation, thus creating the possibility for debtors to benefit from the Law' provisions regardless of their economic status.
- Law no. 77/2016 is deemed unconstitutional based on its retroactive effect, which determins a change in the nature of the credit agreement itself which becomes a leasing agreement. In support of this thesis, the authors claim that for past situations in which the immovable asset had been sold within the enforcement procedure in order to cover the debt and the bank continued the enforcement procedure for the rest of the amount, the legislator has created a new effect, namely that of the settlement of the debt as of perfecting the sale-purchase of the collateral at the request of the debtor, as per article 8 of Law no. 77/2016. Since at the moment when the collateral was sold, this legal situation did not create the right for the debtor to request the settlement of the obligation, it would be unconstitutional for a new law, subsequent to the sell-purchase of the collateral, to be able to retroactively change the effects of the past situation and give birth to the debtor's right to request the settlement.
- another relevant argument for the unconstitutionality of Law no. 77/2016 is that it replaces the bank's receivable with a ownership right against the bank's will, which leads to a decrease of the bank's patrimony if the value of the immovable asset is lower than the value of the due loan.

− the authors of the unconstitutionaly exception believed that Law no. 77/2016 establishes an unwarrantable interference with the bank's hypothec right, in the sense that if the bank decides to enforce the hypothec right, the bank must takeover the asset. In this case, if the bank's hypothec is higher than other creditor's hypothects, the bank's hypothec shall remain without effect as a consequence of taking over the asset but the next creditor's hypothec shall increase and therefore, their right to settle their receivable shall become actual and their creditor shall become the bank itself.

− Law no. 77/2016 has been criticised also due to the lack of preliminary impact studies prior to its adoption, which leads to a lack of consideration for the rights of other parties involved in the credit process.

− last but not least, the authors of the unconstitutionality exception invoked the negative notice of Central European Bank on the provisions of Law no. 77/2016, since the measures established through the latter lack proportionality because it does not mention the just and equitable compensation applicable to the creditor in such a situation. The authors believed that Law no. 77/2016 would have been proportional if the legislator had correlated the settlement measure with the dispositions of Law no. 151/2015 for the insovency of the individual, therefore if the settlement measure would have been limited to social cases or to credit agreements currently under litigation. In lack of a proportionality between the settlement procedure stipulated by Law no. 77/2016 and the cases in which the legislator allows its application, the guarantees for the economic liberty of creditors and of free trade are severly violated.

4. The Constitutional Court's grounds regarding the arguments supporting the unconstitutionality of Law no. 77/2016

Within Decision no. 623/2016, the Constitutional Court[7] analyses and motivates both arguments related to extrinsic unconstitutionality grounds, as well as intrinsec unconstitutionality grounds:

1. Extrinsic unconstitutionality grounds are related to Law no. 77/2016 itself and refer to the fact that this law has been adopted as an ordinary law instead of an organic law. The Court believed this reason is not grounded since Law no. 77/2016 refers to limited situations which do not entail the geeral regime of ownership. More precisely, the Court considered that Law no. 77/2016 refers to a manner of execution of certain obligations comprised in credit agreements in case of hardship. Even if one of the effects of Law no. 77/2016 is the transfer of ownership, this circumstance does not represent a regulatory framework for the general regime of ownership in Romania. În acest sens, a se vedea
2. In respect to arguments for the instrinsec unconstitutionality of Law no. 77/2016, the Court acknowledges that the critics refer to the lack of clarity and precision of the law, in the sense that it does not mention who shall bear the enforcement expenses and does not clearly specify what agreements are to be considered credit agreement, it does not specify whether the Civil Code is applicable for the return of the asset, it does not accomodate the purpose of the legal norm with its content. The Court rejected this type of arguments, since it deemed that they mostly refer to the interpretation and application of Law no. 77/2016 by the common court of law and their analysis exceeds the competences of the Constitutional Court.

5. The Constitutional Court's grounds regarding the arguments supporting the unconstitutionality of Law no. 77/2016

The Constitutionality Court begins its analysis from the purpose of Law no. 77/2016, as mentioned in its preamble, by referring to the intention of the legislator to promote equity by dividing the contractual risks between the creditor and the debtor, in the current social context after the economic crisis. As opposed to this new theory, in relation to contracts the principle pacta sunt servanda is the one governing the relationship between the parties, who are the ones who establish the extent of their obligations and must observe such extent.

3.1. The compatibility between the mandatory force of the agreement and the provisions of Law no. 77/2016, considered instrusive by the authors of the unconstitutionality exceptions

Therefore, the main issue the Court must clarify first and foremost is the compatibility of the principle pacta sunt servanda, which regulates the parties' autonomy of will with the provisions of Law no. 77/2016.

In order to proceed to this analysis, the Court establishes that the principle pacta sunt servanda reflects the mandatory force of an agreement, entered into by the parties through their true and autonomous will. Since the agreement is mandatory for the party, so is its execution. Therefore, if the parties intend to bring any changes to the initial obligations construed within their agreement, they must express their will in order to do so.

[7] For details, see Mihnea Săraru și Alina Ciocoiu – "Ce efecte mai poate produce "Legea darii in plata" ca urmare a Deciziei Curtii Constitutionale nr. 623 din 25 octombrie 2016?" – Article published on http://www.hotnews.ro/stiri-dosare_juridice_rezolvarea_disputelor-21391551-efecte-mai-poate-produce-legea-darii-plata-urmare-deciziei-curtii-constitutionale-623-din-25-octombrie-2016.htm.

However, in practice, there are certain situations which the parties cannot foresee at the initial moment of entering into the agreement and which can lead to a change in the parties' possibility to execute the undertaken obligations.

Based on this situation, the Court proceeded to analyse whether the provisions of Law no. 77/2016 accommodate or interfere with the parties' autonomous will.

3.2. The applicability of hardship

The Court recognizes the applicability of hardship under the Civil Code of 1864, as an expression of article 970, which stated that conventions were mandatory between the parties if concluded in good faith and their effects were limited not only to what the parties expressly mentioned but also to all the consequences attached to the obligation based on equity, habit or law. Some authors[8] have reached the conclusion that hardship may not be applied in relation to Law no. 77/2016.

The hardship represents an exeption from the mandatory force of the agreement, namely from pacta sunt servanda, and is stipulated in the New Romanian Civil Code under art. 1271. In recent doctrine[9], the hardship has been defined as the impossibility of the party/parties occurred at the moment of the conclusion of the agreement that a prejudice may happen due to the serious imbalance between the contractual performances during the execution of the agreement, usually produced as a consequence of economic changes.

The agreement itself comprises a risk assumed by the contracting parties and a supplementary risk, which the parties did not foresee and which exceeds their reasonable predictability. In such circumstances, the hardship covers the supplementary unforeseen risk, opening the way for the parties to adapt the agreement if its social utility is still justified.

It was pointed out in doctrine[10] that the hardship clause may be triggered not only in synallagmatic continuing agreements, but also in uno ictu agreements, insofar as the circumstance trigerring the contractual imbalance is generated after the agreement is concluded, but prior to the moment when the contractual obligations should have been executed.

3.3. Good faith and equity in the context of fundamental changes of the conditions in which the agreement is executed

The Court analysed the relevance of good faith and equity in the execution of an agreement, and deemed that the legitimacy of an agreement is maintained as long as it is the result of the existance of the two principles of mandatory force and execution in good faith, which are interdependantly connected. Therefore, equity and good faith provide a solid ground for invoking hardship. In the Court's opinion, by taking into consideration the element of good faith, the role of the common law judge is extended and therefore, the security of the relationships between the parties is not harmed, since the court's intervention is limited to the acknowledgement of the specific conditions of contractual hardship.

4. The Constitutional Court's conclusion

By corroborating the above with the legislator's intent to balance the contractual risks, the Constitutional Court deemed that through Law no. 77/2016 the legislator wanted to introduce the applicability of the hardship in credit agreements.

However, the Court pointed out that it is the common court of law's prerogative to verify whether the conditions of the hardship.

Within its analysis, the Court established that Law no. 77/2016 does not represent a case of retroactive application of legal dispositions, since the credit agreements have been concluded under the dispositions of the Civil Code of 1854, which allowed the use of hardship clauses and did not deem that hardships interferes with the principle of autonomy of will.

5. Applicability of Decision 623/2016 in the legal procedure of solving complaints conducted in the cases on the dockets of the courts

As previously mentioned, the new legal framework regulated by Law 77/2016 has been determined by the idea of fairness and sharing of contractual risks in the performance of loan agreements under those circumstances that occurred further to the economic crisis, when debtors were no longer able to perform their obligations undertaken in loan agreements.

However, this allowed debtors to suspend, based on a simple notice, according to Article 5 of Law No. 77/2016, the creditor’s right to have recourse against the debtor, the codebtors, as well as personal guarantors or mortgagors and, implicitly, to have its debts under loan agreements extinguished, along with their accessories, with no additional costs, by giving in payment the immovable asset mortgaged in favour of the creditor.

In all this unfavourable mechanism, creditors were forced to unwillingly become the owner of an immovable asset the market value of which is in most cases much below the value of the loan contracted by the debtor, which automatically resulted in the filing, pursuant to Article 7(1), of the challenge in court of the procedure regulated by this law.

Further to the filing of challenges with the courts of law, a series of cases are being tried, large part of which have been stayed until the issuance of Decision 623/2016.

Please note that the courts currently grant other motions concerning the plea of unconstitutionality of the provisions of Law 77/2016, which motions will lead to an analysis by the Constitutional Court of the constitutionality or non-constitutionality of the articles mentioned in such motions. It is highly probable that the Constitutional Court will dismiss such new motions in consideration of the fact that they made an analysis concerning the constitutionality by Decision 623/2016.

From the considerations of Decision No. 623/2016 it results that, from a procedural perspective, the court approached for solving a challenge to the notice for giving in payment will check in against Decision 623/2016 the cumulative fulfilment of the admissibility conditions: (i) the proof of completing the prior notification procedure, (ii) Fulfilment of the requirements under Article 4 of Law No. 77/2016 and (iii) Fulfilment of the hardship conditions, existence of a risk that none of the parties could reasonably foresee in the context of the application of Article 7, or Article 8 or Article 9 of the law.

Decision No. 623/2016 clearly provides that it is impossible to reduce the role of the court of law merely to checking the fulfilment of the requirements under Article 4(1) of Law 77/2016.

The court may grant the creditor's challenge either because one or another of the five admissibility conditions is not fulfilled, or because one or another of the substantial hardship conditions is not fulfilled.

In order to decide if the debtor was in a hardship situation, the court will review the situation in its entirety, in consideration of several criteria, mentioned in Decision 623/2016 of the Court:

1. the co-contractors' economic/legal capacity and expertise,
2. the value of the considerations determined by the agreement,
3. the risk already materialized and borne by the agreement and
4. the new economic conditions that alter the parties' will, as well as the social use of the loan agreement.

Therefore, the courts will check if the hardship conditions are fulfilled and will consequently order that the agreement should be adapted or terminated[11]. In this respect, there needs to be a distinction between two categories of substantial hardship conditions: the objective and subjective ones. All the objective and subjective hardship conditions must be fulfilled simultaneously.

Objective requirements are the exceptional cause that determine the alteration of the circumstances existing upon the execution of the agreement, resulting in the unbalance of the relation between the parties' considerations, so that the performance thereof would become excessively burdensome.

The subjective condition concerns the debtor's good faith, the debtor's conduct, if the latter is unable to pay for reasons unimputable to him or if, on the contrary, an ill-will refusal to pay is involved.

To conclude, challenges to notifications for giving in payment may be supported by the non-fulfilment of the hardship conditions since the fact that the agreement becomes more burdensome is practically circumscribed to an inherent risk of the loan agreement and in order for hardship to occur the situations that generated excessive burden had to be more drastic, as well as in consideration of the fact that, if, however, the court upholds the fulfilment thereof, the agreement must be adapted.

If it upholds that all the procedural and substantial hardship conditions are fulfilled, the judge may order either the adaptation, or the termination of the agreement, depending on the circumstances of each case.

The application of these two rulings is included in the grounds of Decision No. 623/2016: "Adaptation takes place when the social usefulness of the agreement may be maintained, while termination occurs when in case new conditions occur, the agreement loses its social usefulness. Consequently, the Court upholds that the parties are firstly under the obligation to renegotiate the agreement, and, secondly, the renegotiation should be effective in consideration of the new reality."

The termination, or, as applicable, the adaptation of the agreement, lie with the judge, who may rely on Directive 17/2014, the only legislative act that provides for a renegotiation of the agreement and a potential adaptation when the variation of the aggregate amount to be reimbursed increases from the amount that it would have reimbursed in consideration of the exchange rate applicable at the execution date of the agreement.

6. Conclusions

We believe that Decision 623/2016 of the Constitutional Court is a general one that sets forth the principle for application of Law 77, which means that it lies with the courts of law to continue the interpretation process started by the Constitutional Court, in order to analyse in concreto how the provisions of Law 77/2016 will be applied, in consideration of the hardship theory.

Relying on Decision 623/2016, the courts will apply a theory of hardship in connection to the other principles of the Civil Code of 1864, with balance and just measure, at the same time observing the giving in payment concept.

[11] For details, see Radu Rizoiu – "Paradoxul călătorului în timp a fost evitat… la timp: Condițiile (constituționale ale) dării în plată" – Article published on https://juridice.ro/essentials/722/paradoxul-calatorului-in-timp-a-fost-evitat-la-timp-conditiile-constitutionale-ale-darii-in-plata.

Decision 623/2016 of the Constitutional Court, however, has not fully clarified the problem resulting from the legal practice, it will also face the difficult issue of prescription of the right to request the ascertainment of the fulfilment of the hardship conditions and the application of the solutions for termination or adaptation of the loan agreement. Also, the correlation between the special procedure regulated by such law and the general law procedure gives rise to numerous issues. Such aspects will be clarified by the legal practice.

THE SELLER'S OBLIGATION TO DELIVER THE GOODS ACCORDING TO CISG

Dan VELICU[*]

Abstract

This article aims to analyze the seller's obligations under the Convention on International Sale of Goods (CISG) and in particular the obligation to deliver the goods showing the main issues that arise in an international sale.
We also wish to point the major innovations or improvements brought by the CISG in comparison to the European civil codes regulation and to conclude if the CSIG managed to revolutionize the tradition view on this issue.

Keywords: sales contract, obligation to deliver, seller, buyer, CSIG

1. Introduction

According to the art. 1603 of the French Civil Code, the seller has two distinct obligations: that of delivering and that of warranting the thing which he sales [... deux obligations principales, celle de délivrer et celle de garantir la chose qu'il vend].

Delivery was defined by the art.1604 as the transferring the thing sold into "the power and possession of the purchaser" [la délivrance est le transport de la chose vendue en la puissance et possession de l'acheteur] meanwhile the warranty took into account "the peaceable possession of the thing sold" and the absence of defects [la garantie que le vendeur doit à l'acquéreur a deux objets : le premier est la possession paisible de la chose vendue ; le second, les défauts cachés de cette chose ou les vices rédhibitoires][1].

The definition and the key words of the Napoleonic Code were followed by some European civil codes of the XIXth century as the Spanish, Italian or the Romanian one (e.g. the art. 1461 of the codigo civil stated that "el vendedor está obligado a la entrega y saneamiento de la cosa objeto de la venta" while the art.1462 stated that "se entenderá entregada la cosa vendida cuando se ponga en poder y posesión del comprador").

An obvious difference seemed to be the regulation provided by the Austrian Civil Code of 1812 [Allgemeines Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch or ABGB].

These rules which are placed in different sections of the code retain more importance for the delivery – the material action determines the ownership transfer – but don't make a obvious distinction between the two purposes of the "warranty".

Therefore, according to the § 1047 "Tauschende sind vermöge des Vertrages verpflichtet, die vertauschten Sachen der Verabredung gemäß mit ihren Bestandteilen und mit allem Zugehör zu rechter Zeit, am gehörigen Ort und in eben dem Zustande, in welchem sie sich bei Schließung des Vertrages befunden haben, zum freien Besitze zu übergeben und zu übernehmen".

The article §922 states that "Wer einem anderen eine Sache gegen Entgelt überlässt, leistet Gewähr, dass sie dem Vertrag entspricht. Er haftet also dafür, dass die Sache die bedungenen oder gewöhnlich vorausgesetzten Eigenschaften hat, dass sie seiner Beschreibung, einer Probe oder einem Muster entspricht und dass sie der Natur des Geschäftes oder der getroffenen Verabredung gemäß verwendet werden kann" while §923 that "Wer also der Sache Eigenschaften beylegt, die sie nicht hat, und die ausdrücklich oder vermöge der Natur des Geschäftes stillschweigend bedungen worden sind; wer ungewöhnliche Mängel, oder Lasten derselben verschweigt; wer eine nicht mehr vorhandene, oder eine fremde Sache als die seinige veräußert; wer fälschlich vorgibt, daß die Sache zu einem bestimmten Gebrauche tauglich; oder daß sie auch von den gewöhnlichen Mängeln und Lasten frey sey; der hat, wenn das Widerspiel hervorkommt, dafür zu haften".

The new German Civil Code [Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch or BGB] retained also the importance of the traditio but did not consider the "warranty" as a typical obligation in the frame of § 433 (1) (Vertragstypische Pflichten beim Kaufvertrag): "Durch den Kaufvertrag wird der Verkäufer einer Sache verpflichtet, dem Käufer die Sache zu übergeben und das Eigentum an der Sache zu verschaffen. Der Verkäufer hat dem Käufer die Sache frei von Sach – und Rechtsmängeln zu verschaffen".

In the other way, beyond providing the general definition, the codice civile of 1942 states that "le obbligazioni principali del venditore sono:

1) quella di consegnare la cosa al compratore;

.....

3) quella di garantire il compratore dall'evizione e dai vizi della cosa (art. 1476)".

In other words, the obligation of "warranty" seemed to play a complementary role to the delivery, supposed to be fulfilled immediately after the conclusion of the contract as a general rule.

[1] See art. 1625.

Obviously, the mechanism of the sale contract, as it was proposed by most European Civil Codes, was obsolete (or at least not proper) in regulating an international sales contract.

As we know, most of the international sales are referring to goods that will be acquired or produced by the seller.

Both cases suppose that the buyer is not able to consider or inspect the goods.

The absence of the goods when the parties are negotiating doesn't mean that the buyer has no control over the quality of the goods he wants to acquire. If the seller is the manufacturer the buyer can inspect the goods that are made in order to honor the previous requests or use a sample in order to set up the quality of the goods.

Thus, changing the traditional view which dealt the sale contract as an agreement concluded by the parties in the presence of the goods became a challenge for the authors of the CISG.

Therefore, this case, as a general rule, had to be change in accordance with the necessities of international trade.

2. The new regulation of CSIG

2.1. A new vision seems to emerge from the content of the articles 30 to 44 of CSIG.

First of all, article 30 outlines the seller's major duties: The seller must deliver the goods, hand over any documents relating to them and transfer the property in the goods, as required by the contract and this Convention.

On one hand, it must be mentioned that the sale agreement has priority in relation with the regulation of the CSIG. That's why the provisions of the convention will have only a supplementary task, to offer rules when the parties forgot to provide and to help to solve problems[2].

On the other hand, as we can see, this article seems to impose more duties to the seller as the Napoleonic Code does[3].

Of course, the seller's primary obligation is to deliver the goods[4] but additionally he must deliver also any kind of documents needed by the commercial partners.

For example, if the parties concluded a sale on CIF Incoterms 2000, the seller has to deliver to the buyer an insurance policy or other evidence of insurance cover[5], the usual transport document[6] and obviously an invoice[7].

All these documents are usually necessary in order to make the payments by documentary credits.

If the seller doesn't hand over the above mentioned documents the buyer cannot fulfill his obligation to pay the goods.

In fact, the CSIG expressly states that the seller can consider the tender of these documents as a condition of obtaining payment when it provides that the seller may make such payment a condition for handing over the goods or documents[8].

Therefore, as the records prove, the article 30 of CSIG considers the handing over the documents as a secondary obligation of the seller[9].

More, to these two obligations it must be added the last duty stated by the above mentioned articles: transferring the property in the goods, as required by the contract and CSIG.

This obligation constitutes a major advance in regulating the sale contract.

The rules for the transfer of the ownership greatly differ from country to country; in many states the property in specific goods is transferred at the moment of the conclusion of the contract but there are also domestic laws that state the transfer at the moment of the delivery.

Even the CSIG regulation is not concerned with the effect which the contract may have on the property in the goods sold[10] but at least it recognize that sale contract supposes also the transferring the property not only the possession of the good, and more it placed that distinct obligation obviously on the seller.

Of course, having no international regulation regarding the way that the property will be transferred every case will be regulated by the law applicable pursuant the private international law of the forum[11].

2.2. According to the article 33 of CSIG, because the contractual arrangements have priority, the seller must deliver the goods on the specific date if a date is fixed by or determinable from the contract.

If the parties agreed a period of time in order to deliver the goods and that period is fixed by or determinable from the contract, the seller will have to deliver at any time within that period unless circumstances indicate that the buyer is to choose a date.

When the parties have not established the time to deliver the seller will have to deliver within a reasonable time after the conclusion of the contract.

[11] See Huber and Mullis, 129.

This rule will be taken into account and will be applied even when the parties have agreed to deliver the goods as soon as possible[12].

2.3. Regarding the place of delivery, the main rules are contained in the article 31 of CSIG[13].

It is important to know where is the place of delivery not only to check if the seller has fulfilled his obligation but also to know where and when the risk is transferred to the buyer because article 67 of CSIG states that if the seller is bound to hand the goods over to a carrier at a particular place, the risk does not pass to the buyer until the goods are handed over to the carrier at that place.

On the other hand, if the contract of sale involves carriage of the goods and the seller is not bound to hand them over at a particular place, the risk passes to the buyer when the goods are handed over to the first carrier for transmission to the buyer in accordance with the contract of sale.

Nevertheless, the risk does not pass to the buyer until the goods are clearly identified to the contract, whether by markings on the goods, by shipping documents, by notice given to the buyer or otherwise.

We must mention that there is an essential difference between the place of delivery, which is the place where the duty of the seller finally ends and the place of destination where the goods are transported to.

In fact, the place of destination is a concept which will be used in relation with the examination of the goods.

According to the article 38 par. 1 of CSIG the buyer must examine the goods, or cause them to be examined, within as short a period as is practicable in the circumstances.

When the sales contract involves carriage of goods, examination may be deferred until after the goods have arrived at their destination.

If the goods are redirected in transit or redispatched by the buyer without a reasonable opportunity for examination by him and at the time of the conclusion of the contract the seller knew or ought to have known of the possibility of such redirection or redispatch, examination may be deferred until after the goods have arrived at the new direction.

On the other hand, article 31 of CSIG states that if the seller is not bound to deliver the goods at any other particular place there are three options available in order to fulfill his obligation.

Of course, the parties can agree on the place of delivery and often they do by referring to customary delivery clauses as Incoterms (the 2000 or 2010 version).

All these terms determines the place of delivery which can be at the seller's factory (Ex works), in a named port of shipment (FOB), in a named port of destination (CIF, DES, DEQ), or in a named point of destination, often in the buyer's country.

As we mention above, if there is no place agreed by the parties, the seller's obligation to deliver consists mainly in handing the goods over to the first carrier for transmission to the buyer if the contract involves carriage of goods.

Being characteristic for an international sale this case has become the first hypothesis to take into account.

Of course, as an exception, if the contract relates to specific goods or unidentified goods to be drawn from a specific stock or to be manufactured or produced, and at the time of the conclusion of the contract the parties knew where the goods were at, or were to be manufactured or produced at a particular place, the seller's obligation to deliver fulfills by placing the goods at the buyer's disposal at that place.

In any other cases, the seller will place the goods at the buyer's disposal at the place where the seller had his place of business at the time of the conclusion of the contract.

2.4. As we know in international trade the buyer is not able often to consider or inspect the goods.

What will happen if the seller placed goods that failed to conform to the requirements of the agreement?

Shall we consider that the seller have not fulfilled the obligation to hand over the goods?

It seems that the regulation of the CSIG was not influenced by the distinction acknowledged in several national laws between delivery of goods of different kind or aliud pro alio and defects or lack of qualities.

In fact, as one commentator emphasizes the supplier has delivered the goods if he has handed over or placed at the purchaser's disposal goods which meet the general description of the contract even those goods do not conform in respect of quantity or quality[14].

In jurisprudence, one court concluded that the delivery of goods different than the ones agreed upon (i.e. unprepared instead of prepared planks) is not a case of non-performance (non delivery) but has to be considered as a lack of conformity[15].

2.5. Finally, article 35 par. 1 of CSIG describes the seller's liability as having to conform with the contract: The seller must deliver goods which are of the quantity, quality and description required by the contract and which are contained or packaged in the manner required by the contract.

But if the parties haven't agreed on a way to establish the quality how can we know if there is breach of contract in the case of aliud pro alio or when the buyer pretends that there are lack of qualities?

In this specific case, the regulation of the CSIG seems to be another major improvement.

The second paragraph of the article 35 contains four determinative standards to be used when the parties have not agreed otherwise.

According to the first one, the goods are conform to the contract if they are fit for the purposes for which goods of the same description would ordinarily be used.

If that rule cannot be applied the seller must deliver goods which are fit for any particular purpose expressly or impliedly made known to the seller at the time of the conclusion of the contract, except where the circumstances show that the buyer did not rely, or that it was unreasonable for him to rely, on the seller's skill and judgement.

According to the third criterion the goods are conform to the contract if they possess the qualities of goods which the seller has held out to the buyer as a sample or model.

Finally, according to the last criterion the goods must be contained or packaged in the manner usual for such goods or, where there is no such manner, in a manner adequate to preserve and protect the goods.

Of course, similarly to many European civil codes regulation we must retain that the seller will not be liable under the second paragraph of the article 35 for any lack of conformity of the goods if at the time of the conclusion of the contract the buyer knew or could not have been unaware of such lack of conformity.

As we can see, there is no mention of any kind of warranty as a complementary obligation to duty to deliver the goods.

Notwithstanding, that does not mean, in our opinion, that the CSIG regulate the obligation of delivery as an unique obligation, that of deliver goods which are conform with the contract.

On the contrary, article 35 par. 1 of CSIG seems to be the legal ground for the potential buyer's allegations if there is a breach of contract[16] while the article 30 will be the ground only when the seller have failed to deliver the goods to the buyer[17].

3.Conclusions

The Convention on International Sale of Goods has replaced successfully the regulation of the civil or commercial continental codes.

The uniform rules provided by the Convention are more adequate to the international commercial relations as compared to domestic laws.

They are more flexible and regulate more specific cases as civil continental codes generally do.

Notwithstanding, the Convention has failed in regulating the delivery of the goods which conform to the contract as an unique obligation of the seller.

Therefore, if the delivered goods do not conform to the contract and that hypothesis constitutes a fundamental breach, the legal basis for the buyer's allegations will be the article 35 par. 1 CSIG and not the article 30.

THE FUTURE OF HUMAN RIGHTS TOWARDS A WORLD COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS: REASONS FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT

Elena ANDREEVSKA[*]

Abstract

The founding of the United Nations in 1945, with the promotion of universal observance of human rights as a principle objective under its Charter, launched an era of international human rights institution-building and standard-setting. Despite the existence of a considerable number of human rights treaties elaborated on the international and regional level, one of the main challenges is the large implementation gap between the "high aspirations and the sobering realities on the ground". On the one hand, many national systems do not provide access to effective domestic protection systems for human rights; on the other hand, the UN system still lacks an effective judicial mechanism responsible for the implementation of these rights. Even where States have given their consent to be bound by a human rights treaty, there are failures in compliance. Non-enforcement is a major failure of the United Nations human rights treaty system. However, the promise of universal human rights protection is not likely to be fulfilled unless and until victims of human rights violations are able to have access to effective remedies at both the national and international levels.

The World Court of Human Rights should be a permanent court established by a multilateral treaty under the auspices of the United Nations. The Court would exercise jurisdiction not only in respect of States but also in respect of a wide range of other actors, jointly referred to as 'Entities' in the Draft Statute. They would include intergovernmental organizations, transnational corporations, and other non-state actors.

The article will try to answer three questions. First, whether a World Court for Human Rights would be desirable. Second, whether there is a need for such a court and third, whether there is a reasonable chance of actually realizing the plan, taking into account the most important challenges of the 21st century.

Keywords: human rights, human rights treaties, judicial mechanism, effective remedies, world court of human rights.

Introduction

Traditional international law was defined as the law governing relations between nation-states exclusively. This meant that only states were subjects of and had legal rights under international law[1]. The traditional definition was expanded somewhat after World War I to include various newly-created intergovernmental organizations which acknowledged to have some very limited rights under international law as well as the protection of human rights became an issue of concern to the international community[2]. Individual human beings were not deemed to have international legal rights as such; they were said to be objects rather than subjects of international law.

The horrors perpetrated during the Second World War motivated the international community to ensure that such atrocities would never be repeated and provided the impetus for the modern movement to establish an international system of binding human rights protection. Consequently, the international human rights as an idea that every nation has an obligation under international law to respect the human rights of its citizens, and that other nations and the international community have a right, and responsibility, under international law to protest and take other appropriate action as permitted by international law if States do not comply with their obligations in this respect is new, emerging for the most part only since 1945 and the establishment of the United Nations. Thus, the international human rights law consists of a body of international rules, procedures and institutions developed to implement this concept and to promote respect for human rights in all countries on a worldwide basis[3].

[1] The fundamental principle underlying the 'law of the nations' is that of sovereignty. According to that principle, a sovereign state has complete freedom to deal with its own nations and territory as it wishes. That meant that, in general, international law imposed obligations, accorded rights, and provided remedies only to states not to individuals. There were exceptions to this rule of non-intervention. See Thomas Buergental, International Human Rights (1994), 2-3. See also Harsch Lauterpacht, International Law and Human Rights (1950); Theodor Meron, Human Rights in International Law (1984); James Nickel, Making Sense of Human Rights (1987); Jack Donnelly, Universal Human Rights in Theory and Practice (1989); Louis Henkin, Age of Rights (1990).

[2] Under the League of Nations, established at the end of the First World War, attempts were made to develop an international legal framework, along with international monitoring mechanisms, to protect minorities.

[3] One of the initial questions is what is meant by human rights. There are many theories and definitions about the meaning of term 'human rights', which could be divided mainly into two groups. According to the first, that human rights are those rights to which human beings are entitled to and which they can claim against state authority simply because they are human, and second, is that human rights are those social and political guarantees necessary to protect individuals from the standard threats to human dignity posed by the modern state and modern markets. See Theodor Meron, Human Rights in International Law, (Vol.1, 1984), 75-100; John Austin, The Province of Jurisprudence Determined and the Uses of Jurisprudence (1954); Isaiah Berlin, Two Concepts of Liberty (1958); and Freaderick Engels, The origin of the Family, Private Property and the State (1972). From my point of view independently of the above mentioned opinion of the meaning of what

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR), adopted in 1948, elaborated upon and systematized for the first time the idea of 'human rights' derived from the United Nations (UN) Charter. The UDHR enumerated a variety of civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights[4], that were subsequently separated and incorporated into two binding treaties – the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR)[5]. The UDHR and the two Covenants together form the minimum standard of international human rights protection, known as the International Bill of Rights. Several other international human rights conventions followed[6], which focused on more specific thematic concerns (such as racial discrimination) or on the protection of vulnerable groups (such as women, children, migrant workers, or disabled persons), and which substantively complement and expand upon particular rights guaranteed in the International Bill of Rights[7].

The primary aims of the treaty system are to:

- encourage a culture of human rights;
- focus the human rights system on standards and obligations;
- engage all states in the treaty system ;
- interpret the treaties through reporting and communications;
- identify benchmarks through general comments and recommendations;
- provide an accurate, pragmatic, quality end product in the form of concluding observations for each state;
- provide a remedial forum for individual complaints;
- encourage a serious national process of review and reform through partnerships at the national level; and
- mainstream human rights in the UN system and mobilize the UN community to assist with implementation and the dissemination of the message of rights and obligations.

The nine treaties are associated with nine treaty bodies which have the task of monitoring the implementation of treaty obligations[8].

Each State party has an obligation to take steps to ensure that everyone in the State can enjoy the rights set out in the treaty. The treaty body helps them to do this by monitoring implementation and recommending further action[9]. Although each treaty is a separate legal instrument, which States may or may not choose to accept. The extent to which the treaties and the treaty bodies can function together as a system depends on two factors: first, States need to accept all the core international human rights treaties systematically and put their provisions into operation (universal and effective ratification); and, second, the treaty bodies need to coordinate their activities so as to present a human rights mean, I completely agree with I. Brownlie's opinion that 'Human rights have always existed alongside with human beings. They existed independently from, and before, the State. Alien and even stateless persons must not be deprived of them. Belonging to diverse kinds of communities and societies-ranging from family, club, corporation, to State and international community, the human rights of man must be protected everywhere in this social hierarchy, just as copyright is protected domestically and internationally'. He added: 'A State or States are not capable of creating human rights by law or by convention; they can only confirm their existence and give them protection. The role of the State is no more then declaratory. It is exactly the some as the International Court of Justice'. See Ian Brownlie, Basic Documents on Human Rights (1992), 580-81.

[4] One of the most important clauses of the UN Declaration of Human Rights concerning human rights, maybe of key importance which provide a foundation for, an impetus to further improvement in the protection of human rights is Article 55, which states that 'the United Nations shall promote: a) higher standards of living, full employment, and conditions of economic and social progress and development... c) universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all... 'Article 56 provides: 'All Members pledge themselves to take joint and separate action in cooperation with the Organization for the achievement of the purposes set forth in Article 55. [7] The treaty body system of the United Nations Is a product of the Cold War, which only allowed for the lowest common denominator between the East, West and South. Western countries had introduced a strong division between civil and political rights on the one hand, and economic, social and cultural rights on the other, and permitted a complaint system only with respect to the former category.

[8] These are: the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD); the Human Rights Committee (HRC);the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR); the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW); the Committee Against Torture (CAT); the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC); the Committee on Migrant Workers (CMW); the Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD); and the Committee on Enforced Disappearance (CED). In addition, there is the CAT Subcommittee on the Prevention of Torture (SPT), which is mandated to carry out state visits under the Optional Protocol to the Convention Against Torture, and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. Prior to 2008, CEDAW met in New York and was serviced by the UN Division for the Advancement of Women. The treaty bodies are composed of members who are elected by the states parties to each treaty (or through the UN Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC) in the case of CESCR). In principle, treaty members are elected as experts who are to perform their functions in an independent capacity.

[9] It should be noted that the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights is not technically a treaty body, since it was not established directly under the terms of the Covenant but was created by Economic and Social Council resolution 1985/17.

consistent and systematic approach to monitoring the implementation of human rights at the national level[10].

The practice of individual and inter-State communications before the UN treaty bodies is indeed not very encouraging. Despite the fact that Article11of the CERD[11] even provides for a mandatory inter-State communication procedure which had entered into force already in1970, not one of the169 States Parties to CERD has so far availed itself of this opportunity vis a' vis any of the other States Parties where systematic racial discrimination and ethnic cleansing had even led to genocide. The same holds true for the optional inter-State communications procedures under the CCPR[12] and the CAT[13]. While the full-time European Court of Human Rights presently decides by a binding judgment on some1000 individual complaints per year (in relation to 46 States Parties to the ECHR, all UN treaty bodies competent to deal with individual communications together have handed down only little more than 500 non-binding decisions on the merits ('final views') within almost 30 years in relation to more than 100 States Parties![14] Although the Human Rights Committee has done its utmost to interpret its powers under the first Optional Protocol to the CCPR1966[15] in a broad manner and renders highly professional quasi-judicial decisions on the merits, this procedure seems to be very little known in the world, and/or the billions of human beings in all regions of the world entitled to lodge complaints with the UN treaty bodies have little confidence in this procedure. The Petitions Team in the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights in Geneva is a small and grossly understaffed unit which cannot be compared to the Registry of the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg. No political body in the United Nations feels responsibility to supervise the implementation of the treaty bodies' decisions by States Parties which has led to the absurd situation that the treaty bodies themselves have developed their own follow-up procedures. No wonder that many States Parties simply ignore the decision of treaty bodies, and even Western State increasingly argue that they are not bound by the decisions of the Human Rights Committee[16].

There is no doubt that non-enforcement is a major failure of the United Nations human rights treaty system. The treaty bodies themselves are usually left with the task of overseeing the implementation of their own findings[17]. This situation is in stark contrast with the unconditional binding force of judicial decisions in national jurisdictions, or with the role of intergovernmental organs in the non-selective supervision of the implementation of rulings by regional human rights courts, such as the European Court of Human Rights within the Council of Europe framework.

The establishment of the Human Rights Council seems to be the right moment to start seriously thinking about the creation of a World Court of Human Rights (hereinafter referred to as WCHR) as its independent counter-part[18] Similar to the International Criminal Court, the Court would be based on a new treaty, the Statute of the WCHR[19]. There is no doubt, the establishment of a WCHR, is a response to many of the most important challenges of the 21st century.

1. Establishment of the WCHR: Jurisdiction, Admissibility and Applicable Law

After the end of the Cold War, some of the institutional visions of the 1940s[20] have been taken up.

[10] In contrast to the UN, the Council of Europe and the Organization of American States had already during the Cold War established fully independent human rights courts with the power to render final and binding judgments on both individual and inter-State complaints (the European Court of Human Rights was established in 1959 pursuant to Section IV, European Convention of Human Rights , and the Inter-American Court of Human Rights was established in 1979 by the American Convention on Human Rights). See 1969(ACHR), OAS No. 36. In addition, the Organization of African Unity (now the African Union) decided in 1998 to established an African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights). See 1998, 6 IHRR 891 (1999). In other words, all three world regions where a regional organization for the protection of human rights exists decided to entrust the decision on human rights complaints to a regional human rights court. Only the Asian region lacks a human rights court, but this has to do with general lack of a regional organization and human rights system.

[20] When the Working Group on Implementation of the UN Commission on Human Rights in 1947 recommended the establishment of an International Court of Human Rights as "final guarantor of human rights" with the power "to give judgments against violators of human rights", it left open whether the proposed court should give "judgment only against States, or whether employers or other individuals might be adjudged violators of human rights". See UN Doc E/600, p. 58.

Already during the Vienna World Conference on Human Rights in 1993[21], the establishment of the Office of a UN High Commissioner for Human Rights[22] has been agreed upon and the first High Commissioner took up his post in Geneva in April 1994[23]. At about the same time, the UN Security Council had established two ad hoc criminal tribunals for the former Yugoslavia[24] and Rwanda[25] which in 1998 led to the adoption of the Rome Stature for an International Criminal Court (ICC)[26]. Despite the massive resistance of the United States, the Rome Statute entered into force in 2002 and the Court started to function one year later in The Hague[27].

A number of human rights proponents continued to argue that international human rights standards required an international mechanism for effective enforcement and implementation. The first question, then, is whether it would be a good thing to have a world court for human rights. The answer tends to be an affirmative one, at least if the person who answers is someone who believes in human rights, the supremacy of law, and the possibility of conflict-solving through the judicial process[28].

The International Commission of Jurists (ICJ) made the establishment of a WCHR one of its central advocacy objectives at the First World Conference on Human Rights held in Tehran in 1968[29], a global event at which the question was addressed. During the lead-up to the Tehran Conference, ICJ Secretary-General and future Nobel Peace Prize winner Sean MacBride[30] addressed the question in numerous public speeches, seminars and conferences, including at the UNESCO International NGO Conference on Human Rights in Paris in September of 1968[31]. In his public advocacy, Sean Macbride insisted that while the elaboration of binding treaties was critical, the treaties must be subject to judicial enforcement in order to represent an effective contribution to international justice[32].

There is no doubt that we live in a geocentric world of nation-states, preoccupied mainly by "national" problems of the economy, society and politics. No matter where we live, for most of us the "nation" is the center of our political universe – the immovable point around which revolve other nations and, supposedly, the rest of the world. Our attachment to our nation is not merely legal; it is profoundly emotional. In the usual "international" context, the individual is nowhere to be found[33].

For a higher authority to come into being, therefore, a new compact is needed, a global civic contract that transcends the national paradigm. The good news is that such a contract already exists, both naturally and legally[34].

The WCHR, for example, was established in France by a General assembly of World Citizen in 1972.35 A provisional statute for the court was subsequently drafted, and still later the World Judicial [33]The accumulated power of nation-states does not make them the only legitimate participants in global decision-making. In a world threatened by war and injustice, "responsible citizenship" can only mean a powerful assertion of humanity's ultimate sovereignty. As Thomas Paine explained it, "individual human beings, each in his or her own personal and sovereign right, enter into a compact with each other to produce any government." Available at muckraker-gg.blogspot.com/2015/12/the-emergence-of-world-citizenship.html.

[34] The World Government of World Citizens, which was established in 1953, is both an extension of the individual and an expression of humanity as a whole. It grows from your sovereignty and mine as world citizens, and from our commitment to each other's protection and survival. It is a horizontal network based on natural rights and the human rights affirmed by both national constitutions and international agreements like the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It is also "vertical" as the political expression of a world community by those who recognize only the geographic limits of the planet itself. [35] The World Government of World Citizens is the political representation of the sovereign citizen of the world dynamically , intrinsically allied with sovereign humanity, to provide a global political service institution for the installation and maintenance of the world peace. It has been founded on September 4, 1953. See The Ellsworth Declaration available at http://www.worldservice.org/ells.html.

Commission was set up to handle preliminary complaints filed by world citizens[36].

In December 2008, the drive for a WCHR gained renewed momentum when the Foreign Minister of Switzerland, Micheline Calmy-Rey, declared it as one of eight projects constituting a new Swiss Agenda for Human Rights, which was launched in commemoration of the 60th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR). The Swiss Federal Department of Foreign Affairs established a Panel of Eminent Persons, co-chaired by Mary Robinson and Paulo Sérgio Pinheiro, to implement the new Agenda[37]. The experts combined their efforts to produce a consolidated draft proposed statute, which was published in 2010[38].

The WCHR Project is a collaborative effort of judges, lawyers, academics, practitioners, and nonprofit groups dedicated to the theory and practice of court-based protections of human rights. The goal of the project is to design a court that implements, affirms, and promotes unequivocal respect for human rights globally. The Court also would provide areas of human rights protection that are currently underserved by existing public law structures, such as the International Court of Justice (ICJ) and the International Criminal Court (ICC), and existing regional courts of human rights. The Design Team represents major legal systems around the world and provides a balance of gender, race, ethnicity, and culture. Over the past several years, Chief Justices of the World, lawyers, academics, and practitioners have worked together to clarify the need for the court, draft its Statute, and identify its guiding bodies of law. The Statute was presented at the plenary session of the 15th annual World Judiciary Summit, in Lucknow India, in December 2014. A draft copy of the Statute can also be found on the WCHR' website:[39]

The WCHR is an international treaty, the WCHR shall nevertheless become a permanent institution that brought into relationship with the United Nations. The WCHR shall have the power to decide in a final and binding manner on all complaints about alleged human rights violations; its judgments shall be enforced by domestic law enforcement bodies. An important principle modelled after the ICC statute is the complimentary nature of the WCHR's jurisdiction in relation to the jurisdiction of national human rights courts. The WCHR shall be brought in relationship with the United Nations by way of an agreement; its expenses shall be borne by the regular budget of the United Nations rather than by contributions of States Parties. The statute proposes The Hague as the seat of the WCHR, since centralizing international courts in one place will contribute to their exchange of ideas and cooperation[40].

A WCHR would be designed first and foremost to provide access to justice and effective redress to victims of human rights violations throughout the world. Individuals alleging violations would have recourse to an international judicial mechanism, composed of independent and impartial judges of the highest standard of competence, to bring complaints against States that are parties to the WCHR's Statute.

While victims of human rights violations seeking a remedy would, in the first instance, be expected to make use of their own States' national procedures and mechanisms, the WCHR would be available to them where the national mechanisms are unavailable, ineffective, or have failed to deliver justice.

The precise jurisdictional scope and structure of the WCHR will ultimately have to be negotiated by States. However, certain identifiable features will be essential for a credible and effective judicial mechanism. The WCHR would be a permanent standing institution established through a multilateral treaty under the auspices of the United Nations. It would be composed of highly qualified and independent fulltime judges elected by the States parties. It would have the power to take final and legally binding decisions on applications of alleged human rights violations committed by States parties, in breach of their international human rights obligations[41].

The WCHR shall be established by the Member Nation States, and the Member National Judiciaries, through their accession to the Treaty of Lucknow, as follows[42].

The Statute of a WCHR would be unlikely to contain any fresh enumeration of substantive human rights standards. Rather, the WCHR would assume jurisdiction for rights contained in the existing [36] World citizens, whose exercise of human rights can contravene "national laws," need a new kind of court, one both grounded on the legal defense of global rights and accessible to all. As the first Chief Justice of the World Court, Dr. Luis Kutner explained upon accepting the post, "The international community has come to realize that human rights are not an issue to be left solely to the national jurisdiction of individual states. These rights obviously need protection at a higher level within the framework of international law."Written with Garry Davis for Passport to Freedom: Guide for World Citizens, available at http://muckraker-gg.blogspot.mk/2015/12/the-emergence-of-world-citizenship.html.

[40] The composition of the Court and the election of the judges are regulated. Judges shall be nominated by States Parties; different than with respect to the UN Treaty Bodies, where a pluralistic composition is advantageous, it is necessary that all judges of the Court are jurists and are working on a fulltime professional basis.

universal human rights treaties[43], including the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and its Second Optional Protocol; the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights; Slavery Convention; Protocol Amending the Slavery Convention; Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide; the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination; the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women; the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment; the Convention on the Rights of the Child and its First and Second Optional Protocols; the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of their Families; the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities; and the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance[44].

2. Organization of the Court and Obligations of States Parties and of Non-State Actors

The Statute of the WCHR will be an international treaty[45]. The WCHR shall nevertheless become a permanent institution that brought into relationship with the United Nations[46]. The ratification of or accession to this Statute by a State shall be treated by the Secretary- General of the United Nations[47]. The WCHR shall have the power to decide in a final and binding manner on all complaints about alleged human rights violations; its judgments shall be enforced by domestic law enforcement bodies[48]. An important principle modelled after the ICC statute is the complimentary nature of the WCHR's jurisdiction in relation to the jurisdiction of national human rights courts[49].

The WCHR shall be composed of a body of 21 independent Justices[50], nationals of the States Parties to the Statute, elected in the individual capacity. All judges shell serve as a full –time members of the Court[51]. The WCHR shall be composed of the following organs: Plenary Court[52]; Chambers and Committees[53]; Presidency[54]; and Registry[55].

Besides the States and jointly called 'Entities' in the Draft Statute, could accept the jurisdiction of the WCHR. The term 'Entity' refers to any inter-governmental organization or non-State actor, including any business corporation, which has recognized the jurisdiction of the WCHR in accordance with Article 51[56]. This would constitute a welcome opportunity to solve the difficult problem of holding at least some types of non-State actors accountable in relation to international human rights law. One may think, first of all, of inter-governmental organizations, such as the United Nations and its specialized agencies; the European Union; the World Bank and other financial institutions, the World Trade Organization; and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO).57 Similarly, NATO forces involved in peace-keeping, peace-building or peace-enforcement missions might be held accountable for possible violations of international human rights standards. The same holds true for any other inter-governmental organization willing to ratify the Statute of the WCHR. Secondly, transnational corporations which adopt voluntary codes of conduct with references to human rights standards in [43] See Article 5 of the Statute.

[44] In deciding its cases, the Court shall apply the following substantive law: human rights conventions and declarations of which one or more of the parties is a member; human rights custom, and generally accepted practice; general principles of human rights law; human rights judicial decisions; and the teachings and writings of preeminent human rights experts. This provision shall not limit the power of the Court to decide a case under principles of equity, if the parties consent. See Article 20.

[45] Hence, ratifying States will be the primary category subject to the jurisdiction of the WCHR. In line with the traditional rules of public international law, no State will become party to the Statute and subject to the WCHR's general jurisdiction, without its explicit consent.

[46] The WCHR shall be brought in relationship with the United Nations by way of an agreement; its expenses shall be borne by the regular budget of the United Nations rather than by contributions of States Parties.

[56] Article 4(1) of the Statute. The 'Entities', for example include: International organizations constituted through a treaty between States, or between States and international organizations; Transnational corporations, i.e. business corporations that conduct a considerable part of the production or service operations in a country or in countries other than the home State of the corporation as a legal person; international non-governmental organizations, i.e. associations or other types of legal persons that are not operating for economic profit and conduct a considerable part of their activities in a country or in countries other than the home State of the organization as a legal person; Autonomous communities within a State or within a group of States and exercising a degree of public power on the basis of the customary law of the group in question or official delegation of powers by the State or States.

[57] The United Nations, for example, does exercise jurisdiction in the context of interim administrations, such as those established in relation to Kosovo (See Security Council resolution 1244, 10 June1999, S/RES/1999/1244), and East Timor (See Security Council resolution 1272, 22 October 1999, S/RES/1999/1272, replaced by United Nations Mission of Support in East Timor, Security Council resolution 1410,17 May 2002, S/RES/2002/1410), which may lead to human rights violations by military, police and other components.

the framework of their corporate social responsibilities (CSR) and which become members of the Global Compact of the United Nations[58] might be invited and encouraged to accept the binding jurisdiction of the WCHR in relation to selected human rights in the sphere of their respective influence, such as the prohibition of forced or child labour; the right to form and join trade unions; the right to collective bargaining; and the prohibition of discrimination. The WCHR would not only be in a position to decide in a binding judgment whether or not a business corporation subject to its jurisdiction has violated any human right of an employee, a client or any other person affected, but it might also provide proper reparation to the victim concerned. In principle, any non-State actor might be interested, for various reasons including upholding ethical standards, marketing, corporate identity or a genuine interest in strengthening human rights, to recognize the jurisdiction of the WCHR.

A second extension of the Court's jurisdiction is provided for by Article 7(2) which allows both States that are not parties to the Statute, and Entities that have not generally accepted the jurisdiction of the WCHR, to accept that jurisdiction on an ad hoc basis in respect of a particular case (complaint) submitted to the WCHR[59]. All forms of exercise of jurisdiction described so far result in a legally binding judgment of the WCHR[60]. The States Parties undertake to directly enforce the judgments of the WCHR by the respective bodies[61].

The judgment of the Plenary Court shall be final, but the judgment of a Chamber shall become final only if the parties declare that they will not request that the case be referred to the Plenary Court or three months after the date of the judgment, if reference of the case to the Plenary Court has not been requested[62].

The right to a judicial remedy for human rights violations[63] must include the right of the victim to receive adequate reparation by the same court that decides about the alleged human rights violation[64]. It is not efficient for an international court to only decide about the violation and leave it to the duty-bearer to decide which type of reparation, if any, it wishes to afford to the victim for the harm suffered. It is also not efficient to expect from the victim, who has already exhausted all domestic remedies before going through the cumbersome process of international human rights litigation, to start again, on the basis of the judgment by an international court, tort litigation before domestic courts[65].

Finally, it is important to be emphasized that any judgment of the WCHR shall be transmitted to the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights[66] who shall supervise its execution[67].

Conclusion

Rights mean essentially nothing if there is no way to enforce them. United Nations charter-based and committee-based human rights systems are extremely valuable, but they are "intergovernmental" systems. They are not court-like in their nature, or in their operation. Just as nations states need an International Court of Justice to resolve their treaty disputes, victims of human rights violations need a WCHR[68] to which they can turn when governments either violate their rights, or act indifferently in the face of preventable suffering or discrimination. The United Nations' intergovernmental human rights bodies cannot do it alone, and the right to judicial access is fundamental.

All proposals for a substantive reform of the UN treaty monitoring system, including the "consolidation" of existing treaty bodies, are faced with the considerable challenge of amending UN human rights treaties. Similar to the ICC, the WCHR would be based on a new treaty, the Statute of the WCHR. As other human rights treaties, this Statute should be drafted by the Human Rights Council[69] and adopted by the [58] Information on the Global Compact initiative can be found at www.unglobalcompact.org.

[59] This model of ad hoc acceptance of jurisdiction is also applicable when a State or Entity has accepted the jurisdiction of the Court but excluded a particular human rights treaty, and now a complaint is submitted in respect of an issue not governed by the existing acceptance of jurisdiction.

[60] See Article 18(1) of the Statute.

[61] The Court may only deal with any individual complaint if the complaint has been submitted to the highest competent domestic court and the applicant is not satisfied with judgment of this court. This admissibility requirement does not apply if, in the view of the Court, the relevant domestic remedy is not available or effective. See Article 9 (1) (2) of the Statute. See UN General Assembly Res. 60/147 of 16 December 2005.

[64] See Article 17(2) of the Statute.

[65] Since the jurisdiction of the World Court also extends to non-State actors, including business corporations, reparation orders shall also be made to non-State actors.

66 The Human Rights Council is the symbol of UN human rights reform relating to the Charter based system. It is the main political body of the United Nations dealing with human rights, composed of State representatives.

67 See Article 18 (4)(5) of the Statute.

68 The proposed Statute of the World Court of Human Rights (The Treaty of Lucknow) is drafted through an international collaboration of judges, lawyers and scholars, and the Chief Justices of the World unanimously pass a Resolution endorsing the creation of the Court as an avenue of recourse for the voiceless. 2015 and 2016 – Information about the World Court of Human Rights has been broadly disseminated, widespread public awareness of the need has been promoted, grass roots support has been built, and an Advisory Board has been formed.

[69] As a subordinate body of the General Assembly, it enjoys a higher status than the former Commission on Human Rights, and it meets on a much more regular basis than its predecessor. The most prominent new procedure is the "Universal Periodic Review" (UPR) of all UN member States. The Council thereby has to assess the human rights performance of States on the basis of governmental, non-governmental and expert

General Assembly. The WCHR would only gradually take over one of the functions of the treaty monitoring bodies, namely examining individual and inter-State complaints. This has at the same time the positive effect that the existing treaty bodies could devote more time and resources to their main function, the examination of State reports, which would contribute to reducing the considerable backlogs and delays in the State reporting procedure[70].

Through the adoption of human rights treaties over the past seven decades, the available remedies have expanded…in theory. Human rights standards are more widely known, better understood, and more universally accepted. The paradox is that the countries with the highest incidences of human rights violations often have governments with the least interest in fixing the problem. They also often have the least independent judiciaries. This is one factor in the emergence of the regional courts of human rights. The European Court of Human Rights is the closest regional example of what the World Court of Human Rights would be at a global level. Africa and the Americas have regional human rights systems as well, but they are somewhat more intergovernmental in nature. Asia, sadly, with 60% of the world's population, and with more than its share of human rights problems, has no regional human rights system. Each of these regional human rights systems has evolved from a fundamental societal need, and the time has come to make the system procedurally and substantively uniform, and universally available[71].

A WCHR would provide a major contribution to ensuring the right of victims of human rights violations to an effective remedy and to an adequate reparation for the harms suffered. It would also offer the opportunity to address a number of unsolved contemporary human rights problems, such as the accountability of non-State actors. The creation of the WCHR can be achieved in a smooth manner without any treaty amendment and without abolishing the present treaty monitoring bodies. It is a purely voluntary measure as States would decide freely whether or not to ratify the Statute of the WCHR and for which rights they were willing to recognize the binding jurisdiction of the WCHR. Finally, the WCHR should become the major counter-part of the Human Rights Council within the treaty system, and by supervising the execution of the binding judgments of the WCHR, the universal periodic review mechanism of the Human Rights Council would fulfil a meaningful and important function based on a strict division of labour between the two major future political and expert bodies of the United Nations in the field of human rights[72].

REASONS CONCERNING THE RESTRICTION OF SOME RIGHTS IN COMPLIANCE WITH THE PROVISIONS OF ART. 53 OF CONSTITUTION

Marius ANDREESCU[*]
Claudia ANDREESCU[]

Abstract

An essential dimension of the lawful state is represented by the consecration and guaranteeing of the fundamental rights and liberties, the ensuring of the optimum conditions for their exercising. The state authorities have the negative obligation to restrain from any arbitrary or excessive requirement that may restrict or condition the exercise of the constitutional right. In order to be legitimate and constitutional, any restriction of the exercise of the fundamental rights and liberties through the measures prescribed by the state's authorities, needs to have the character of exemption, not to affect the substance of the law and to fulfill all conditions stipulated by article 53 of Constitution. In relation to these premises we analyze in this study the constitutional institution of restraining some rights' exercising and the relevant aspects of jurisprudence. The observance of the principle of proportionality is one of the constitutional requirements in order that such a restrictive measure be legitimate. The main particularities of the principle of proportionality applied in the matter of restraining some rights' exercising are analyzed with reference to the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court and the European Court of Human's Rights.

Introduction

A Romanian author emphasized that freedom has a meaning provided the limit exists, as to manifest itself, it must depend on something, to circumscribe itself to certain coordinates. "Human freedom is construed in a bundle of limits that are the very condition of its exercise"[1].

Consecration and guaranteeing of human rights through domestic and international regulations does not exclude their limiting. Moreover, the existence of such unconditional, theoretical rights can not be accepted in a democratic constitutional system. The lack of the exercising limits and conditions prescribed by law, constitutions or international legal instruments can lead to arbitrariness or abuse of law, because it would not allow the differentiation of illegal behavior from the legal one. This idea is expressed by Article 4 of the French Declaration of Rights of Man and Citizen: "the exercising of each man's natural rights has no limits, others than those which provide every member of society the possibility to exercise those rights." Also, the legal doctrine noted that in the relationships between the rights holders „one's freedom begins where stops the other one's freedom, since the condition inherent to the person is its relationship with others"[2].

The social order and stability implies tolerance and mutual respect among the subjects participating to social relations. The exercising of fundamental rights and freedoms must not conflict with the order existing in social life: the coexistence of freedoms and social protection are the two commandments underlying the limits enacted by positive law"[3]. The difficulty lies in finding the most suitable solutions that would balance the individual interests and public interest while guaranteeing the fundamental rights and freedoms in situations in which could be limited or restricted their exercising.

In the relationship between the rights and freedoms, on one hand, and society on the other hand, two extreme attitudes have been outlined: sacrificing of rights and freedoms in the interests of social order, or the preeminence of rights and freedoms, even if thus are sacrificed the interests and order social[4]. None of these solutions is justified by the imperatives of authentic democracy and the requirement to achieve a balance and social harmony. The Constitutional regulations, to be effective, must achieve a balance between citizens and public authorities, then between public authorities and of course, citizens. It must also ensure protection to the individual against the arbitrary interference of State in the exercise of its rights and freedoms[5]. Therefore, the limits imposed to the fundamental rights and freedoms must be appropriate to a legitimate purpose, it can be: protection of society, social, economic and political order, of lawful order, or protection of the rights of others. The limits must not deprive of contents the rights themselves, but must ensure the exercise thereof in such situations.

The existence of certain limits on the exercise of fundamental rights is justified through constitutional protection or the protection through important international legal instruments or state human values. However, it is not acceptable that in the name of these values, the state authorities to limit discretionary and abusively the exercise of rights which in turn are constitutionally guaranteed. In this case one might come to destroying democracy under the pretext of defending it.

The principle of proportionality, understood as the appropriate relationship between the measures restricting the exercise of human rights and freedoms, the factual situation and the legitimate aim pursued represents a criterion for determining these limits, avoiding the excess power, but also a guarantee of the constitutional rights consecrated[6].

Paper Content

In doctrine, the legal instruments and jurisprudence, the limits of the fundamental rights and freedoms were differentiated by several criteria.

A first distinction is between the limit and limitation of fundamental rights[7]. Thus, the limit is a content item of the law and is necessary for its exercise. In contrast, the limitation (restriction) limits the exercise of a right by measures taken by the competent state authorities in view of a legitimate aim.

Another author[8] believes that there are limits imposed on the fundamental rights and freedoms in order to facilitate their implementation, and on the other hand, limits aiming at "the protection of society, its socio-economic and political and legal order"[9]. The limits deriving from such a purpose may be absolute, imposed by the demands of social life, in all circumstances for the protection of the essential values of the state and society, and on the other hand may be relative, those that do not apply in a general and permanent manner, but only to some of the rights and freedoms, or only in a certain time or in a determined situation, or only to certain subjects[10].

In our view we can distinguish: a) Conditions for the exercise of rights and freedoms that are found even in their legal and constitutional definition contents; b) restrictions, exemptions, suspension, loss of rights, which have an exception and temporary nature, being measures taken by the state authorities to protect or achieve a legitimate aim.

State interference in the exercise of the fundamental rights and freedoms can be realized in principle by restricting and suspending certain rights or by derogations. These modalities are regulated in constitutions and international legal instruments. Avoiding any misuse of state authorities and guaranteeing of the rights and fundamental freedoms in such situations requires constitutional regulation, but also in the international legal instruments of the conditions justifying such measures' enacting.

There are constitutions governing the institution of certain rights' restriction in certain circumstances[11], the possibility of suspending certain rights or freedoms[12] or in cases that due to the abusive exercising of a right, its exercise is being lost[13].

Romania Constitution imposes conditions on the exercise of certain rights or freedoms. Thus, the freedom of movement is exercised under the conditions established by law (Article 25, para. (1)). Physical person may dispose of oneself, if not violating the rights and freedoms of others, public order or morals (Article 26, para. (2)); a person's right to access information of public interest can not be restricted, but should not be prejudicial to the protection of young people or national security. (Art. 31 paragraph (3)); the right to strike can only be exercised under law, which sets its limits (article 43, par. (2)); the content and limits of ownership right are determined by law (Article 44 para. (1)); the freedom of expression may not harm the dignity, honor, privacy of person or the right to own image (article 30, par. (6)); meetings may be organized and held only peacefully, without any kind of arms (39).

The restriction of certain rights or freedoms is governed by Article 53 of the Constitution. These are provisions of principle, which refer to the measures taken by state through law or government ordinance that represents interference with the exercise of constitutionally guaranteed rights. In order not to affect the substance of the right, such measures are temporary and also, in order to be constitutional, must comply cumulatively with the conditions provided by article 53. There are also constitutional provisions which restrict the exercise of some rights, the restrictions having a permanent character. The restrictions are usually specific to the legal content of the law constitutionally consecrated. Thus, the exercise of individual freedom may be restricted by search, detention or arrest (Article 23). Inviolability of home may be restricted under the terms of article 27, par. (2). The provisions of article 36, par. (2), prohibit to certain categories of persons the right to vote. The provisions of article 40, par. (3) prohibit such professional categories the right to join political parties.

There are differences between restrictions and derogations, and on the other hand, that can cover the exercise of rights and fundamental freedoms.

Restrictions are measures considered needed in a democratic society, inflicted in order to achieve public interest or to protect the rights and freedoms of others. In this respect, the provisions of article 18 of the Convention states that: "... restrictions... can not be applied unless on the purpose for which they were intended."

With all specific aspects, arising from Constitution or international legal instruments, can be identified common conditions for the legitimacy of restrictions: be prescribed by law, be necessary in a democratic society, not be discriminatory, be appropriate at least to one of purposes provided by law and justifying circumstance. Compliance with these conditions must be achieved cumulatively. In this way the fundamental rights are guaranteed and is removed the arbitrary interference of state authorities in their pursuit.

Exemptions are wider restrictions of rights and fundamental freedoms and can be decided by States in emergencies. Restrictions may aim, in principle, any fundamental right, as opposed to derogatory measures that may concern only some human rights guaranteed by the international legal instruments.

From the international legal instruments, to which I referred, results that the derogations, in order not to be arbitrary, must meet the following conditions: must be applied only in exceptional circumstances; be strictly appropriate to the facts; be compatible with other obligations that States members adjusted to the international law; not be discriminatory; the states that make use of the right of derogation to announce the relevant international fora.

There are also absolutely guaranteed rights (absolute rights) in that no restrictions or derogations are being allowed. Obviously, we are referring to the right to life; the right not to be subjected to torture or to any kind of inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

The principle of proportionality is a guarantee in all circumstances when the exercise of a right or fundamental freedom is subjected to a condition, restriction, suspension or exemption. The principle of proportionality, applied in this matter has into consideration the achieving of a fair balance between individual interests and the public interest or private interests which corresponds to the fundamental subjective rights, consecrated and guaranteed constitutionally.

Regarding the Romanian constitutional provisions related to the restriction of fundamental rights and freedoms in the literature in specialty, a distinction is made between the common circumstances to restrict the exercising of certain rights that form the subject for the regulation of provisions of article 53 of the Constitution, and secondly the special circumstances, specific to certain rights and freedoms. The common restriction circumstances are of temporal nature, are essentially fortuitous, while the special circumstances are permanent[14]. The quoted author stresses that such circumstances should be expressly recognized as "not being the product of conventionalism"[15].

Although these circumstances are common, they can justify the restriction having into consideration the nature of the right or freedom. Thus, no circumstances can justify the restriction of the right to life or the right not to be tortured.

Romania Constitution uses a simple and efficient method for regulating the restriction of exercising certain rights and freedoms (common circumstances) by provisions in one single article. The provisions of Article 53 allow the restriction of certain rights and freedoms, but only conditioned[16]. The issue of interpretation and application of the provisions of Article 53 is particularly complex because the restrictions can aim the exercise of any right or fundamental freedom consecrated and guaranteed by the Constitution, except those regarded as absolute. The complexity is due to the diversity of concrete situations justifying the restriction of certain rights.

The rules imposed by the provisions of Article 53 have the value of a constitutional principle, because they are applicable to all fundamental rights and freedoms of citizens.

In the version prior to revision of Constitution, the provisions of article 49 indicated that the restraints can be achieved only by law, if necessary, according to the following purposes: "protection of national security, public order, health or morals, rights and freedoms of citizens, the conduct of criminal investigation, preventing of consequences of a natural disaster, or of any extremely severe catastrophe." At the same time, the restriction should not affect the existence of the right or freedom and must be proportional to the situation that caused it.

Through the Law amending the Constitution on September 18, 2003, were modified the provisions of Article 49, and by the republication of Constitution was given a new numbering of the Articles, Article 49 becoming Article 53. The initial rules in place for the restriction of some rights exercising have been maintained but two more conditions have been added: the restriction must be "necessary in a democratic society" and another condition is that the restrictive measure be applied "nondiscriminatory". In this way, the Romanian Constitution perceived in this matter the most important rules in the international legal instruments in the matter and capitalized C.E.D.O jurisprudence.

If making a comparative analysis between the Romanian constitutional provisions and those contained in certain international legal instruments governing the conditions for the restriction of certain rights and freedoms exercising, some differences can be found. For our study is of interest that the provisions of Article 53. (2) of Constitution expressly consecrates proportionality as a condition that must be met in case of restriction of certain rights exercising, while in most international legal instruments this condition results implicitly out of the regulations content and is deduced by way of interpretation, by the jurisprudence of international courts.

To identify the peculiarities of the principle of proportionality, applied in this matter, it is useful to highlight some aspects of doctrine and jurisprudence on the interpretation and application of Article 53 of the Constitution.

The doctrine asserted that, in case the legislator restricts the exercise of certain rights without indicating expressly the constitutional background, it "does not remove the obligation of a verification within the procedure for monitoring the legitimacy of the constitutional law, if the measure thus established constitutes a limitation of a right"17. In recitals of Decision No. 4/1992 of Constitutional Court results that under the assumption that the legal provision subjected to a control, constitutes a limitation of a constitutional right, it is legitimate only in cases falling within the limiting situations expressly provided by Article 53 of Constitution[18].

The Constitutional Court held that the provisions of Article 53, have into consideration the fundamental rights and freedoms contained in Chapter II, Section I of Constitution, and no other rights[19]. Our Constitutional Court, interpreting the provisions of Article 53 in relation to the provisions of article 5 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the distinction was made between the loss and restriction of a right. The last situation is envisaged by the provisions of Article 53. "The Court finds that the invoking of provisions of article 5 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms has no bearing in the cause because these provisions apply to deprivation of liberty and not to restriction of freedom"[20].

At the same time, our Constitutional Court decided that the restriction of a right must be temporary, being instituted only for the time period the causes that led it are acting, which are limitative consecrated by para (1) of Article 53 of the Constitution[21].

Whenever the restriction of a right exercising is realized in order to defend the rights of citizens, restrictive measures are legitimate only in consideration of a particular law, as without this restriction, that right would be affected[22]. The restrictions brought upon the right exercising should not bring touch to the substance of this right. The Constitutional Court has established that through the law can be disposed certain restrictions of ownership, but they should not bring touch to this very right substance. These restrictions can be established in regard to the object of the right or other attributes of law, for the protection of the rights of persons or the general social and economic interests[23].

Constitutional Court jurisprudence distinguishes the restriction of certain rights related to the circumstances in which the legislator conditions the exercise of a right. In this regard it was decided that the seniority requirements established by article 19 of Law No.51 / 1995[24] on the legal profession, are seeking to enforce the right of defense in terms of competence, professional responsibility and practice experience, related to hierarchical level of the courts and to the complexity of the cases, so it is natural that they involve certain conditions, which cannot be regarded as affecting the right to work, but as measures to protect both the interests of the litigant and lawyer's[25].

Also, the exemption by law of certain categories of citizens of the benefit of rights granted to others, who are in a different situation, does not represent a limitation on the exercise of these rights. Therefore the provisions of Article 53 of Constitution are not applicable[26].

Proportionality is a condition of constitutionality of the measures ordered by law or by ordinances, through which is restricted the exercise of some fundamental rights and freedoms, condition expressly stipulated by provisions of article 53, par. (2) of Constitution. The Analysis of the particularities of this principle must be carried out systematically in the context of the Article 53. Express consecration of a particular aspect of principle of proportionality, through the provisions of article 53, par. (2) changes the proportionality, from a rule of moral or opportunity into a law's constitutionality condition, while the Constitutional Court has the power to check the compliance with this principle.

Restriction of certain rights or freedoms by law represents a requirement of the state in the exercising of those rights and freedoms, justified by achieving a legitimate aim. To avoid arbitrariness or excess of power by state authorities that adopt such measures, it is necessary to exist guarantees provided by the state, which need to be adequate to the constitutional purpose pursued, namely for the protection of the fundamental rights and freedoms in the concrete situations in which prejudice might be brought to them. The principle of proportionality is thus a constitutional guarantee that allows sanctioning by the constitutional court of the arbitrary interferences of Parliament or Government in those rights exercising[27].

Therefore, the measures taken by the State through which is restricted the exercise of fundamental rights or freedoms, in order not to be abusive must be not only legal, i.e. disposed by law, or by a normative act equivalent as legal force to the law, but also legitimate (fair) that is necessary in a democratic, non-discriminatory society, proportionate to the situation causing them and not affect the substance of the law. The proportionality and necessity in a democratic society are criteria of evaluation, both for the legislator as for the judge, of the legitimacy of the restriction of certain rights and freedoms.

In the doctrine was pointed out that whenever the legislator brings a limitation in the exercise of a right or freedom, shall state expressly in the wording of that disposition, the provision, under constitutional article 53[28]. This statement aims implicitly the respecting of the principle of proportionality and corresponds to the principle of supremacy of Constitution: "The law is an enactment act, in the meaning that the legislator's will necessarily finds limits in the supremacy of Constitution, as a fundamental law of state and society"[29]. In such cases, the assessment made by the legislator or constitutional judge, is based on a proportional reasoning. The restriction of certain rights exercising is justified by the existence of diverse interests and in some cases, even contradictory. On one hand, the subjective interest of the fundamental rights holders, and on the other hand, the public interest or the need to guarantee the fundamental rights of other persons. In such circumstances, one of the interests backgrounds its constitutional legitimacy on a provision and the other one, on another constitutional provision. The proportional reasoning involves the comparing of interests, so as the limiting of the exercise of a right or fundamental freedom does not exceed what is strictly necessary to satisfy the public interest or the rights of others.

The principle of proportionality, applicable in the matter of restriction of certain rights, is concretely determined by the meaning of the elements being compared, pending on which can be established whether the respective measure is either appropriate or not to the situation and intended purpose. Proportionality of the restrictive measures must be assessed in relation to a well-defined legitimate aim, whose significance is given where applicable, by the doctrine, statute or case law. The restrictive measure violates the condition of proportionality if the purpose for which it was prepared is generic, and does not indicate a particular right or fundamental freedom as legitimate aim[30].

The purposes justifying the restriction of certain rights and related to which is appreciated the respecting of the principle of proportionality are expressly and limitating provided by article 53, par. (1) of Constitution. Their meaning is important to determine the proportionality of the restrictive measures.

Thus, by "national security", a newly introduced expression following the revision of Constitution, which replaces the term "national security" means "the existing state of legality, balance and social, economic and political stability and development of the Romanian national state, as a sovereign, unitary, independent and indivisible, for the maintenance of public order and the climate for unrestrained exercise of rights, freedoms and fundamental duties of citizens, according to democratic principles and norms settled by the Constitution"[31].

"Public order" is the set of rules that ensures the safety of society, public welfare, social harmony, respect for law and for the legitimate decisions of public authorities.

"Public health" means health protection of whole population or part thereof.

"Public Morals" is all precepts of conduct, dependent on individual conscience and values of the community to which he belongs.

Ensuring the respecting of citizens' "rights and freedoms" is a requirement mainly due to the fact that the person belongs to a social collectivity, aspect implying the fact that the rights and freedoms of others require the same protection as their own rights and freedoms.

The "Criminal Instruction" is a component of lawful order and implies the succession of acts and deeds that form the criminal proceedings in all its phases and stages[32].

Depending on the legitimate aim pursued is determined the "margin of appreciation" which the public authorities have to impose limitations to the exercise of fundamental rights and freedoms, as provided by Article 53 of Constitution. The limits of the right of appreciation of the competent state authorities and also the respecting of principle of proportionality, are established in our constitutional jurisprudence court, including by reference to C.E.D.O. jurisprudence.

Thus, the proportionality of the interference of state authorities is considered by the international court against the requirements of a democratic society, a concept found in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court.

Also, our constitutional court invoked other aspects of C.E.D.O jurisprudence: the restrictive measures are: proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued if national and institutional legislative system has adequate and sufficient guarantees against abuses[33]. There is a distinction between facts and valuable judgments. If the materiality of the first one can be proved, the value judgments are not able to be demonstrated in terms of their accuracy34. Therefore, the compliance with the condition for proportionality of the restrictive measures imposed on freedom of expression is appreciated differently depending on the nature of allegations. The proportionality can be regarded as a strict fitness unto the purpose of the restrictive measure, or there may be a greater margin of appreciation of authorities when the legitimate aim pursued is public morality, for instance[35].

These are just some aspects of C.E.D.O. jurisprudence, invoked in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court of Romania, in case are to be analyzed the restrictive measures imposed by Parliament or Government, regarding the exercise of fundamental rights and freedoms.

The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court of Romania contributed to identifying the features of proportionality principle applied in relation to guaranteeing the fundamental rights and freedoms, including in situations in which the competent state authorities have restrictive measures which must meet the conditions of Article 53.

In this matter, the Constitutional Court jurisprudence reveals defining characteristics of the constitutional principle of proportionality, which assumes the necessary adequacy of the constitutional guarantees conferred to fundamental rights and freedoms, to the finality pursued, namely the protection of the exercise of rights in concrete situations that could be restricted. The applying of the principle of proportionality has a dual significance: state guarantees on human rights become effective in specific situations; It is removed the arbitrary interference of public authorities in the exercise of these rights or in applying the measures for restricting their exercise, measures which constitute abuse of power.

Proportionality is a fundamental guarantee for exercising the fundamental right, subjected to a limit or circumstance. The existence of some limits or conditions for the exercise of some fundamental rights is justified by the idea of constitutional protection of some important human or state values.

In the meaning of those above Romania's Constitutional Court held: "The legislation, doctrine and jurisprudence have rejected and reject constantly the existence of absolute rights and liberties"[36]. Given this premise, the court identifies the Romanian constitutional provisions that set limits, conditions or restrictions in exercising of some rights[37].

Although not expressly referring to the principle of proportionality, the decision No.13 / 1999 is important because it reveals the peculiarities of this principle applied in the matter of fundamental rights and freedoms protection. The need for a proper balance expresses the general principle of proportionality. At the same time, the conditions, limitations or restrictions imposed on some fundamental rights must be appropriate to the objective pursued by the constituent legislator, that of protection of the fundamental rights in situations in which it can be conditioned or limited.

By several decisions, the Constitutional Court ruled that it has jurisdiction to verify the compliance with the proportionality requirement in case of certain rights' restriction. The Constitutional Court assumes this jurisdiction only if the proportionality is a condition of constitutionality of the law instituting the restriction of the right. "Unquestionably, the checking of proportionality is within the competence of Court's control, while the proportionality of restricting with the situation that has caused, it is a constitutionality prerequisite of the law that established the restriction of the right"[38].

This finding of the Constitutional Court is important for several aspects: proportionality is regarded as a requirement of constitutionality which the law, setting up the restriction of the right, must follow. In this way the principle of proportionality is not only a simple state of fact, closed to opportunity, but is a legal requirement within the Court's controlling jurisdiction. The Court draws a distinction between the general principle of proportionality, the proportionality applied in other branches of law and the constitutional principle of proportionality applicable in matter of certain rights' restriction. The Constitutional Court competence refers only to the constitutional principle of proportionality, consecrated by Article 53 para (2) provisions. To be noted the interpretation of our Constitutional Court on the content of the principle of proportionality applied in this matter: the appropriateness of restriction to situation that caused it.

The Constitutional Court pointed out that proportionality must be analyzed and understood pending the legitimate purpose aimed for which is applied the restricting measure. This purpose has to be one of the stipulated limiting set of article 53, par. (1). Moreover, then this, because the law through which is ordered the restriction of a right's exercising, to respect the principle of proportionality, the reference to the legitimate aim must not be generic, but it needs to be determined. Analyzing the restricting of the right to free movement, the Government Ordinance no.50 / 1994, the Constitutional Court held that the restriction of a constitutional right is possible, in accordance with Article 53 of the Constitution "solely on account of a certain law, as a measure that is being imposed whereas without that restriction, that right would be severely undermined and, according to the principle of proportionality, only to the extent necessary, so that this right be not at least partly compromised ... or, in the absence of specifying in whose service the restriction takes place, from the simple reference to the social protection right (Article 1 of the Ordinance) or to social rights existing (Article 7 of the Ordinance) does not result neither that this restriction is imposed - as required by Article 53 of the Constitution - nor that it is proportional the situation that caused it - as required by paragraph 2 of the same Article"[39].

The argumentation of proportionality reasoning, which in the matter of certain rights' restriction involves the adequacy of the restrictive measure to the situation in fact, but also to the legitimate aim pursued, is used in the jurisprudence of Constitutional Court. Analyzing the respecting of principle of proportionality, in the event of exceptions of unconstitutionality regarding the provisions of Article 148, paragraph 1, letter h of the Criminal Procedure Code, our Constitutional Court found that principle of proportionality is satisfied, having into consideration both the provisions of article 18 of the Convention and the provisions of article 53, par. (2) of Constitution. It was found that the preventive arrest measure is necessary for conducting a criminal investigation and proportional to the situation that has caused it[40].

In the jurisprudence of Constitutional Court, the argumentation of proportionality is revealed under the form of a fair balance analysis that should exist between two constitutionally protected rights, balance which determines simultaneously their limits of their exercising[41].

The Constitutional Court stressed that the principle of proportionality, under article 53, par. (2) of Constitution, has as objective only the rights and fundamental freedoms[42]. In this regard, the Constitutional Court stated that the ratio between the offense committed and the penalty imposed, which must be a just one, exceeds the regulation sphere of Article 53, para. (2) of Constitution. "It is undeniable that the verification of proportionality belongs to the controlling powers of the Court, as long as the restriction has as objective the exercise of certain fundamental rights or freedoms[43].

The Constitutional Court jurisprudence contributes to the understanding and explaining of the principle of proportionality in cases in which it is noticed its interference in the principle of equality.

To be noted that the jurisprudence of our Constitutional Court, in matters of interpretation and applying of the principle of equality has evolved, from the admitting that different situations must be treated differently up to the recognition of new constitutional rights, respectively "the right to difference"

The uniformity has been consistently rejected in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, in connection to the interpretation and applying of the principle of equality. To situations, which by their nature are different, must be applied a different treatment. The principle of proportionality means, in this case the required adequacy of legal regulation to the objective situation considered. Also, the proportionality requires the existence of a motivation "objective and reasonable" for a differentiated legal treatment applied to identical situations.

These rules are formulated in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court: "The principle of equality before the law requires the establishment of equal treatment for situations, which pending on the purpose aimed, are not different. Accordingly, a different treatment may not be only the exclusive appreciation expression of the judge, but must be rationally justified, in observing the principle of equality of citizens before the law and public authorities"[44].

Applying the reasoning of proportionality, the Constitutional Court has reached to the recognition of a fundamental right: "the right to difference". "In general, it is estimated that the violation of the principle of equality and nondiscrimination exists when applying a differential treatment to equal cases, without the existence of an objective and reasonable motivation or if there is a disproportion between the aimed purpose by unequal treatment and means used. In other words, the principle of equality does not prohibit specific rules. Therefore the principle of equality leads to underline the existence of a fundamental right, the right to difference, and as far as equality is not natural, the fact to impose it would mean to establish a discrimination[45].

Conclusions

The jurisprudence issues discussed above lead to the conclusion that the understanding and applying of the principle of proportionality by the Constitutional Court is consistent with the meanings conferred to this principle, applied in the field of human rights' guaranteeing by C.E.D.O.

However, the jurisprudence of our Constitutional Court is not generous nor edifying in the application and interpretation of the principle of proportionality in ensuring fundamental rights and freedoms, which demonstrates that proportionality, as a principle of law in general and constitutional law in particular, does not represent another object of major concern of jurisprudence.

Most times, the Constitutional Court refers to the criterion of proportionality generically, invoking the provisions of article 53 of Constitution. There are relatively few decisions of our Constitutional Court to include elements of proportionality analysis. It is true that the interpretation and understanding of the principle of proportionality, considered to be one of the guarantees of fundamental rights and freedoms in situations where it is possible to limit or restrict their exercising, presents serious difficulties, given the diversity of concrete situations, the appreciation margin recognized by legislator, the nature of the right protected and not least the interpretative reasoning of Constitutional Court, which must be maintained to a high level of abstraction, setting the constitutionality of a provision by relating to the provisions of Constitution.

Summarizing, we can say that in the matter of fundamental rights and freedoms' protection, the principle of proportionality is explicitly or implicitly invoked by the Constitutional Court in the following forms:

a) necessary appropriateness of constitutional and legal guarantees conferred to fundamental rights and freedoms, on pursued finality, namely the protection of the exercise of rights in concrete situations in which could be restricted;
b) adequate relationship between the restrictive measures ordered by law, the situation in fact and the legitimate aim pursued, in accordance with Article 53 of Constitution;
c) "argumentation of proportionality" as a means of interpretation used by the Constitutional Court to establish the existence of a fair, equitable ratio, between categories of rights and interests constitutionally protected.

CONSTITUTION AND CONSTITUTIONALISM CONTEMPORARY ISSUE

Abstract

In a democratic society, the judicial legitimacy of the state and its power, of its institutions, but also the social and political grounds are generated and determined by the Constitution, defined as expressively as possible as being: "The fundamental political and judicial settlement of a people" (I. Deleanu).
The supremacy of the Constitution has as main effect the conformity of the entire system of law with the constitutional norms. Guaranteeing the compliance with this principle, essential for the state of law, is first of all an attribution of the Constitutional Court, but also an obligation of the legislative power to receive, through the adopted normative acts, in content and in form, the constitutional norms.
Altering the fundamental law of a state represents a political and judicial act extremely complex with major meanings and implications for the socio-political and national systems, but also for each individual. This is why such measure should be very well justified, to answer certain socio-political and legal needs well shaped and mainly to match the principles and rules specific to a democratic constitutional and state system, by insuring its stability and functionality.
These are a few aspects of the Romanian contemporary constitutionalism that this study shall critically analyse in order to differentiate between the constitutional ideal and reality.

Keywords: Constitution, constitutional supremacy, constitutional ideal and reality, fundamental rights, discretionary power of the state, constitutional reform.

Introduction

For any people, for any form of modern social state organization, the Constitution was and is an ideal given by the meanings and role of the fundamental law especially for each one's social existence.

In modern history, starting with the 18th century, the constitution has been imposed along with other major institutions created with the purpose of expressing the political, economic or legal structural transformations as the fundamental law of a state. Towards the importance and meanings of the Constitution, of the practices in this area, it is considered as the fundamental political and judicial settlement of a state. This is why the Constitution was and is created in a broader vision, exceeding the politics, not only as a fundamental law, but also as a political and state reality identifiable with the society it creates or shapes and for whom its adoption has the meaning of a true revolution.

The constitution states the fundamental principles of the economic, political, social and legal life, in accordance with the fundamental values promoted and protected by the state. The people, according to Hegel, must have, for his constitution, the feeling of his law and state of fact, thus it may exist, in an exterior form, but without meaning and value. How current are the words of the great philosopher saying that "The constitution of any given nation depends in general on the character and development of its self-consciousness"?

The value, content and meanings of the constitution as an ideal of a democratic society were clearly stated by the constitutional acts and constitutions opening the way for the constitutional process. Thus, the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen of 1789 stated that "Any society, in which no provision is made for guaranteeing rights or for the separation of powers, has no Constitution". The United States Constitution, the first written constitution in the world, in 1787, stated in its preamble that "We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America". As stated by the American legalists the spirit of constitutionalism has found its climax in the American Constitution. Therefore, right from its apparition, the constitution has been considered and analysed in opposition to absolutism, as a limitation in the arbitrary performance of power. Once this purpose has been fulfilled, the constitutionalism continued to play an important and, most of all, progressive role in history, aiming the efficient guarantee of the fundamental rights and freedoms for citizen.

state's law to the state of law was and still remains a long and difficult process enlisted between the poles of contradictory values. Conceptually, on the foundation of the construction of the state of law is the idea of rationalizing the system of law and of emphasizing its efficacy. The essential requirement of the constitutional ideal of the state of law is represented by the subordination of the state towards the law and the limitation of the state's power using the law. The supremacy of the law and, implicitly, of the constitution, forces the state authorities to comply with the fundamental rights and freedoms of the citizens, to withheld from any arbitrary interference in their performance, moreover to adopt politically and legally appropriate and necessary means for the preservation and affirmation of the fundamental rights.

Indeed, the constitutions, in a state of law which assumes the compliance of legality and the rule of law, the protection of the individual and of the citizen in his relations with the power, the performance of the entire state activity based on and within the strict limits of the law, are or might be an obstacle in the way of the arbitrary, if they express the general will and their respect becomes a "religion" for the governors.

The ideal of the constitution, as well as of the constitutionalism, is also expressed by the concept of the supremacy of the constitution. We may say that the supremacy of the constitution is one of its qualities placing it on top of the politico-legal institutions of a state and makes the constitution the source of all regulations in the political, economic, social and legal areas. The most important consequences of the supremacy of the constitution are the conformity of the entire legal system with the constitutional norms and the fundamental obligation of the state authorities to perform their attributions within the limit and in the spirit of the constitution.

Of course, the constitution's supremacy would represent only an ideal if there were not any specific guarantees which mainly allow the control of power and the avoidance of its evolution towards the arbitrary. Among these guarantees, only two of them are more important: the control of the constitutionality of the laws which represent an important counterweight to the parliamentary and governmental powers, while the second one refers to the establishment of the principle to free access to justice. In a constitutional system based on the constitution's supremacy, the control performed by the courts represent an important guarantee of the compliance with the citizens' rights and freedoms, especially in their relations with the executive authorities.

The essence and finality of the constitution, as well as of the constitutionalism as a historic process consists in the achievement of a balance between different realities and forces, but which must coexist and harmonize to insure the social stability, the individual freedom, but also the legitimacy and functionality of the state's authorities. In other words, the purpose of a democratic constitution consists in the achievement of a fair and rational balance between different realities, between individual and public interest. In the meaning of the above mentioned, Prof Ioan Muraru stated that "In socio-legal and contemporary state realities, the constitutionalism must be seen as a complex politico-legal status, expressing at least two aspects: a) on the one hand, the constitution must reflect the demands of the movement of ideas (originating in its evolution) on the state of law and the democracy, public freedoms, organization, functioning and balance of powers; b) on the other hand, the large reflection of the subjects of law regarding the constitutional provisions. This mutual reflection is the only one able to insure the efficiency and viability of the constitution; it may insure the concordance between the constitutional rules and the political practice".

We have discussed about what could be considered as the ideal of the constitution and the constitutionalism. The reality of a constitution mainly represents the interpretation and application of the fundamental law, but especially the compliance with its provisions by the public authorities. There cannot be an ideal, perfect and immutable constitution. The constitution, as fundamental law, in order to be efficient, must be adjusted to the social, economic and political realities of the state. The dynamic of these factors shall eventually determine alterations of the constitutional norms. The achievement of an adequate relation between the constitution and the political, ideological, economic and state's realities is a complex matter, which must not be formally understood. We emphasize the fact that strictly juridical, the constitution may define both a liberal regime, as well as dictatorial one. If in any type of state, either democratic, or totalitarian there is a constitution, one cannot state that there is a real constitutional regime everywhere. The features of the constitutional regime existing at some point in history in a state, but also the way in which is perceived and complied with, the constitution determines the reality of the fundamental law and of the constitutionalism.

The differences which may arise between the constitutional ideal above expressed, and on the other hand, the reality of the constitutionalism existing in every state is justified by objective and subjective factors. Among the objectives factors, we identify:

a) the dynamic of the social life in relation to the stability of the constitution. The inevitable transformations in the social, economic, political or legal life of a state led to a distance between these realities and the viability and efficiency of the constitutional norms. This situation is one of the factors determining the revision of the fundamental law;
b) the constitution has all the features of a normative act, therefore the application of the fundamental law requires an interpretation of the public authorities, which may imply a different reception of the constitution;
c) there may be cases in which the constitutional > regulations, though democratic in their essence are in contrast with the socio-economic realities of the moment, inferior towards the democratic constitutional principles. Such situation inevitably leads to a reduced reception of the constitutional norms among the population and to its inefficiency. The history of the Romanian constitutionalism offers a conclusive example in this meaning, if we consider the period between 1866-1938, in which the reality of the Romanian constitutionalism was inferior to the values and principles stated by the Constitutions of 1866 and 1923.

There are also subjective factors we might determine a difference between the constitutional values, and on the other hand the way in which are respected and applied. The tendency of the central authorities to abuse the power, attempting to authoritatively exercise powers, sometimes in disregard with the constitutionals norms, represents an important subjective factor denaturising the norms and spirit of the constitution, with the consequence of building a political, economic and social reality obviously contrasting with the fundamental law.

We shall exemplify the above mentioned with brief mentions to the Romanian Constitutions of 1866, 1923 and 1991.

The Constitution of 1866 was mainly a liberal constitution which stated in the area of the legal and political practice the Romanian liberalism, emphasizing the "historical role and purpose" of the Romanian bourgeoisie in the creation of a form of government and of democratic institutions based on the creative valorisation of our traditions in this area. The functionality of the Constitution raised a controverted issue regarding the incapacity of the monarchy and of the central authorities of that time to adjust to the social realities of the country. From a socio-economic perspective, the Romanian society was polarized, the middle class being extremely thin as average (formed only by clerks and liberal professionals). In exchange, the majority of the peasantry recently released from servitude, mostly analphabetic, was in contrast with the reduced average of large landowners, many of them having received a good education in western schools. Under these conditions, the Romanian monarchy system and the Romanian state system were compelled to adjust the political parliamentary regime to the existent social and political structure, and from here on sprang most of the limits of the Romanian constitutionalism, because the general interests of society interfered and were contradictory with the interests of the landowners, amid a weak economic power of the bourgeoisie crumbled into several factions and political groups. To all these, were added the personal ambitions of the politicians who, often, have seriously complicated the nature of the political area, hardening the acceleration of reforms and the amplitude of the modernization.

Analysed from a historical-political perspective, the Constitution of 1923, as an expression of the real balance of forces during 1919-1923 has represented the main legal settlement on whose base functioned the fundamental institutions of the united Romania, offering the Romanian state the monarchism, but based on the democratic parliamentary regime. The Constitution of 1923 maintains most of the structure of the Constitution of 1866, taking and deepening a series of principles offering the feature of modernity, as well as the real possibility for democratizing the interwar Romanian state and society. In this meaning, under the empire of this Constitution, the principles of representativeness, the separation of powers, the principle of legality and legitimacy of the laws, of the control of constitutionality, as well as the principles regarding the elective system and of the regime of property were much stronger than the one mentioned by the settlement in 1866. So, the Constitution of 1923 has represented a progress in the democratization of the Romanian society.

The application of the Constitution of 1923 has beard the mark of two trends: on the one hand, a series of subsequent legislations have tried to develop the democratic content of some provisions, and on the other hand, certain laws have narrowed the rights and fundamental freedoms. The position of the monarchy in the political practice has led to the reality that the appointment of the Government by the king, followed by the dissolution of the legislative bodies and the organization of new elections was, first of all, the expression of certain deals between the monarch and the representatives of the main parties, consultations which in most cases were the result of subjectivism and personal ambitions represented by the governmental changes. During the interwar period, 11 legislative bodies succeeded, representing their development within half the legal time stated by the Constitution.

Undoubtedly, the Romanian Constitution in force, adopted on 1991 has represented the rebirth of the Romanian constitutional life. The fundamental law of the state represents the fundamental legislative framework for the organization and functioning of the Romanian state and society on democratic bases. Nevertheless, the reality of the contemporary Romanian constitutionalism proves, in most cases, an abandonment of the values and spirit of the Constitution from certain central authorities, through their obvious intent to evolve towards the discretionary performance of the attributions given to them by the law and the biased interpretation of certain constitutional norms. We shall present two examples:

- The right to a decent living is stated by Art 47 of the Romanian Constitution, which states that: "The State shall be bound to take measures of economic development and social protection, of a nature to ensure a decent living standard for its citizens". It is a fundamental human right based in the feature as "social state" of the Romanian state, mentioned by Art 1 Para 3 of the Constitution which entails constitutional obligations for the state, namely to adopt political and legislative decisions in the political, economic and social areas, whose finality to be represented not only by the guaranteeing, but also the achievement of this fundamental right. This obligation is more of a constitutional and political ideal, than a legal obligation, because there are no normative criteria based on which it could be evaluated by the constitutional court, if the legislative measures adopted by the state have as result the material, effective, and not theoretical, abstract insurance of decent living for all citizens. The only sanctions if the state does not comply with these positive obligations have a preponderant political nature, and indirectly a constitutional one, such as the adoption of a motion of no confidence for the Parliament.

– According to Art 80 of the Romanian Constitution, the President has the obligation to guard the observance of the Constitution and the proper functioning of the public authorities. In this purpose, the president is the mediator between the state's powers, but also between state and society. It is a constitutional provision which may remain in the area of the constitutional ideal, or a political principle, because it is not concretized under the aspect of the means and procedures for achievement, nor is accompanied by specific constitutional sanctions. The Romanian political practice of the last decade proved that there is the possibility of a discretionary manifestation of power from the Chief of state based on this constitutional text.

Obviously, the examples could continue. We aim to emphasize that the constitutional norm, even if in most cases it has the value of a principles, it imposes in its logic the compliance with the syllogism hypothesis – disposition – sanction, to not only stay within the area of the constitutional ideal.

The modification of the Constitution could be necessary if the social and political realities impose it. We consider that the state authorities should be more concerned by the appropriate application of the fundamental law and only in subsidiary by its possible modification. Further, we shall analyse certain legal aspects and aspects of other nature entailed by the initiatives to revise the Romanian Constitution.

The decision to initiate the revision of the Constitution of a state is, without any doubt, a political one, but in the same time it must have legal basis and to correspond to a historical need of the social system organized as a state from the perspective of its subsequent evolution. Therefore, the revision of the constitution must not be subordinated to political interests at that time, no matter how beautiful they are wrapped, but to the social general interest, well-shaped and possible to be legally expressed.

The late Prof Antonie Iorgovan rightfully stated that "In terms of the revision of the Constitution, we dare to say that where there is a political normal life, one shall express cautious restraints, the imperfections of the texts in their confrontation with life, with subsequent realities are corrected by the interpretations of the Constitutional Courts, namely by the parliamentary customs or traditions, reason for which the western literature does not longer talks about the Constitution, but about the constitutional block"[1].

The revision of the Constitution cannot have as result the satisfaction of the political interests of the temporary holders of power. In the direction of strengthening the discretionary power of the state, with the inadmissible consequence of damaging certain democratic values and principles, unlike the political and institutional pluralism, the principle of the separation of powers or the principle of the legislative supremacy of the Parliament. Also, the limitations of the Romanian constitutional revision are stated by Art 152 of the Constitution, though the political interpretation of these constitutional provisions may denaturise their meaning and finality.

The two and a half decades of democratic constitutional life in Romania proved that the political power, by its decisions, numerous times it has denaturised the constitutional principles and rules using interpretations contrary to the democratic spirit of the fundamental law, for political purposes and the support of conjectural interests. The consequences were and still are obvious: the limitation or violation of certain rights and fundamental freedoms, the generation of social tensions, non-compliance with the constitutional role of the state's institutions, in other words political actions, some dressed with a legal aspect, contrary to the constitutionalism which must characterize the Romanian state of law.

Under these conditions, a possible step in revising the fundamental law should be focused on the need to strengthen and enhancement of the constitutional guarantees for complying with the requirements and values of the state of law, to avoid excessive power specific to the politics exclusively subordinated to group interests, mostly conjectural and contrary to the Romanian people's interests, which according to Art 2 Para 1 of the Constitution has the national sovereignty.

In our view, the concern among politicians and state authorities in the current period compared to the current content of the fundamental law should be guided not so much towards the change of the Constitution, but especially towards the correct interpretation and application of it and respect of the democratic purpose of the constitutional institutions. To strengthen the rule of law in Romania, it is necessary that political parties, especially those in power, all state authorities to act or perform their duties within a loyal constitutional behaviour involving respect for the democratic meanings and significance of the Constitution.

Some proposals to revise the Romania fundamental law aim to modification of the constitutional system of bicameralism to unicameralism and strengthen the executive power, especially the presidential institution.

We consider that the Romanian bicameralism is appropriate for the state and social system of this historic moment, better reflecting the need to achieve not only the efficiency of the legislative parliamentary procedures, but especially "norming" and the quality of the legislation. Bicameralism is a necessity for Romania, for the Parliament to represent a viable counterweight to the executive, in the context of the exigencies and balance of the powers in a democratic state. Rightfully, late Prof Antonoe Iorgovan pointed out: "It should represent a high political risk, in that post-revolutionary tension, that in Romania be projected a unicameral Parliament, such risk still being present at this hour, under the conditions in which we can no longer talk about a political life established on the normal aisles of the democratic doctrines accepted by the West (social-democratic doctrine, Christian-democratic doctrine, liberal doctrines and ecologist doctrines)[2].

Unicameralism in a semi-presidential constitutional system, such as the Romanian one, in which the powers of the head of state and generally of the executive are significant, also considering the current excessive politicking, would have as consequence the serious deterioration of the institutional balance between the legislative and executive, resulting in the increase of the discretionary power of the executive and the minimization of the Parliament's role as a supreme representative organ and of the Romanian people, as single legislative authority of the state, as stated by Art 61 Para 1 of the Constitution. The evolution to a unicameral Parliament must not be considered as a simple act as unfortunately it results from the project law on the revision of the Constitution drafted by the Government, but it requires a general modification of the Romanian constitutional system, a reconfiguration of the role and attributions of the state authorities, in order to preserve the balance between legislative and executive and to not create the possibility of an evolution towards an overrated preponderance of the institution of the head of state in relation to the Parliament. We emphasize the fact that all European states with a unitary structure which have a unicameral Parliament also have a constitutional parliamentary system in which the head of state has limited attributions regarding the governing.

We do not aim to perform a thorough analysis of this issue, underlining only the conclusion that the Romanian unicameralism could be justified both politically and constitutionally, and appropriate to the democratic values in a state of law only if the legitimacy and role of the Romanian Presidency, as constitutional institution, is fundamentally altered. The election of the President should be performed by the Parliament. Also, in the case of a unicameral parliamentary structure, it is necessary to significantly reduce the attributions of the President in relation to the executive. Such reconfiguration of the state institutions should increase the role and attributions of the Constitutional Court and of the justice, representing guarantees of the supremacy of the law and of the Constitution also avoiding the abuse of power of the other state institutions. In Romania, the unicameralism could only be associated with the existence of a constitutional system. The unicameralism has the nature to generate a disproportion between the Parliament and the executive, by that that a single chamber of the Parliament, in Romania, does not represent a satisfactory guarantee to represent an efficient counterweight for the executive, especially that the constitutional attributions of the President as participant in the governing are obviously significant. The dispute between bicameralism and unicameralism with application to the case of Romania is very well presented by the late Prof Antonie Iorgovan: "…any bicameral or unicameral parliamentary system could generate serious dysfunctionalities, as expressed by Prof Tudor Drăganu, no matter how good the constitutional solution might be, if the parliamentary practice shows politicking, demagogy and irresponsibility"[3].

Does the current Romanian parliamentary system correspond to the exigencies of the democratic requirements of the bicameralism and is it fit for the performance of the role and functions of the Parliament? The late Prof Tudor Drăganu, in a large study of flawless argumentative logic answered this question: "The revised Constitution establishes a system claiming to be bicameral, but currently functioning as a unicameral one, convicted to break, by some of its aspects, certain elementary principles of the parliamentary regime and which embraces the danger of future serious dysfunctionalities in the performance of the legislative activity"[4]. The illustrious professor considered that the law amending the Constitution contains no explicit reference to the number of deputies and senators; it questions the substantial legitimacy of the two chambers because their members are appointed by the same body and by the same type of electoral system and electoral scrutiny; the chambers' legislative powers are not sufficiently differentiated; exercising the right for a legislative initiative by senators and deputies, as it is stated, generates constitutional contradictions.

We support that the prospect of a constitutional revision to regulate the differentiation between the two chambers using particular types of representation. The comparative law provides sufficient examples of this kind (Spain, Italy and France) and even the Romanian Electoral Law of 27 March 1926 provides a benchmark in this regard. The Senate may represent the interests of the local communities. Thus, Senators could be elected by an electoral college consisting of the elected members of local councils. Interesting to note is that in the draft of the Constitution in 1991, the Senate was designed as a representative of the local communities, grouped in counties and in Bucharest.

The criticism of Prof Tudor Drăganu is fair, according to which the current constitutional regulation does not provide a functional difference between the two chambers. This aspect was also noticed by the Constitutional Court, which referring to the parliamentary legislative procedure inserted by the project for revising the Constitution underlined that: "The cascade examination of the draft laws, in a chamber of first lecture, and in the one the second lecture, transforms the bicameral Parliament into an unicameral one"[5]. Therefore, a new initiative for the modification of the fundamental law should also consider this aspect and to perform a real and functional differentiation between the two Chambers.

The final part of this study shall refer to certain aspects that we consider necessary to be stated by a future procedure for revising the Constitution.

As above mentioned, unlike the excessive politicking and discretionary use of power from the executive contrary to the spirit and letter of the Constitution, with the consequence of violating certain rights and fundamental freedoms, manifested during the past two decades of democracy in Romania, we consider that the scientific approach and not only in the area of the revision of the fundamental law should be oriented towards solutions guaranteeing the values of the state of law, limiting the violations of the constitutional provisions for the purpose of particular interests and to avoid the excessive power of the state authorities.

1. Art 114 Para 1 of the current regulation states that: "The Government may assume responsibility before the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, in joint sitting, upon a programme, a general policy statement, or a bill".

The responsibility of the Government has a political feature and is a procedural means by which it is avoided the phenomenon of the "dissociation of majorities"[6] for the case in which the in Parliament the majority necessary for the adoption of a measure proposed by the Government was not gathered. In order to determine the legislative forum to adopt its measure, the Government, using the procedure of assuming the responsibility conditions the performance of its activity by requesting a vote of trust. This constitutional procedure guarantees that the majority required for the dissolution of the Government, in the case of a censure motion to coincide with that for rejecting the law, the programme or the political statement to which the Government connects its existence.

Adjusting the laws as effect of invoking the political responsibility of the Government has as important consequence the absence of any parliamentary debates or deliberations on the draft law. If the Government is supported by a comfortable majority of the Parliament, this procedure could result in the adoption of the laws by "bypassing the Parliament", which could have negative consequences on the compliance with the principle of the separation of powers, but also regarding the role of the Parliament, as it is defined by Art 61 of the Constitution. As consequence, using such constitutional procedure by the Government for the adoption of a law must have an exceptional feature, justified by a political situation and a social imperative very well shaped.

This aspect of extreme importance for the compliance with the democratic principles of the state of law by the Government was well emphasized by the Romanian Constitutional Court: "This simplified means of legislation must be used in extremis, when the adoption of the draft law using the common or the emergency procedure is no longer available or when the political structure of the Parliament does not allow the adoption of the draft law using one of the above mentioned procedures"[7]. The political practice of the Government for the past years has been contrary to these rules and principles. The Executive frequently assumed its responsibility not only for a single law, but also for packages of laws, without any justification in the meanings stated by the Constitutional Court.

The Government's politicking clearly expressed by the frequency of using this constitutional procedure seriously harms the principle of the political plurality, which is an important value of the system of law stated by Art 1 Para 3 of the Constitution, but also of the principle of the parliamentary right stating that "the opposition shall express and the majority shall decide" [8]. "Denying the right of the opposition to express itself is synonym with denying the political plurality, which according to Art 1 Para 3 of the Constitution represents a supreme and guaranteed value". The principle "the majority shall decide, the opposition shall express itself" refers to that throughout the organization and functioning of the parliamentary Chambers be assured that the majority is not obstructed especially in the performance of the parliamentary procedure, and on the other hand that the majority rule only after the opposition has spoken"[8]. The censorship of the Constitutional Court proved to be insufficient and inefficient in order to determine the Government to comply with these values of the state of law.

Conclusions

In the context of these arguments, we propose that in the perspective of a constitutional revision to limit the right of the Government to entail its responsibility for a single draft law in a parliamentary session.

1. All post-December Governments have massively used the practice of the emergency ordinances, practice blamed by the literature.

The conditions and interdictions stated by the Law No 429/2003 for the revision of the Constitution of Romania regarding the constitutional regime of the emergency ordinances, proved to be insufficient in order to limit this practice of the Executive, also the control of the Constitutional Court proved insufficient and even inefficient. The consequence of such practice is the violation of the role of the Parliament as single "legislative authority of the state" (Art 61 of the Constitution) and the creation of an imbalance between executive and legislative by accentuating the discretionary power of the Government, which in most cases turned into excessive power.

We propose that in the perspective of a future revision of the fundamental law, Art 115 Para 6 be modified in the meaning of prohibiting the adoption of emergency ordinances in the area of the organic laws. In this meaning it is protected an important area of social relations considered by the constitutional legislator as essential for the social and state system, from the excess of power of the executive by issuing emergency ordinances.

2. In the current conditions characterized by the executive's trend to profit from the obvious politicking and to unduly and dangerously force the limits of the Constitution and of the democratic constitutionalism it is necessary to create mechanisms for the control of the executive's activity in order to really guarantee the supremacy of the Constitution and the principles of the state of law.

According to our opinion, it is necessary that the role of the Constitutional Court as guarantor of the fundamental law be amplified by new attributions with the purpose of limiting the excess of power of the state's authorities. We do not agree with the statements made by the literature that a possible amelioration of the constitutional justice could be achieved by reducing the attributions of the court of administrative contentious[9]. It is true that the Constitutional Court has ruled certain questionable decisions under the aspect of compliance with the limitations of its attributions according to the Constitution, by assuming the role as positive legislator[10]. The reduction of the attributions of the constitutional court for this reason is not a legally fundamental decision. Of course, the reduction of the attributions of a state authority has as consequence the elimination of the risk for deficient performance. This is not the way to achieve the perfection of the activity of a state authority in a state of law, but by the continuous search for legal solutions for better conditions for the performance of such attributions, which proved to be necessary for the state and social system.

The attributions of the Constitutional Court might as well include the one about ruling upon the constitutionality of the administrative acts exempted from the control for legality of the courts of administrative contentious. This category of administrative acts, to which Art 126 Para 6 of the Constitution and the Law No 544/2004 on the administrative contentious refer to, are extremely important for the entire social and state system. Therefore, it is necessary a control for constitutionality, because in its absence the discretionary power of the issuant administrative authority is unlimited with the consequence of a possible excessive limitation of the rights and fundamental freedoms or of the violation of certain important constitutional values. For the same arguments, our Constitutional Court should be able to control under the aspect of constitutionality the presidential decrees establishing the referendum.

The High Court of Cassation and Justice has the competence to adopt decisions using the procedure of the appeal in the interests of the law, which are mandatory for the courts. In the absence of any form of control for legality or constitutionality, the practice proved in numerous situations that the Supreme Court overcame its attribution to interpret the law, and by such decisions it modified or completed normative acts, acting as a real legislator, thus violating the principle of the separation of powers[11]. With the purpose of avoiding the excessive power of the Constitutional Court, we consider necessary the establishment for the Constitutional Court of the competence to rule upon the constitutionality of the decisions of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, adopted using the procedure of the appeal in the interests of the law.

3. The proportionality is a fundamental principle of the law expressly stated by constitutional and legislative regulations and international legal instruments. It is based on the values of the rational law of justice and equity and expresses the existence of a balanced or appropriate relation between actions, phenomena or situations, also being a criterion for limiting the measures ordered by the state authorities to what is necessary for the achievement of a legitimate purpose, thus guaranteeing the fundamental rights and avoiding the excessive powers of the state authorities. The proportionality is a basic principle of the European Union, being expressly stated by Art 5 of the Treaty on the European Union[12].

We consider that the express statement of this principle only by Art 53 of the Constitution, with application in the area of limiting the exercise of certain rights is insufficient for the valorisation of the entire meaning and importance of the principle for the rule of law.

It is useful the addition to Art 1 of the Constitution of a new paragraph stating that "The performance of the state power must be proportionate and indiscriminate". This new constitutional statement could represent a true constitutional obligation for all state authorities to perform their attributions so that the measures adopted to be within the limits of the discretionary power recognized by the law. Also, it is created the possibility for the Constitutional Court to sanction using the control for constitutionality of the laws and ordinances the excess of power in the Parliament's and Government's activities, using as criterion the principle of proportionality.

JUDICIAL PRECEDENT, A LAW SOURCE

Elena ANGHEL[*]

Abstract

The role awarded to judge varies from one legal system to another. In the Anglo-Saxon legal systems, there is not a self-standing legislative body, so the judge is the one who creates the law; his mission consists in solving a specific case, given the existing judicial precedents; if he cannot find an appropriate rule of law, he has to develop one and to apply it.
In the continental system, creation of law is the mission of the legislature, so the creative role of jurisprudence still raises controversy. Evolving under the influence of Roman law, the continental law systems differ from the Anglo-Saxon by: the continuous receiving of Corpus iuris civilis; the tendency to abstraction, leading to the creation of a rational law; the rule of law, with the consequence of blurring the role of jurisprudence.
Underlining the creative force of jurisprudence, Vladimir Hanga wrote: "The law remains in its essence abstract, but the appreciation of the jurisprudence makes it alive, as the judge, understanding the law, taking into account the interests of parties and taking inspiration from equity, ensures the ultimate purpose of the law: suum cuique tribuere"[].

Keywords: jurisprudence, precedent, continental law system, creator role, anglo-saxon law system

Introduction

In Anglo-Saxon law, the task of creating the law rests mainly with the judge. It was considered that „a law can rarely provide all cases in question; common law, that works itself pure by rules drawn from the fountain of justice, is for this reason superior to an Act of Parliament"[1]. The resolutions pronounced by the judge become mandatory in the future for all similar cases faced by the lower courts, by forming the so-called „case law". The Anglo-Saxon precedent is expressed by maxim „stare decisis et non quieta movere", namely „to stand by decisions and not to disturb the undisturbed".

Judicial precedent does not designate the judgment in its entirety, but the principle, the argument based on which the case was settled[2]. „Common law does not consist in the cases in question, but in the general principles illustrated and applied by them"[3]. Therefore, ratio decidendi and obiter dictum are distinguished in the structure of the judgment. Ratio decidendi designates the essence of the legal reasoning, the principle which led to the respective ruling, and obiter dictum means the actual ruling pronounced by the judge. If the judge does not find appropriate principles for the case submitted to settlement, the judge can and must create a new rule of law. By creating a new ratio decidendi, the judge contributes to the development of the case law (in the doctrine there was the opinion according to which the system for the recruiting of judges for the Constitutional Court should be rethought and they should be persons from among judges, persons with impeccable moral probity, university professors[4]).

Paper content

Despite its creating nature, the continental literature assigns to the jurisprudential Anglo-Saxon system many difficulties which concern the great number of precedents, the impossibility of their systematization, as well as the subsistence of many obsolete precedents. This state of facts made Hegel to claim the following: „What a monstrous confusion prevails in that country, both in the administration of justice and in the subject-matter of the law".

The role awarded to the precedent in the Anglo-Saxon law is explicable if we take into account the historical factors, namely that England did not see the revival of the Roman law, it lacked of a complete set of rules, and therefore the creation of the law according to the needs of the respective era was required. In this context, judge made law seemed the most pertinent and handy ruling. „Common-law was the legal system of a feudal society on the patterns of which the content of the bourgeois law was laid", V. D. Zlătescu[5] noted. By characterizing the judicial precedent as being the „guiding star" of this system, the author states however that, currently, things are going so far that, even in the presence of the text of the law or of the rule of common law, the judges would rather rely on judgments that were previously implemented, than apply directly the text or the respective rule. Therefore, the rules are highly technical and formal, being accessible only to specialists. Furthermore, it is deemed that „the great malady of any legal system based on precedents is the obsolescence", as the law created in this way gets to be unreceptive to social impulses and hostile to society evolution, thus becoming a barrier which can result in considerable damage.

The Roman-Germanic system does not recognize stare decisis doctrine, the judicial precedent not being recognized as a formal source of law[6]. The judge is not allowed to decide based on general provisions or regulations, so that the judge cannot justify the decision, by referring expressly to the power of another judgment ruled in a similar case. Therefore, guidance decisions (arrêts de règlement), whereby the judge formulates a mandatory general rule for the courts of law are not admitted.

The judgment ruled by the judge in the settlement of a case produces effects only on the parties of the lawsuit, having a relative power of res judicata. In what concerns the mandatory nature of the decisions of the Constitutional Court, the failure to comply with the decisions of the contentious constitutional court draws the overall liability[7]. Notwithstanding, it is sometimes considered that, in filling the gaps of law or in the absence of law, the courts of law „persists in a particular decision, given the independence of the judiciary power, this decision acquires the nature of a legal truth, the absolute power of res judicata"[8]. It is natural that, in what concerns the settlement of a case, the courts of law study the judicial practice in the field and draw from the judgments ruled by higher courts. Such a requirement lies in the need for unity, conformity, consistency and continuity of judicial practice. Furthermore, in the continental system, which is subject to the domination of rigid laws, the case law has also a compensatory function, its role being that of conferring certain elasticity to the law.

Therefore, more generally, we can say that that Anglo-Saxon law conserves the judicial precedent as a source of law as its power is general, it extends over other courts or similar cases, and the judge is called to distinguish between ratio decidendi and obiter dictum. Roman-Germanic law gives an interpretative value to the case law, being a mean for filling the gaps, an inspiration source for the lawmaker, but the judge is bound to rule only on the case.

In order to understand the power of the judicial precedent, despite the fact it is not a source of law in the continental system, we have to make a delimitation between jurisdictional activity, which consists in the issuing of judgments and jurisprudential activity, which creates reference regulations which law is based on.

From the etymologic point of view, jurisdictio is the result of joining two terms: juris abd dictio, which means to tell the law. Generally, the term covers both the prerogative of judging, of applying the law in an actual situation, and the authority vested with this power. We hereby point out that the term of jurisdiction is often misused as the equivalent of the term of justice. Strictly speaking, justice is performed exclusively by the judicial power, all the other entities endowed with the power to judge in certain fields which are strictly regulated, being broadly called jurisdictions. In order to remove the existent confusion, they are also called jurisdictional activity bodies or special jurisdictions, for example, constitutional jurisdiction. The result of the activity of all jurisdictional bodies is the jurisdictional act.

In the opinion of Mircea Djuvara, the jurisdiction act carries a wider meaning, designating an individual nature act whereby the state establishes general rules of positive law applicable in an individual case. The jurisdictional act simply finds, in the light of the positive law regulations, the legal relationships which have to be applied to an actual social fact. The difference between the two terms consist in the fact that „the case law broadly includes not the facts which were acknowledged as law at some point in time, but the facts which were applied, namely the facts which were executed based on the respective acknowledgment". Generally speaking, the jurisdiction act belongs to the organized courts of law, but it is also included in the area of the administrative or political acts; for example, the control of the government in the parliamentary regime is also a jurisdictional act[9].

Therefore, the jurisdictional activity of the judge consists in the settlement of the litigation. In this regard, the judge performs two tasks: that of telling the law (jurisdictio), by acknowledging from the claims in litigation the one corresponding to the legal regulations in force and that of ordering the fulfillment of the decision pronounced (imperium), by means of the coercive force of the state, if the case may be.

Etymologically speaking, Bergel notes that the jurisdictional act is the act by means of which the judge tells the law. Seemingly simple, the task of qualifying an act of the judge as being jurisdictional is difficult and entails multiple doctrinal controversies, the provided criteria being inexhaustible. Essentially, the jurisdictional act is considered the act whereby the settlement of the litigation is aimed[10].

According to Terré, two aspects are found in every judgment: individual, actual aspect, which claims the pronouncement of the settlement of the case and general principle, which the judgment is founded and substantiated on. These general principles are rather revealed to the judge than the directives of the law, which have a discreet nature, this is why, the Court of Cassation tends to grant a privileged attention to the generalizing function of the judicial act, to the detriment of the individualizing function. According to the author, certain patterns arise from these decisions of the Court of Cassation, which are designated to guide the future work of the judges of the merits, being capitalized based on two trends: law of imitation and law of continuity. Especially in private international law, but also in civil and commercial law, the judge substantiates the decision on general principles which the judge founds and establishes and the violation of which represents a ground of invalidation[11].

The author notes that in French law, Parliaments, as courts of law and the other sovereign courts had the power to pronounce guidance decisions12. We are drawn the attention on the fact that the use of term „decisions" is not exactly correct, as they were not pronounced on the settlement of a litigation between two parties, but they were genuine regulations. Guidance decisions were however limited under two aspects: in space, as their mandatory force was extended only on the division which the respective Parliament belonged to; in time, due to the fact that such decisions were temporary, being valid until the adoption of a law.

By means of the provisions of art. 5 of the French Civil Code, these guidance decisions were prohibited. According to Terré, this does not mean that the judge is prevented to issue decisions in principle, if a connection can be established between the expressed principle and the ruling pronounced in the case. In other words, the text of the law prohibits the judge to create rules, outside the litigation, but it does not exclude the creation of praetorian rules within the jurisdictional activity. In this way, the motivation and the ruling pronounced in a case can be adjusted to other similar cases. Furthermore, it is considered that, if the issuance of decisions in principle is allowed in the settlement of the litigation, there is nothing to prevent their modification in order to be used for the settlement of other cases.

Similarly, Djuvara notes that, if the legitimacy of a new regulation is acknowledged, the legitimacy of any other identical act is necessarily acknowledged, based on generalizing legal induction, which leads to a general regulation. But, „this general regulation was not previously established, but it is formed in mind only by acknowledging the individual regulations"[13].

Therefore, it is noted that the decisions „which the judges not only pronounce but also substantiate, lead to the occurrence of the gaps of the legislation in force, and to the rulings of actual and individual application, formulated as general rules of legal issues brought into the respective litigations"[14].

Given all the aforementioned, we conclude that the judgments are of two kinds: judgments in principle, defined by the fact that the ruling is substantiated on a general principle and case judgments, limited to the settlement of an actual case.

The Romanian Civil Code prohibits guidance decisions, but does not prohibit decisions in principle. The possibility of the judge to issue a decision in principle does not violate the rule provided by the Civil Code, as this decision only produces inter partes effects; the substantiation of the judgment is the one that it is based on a preexistent legal principle. Whenever the law is silent or insufficient, the judge, being bound to settle the case under the penalty of denial of justice, shall seek to found a general principle admitted by the law system. But, „the creation of law is naturally a continuous process where every step generates unforeseen consequences on what we can do and what we should do next"[15]. As the dynamics of social life continuously reveal new aspects, such as euthanasia, human cloning, artificial procreation, the judge often finds himself obliged to create innovative principles, consistent with the existent ones, based on which he can substantiate his ruling. The legislative changes that occur at some point in time raise serious issues for certain fields of law, in terms of interpretation and application of normative acts[16]. In this case, the judge pronounces a decision in principle which, without pretending to be imposed as mandatory, will influence rulings pronounced in similar cases.

The literature shows that the decisions in principle suggest „a potential rule to follow", therefore, the provisions of the Civil Code do not prevent the jurisprudential development of law, but only mandatory precedent[17]. The authors point out that, although the judge settles an actual case, the judge formulates a principle and his reasoning must be a general one, applied to the actual case, but which could be applied to any similar case. Such a decision is substantiated on the „internal logic of the legal system, but not in the sense that it has a generally binding value”[18].

Dimitrie Alexandresco noted that nothing prevented the judges, in motivating their decision, to present general considerations, to state principles of law, to make inductions or deductions. Notwithstanding, „the judges could not motivate their ruling, by simple reference to a previous sentence, although they could take into account their own case law or the case law of a superior court”[19].

Similarly, professors Demeter and Ceterchi wrote that, in socialist law, the lack of general-mandatory nature of the judgment did not exclude the possibility that the courts, in solving different cases, took into account previous decisions. The settlement of an actual case raises certain general aspects which, „if settled fairly and persuasively, can be a valuable guide for all state bodies, called upon to settle similar cases”[20]. Furthermore, it is shown that, given the hierarchy of courts, lower courts study the judicial practice of higher courts, without this practice being mandatory, but in order for the pronounced decisions not to deviate from the „general line of law interpretation and application”.

Gh. Mihai acknowledges that the primary role of the judge is to apply the law, but „provided that the grounds of several cases are the same, they can be general inspirations derived from a series of previous decisions”[21]. Mircea Djuvara notes that, if a doctrinal opinion of a legal expert or a judgment is „established as mandatory for future disputes, they play the role of the law”[22].

The power of the case law, according to Vălimărescu, is not inferred from text, but from the „power of things and lessons of history”[23]. If a certain issue of law receives the same ruling from several courts, the ruling shall be most often complied with by all the courts, therefore it is deemed that „the case law is established and it has legal force”.

Another opinion shows that, although theoretically, the judge cannot introduce a new regulation in the legal system, as the judge only „discovers” a regulation which exists in the system by default, however, „this strictly archaeological work is a mere fiction, beneath which a work of creation is hidden”[24]. The judge cannot claim previous case law as the legal ground of the new decision, due to the fact the judiciary precedent is not formally acknowledged as a formal source in continental law, but, the judge often relies on these principles. The judge „shall claim the principle as being incident to the system and not as being created by the judicial practice”.

Given all the aforementioned, in Roman-Germanic system, judicial precedent has only persuasive value: as far as the judge finds that a principle emerges from a constant case law, the judge shall acquire the principle and shall apply it in the case he has to settle. The judge is not bound to comply with the precedent, but the principle can be mandatory for the reason by means of its intellectual value. Given these grounds, the ratio decidendi of a previous decision is often found in similar cases, even under the same formulation. Furthermore, due to reasons concerning the consistency of the system, the continuity of the principles and the safety of legal relations, the unification of the judicial practice is a challenge.

The power of a case law, according to Djuvara, is enforced „based on the great principle of stability and of the security of social relations, which is a general principle of justice: without such a consistency of the rulings, not only that similar cases are settled in a particular way, which represents an injustice, but nothing is certain and nobody knows on what to rely, general legal order being therefore reached”[25].

The literature explains the persuasive value of precedent by considerations relating to the following: the need to ensure non-discriminatory treatment to individuals, which entails the considerations of rulings pronounced in similar cases; the fact that the judges represent a social body with well defined ideas, „which discriminates individual opinions in favor of the continuity of concepts which are expressed in decisions”; the hierarchical control of decisions, by higher courts, which determines, despite the independence of judges, the adoption of solutions in line with those pronounced by higher court[26].

We note that, under the apparent rigor of the provisions of the Civil Code, which force the judge to rule only by case decisions, the judge may, within certain limits, to exceed the framework of the enacted law. Although the judge claims to rely on preexistent law, in fact, the judge gets to create himself general principles of law.

Conclusions

In the light of all the aforementioned, we note that the legal principles drawn from the case law are enforced as mandatory, even if the judicial precedent is not mandatory in our legal system. The decisions establishing these principles are not formally mandatory for the courts of law, but the hierarchy of jurisdictional bodies and the authority of the Supreme Court require, at least in practice, the observance by lower courts of the Praetorian regulations.

Due to these grounds, recent specialized studies place continental case law, in terms of its creative role, between two limits: de jure negation and de facto acknowledgment[27]. Furthermore, we talk more and more about the power of the precedent in continental system, beyond its persuasive value. As an argument in favor of the acknowledgment of a creative case law, the possibility that the law grants to the judge in order to fill the gaps of the law is claimed, the judge having to choose between the potential meanings of concepts, such as: good faith, public order, good morals, equity. Furthermore, it is shown that the judge is authorized to remove potential contradictions, thus ensuring the consistency of the legal order[28]. Furthermore, the judge is liable to adjust law to the needs of social life, a prerogative that resulted in certain jurisprudential creations such as the institution of matrimonial regime and of the civil liability in French law or the institution of the tort liability and joint tenancy on shares, in Romanian law.

The matter of the judicial precedent role is very complex and very actual. The law creator role of the judge is discussed not only nationally, but also at the European Union level. The doctrine points out that although the rulings of the European Union courts are not erga omnes opposable, being binding only upon the parties of the litigation, they have „indirect law creator effect, due to the fact the settlement of similar litigations is also indicated"[29].

JUSTICE AND EQUITY

Elena ANGHEL[*]

Abstract

Juridical principles have a privileged place within the positive juridical order, representing foundation of the legal edifice: they prove the continuity of law during the centuries and that is why here we have to dig in order to find out the foundation of law, its permanent nature, its substance; they precede and give birth to positive law, which lies upstream of legal rules; principles build and direct the entire system of law, conferring to the legal order its necessary stability; being the underlayer of positive law, the principles of law represent a stability factor and, also, a source of unity, coherence, consistency and efficiency for that legal system[1].

The entire law science consists in reality of "generating from the multiplicity of law dispositions their essential, namely these exact last justice principles, from which all the other dispositions derive. Hereby, the entire legislation becomes of a great clarity and is caught in the so-called legal spirit"[2].

Keywords: justice, equity, principle, value, judge

Introduction

The scope of law, according to Alexandru Vălimărescu, consists in achieving a balance of interests which social harmony derives from, an harmony which is reached by means of two factors: the idea of justice and the idea of order[1].

The ultimate scope of the law, namely the idea of justice has received a multitude of meanings over the time. Regardless of the way it was founded (universal, divine, liberal, egalitarian, etatist justice, etc.), it was always considered that justice and society cannot be separated: ubi societas, ibi jus. It would be absurd to pretend that there is no justice if a positive law does not establish it, according to Montesquieu, thus claiming the transcendental nature of the principle of justice, which governs the society independently from its establishment in the regulations of the positive laws.

In the light of these historical considerations, we note that justice was assigned a multitude of meanings over the time: the meaning of justness, thus substantiating the positive law (principled justice); the individual's sense of justice (subjective justice); attainable ideal of any positive law (commutative justice); entitlement of judiciary institutions (distributive justice); prerogative of a state body to establish law (technical justice).

The following perspectives of approaching the concept of justice are noted in the current literature: ontological, as a principle of positive law; axiological, as a value of justness or of justice; moral, as a virtue of the human; sociological, as a social status, like equality or freedom; technical and legal, as a guiding principle of balanced organization of the society; political, as institutionalized power of the state[2].

Paper content

From the ontological point of view, justice is the basis of any law. According to Professor Gh. Mihai, there is a single multidimensional principle, the principle of Justice; it is a fundamental principle, which does not require acknowledgment, because it exists by itself; it is an innate principle, attached to human spirituality. The other fundamental principles – freedom, equality, responsibility – are only „dimensions" of the principle of Justice[3].

According to Djuvara, the idea of justice warms our souls and it is so rooted in our souls that we subordinate everything to it. It is „the guardian of our highest expectations"[4]. Therefore, the law as a science, discipline that dominates its every day application, „is based on an idea that owns it entirely, which infuses its whole life, the idea of justice. Without justness, namely without justice and equity, law cannot be understood, it is only a mean of torture of the people, and not a mean a peaceful coexistence between them"[5].

Sometimes, justice was mistaken for lawfulness. According to Gh. Mihai, we forget that justice is the knowledge of the ground the lawfulness is based on, as a tool which guarantees and ensures order. The father of the constitutions is the lawmaker and their mother is justice. Therefore, the law has to be in accordance with justice. Dura lex sed lex (the law may be harsh, but it is still the law) outlines the vision according to which the strict application of the law, and not the dispensing of justice is important. Nowadays, it is widely acknowledged and confirmed in the constitutions of all countries of the world that nobody can be exempted from liability for the offenses committed in the exercise of public function[6]. The violation by the lawmaker of the justness standard often leads to the adoption of unfair laws. Although Romanian people stated that lex injusta non est lex, the reality contradicted them, so the question is to determine to what extent the law manages to express the standard of justness.

The possibility that the laws are unjust was noted by Toma d'Aquino, which wrote that it is always required to avoid unjust judgment, but it is not required to comply unconditionally with the laws, these being often unjust, „being by themselves contrary to natural law, either always, or most often; the same, well drawn up laws are in some cases faulty; in these cases, the judgment shall not be performed by the law, but by resorting to labels, according to the lawmaker's intention"[7].

Paul Roubier considers that unjust laws hurt the feeling of justice[8]. Despite this, they exist. The author gives several examples of serious damage caused to the achievement of modern justice, either by the imperfections of legal techniques (for reasons of practical utility, which concerns the effective implementation of justice, the legal technique sometimes proceeds with the suppression of justice contained in certain rules of law, in order to turn them into simple and easily applicable rules), or by the adoption of a certain legal and content policy of the institutions; in this respect, the author believes that the law moves away from the requirements of justice when it establishes the opportunity to acquire ownership by adverse possession by a bad faith person. We note that sometimes justice is sacrificed in favor of social order, an aspect justified by M. Hauriou by the fact that „the established social order is the one which separates us from catastrophe; most people in civilized countries prefer to bear a certain dose of injustice than to risk a catastrophe". Notwithstanding, Roubier claims that the supreme goal of law is to achieve justice as the feeling of justice animates social order[9]. In this respect, the author suggests two potential remedies against unjust laws: by way of interpretation, the harmful effects can be reduced, by resorting to actual sources, instead of formal sources and by applying a „free law", and not a „pure law"; furthermore, injustice can also be removed by controlling the constitutionality of the law, which is one of the highest expressions of a law substantiated on justice[10].

Gh. Mihai points out that not the actual facts can be qualified as just or unjust, but the legal regulation which connects legal consequences with such facts. Therefore, thus relating it to the principles of law, the regulation can be legal, but this does not mean that it possesses the justness: justice does not always establish lawfulness from the moral and legal point of view.

Mircea Djuvara noted that unjust laws have to be removed, because the lawmaker „can often be wrong, but the idea of justice necessarily dominates any conception of the law". The law „takes its authority from the principle of justice, which, at least formally, represents"[11]. The ideal of justice is covered by the legislation as it could be roughly formulated, so that the application of this legislation can lead to actual cases of injustice. Notwithstanding, the principle of justice remains the sole criterion for the assessment of justness. The fact that this principle was subject to different interpretations or applications over time, leading sometimes to the regulation of slaves sale, or war or euthanasia, is not likely to affect the uniqueness of the concept of justice.

For Mircea Djuvara, justice is a scope in itself: positive law has a sole justification, namely justice. The rule of law is observed because it is established by itself, it contains its value in itself, rationally, because „for our reason, nothing is superior to the idea of justice that such a rules entails; we necessarily understand that we cannot scarify justice in favor of another interest; the ideal of justice is superior to any other interest, in this respect being the ultimate ideal"[12].

However, the author does not embrace the idea of eternal justice, by postulating that justice remains an ideal, which is never achieved completely, a directive of thinking that subordinates the entire law: „just like geometric shapes, it is an ideal form, empty of contents"[13]. Djuvara defines the ideal as being an absolute rational concept, but points out that its achievement is always relative, since it depends on the facts and conscience that we have on it at some point in time. Therefore, this ideal is not fixed, but it varies from people to people and from a stage to another, it is „a reflex which changes according to places and times, thus representing the ideal of justice of every people, in every moment of its evolution"[14]. Therefore, we can conclude that legal system is characterized by diversity, legal regulations being variable in time and space: „every state has its enacted law, which it deserves in accordance with its traditions and values, with its own social and political development"[15].

Even with this variable content, justice lasted from early evolution of human society, as the ancients defined it: Fiat justitia, pereat mundus. The source of the law is the idea of justice, rational idea which is established by means of its own authority; laws are formulated at least under the plea of being just, because law „is not at all Law when it can no longer be considered an effort to achieve Justice"[16]. Under these terms, according to Djuvara, it can be said that „law itself is justice in its essence and the scope of any social organization can only be the achievement of law and therefore of the justice, in the broader and deeper meaning of this expression"[17].

Giorgio del Vecchio conceives justice a priori, considering that nothing can be claimed in the name of justice without obedience to its rules. Absolute justice, which „transcends all positive legal findings", remains a high ideal criterion, as it is reflected in all laws, but it is not perfected in any of them. The author analyzes the relation between absolute justice and lawfulness: lawfulness is just an empirical and positive justice, therefore absolute justice represents an inexhaustible source meant to fill the gaps of the lawfulness. However, „those who easily violate laws undermine the very basis of civil life and damage the conditions the respect shown to own person depends on". This does not mean, according to the author, that justice is perfected by the mere cult of lawfulness: „we cannot answer to the vocation of our legal consciousness by standing impassively in the middle of the established order or by waiting passively for justice to fall from the sky. It requires an active and determined participation in that eternal drama, the scene of which is the history and the subject of which is the contrast between good and wrong and just and unjust. We need not only to obey the laws, but to vivify them and to cooperate to their renewal"[18].

According to Paul Roubier, the basis of the law is the ideal of justice; justice is the value which the author lays at the foundation of law and which dominates its entire general theory. First of all, it deals with the external appearance of the rule of law, then, following a rigorous and critical examination of the theories of the great school of laws, it investigates the basis of the legal regulation. Given that justness, the supreme moral value of the society, exists in the civilized human consciousness, beyond strictly legal terms relating to the formal framework of the rule of law, we cannot define law in its external appearance, without analyzing the contents of the rule of law[19].

According to Paul Roubier, the knowledge of the content of the law entails the understanding of the legal rules formation. The establishment of a rule of law must always start from the knowledge of social life needs, depending on which the rule is enacted, and then, according to them, the organization of legal relations is proceeded with. If the first approach is scientific, the second concerns the art of the law. The society is continuously evolving and the law is permanently renewed. The individual is not satisfied with knowing how the things are, but he will always seek to discover how the things should be. He relates to an ideal all the time, and this ideal cannot be found by scientific means, but only by valuable judgments. This is why law is an art, directed towards an ideal.

Therefore, the legal creation work covers two stages: the acknowledgment of those givens of social life and the construction of the rule of law and based on them[20]. By assessing the foundation of the rule of law, the author shows that, if the lawmaker creates the rule of law without taking into account all the givens of the social order, the lawmaker performs an useless work. The author lays at the basis of the law structure two givens: the experience and the ideal of justice, which turn the social order into a superior moral order.

Therefore, the superior principles of law are placed above positive laws[21]. The ideal of justice is the supreme moral value that governs the relations between people, is the „idea of a superior order which must reign in society and which will ensure the triumph of most respectable interests". Roubier pleads for the existence of a substantial criterion of the legal system; justness is contained in the rule of law. Justice is the product of a continuous progress, of law refining work, performed by lawyers in order to ensure a social balance. Therefore, all things which comply with „the superior order of human interests" are just.

According to Nicolae Popa, justice, the Roman sister of Dike, represents „the ideal general state of the society, achievable by ensuring for each and every individual and for all individuals together the fulfillment of their legitimate rights and interests"; if we say justice, we mean subordination to a hierarchy of values[22].

Justice is the reference point which guides the law towards the harmonization of individual interests with the interests of the society, a condition of the wished-for social balance. Standing at the basis of law, justice acts as "glue of all other principles and at the same time, as a regulating principle, by limitation, of these principles"[23]. Due to the fact that social order is the ultimate purpose, justice occurs as a limitation of individual freedom: „human world would be more balanced if every entity of it accomplished its scope, by affirming its purpose in the scope of the world living in; only under such conditions, the respective entity would be and would have what it deserves"[24].

Therefore, the principles are levers the judge relies on in carrying out the work of justice, motivated by the fact that the principles: represent a quality guarantee for the system of justice, ensure the stability of justice, entail the required adjustment of law to social life conditions and enable the filling of the gaps of the law. And yet, „people move under the abstraction of the laws and sacrificing them to an excess of logic means to say that human is made for the law and not that the law is made for human, which is an absurdity"[25].

Permanently engaged in „what should be", justice can often seem cruel. In social reality, the ideal is never achieved, due to the fact „it is covered by the legislation of a moment as it could be roughly formulated. The application of this legislation can lead to actual cases of injustice"[26]. Therefore, too much social justice can mean injustice for actual individual. The high number of cases where the Romanian state was responsible for the activity of the powers of the state should be a warning for the Romanian lawmaker in order to improve legislation and to reconsider all the theory of legal liability in general[27].

If the severity of the principle of justice requires an overview of social relations, equity corrects this inconvenient: it is focused on actual cases, by taking into account personal circumstances of every situation and applies and becomes subject to the value of justness in social diversity in order to do JUSTICE, an actual justice. „Equity shows us the fair assessment, from the legal point of view, of every individual case. This assessment is therefore the individual legal relation, having a particular form in every case. It is at the beginning and at the end of law"[28].

The law establishes a formal legal equality, but there cannot be an absolute equality in the society because inherent natural and social differences exist between people[29]. The equity is the one establishing the balance required for the coexistence of individuals, by referring constantly to the idea of equivalence, proportionality. „Legal law, written or not, limited in space and time, lacks of the capacity to cover and establish equity in its universality, but cannot ignore it, by engaging it in the equality relation, which represents the translation of the equity in formal-legal terms"[30].

Equity humanizes positive law, by including the categories of moral in its content. As we have already stated, law does not exhaust the wealth of content of value horizon: besides self-standing legal values which establish the rules of law, other non-legal values, such as equity, are also required for human coexistence. Equity is the guarantor of „the unit of inner life of human individuality with the relative exteriority to the others and to the community", according to Gh. Mihai, adding that the principle of equity lies in the consensuality of Justice with Moral Goodness, with the same founding universality[31].

According to Dumitru Mazilu, equity is a general principle of law, concerning both the creation and the application of law; therefore, equity requires moderation in what concerns the prescription by the lawmaker of the rights and obligations, but also impartiality in the distribution of advantages and disadvantages in the activity of the bodies applying the law[32].

Equity serves as guidance in the filed of the legal liability. The statement engages again the idea of proportionality, this time between the seriousness of the offense and the sanction applied to the offender. But, as legal law is not the same with just law, the legal sanction is not necessarily just. This is why the legal sanction is required to stand between lawfulness and equity: sanction lawfulness would remain „a rigid and repressive form outside the connection with the equity, which ensures a minimum of morality to its content recorded in temporarity"[33].

Equity is an universal principle-idea. It is found as a reference point in the Roman law and in Manu's Code, but also in modern legislations. C. Perelman believed that equity represented the appeal of the judge against law. Therefore, equity represents a reference point for the case law, leading to the creation of legal constructions by Praetorian means, such as the theory of heir apparent. According to François Terré, the role of the equity is different if we refer to a legal system where law is dominant, case in which it occurs as a remedy thereof, or if case law or common law ranks first in the category of the sources of law[34]. In what concerns the power of the judge to decide on equity, Paul Roubier believes that, if it appeared as established in the old French monarchy, where it was considered that individuals could not be equal before the law, it is no longer justified today, when modern democratic societies vigorously promote the principle of civil freedom and equality. Furthermore, the author notes that, the appeal to equity can be dangerous if it contradicts legal security and social order, social values considered superior[35].

Conclusions

Being a moral-legal constant of humanity, the idea of justice is closely connected with the principle of justice. Mircea Djuvara believed that justice and equity are mistaken as ideals: „if they reach differentiation, this is a mistake that has to be remedied"[36]. We believe that they complement each other. Due to its requirements, the ideal of justice never leans on actual cases, this is why law has to include the ideal of equity in its content, and the two concepts should balance each other.

POSTWAR INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS PREDECESSOR OF THE EUROPEAN UNION

Dragoș – Adrian BANTAȘ*
Elvira BELDIMAN

Abstract

The European Union, as its existence that we can meet in the present moment, is not a creation which came out of nothing or arising of the history's hazard, but is rather an evolutionary process that began after the end of the Second World War. In this respect, in their continuing search for security, cooperation and common prosperity, European countries have made, in turn, organizations with different profiles (economic, political, security), such as the Treaty of Dunkirk, Western Union, Organization Economic Cooperation in Europe, Council of Europe, Western European Union, all of which are creations precursor Union and, before being dissolved as obsolete or being embedded in Cleaned have served the aims of their times, representing evolutionary steps in defining project European.

Keywords: Dunkirk, Western Union, Organization for Economic Cooperation in Europe, Council of Europe, Western European Union.

1. Preliminary considerations.

By the present approach, we want to bring to the attention of readers those international organizations which have planted the seeds of cooperation among European states in the new political, economic and security paradigm which followed the Second World War, following the construction of cooperation or integration on the old Continent, from the Treaty of Dunkirk to the formation of the European Communities.

In this note, we wish to prove that the future European Comunities represent the culmination of a process of creating and deepening a culture of cooperation in Europe, who's premises can be identified before World War II, but which is decisively influenced by its catastrophic consequences, and also by the new power configuration which would define the postwar world. We belive that this study is relevant for the student body, specialists and enthusiasts of the domain, due to itțs relatively sporadic treatment in the Romanian specialty literature, a fact that may be considered the product of the historical circumstances that define Romanias relations with the european cooperation or integration projects. Thus, during the period which holds the events presented, Romania was placed in a different influence zone, as part of the socialist system, its connection with the ensemble of the European community being interrupted. However, given the resumption of Romania's European course, after the fall of the communist regime, and its present status of member state of the European Union, we don't consider as lacking in interest the presentation of the roots of these process and any approach that is likely to support the deepening of European culture phenomenon in our country and its complete understanding.

As far as we are concerned, in this study that we bring to your attention, we wish to bring our modest contribution towards reaching the aforementioned purposes by chronologically and synthetically presenting the highlights marking the creation of postwar European international organizations that precede the establishment of the European Communities.

For this purpose we use primarily the bibliographical research method, by appealing mainly to primary sources, and especially to the agreements signed by the founding states of the aforementioned organizations. We select from the ensemble of provisions, mainly the elements that appear as characteristic for the purposes of the Member States and for the concrete ways in which they are put into practice.

Following, we perform certain correlations between the events that were presented and we emphase the role of each moment analyzed in the broader picture of the system consisting of the analyzed organizations and their relationships.

We believe that that our approach can be harmoniously integrated into the overall existing literature in the vernacular doctrinal space, thus contributing to the completion of the already existing assembly of writings with a number of elements of detail, based on the study of primary sources, and also with a number of personal considerations, which we consider to be the starting point for future debates.

2. The End of World War II and the United Nations.

For this, however, we must start our analysis from a brief description of the postwar international context and a presentation of some provisions of the UN Charter, relevant to the case, without insisting on issues well known to readers that would expand impermissibly the limits of the study we propose to you for analysis.

As the distinguished reader very well knows, the end of World War II offers mankind the full measure of the worst disasters resulting from the destructive action of man in the history of our species. In Europe and in great part of the rest of the world, many generations contemplate their disturbing fate and mourns the tens of millions of deaths, material achievements of many years of human struggle lie destroyed and prospects are almost as grim as the War that has just ended. Moreover, the discovery of the horrors of the Nazi regime, no less important, however, to the communist ones, installed in the USSR and beyond (Eastern Europe, China, part of South-Eastern Asia and in perspective, Africa and Latin America) take a serious question mark over man's ability to cooperate with the different others, instead of using violence fueled by unleashed hatred.

In this context, which we have mentioned because, as constructivist thinkers such as Alexander Wendt teach us, the ideas that dominate the thinking of decision-making people and, more generally, of human societies have great impact on their actions, both victors in the war mentioned and the states that have not taken part in hostilities seek a formula to establish and preserve the future climate of peace and security worldwide, which would make impossible to repeat past experience.

Certainly, having at hand the project, be it failed, of the League of Nations in the interwar period (hence the set of ideas and concepts that materialize in the United Nations is not entirely new, but it already existed in the relevant collective mind), the solution that shows the handiest refers to the establishment of a similar organization, whose charter to correct, however, the vulnerabilities that led to the failure of the previous approach, thus ensuring its superior functionality of Nations.

Thus, starting from the efforts of the period of the war, of the Allied Powers, to bring together the international society to defeating the common enemy, Nazi and others, which we can exemplify in moments, such as the Atlantic Charter (1941), Statement of US President F.D. Roosevelt (Washington, 1942), Moscow and Teheran Conferences etc., but which we will not explain in this endeavor, for reasons related to its wideness, a total of 51 countries signed in San Francisco on June 26, 1945, which became the United Nations Charter, or, in other words, the constitutive document of the most important organization with universal vocation of the contemporary world.

The stated purpose of the new Organization was, as its Preamble showed, to save future generations from the disaster of war, which twice in the founders' lifetime caused unprecedented human suffering.

In this respect, Article 2 of the Charter expressly mentions the obligation of every Member State to abstain in the conduct of its international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State.

To ensure, however, the efficiency and effectiveness of this article, the Charter allowed, and even encouraged, I would say, the existence of regional arrangements or other agents with responsibilities for maintaining international peace and security, provided that such arrangements or structures are consistent with the principles and purposes of the United Nations[1]. Moreover, the same Charter expressly specified that the decision making structure with the most extensive powers of the Organization can use these regional organizations for actions to implement the provisions of the Charter, under its close authority[2].

Moreover, however, one of the symbolic articles of the Charter, namely Article 51, provides that nothing in the Charter does not prevent the inherent right of self-defense, individual or collective, in case of an armed attack against one member of the United Nations, which is exercised until the Security Council takes the necessary measures to maintain international peace and security[3].

These fundamental articles of the UN Charter will form the legal basis for the establishment and functioning of European international organizations, before the Union, which we will analyze below.

3. The initial moments of economic integration. BENELUX debut year.

Before analyzing key debut moments of security cooperation it is necessary, as this is required by the chronological criterion, to take a look on what will become the main level of European integration, which will lead to the Union that we see today into being, namely the economic field.

In this regard, we consider it appropriate to begin the analysis with the series of agreements that will serve as a model for the creation of the European Communities, namely the agreements between the Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg that will create the space known today as the BENELUX.

Thus, it is useful to remember that the roots of this happy ending are still in the period of the Second World War, more precisely in 1943, when representatives of the governments in exile of the three countries mentioned, meeting in London, signed, on October 21st the Monetary Convention between Belgium, Luxembourg and the Netherlands.

[1] United Nations Charter, art. 52.

[3] Ibidem, art. 51.

Without going into the many technical details contained in this Convention, which do not fall either in the space, or the purposes of this study, we shall merely present some essential provisions drawn from reading the said Convention.

Therefore, the purpose of this agreement of wills is defined by the signatory parties, by stabilizing monetary relations and facilitating mechanisms for payments between the Netherlands and Economic Union Belgium-Luxemburg (dating from 1921)[4], as well as between their territories overseas (provisions which will see their relevance diminished with increased decolonization process). Further, the Convention sets out details of the fixed exchange rate between the currencies of the Member concerned, to be used in mutual economic and financial relations, covering a multitude of technical relevant aspects for the covered field.

The next agreement concluded by the same three states that we can consider a vanguard of the European project is the Customs Convention between the Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg, signed in London on September 5th, 1944.

It aims to create, upon handing the territories of the Economic Union, Belgium-Luxembourg and the Netherlands, the most favourable conditions for a subsequent sustainable customs union and the resumption of economic activity[5] disrupted by the ongoing war and the German occupation.

In this regard, starting with its first article, the Parties intended to implement, at the entry of gods from third states on their territory, the same customs duties, according to an annex that was part of their agreement[6].

We see, therefore, the highly advanced degree of integration that the signatory states suggest from the start, like the common market that the European Communities have achieved many years later.

Further, Article 2 of the Convention includes the prohibition of customs duties collection at the entry of goods from the territory of a Member State in the other signatory states, except for certain categories of goods such as spirits, wines, sugar or tobacco[7].

To ensure and develop the organization created, Article 3 of the Convention establishes the creation of an Administrative Council of Customs, composed of three delegates from the Economic Union Belgium-Luxembourg and as many from the Netherlands, with President exercised in turn by delegates of the Union and the Netherlands. The purpose of this Council was to propose the necessary measures to harmonize laws and regulations and administrative regulations regarding the levying of customs duties in the Member States[8].

We see virtually in those provisions, a possible source of inspiration for future Commissions of the European Communities.

The Board of Directors will be assisted under Article 4, by a Commission of customs disputes, composed of two delegates from the Economic Union Belgium-Luxembourg and the Netherlands, which will decide, ultimately, on complaints relating to decisions of competent bodies of the Parties, which are considering applying legal provisions or administrative regulations resulting from application of the Convention. Member States enforce the Commission's decisions[9].

In our view, there can be identified some similarities between this committee and the forthcoming Court of Justice of the European Communities, also accounting for the task of ensuring the interpretation and uniform application of Community law.

Further, the Convention also provides for the establishment of a Council of Administrative Regulations for Foreign Trade, with a similar composition of the Administrative Board of Customs and a presidency exercised according to the same model. It will have the mission to provide advice to the competent authorities of the Member States in all matters they wish to regulate, in matters covered by the Convention (customs duties, charges having equivalent effect, imports and exports, transit of goods, licenses, quotas, administrative fees) and coordinate the measures to achieve a common regime in the Member States, to ensure the administration of import, export and transit quotas, common to the Member States and to provide advice to the competent authorities of the Member States concerning all legal measures related to bonuses or grants which Member States want applied[10].

We must not forget the Commercial Agreements Council, composed and chaired by the same rules, competent to ensure as far as possible, the coordination of provisions relative to the relations with third countries[11].

We can identify, in the mentioned institutional framework, the seeds of future supranational institutions of the Communities and later the European Union, although the proportions should be maintained properly and assimilation cannot exceed a limited correspondence. However, given that constructions such as the Communities rarely occur spontaneously, ideas that lead to their creation have evolved gradually, step by step, we consider useful their exposure in the study which we bring to your attention.

Another provision which appears as interesting consists of temporal application of this agreement, conceived as unlimited[12], which is detached from the practice that we observe applied in international relations, in the period under review.

The aforementioned Customs Union came into force on January 1st, 1948, supporting with its innovative means, however limited they may be, economic recovery, encouraging a free trade in the area bounded signatory states' territories.

4. Transposition of the cooperative spirit of the UN Charter in Europe. Alliance and Mutual Assistance Treaty of Dunkirk.

As indicated in the title of this part of our study, in our opinion, the UN Charter and general predominance of the idea that peaceful cooperation between countries is the paradigm taking place in relations between the states of postwar democratic world. However, in terms of the Treaty which we will analyze, a number of other considerations will contribute to it materialization.

Thus, as we can deduce from the works of neoliberal and constructivist thinkers of international relations science, the cooperation's culture between the two countries can influence in a significant way, their mutual actions. In this sense, history shows the existence of a long cooperation between Britain and France in the field of security, began with Entente Cordiale, marking overcoming the millennial rivalry between the two countries, which did not correspond to the interests and circumstances of the present times. As a result of this agreement, the two states form common front in World War I against Germany, and the second conflagration places them in almost exactly the same circumstances.

It is not surprising, therefore, that, just two years after the end of World War between the years 1939-1945, Britain and France signed in Dunkirk, on Belgian territory (a place chosen also because of its symbolic significance for Anglo-French solidarity, manifested through the joint effort of evacuating approximately 340,000 combatants, of which 120,000 French and Belgian, before the German offensive against France and Belgium, in the spring and summer of 1940), a Treaty of Alliance and Mutual Assistance, on March 4th, 1947.

Even in its Preamble, the parties affirm their desire to confirm, through a treaty, cordial friendship and close association of interests.

The parties also noted the same Preamble, their determination to work together through mutual assistance in the event of any renewal of German aggressive trends, stating also their belief in the sense of opportunity of concluding a treaty between all parties which hold responsibilities in relation to Germany, in order to prevent it from turning again into a threat to peace.

We see, therefore, in this paragraph, both the intention of extending forms of European cooperation and reminiscences of strategic thinking in the periods before and during the two World Wars. Of course, looking in retrospect at the events, it is easy to accuse Europeans decision-makers of the time of a slight myopia in connection with the distribution of further power and the source of threats to their security, but, judging by the information which they had and in the paradigm of thought developed in previous decades of this Treaty, including marked by two world wars which had Germany as the protagonist, their approach appears as natural. Moreover, we can not know whether the further development of the European security architecture would have been the same if French and German leaders would not be afraid of an uncontrolled rearmament from Germany and would have not insisted to include in all their integrative endeavours.

However, we consider important to note that the Treaty of Dunkirk includes provisions that exceed the security scope aimed at deepening French-British cooperation in a number of other areas. Thus, the Preamble to the Treaty also underlines the intention of the Parties to strengthen economic relations between them to their mutual advantage and in the interest of general prosperity.

However, in terms of the security aspect, Article I of the Treaty includes the obligation of the Contracting Parties to undertake, after mutual consultation and, if necessary, with prospective parties which would have responsibilities for the German problem, those actions on which they will agree upon to end any threats arising from the adoption by Germany of a policy of aggression or any action to facilitate such a policy[13].

We note in this article, the existence of provisions designed to give Parties the ability to combat since the beginning any aggressive policy of Germany, without allowing it to benefit from the respite necessary to put intentions in practice, as it happened in the recent war that ended. Basically, we can say that we are dealing with a preventive action mechanism which, once implemented, prevents escalation of violence to war.

However, if either Party saw itself again involved in hostilities with Germany, triggered both by an attack launched by Germany and the action carried out in accordance with Article I, described above, the other Party shall provide immediately the full support, military or otherwise, which lies in its possibilities[14].

Moreover, the Treaty also includes in its article V, the obligation for Contracting Parties not to enter into any alliance and not to take part in any coalition directed against the other Party and not to assume any obligation which is not in accordance with the Treaty[15].

[12] Ibidem, art. 8.
[13] Alliance and Mutual Assistance Treaty of Dunkirk, art. I.
[14] Ibidem, art. II.

Regarding the duration of this agreement, Article VI sets it to a period of 50 years.

Therefore, in our opinion, we are dealing with an embryo of the future European security architecture. Although maybe its provisions do not represent something new and do not have a pan-European vocation, the Treaty lays the foundation of cooperation that will expand gradually and can be seen in this paradigm as the first part of the whole that is to be defined.

5. Strengthening cooperation on the issue of security. Western Union.

As previously stated, the Treaty of Dunkirk is only a first security cooperation exercise between West European states. Shortly after its signing, policymakers in Britain and France realized that, compared with tensions between Western countries and the Soviet Union (fueled by the aggressive behaviour thereof, exemplified by events such as the Berlin Blockade or the establishment by force of some governments faithful to the Soviet power in Eastern Europe, including Romania) the coalition effort of European states should strengthen. Moreover, we are witnessing, in the same period, a gradual shift of attention from a possible rearmament of Germany, in an uncertain future, to the Soviet aggression, immediately perceptible. This is the framework in which the second security organization analyzed will be established, the Western Union.

Thus, the Constitutive Treaty signed in Brussels on 17th of March, 1948 by representatives of Belgium, France, Luxembourg, the Netherlands and the UK will include, in the preamble, reaffirming the intention of signatory parties to preserve their faith in fundamental rights of the human being, in the dignity and worth of the person and in the other ideals proclaimed in the Charter of the United Nations.

Also, the same Treaty contains a number of core values that Member States share, including democracy, personal and political freedom, constitutional traditions of the Member and the rule of law, considered the common heritage of the legal systems and political conditions in Western Europe.

Accordingly, Member states reaffirm their desire to strengthen the economic, social and cultural ties between them, on which to coordinate their efforts to create an adequate basis for European economic recovery.

In addition to these targets, Parties emphasize what will become, in fact, the most important component of the Organization, namely the security aspect. Accordingly, mutual assistance is an aim of their approach, in accordance with the provisions of the UN Charter, for the maintenance of an international climate of peace and security and to combat any policy of aggression, coming not only from Germany (specifically mentioned) but also from other international players (undefined).

The open, pan-European nature that the Treaty wanted to print to this construction is further emphasized by the desire to associate progressively other states that share the same principles and are animated by the same goals.

However, the Treaty does not begin to state the provisions relating to collective defense, but by the economic provisions. Thus, Article I contains the obligation for Member States to organize economic policies so as to support the common goal of European economic recovery and eliminate the conflict of mutual economic relations.

In order to harmonize the interests and actions of signatory states in the economic sphere an Advisory Board is constituted by the same Article I, stating that membership in it does not contravene the Members' belonging to any other forms of economic association, as long as they pursue similar objectives[16].

Article II of the Treaty also contains a very interesting and ambitious objective, namely to cooperate, both at headquarters and in the various bodies and agencies to achieve a high level of life standard and to accelerate economic and social development in signatory states[17].

Similarly, Article III includes members' wish to promote cultural ties that unite them, forming the foundation of their common civilization[18].

Collective defense will make its appearance in Article IV, which states that if one of the parties will become subject to an armed attack, taking place within the geographical limits of the European continent, the other Parties are obliged to give, in accordance with the provisions of Article 51 of the UN Charter, the necessary assistance, by any means, including military[19].

Moreover, Article VI continues a provision mentioned in the Treaty of Dunkirk, namely the obligation of the parties not to take part in any agreement that would imply provisions contrary to this Treaty[20].

The same treaty also includes provisions concerning the settlement of any dispute between Member States which, through its article VIII, brings [15] Ibidem, art. V.

[16] Treaty between Belgium, France, Luxembourg, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, signed in Brussels on March 17, 1948, art. I.
[17] Ibidem, art. II.
[18] Ibidem, art. III.
[19] Ibidem, art. IV.
[20] Ibidem, art. VI.

them to the attention of the International Court of Justice, if states from which the dispute arises are unable to settle it by better operational means[21].

Moreover, Article IX provides for the possibility for Contracting Parties to invite other member countries to be part of this agreement, if they agree with the principles, values and concrete provisions thereof[22].

Article X establishes, exactly as in the case of the Treaty of Dunkirk, whose natural continuation I, the same validity period of 50 years[23].

We therefore have before us a linear, continuous example of the European security construction and furthermore, of the cooperation development and, ultimately, European integration. This is the conclusion we are led to both due to the expansion of the membership of the new construction, in relation to the Treaty of Dunkirk and the horizontal and vertical development of areas covered by the Treaty, the ongoing cooperation also including economic and cultural aspects, but setting up a specialized institution to coordinate them. Of course, in spite of certain results in economic and social policy and some meetings devoted to this theme, between the Parties, these areas will fall in relative disuse, with the establishment of some perfected forms in the field, here referring mainly to European communities. The security side, however, will develop, gradually having increasingly more advanced forms.

Until then, we propose to consider the efforts made by European countries in the predominantly civil fields.

6. Economic cooperation at continental level. Organization for Economic Cooperation in Europe.

As we said at the beginning of our study, after the end of World War I, Europe was in a state of unprecedented devastation, which left European countries vulnerable to any shock from outside. In this world that was struggling to find itself after the War, two superpowers were left with no other potential adversary, namely the USA and the Soviet Union, and their confrontation would mark the following five decades of world's history, placed under the sign of bipolarism.

United States came out of war with an industry intensified by the effort to support its specific military actions and changing again major industrial producers in the production of peace put a difficult problem, namely targeting goods surplus, which otherwise could create an overproduction crisis. That is why the United States needed a European market able to absorb goods produced and which exceeded domestic consumption capabilities. But more than that, the United States could not afford communism to expand in Europe. However strong the US economy was, it could not exist without a free world with which to conclude commercial agreements. And as widespread poverty, installed in Europe after WWII could only encourage the rise to power of the communist parties supported by the Soviet Union, it was necessary to help these countries to overcome this state of poverty and thus limit the audience of communist parties[24].

The way to achieve these goals has been stated, for the first time publicly by Secretary of State George C. Marshall, in a speech in June 5, 1947, at Harvard University in Cambridge, Massachusetts. His plan, subsequently approved by Congress, which would bear his name, included a helping scheme for European countries on the basis of agreements with each of them, in order to re-launch their economies and combat communist influence. The Marshall Plan, however, involved a much larger mobilization of energies favourable to democracy across Europe, including the opinion leaders' activity, radio and TV media, intellectuals', civil society's activities etc. This vast concentration of energies has reached its goal, in the first elections organized in the European states, after launching the aid plan, communist parties registering unfavourable results.[25] However, the Marshall Plan remains, in our view, the Europeans subjected to Communist dictatorships, a distant dream and a limited success, as the Soviet Union did not allow states in its sphere of influence to benefit from US aid.

US aid has also assumed, however, another aspect, namely to encourage, by the Partners over the Ocean, economic cooperation among European states in order to improve its effects. In this regard, benefitting from the contribution of American diplomacy, the governments of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, Norway, Netherlands, Portugal, United Kingdom, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the powers in charge with the occupation areas of Germany, signed on 16 April 1948, in Paris, the Convention for European Economic Cooperation.

The Convention contains a number of obligations on Member States, where we would certainly recognize future provisions of the Treaties establishing the European Communities.

Thus, in the very first article of the Convention, the Parties agree to work closely for the development and execution of a concerted economic recovery program. Its objective was to achieve in the shortest time, and to maintain at a satisfactory level the economic activity, limiting external aid needs, and to develop mutual economic exchanges with third countries. With this stipulation, the signatory states approved the establishment of an Economic Cooperation Organizations in Europe[26].

In accordance with Article 2, the Contracting Parties undertook the obligation to strongly promote the development of their production, through the effective use of available resources[27].

Also, under the auspices of the Organization, Member States will set up programs for the joint production and exchange of goods. Further, Article 4 is the core of developing countries' efforts in cooperation, the highest possible level of interchange of goods and services. To this end, States bear the obligation to create in the shortest time, a multilateral system of payments and cooperate to ease restrictions on trade and payments between them, in order to finally abolish these restrictions completely[28].

In addition, they will continue to study the possibility of establishing a Customs Union or an arrangement similar to a free trade area, as a means to achieve goals set by the Convention[29].

States will also assume the obligation to ensure the attainment and maintenance of relative stability of prices and macroeconomic coordinates, which will increase their credibility internationally[30].

Another interesting provision, in perspective, of the Convention is the obligation for Member States to seek full employment of labour force and, when needed, to use labour from other partner states. To this end, Article 8 encourages states to adopt measures for the establishment of free movement of labour force and freedom of residence for workers' families and, as a prospect, for the abolition of all obstacles to the free movement of persons in general[31].

Aims of the Organization were, under the Convention, to prepare and implement measures needed to achieve the aspirations set out in Article 11 (a high level of European economy and cooperation between Members), to facilitate the implementation of this Convention, to adopt the measures necessary for its enforcement and to facilitate the optimal use of states' resources, whether internal or external, and to manage the relationship with the US or other third countries in order to conclude commercial agreements[32].

The Convention also establishes a specific institutional system to the freshly created Organization, consisting of a Board, as a supreme decision-making body, which includes representatives of all Member States, an Executive Committee consisting of seven members appointed annually by the Council, before which there is a Secretary General, responsible for managing the technical aspects, a Secretariat, subordinated to it, technical committees and other bodies. Also, the Organization reiterates, in Article 25, its open character[33].

We find practically, in the scheme shown, both common elements of cooperative organizations and elements that can lead us thinking about the future institutional structure of the European Communities.

7. Initial moments of political cooperation. Council of Europe.

The idea of setting any kind of European political cooperation, in less than five years after a devastating war that took millions of lives, harmed profound national dignity of the belligerent states and, normally, would have created animosity difficult to overcome between countries and peoples of Europe seems difficult if not impossible to conceive, unless we consider the existence, even during war, of some strong resistance movements, in both countries occupied by the Axis powers, and within them.

Furthermore, reversing the course of history made it that, after the war, many members of the movements mentioned or supporters of their ideas reached decision-making positions in West European countries, and thereby had the opportunity to put into practice pro-European vision.

After the feverish activity of all groups of major pro-European influence, on 7 May 1948, an International Congress for the coordination of movements favourable to European unity was convened, in Hague. Although many ideas were presented there, some contradictory and important differences between federalist and functionalist followers were revealed, participants failed to agree on a political resolution calling for convening a representative European assembly, drafting a Charter of Human Rights and creating a Court of Justice charged with interpreting and defending its observance. Actually, their approach benefits from the entire efforts of the US administration, favourable, in general, to the idea of European unity and even more to a form of European unity that includes the Federal Republic of Germany. European federalist movement representatives addressed on 18 August 1948 their draft to the European governments concerned[34].

They managed to capture the interest of governments in France and BENELUX, but faced opposition from Great Britain, which rejected the idea of international institutions (or, rather, supranational institutions) whose members are not appointed by the governments of the organization's member states they belong to. To overcome the crisis, a study committee for the European Union was constituted on October 26, 1948, meeting in Paris under the chairmanship of Edouard Heriott. The Committee reached an agreement and presented Governments of the States mentioned a draft of European Union on 15 December 1948, only to be faced with a new British refusal. After further negotiations, the foreign ministers of the countries concerned reached an agreement on the creation of a Council of Ministers endowed with certain powers of decision and a Consultative Assembly, where members are appointed under a procedure chosen by each individual government[35].

The Five (France, UK and the BENELUX countries) invited representatives of Ireland, Italy, Denmark, Norway and Sweden to attend the Conference on the creation of the Council of Europe, held in Saint-James Palace, in London, between 3 and 5 May 1949, after which there was signed what was to become the Council of Europe Statute, which entered into force on August 3rd, the same year, after ratification by the UK[36].

Basically, these efforts contain the steps of creating a European Union, a federative entity that, even if it will not be carried out on this occasion, it will inspire efforts to create Communities that will give birth, tens of years later, to today's European Union, which, in turn, can only represent the form of a construction in progress to strengthen.

In what follows, we will present some of the essential provisions of the Agreement on the Statute of the Council of Europe, as it was adopted in 1949. Of course, this document has undergone a number of changes over time, which we will approach in other research efforts.

First, we wish to emphasize that, in the preamble of the Agreement, the signatories considered that it represented the mission of the new Organization. Thus, they emphasized their conviction that consolidation of peace, founded on the ideas of justice and international cooperation is essential for the survival of human society and civilization. Attached to the spiritual and moral values that represented the common heritage of their peoples and which are underlying the principles of individual and political freedom and the rule of law, underpinning genuine democracy, they decided to constitute a Council of Europe consisting of a Committee representing Governments and the Consultative Assembly.

Further, Article 1 of the Statute clearly establishes the Organization's goal: achieving greater unity between Member States and safeguarding and promoting the ideals and principles which are their common heritage and favors their economic and social progress, an aim had in view through the established institutions. However, letter d) of the same article states expressly that problems in the sphere of national security and defense are outside the Council of Europe's competence[37].

To strengthen the above, Article 3 reiterates that all Member States recognize the principle of the rule of law and the one according to which all persons under its jurisdiction enjoy the provisions concerning its human rights and fundamental freedoms, for the observance of which Member States are committed to work together[38].

The open nature of the new organization, for any European state that adheres to the principles laid down by the Statute, is outlined in Article 4, while sanctions for failure to comply with it, which can reach up to the withdrawal of membership, are outlined in Article 8.

Further, the Statute provides the institutional structure of the Council, made up of the Committee of Ministers and the Parliamentary Assembly (Consultative, in the French version of the Statute of 1949).

Of these, the Committee of Ministers, composed of the external affairs ministers of member states has as responsibilities examining, on a recommendation from the Parliamentary Assembly or on its own initiative, measures that are necessary to accomplish the purpose of the Council's existence and to facilitate the conclusion, by the States, of international agreements and conventions in the field, thus trying to coordinate their foreign policies, in the areas within its competence. The Committee of Ministers presents the activity report to the Parliamentary Assembly, at each session[39].

As for the Parliamentary Assembly, it is the deliberative body of the Council, responsible for the debate of relevant issues in the fields of competence, and for submitting its conclusions to the Committee of Ministers, in the form of recommendations. The Assembly is composed of representatives of Member States, designated under the 1949 Statute, at the desire of Great Britain, according to the rules adopted by each state. Membership of the Assembly is incompatible with that of Member of the Committee of Ministers[40].

Moreover, the Statute also details the rules of procedure applicable to the institutions mentioned, especially regarding the voting rules for each area. The Council also benefits from the contribution of a Secretariat responsible with managing the organizational aspects involved by the Organization's existence and activity[41].

We are, therefore, dealing with an organization which benefited from a particularly promising foundation, the pro-European effervescence provided by the federalist movements, but failed in fulfilling the federalist ideal, coming down to an intergovernmental character. It results from a compromise between the original federalist idea and the desire to ensure a pan-European vocation of the Council, in particular by including Great Britain in its composition. Or, as we see in many other aspects related to British foreign policy guidelines, and the dominant mentality at all levels, in this state, the United Kingdom is a constant source of opposition to the supranational aspirations.

8. Conclusions

Summarizing the presented information so far, we are able to conclude that World War II and the new worldwide balance of power that were brought contributed, by undermining the foundations of traditional politics power in Europe and by the shock generated by the magnitude of its catastrophical results, and the emergence of a new actor involved in European issues, namely the US, the emergence and development of a system of cooperation focused on several levels, which led, ultimately, to the creation of the European Communities and, for a longer period of time, the European Union. Moreover, even this creation can not be seen as the end of the road by the analyzed developments, but also as an evolving entity, as can be seen even from the analysis of recent events.

Thus, the analyzed period began with an example of an economic cooperation, namely Benelux Customs Union, in the section dedicated to it being presented as a first exercise of its kind in Europe. Further, we showed how cooperation can target the military aspect, analyzing moments such as the Treaty of Dunkirk or the establishment of Western Union, both steps seen as based on fear of a possible new rearmament of Germany. Next, we presented the role of US involvement in Europe's economic recovery, but also the specific requirements its Atlantic partner had in order to obtain the requested aid, which have an important role in developing a culture of cooperation among European states. Finally, we presented a first exercise of political and legal cooperation between the European states, also exposing the moments that preceded, generated and promoted the creation of the Council of Europe.

In our opinion, the ideas in this framework can be a useful working tool for the readers interested in studying the phenomenon of European construction, thanks to the fact that gives them details about a period somewhat less analyzed in the domestic space. However, our aim is also to provide premises for the elaboration of approaches for future research, in which case the communication face only serves to draw attention to this field of study, which we consider important because of the natural need to know the starting points, the premises and the context that generated the paradigm in which we find ourselves now.

In particular, we see as possible developments of this theme, the analysis of the initial moments of European Communities, of the stranded episodes as the European Defence Community and European Political Community and, in a broaded context, the development of some works that present, in a full picture, the evolution of cooperation and European integration in the aftermath of the Second World War, giving all the main organizations that make up this framework, in a chronological unfolding, enabling the analysis of the relationships between them and their systemic research.

At the end of this presentation, we can say that, in our opinion, analyzing the constitution and peculiarities of postwar international European organizations, prior to the European Communities, reveals that the idea of European unity, circulated more or less concrete for nearly a millennium, in the space of the Old Continent, reaches, both before and during, and especially after the Second World War, a level of concreteness which places it already, under its various aspects, on the agenda of European and even Americans policy makers. However, at least so far, despite a surprisingly high degree of acceptance of the need for Europe to move in the future towards a federal form of organization, actual achievements are not approaching this level. In other words, "the European construction has oscillated since its beginning between integration and cooperation, between deepening and staging / rescheduling the progresses that had to be achieved from the collaboration between states"[42]This, however, does not justify, in our view, a highly critical approach of the progress achieved in this period in terms of putting the European idea into practice. It is true that, for starters, cooperation focused on the economic component and limited regionally, but we can also notice a cooperation increasingly more extensive at the security level between almost all countries of Western Europe, which will result in future in including Germany, which ended the German aggressive policy, regular source of conflict in Europe. Moreover, we can notice how, after economic and security cooperation exercise, we are witnessing the first political approach that will bring together gradually, almost all European countries, which is, with all its drawbacks outlined above, a first in the tumultuous history of Europe.

All these efforts represent a great milestone in the history of Europe, which makes the transition to a new paradigm that will get more concrete forms with the creation of the European Communities.
